

DUMBARTON OAKS STUDIES

XXXV

BYZANTINE MONASTIC FOUNDATION DOCUMENTS

Volume 1

BYZANTINE MONASTIC FOUNDATION DOCUMENTS

A Complete Translation of the Surviving Founders' Typika and Testaments

Volume 1

Edited by

John Thomas

and Angela Constantinides Hero with the assistance of

Giles Constable

Translated by Robert Allison

Anastasius Bandy

George Dennis

Gianfranco Fiaccadori

Catia Galatariotou

Ilija Iliev

Patricia Karlin-Hayter

Robert Jordan

Leslie S. B. MacCoull

Timothy Miller

Joseph Munitiz

Stephen Reinert

Nancy Patterson Ševčenko

Alice-Mary Talbot

John Thomas

with an administrative commentary by

John Thomas

Dumbarton Oaks Research Library and Collection
Washington, D.C.

Copyright © 2000 by Dumbarton Oaks
Trustees for Harvard University

All rights reserved
Printed in the United States of America

Library of Congress Cataloging-in-Publication Data

Byzantine monastic foundation documents: a complete translation of the surviving founders' typika and testaments / edited by John Thomas and Angela Constantinides Hero; with the assistance of Giles Constable; translated by Robert Allison. . .[et al.] ; with an administrative commentary by John Thomas.

p. cm. (—Dumbarton Oaks studies ; 35)

Includes bibliographical references.

ISBN 0-88402-232-3 (hc.)—ISBN 0-88402-289-7 (pbk.)

1. Monasticism and religious orders, Orthodox Eastern—Byzantine Empire—
History—Sources. 2. Monasteries, Orthodox Eastern—Byzantine Empire—History—
Sources. 3. Byzantine Empire—Church history—Sources. I. Thomas, John, 1951– .
II. Hero, Angela Constantinides, 1926– .
III. Constable, Giles.

BX385.B9B95 1998
255' .819—DC21

98-19254
CIP

Contents

Volume 1

Preface	xi
Acknowledgments	xxxix
Abbreviations	xliii
Introduction	1
Maps (Sites of monasteries)	follows page 20
Early Monastic Rules	21
CHAPTER ONE: Traditional Private Religious Foundations
Introduction	43
Seventh Century
1. Apa Abraham: Testament of Apa Abraham, Bishop of Hermonthis, for the Monastery of St. Phoibammon near Thebes, Egypt (trans. Leslie S. B. MacCoull)	51
Eighth Century
2. Pantelleria: Typikon of John for the Monastery of St. John the Forerunner on Pantelleria (trans. Gianfranco Fiaccadori)	59
Ninth Century
3. Theodore Studites: Testament of Theodore the Studite for the Monastery of St. John Stoudios in Constantinople (trans. Timothy Miller)	67
4. Stoudios: Rule of the Monastery of St. John Stoudios in Constantinople (trans. Timothy Miller)	84
Tenth Century
5. Euthymios: Testament of Euthymios for the Monasteries of Psamathia and Ta Agathou (trans. Patricia Karlin-Hayter)	120
6. Rila: Testament of John of Rila (trans. Ilija Iliev)	125
7. Latros: Testament of Paul the Younger for the Monastery of the Mother of God tou Stylou on Mount Latros (trans. Gianfranco Fiaccadori)	135
Eleventh Century
8. John Xenos: Testament of John Xenos for the Monastery of the Mother of God Antiphonetria of Myriokephala on Crete (trans. Gianfranco Fiaccadori)	143
9. Galesios: Testament of Lazarus of Mount Galesios (trans. Patricia Karlin-Hayter)	148

CONTENTS

10. Eleousa: Rule of Manuel, Bishop of Stroumitza, for the Monastery of the Mother of God Eleousa (trans. Anastasius Bandy)	167
CHAPTER TWO: Athonite Monasteries
Introduction	193
Tenth Century
11. Ath. Rule: Rule of Athanasios the Athonite for the Lavra Monastery (trans. George Dennis)	205
12. Tzimiskes: Typikon of Emperor John Tzimiskes (trans. George Dennis)	232
13. Ath. Typikon: Typikon of Athanasios the Athonite for the Lavra Monastery (trans. George Dennis)	245
14. Ath. Testament: Testament of Athanasios the Athonite for the Lavra Monastery (trans. George Dennis)	271
15. Constantine IX: Typikon of Emperor Constantine IX Monomachos (trans. Timothy Miller)	281
CHAPTER THREE: The Protectorate
Introduction	295
Tenth Century
16. Mount Tmolos: Typikon of Nikephoros Erotikos for the Monastery of the Mother of God and the Old Age Home called Ta Derma on Mount Tmolos (trans. John Thomas)	310
17. Nikon Metanoeite: Testament of Nikon the Metanoeite for the Church and Monastery of the Savior, the Mother of God and St. Kyriake in Lakedaimon (trans. Anastasius Bandy)	313
Eleventh Century
18. Nea Gephyra: Testament of Nikodemos for the Monastery of Nea Gephyra near Lakedaimon (trans. Stephen Reinert)	323
19. Attaleiates: Rule of Michael Attaleiates for his Almshouse in Rhaidestos and for the Monastery of Christ Panoiktirmon in Constantinople (trans. Alice-Mary Talbot)	326
20. Black Mountain: Regulations of Nikon of the Black Mountain (trans. Robert Allison)	377
Twelfth Century
21. Roidion: Typikon of Nikon of the Black Mountain for the Monastery and Hospice of the Mother of God tou Roidiou (trans. Robert Allison)	425

CONTENTS

Volume 2

CHAPTER FOUR: Early Reform Monasteries of the Eleventh Century
Introduction	441
22. Evergetis: Typikon of Timothy for the Monastery of the Mother of God Evergetis (trans. Robert Jordan)	454
23. Pakourianos: Typikon of Gregory Pakourianos for the Monastery of the Mother of God Petrizonitissa in Bačkovo (trans. Robert Jordan)	507
24. Christodoulos: Rule, Testament and Codicil of Christodoulos for the Monastery of St. John the Theologian on Patmos (trans. Patricia Karlin-Hayter)	564
CHAPTER FIVE: Imperial and Royal Monasteries of the Twelfth Century
Introduction	607
25. Fragala: Testaments of Gregory for the Monastery of St. Philip of Fragala in Sicily (trans. Patricia Karlin-Hayter and Timothy Miller)	621
26. Luke of Messina: Typikon of Luke for the Monastery of Christ Savior (San Salvatore) in Messina (trans. Timothy Miller)	637
27. Kecharitomene: Typikon of Empress Irene Doukaina Komnene for the Convent of the Mother of God Kecharitomene in Constantinople (trans. Robert Jordan)	649
28. Pantokrator: Typikon of Emperor John II Komnenos for the Monastery of Christ Pantokrator in Constantinople (trans. Robert Jordan)	725
29. Kosmosoteira: Typikon of the Sebastokrator Isaac Komnenos for the Monastery of the Mother of God Kosmosoteira near Bera (trans. Nancy Patterson Ševčenko)	782

Volume 3

CHAPTER SIX: Early Reform Monasteries of the Twelfth Century
Introduction	859
30. Phoberos: Rule of John for the Monastery of St. John the Forerunner of Phoberos (trans. Robert Jordan)	872
31. Areia: Memorandum and Typikon of Leo, Bishop of Nauplia, for the Monastery of the Mother of God in Areia (trans. Alice-Mary Talbot)	954
32. Mamas: Typikon of Athanasios Philanthropenos for the Monastery of St. Mamas in Constantinople (trans. Anastasius Bandy)	973
33. Heliou Bomon: Typikon of Nikephoros Mystikos for the Monastery of the Mother of God ton Heliou Bomon or Elegmon (trans. Anastasius Bandy)	1042
CHAPTER SEVEN: Independent and Self-Governing Monasteries of the Thirteenth Century
Introduction	1093

CONTENTS

34. Machairas : Rule of Neilos, Bishop of Tamasia, for the Monastery of the Mother of God of Machairas in Cyprus (trans. Anastasius Bandy)	1107
35. Skoteine [Boreine] : Testament of Maximos for the Monastery of the Mother of God at Skoteine near Philadelphia (trans. George Dennis)	1176
36. Blemmydes : Typikon of Nikephoros Blemmydes for the Monastery of the Lord Christ-Who-Is at Ematha near Ephesos (trans. Joseph Munitiz)	1196
37. Auxentios : Typikon of Michael VIII Palaiologos for the Monastery of the Archangel Michael on Mount Auxentios near Chalcedon (trans. George Dennis)	1207
38. Kellibara I : Typikon of Michael VIII Palaiologos for the Monastery of St. Demetrios of the Palaiologoi-Kellibara in Constantinople (trans. George Dennis)	1237
39. Lips : Typikon of Theodora Palaiologina for the Convent of Lips in Constantinople (trans. Alice-Mary Talbot)	1254
40. Anargyroi : Typikon of Theodora Palaiologina for the Convent of Sts. Kosmas and Damian in Constantinople (trans. Alice-Mary Talbot)	1287

Volume 4

CHAPTER EIGHT: Later Private Religious Foundations

Introduction	1295
Twelfth Century
41. Docheiariou : Rule of Neophytos for the Monastery of St. Michael the Archangel of Docheiariou on Mount Athos (trans. Robert Allison)	1303
42. Sabas : Founder's Typikon of the Sabas Monastery near Jerusalem (trans. Gianfranco Fiaccadori)	1311
43. Kasoulon : Rule of Nicholas for the Monastery of St. Nicholas of Kasoulon near Otranto (trans. Timothy Miller)	1319
44. Karyes : Typikon of Sabbas the Serbian for the Kellion of St. Sabbas at Karyes on Mount Athos (trans. George Dennis)	1331
Thirteenth Century
45. Neophytos : Testamentary Rule of Neophytos for the Hermitage of the Holy Cross near Ktima in Cyprus (trans. Catia Galatariotou)	1338
Fourteenth Century
46. Akropolites : Testament of Constantine Akropolites for the Monastery of the Resurrection (Anastasis) in Constantinople (trans. Alice-Mary Talbot)	1374
47. Philanthropos : Typikon of Irene Choumnaina Palaiologina for the Convent of Christ Philanthropos in Constantinople (trans. Alice-Mary Talbot)	1383
48. Prodromos : Testament of Neilos for the Monastery of St. John the Forerunner (Prodromos) on Mount Athos (trans. Stephen Reinert)	1389

CONTENTS

49. Geromeri: Testament of Neilos Erichiotes for the Monastery of the Mother of God Hodegetria in Geromeri (trans. George Dennis)	1396
50. Gerasimos: Testament of Gerasimos for the Small Monastery of St. Euthymios in Jerusalem (trans. George Dennis)	1404
51. Koutloumousi: Testaments of Chariton for the Monastery of Christ Savior of Koutloumousi on Mount Athos (trans. George Dennis)	1408
52. Choumnos: Rule and Testament of Makarios Choumnos for the Nea Mone of the Mother of God in Thessalonike (trans. Alice-Mary Talbot)	1433
53. Meteora: Canonical Rule of Athanasios the Meteorite for the Monastery of the Transfiguration (Metamorphosis) (trans. George Dennis)	1455
Fifteenth Century
54. Neilos Damilas: Testament and Typikon of Neilos Damilas for the Convent of the Mother of God Pantanassa at Baionaia on Crete (trans. Alice-Mary Talbot)	1462
CHAPTER NINE: Independent and Self-Governing Monasteries of the Fourteenth and Fifteenth Centuries
Introduction	1483
Fourteenth Century
55. Athanasios I: Rule of Patriarch Athanasios I (trans. Timothy Miller)	1495
56. Kellibara II: Typikon of Andronikos II Palaiologos for the Monastery of St. Demetrios-Kellibara in Constantinople (trans. George Dennis)	1505
57. Bebaia Elpis: Typikon of Theodora Synadene for the Convent of the Mother of God Bebaia Elpis in Constantinople (trans. Alice-Mary Talbot)	1512
58. Menoikeion: Typikon of Joachim, Metropolitan of Zichna, for the Monastery of St. John the Forerunner on Mount Menoikeion near Serres (trans. Timothy Miller)	1579
Fifteenth Century
59. Manuel II: Typikon of Manuel II Palaiologos for the Monasteries of Mount Athos (trans. George Dennis)	1613
60. Charsianeites: Testament of Patriarch Matthew I for the Monastery of Charsianeites Dedicated to the Mother of God Nea Peribleptos (trans. Alice-Mary Talbot)	1625
61. Eleousa Inv.: Inventory of the Monastery of the Mother of God Eleousa in Stroumitza (trans. Anastasius Bandy, with Nancy Ševčenko)	1667

Volume 5

Glossary	1679
Appendix A: Concordance with Previous Lists	1691
Appendix B: The Regulation of Diet in the Byzantine Monastic Foundation Documents	1696

Appendix C: Topical Interrelationships of the Families of the Typika of the Byzantine Monastic Reform Movement	1717
General Bibliography	1725
Index of People and Places	1745
General Index	1851

Preface

I

Among the many types of sources for the history of Byzantine monasticism, none are more important than the typika, or foundation documents, collected and translated in these volumes, which will make possible for the first time a comprehensive study of religious life and institutions in the Greek East and a comparison between Greek and Latin monasticism.¹ Together, the typika throw light on almost every aspect of Byzantine monastic life and its development from the eighth to the fifteenth century. Their nature is discussed by John Thomas in the introduction. They were flexible and personal documents, which differed considerably in form, length, and content. Not all of them were foundation documents in the strict sense, since they could be issued at any time in the history of an institution. Some were wills; others were reform decrees and rules; yet others were primarily liturgical in character.

Each typikon was normally written for a specific monastery and its dependencies and reflected the ideas and wishes of the writer. A few were designed for several monasteries, such as the houses on Mt. Athos or in Sicily. The typikon issued by Patriarch Athanasios I in 1303–5, (55) Athanasios I, was exceptional, since it applied in theory to all the monasteries in the empire and calls to mind the claims of papal monarchy in the West. There are many resemblances among the typika, and large parts of some were virtually copied from others. The typikon of the Stoudios monastery in Constantinople, (4) Stoudios, influenced the typika of many other houses, including (22) Evergetis, which in turn formed the basis of (29) Kosmosoteira, (32) Mamas, (33) Heliou Bomon, and others. The differences between these successive variations show not only the individuality of each monastery but also the changes in Byzantine monasticism over the centuries. Each typikon needs to be studied in terms of the history and circumstances of the monastery for which it was written.²

A typikon thus combined the features that in the West were found on the one hand in foundation charters, which established the legal and economic status of a monastery and were often

Note: The typika are cited by the number, in parentheses, and section, in brackets, of the translations in this edition.

¹ When this project was first conceived, in 1980, I planned to contribute a running commentary from the point of view of a historian of western monasticism, but this proved impossible owing to the size of the undertaking and the inevitable repetitions, given the number of topics that are treated in more than one typikon. I therefore decided to write a preface comparing some of the more salient characteristics of eastern monasticism as reflected in the typika with monasticism in the West, leaving the examination of more detailed questions for further study.

² According to Alice-Mary Talbot and Mark Johnson, "Monastery," ODB, p. 1391, "The organization of each monastery varied and was prescribed by its typikon."

PREFACE

formulaic in character,³ and on the other hand in the rules, customs, and statutes that applied to several houses and from which the personal elements found in the typika were excluded.⁴ There were no general monastic rules in the East, and no monastic orders in the western sense of the term.⁵ Honor was paid to the early monastic legislators, especially to Basil, but his so-called rules were not normative, and they differed from the typika in many respects, which are described in John Thomas's introduction, such as with regard to manual labor, intermonastic relations, and attitudes toward women. The Apophthegmata patrum, Precepts of Pachomios, and Book of Horsiesios were also known in the Middle Ages, but they never exercised the influence of the western rules and customs. There was also considerable variety in the West, particularly during the so-called period of the Mixed Rule, from the sixth to the eighth century, when no single rule predominated and some monasteries had their own rules, but the Carolingian reform in the early ninth century in principle imposed the Rule of Benedict on all monasteries. Many houses had their own customaries, which have been collected in the Corpus consuetudinum monasticarum,⁶ but they were within the framework of the Rule of Benedict, and most customaries were designed to promote a uniform liturgy and observance in groups of monastic houses, which were later referred to as orders. The customs of independent religious houses, including some of the greatest, such as Monte Cassino, were primarily enshrined in the memories and practices of their members. The customaries were supplemented in the eleventh and twelfth centuries, as the orders developed, by the statutes issued by the superiors of the mother house, as at Cluny, or by the decrees of general chapters, which included representatives from all the member houses, as in the orders of Cîteaux and Prémontré.⁷

It is possible that most Byzantine monasteries originally had their own typika, of which the surviving examples (except for a few liturgical typika) are collected here. They were sometimes confirmed by a public authority, preferably the emperor, and served as the legal basis and protection for the communities to which they were granted. In this they resembled foundation charters in the West but were more comprehensive in their scope and content. The typikon of the monastery of the archangel Michael, (37) Auxentios, was called a constitution [1], and that of the monastery of St. John the Forerunner, (58) Menoikeion, "this very monastic constitution" [22]. Previously, it

³ On the contrast between Byzantine typika and western monastic foundation charters, see the comments of Georg Schreiber, "Anselm von Havelberg und die Ostkirche," ZKG 60 (1941), 384–410, esp. 387–90, and "Byzantinisches und abendländisches Hospital," in his Gemeinschaften des Mittelalters (Münster, 1948), p. 9.

⁴ Adalbert de Vogüé, Les règles monastiques anciennes (400–700) (= Typologie des sources du moyen âge occidental 46) (Turnhout, 1985), pp. 22–23, stressed the parallel between eastern typika and early Latin, Irish, and Syrian monastic rules.

⁵ See Schreiber, "Anselm," pp. 397 and 403–4, who also stressed (pp. 394–95 and 407) that there was no Cluny and no St. Bernard nor St. Norbert in the East, and Alice-Mary Talbot, "Monasticism," ODB, p. 1393.

⁶ Corpus consuetudinum monasticarum, ed. Kassius Hallinger (Siegburg, 1963–), 12 vols. in 16 to date.

⁷ Jacques Hourlier, Le chapitre général jusqu'au moment du Grande Schisme (Paris, 1936). Collections of the statutes and decrees of the general chapters of the orders of Cluny and Cîteaux have been published, respectively, by Georges Charvin and Joseph-Marie Canivez.

PREFACE

appears, this latter house had neither “a typikon which could be produced at any time before an official or magistrate or in any kind of court where legal arguments regarding matters of the law and lawsuits take place” nor “an authoritative document in which all sorts of sacred matters are written down as well as other things such as the immovable property belonging to the monastery and the rights pertaining to these properties so that these remain stable and safeguarded against seizures” [2]. Some monasteries also had other types of governing documents. There is a reference in (54) Neilos Damilas for the convent of the Mother of God Pantanassa in Crete, which dates from about 1400, to a tabularion written not in Greek, the language of the nuns, but in Latin so that it could be understood by the Venetians who controlled Crete at that time [18].

Owing to their legal and practical importance, the typika were preserved with special care, to which there are many references. This unique character may also explain the prescriptions requiring that they be read aloud, sometimes as often as three, seven, or twelve times a year. Given the length and complexity of some of the typika, this must have been a time-consuming business, and if the members of the community paid attention, they would have known their typikon almost by heart. There are comparable provisions in the West for reading the Rule of the Master, Rule of Benedict, the Regula IV Patrum, and other early monastic rules.⁸ Writing was also of importance as the monastic orders spread in the high Middle Ages.⁹ Their rules and customs had a common character and were designed for many houses, however, in spite of particular observances, whereas monks and nuns in the East had a sense of their typikon as the embodiment and protection of their own special rights and way of life.

The difference between the typika in the East and the rules in the West affected the nature of the movements of monastic reform in the eleventh and twelfth centuries. Both reforms were directed against the abuses of the previous period, especially lay control over monasteries, and were designed to restrict the powers of founders and patrons and to assert institutional independence. Reformers in both the East and West, in spite of their admiration for individual hermits, preferred community life and cenobitical forms of monasticism to solitude or eremitism, which they associated with self-will, disobedience, and private property. The so-called eremitical movement was less concerned with promoting solitary forms of religious life than with founding monastic communities in isolated places, cut off from secular society. The western reformers often worked through public authorities, such as popes, kings, and bishops, and through councils that sought to establish the literal observance of the Rule of Benedict or the life of the primitive church.

The reform movement in Byzantium was primarily the work of individuals concerned with specific monasteries. Their typika frequently include details of their own lives both in the world and in religious institutions. The concepts of reform, renewal, and rebirth figured less prominently than in the western reform documents, and it may be significant that the term reformation (diorthosis) was used only in a typikon from Sicily, (26) Luke of Messina [5], where western influence was stronger than in the East. There was a great stress on tradition, and any innovation or change in a typikon was regarded with suspicion. The modalities of reform therefore differed from house to house, and there was no movement of reform that applied to all monasteries. The typika differ widely, for instance, in their provisions concerning the selection and installation of the superior and the admission and treatment of members of the community. From a modern point of view, they often seem to be repetitive, confused, and occasionally self-contradictory. Yet many of them were written by men and women of affairs and by experienced administrators, who were ready to make accommodations for the times and the circumstances of the institutions for which they were legislating rather than to lay down abstract principles that in practice they knew would be disregarded.¹⁰

⁸ Regula Magistri, ed. Adalbert de Vogüé ao, SC 105–7, vol. 2 (1964), p. 126, n. 15.

⁹ On the importance of writing for religious groups, see Gert Melville, “Zur Funktion der Schriftlichkeit im institutionellen Gefüge mittelalterlicher Orden,” Frühmittelalterliche Studien 25 (1991), 392–93.

PREFACE

Behind these differences lay important common principles, however, and the parallels and resemblances among monastic institutions all over the Christian world were the result less of specific influences or traditions than of the distinctive way of life led by men and women who had left secular society to serve God and were dedicated to prayer, virginity, and unworldliness. Since at least the time of Cassian and Basil, the religious life was compared to that of angels. The monks of Mt. Athos were described in (44) Karyes as “angels here on earth” [2], and in (57) Bebaia Elpis the nuns in Constantinople followed an “ascetic or angelic way of life” [37] and imitated Christ, the apostles, and the martyrs [41–42]. In (24) Christodoulos, the monks of Patmos, like the angels, were occupied in praising God [A17], and Isaac Komnenos established the monastery at Bera, according to (29) Kosmosoteira, “for the propitiation of God and of his mother” [70]. Similar sentiments were expressed in the West, as by Alcuin in a letter to the abbot and monks of an unknown monastery in which he said that the life of the saints consisted in praising and loving the goodness of Christ and that the followers of this life in the present world resembled the angels who eternally praised God: “He who strives to be watchful for the prayers of God leads the angelic life on earth.”¹¹

These quotations emphasize the positive aspects of the monastic ideal, but there was also a strong negative element of self-abnegation and of practical, if not theoretical, dualism. (55) Athanasios I took from John Klimakos’s Ladder of Heaven the definition of a monk as the order and rule of the incorporeal carried out in the filthy and material body. A monk is one who is attached only to the things of God every day, everywhere, and in everything. A monk is a continual forcing of nature and a constant guarding of the senses. A monk is a sanctified body, a purified mouth, and an enlightened mind. A monk is a grieving soul, meditating in the continual awareness of death, meditating both while asleep and while awake and all the rest. [3]

According to the typikon of Nikon, (20) Black Mountain, which dates from 1055–60, “the monastic life professes to a greater degree what the world professes. The worldly life professes the commands of the Lord, but the monastic life both professes death from the world and pledges to God life crucified in its submission and tonsuring. This is the comprehensive command and tradition of the monks” [84].

¹⁰ Schreiber, “Anselm,” p. 401, stressed the personal role of the emperor in establishing the Pantokrator in Constantinople, whether or not he himself wrote the typikon.

¹¹ Alcuin, ep. 278, in Monumenta Germaniae Historica: Epistolae, vol. 4, p. 435.

PREFACE

Entry into monastic life was a second baptism, which involved at the same time death to life in this world and rebirth into a life cleansed of sin.¹² In (22) Evergetis, which was written in the eleventh century and influenced many later typika, monks and nuns were committed to a life of effort, endurance, and perseverance [42].¹³ They should grieve for their sins rather than teach, contemplate, or perform miracles, according to (54) Neilos Damilas, citing the Ladder of Heaven of John Klimakos and echoing the dictum of St. Jerome that “A monk has the office not of a teacher but of a mourner” [12].¹⁴ They were required to confess their sins regularly and frequently, sometimes as often as once a day. This stress on conscience (syneidesis) in the sense of self-examination and self-awareness is found in many of the typika, especially in the twelfth century and later, when there was a growing concern with conscience in western monastic and theological writings.

Monastic communities were often called living organisms, as in (29) Kosmosoteira, where the monastery had “one body and one breath” [57], (57) Bebaia Elpis, where the nuns were said to have “many separate bodies, but . . . one, indivisible soul” [46], and (58) Menoikeion, in which the body was “governed by the five senses” [22] and needed the care of a doctor to remain in good health. Members who were ill had to be either cured or cut off and expelled, like a diseased limb or cancer of the body. In (32) Mamas, concealed faults were described as wounds that harmed the whole body [29]. In (33) Heliou Bomon [prol.] and (37) Auxentios [1], the monasteries when they were in difficulties were compared to fallen runners. Similar terms were applied to monasteries in the West, and the number of medical images in the Rule of Benedict has led some scholars to conjecture that the author may have had medical training.¹⁵

The typika are filled with agricultural, military, architectural, and naval metaphors. Some monasteries were compared to gardens, as in (26) Luke of Messina [7] and (31) Areia [M2], to houses, with walls and gates, and to vineyards, beehives, and flocks of sheep in a sheepfold. In (30) Phoberos, the monks were urged to “resist and wage the war” [53], like soldiers in an army; the hermitage at Ktima in Cyprus, in (45) Neophytos, was called “a godly watchtower” [pref.] by its founder; and other houses were safe harbors or ships steered by a helmsman, as in (58) Menoikeion [22]. The members of religious communities were like the members of a family living in a single house or the inhabitants of a town or like fish swimming in a river or pond. The descriptions of the physical beauty of their locations and the wildness and isolation of their surroundings derived from the Bible and served, like similar topoi in the foundation documents and

¹² See, on baptism, Peter Cramer, Baptism and Change in the Early Middle Ages, c. 200–c. 1150 (Cambridge, 1993), and, on entry into monastic life as a second baptism, the references in my article, “The Ceremonies and Symbolism of Entering Religious Life and Taking the Monastic Habit, From the Fourth to the Twelfth Century,” in Segni e riti nella Chiesa altomedievale occidentale, 11–17 aprile 1985 (= Settimane di studio del Centro italiano di studi sull’alto medioevo 33) (Spoleto, 1987), pp. 799–802.

¹³ See Appendix C on the reform elements in (22) Evergetis and its influence on other typika.

¹⁴ Jerome, Contra Vigilantium 15, in Patrologia latina 23, col. 367A, and the references in Pierre Mandouret, Saint Dominique, vol. 2 (Paris, 1937), p. 25.

¹⁵ Einar Molland, “Ut sapiens medicus: Medical Vocabulary in St. Benedict’s Regula monachorum,” Studia monastica 6 (1964), 293–98, and The Rule of St. Benedict, ed. Timothy Fry (Collegeville, 1981), pp. 222–23, 352, and 430, n. 57 (hereafter Regula Benedicti).

PREFACE

histories of western monasteries,¹⁶ to underline the paradisiacal character of religious houses and their contrast with the world of secular society.

In spite of this rich figurative language, the typika were not spiritual treatises, and they touch only incidentally on the inner lives of the men and women who left their homes in order to serve God in monasteries. They lend little support to the view favored by some scholars that religious life in the East, unlike the West, was aimed primarily at deification and that monks and nuns, like the saints, were more inspired by the divine and impassible Christ than by the human Jesus and that they sought to rise above the body and earthly things to disincarnated incorruptibility.¹⁷ This view stresses the difference between the image of the austere Pantokrator who looked down from the apses and domes of so many monastic churches in the East and the tender and suffering Man who, from at least the eleventh century, was seen on the altars of western churches. Other scholars have argued that devotion to the humanity of Jesus and imitation of Christ the man were not unknown in medieval Greek spirituality.¹⁸

Though the typika contribute little to this dispute, they do not entirely neglect the human side of religious life in their emphasis on asceticism, self-denial, and service to God. Love was greater than prayer, in (22) Evergetis [33], which was copied in (27) Kecharitomene [25], (32) Mamas [23], and elsewhere, and the author of (30) Phoberos spoke of the personal sadness and discouragement associated with the term akedia [6], which was often used in the West. “[C]ontemplation profits by works rather than by words,” according to (42) Sabas [7], of which the author was presumably opposed to the chattering of the hesychastai. For (45) Neophytos, however, “Talk is better than silence. For silence only benefits its own laborer, while the word also benefits many others” [14]. These are surprising words for an austere hermit, and they show that at least some writers of typika were aware of the needs of others as well as of the requirements of personal salvation.

II

The communities for which these typika were written ranged in size from three or four monks—as at the kellion of St. Sabbas on Mt. Athos ((44) Karyes) and the dependency of St. Euthymios at Jerusalem ((50) Gerasimos)—up to eighty—as at the Great Lavra on Mt. Athos in the tenth century (and later a hundred twenty) ((13) Ath. Typikon [36]) and at the Pantokrator in Constantinople ((28) Pantokrator [19]). (15) Constantine IX said in 1045 that the total number of monks at Lavra had grown from one hundred to seven hundred [4], which by the end of the fifteenth century

¹⁶ Dieter von der Nahmer, “Die Klostergründung ‘in solitudine’—ein unbrauchbarer hagiographischer Topos?” Hessisches Jahrbuch für Landesgeschichte 22 (1972), 90–111.

¹⁷ Myrrha Lot-Borodine, “La doctrine de la ‘déification’ dans l’Eglise grecque jusqu’au XI^e siècle,” RHR 105–6 (1932), 5–43 and 525–74, and 107 (1933), 8–55.

¹⁸ Sévérin Salaville, “Christus in orientalium pietate: De pietate erga Christi humanitatem apud orientales liturgias et liturgicos commentatores,” EL 53 (1939), 13–59 and 350–85, and “Un office grec du ‘Très doux Jésus’ antérieur au ‘Jubilus’ dit de saint Bernard,” RAM 25.2–4 (1949 = Mélanges Marcel Viller), 246–59, and Irénée Hausherr, “L’imitation de Jésus-Christ dans la spiritualité byzantine,” Mélanges offerts au R. P. Ferdinand Cavallera (Toulouse, 1948), pp. 231–59.

PREFACE

had increased to more than two thousand.¹⁹ Most of the typika written in the twelfth century and later were for communities of between twenty and fifty members, but some authors expressed a preference for relatively small houses and were concerned that the size of the community should not outstrip its resources. The number of monks was limited to seven in (19) Attaleiates [27] and to twelve in (16) Mt. Tmolos [1] and in (30) Phoberos [42], where the community was allowed to increase if resources permitted. (45) Neophytos, which dates from 1214, set the number of monks at between fifteen and eighteen, saying that “God does not want a multitude of monks, crawling in sin” [C16].

These figures agree approximately with those proposed by Charanis, who said that the majority of Byzantine monasteries had between ten and twenty members, though some had as many as eighty.²⁰ Mango and Ševčenko, in their study of monasteries on the southern shore of the Sea of Marmara, found two houses of roughly one hundred and another of more than seventy in about 800, and others of eighty, sixty-four, and forty-two members.²¹ Monasteries tended to be smaller in the central and late Middle Ages than they were earlier, in both East and West, where Lérins, St. Riquier, Jumièges, and Fulda all had several hundred monks in the eighth and ninth centuries. The average Benedictine monastery in the twelfth and thirteenth centuries had between twelve and twenty members. Communities of more than sixty were exceptional, and only a few, such as Cluny, had more than a hundred.²²

Very little is known about who entered monasteries, aside from the fact that they included highly placed and wealthy people. The abolition of the payment for entry, which is mentioned in several typika and was considered a reform measure, may have made it easier for poor people to enter religious life, but it is hard to be sure on this point. It is clear that a number of both monks and nuns received their monastic formation in one house and later transferred to another, in spite of ecclesiastical legislation requiring them to stay in their monastery unless the bishop or the superior gave them permission to leave. In his study of stabilitas loci in Byzantine monasticism, Emil Herman concluded, largely on the basis of hagiographical sources, that transfers were not unusual,²³ and there are a few references in the typika to monks who left their monasteries on

¹⁹ Heath Lowry, Jr., “A Note on the Population and Status of the Athonite Monasteries under Ottoman Rule (ca. 1520),” in his Studies in “Defterology”: Ottoman Society in the Fifteenth and Sixteenth Centuries (= Analecta Isisiana 4) (Istanbul, 1992), p. 238.

²⁰ Peter Charanis, “The Monk as an Element in Byzantine Society,” DOP 25 (1971), 69–72. Raymond Janin, “Le monachisme byzantin au moyen âge: Commende et typica (X^e– XIV^e siècle),” REB 22 (1964), 29–31, cited fourteen communities ranging in size between five to seven and eighty to one hundred twenty, and Anthony Bryer, “The Late Byzantine Monastery in Town and Countryside,” in The Church in Town and Countryside, ed. Derek Baker (= Studies in Church History 16) (Oxford, 1979), p. 225, accepted Charanis’s estimate.

²¹ Cyril Mango and Ihor Ševčenko, “Some Churches and Monasteries on the Southern Shore of the Sea of Marmara,” DOP 27 (1973), 270.

²² See Ursmer Berlière, “Le nombre des moines dans les anciens monastères,” Revue bénédictine 41 (1929), 231–61, and 42 (1930), 19–42, and Jacques Dubois, “Du nombre des moines dans les monastères,” Lettre de Ligugé 134 (1969.2), 24–36.

²³ Emile Herman, “La ‘stabilitas loci’ nel monachesimo bizantino,” OCP 21 (1955), 115–42.

PREFACE

pilgrimages or special missions or, most frequently, in search of a more austere life. Monks were allowed to leave the monastery voluntarily at Bera, according to (29) Kosmosoteira [55], and in some houses members who misbehaved or did not fit into the community were expelled. Whether such former monks and nuns reentered secular society, transferred to other monasteries, or became vagrants and beggars is not known. Although in some houses the reception of monks from other houses (xenokouritai) was prohibited, in others they were admitted but not allowed to become superior.

The issue of transitus, or transfer from one monastery to another, was much discussed in the West.²⁴ The Rule of Benedict laid great emphasis on stabilitas loci, which was (together with obedience and conversatio morum) one of the three promises made by a new monk, but the possibility of movement was foreseen. In chapter 61 the abbot was warned not to receive a monk “from another known monastery . . . without the consent of his abbot or commendatory letters,” and in the final chapter, monks who wanted to achieve perfection were advised to follow the teachings of the holy fathers, which were interpreted as living in solitude. During the monastic reforms of the eleventh and twelfth centuries, when many monks sought a more austere life, stability was increasingly seen in terms of profession rather than of place, and transfers were not only permitted but in some cases encouraged, especially from a lower to a higher, or stricter, monastery.

Six out of the sixty-one typika translated here were written for houses of women, who played an important part in Byzantine monasticism. None of them were written for double houses, where men and women lived in a single community under one superior, occasionally a woman,²⁵ but several of them envisaged a close relationship between male and female houses, as in (34) Machairas [169], (47) Philanthropos [intro.], and (54) Neilos Damilas [8], [14], which cited the decree of the Second Council of Nicaea forbidding double monasteries and established that work both within and outside the nunnery should be done by pious laymen rather than monks, who were forbidden even to conduct services for the nuns. (31) Areia [M5–6] shows that some relationship existed between the two houses near Nauplia after the nuns moved and their former house was occupied by monks. Close relations between male and female monasteries were also found in the West, where many of the communities established by the reformers in the eleventh and twelfth centuries welcomed both men and women. As time passed, the women lived an increasingly segregated life but were still associated with houses of monks.

Both monks and nuns were deeply concerned with sexual purity. The monks’ fear of sexuality extended to contacts not only with women, boys, and beardless youths, but also with female animals. (30) Phoberos, which dates from 1113/40, includes a striking passage on the fears of homosexuality and bestiality written by Paul Helladikos in the sixth century [58]. In (53) Meteora, the monks were forbidden to give food to women even if they were dying of hunger [7]. On a visit to Mt. Athos in the 1930s, Kurt Weitzmann met a hermit who, having come there as a child, had never seen a woman, and whose opinion that “the woman is a devil” was derived, he said, from reading Klimakos’s Ladder of Heaven.²⁶ These regulations were not inspired by misogyny or dislike of women as such, according to Nikon’s (20) Black Mountain [86] and (22) Evergetis [39], which was copied in (29) Kosmosoteira and other typika. Nuns inevitably had some contact with men, since they were dependent upon priests to celebrate the sacraments and upon male laborers to perform hard physical work, but it was kept to a minimum in order to avoid temptation, and (57) Bebaia Elpis specified that the priest who served in the church should be married [79]. In (28) Pantokrator, provision for women was made in the hospital associated with the monastery, though the male doctors were paid more than the female doctors [38], [52].²⁷

²⁴ Philipp Hofmeister, “Der Übertritt in eine andere religiöse Genossenschaft,” AKKR 108 (1928), 419–81.

²⁵ On double monasteries in the East, see Jules Pargoire, “Les monastères doubles chez les Byzantins,” EO 9 (1906), 21–25; Janin, “Monachisme,” pp. 42–44; and Georges-Joseph Mahfoud, L’organisation monastique dans l’Eglise maronite (= Bibliothèque de l’Université Saint-Esprit, Kaslik-Jounieh-Liban 1) (Beirut, 1967), pp. 289–315.

PREFACE

A special problem was posed in eastern monasteries by eunuchs, who were almost unknown in the West, but who played a prominent role in Byzantine society and with regard to whom policy seems to have varied. They were forbidden in some monasteries, including nunneries. The reference to the admission of a wealthy eunuch in (29) Kosmosoteira [55] suggests that it was regarded as exceptional. In (19) Attaleiates, on the other hand, the monks had to be eunuchs and “men free from passions,” and bearded monks were forbidden [30]. In (27) Kecharitomene, the priests, the spiritual father of the nuns, the steward, and the attendant physician were all required to be eunuchs [14–16], [57]. The fact that one of the three monasteries at Mt. Galesios was reserved for twelve eunuchs shows that there was no objection in principle to eunuch monks.²⁸

The communities therefore differed in character, and some were less cut off from the outside world than others. There were important distinctions even among the regular members of the community, in spite of the emphasis found in several of the typika on equal treatment of all members. It was in practice impossible to exclude entirely the social distinctions and attitudes that permeated secular society, in which most monks and nuns had been raised, and in almost all religious houses special privileges were given to members of rich and powerful families, especially if they were related to the emperor or to the founder. There are countless references to travelers, pilgrims, beggars, strangers, servants, laymen, and all sorts of hangers-on, and, in spite of efforts to exclude them, to women and boys in male houses and to men and girls in female houses. In (34) Machairas, pilgrims going to Jerusalem stopped at the monastery in Cyprus [116]; a “sister Melanie” is mentioned in the typikon of Nea Mone at Thessalonike, (52) Choumnos, which was otherwise strict on the subject of women [A18]; and (55) Athanasios I apparently indicates the acceptance of the presence of laymen in monasteries in the reform program for Mt. Athos [4]. Monks from distant places—“beyond Cadiz,” as they were called in (13) Ath. Typikon [27]—were welcomed at the Great Lavra, and were not called foreigners. Begging monks appear in (32) Mamas [13] of 1158. More obscure are the frequent prohibitions against imposed guests and against internal and external monks, which suggests that monks sometimes lived outside the community at the expense of the monastery.

²⁶ Kurt Weitzmann, Sailing with Byzantium from Europe to America: The Memoirs of an Art Historian (Munich, 1994), p. 135.

²⁷ On the parallel expressions of brotherly love in the Pantokrator typikon and western monastic sources, see Schreiber, “Hospital,” p. 30.

²⁸ See Alexander Kazhdan, “Eunuchs,” ODB, pp. 746–47, and Alice-Mary Talbot, “Galesios, Mount,” ODB, p. 817.

PREFACE

Prohibitions of this type show something about the nature of monastic communities and the indifferent success of reformers, in both East and West, in fully cutting off monks and nuns from secular society, even when they were surrounded by walls and guarded by watchful doorkeepers. In (60) Charsianeites, for instance, the monks, like the Grandmontines in the West, were forbidden to engage in lawsuits, even in a just cause, and were required simply to state their case in court and leave [C7]. The nuns in (57) Bebaia Elpis were not allowed to educate lay children [148], as were some western nuns in the twelfth century. The prohibitions against the use of professional singers, which are found in several typika, were more distinctively eastern, as were the efforts to prevent the types of personal links that appear to have been a feature of Mediterranean society.²⁹ Spiritual and adoptive brotherhoods, familiarity, associations, and unions between monks of religious houses and outside laypeople were forbidden in (3) Theodore Studites [8], in (12) Tzimiskes [14], (22) Evergetis [46], (26) Luke of Messina [3], (42) Sabas [6], and others, including the general typikon for Mt. Athos, (59) Manuel II, which prohibited spiritual relationships and adoptive brotherhoods between a monk and a layperson [10]. The precise nature of these associations is uncertain, but they included serving as godparents and sponsors at baptisms. Though they were regarded as improper for monks and nuns, the number of prohibitions suggests that they were not uncommon.

The typika throw considerable light on the age of entry, which tended to be higher in eastern than in western monasteries, where the system of oblation, by which children were given to monasteries by their parents, was common until at least the eleventh and twelfth centuries, when the age of entry was raised in many houses.³⁰ Although eastern church law set the age of entry at ten and of tonsure at sixteen or seventeen,³¹ there are no references to child members in the typika except in (36) Blemmydes, which, written in 1267, allowed ten-year-old boys to be admitted on condition that they could not become monks before they were twenty and might leave if they proved unsuited to monastic life [9]. The minimum age of entry was sixteen in (60) Charsianeites [C2], eighteen in (10) Eleousa [17], and ranged in other places from twenty up to thirty, as in (29) Kosmosoteira [3]. These figures were considerably higher than for any known monastery in the West, where the average age of profession was between fifteen and twenty, and where the imposition of higher age limits was regarded as a reform measure designed to insure a higher level of commitment and maturity than could be found in children.³² This, perhaps in addition to a desire to avoid the sexual temptation presented by boys, may also have inspired the authors of the typika. The result was that most monks and nuns in the East had considerable experience in the secular world, and many had been married. According to (35) Skoteine, Maximos, the founder of the monastery of the Mother of God, was the son and grandson of monks but was himself tonsured before the age of marriage and perhaps below the established age of entry [2–4], [7]. In (54)

²⁹ John Boswell, Same-Sex Unions in Premodern Europe (New York, 1994), pp. 240–42, and Claudia Rapp, “Ritual Brotherhood in Byzantium,” Traditio 58 (1997), 285–326.

³⁰ See Regula Benedicti, 59, ed. Fry, pp. 270–72, and the references in my Medieval Monasticism: A Select Bibliography (= Toronto Medieval Bibliographies 6) (Toronto-Buffalo, 1976), pp. 123–24.

³¹ Janin, “Monachisme,” pp. 21–22.

³² See Peter the Venerable, Stat. 36, in Corpus consuetudinum monasticarum, vol. 6, p. 70.

PREFACE

Pantanassa, a married woman could not be admitted without her husband's permission and with a girl who was more than ten years old [5]. These girls, like the boys of the monastery of the Lord Christ-Who-Is at Ematha, were presumably educated in the monastery, as were many children in the West. They may have resembled the "insiders" who were admitted at the age of sixteen to the nunnery of Lips, where, according to (39) Lips [17–18], twenty was the age of entry for outsiders.

The length of the novitiate varied with the age and experience of the candidate but tended to be longer in the East than in the West, where it was set at two months in the Rule of the Master and at a year in the Rule of Benedict, which prescribed three successive probationary periods of two, six, and four months, each concluding with a reading of the rule.³³ In (22) Evergetis, the novitiate lasted six months [37], which was increased to two years in (32) Mamas, though known people were admitted after six months and monks from other monasteries after eight days [22]; in (34) Machairas from Cyprus, the novitiate was three years but was reduced to six months for known people and transfers [55], [60]; and in (39) Lips the novitiate at the nunnery was three years for outsiders, a year for unspecified others (perhaps nuns from other houses), and six months for mature women [17–18]. In (13) Ath. Typikon, an abbreviated novitiate was allowed in the Great Lavra on Mt. Athos for "some who are pious and well known and whose religious way of life is well attested" [50], in (24) Christodoulos at Patmos for "a pious man who led a monastic life in the world" [A26], and in (27) Kecharitomene in Constantinople for devout women "practicing the monastic life in secular clothing" [30].³⁴ Provisions were made for shortened periods of probation, and even for immediate tonsure, especially for candidates who were sick or dying, as in (12) Tzimiskes [3], in (36) Blemmydes [9], and probably also in other monasteries. The practice of speedily admitting the elderly and ailing, to enable them to enter the next world clad in the monastic habit, was common in western monasteries, where it was known as ad succurrendum.³⁵ Exceptions were also made in the West for important people and monks from other houses, and the reformers in the eleventh and twelfth centuries tried to establish the regular novitiate, as it was called, of a year. The longer novitiate in the typika may have been associated with the higher ages of admission and with the perceived need to test thoroughly the vocations of men and women who had lived in the world and had to learn the ways of monastic life, unlike monks and nuns who had been raised in monasteries or came from other houses.

The typika say comparatively little about the formal ceremonies of admission, which were spelled out in detail in the Rule of Benedict and many western customaries, and they do not support the view that entering religious life in the East was a consecration rather than a personal promise or commitment.³⁶ The blessing of monks is occasionally mentioned, mostly in connec-

³³ Regula Magistri, 88.3, vol. 2, p. 369, and Regula Benedicti, 58, ed. Fry, pp. 266–68.

³⁴ These passages are interesting evidence of the existence in secular society of men and women who lived a quasi-monastic life. See John Nesbitt and J. Wiito, "A Confraternity of the Comnenian Era," BZ 68 (1975), 300–384.

³⁵ Nikephoros Chartophylax was the first Byzantine layman known to Karl Holl to take the monastic habit on his deathbed. See his Enthusiasmus und Bussgewalt beim griechischen Mönchtum: Eine Studie zu Symeon dem Neuen Theologen (Leipzig, 1898), p. 321.

³⁶ See, for instance, Olivier Rousseau, "Le rôle important du monachisme dans l'Eglise d'Orient," Il monachesimo orientale (= OCA 153) (Rome, 1958), pp. 38–40.

PREFACE

tion with the authority of the bishop, but the primary emphasis was on the promise, tonsure, and habit. According to (10) Eleousa, which dates from 1085–1106, the monks made “our promise on the things that we were proclaiming, frequently repeating our consent with both a subdued posture and a calm voice” [9], and in (30) Phoberos new monks read and promised to obey “this rule” [51]. There are many references, in part owing to the influence of (22) Evergetis, to “the hair of this world” and to “worldly locks,” which were cut when someone entered religious life. Facial hair was a mark of maturity in men, and of suitability to be a monk or priest, since clerics in the East, unlike the West, were bearded. The beardlessness of eunuchs showed their anomalous status, even if it did not exclude them from becoming monks or priests.

The monastic habit was of symbolic as well as practical significance in distinguishing men and women in religion from those living in the world. (55) Athanasios I called it “the robe of unchanging glory” [1], and in (45) Neophytos, the founder of the hermitage at Ktima in Cyprus kissed the cuffs of his habit [4]. The scapular was compared to the cross in (10) Eleousa [9], as in many western monastic texts, and Nikon in (20) Black Mountain stressed the importance of the distinctive cap worn by eastern monks [75]. In (45) Neophytos [15] and (34) Machairas, different ranks of monks apparently wore different habits, and according to the latter the great habit was apparently worn by the monks known as apostolikai but not by others [102], [148]. (45) Neophytos expressed a preference for inexpensive grey rather than black cloaks [C15]. The western reformers in the twelfth century, and later the mendicants, also favored undyed and cheap materials for their habits. It was a mark of visible humility and unworldliness, like the use of a donkey rather than a horse when traveling, to which there are references in both eastern and western saints’ lives and, among others, in (48) Prodromos [7], whose monastery was a dependency of Docheiariou on Mt. Athos.

Great importance was attached in the typika to the behavior of monks and nuns and their proper deportment toward each other and, especially, toward the superior and monastic officials. There are references in several typika to disciplinary officers, as in (11) Ath. Rule [17] of the Great Lavra, but comparatively few to punishments, aside from the long list, which derived from the pseudo-Basilian Poenae and resembled a western penitential, incorporated into (34) Machairas [121–34]. (4) Stoudios [25] and (11) Ath. Rule [19] for the Great Lavra noted the presence of prisons for recalcitrant monks at their respective monasteries, and some, such as (28) Pantokrator and (29) Kosmosoteira, said theirs were used for political prisoners, who may have been the imposed guests mentioned above. Whipping was explicitly forbidden in (4) Stoudios, and the most serious punishment for monks who refused to obey the rule or to fit into the community seems to have been expulsion.

All distinctions within monastic communities were potential sources of disputes and tension, and the authors of many typika attempted to head off the problems created by differences in rank, social status, wealth, and culture. Among the most interesting of these was the presence in a single community of various linguistic and ethnic groups. In (23) Pakourianos, only Georgians, for instance, were admitted to the monastery at Bačkovovo in Bulgaria [prol.], [24]. The community of St. Sabas near Jerusalem included both Greeks (or Romans, as they are called) and Syrians, and the typikon, (42) Sabas, specified that the superior should be Greek but that the steward and treasurer should be Syrians, who were “more efficient and practical in their native country” [9].

PREFACE

There is an interesting account of the difficulty of introducing Vlachs into a Greek house in (51) Koutloumousi [B6] of Mt. Athos. Similar problems must have arisen in western monasteries, especially with the decline of Latin and the spread of vernacular languages, but they are not discussed with equal frankness in any known rule or customary.

III

Members of religious communities, both monks and nuns, divided their time between religious services, private devotions, and various types of work, of which the proportions varied from monastery to monastery. Their activities were regulated, in Byzantine monasteries, by the sound of the semantron—"the holy bell," as it was called in (46) Akropolites [6]—which was a flat piece of wood or metal and performed the same function as the bell in western monasteries. Some monasteries had several semantrons, as in (22) Evergetis [6] and (32) Mamas [47], where there were small, great, and bronze semantrons, and in (34) Machairas [45], [47], [61], where there was a refectory semantron and at least one large semantron. According to their differing sounds, the monks and nuns knew what they should do. Less is said in the typika about the system of keeping time, but there are a few references to clocks, which were presumably water clocks, or clepsydra, which were also known in western monasteries. The primary indicators of time, in both East and West, were the sun and stars and, in the morning, the cock.

The most important occupation of monks and nuns was the celebration of the liturgy, with which a few typika (which are not translated here) were exclusively concerned.³⁷ In (32) Mamas, the members were required to attend the services [21], but in other communities a distinction was drawn between the members who primarily served in church and those who performed other functions, who would today be called the support staff and usually included the monastic officials, as in (38) Kellibara I [17] and (57) Bebaia Elpis [23], [146–47]. (23) Pakourianos, for instance, shows that of the fifty monks at the monastery in Bačkovo in 1083 ten were in holy orders and twenty-six were officials, including the superior, who was not required to be a priest, leaving four unaccounted for. The typikon also distinguished three types of monks who received different stipends [6], [9], [22]. In (28) Pantokrator, there were four servants and eighty monks, of whom thirty were occupied in what were called menial duties and fifty with the praise of God, and they received, respectively, the biblical rewards of thirty-, sixty-, and a hundred-fold [19]. In (37) Auxentios, of the forty monks in the monastery of the archangel Michael, sixteen served in the church and twenty-four in the monastery and fields [6–7]; of the fifty nuns in (39) Lips [4] and thirty in (40) Anargyroi [6] at Sts. Kosmas and Damian, thirty and eighteen, respectively, performed liturgical duties, and twenty and twelve were occupied with housekeeping; and so on in other monasteries, though the division may have been less strict in smaller houses. The two categories were called fathers and brothers, ekklestastikoi and diakonetai, and (in other sources) psalmodists and attendants, and they were described as literate and illiterate, though it is not certain that those who served in the church were all literate and the others, especially the officials, were illiterate.

³⁷ There is no evidence in these typika of the type of continuous prayer by shifts of monks that was found in early monasteries in the East but more or less died out by the twelfth century. See Michael Marx, Incessant Prayer in Ancient Monastic Literature (Rome, 1946).

PREFACE

The typika throw comparatively little light on the number of monks who were in holy orders or on whether the proportion increased, as it did in the West, where by the thirteenth century almost all monks were ordained. Likewise, there is little said on the related question of the performance of pastoral work by monks, both within their communities and in parish churches.³⁸ What evidence there is suggests that the proportion of ordained monks was lower in Byzantine monasteries than in the West and that they did not regularly serve as parish priests, though other sources might lead to a different conclusion.³⁹ (23) Pakourianos shows that at Bačkovo in the late eleventh century ten monks, or a fifth of the community, were ordained, of whom six were priests and two each were deacons and subdeacons [6]. In (32) Mamas, which dates from 1158, there were twenty monks, of whom two or three were priests and two were deacons [5].

At first sight, the distinction between the liturgical and non-liturgical members seems to resemble that in western monasteries between western monks who were raised in a monastery (oblati or nutriti) and those who entered as adults (conversi) and, even more, that between the so-called choir monks and lay brothers (fratres laici or conversi), who were found in many reformed houses in the West, especially those affiliated with Hirsau, Cîteaux, and Prémontré, in the eleventh and twelfth centuries.⁴⁰ The comparisons do not hold up on close inspection, however. The conversi of the old type were characteristically illiterate at their time of entry and able to participate in the services only in limited ways, but they often learned to read and write, were ordained, and served as priors and abbots. The lay brothers and sisters, or conversi of the new type, on the other hand, constituted a closed category, from which there was no promotion, and they were mostly occupied with agricultural labor. The typika show that, in Byzantine monasteries, unordained, non-liturgical monks were not a closed group and frequently occupied responsible positions, and that unlettered monks sometimes participated in the offices, as seen in (22) Evergetis [33] and (33) Heliou Bomon [23]. (39) Lips suggests that the contemplative nuns were subordinate to the preeminent active nuns [27], and Neophytos, the founder of the hermitage at Ktima, worked in the vineyards for five years before he learned to read and write and became assistant ecclesiarch, a position he later gave up in order to devote himself to the contemplative life ((45) Neophytos [4]).

The welfare of specific individuals as well of society in general was thought to depend upon the prayers of monks,⁴¹ the “faithful oratores” as Charlemagne called them in his capitulary De

³⁸ A related issue, which requires further study, is the number of churches within monastic enclosures in both East and West and their use. See Schreiber, “Anselm,” p. 385.

³⁹ See Irénée-Henri Dalmais, “Sacerdoce et monachisme dans l’Orient chrétien,” La vie spirituelle 80 (1949), 37–49, and the references in my Medieval Monasticism, pp. 135–37. Clément Lialine, “Monachisme oriental et monachisme occidental,” Irénikon 33 (1960), 444–45, argued that the “pneumatico-psychological preference” of Byzantine monks led to a distrust of clericalization, institutionalization, and the ministry.

⁴⁰ On conversion and lay brothers see the references in my Medieval Monasticism, pp. 124–25.

⁴¹ On intercessory prayer in the East, see Schreiber, “Anselm,” pp. 408–9, and Paul Lemerle “Un aspect du rôle des monastères à Byzance: les monastères donnés à des laïcs, les charistocaires,” CRAI (1967), 13.

PREFACE

litteris colendis.⁴² There are innumerable references in the typika to liturgical commemoration for founders, protectors, and benefactors, especially the emperor and members of the ruling family, both male and female,⁴³ for members of the community and, more rarely, for all Christians, as in (48) Prodromos [5], or for specific groups in society, as in (33) Heliou Bomon [47] and (34) Machairas [44]. The steadily growing number of commemorations created a problem at Evergetis, as it did at Cluny and other western monasteries, where efforts were made to limit the amount of time spent in commemorations.⁴⁴ The manner of chanting was also mentioned in several typika, of which the authors stressed the need for moderation, slowness, clarity, and attention to the words of the texts ((20) Black Mountain [16], (23) Pakourianos [12], (36) Blemmydes [13], and (37) Auxentios [7]). (54) Neilos Damilas mentioned the “excessive variety of hymns” and warned against “undignified tunes” [12].⁴⁵

Policy with regard to celebration of the Eucharist varied from monastery to monastery, but frequent communion, especially for monks, was common in Byzantium in the early Middle Ages.⁴⁶ At Evergetis, mass was celebrated every day, though not all the monks communicated; at Machairas, a liturgy was daily and communion weekly, or at least twice a month; and in other monasteries a liturgy was celebrated between once and five times a week, and the frequency of communion was not always specified. “Daily communion was a rarity in Byzantine monasteries,” according to Robert Taft, “but weekly communion, though not universal, remained common.”⁴⁷

The importance of confession has already been mentioned in connection with the emphasis on conscience.⁴⁸ In some monasteries, daily confession was required, and a parallel between confession and bodily health was drawn in (22) Evergetis and the typika that derive from it. It was considered as important as the Eucharist at Nea Mone in Thessalonike, of which the typikon, (52) Choumnos, dates from before 1374 [B10]. The reformers preferred that confession be made to the superior or spiritual father rather than to other monks or to outsiders, presumably in order to ensure a consistent spiritual direction, but (22) Evergetis [7] and (30) Phoberos [14] allowed confession to be made to priests, deacons, or “more reverent brothers,” probably owing to the ⁴² Monumenta Germaniae Historica: Capitularia, vol. 1, p. 79.

⁴³ (27) Kecharitomene specified that male and female members of the ruling family should be commemorated equally [79].

⁴⁴ See Peter the Venerable, Stat. 32, in Corpus consuetudinum monasticarum, vol. 6, pp. 66–67, and note there.

⁴⁵ See Margot Fassler, Gothic Song: Victorine Sequences and Augustinian Reform in Twelfth-Century Paris (Cambridge, 1993), pp. 39–40, on “conventional nonsense syllables” in eastern liturgies and parallel phenomena in the West.

⁴⁶ Sévérin Salaville, “Messe et communion d’après les typika monastiques byzantins du X^e au XIV^e siècle,” OCP 13 (1947), 283–98, and Emil Herman, “Die häufige und tägliche Kommunion in den byzantinischen Klöstern,” Mémorial Louis Petit (= Archives de l’Orient chrétien 1) (Bucharest, 1948), pp. 203–17.

⁴⁷ “Communion,” ODB, p. 491.

⁴⁸ On confession in the West, where it was more frequent among monks than the laity and was prescribed in the Rule of Benedict, see Alexander Murray, “Confession before 1215,” Transactions of the Royal Historical Society, ser. 6, 3 (1993), 70–72.

PREFACE

difficulty in finding time and opportunity for each member of the community to confess to a single person every day.

Allowance was also made for private prayers and devotions, though they do not figure prominently in the typika. Private psalmody was indeed prohibited in some of the early typika, but Athanasios the Athonite in his rule for the Great Lavra in 963, (11) Ath. Rule, modified the typikon of St. John Stoudios and recognized that absolute uniformity was not required and that a monk might have reason not to attend choir service [17]; the provisions of (22) Evergetis were altered in (30) Phoberos specifically to allow the midnight office to be sung by monks in their cells [12]. There are several references to penitential devotions, such as weeping, foot washing, and, especially, genuflections, which were defined as fifteen prostrations in (27) Kecharitomene [32]. In (54) Neilos Damilas the nuns were expected to perform two hundred prostrations every twenty-four hours, but those who were unable to do that many were permitted to reduce the number [10].

All members of the community, including those whose primary duties were in the church, were expected to work,⁴⁹ not only as a way to avoid idleness, according to (57) Bebaia Elpis, but also as a mortification of the flesh and a means to provide the wherewithal for alms [95]. The monks were allowed to work in their cells, according to (31) Areia [T3], and in (34) Machairas helped to harvest the grain and grapes [83]. In (54) Neilos Damilas, the nuns of the Pantanassa nunnery worked to produce goods both for their own use and for sale [6]. (52) Choumnos set no fixed amount of work for the monks of Nea Mone, because people differed in their capacity for physical labor, and elsewhere in the typikon it is said that those who wanted should spend ten years working and then devote themselves to spiritual labor [B18], [B21]. A similar attitude is found in the book of proverbs by the twelfth-century Cistercian Galland of Rigny, who wrote that monks who were unable to work in the sun should choose an occupation in the shade and that those who could not observe all the feast days at least should celebrate All Saints, which covers the other feasts in the same way that charity includes the other virtues.⁵⁰ Passages like these suggest that there was a growing recognition in both East and West of the physical needs and capacities of monks and nuns, in spite of the general emphasis on asceticism and self-denial.⁵¹ The spiritual well-being of monks was associated with their physical health in a remarkable chapter in (60) Charsianeites, which dates from 1407:

When everyone is healthy, you should be grateful to the Provider of health, each one on behalf of the others rather than on his own behalf, but if one of you is ill, then you should all be sympathetically disposed to his illness and share in his suffering, just as the other

⁴⁹ Tudor Teoteoi, "Le travail manuel dans les typika des XI^e-XIII^e siècles," RESE 17 (1979), 455–62, and in Actes du XV^e Congrès international d'études byzantines. Athènes-Septembre 1976, vol. 4 (Athens, 1980), 340–49, and Maria Dembinska, "Diet: A Comparison of Food Consumption between Some Eastern and Western Monasteries in the 4th–12th Centuries," Byzantion 55 (1985), 44–45. According to Schreiber, "Anselm," pp. 404–6, there was a greater emphasis on manual labor in the West, especially among reformers, than in the East.

⁵⁰ Galland of Rigny, "Libellus proverbiorum," Revue du moyen âge latin 9 (1953), 47 and 105, no. 13.

⁵¹ Gerd Zimmermann, Ordensleben und Lebensstandard: Die Cura Corporis in den Ordensvorschriften des abendländischen Hochmittelalters (= Beiträge zur Geschichte des alten Mönchtums und des Benediktinerordens 32) (Münster, 1971).

PREFACE

limbs of the body suffer, if one is in pain. You should do everything and exert yourselves to see the brother cured of illness. [B4]

The most remarkable evidence of concern for physical health is in the typikon of the Pantokrator monastery in Constantinople, which made elaborate provision for five wards (ordinoi), each with appropriate staff and equipment, to care for various diseases, wounds, and disorders of both men and women.⁵² Several typika mention springs and aqueducts, and the provision of an adequate supply of water was considered a notable benefaction to a monastery. Water was needed not only for drinking and cooking but also for bathing, which is the subject of various provisions in the typika.⁵³ In (30) Phoberos, for instance, bathing was allowed only for the sick [46], and in (45) Neophytos for the sick and aged [C9], whereas in (31) Areia it was allowed once a week [T3], and in other monasteries between three and twelve times a year, sometimes in bathing establishments outside the monastery, for which the monks were given special allowances. Careful control was exercised over other aspects of bodily care, such as bleeding and hair cutting, which in (34) Machairas could be done only with permission and a blessing [133]. Shaving, on the other hand, was of less concern to the bearded monks in the East than to western monks, who were expected to cut their beards, though not too closely or too often, and whose shaving was the subject of legislation in many monasteries.⁵⁴

Greater attention was paid to diet in the typika than in comparable western documents, and especially to the precise amounts and types of food to be eaten at different times during the liturgical year.⁵⁵ Some of the dietary restrictions were very strict and included prohibitions against eating even eggs and cheese, but small additional allowances, resembling pittance in western monasteries, were often given in memory of a benefactor. Dembinska in her article on food consumption in eastern and western monasteries concluded, “The basic foodstuffs mentioned in the rules of the period under research were almost identical in Byzantium and in Western Europe,” but the daily per capita ration was at least a third greater in caloric weight and value in western monasteries in the ninth century than in eastern monasteries in the eleventh and twelfth centuries. This was the result not only of the more severe regime in the East but also, she proposed, of climatic differences and perhaps of a decrease in agricultural production in Byzantium.⁵⁶ In (32) Mamas, dietary concessions were made for those who participated in the liturgy [18], and a concern for physical health was shown in (22) Evergetis, which remarked on the ill-effects of drinking [App.], and (30) Phoberos, which said that moderate eating showed a care for bodily health [5].

⁵² See Schreiber, “Hospital,” pp. 3–80; Timothy Miller, The Birth of the Hospital in the Byzantine Empire (Baltimore, 1985); and Peregrine Horden, “Text and Context: The Pantokrator Hospital in Its Middle Byzantine Setting” (paper presented at the Nineteenth Annual Byzantine Studies Conference, Princeton, 5 November 1993).

⁵³ Apostolos Karpozilos, “Bath,” ODB, pp. 271–72. On monastic bathing in the West and the number of baths taken by monks, see Zimmermann, Ordensleben, esp. pp. 117–33.

⁵⁴ See the introduction to Burchard of Bellevaux, Apologia de barbīs, ed. R. B. C. Huygens (= Corpus Christianorum, Continuatio Mediaevalis 62) (Turnhout, 1985), pp. 114–30.

⁵⁵ See Appendix B on the dietary prescriptions of the typika.

⁵⁶ Dembinska, “Diet,” p. 453.

PREFACE

The typika were generally less concerned with the intellectual than with the material aspects of monastic life, though there are some interesting lists of books in the inventories of individual houses.⁵⁷ Relatively little is said about literacy or reading, in contrast to the Rule of Benedict, in which monks were told to read on Sundays and to take a book from the library at the beginning of Lent and to read it through “in order in its entirety.”⁵⁸ Houses that followed the Rule of Benedict consequently had at least a few books, if not a library, and the monks were expected to be able to read, even though many of the conversi, who entered as adults, were in fact illiterate. The author of (30) Phoberos, which was based on (22) Evergetis, added that new monks should read and promise to obey “this rule” [51], but they may not all have been literate. The most interesting reference to literacy is in (54) Neilos Damilas of Crete, where reading aloud was said to be more important than psalmody [13], [20], but it is unknown how this was interpreted in practice.

IV

The typika include much material on the organization and administration of religious communities and reflect the writers’ desire for the independence of monasteries and fear of outside interference in monastic affairs. These concerns need to be seen against the background of the system of charistike, which was widespread in Byzantium in the tenth and eleventh centuries and by which monasteries were held in quasi-possession by institutions and private individuals, who often exploited them for their own advantage.⁵⁹ In theory, the grants were conditional, limited in time, and designed to benefit not only the charistikarios but also the monastery, and to keep its members from secular involvements. In practice, however, they opened the way to abuses, including lay control and loss of revenues. In some respects the charistike resembled the so-called proprietary churches and monasteries in the West, where both churchmen and secular rulers and nobles controlled religious institutions over which they had no legal rights and, as advocates, exercised jurisdiction over monastic lands, in principle in the name of the abbot but in fact in their own name and as a hereditary right.⁶⁰ The movements of monastic reform in the eleventh and twelfth centuries were directed against these types of control over monasteries and tried to define and limit the powers, respectively, of lay proprietors and advocates in the West and of charistikarioi in the East.⁶¹

⁵⁷ Nicolas Oikonomides, “Mount Athos: Levels of Literacy,” DOP 42 (1988), 167–78, estimated the levels of literacy among monks on Mt. Athos on the basis of subscriptions to documents.

⁵⁸ Regula Benedicti, 48, ed. Fry, p. 251. On this chapter, see Anscari Mundó, “‘Bibliotheca’: Bible et lecture du Carême d’après saint Benoît,” Revue bénédictine 60 (1950), 65–92.

⁵⁹ See Peter Charanis, “The Monastic Properties and the State in the Byzantine Empire,” DOP 4 (1948), 72–81; Lemerle, “Aspect,” who stressed as a general feature of Byzantine monasticism that monasteries were viewed as a source of private profit; and Hélène Ahrweiler, “Charisticariat et autres formes d’attribution de fondations pieuses aux X^e–XI^e siècles,” Receuil des travaux de l’Institut d’études byzantines 10 (1967), 1–27, and generally Mark Bartusis, “Charistikion,” ODB, p. 412.

⁶⁰ See the work of Felix Senn, L’institution des avoueries ecclésiastiques en France (Paris, 1903), and other references in my Medieval Monasticism, pp. 105–6.

⁶¹ John Thomas, “The Rise of the Independent and Self-Governing Monasteries as Reflected in the Monastic Typika,” GOTR 30 (1985), 21–30.

PREFACE

The reformers in the East, some of whom were themselves charistikarioi, sought to promote, in place of the charistike, the more limited system of ephoreia, which emphasized the protection and supervision of monasteries rather than their possession. According to (32) Mamas, the patriarchs had controlled the monastery in the past and had granted it “to various charistikarioi, the greatest number of whom used to abuse the monastery as landed property and to seek nothing else but what they were going to gain from it, and there was no concern for the monastery and its affairs.” When the mystikos George the Cappadocian held St. Mamas, however, he realized that it might again come under the control of a bad charistikarios, and therefore “sought to have the monastery made independent and released from the patriarchal rights” [First Semeioma]. In 1261–80 the emperor Michael VIII Palaiologos wrote in (37) Auxentios, one must hold tightly to freedom for the stability of the monastery and for its continued progress. Monasteries that are self-governing are more flourishing and self-sufficient than those that are subject to various individuals. For these enjoy what they possess without any diminution, whereas the others receive little or nothing of their revenues. All or most of their possessions are appropriated [by their lords] as if they were their own and they distribute them as their own property. [2]

It was not easy even for an emperor, however, to safeguard a monastery from outside interference, especially when it took the form of protection. After the flurry of reform in the eleventh and twelfth centuries, the real independence of monasteries tended to diminish, and the ephoroi, like the advocates in the West, increasingly exercised a variety of powers in their own names.

One of the most important ways to secure the independence of a monastery was to free it from obligations and payments to external authorities.⁶² These were known as exkousseia; in the West they were called immunities when they involved the exclusion of royal officials from monastic lands and called exemptions when they applied to episcopal authority. (19) Attaleiates for the almshouse at Rhaidestos and the monastery of Panoiktirmon in Constantinople, which dates from 1077, included a privilege of emperor Michael VII Doukas exempting the monks from an elaborate list of obligations, including the billeting of officers and soldiers, various types of provisioning, forced sales and purchases, compulsory services, and any number of payments, levies, and taxes of which the precise nature is uncertain [INV10]. It is interesting to compare this list with that in the privilege granted the following year, in 1078, to the monastery of Leno in Lombardy by pope Gregory VII, who forbade any layperson to control the monastery or to hold a court without the abbot’s permission and who freed the monks from having to provide food, housing, or fodder for animals, pay moorage dues, or render any “other public obligation.”⁶³

The reformers in both the East and the West particularly wanted to prevent any outside control over the selection of monastic superiors, especially by a lay charistikarios, and advocated some type of internal selection. The authors of a few typika allowed the founder to appoint the superior, occasionally without the participation of the community, as in (60) Charsianeites [A5], ⁶² Charanis, “Monastic Properties,” pp. 64–65.

⁶³ Leo Santifaller, Quellen und Forschungen zum Urkunden- und Kanzleiwesen Papst Gregors VII.: Quellen—Urkunden, Regesta, Facsimilia (= ST 190) (Vatican City, 1957), pp. 167–70, no. 150.

PREFACE

[C18], but they mostly favored election either by lot or by the community. In some houses, the principal role was played by the elder or more preeminent monks, as on Mt. Athos, where Manuel II Palaiologos, in (59) Manuel II, established in 1406 that superiors should be chosen by fifteen councillors and some monks who lived outside the monastery [3]. In most houses the superiors were elected either by all or a majority of the members of the community. In the case of disagreement, in (32) Mamas [1], the superior was chosen by lot, and in (37) Auxentios, the superior of the monastery of the archangel Michael was appointed by the emperor [3].

How a new superior took office was apparently of less concern to the writers of the typika than to western monastic reformers, for whom the question of investiture was at the heart of the eleventh-century reform movement. In the East, practice varied from house to house, and the terms cheirotonia (ordination), sphragis (blessing), and procheirisis (appointment) were used interchangeably in the typika to describe the installation of the superior and other monastic officials.⁶⁴ According to (27) Kecharitomene, the new superior took her pastoral staff from the altar [11], which corresponded to the procedure known in the West as auto- or self-investiture,⁶⁵ and in (58) Menoikeion, the bishop was explicitly forbidden to install the superior [3]. In (28) Pantokrator [25] and (29) Kosmosoteira [33], the superiors were installed by the bishop or metropolitan, but took their staffs respectively from the icon of the Pantokrator and from the altar. In (31) Areia, though the typikon is not entirely clear, the bishop invested the first superior but was not involved in the election or investiture of subsequent superiors, who received the staff from the priest [M4], [M7], [M15], [T10].

The role of the bishop in the installation of the superior does not figure prominently in most of the typika. The patriarch or bishop was often simply said to bless the superior, and occasionally to grant the authority to hear confession, though a closer study of the precise wording in these and other sources might throw further light on the question. A provision for blessing by the patriarch was added to the section dealing with the selection of the superior in (30) Phoberos [35], which otherwise derived from (22) Evergetis [35], and the bishop was said to install and bless the superior after he was chosen by the monks in (34) Machairas [17], [140]. In (57) Bebaia Elpis, the patriarch both blessed and gave the staff to the superior [26], but there is no reference to either blessing or investiture in the typikon of a nearby monastery, (60) Charsianeites, though the superior visited the patriarch twice a year to show his orthodoxy [C12].

The authors of some typika even allowed lay investiture, which was anathema to reformers in the West. In (37) Auxentios, the superior was invested with rod and staff by the emperor (who also appointed him if there was disagreement within the community) and was blessed by the bishop, who was otherwise entitled only to liturgical commemoration and three small honoraria [2–3].

⁶⁴ See J. Darrouzès, Recherches sur les ὁφίκια de l'église byzantine (Paris, 1970), p. 612, s.v. sphragis. Cheirotonia is used for the self-investiture of the superior in (22) Evergetis [13] and is translated as “installation” here and as “nomination” by P. Gautier, “Le typikon de la Théotokos Evergétis,” REB 40 (1982), 46. Procheirisis is used for the lay investiture in (19) Panoiktirmon [26] and for the installation of the superior by the bishop in (34) Machairas [17], where it is later described as sphragis [140].

⁶⁵ On auto-investiture at Cluny, see Dominique Iogna-Prat, “Coutumes et statuts clunisiens comme sources historiques (ca. 990–ca. 1200),” Revue Mabillon, n.s., 3 (1992), 39–43.

PREFACE

The superior of the nunnery of Lips received the staff from the emperor and a box containing the typikon, (39) Lips [7], from the priest. According to (51) Koutloumousi, the voivode of Wallachia confirmed the superior of the monastery on Mt. Athos [A13], and in (58) Menoikeion the superior of the monastery of St. John the Forerunner received the staff from the emperor himself “if the chance arises” or by order of the emperor [22].

The superior, once installed, exercised a wide range of responsibilities. According to (37) Auxentios, Governance is in fact a single thing but becomes many-sided because of the diversity among those governed. The person who assumes such office may have to take various titles to fit each situation. Sometimes he is addressed as father, at other times as superior, at times of course as shepherd, helmsman, guide, guardian, teacher, salt, lamp, and light. As a father he ought to suffer along with those who are weak. As a person in authority he ought to be a shield to those who are under attack. As a helmsman he ought to sail over the dangerous waves. As a shepherd he ought to settle his flock in verdant pastures and provide them with the waters of spiritual repose. As a guardian he ought to give timely warning to those he guards of the approach of something harmful. As a teacher he trains those whose understanding is like that of children. As salt he seasons what is lacking in spiritual flavor with virtues, or he causes what is frivolous and starting to decay to tighten up. As a lamp and a light he shows his flock the unencumbered path of virtue. [4]

This passage deals primarily with the internal, pastoral duties of superiors, but they also exercised authority over people and lands outside the monastery. Isaac Komnenos, in (29) Kosmosoteira, referred to the superior’s jurisdiction over arsonists and to his responsibility for the behavior of the peasants, who were not allowed to eat eggs, cheese, or meat on Wednesdays or Fridays [98], [104].

The superiors were expected to rule in consultation with the members of the community, as in the Rule of Benedict, or at least with the officials and seniores, but in practice they often behaved autocratically. In (57) Bebaia Elpis, the superior of the nunnery was to rule in a manly way [27], according to the typikon written by Theodora Synadene in 1327–35. As time went on, monastic administration tended to concentrate increasingly in the hands of the superior, over whom the only real control seems to have been the threat of deposition, to which there are many references in the typika.

The superior was assisted in administering the monastery by a variety of officials and by a group of preeminent, leading, or senior members of the community, who are described in (24) Christodoulos as “more prominent” [A20] and in (55) Athanasios I as “more pious” [5] and who presumably corresponded to the somewhat shadowy category of seniores found in western monastic sources.⁶⁶ The officials were sometimes themselves the preeminent members, but the exact relation between the two groups, and how they were chosen, is unclear. In (57) Bebaia Elpis, the officials were elected by the nuns, not appointed by the superior, but the ecclesiarchissa was chosen by the superior and nuns [50], [73–74]. (13) Ath. Typikon [52] for the Great Lavra and (28) Pantokrator [9] specified that the steward might not be a priest, perhaps because the secular responsibilities of the steward were considered incompatible with the sacerdotal dignity.

⁶⁶ See my “Seniores et pueri à Cluny aux X^e, XI^e siècles,” in Histoire et société: Mélanges offerts à Georges Duby, vol. 3 (Aix-en-Provence, 1992), pp. 17–24.

PREFACE

The basic unit of administration was the monastic community, of which the members lived a common life together, and the authors of the typika for the most part favored cenobitical over eremitical forms of life. In (32) Mamas, cenobitism was equated with solitude in the sense that it was cut off from the world, and all forms of non-cenobital monasticism were forbidden [25–26].⁶⁷ Solitude led to disobedience, according to (13) Ath. Typikon [40]; the superiority of common life to solitude was stressed in (35) Skoteine [13]; and the general typikon for the monasteries on Mt. Athos, (59) Manuel II, said that monks who wanted to have their own property sometimes used the desire for solitude as a pretext [1]. Hermits were also accused of disobedience, willfulness, and acquisitiveness in many western monastic texts of the eleventh and twelfth centuries, and most of the contemporary reformers in the West favored community life for monks and nuns.

The clear preference for cenobitism expressed in the typika is important in view of the emphasis put by some scholars on eremitism, and its combination with cenobitism, in Byzantine monasticism. The opinion of Delehaye that “the mixture of the cenobitic and eremitic lives was one of the most characteristic particularities of eastern monasteries” was cited with approval by Papachryssanthou, who argued, largely on the basis of hagiographical sources, that the interpenetration of cenobitism and anchoritism was peculiar to Byzantine monasticism and left little room for the traditional type of lavra, which usually referred in Byzantine texts to a koinobium that had either anchoritic cells within the community or associated anchorites living in detached cells.⁶⁸ These practices were not distinctively eastern, however, and recent research has shown that hermits were often associated with cenobitic monasteries in the West.⁶⁹ At Cluny, for instance, some four hundred monks were said to live in the surrounding woods during the first half of the twelfth century, and they were occasionally joined for temporary retreats not only by members of the community but also by the abbot himself.⁷⁰ Prieories often served as permanent or temporary eremitical retreats for monks who needed a period of solitude and private devotions.⁷¹

⁶⁷ See also (58) Menoikeion [11].

⁶⁸ Hippolyte Delehaye, “La vie de saint Paul le Jeune († 955) et la chronologie de Métaphraste” (1893), in his Mélanges d’hagiographie grecque et latine (= Subsidia Hagiographica 42) (Brussels, 1966), p. 97, and Denise Papachryssanthou, “La vie monastique dans les campagnes byzantines du VIII^e au XI^e siècle: Ermitages, groupes, communautés,” Byzantion 43 (1973), 169–75; cf. Mahfoud, Organisation, pp. 53–54 and 126 on monasticism in Egypt, Syria, and the Holy Land.

⁶⁹ See my “Eremitical Forms of Monastic Life,” in Istituzioni monastiche e istituzioni canonicali in Occidente (1123–1215). Atti della settima Settimana internazionale di studio, Mendola, 28 agosto–3 settembre 1977 (= Pubblicazioni dell’Università cattolica del Sacro Cuore, Miscellanea del Centro di studi medioevali 9) (Milan, 1980), pp. 239–64.

⁷⁰ See the chronicle of Cluny in Bibliotheca Cluniacensis, ed. Martin Marrier and André Duchesne (Paris, 1614), col. 600BC, and Jean Leclercq, “Pierre le Vénérable et l’érémisme clunisien,” in Petrus Venerabilis, 1156–1956: Studies and Texts Commemorating the Eighth Centenary of His Death, ed. Giles Constable and James Kritzeck (= Studia Anselmiana 40) (Rome, 1956), pp. 99–120.

⁷¹ Jacques Dubois, “La vie des moines dans les prieurés du moyen âge,” Lettre de Ligugé 133 (1969.1), 10–33.

PREFACE

Not all the monks were cenobites, however, either in practice or in principle, and there are many references in the typika to solitaries, who were called kelliotai or hesychastai—which derived from the term for prayer or contemplation—and who lived in cells or caves outside a monastery but remained members of the community and also to monks who owned property and lived by themselves within a community and whose way of life was known as idiorhythmic, or self-regulating. The solitaries mentioned in the typikon of Christodoulos of Patmos in 1091–3, (24) Christodoulos [A24], and in (34) Machairas [152] in 1210 returned to the monastery on Saturdays and Sundays and were given provisions there, and in (42) Sabas [3], [7] the community in the early twelfth century included both monks who lived together in the lavra and hesychastai, who apparently participated in the vigils but not in the liturgical commemoration.

In the late Middle Ages the opposition to non-cenobitic forms of life seems to have weakened, and there was a growing acceptance of the coexistence of community and solitary life, as seen in (37) Auxentios, where cells were set aside for solitaries [11], and in (45) Neophytos for Ktima, which started as a hermitage and where the superior was known as “the recluse [enkleistos]” [14].⁷² In (60) Charsianeites the different forms of monasticism are compared to the many mansions in the house of God and it is said that the life of monks who lived with others but by themselves was between the cenobitic and communal life, on one hand, and the solitary and reclusive life, which is called angelic, on the other [B2]. A kelliotas, it said, was “a monk in his habit, but has chosen an idiorhythmic regime and to live by himself as he wishes” [B18]. The solitary and idiorhythmic forms of life overlapped, as the passage cited above from the general typikon of Mt. Athos shows.

Although Byzantine monasteries remained in principle opposed to private property, personal poverty was not a rule, and exceptions were regularly made, especially for monks and nuns who came from powerful and wealthy families and who, by the standards of the time, could not be expected to live a common life with other members of a community.⁷³ The superiors of monasteries were allowed to have private property by John Tzimiskes in his typikon for Mt. Athos in 971–2, (12) Tzimiskes [6–7]; in (19) Attaleiates, the eunuch monks at the Panoiktirmon monastery in Constantinople had servants to whom pensions were given after their masters died [42]; and in (23) Pakourianos [4], for the monastery at Bačkovo, and in (28) Pantokrator [17], concessions were made for monks who were accustomed to luxurious ways. In (24) Christodoulos, personal servants at Patmos were required to be bearded before they could sit at table or drink wine [C4]. In some houses the members received cash allowances to cover such expenses as clothes, which might otherwise be a source of dispute, and bathing in establishments located outside the monastery, as in (19) Attaleiates [33], [35] and (32) Mamas [28]. In other houses, however, such as the monastery of the archangel Michael, (37) Auxentios [7], all food and clothing was distributed by the monastic officials. The typikon of Koutloumoussi on Mt. Athos, which dates from 1370–78, illustrates the problems that were created by the presence in a monastery of powerful men who expected special treatment. (59) Manuel II allowed the Athonite monks to keep a life interest in personal property [2], and a few monasteries on Mt. Athos have remained idiorhythmic down to the present time. Such arrangements were never sanctioned in the West, where personal poverty was always the rule, in spite of abuses, and where the lay servants, or famuli, customarily lived outside the monastic enclosure and worked for the community, not for individual members.⁷⁴

⁷² A. P. Kazhdan and Ann Wharton Epstein, Change in Byzantine Culture in the Eleventh and Twelfth Centuries (Berkeley–Los Angeles–London, 1985), p. 87, commented on the growing individualism in late Byzantine monasticism, which they contrasted with the “coherent communities bound by the strict discipline of the monastic orders” in the West.

⁷³ Emil Herman, “Die Regelung der Armut in den byzantinischen Klöstern,” OCP 7 (1941), esp. 419–21.

PREFACE

Mention has already been made of the internal and external monks and imposed guests who appear in the typika and who were clearly regarded as an abuse, though their precise status is unclear. Internal and external monks were distinguished in (28) Pantokrator [28], and Isaac Komnenos specified that his secretary should be treated as an internal monk in (29) Kosmosoteira [107]. Kelliotai and external monks were forbidden in (32) Mamas [26], of which the provisions, with the addition of imposed guests, were repeated in (58) Menoikeion [11]. These sources suggest that internal monks, who may have been monks assigned from other houses, lived in the monastery but did not participate in the common life, and that external monks lived outside at the expense of the monastery. Imposed guests were apparently appointed by the patron, but they may have included the political prisoners who were sometimes incarcerated in monasteries.

Some monks in the West also lived outside monasteries, either when they served parishes or administered monastic estates or as independent hermits or wandering monks, who were called sarabaitae and gyrovagi in the Rule of Benedict. They had no special name or status, however, when they belonged to a community and obeyed its superior. From the twelfth century on, there were also lay pensioners or corrodians who received material support from monasteries, and sometimes lived in them, usually in return for some sort of payment. Though disapproved of by reformers, corrodies were a recognized way for poor monasteries to acquire property and to use their underoccupied facilities.⁷⁵

The authors of the typika frequently refer to monastic possessions and finances, which were a subject of concern in both the East and the West.⁷⁶ Neophytos, in the early thirteenth century, was opposed to the acquisition of property by his hermitage in Cyprus, (45) Neophytos [10], and in 1261–80/81 Michael VIII Palaiologos mentioned the resentment at the wealth of monasteries in (37) Auxentios [9]. The security of monastic institutions was more often threatened by poverty than by wealth, however, and the authors of most typika sought to secure both an adequate endowment for their monasteries and, when possible, exemptions from taxes and other fiscal obligations. (60) Charsianeites, which dates from the early fifteenth century, was exceptional in its requirement that the monks “must pay the fisc its due . . . from the income of the monastic estates” [C8].

⁷⁴ Ursmer Berlière, La familia dans les monastères bénédictins du moyen âge (= Académie royale de Belgique, Classe des lettres et des sciences morales et politiques, Mémoires in-8° [ser. 2] 29.2) (Brussels, 1931).

⁷⁵ See Howard M. Stuchert, Corrodies in the English Monasteries: A Study in English Social History of the Middle Ages (Philadelphia, 1923).

⁷⁶ Charanis, “Monastic Properties,” esp. pp. 56–59 and 82–87.

PREFACE

There are some interesting references elsewhere in this typikon to taxes and tithes [A11] and in (34) Machairas to the tithing of male but not of female animals, “because of the wool and the cheese” [170]. Monastic estates were mostly run by dependencies and cultivated by dependent workers, for whose treatment Isaac Komnenos expressed a concern in (29) Kosmosoteira [71], [76]. Two other important sources of revenue for monasteries were gifts made at the time of entry, which were prohibited in some houses but welcomed by others, and grants in return for liturgical commemoration and burial. A few houses required rich candidates to dispose of their property before joining the community. Practice with regard to payment for entry into monasteries also varied in the West, where compulsory payments were considered simoniacal, but voluntary offerings were commonly accepted.⁷⁷

After the expenses of the community itself, philanthropic and eleemosynary activities were the most important drain on monastic revenues, though the typika give no indication of the proportion of monastic income they absorbed. Almost all houses distributed alms to the poor and to travelers at the gate (pyle or porta) and provided food and lodging in the xenodocheion, or guesthouse, and many of them assisted orphans, prisoners, and women who lacked the wherewithal for dowries. The hospital associated with the Pantokrator in Constantinople was unique, but many houses supported hospices, old age homes, and hospitals, and also bridges, which were considered a worthy object of charity and were mentioned in several typika, including (29) Kosmosoteira [67]. In (23) Pakourianos [29], the monastic hostel at Bačkovo was cared for by peasants who held responsible positions and who in some respects resembled the officeholders or ministeriales who performed comparable duties for monasteries in the West.

The protection of monastic property often presented a greater problem than its acquisition, and the rising concern in the eleventh and twelfth centuries over the alienation of consecrated property paralleled the efforts of the reformers in the West to recover ecclesiastical revenues and possessions from lay owners and to prevent further alienation to either secular or ecclesiastical authorities. Even the greatest houses, and those with the most comprehensive privileges, were liable to oppression and invasion by nobles and churchmen, including the emperor and the patriarch, and their founders tried to find the proper balance between protection and control. The ideal was a powerful but distant protector—strong enough to repel invaders but sufficiently removed not to be an oppressor himself—like the so-called umbrella-advocacy exercised by the western emperor over Cistercian abbeys in the Holy Roman Empire or the regional protectorates established by great prelates such as the archbishops of Mainz and Cologne.

The bishops were more often presented in the typika as a source of difficulty than of protection. Very few mentioned decrees such as the fourth canon of the Council of Chalcedon, which granted the bishops authority over the monks in every town and region, and many of them either failed to refer to the bishop at all or asserted that their monasteries were independent and exempt from the bishop. In (23) Pakourianos he was excluded from the liturgical services at Bačkovo [3], and at the monastery of St. Demetrios-Kellibara at Constantinople, according to the typikon issued by Michael Palaiologos in 1282, (38) Kellibara I, the patriarch himself was entitled only to liturgical commemoration [15]. Episcopal rights were explicitly rejected at the monastery at Ematha, (36) Blemmydes, where no outsider was allowed to investigate or correct any spiritual failings [1]. This is not to say that bishops were systematically excluded from all monasteries. Their role in confirming and blessing and occasionally in choosing new monastic superiors and in granting the power to hear confessions has already been discussed, and their supervisory powers were recognized in a few houses, as in (29) Kosmosoteira [41]. In (31) Areia, which bishop Leo of Nauplia wrote in 1143–49, the bishop had no authority over the monastery but could investigate spiritual faults [M11], and in (35) Skoteine any misunderstandings were laid first before outside spiritual fathers, perhaps local superiors, and then before the bishop [16]. The patriarch of Constantinople was recognized as the protector of the monastery in (37) Auxentios [16] and had the power of spiritual correction over the nuns in (39) Lips [1].

⁷⁷ Joseph H. Lynch, Simoniacal Entry into Religious Life from 1000 to 1260: A Social, Economic, and Legal Study (Columbus, Ohio, 1976).

PREFACE

The authors of the typika were more likely to look for protection to secular than to ecclesiastical authorities. Mindful of the dangers of charistikarioi, they turned to the more restricted type of protector known as an ephoros or prostates, who was often a ruler, a member of the founding family, or a great noble, as in (49) Geromeri [15]. Local magnates were also sometimes used, and Isaac Komnenos, in (29) Kosmosoteira, expected the military men in nearby villages and the vestiaritai, or imperial bodyguards, to defend the monastery [110], [112]. Some ephoroi acted not only as protectors in external affairs, but also as internal administrators, like commendatory abbots in the West. At the monastery of St. John the Forerunner, (58) Menoikeion stated that the ephoros worked with the superior and monastic officials on both the spiritual and the material affairs of the community [21–22]. Such a position resembled that of the western advocates, who exercised jurisdiction in the name of the monastery and were often chosen from within the family of the founder. The rewards of the ephoros were in principle spiritual. They were defined in (50) Gerasimos as the remission of sins, the health of the soul and body, and a good reputation [A4], [B5]. In practice, however, they often took a more concrete form. There was a balance in medieval monasteries between the need for protection and the desire for independence. Just as the advocates in the West inherited some aspects of lay proprietorship, the ephoroi exercised some of the same powers as the charistikarioi, but as time went on, their authority was effectively limited.

When all forms of human protection failed, religious communities sought supernatural assistance, both from God and from the saints, whose role as protectors was less prominent in the typika than in hagiographical texts, but who are mentioned several times, as in (38) Kellibara I, where the emperor is called upon to guard the monastery in such a way as to have “the great athlete of Christ, Demetrios, as his legate and intermediary” [16]. Even when they were not specifically invoked, the saints were ever present in the monasteries. The images of saints appeared to be alive at Bera, according to (29) Kosmosoteira [9]; the patron saint—“our fervent patron and helper”—was personally present in (32) Mamas [4], [9], [22], [46]; and in (57) Bebaia Elpis, the saints were “living images” and “efficacious and inspiring figures” whose lives were models for the nuns to follow [30]. The close relation between nature and supernature was characteristic of religious life in both the East and the West and is a reminder that the monks and nuns lived in the company of supernatural powers and the expectation of eternal salvation. Although the typika published in these volumes are primarily concerned with the outer forms of monastic life, they were written not only for institutions but also for the men and women who sought to lead a Christian life in religious communities, and they reflect the changing aspirations and objectives of monks and nuns and of their patrons throughout the course of the Middle Ages.

PREFACE

Giles Constable

Acknowledgments

The idea of producing a corpus of English language translations of the Byzantine monastic foundation documents was Giles Constable's, which he proposed to me as my first assignment in the spring of 1981 when I was a research associate and he the director of Dumbarton Oaks. Together he and I developed the scope of the project which governed it to its conclusion, a comprehensive series of authoritative translations of all the documents that fit the criterion of being founders' rules for medieval Byzantine monasteries.

Like most projects of this scope, the Byzantine Monastic Foundation Documents Project was brought to completion with generous help from several institutions and many individuals over the last fifteen years. Foremost among the latter has been Dr. Constable, not only for the initial idea that led to the project but also for the crucial and generous support he lent to it in its early years, including the financing — through the director's discretionary fund — of two conferences of the project's participants that met at Dumbarton Oaks in November 1982 and in March 1984. Even after his departure from Dumbarton Oaks in 1985, he remained a supporter of the project through its many trials and tribulations.

As the dimensions of our project became evident, Giles Constable and I decided to seek outside support. I wrote a proposal for funding by the National Endowment for the Humanities, which in March 1982 awarded Dumbarton Oaks a small grant for $32,000, mostly to pay for modest honoraria for the translators we proposed to hire for the project. Giles Constable and I served as principal investigators under the grant during this phase of the project. On the recommendation of Susan Mango, the NEH program officer for the grant, we sought a Greek editor for the project, and Angela Hero of Queens College, New York, agreed to join us in this capacity. Over the course of the next eight years her role in the project was to grow so significantly that she would justly come to merit the co-authorship that this completed work accords her. Her services to the project have been many, but her meticulous proofing and editing of the translations — she has read every word of the Greek texts — was the indispensable service without which the project could not have been accomplished.

Next, I began the recruitment of translators. We quickly discovered that the universe of those both willing and able to handle the translation assignments was quite small, even after we decided to cast our nets more broadly and seek translators from abroad. Determined not to compromise quality, we found it necessary to delay placing some major assignments until suitable translators were located.

Early on in the project, we became aware of a parallel effort being undertaken by Robert Jordan of Methodist College, Belfast. He had already virtually completed a fine English translation of the typikon of Pakourianos, and was aiming to start on other typika of the eleventh and twelfth centuries. Appraised of our effort at Dumbarton Oaks and of our hopes for obtaining funding from the NEH, Robert Jordan graciously agreed to merge his project with our own.

ACKNOWLEDGMENTS

After the end of my appointment at Dumbarton Oaks in 1984, I was able to obtain an additional source of funding for the project through a fellowship for the 1984–85 academic year at the National Humanities Center in Research Triangle Park, North Carolina. While the translation and proofing of the documents progressed, I computerized the project, assembled the secondary literature needed for the commentaries, and drafted introductions to the documents. After the conclusion of this fellowship, I received additional funding for the project through the Citadel Development Fund of the Military College of South Carolina, where I taught from 1985 through 1986.

The NEH grant and through it all financial support from Dumbarton Oaks ceased in January 1986. For the next four years while the last translations were completed (gratis — since it was no longer possible to pay honoraria), Angela Hero and I supported the project on our own private resources. At that stage Angela willingly took on additional management responsibilities and became the project's co-director. The last translation was finished in the summer of 1990, completing our collection after some eight years of work.

A Dumbarton Oaks fellowship for the academic year 1990–91 was a most welcome support for the project as it entered the final stages of editing, since I had no academic position to facilitate my work. This fellowship enabled me to complete the word processing of the translations, the corpus of which had by then become quite formidable, and most important of all, provided me with an opportunity to read them at leisure so I could lay the necessary groundwork for the planned commentary.

Whatever Angela Hero and I have been able to contribute to this project, its heart and soul was made up of translations contributed by our 14 able and dedicated translators. A word about each of their contributions, therefore, does not seem out of place here.

Alice-Mary Talbot gladly took on the most substantial share of the assignments and completed them sooner than anyone else. George Dennis volunteered for scarcely less in the way of assignments, completed them promptly, and then served as a resource for other translators and myself during the balance of the project. Robert Jordan not only agreed to merge his project with our own, as mentioned above, but then completed very elegantly phrased translations of some of the longest and most important documents. Nancy Ševčenko volunteered to translate one of the most difficult documents, the typikon of Kosmosoteira. Timothy Miller was not only among our initial group of translators but also several times later on in the project saved the editors grief by agreeing to translate documents that had somehow been overlooked in the first assignments. Anastasius Bandy generously took on the translation of several very long documents mid-way through the project when no one else from our team was available to do the work.

These dedicated six scholars formed the core of our original translation team. Yet the corpus would not have been complete without able and timely assistance from eight other translators. Gianfranco Fiaccadori, who applied his prodigious linguistic skills to the translation of four short but troublesome texts, including one in Old Church Slavonic. He referred me to Ilija Iliev, a fellow at Dumbarton Oaks during the 1984–85 academic year, who volunteered to translate the other Slavonic text, the Testament of John of Rila. Drawing on her particular area of expertise in the Cypriot church, Catia Galatariotou provided us with a translation of the typikon of Neophytos. Stephen Reinert contributed fine translations of some small but important texts. Early on in the project, Patricia Karlin-Hayter contributed fine translations of some especially difficult texts. Fr. Joseph Munitiz extended a much appreciated courtesy to the project by allowing us to include his translation of the typikon of Nikephoros Blemmydes, which he was preparing along with an edition for separate publication. Robert Allison enabled us to include a translation of the virtually unknown taktikon of Nikon of the Black Mountain by offering to translate this huge text gratis, long after our funds from the NEH to pay honoraria were gone. Towards the end of the translation phase of the project, Leslie S. B. MacCoull agreed to contribute a fresh translation of the Testament of Apa Abraham so that we would not have to rely on an obscure nineteenth-century English translation.

ACKNOWLEDGMENTS

I could not have asked for a more supportive, diligent or technically proficient collaborator than Angela Hero. She and I brought the manuscript into its final form during 1992–93, during which time I held an NEH Fellowship for Independent Scholars. This fellowship provided essential concluding support for the project, without which it could not have been finished on a timely basis. With some few exceptions, the conclusion of this fellowship at the beginning of 1993 also effectively marks the end of our attempt to stay abreast of the literature.

In the course of her editorship of the translations, Angela Hero benefited in particular from the exemplary edition, translation and annotation of five of the most important typika by the late Father Paul Gautier. The pioneering studies of Phaidon Koukoules on everyday life in Byzantium also facilitated the understanding of texts so rich in realia and variety of language and style as our documents. For the preparation of the glossary, the Oxford Dictionary of Byzantium, edited by Timothy Gregory, Alexander Kazhdan, Alice-Mary Talbot, Anthony Cutler, and Nancy Ševčenko, proved an invaluable tool.

Professor George Majeska deserves our thanks for taking on the difficult task of reviewing the translations of those documents based in whole or part on Old Church Slavonic originals. A special word of appreciation is also due to Professor Nicolas Oikonomides for his expert advice regarding certain obscure fiscal terms. Warm thanks are also extended to Lee Sherry and Alexander Alexakis of Dumbarton Oaks for identifying several patristic quotations in the Thesaurus Linguae Graecae.

Dr. Johannes Koder of the University of Vienna assisted the project by kindly supplying me in 1988 with an advance copy of his forthcoming article on the fragmentary typikon of Mount Tmolos, which enabled me to prepare a English translation for the document and include it in our collection. Dr. Albert Failler, director of the Revue des études byzantines, permitted us to reproduce an earlier English translation by Joseph Munitiz of the typikon of Nikephoros Blemmydes.

I would like to thank Nicholas Caparrotta for offering a base for work in Hingham, Massachusetts, during the summers of 1985 and 1986, and also for providing safe storage for the project's voluminous files for nearly eight years. Martin Green provided encouragement and another base for work in Washington, D.C., on several occasions during the late 1980s. Finally, the late Jimmy Diaz, of San Jose, California, unstintingly gave me his personal and material support during all the years I was privileged to know him.

Last but not least, I should like to acknowledge the painstaking work of the Publications Office at Dumbarton Oaks in seeing these volumes through copy editing and into press. I am particularly grateful to Glenn Ruby, publishing manager, and to Robin Surratt, senior editor, and Olga Grushin, assistant editor, for their meticulous oversight of an unusually intricate and massive publication.

ACKNOWLEDGMENTS

Some of the greatest names in Byzantine scholarship, starting with Leo Allatius and Bernard de Montfaucon in the seventeenth century and down to Paul Gautier in our own times have done wonderful work on some of the documents that make up this collection; the reward for our labors has been the opportunity to be perhaps the first individuals to read through all of those included in our collection from beginning to end. This has enabled us to see the whole sweep of the history of medieval Byzantine monasticism unfold before us. It has been quite an experience, well worth all the work, and we now offer this collection to our readers, confident that they will share in our reward.

John Thomas
San Francisco, California
December 1996

Abbreviations

The following is a list of all abbreviations employed in the notes and bibliographies to refer to journals, original sources, and collections of sources. The list also includes a small number of the most common secondary sources referred to in the notes by acronyms or shortened titles.

AASS	Acta Sanctorum Bollandiana (Brussels, 1643–1770, 1894– ; Paris and Rome, 1866, 1887)
AB	Analecta Bollandiana
ABSA	Annual of the British School at Athens
AHDO	Archives d'histoire du droit oriental
AKKR	Archiv für katholisches Kirchenrecht
APAW	Abhandlungen der Preussischen Akademie der Wissenschaften
ASCL	Archivio storico per la Calabria e la Lucania
ASI	Archivio storico italiano
ASS	Archivio storico siciliano
BBAO	Bulletin of the British Association of Orientalists
BBBS	Bulletin of British Byzantine Studies
BBGG	Bollettino della Badia greca di Grottaferrata
BCH	Bulletin de correspondance hellénique
Beck, KTL	Hans-Georg Beck, Kirche und theologische Literatur im byzantinischen Reich (Munich, 1959)
BF	Byzantinische Forschungen
BHO	Bibliotheca Hagiographica Orientalis
BIFAO	Bulletin de l'Institut français d'archéologie orientale
BISIAM	Bollettino dell'Istituto Storico Italiano per il Medio Evo e Archivio Muratoriano
BM	Benediktinische Monatschrift
B&MGS	Byzantine and Modern Greek Studies
Bompaire, "Catalogues"	Jacques Bompaire, "Les catalogues de livres-manuscripts d'époque byzantine (XI ^e –XV ^e s.)," in Byzance et les Slaves, Études de civilisation: Mélanges Ivan Dujčev (Paris, 1979), pp. 59–81
BNJ	Byzantinisch-neugriechische Jahrbücher
BSAC	Bulletin de la Société d'archéologie copte
BSC	Byzantine Studies Conference, Abstracts of Papers
BS/EB	Byzantine Studies/Études byzantines
BZ	Byzantinische Zeitschrift

ABBREVIATIONS

- CA Cahiers archéologiques
- CCM Cahiers de civilisation médiévale
- CH Church History
- Chalandon, Alexis I^{er}
 Ferdinand Chalandon, Essai sur le règne d'Alexis I^{er} Comnène (Paris, 1900)
- Chalandon, Jean II et Manuel I
 Ferdinand Chalandon, Jean II Comnène (1118–1143) et Manuel I Comnène (1143–1180) (Paris, 1912)
- CIG Corpus Inscriptionum Graecarum, ed. A. Boeckh et al. (Berlin, 1825–77)
- CRAI Comptes-rendus de l'Académie des inscriptions et belles-lettres
- CSCO Corpus Scriptorum Christianorum Orientalium (Paris, Louvain, 1903–)
- CSHB Corpus Scriptorum Historiae Byzantinae
- CTh Codex Theodosianus, ed. Theodor Mommsen et al. (Berlin, 1905)
-
- DACL Dictionnaire d'archéologie chrétienne et de liturgie, ed. F. Cabrol and H. Leclercq (Paris, 1907–53)
- Darrouzès, Οφφίκια
 Jean Darrouzès, Recherches sur les ὀφφίκια de l'église byzantine (Paris, 1970)
- Darrouzès, Regestes
 Jean Darrouzès, Les regestes des actes du Patriarcat de Constantinople, vol. 1, fasc. 5: Les regestes de 1310 à 1376 (Paris, 1977); fasc. 6: Les Regestes de 1377 à 1410 (Paris, 1979)
- DDC Dictionnaire de droit canonique, ed. R. Naz (Paris, 1935–)
- Delehayé, Deux typica
 Hippolyte Delehayé, Deux typica byzantins de l'époque des Paléologues (Brussels, 1921)
- Demetrakos, Lexikon
 D. Demetrakos, Mega Lexikon tes Hellenikes Glosses, 9 vols. (Athens, 1949–50)
- DHGE Dictionnaire d'histoire et de géographie ecclésiastiques, ed. A. Baudrillart et al. (Paris, 1912–)
- Dmitrievsky, Opisanie
 Aleksii Dmitrievsky, Opisanie liturgicheskikh rykopisei, 3 vols. (Kiev, 1895–1901; Petrograd, 1917)
- Dölger, Regesten
 Franz Dölger, Regesten der Kaiserurkunden des oströmischen Reiches von 565–1453, 5 vols. (Munich-Berlin, 1924–65)
- Dölger, Schatzkammer
 Franz Dölger, Aus den Schatzkammern des Heiligen Berges (Munich, 1948)
- DOP Dumbarton Oaks Papers
- DS Dictionnaire de spiritualité ascétique et mystique, ed. M. Viller (Paris, 1932–)
- DTC Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. Vacant et al. (Paris, 1935–72)

ABBREVIATIONS

- EA* Ekklesiastike Aletheia
EB Études byzantines
EEBS Epeteris Etaireias Byzantinon Spoudon
EKEE Epeteris tou Kentrou Epistemonikon Ereunon
EL Ephemerides Liturgicae
EO Echos d' Orient
EP Ekklesiastikos Pharos
EphL Ephemerides liturgicae
- FM* Fontes Minores
- GOTR* Greek Orthodox Theological Review
GRBS Greek, Roman, and Byzantine Studies
 Grumel, Regestes
 Venance Grumel, Les registes des actes du Patriarcat de Constantinople, vol. 1, fasc. 1: Les registes de 381 à 715 (Chalcedon, 1932); 2nd ed. (Paris, 1972)
- GSKA* Glas Srbske Kraljevske Akademije
- Halkin, BHG
 François Halkin, Bibliotheca hagiographica graeca, 3rd ed. (Brussels, 1957)
- HUS* Harvard Ukrainian Studies
HZ Hilendarski Zbornik
- IBID* Izvestiya na Bulgarskoto Istorichsko Druzhestvo
ICS Illinois Classical Studies
IF Indogermanische Forschungen
IRAIK Izvestiia Russkago Archeologicheskago Instituta v Konstantinople
- Janin, Géographie
 Raymond Janin, La géographie ecclésiastique de l'empire byzantin, vol. 2: Les églises et les monastères des grands centres byzantins (Paris, 1975); vol. 3: Les églises et les monastères [de Constantinople], 2nd ed. (Paris, 1969)
- JDAI, Kairo*
 Jahrbuch des Deutschen Archäologischen Instituts, Abteilung Kairo
- JEH* Journal of Ecclesiastical History
JGR K. E. Zachariä von Lingenthal, Jus graeco-romanum, 7 vols. (Leipzig, 1856–84)
JÖB Jahrbuch der Österreichischen Byzantinistik
JÖBG Jahrbuch der Österreichischen Byzantinischen Gesellschaft
JSAH Journal of the Society of Architectural Historians
JWCI Journal of the Warburg and Courtauld Institutes

ABBREVIATIONS

- KC* Kretika Chronika
- Koukoules, BBP
Phaidon Koukoules, Byzantinon bios kai politismos, 6 vols. (Athens, 1948–57)
- Krautheimer, Byzantine Architecture
Richard Krautheimer, Early Christian and Byzantine Architecture, 4th ed., rev. Slobodan Ćurčić (Harmondsworth, 1986)
- Kriaras, Lexiko
Emmanuel Kriaras, Lexiko tes mesaionikes ellenikes demodous grammateias, 12 vols. (Thessaloniki, 1969–)
- KRU* W. E. Crum and G. Steindorff, Koptische Rechtsurkunden des achten Jahrhunderts aus Djême (Theben) (Leipzig, 1912; repr. Leipzig, 1971)
- KS* Kypriakai Spoudai
- Lampe, PGL
G. W. H. Lampe, A Patristic Greek Lexicon (Oxford, 1961)
- Laurent, Regestes
Vitalien Laurent, Les registes des actes du Patriarcat de Constantinople, vol. 1, fasc. 4: Les registes de 1208 à 1309 (Paris, 1971)
- Lefort et al., Iviron
Jacques Lefort, Nicolas Oikonomides, and Denise Papachryssanthou, Actes d'Iviron, pt. 1: Des origines au milieu du XI^e siècle (= Archives de l'Athos 14) (Paris, 1985)
- Lemerle et al., Actes de Saint-Pantéléèmon
Paul Lemerle, Gilbert Dagron, and Sima Cirković, Actes de Saint-Pantéléèmon (= Archives de l'Athos 12) (Paris, 1982)
- Lemerle, Cinq études
Paul Lemerle, Cinq études sur le XI^e siècle byzantin (Paris, 1977)
- Lemerle, Lavra
Paul Lemerle, André Guillou, Nicolas Svoronos, and Denise Papachryssanthou, Actes de Lavra, pt. 1: Des origines à 1204 (= Archives de l'Athos 5) (Paris, 1970); pt. 3: De 1329 à 1500 (= Archives de l'Athos 10) (Paris, 1979); pt. 4: Études historique–Actes serbes–compléments et Index (= Archives de l'Athos 11) (Paris, 1982)
- MAH* Mélanges d'archéologie et d'histoire
- Majeska, Russian Travelers
George Majeska, Russian Travelers to Constantinople in the Fourteenth and Fifteenth Centuries (Washington, D.C., 1984)
- Maspero, P. Cairo Masp.
Jean Maspero, Catalogue général des antiquités égyptiennes du Musée du Caire. Papyrus grecs d'époque byzantine, 3 vols. (Cairo, 1911–16)

ABBREVIATIONS

- Mathews, Byzantine Churches
 Thomas Mathews, The Byzantine Churches of Istanbul: A Photographic Survey
 (University Park, Pa., 1976)
- MDAI Athens*
Mitteilungen des Deutschen Archäologischen Instituts, Athenische Abteilung
- MDAI Kairo*
Mitteilungen des Deutschen Archäologischen Instituts, Abteilung Kairo
- Meyer, Haupturkunden
 Ph. Meyer, Die Haupturkunden für die Geschichte der Athosklöster (Leipzig, 1894)
- M&H* Medievalia et Humanistica
- MM* F. Miklosich and F. Müller, Acta et diplomata graeca medii aevi sacra et profana, 6 vols. (Vienna, 1860–90)
- Müller-Wiener, Bildlexikon
 Wolfgang Müller-Wiener, Bildlexikon zur Topographie Istanbuls (Tübingen, 1977)
- NCE* New Catholic Encyclopedia, 15 vols. (New York, 1967)
- NH* Neos Hellenomnemon
- NJ* Justinian, Novellae, ed. R. Schoell and W. Kroll, Corpus juris civilis, vol. 3, 5th ed. (Berlin, 1928)
- NPB* Angelo Mai and J. Cozza-Luzi, Nova patrum bibliotheca, 10 vols. (Rome, 1852–1905)
- OC* Orientalia Christiana
- OCA* Orientalia Christiana Analecta
- OCP* Orientalia Christiana Periodica
- ODB* Alexander Kazhdan, ed., Oxford Dictionary of Byzantium, 3 vols. (New York– Oxford, 1991)
- Oeconomus, Vie religieuse
 Lysimaque Oeconomus, La vie religieuse dans l'Empire byzantin au temps des Comnènes et des Anges (Paris, 1918)
- OL* Orientalistische Literaturzeitung
- OS* Ostkirchliche Studien
- P. Lond.* F. G. Kenyon and H. I. Bell, Greek Papyri in the British Museum, 7 vols.
 (London, 1893–1974)
- Papachryssanthou, Prôtaton
 Denise Papachryssanthou, Actes du Prôtaton (= Archives de l'Athos 7) (Paris, 1975)
- PG* J. P. Migne, Patrologiae cursus completus. Series graeco-latina, 161 vols. (Paris, 1857–66)

ABBREVIATIONS

- POC* Proche-Orient chrétien
- RAC* Reallexikon für Antike und Christentum, ed. T. Klauser (Stuttgart, 1950–)
- RAM* Revue d'ascétique et de mystique
- RDC* Revue de droit canonique
- REB* Revue des études byzantines
- REG* Revue des études grecques
- RESE* Revue des études sud-est européennes
- RHE* Revue d'histoire ecclésiastique
- RHPR* Revue d'histoire et de philosophie religieuses
- RHR* Revue de l'histoire des religions
- RIDA* Revue internationale des droits de l'Antiquité
- ROC* Revue de l'Orient chrétien
- R&P* G. A. Rhalles and M. Potles, Syntagma ton theion kai hieron kanonon, 6 vols. (Athens, 1852–59; repr. 1966)
- RQ* Römische Quartalschrift für christliche Altertumskunde und [für] Kirchengeschichte
- RQH* Revue des questions historiques
- RSCI* Rivista di storia della chiesa in Italia
- Sathas, MB Konstantinos N. Sathas, Mesaionike Bibliothekē, 7 vols. (Venice-Paris, 1872–94)
- SBAW* Sitzungsberichte der Bayerischen Akademie der Wissenschaften
- SBN* Studi bizantini e neoellenici
- SC* Sources chrétiennes
- SCH* Studies in Church History
- SE* Sacris Erudiri
- SF* Südost-Forschungen
- SM* Studi meridionali
- ST* Studi e Testi
- TEE* Threskeutike kai Ethike Engkyklopaideia, 12 vols. (Athens, 1962–68)
- TKDA* Trudy kievskoi duchovnoi Akademii
- T&M* Travaux et mémoires
- T&U* Texte und Untersuchungen zur Geschichte der altchristlichen Literatur (Leipzig-Berlin, 1882–)
- Trapp, PLP Erich Trapp, Prosopographisches Lexikon der Palaiologenzeit (Vienna, 1976–)
- Tsiknopoullos, Kypriaka Typika
Ioannes Tsiknopoullos, Kypriaka Typika (Nicosia, 1969)
- Turyn, Manuscripts
Alexander Turyn, Dated Greek Manuscripts in the Libraries of Great Britain (Washington, D.C., 1980)

ABBREVIATIONS

Twilight of Byzantium

Twilight of Byzantium: Aspects of Cultural and Religious History in the Late Byzantine Empire, ed. Slobodan Ćurčić and Doula Mouriki (Princeton, 1991)

Van Millingen, Byzantine Churches

A. Van Millingen, Byzantine Churches in Constantinople: Their History and Architecture (London, 1912)

Varzos, Geneologia

Konstantinos Varzos, He genealogia ton Komnenon, 2 vols. (Thessaloniki, 1984)

Volk, Gesundheitswesen

Robert Volk, Gesundheitswesen und Wohltätigkeit im Spiegel der byzantinischen Klostertypika (Munich, 1983)

Volk, “Klosterbibliotheken”

Otto Volk, “Die byzantinischen Klosterbibliotheken von Konstantinopel, Thessalonike und Kleinasien” (Ph.D. diss., Munich, 1955)

VV Vizantiiskii Vremennik

ZAM Zeitschrift für Askese und Mystik

ZÄS Zeitschrift für ägyptische Sprache und Altertumskunde

Zepos, Jus J. and P. Zepos, Jus graecoromanum, 8 vols. (Athens, 1931; repr. Aalen, 1962)

ZKG Zeitschrift für Kirchengeschichte

ZKT Zeitschrift für katholische Theologie

ZMNP Zhurnal Ministerstva Narodnogo Prosveshchenija

ZMR Zeitschrift für Missionswissenschaft und Religionswissenschaft

ZRVI Zbornik Radova Vizantološkog Instituta

ZSR k. a. Zeitschrift der Savigny-Stiftung für Rechtswissenschaft, Kanonistische Abteilung

ZSR r. a. Zeitschrift der Savigny-Stiftung für Rechtsgeschichte, Romanistische Abteilung

The translation of scriptural passages follows the L. C. Brenton translation of the Septuagint (London, 1844) and the Revised Standard Version of the New Testament (New York, 1973). The rendering of names for lighting devices is based on L. Ph. Bouras, “Byzantine Lighting Devices,” XVI Internationales byzantinistenkongress. Akten II/3, JÖB 32–33 (1982), pp. 479–91.

Introduction

A. Purpose of the Byzantine Monastic Foundation Documents Project

Although there have been a handful of valuable studies of the corpus of Byzantine monastic foundation documents, no one has ever attempted to assemble the documents themselves in a collection for study. This shortcoming has severely handicapped our ability to understand medieval Byzantine monasticism, for which these documents are unquestionably the most important historical texts. That being the case, it might seem that the obvious step to remedy this deficiency would be to produce a set of new critical editions with scholarly commentaries. The late Paul Gautier certainly made an impressive start on this worthy project by undertaking the publication of the typika of the Komnenian era, beginning with his edition of (28) Pantokrator in 1974. He completed editions with commentaries and French translations (all monuments of the most scrupulous scholarship) for five of these documents by the time of his death in 1985.¹

Our own project, though inspired by Gautier, has had a more modest scope, namely the production of accurate English translations, with commentaries and annotations, of all of the founders' documents drawn up for medieval Byzantine monasteries for which there were available texts in printed editions. Even though it was clear that—aside from those editions then being prepared by Gautier—a very strong case could be made for also producing a set of modern critical editions of all of the documents, Giles Constable advised against such an expansion of our undertaking. Since it has taken a decade just to produce and edit the translations, time has amply proven the wisdom of this restriction of scope.

Constable foresaw how immensely valuable even a collection of translations would be not only for Byzantine historians but also for western medievalists and all those interested in the history of Christianity. Our readers can now reap the rewards of his foresight. We can now learn a very great deal about Byzantine monasticism that might otherwise have had to be deferred for another generation. Yet it must be admitted that the production of a corpus of translations before a complete set of modern critical editions was available has made this present work extremely difficult and necessarily tentative.

B. Publication of the Texts and Definition of the Corpus

One fundamental problem resulting from our decision to produce a collection of translations ahead of a complete modern set of editions was that the content of the corpus of Byzantine monastic foundation documents had not yet been defined. The process of definition began as early as the seventeenth century, at which time Leo Allatius was aware of some of the texts which would come to make up the corpus.² The first editions began to be prepared, one of which in the imprint of J. J. Sirmond³ remains, remarkably enough, the only one in existence for its document and is used here as the basis for our translation of (3) Theodore Studites. The seventeenth century also saw Bernard de Montfaucon's first edition of (27) Kecharitomene in 1688.⁴

¹ (28) Pantokrator (1974), (19) Attaleiates (1981), (22) Evergetis (1982), (23) Pakourianos (1984), and (27) Kecharitomene (1985).

INTRODUCTION

In the eighteenth century, the most important work was published in Italy, including J. Pasini's Turin edition of the Memorandum of (31) Areia in 1749, the monk Ephraim's Venetian editions of the Rule of (24) Christodoulos and (34) Machairas in 1756, and then first editions of (45) Neophytos by Archimandrite Kyprianos in 1779 and of (17) Nikon Metanoeite by Nicholas Glykys in 1780.⁵

Nothing more was accomplished until the middle of the nineteenth century, when certain of the documents that would eventually come to be recognized as part of our corpus were published in conjunction with other scholarly endeavors.⁶ In 1849, Cardinal Angelo Mai executed an edition of one of the two versions we now have of (4) Stoudios in the fifth volume of his Nova patrum bibliotheca. J. P. Migne began to bring out his still convenient Patrologia Graeca in 1857. Eventually this series would include reprints of existing editions of (3) Theodore Studites, Mai's version of (4) Stoudios [B] and of Montfaucon's (27) Kecharitomene. In 1859, C. W. Goodwin produced the first, and for a long time the only, English translation of one of the documents, (1) Apa Abraham. In 1861, Giuseppe Spata published the second and third versions of (25) Fragala in conjunction with his study of medieval Greek manuscripts in Palermo. In 1865, P. Aravantinos published the first edition of (49) Geromeri in the Greek provincial journal Pandora.

By 1858, the eminent canonist, Cardinal J. B. Pitra, then engaged in the publication of many of the sources of Greek canon law in his Spicilegium Solesmense, recognized the necessity of distinguishing between purely liturgical typika and the monastic (i.e., "founders") typika that make up the documents included in our present collection.⁷

² Leo Allatius, De libris et rebus ecclesiasticis graecorum (Paris, 1646).

³ (3) Theodore Studites, ed. J. J. Sirmond, Opera Varia, ed. J. de la Baume, vol. 5: Sancti Theodori Studitae Epistolae aliaque scripta dogmatica (Paris, 1696), pp. 80–88.

⁴ Bernard de Montfaucon, Analecta graeca sive varia opuscula graeca hactenus non edita (Paris, 1688), pp. 136–307.

⁵ (31) Areia (Memorandum [M] only): ed. J. Pasini, Codices manuscripti bibliothecae Regiae Taurinensis (Turin, 1749), pp. 426–29; (17) Nikon Metanoeite: ed. Nicholas Glykys, Prostetheises eis to telos tes Diathekes, kai diaphoron thaumaston Nikonos Monachou tou Metanoeite (Venice, 1780); (24) Christodoulos (Rule [A] only): ed. Ephraim, Biblos periechousa kanonas merikon tinon hagion . . . (Venice, 1756), pp. 24–45; (34) Machairas: ed. Ephraim, Typike Diataxis hos euretai tes kata neson Kypron sebasmiias kai basilikes mones tes hyperagias Theotokou, Machairidos epilegomenes (Venice, 1756); (45) Neophytos: ed. Archimandrite Kyprianos, Typike syn Theo Diataxis kai logoi eis ten hexaemeron tou hosiou patros hemon Neophytou tou Enkleistou (Venice, 1779).

⁶ (4) Stoudios [B], ed. Angelo Mai, Nova patrum bibliotheca, vol. 5 (Rome, 1849), pp. 78–145; (3) Theodore Studites, PG 99, cols. 1813–24 and (4) Stoudios [B], cols. 1703–20; (27) Kecharitomene, PG 127, cols. 985–1128; (1) Apa Abraham, trans. C. W. Goodwin, "Curiosities of Law. 1. Conveyancing among the Copts of the Eighth Century," The Law Magazine and Law Review 6, no. 12 (1859), pp. 237–48; (25) Fragala [B], [C], ed. Giuseppe Spata, Le pergamene greche esistenti nel grande archivio di Palermo (Palermo, 1861), pp. 197–214; (49) Geromeri, ed. P. Aravantinos, "Peri tou hosiou Neilou tou Erichiotou," Pandora 15 (1865), 470–74.

⁷ J. B. Pitra, Spicilegium Solesmense, vol. 4 (Paris, 1858), p. 381.

INTRODUCTION

Some more important work was done in the 1870s.⁸ Johann Curtius and Adolph Kirchoff published (18) Nea Gephyra in the fourth volume of the Corpus Inscriptionum Graecarum in 1877, after a transcription made by Michel Fourmont in 1730. In 1872, Konstantinos Sathas published the first edition of (19) Attaleiates and the first excerpts from (58) Menoikeion in Venice. In Russia, Porfirii Uspensky published his editions and Russian translations of (12) Tzimiskes and (15) Constantine IX in 1877 and of (59) Manuel II in 1892 as part of a multi-volume study of Mount Athos.⁹

The study of the foundation documents for their own sake resumed towards the end of the nineteenth century in Russia, Austria, and Germany. A group of Russian historians including Ivan Mansvetov and P. Bezobrazov—the rediscoverer of the manuscript of (28) Pantokrator—did some important work. Mansvetov wrote the first modern study on monastic typika in 1885, while Bezobrazov pointed out the importance of the monastic foundation documents for the history of the Byzantine Empire and church in an article he wrote in 1887, when many of them were still in manuscript, like (23) Pakourianos, (32) Mamas, (37) Auxentios, (39) Lips, (50) Gerasimos, and (60) Charsianeites.¹⁰ Bezobrazov's study also provided the first transcription of the text of (2) Pantelleria.

Mansvetov and Bezobrazov's work coincided with a revival of scholarly interest in the Byzantine monastic foundation documents. Already I. G. Troitzki had published the first edition of the fragmentary (38) Kellibara I in St. Petersburg in 1885 along with a Russian translation.¹¹ Meanwhile, in Austria, Franz Miklosich and Josef Müller republished Sathas' edition of (19) Attaleiates (1887), Montfaucon's edition of (27) Kecharitomene (1887), and Ephraim's edition of (34) Machairas (1887); then they produced new and more complete editions of (24) Christodoulos (1890) and (31) Areia (1887) in the last two volumes of their Acta et diplomata graeca medii aevi sacra et profana.¹² Their text of (24) Christodoulos is still the best currently available. In Leipzig in 1894, Ph. Meyer published many of the Athonite documents in his Die Haupturkunden für die Geschichte der Athosklöster, including (11) Ath. Rule, (13) Ath. Typikon, (14) Ath. Testament, (44) Karyes, all first editions except for (13) Ath. Typikon.¹³ A year later in 1895 in an article in Byzantinische Zeitschrift, Meyer published first editions of (47) Philanthropos and (56) Kellibara

⁸ (18) Nea Gephyra, ed. Curtius and Kirchoff, CIG, vol. 4 (Berlin, 1877), pp. 327–28; (19) Attaleiates, ed. K. A. Sathas, Mesaionike Bibliothek. Bibliotheca graeca medii aevi, vol. 1 (Vienna, 1872), pp. 3–69, and (58) Menoikeion, pp. 202–11.

⁹ (12) Tzimiskes, ed. Porfirii Uspensky, Vostok kristianskii. Athon. Istoriia Athona, vol. 3, pt. 1 (Kiev, 1877), pp. 265–76; (15) Constantine IX, ed. Uspensky, pp. 277–90; (59) Manuel II, ed. Uspensky, vol. 3, pt. 2 (St. Petersburg, 1892), 675–82.

¹⁰ Ivan Mansvetov, Tserkovnii ustav (Moscow, 1885); P. Bezobrazov, “Materiali dlya istorii vizantiiskoi imperii: I. Ne izdannie monastirskie ustav,” ZMNP 254 (1887), 65–78; rev. Ed. Kurtz, BZ 2 (1893), 627–31.

¹¹ (38) Kellibara I, ed. I. G. Troiskii, Autobiographia imperatora Mikhaila Paleologa (St. Petersburg, 1885), pp. 1–20.

¹² (19) Attaleiates, ed. Franz Miklosich and Josef Müller, Acta et diplomata graeca medii aevi sacra et profana (MM), vol. 5 (Vienna, 1887), pp. 293–327; (27) Kecharitomene, pp. 327–91; (31) Areia, pp. 178–90; (34) Machairas, pp. 392–432; (23) Christodoulos, vol. 6 (1890), pp. 59–90.

¹³ (11) Ath. Rule, ed. Ph. Meyer, Die Haupturkunden für die Geschichte der Athosklöster (Leipzig, 1894), pp. 130–40; (13) Ath. Typikon, pp. 102–22; (14) Ath. Testament, pp. 123–30; (44) Karyes, pp. 184–87.

INTRODUCTION

II.¹⁴ He was aware of Troitzki's edition of (38) Kellibara I, but could not read the latter's Russian translation. In 1896, also at Leipzig, August Heisenberg published all that was then known of (36) Blemmydes.¹⁵ This as well as all of Meyer's other editions is still standard.

In 1894 at Jena, Waldemar Nissen produced one of the first important secondary works on one of the documents, (19) Attaleiates.¹⁶ This work contains a list of the fourteen monastic foundation documents then known to the author. Meanwhile, some additional work of editing was being done in Greece by the prolific Manuel Gedeon, who produced first editions of (13) Ath. Typikon in 1885 and of (37) Auxentios in 1895, while the Greek scholar Georgios Mousaios published the first edition of (23) Pakourianos, based on an inferior manuscript, as his dissertation at Jena in 1888.¹⁷ In England in 1893, F. G. Kenyon published (1) Apa Abraham in the first volume of his Greek Papyri in the British Museum.¹⁸

In 1895, the Russian Aleksei Dmitrievsky began the truly ambitious project of producing a collection of critical editions of all of the texts, both founders' and liturgical typika.¹⁹ Earlier, he had produced an edition of (42) Sabas (1890) that was reviewed by Ed. Kurtz in Byzantinische Zeitschrift in 1894, showing again the close connection between Russian and German scholarship despite the language barrier.²⁰ The founders' typika are to be found in the first volume of Dmitrievsky's corpus, including an alternate version of (4) Stoudios [A] (first edition), (11) Ath. Rule, (14) Ath. Testament, (22) Evergetis (first edition), (28) Pantokrator (first edition), (33) Heliou Bomon (first edition), (32) Mamas (excerpts only), (37) Auxentios, a reprint of his (42) Sabas, and (43) Kasoulon (first edition). Dmitrievsky's monumental work, happily available in a recent German reprint, is still of great value, and the translations of the first of the two versions of (4) Stoudios, of (33) Heliou Bomon, of (37) Auxentios, and of (42) Sabas as presented here are based on his editions.

¹⁴ (47) Philanthropos, ed. Ph. Meyer, "Bruchstücke zweier typika ktetorika," BZ 4 (1895), pp. 48–49; (56) Kellibara II, pp. 45–48.

¹⁵ (36) Blemmydes, ed. August Heisenberg, Nicephori Blemmydae curriculum vitae et carmina (Leipzig, 1896), pp. 93–99.

¹⁶ Waldemar Nissen, Die Diataxis des Michael Attaleiates von 1077. Ein Beitrag zur Geschichte des Klosterwesens im byzantinischen Reich (Jena, 1894).

¹⁷ (13) Ath. Typikon, ed. Manuel Gedeon, Athos, anamneseis, engrapha, semeioseis (Constantinople, 1885); (37) Auxentios, ed. Manuel Gedeon, Michael Palaiologou Typikon tes epi tou Bounou tou Auxentiou sebasmiar mones Michael tou Archangelou (Athens, 1895); Georgios Mousaios (Stenimachites), Gregorios Pakourianos megas domestikos tes Dyseos kai to hyp'autou typikon tes mones tes Theotokou tes Petritzonitisses (Leipzig, 1888).

¹⁸ (1) Apa Abraham, ed. F. G. Kenyon, Greek Papyri in the British Museum, vol. 1 (London, 1893), pp. 231–36.

¹⁹ Aleksei Dmitrievsky, Opisanie liturgicheskikh rykopisei, vol. 1: Typika (Kiev, 1895); vol. 2: Euchologia (Kiev, 1901); vol. 3: Typika (Petrograd, 1917). Ed. (4) Stoudios [A], Opisanie, vol. 1, pp. 224–38; (11) Ath. Rule, pp. 246–56; (13) Ath. Typikon, pp. 238–46; (22) Evergetis, pp. 615–56; (28) Pantokrator, pp. 656–702; (32) Mamas, pp. 702–15; (33) Heliou Bomon, pp. 715–69; (37) Auxentios, pp. 769–94; (42) Sabas, pp. 222–24; and (43) Kasoulon, pp. 795–823.

²⁰ (42) Sabas, ed. Aleksei Dmitrievsky, TKDA (January 1890), 170–92, and Ed. Kurtz (review of the preceding), BZ 3 (1894), 168–70.

INTRODUCTION

Around the turn of the century, the Russian Archaeological Institute in Constantinople published Louis Petit's editions of (10) Eleousa, (61) Eleousa Inv. (both 1900) and of (29) Kosmosoteira (1908) as well as S. Pétridès' edition of (54) Neilos Damilas (1911) in its Izvestiia.²¹ All of these documents are still the best current editions even though the journal in which they were published is unfortunately quite rare. Russia itself remained a center for scholarship on the documents right up to the revolution.²² Louis Petit published a much improved edition of (23) Pakourianos in a special supplementary issue of the pioneering Russian Byzantine journal Vizantiiskii Vremennik in 1905. A. I. Papadopoulos-Kerameus published (50) Gerasimos in 1891 and (30) Phoberos in 1913 (posthumously), both in St. Petersburg in their first and only editions. In 1917 in Petrograd, Vladimir Benešević published all that ever appeared of his Taktikon of Nikon of the Black Mountain, from which we gain our still standard texts of (20) Black Mountain and (21) Roidion.

Thus, thanks primarily to the efforts of Russian and German scholars, there was a lively interest in the Byzantine monastic foundation documents by the beginning of the twentieth century.²³ In 1905, J. Cozza-Luzi, continuing Cardinal Mai's Nova patrum bibliotheca, published a first edition of (26) Luke of Messina and a new one of (43) Kasoulon that have been used for the translations of these documents in our collection. Also in 1905, Spyridon Lampros edited the hagiographic life in which (53) Meteora is preserved. We have employed another edition of (53) Meteora, by N. A. Bees, that appeared a few years later in 1909.

The great Bollandist hagiographer Hippolyte Delehaye incidentally gave us our first editions of (7) Latros (1913) and (9) Galesios (1910) in the course of his extensive publication of Greek hagiographic texts.²⁴ In 1921, Delehaye published first editions of (8) John Xenos, (39) Lips, (40) Anargyroi, and (57) Bebaia Elpis in his Deux typica byzantins de l'époque des paléologues. In a ²¹ (10) Eleousa and (61) Eleousa Inv., ed. Louis Petit, "Le Monastère de Notre-Dame de Pitié en Macédoine," IRAIK 6 (1900), 1–153, at 69–93 and 114–25; (24) Kosmosoteira, ed. Petit, "Typikon du monastère de la Kosmosotira près d'Aenos (1152)," IRAIK 13 (1908), 17–75; (54) Neilos Damilas, ed. S. Pétridès, "Le typikon de Nil Damilas pour le monastère de femmes de Baëonia en Crète (1400)," IRAIK 15 (1911), 92–111.

²² (23) Pakourianos, ed. Louis Petit, "Typikon de Grégoire Pacourianos pour le monastère de Petritzos (Bačkovo) en Bulgarie," VV Prilozhenie 11, no. 1 (1904); (50) Gerasimos, ed. A. Papadopoulos-Kerameus, Analekta Hierosolymitikes Stachyologias, vol. 2 (St. Petersburg, 1894), pp. 255–57; (30) Phoberos, ed. Papadopoulos-Kerameus, Noctes Petropolitanae (St. Petersburg, 1913), pp. 1–88; (20) Black Mountain and (21) Roidion, ed. Vladimir Benešević, Taktikon Nikona Chernogortska (Petrograd, 1917), pp. 22–67, 68–80.

²³ (26) Luke of Messina and (43) Kasoulon, ed. J. Cozza-Luzi, NPB, vol. 10, pt. 2 (Rome, 1905), pp. 117–37, 149–66; (53) Meteora, ed. Sp. Lampros, "Symbolai eis ten historian ton Meteoron," NH 2 (1905), 49–156, at 76–77, and ed. Nikos Bees, "Symbole eis ten historian ton monon ton Meteoron," Byzantis 1 (1909), 191–331, at 250–52.

²⁴ (7) Latros, ed. Hippolyte Delehaye, Monumenta Latrensia hagiographica, in Theodor Wiegand, Milet, Ergebnisse der Ausgrabungen und Untersuchungen, vol. 3, pt. 1: Der Latmos (Berlin, 1913), pp. 152–53; (9) Galesios, ed. Delehaye, Acta sanctorum novembris, vol. 3 (Brussels, 1910), pp. 508–606; (9) John Xenos, ed. Delehaye, Deux typica byzantins de l'époque des paléologues (Brussels, 1921), pp. 188–90; (8) John Xenos, pp. 191–96; (39) Lips, pp. 106–36; (40) Anargyroi, pp. 136–40; (57) Bebaia Elpis, pp. 18–105; (46) Akropolites, ed. Delehaye, "Constantini Acropolitae hagiographi byzantini epistularum manipulus," AB 51 (1933), 263–84, at 279–84.

INTRODUCTION

list that he prepared for the introduction to this work, he lists 27 documents known to him in addition to the four presented in his own publication. Delehaye's last contribution to the corpus of Byzantine monastic foundation documents was his edition of (46) Akropolites in 1933. All of Delehaye's editions, with the exception of (8) John Xenos, have been employed in the preparation of the translations of these documents in this collection.

The early twentieth century also saw the discovery of additional texts with just claims to positions in the corpus of Byzantine monastic foundation documents, but not all of them were adequately edited.²⁵ Iordan Ivanov's edition of the Slavonic text of (6) Rila appeared in 1917. The editions of (32) Mamas (1928) and (35) Skoteine (1930) by Sophronios Eustratiades are generally considered to be unsatisfactory. The Archimandrite Christophoros Ktenas provided us with what were for a long time the only editions of (41) Docheiariou and (48) Prodromos (both 1929). In extreme old age, Manuel Gedeon attempted an improved edition of (35) Skoteine in 1930, but without notable success. Martin Jugie's edition of (58) Menoikeion appeared in 1937 in Byzantion and served as the standard edition of that document for nearly twenty years.

Placide de Meester, who could lay claim to the first modern attempt to document the institutions of Byzantine monasticism,²⁶ not coincidentally produced the first reasonably complete working list of the foundation documents in 1940 in an article that provides a thorough discussion of earlier attempts to organize the material.²⁷ De Meester made the enduring distinction between founders' typika (typika ktetorika) and founders' testaments (diathekai). He included 33 documents (including 5 that are post-Byzantine) in the former list and 14 (5 post-Byzantine) in the latter list. His article also provides a list of 19 founders' typika now lost but attested in surviving sources.

Work continued after the war with the publication of several first editions and useful re-editions.²⁸ Paul Lemerle published (51) Koutloumousi in his 1945 edition of the Actes de Kutlumis.

²⁵ (6) Rila, ed. Iordan Ivanov, sv. Ivan Rilski i negoviyat monastir (Sofia, 1917), pp. 136–42; (25) Mamas, ed. Sophronios Eustratiades, "Typikon tes en Konstantinoupolei mones tou hagiou megalomartyros Mamantos," Hellenika 2 (1928), 256–314; (35) Skoteine, ed. Eustratiades, "He en Philadelphieia mone tes hyperagias Theotokou tes Koteines," Hellenika 3 (1930), 317–39; (41) Docheiariou and (48) Prodromos, ed. K. Ktenas, "Ho Protos tou Hagiou Orous Atho kai he 'Megale Mese' e 'Synaxis,'" EEBS 6 (1929), 233–81, at 253–57 and 263–67; (35) Skoteine, ed. Manuel Gedeon, "Diatheke Maximou monachou ktitoros tes en Lydia mones Kotines," Mikrasiatika Chronika 2 (1939), 263–91; (58) Menoikeion, ed. Martin Jugie, "Le typicon du monastère du Prodrome au mont Ménécée, près de Serrès. Introduction, texte et remarques," Byzantion 12 (1937), 25–69.

²⁶ Placide de Meester, De monachico statu juxta disciplinam Byzantinam (Vatican City, 1942).

²⁷ Placide de Meester, "Les typiques de fondation," SBN 6 (1940), 496–508; cf. Th. Zielinski, "Projet de la création d'un 'Corpus scriptorum juris graecoromani tam canonici quam civilis,'" SBN 5 (1939), 735–40.

²⁸ (51) Koutloumousi, ed. V. Laurent, Actes de Kutlumis (Paris, 1945), pp. 113–38; (52) Choumnos, ed. Laurent, "Écrits spirituels inédits de Macaire Choumnos († c. 1382), fondateur de la 'Nea Moni' à Thessalonique," Hellenika 14 (1955), 40–86, at 60–71, 76–85; (58) Menoikeion, ed. André Guillou, Les archives de saint-Jean-Prodrome sur le mont Ménécée (Paris, 1955), pp. 163–76; (5) Euthymios, ed. Patricia Karlin-Hayter, "Vita S. Euthymii," Byzantion 25 (1955–57), 1–172, at 148–51; (38) Kellibara I, ed. Henri Grégoire, "Imperatoris Michaelis Palaeologi de vita sua," Byzantion 29–30 (1959–60), 447–76.

INTRODUCTION

Vitalien Laurent provided us with our first and only edition of (52) Choumnos in 1955. In that same year André Guillou produced a new edition of (58) Menoikeion, replacing Jugie, in conjunction with his study of the cartulary of the Monastery of St. John the Forerunner near Serres. In an issue of Byzantion that appeared in 1957, Patricia Karlin-Hayter, one of our translators, published the Life in which (5) Euthymios is contained. In 1960, Henri Grégoire's re-edition of (38) Kellibara I appeared in Byzantion.

By the time Raymond Janin published his list of them in 1964, the monastic foundation documents had been acknowledged as the most important body of source material for the history of Byzantine monasticism, and a consensus had formed on how to categorize the documents.²⁹ Janin, counting only founders' typika, reckoned on 32 documents. His article attempts a general discussion of Byzantine religious life based on the evidence of these texts.

A few years later in 1969, I. Tsiknopoullos brought the two Cypriot typika, (34) Machairas and (45) Neophytos, together in a convenient new edition.³⁰ Tsiknopoullos' edition, though much criticized, was the first to attempt to show the textual dependence of one of the documents, (34) Machairas, on earlier models. This suggested a rewarding approach to recreating an important part of the lost history of Byzantine monasticism that has been adopted in the presentation of our own collection.

The study of Byzantine monastic foundation documents was taken to a higher level of scholarship by Konstantinos Manaphes, who produced in 1970 the first modern monographic study (since Mansvetov) that examined the founders' typika as a group.³¹ Building on a distinction observed by de Meester, Manaphes subdivided the corpus into monastic testaments (8 documents) and typika (31 documents), and then used this distinction as the basis for his analysis. Our project's debt to Manaphes is considerable, for he considerably advanced the notion of dealing with the documents as a corpus, and our initial list of documents to be translated was drawn directly from an appendix in his study, which was itself based on the earlier lists of de Meester and Janin.

In the years before our own project began, scholarship continued at a slow rate, mostly in the form of contributing new editions or the publication of hitherto overlooked texts.³² In 1970 Patricia Karlin-Hayter's Life of Euthymios, including (5) Euthymios, that had originally appeared in Byzantion, was republished separately. Ivan Dujčev published a facsimile edition of (2) Pantelleria in 1971. Basiles Kraptsites produced a new edition of (49) Geromeri in 1972, replacing Aravantinos'

²⁹ R. Janin, "Le monachisme byzantin au Moyen Age. Commende et typica (X^e–XIV^e siècle)," REB 22 (1964), 5–44.

³⁰ (34) Machairas and (45) Neophytos, ed. I. Tsiknopoullos, Kypriaka Typika (Nicosia, 1969), pp. 3–68 and 71–104.

³¹ Konstantinos Manaphes, Monasteriaka typika-diathekai (Athens, 1970).

³² (5) Euthymios, ed. Patricia Karlin-Hayter, Vita Euthymii Patriarchae CP (Brussels, 1970), pp. 143–47; (2) Pantelleria, ed. Ivan Dujčev, "Il Tipico del monastero di S. Giovanni nell'isola di Pantelleria," BBGG, n.s., 25 (1971), 3–17; (49) Geromeri, ed. Basilio Kraptsites, Thesprotika, vol. 2 (Athens, 1972), pp. 160–68; (28) Pantokrator, ed. Paul Gautier, "Le typikon du Christ Sauveur Pantocrator," REB 32 (1974), 1–145; (12) Tzimiskes, (15) Constantine IX, and (59) Manuel II, ed. Denise Papachryssanthou, Actes du Prôtaton (= Archives de l'Athos 7) (Paris, 1975), pp. 202–15, 216–32, and 254–61; (31) Areia, ed. G. A. Choras, He "hagia mone" Areias (Athens, 1975), pp. 239–52.

INTRODUCTION

edition of more than a hundred years earlier. The first of Paul Gautier's editions, (28) Pantokrator, appeared in 1974. With the publication of the Actes du Prôtaton by Denise Papachryssanthou in 1975, we received welcome new critical editions of (12) Tzimiskes, (15) Constantine IX, and (59) Manuel II. G. A. Choras provided a modern edition of (31) Areia in 1975.

Our own project, conceived in 1981, coincided with a burst of scholarly activity that would keep the project's directors scrambling to stay abreast of the new output.³³ K. A. Manaphes and Ioannes Konidares produced the first complete edition of (60) Charsianeites in 1982, the last of the unedited texts to which Bezobrazov had called attention to nearly a hundred years earlier. In swift succession, Paul Gautier completed his modern critical editions of (19) Attaleiates in 1981, (22) Evergetis in 1982, (23) Pakourianos in 1983, and finally (27) Kecharitomene in 1985. Od. Lampsidis provided a new edition of (17) Nikon Metanoeite in 1982. Vera von Falkenhausen published the first version of (25) Fragala in 1983, completing Spata's edition of this work begun 120 years earlier. Nicolas Oikonomides' edition of the Actes de Docheiariou in 1984 gave us welcome new critical editions of (41) Docheiariou and (48) Prodromos, replacing those of Ktenas. In conjunction with his work on Nikephoros Blemmydes, our translator Fr. Joseph Munitiz has edited (1984 and 1986) the remaining fragments of (36) Blemmydes, overlooked by Heisenberg ninety years earlier. A. Philippidis-Braat republished (18) Nea Gephyra in 1985. In 1986, N. B. Tomadakes published a new edition of (8) John Xenos. Paul Lemerle's 1945 edition of (51) Koutloumousi was republished in 1988 in conjunction with the second edition of the Actes de Kutlumus. Thomas Drew-Bear and Johannes Koder published the inscription that supplies us with the partial text of (16) Mount Tmolos in 1988. Finally, one of our translators, Timothy Miller, has prepared a first edition of (55) Athanasios I that will be published by him separately with a commentary by John Thomas.

Meanwhile, contemporary scholarship continued to debate and redefine the corpus as our own work was being produced over the last decade. Ioannes Konidares produced a study in 1984

³³ (60) Charsianeites, ed. I. M. Konidares and K. A. Manaphes, "Epiteleutios boulesis kai didaskalia tou oikoumenikou patriarchou Matthaïou A' (1397–1410)," EEBS 45 (1981–82), 462–515; (19) Attaleiates, ed. Paul Gautier, "La diataxis de Michel Attaliate," REB 39 (1981), 5–143; (22) Evergetis, ed. Gautier, "Le typikon de la Théotokos Évergétis," REB 40 (1982), 5–101; (23) Pakourianos, ed. Gautier, "Le typikon du sébaste Grégoire Pakourianos," REB 42 (1984), 5–145; (27) Kecharitomene, ed. Gautier, "Le typikon de la Théotokos Kécharitôméné," REB 43 (1985), 5–165; (17) Nikon Metanoeite, ed. Od. Lampsidis, Ho ek Pontou hosios Nikon ho metanoeite (Athens, 1982), pp. 251–56; (25) Fragala, ed. Vera von Falkenhausen, "Die Testamente des Abtes Gregor von San Filippo di Fragala," HUS 7 (1983), 174–95; (41) Docheiariou and (48) Prodromos, ed. Nicolas Oikonomides, Actes de Docheiariou (= Archives de l'Athos 13) (Paris, 1984), pp. 91–97, and pp. 133–38; (36) Blemmydes, ed. Joseph Munitiz, Nicephori Blemmydae autobiographia sive curriculum vitae necnon epistula universalior (Turnhout, 1984), pp. xxx–xxxii, and "A Missing Chapter from the Typikon of Nikephoros Blemmydes," REB 44 (1986), 199–207; (18) Nea Gephyra, ed. D. Feissel and A. Philippidis-Braat, "Inventaires en vue d'un recueil des inscriptions historiques de Byzance. III. Inscriptions du Péloponnèse (à l'exception de Mistra)," T&M 9 (1985), 267–396, at 301–2; (8) John Xenos, ed. N. B. Tomadakes, "Ho Hagios Joannes ho Xenos kai Eremites en Krete (10os–11os aion)," EEBS 46 (1983–86), 1–117, at 11–12; (51) Koutloumousi, ed. Paul Lemerle, Actes de Kutlumus, 2nd ed. (Paris, 1988), pp. 113–38; (16) Mount Tmolos, ed. Thomas Drew-Bear and Johannes Koder, "Ein byzantinisches Kloster am Berg Tmolos," JÖB 38 (1988), 197–215.

INTRODUCTION

focusing on the monastic typika's contribution to canon law, with an updated list of 60 documents attached.³⁴ In 1987, one of our translators, Catia Galatariotou, produced the first comparative study of the documents in English, based on the working list for this project.³⁵ Then, as our project manuscript was being prepared in 1992, a group of scholars, including Mary Cunningham, Robert Jordan, Rosemary Morris, Margaret Mullett, Joseph A. Munitiz, Fr. Robert Taft, S.J., John Turner, and John Wortley, formed a project based at Queens University Belfast to edit, translate and annotate all of the documents associated with the pivotal eleventh-century reform monastery of Evergetis.³⁶

C. Scope, Exclusions, and Rationale of Our Collection

We follow the example of Delehaye (1921), de Meester (1940), Janin (1964), Manaphes (1970), and Konidares (1984) in concentrating on foundation documents to the exclusion of purely liturgical typika. The latter have been omitted partly on grounds of length (their inclusion would have increased the size of the present work considerably) but also because they have relatively little to tell us, aside from their discussions of the liturgy itself, about the lives of the monasteries for which they were written. They are also mostly well edited, and less difficult to read for those with at least some command of Greek.³⁷ The other category of documents identified by our distinguished predecessors, the typika ktetorika, or “founders” typika, form the core of our collection.³⁸ The content of these documents is primarily disciplinary, but also touches on a large number of other subjects of interest to both specialists and general readers.

As our previous discussion indicates, the concept of a corpus of foundation documents with an agreed membership has only recently started to solidify. In a very real though surely unintended way, Catia Galatariotou's article referred to above illustrates the ultimate futility at this point of trying to impose rigorous criteria for including or excluding documents from the corpus. The approach adopted for our own project has been to include those regulatory documents that shed some light on the life of medieval Byzantine monasteries even if some of these texts might fail to meet the strictest theoretical criteria for being considered proper typika. Until a scholarly consensus is finally formed on the content of the corpus of Byzantine monastic foundation documents, it seems to us that a tolerant “admissions policy” is in order, given the great obscurity in which most of these texts have languished.

These then have been the principles for the composition of our collection: 1) only documents which are represented by printed editions are included; 2) chronologically, our scope is from the ³⁴ Ioannes Konidares, Nomike theorese ton monasteriakon typikon (Athens, 1984).

³⁵ Catia Galatariotou, “Byzantine Ktetorika Typika: A Comparative Study,” REB 45 (1987), 77–138.

³⁶ For which see The Theotokos Evergetis and Eleventh-Century Monasticism, ed. Margaret Mullett and Anthony Kirby (Belfast, 1994).

³⁷ Robert Taft, “Typikon, Liturgical,” ODB, pp. 2131–32; for editions, see Dmitrievsky, Opisanie, vol. 1, pp. 256–656 (Evergetis), and vol. 3, pp. 1–486 (Sabas); Miguel Arranz, Le typikon du monastère du Saint-Sauveur à Messine (= OCA 185) (Rome, 1969); Juan Mateos, Le typicon de la Grande Église, 2 vols. (Rome, 1962–63); see also General Bibliography, XXIII. Liturgy.

³⁸ Alice-Mary Talbot, “Typikon, Monastic,” ODB, p. 2132; Karl Krumbacher, “Ktetor, ein lexicographischer Versuch,” IF 25 (1909), 393–421, rev. A. Heisenberg, BZ 19 (1910), 588–89.

INTRODUCTION

seventh through the fifteenth century, i.e., medieval Byzantium, thus excluding the mostly well-edited and translated monastic rules of the Later Roman Empire such as those of Pachomios and Basil of Caesarea as well as post-Byzantine documents; 3) geographically, we take an expansive view of the Byzantine world, including documents in Greek from Norman Italy and Sicily as well as from Palestine;³⁹ 4) linguistically, we have included only documents composed in Greek (thereby excluding some early Coptic testaments and Syriac rules), with the exception of two short but interesting documents preserved in Old Church Slavonic translations;⁴⁰ 5) as noted above, purely liturgical typika are excluded; 6) typika of the Byzantine commonwealth of nations, e.g., of medieval Serbia and the old Russian principalities, despite their admitted interest and strong dependence on Byzantine models,⁴¹ have been excluded; 7) a very few documents that fail to find admission to our collection under any of the criteria enumerated above are nevertheless presented here because of their special interest and importance for presenting the overall interpretational framework for the collection itself.⁴² Although these criteria may seem arbitrary, our collection includes nearly all of the edited works in the lists of Delehaye, de Meester, Janin, Manaphes and Konidares, a concordance to which is supplied in Appendix A.

Also, although the distinction drawn by de Meester and Manaphes between founders' typika and testaments is useful for some purposes, we have chosen here to include both testaments and typika without differentiation. The distinctions between them, while real enough in many cases, are not hard and fast. The documents themselves sometimes seem to frustrate a classification along these lines, as some typika adopt the format of monastic testaments while several testaments contain a considerable amount of disciplinary content.⁴³

D. Organization, Features, and Conventions of This Edition

Our collection is presented in a multi-volume edition, with the documents organized in nine chapters, preceded by a narrative chapter on the early monastic rules of antiquity by John Thomas, who has also provided introductions to each of the nine chapters that attempt to illustrate the common themes of the documents contained in each and to set them in a broader historical context.

Within the chapters, each of the 61 documents is prefaced with basic identifying information, including its formal title, translator, date, edition employed, manuscript, and other translations; a bibliography of previous work related to the document;⁴⁴ a brief institutional history of the foundation for which the document was written; and a fairly detailed analysis of the document. For the ³⁹ Sicily: (25) Fragala and (26) Luke of Messina; Italy: (36) Kasoulon; Palestine: (42) Sabas and (50) Gerasimos.

⁴⁰ (2) Pantelleria and (6) Rila.

⁴¹ See General Bibliography, XIII. Byzantine Monasticism and the Slavs.

⁴² (1) Apa Abraham, (5) Euthymios, and (61) Eleousa Inv.

⁴³ Typika in testamentary format: (10) Eleousa; (19) Attaleiates; (34) Machairas; (35) Skoteine; (45) Neophytos; (54) Neilos Damilas; (60) Charsianeites; testaments with disciplinary content: (3) Theodore Studites; (9) Galesios; (14) Ath. Testament; (17) Nikon Metanoeite; (24) Christodoulos; and (25) Fragala; for a general discussion, see Artur Steinwenter, "Byzantinische Mönchstestamente," Aegyptus 12 (1932), 55–64.

⁴⁴ For some famous founders like Theodore the Studite or Athanasios the Athonite, there are additional longer documents, the analyses are broken down into a topical scheme of organization that is intended to facilitate the study of common themes. These introductory materials, with the accompanying notes, are the work of John Thomas. Being fully aware that no one individual could hope to produce a comprehensive commentary on all the matters encompassed in this diverse collection of documents, he chose to draw on his particular expertise by emphasizing the administrative aspects of Byzantine monasticism in this first commentary.

INTRODUCTION

In order to facilitate cross-reference, we have adopted the following format for reference to the documents and chapters therein: document number in parentheses, short title in italics, and chapter reference in brackets, e.g., (22) Evergetis [12].

The translations, edited by Angela Hero, follow after the introductory materials. Readers will see that we have tried to treat this collection of translations consistently as if it were an edition. Indeed, we have perforce had to follow conventions and take some liberties usually reserved for the editors of texts, such as renumbering the chapters of one document, (40) Anargyroi, and providing a chapter numeration (and occasionally also chapter titles) for others, like (28) Pantokrator, that have none in their editions. These changes have been carefully bracketed. Readers should exercise special care in reference to documents with multiple parts. These are (4) Stoudios, presented in two versions [A] and [B] in parallel columns; (19) Attaleiates, in which the inventory, along with two attached imperial chrysobulls, has a separate chapter numeration, e.g., [INV 8]; (21) Roidion, which includes both a typikon [A] and a treatise by the same author [B]; (24) Christodoulos, which is made up of a Rule [A], a Testament [B], and a Codicil [C]; (25) Fragala, in which there are three versions [A], [B], [C] of the Testament; (31) Areia, which contains a Memorandum [M] as well as a Typikon [T]; (45) Neophytos, which also includes a set of the author's canons [C] as well as others attributed to Basil of Caesarea [CB]; (51) Koutloumousi, in which there are three versions [A], [B], [C] of the author's Testament; and (60) Charsianeites, which contains the author's Autobiography [A], his predecessors' Rule of Mark and Neilos [B], and his own Subsequent Chapters [C].

Although (39) Lips is actually two documents by different authors, we have preserved the continuous chapter numeration of the edition. (40) Anargyroi, composed by the primary author of (39) Lips but for a different institution, has been treated as a separate document. We have also presented (38) Kellibara I and (56) Kellibara II as two distinct documents by different authors for the same institution. Overall, we have tried to maintain a delicate balance between leaving the conventions of the underlying editions as undisturbed as possible while facilitating our own cross-referencing and that of our readers among all the various components of this large collection of translations. On occasion, this has meant that when cross-referencing a section of a document that lies outside its traditional chapter numeration, we must use a referent like "Preface" or "Prologue" for prefatory materials, or "Appendix A" or [INV] for an appendix or inventory. These should be self-explanatory.

Although access to the underlying Greek and Old Church Slavonic texts is not assumed, especially since many of the editions are quite rare, it is facilitated throughout our collection of biographical bibliographies. These latter include references to related hagiographic texts that are often important supplements to the information available in the foundation documents.

INTRODUCTION

translations by insertion of bracketed page or column references to the editions of the texts that we have employed.

Among the editors of these documents, only Tsiknopoulos with his edition of (34) Machairas and Gautier with his (27) Kecharitomene made any attempt to indicate the nature and extent of the borrowings of their authors from earlier documents. Only Gautier actually indicates the specific passages borrowed in his edition. We believe that it is absolutely essential to be aware of these borrowings in order to appreciate the extent of each author's own contribution. The ability to reconstruct a considerable part of monastic history through the study of these borrowings is a great bonus. Therefore we have attempted to indicate the precise borrowings among the documents, with the borrowed text placed in bold and/or italics, wherever we could identify them. Scriptural citations are also noted directly in the documents. Their translation follows the L. C. Brenton translation of the Septuagint (London, 1844) and the Revised Standard Version of the New Testament (New York, 1946). Finally, words and phrases inserted by translators in order to clarify obscure passages appear within square brackets ([...]).

Like the introductory materials, the translations are supplied with footnotes. These are primarily the work of the editors John Thomas and Angela Hero, though for certain documents individual translators have assisted us. This assistance is gratefully acknowledged in the notes to the individual documents. A series of fairly extensive cross-references to nearly all of the documents have also been provided in the document notes to the translations. These are the work of John Thomas.

A glossary of technical terms by Angela Hero will be found after the documents. There are three appendices by John Thomas: "Concordance with Previous Lists" (Appendix A); "The Regulation of Diet in the Byzantine Monastic Foundation Documents" (Appendix B); and three tables illustrating the topical interrelationships of three families of monastic typika (Appendix C). The first table in the last appendix, titled "Topical Interrelationships of the Evergetian Family of Monastic Typika," should be consulted to identify the "related documents" frequently referred to in the endnotes to many of the translations in conjunction with cross-references to (22) Evergetis. A general bibliography by John Thomas, subdivided into thirty topical bibliographies, concludes our work.

We have chosen not to adopt a strictly chronological ordering for the placement of the documents within our nine chapters. Given the uncertainty of the dating of many documents, chronology would not have been a sure guide to organization in any event. Moreover, such a large collection of documents as ours needs a more helpful conceptual framework. While various alternative schemes of organization are possible,⁴⁵ we think that our modified chronological arrangement of the documents according to the types of institutions for which they were written works well for making Byzantine monasticism understandable over some 750 years of medieval history.

Necessarily in a work of this size, complexity and novelty, there will be many shortcomings for which the editors must beg indulgence. The emphasis has been on making the documents, through the medium of the translations, notes, and commentaries, considerably more accessible for future work rather than attempting to do all of that work ourselves.

⁴⁵ Such as the "aristocratic" versus "non-aristocratic" distinction proposed by Galatariotou, "Ktetorika Typika," pp. 89, 109.

INTRODUCTION

E. Principles of This Translation

Presuming neither knowledge of medieval Greek nor access to the underlying editions, we have endeavored to translate the documents in the corpus as completely as possible. Titles of monastic officials and some technical terms have been translated into English equivalents where possible. Otherwise, they have been transliterated and their meaning explained in the Glossary. The editors were the final arbiters of how the translations read. We have struggled mightily to maintain consistency in the translations, though with fifteen contributors in America and Europe working independently on this project for over a decade, perfection was hardly within reach.

Readers will find that the style of these translations varies somewhat from one translator to another, as it does from one author to another in the original texts. We have tried to see to it that, whatever the individual variations from one document to another, the overall style of the corpus should be idiomatic contemporary American English.

F. General Observations on the Documents

1. Original Texts

One of the outstanding claims to interest that the corpus of 61 Byzantine monastic foundation documents makes is the relatively large number of them that exist as original texts. The oldest document in this category is (1) Apa Abraham of the seventh century, preserved on papyrus in the British Museum. Two of the documents were preserved as monumental inscriptions, (16) Mount Tmolos and (18) Nea Gephyra, the former recently discovered, the latter now lost. Perhaps as many as 19 autograph or isotype manuscripts also survive to the present day. From the tenth century comes (12) Tzimiskes, the earliest of them. Isotype copies of (15) Constantine IX and (19) Attaleiates survive from the eleventh century. The Testament [B] and Codicil [C] of (24) Christodoulos are autographs of the late eleventh century as is the first version [A] of (25) Fragala. From the twelfth century come the autographs of the second [B] and third [C] versions of (25) Fragala, (26) Luke of Messina, (27) Kecharitomene, (33) Heliou Bomon, (41) Docheiariou, (43) Kasoulon, and possibly also (30) Phoberos. Sad to say, the immensely valuable twelfth-century autograph of (28) Pantokrator survived in a Peloponnesian monastery until 1934, when it was destroyed in a fire.

The originals of the two Cypriot typika, (34) Machairas and (45) Neophytos, both of the early thirteenth century, survive, the latter at Edinburgh University, the former in situ at its home institution on Cyprus. A manuscript in the British Library preserves the original copies of (39) Lips and (40) Anargyroi. The thirteenth-century manuscript of (35) Skoteine, surviving in the Vatopedi monastery on Mount Athos, may also be an autograph. Originals of the three versions of (51) Koutloumousi at the Kutlumus monastery on Mount Athos survive from the fourteenth century. Another fourteenth-century manuscript may preserve the original of (48) Prodromos. (57) Bebaia Elpis survives at Lincoln College, Oxford, in a deluxe fourteenth-century original edition. Finally, from the fifteenth century, (59) Manuel II survives in autograph at the Athonite Iveron monastery; the Inventory associated with (54) Neilos Damilas may also be a fifteenth-century original.

Counting the surviving inscription and the papyrus, perhaps as many as 20 of the documents can be traced to the author's or his scribe's hand, with (15) Constantine IX being derived from an authenticated copy made a half century after the original. Further palaeographic research may indicate that the corpus of Byzantine monastic foundation documents contains some additional autographs. The nature of the documents partly explains the good rate of survival for autographs. As profoundly personal documents of the founders intended for the regulation of their own communities, they were among the most important possessions of the institutions for which they were written. The documents themselves provide some evidence of the precautions taken in Byzantine times to assure their survival.⁴⁶ On the other hand, since these documents were highly idiosyncratic and particular in their application, most would have been of slight interest to scribes in other institutions.⁴⁷ Therefore, survival of the texts in any form was ordinarily dependent on institutional continuity into relatively modern times, as even a cursory examination of the history of the institutions represented by these documents will show.

INTRODUCTION

2. Manuscripts

Aside from the autographs or isotypes described above, the remaining texts survive in medieval manuscripts or more modern transcriptions. Particulars could not be determined about some of these manuscripts, but (3) Theodore Studites, (5) Euthymios, (22) Evergetis, (42) Sabas, and the balance of (24) Christodoulos not represented by autographs are from the twelfth century. (32) Mamas dates from a manuscript of the late twelfth or thirteenth centuries. (23) Pakourianos dates from a thirteenth-century manuscript. Version [A] of (4) Stoudios derives from a manuscript of the thirteenth or fourteenth centuries. From the fourteenth century come eight documents: (7) Latros, (9) Galesios, (36) Blemmydes, (38) Kellibara I, (46) Akropolites, (52) Choumnos, (53) Meteora, and (55) Athanasios I; these include many of the texts preserved in hagiographic or quasi-hagiographic literature. The manuscript witnesses to (60) Charsianeites date from the fifteenth century; those of (54) Neilos Damilas from either that century or the sixteenth.

We are dependent on post-Byzantine copies for (11) Ath. Rule, (13) Ath. Typikon, and (14) Ath. Testament, (31) Areia, (47) Philanthropos, and (56) Kellibara II, which are all of the sixteenth century. The chief Slavonic manuscript of (2) Pantelleria is from either the sixteenth or the seventeenth century. Later still are the manuscripts underlying the texts of (8) John Xenos, what is now the oldest witness to (28) Pantokrator, (37) Auxentios and (58) Menoikeion, that are all from the eighteenth century. Fourmont's transcription of the (8) Nea Gephyra inscription was made in 1730. We are dependent on modern copies of the nineteenth century of lost medieval manuscripts for (6) Rila, (10) Eleousa, (29) Kosmosoteira, (44) Karyes, (49) Geromeri, and (61) Eleousa Inv. The manuscript of (50) Gerasimos, of uncertain date, may be a forgery.

3. Editions

Some older editions have held up well against the test of time, such as (39) Lips, (40) Anargyroi and (57) Bebaia Elpis (Delehaye, 1921). There are, however, some old editions, such as (3) Theodore ⁴⁶ See (14) Ath. Testament [1], (19) Attaleiates [40], (23) Pakourianos [33A], and (32) Mamas, Second Semeioma.

⁴⁷ The families of interrelated documents among the Studite and Evergetian monasteries form a major exception to this generalization (see below, Chapters Two, Five, and Six, for a discussion of the influence of the typika of these monasteries on later institutions).

INTRODUCTION

Studites (Sirmond, 1696) and the second testament of (25) Fragala (Spata, 1861), which deserve another look. The edition of the Taktikon of Nikon of the Black Mountain, including (20) Black Mountain and (21) Roidion (Benešević, 1917), was never completed. Like the Evergetis family of documents, the smaller group of Studite texts, including (3) Theodore Studites, both versions of (4) Stoudios (Mai, 1849 and Dmitrievsky, 1895), (11) Ath. Rule, and (13) Ath. Typikon (Meyer, 1894) are textually interrelated, and ought to be edited together as a group. Moreover, as Dmitrievsky himself was aware, the two edited versions of (4) Stoudios are far from being the only significant witnesses to the manuscript tradition of that document.

A great deal of progress has been made in editing or re-editing the texts since the beginning of our project. Thanks to Gautier, the texts of (28) Pantokrator (1974), (19) Attaleiates (1981), (22) Evergetis (1982), (23) Pakourianos (1984), and (27) Kecharitomene (1985) are now firmly established. The last two editions appeared while our translation effort was underway, and Robert Jordan, the translator to whom they were assigned, was able to benefit from Gautier's improvements to these texts. As noted above, many of the shorter texts have also been edited or re-edited within the last decade. Although the appearance of these editions caused the editors some headaches during the last decade, their availability has strengthened the textual base on which this translation project rests.

Some texts stand in need of new editions. The (35) Skoteine is perhaps in the worst shape, with both editions (Eustratiades, 1930 and Gedeon, 1939) unsatisfactory. Now that Gautier has provided us with a fine edition of (22) Evergetis (1982), the re-edition of the Evergetian family of texts, aside from his (27) Kecharitomene (1985), becomes both more pressing and possible. Eustratiades, the editor of (32) Mamas (1928), does not seem to have collated his manuscript with that of (33) Heliou Bomon (Dmitrievsky, 1895) even though the latter is in large part an exact copy of the former document, and is itself an autograph original composed only three or four years after its model. Unless somehow the lost fifteenth-century manuscript of (29) Kosmosoteira should turn up, the best we can hope for with it is an improvement of the text based on the many borrowings it makes from (22) Evergetis.⁴⁸

There is also the problem of those documents which are available only in rare or obscure publications. Among these are the editions of (10) Eleousa, (29) Kosmosoteira, and (48) Neilos Damilas, still available only in the editions of the Russian Archaeological Institute in Istanbul published around the turn of the century. The rare original editions of Papadopoulos-Kerameus' Analekta Hierosolymitikas Stachyologias, vol. 1 (St. Petersburg, 1891), for which we must turn for the only edition of (50) Gerasimos, and his Noctes Petropolitanae (St. Petersburg, 1913), in which is to be found the only edition of (30) Phoberos, have fortunately been reprinted (Brussels, 1963, and Leipzig, 1976). What may be the sole original copy in America of Benešević's edition of (20) Black Mountain and (21) Roidion is to be found in the Harvard College Library. The ⁴⁸ After this volume had gone to press, a new edition of the typikon of Kosmosoteira was published by G. K. Papazoglou based on a late sixteenth-century manuscript recently discovered in the library of the monastery of Saint Gerasimos on Cephalonia (Typikon Isaakiou Alexiou Komnenou tes mones Theotokou tes Kosmosoteiras [Komotene, 1994]). We wish to thank Dr. Nancy P. Ševčenko for bringing this edition to our attention and regret that it appeared too late for us to benefit from it.

INTRODUCTION

editors suspect that the assembly of the original editions made over ten years ago at Dumbarton Oaks, before assigning the translations, was the first ever successfully accomplished. Even we had difficulty locating some publications, like the relevant number of the Greek periodical Thesprotika, our source for the edition of (49) Geromeri. Therefore, there is a clear need to re-edit or at least reprint the editions of these texts to increase their general accessibility.

It was never the intent of the Byzantine monastic documents project to translate any additional documents with a claim to inclusion in the corpus which might still remain unedited in manuscript. The editors are aware of a few such texts which might someday find their way into the corpus, though without careful examination of the manuscripts, their claims to admission cannot now be considered.⁴⁹

4. Other Translations

The Byzantine monastic foundation documents have not been served well by translations into any language before this edition. Apart from Gautier's valiant effort, there has been no systematic attempt to translate the documents into any language. Yet as the editors and our translators can attest, any help from prior scholarship is welcome in an ambitious enterprise such as ours. Readers more familiar with languages other than English may appreciate the cross-references which follow.

In accordance with traditional editing practice, seven of the documents have Latin translations provided by their editors: (3) Theodore Studites (Sirmond, 1696), (4) Stoudios [B] (Mai, 1849), (7) Latros (Delehay, 1892), (25) Fragala (partial, Spata, 1861), (27) Kecharitomene (Montfaucon, 1688), and (26) Luke of Messina and (43) Kasoulon (both by Cozza-Luzi, 1905). Another seven have generally excellent French translations: (19) Attaleiates (1981), (22) Evergetis (1982), (23) Pakourianos (1984), (27) Kecharitomene (1985), and (28) Pantokrator (1974) (all by Gautier); also (18) Nea Gephyra (Philippidis-Braat, 1985), (43) Kasoulon (Jeanselme and Oeconomos, 1922), and two partial translations of (38) Kellibara I (Chapman, 1926, and Grégoire, 1960). Not coincidentally, these are the best known documents at the present time.

Reflecting an abiding interest in these documents stimulated by pre-revolutionary Russian scholars, there are Russian translations of (5) Euthymios (Kazhdan, 1959), (12) Tzimiskes (Uspensky 1877), (15) Constantine IX (Uspensky, 1877), two versions of (23) Pakourianos (Shanidze, 1971 and Arutyunova-Fidanyan, 1978), (42) Sabas (Dmitrievsky, 1890) and (59) Manuel II (Uspensky, 1892). There is also a partial Russian translation of (38) Kellibara I (Troitskii, 1885), to supplement the French translations mentioned above. Unfortunately, all except the most recent editions are very rare in American libraries.

A few of the shorter documents have been translated into Modern Greek: (47) Meteora (Lampros, 1905), and the Rule [A] of (24) Christodoulos (Georgousakes, 1913) and the Memo- randum [M] of (31) Areia (Papadopoulos, 1967). Of course these are unlikely to have much value to readers who cannot read the documents in medieval Greek. Otherwise, translations have been few and far between: (2) Pantelleria (Dujčev, 1971) into Italian; (3) Theodore Studites and (4) Stoudios (Goshev, 1940) and (6) Rila (Dujčev, 1947) into Bulgarian; (16) Mount Tmolos into German (Koder, 1988); (23) Pakourianos (Kauchtschischvili, 1963) into modern Georgian (in addition to the French and Russian translations). There is also a German paraphrase of part of (60) Charsianeites (Hunger, 1958). Though not modern translations, there is an Old Church Slavonic version of (4) Stoudios (unedited) and an old Serbian version of (44) Karyes (ed. Corović, 1928).

⁴⁹ A typikon of Patriarch Alexios Studites for the Monastery of The Divine Mother (1034): Avgustin Nikitin, "Das Studios-Kloster und die alte Rus," Ostkirchliche Studien 37 (1988), 107–47, with discussion and partial translation in David Petras, The Typicon of the Patriarch Alexis the Studite: Novgorod-St. Sophia 1136 (Cleveland, Ohio, 1991); a late eleventh-century rule for the Constantinopolitan monastery of Petra: Alice-Mary Talbot, "Petra Monastery," ODB, p. 1643; typikon of Patir, ca. 1130–50, for which see the discussion below in (26) Luke of Messina, Institutional History, D.

INTRODUCTION

Finally, these documents are hardly known at all in the few prior English translations, which are: (1) Apa Abraham (Goodwin, 1859); (5) Euthymios (Karlin-Hayter, 1955, reproduced here); (42) Sabas (Di Segni, 1995); and a very small part of (36) Blemmydes (Munitiz, 1986, also reproduced here). Unfortunately these are not the documents of the greatest historical importance in our collection. The first English translation of (55) Athanasios I, produced for this edition, will also be published separately. Bibliographic citations and further details on prior translations will be found in the introductory materials for the individual documents.

Allowing for overlapping coverage, this means that 23 of 61 documents have been available in complete and another five in partial translations prior to this edition. The rest have never before been translated into any language whatsoever. These include documents of exceptional importance such as (9) Galesios, (10) Eleousa, (13) Ath. Typikon, (29) Kosmosoteira, (32) Mamas, (37) Auxentios, (45) Neophytos and (60) Charsianeites, to name just a few, which are making their appearance now in our edition.

5. Commentaries

Given that the editions of the documents are so widely dispersed and often inadequate besides, it is no surprise that scholarship on them in many cases is not very far advanced. Of the individual texts, (23) Pakourianos has attracted the greatest attention, no doubt because of its peculiar interest for cross-cultural history. There are full commentaries in French (Lemerle, 1977), Russian (Arutyunova-Fidanyan, 1978), and Georgian (Kauchtschischvili, 1963). Some of the very brief documents, e.g., (5) Euthymios, (16) Mount Tmolos, and (18) Nea Gephyra, have been adequately discussed by their editors. But again, as is the case with translations, many important documents have been almost completely ignored by scholarship, such as (20) Black Mountain, (21) Roidion, (30) Phoberos, (33) Heliou Bomon, (34) Machairas, (37) Auxentios, (54) Neilos Damilas, (57) Bebaia Elpis, and (60) Charsianeites. That said, the editors have found that there is, nevertheless, a surprising amount of bibliography that can be assembled to shed light on many of the individual documents. Much of this is only incidental treatment in the course of work with other objectives, but given the overall state of scholarship on the documents, it must still be welcomed. Details will be found in the bibliographies for the individual documents.

Scholarship on the entire collection of these documents necessarily has had to await the definition of the corpus itself. As noted above, a consensus on the content of the corpus is even now not complete. Janin (1964) attempted the first overall evaluation in our own times, though he was ⁵⁰ Janin, “Commende et typica,” pp. 5–44.

INTRODUCTION

unaware of many of the texts in this present collection.⁵⁰ The contributions of Manaphes (1970) and Konidares (1984) have been acknowledged above, while Galatariotou's overview (1987) and that of Abraham-Andreas Thiermeyer (1992), which is based on it, are stimulating if necessarily tentative. Rosemary Morris (1982), Robert Volk (1983), Angeliki Laiou (1985), one of our translators Alice-Mary Talbot (1983), and our editor John Thomas (1985) have examined some of the documents together for particular purposes.⁵¹

6. Geographic and Chronological Distribution

As is the case with most other types of sources from the Byzantine era, it is likely that only a small proportion of the monastic foundation documents have survived. Geographically, the largest number (25) of survivors come from 22 institutions once located in what is now Turkey. Of these, there are 14 documents representing 12 institutions in the old capital city of Constantinople and its environs⁵² and 10 representing a like number of institutions located elsewhere in modern Turkey.⁵³ Greece is next best represented with 20 documents representing four individual monasteries on Mount Athos, the entire group of Athonite monasteries, two monasteries on the island of Crete, and eight elsewhere in Greece.⁵⁴ There are no other large geographic concentrations. Four documents come from Italy (including two from Sicily), two each from Bulgaria, (former Yugoslavian) Macedonia, Jerusalem and the West Bank, and Cyprus.⁵⁵ One document, (1) Apa Abraham, comes from Egypt.

Twenty-one documents are associated with religious institutions that are still functioning in some way, though not always as monasteries; of these, most are still in situ at the monasteries for which they can be said in some sense to have been written: Iveron, Docheiariou, and Kutlumus on ⁵¹ Rosemary Morris, "Legal Terminology in Monastic Documents of the Tenth and Eleventh Centuries," JÖB 32.2 (1982), 281–90; Robert Volk, Gesundheitswesen und Wohltätigkeit im Spiegel der byzantinischen Klostartypika (Munich, 1983); Angeliki Laiou, "Observations on the Life and Ideology of Byzantine Women," BF 9 (1985), 59–102; Alice-Mary Talbot, "A Comparison of the Monastic Experiences of Byzantine Men and Women," GRBS 30 (1985), 1–20; John Philip Thomas, "The Rise of the Independent and Self-Governing Monasteries as Reflected in the Monastic Typika," GOTR 30 (1985), 21–30; Abraham-Andreas Thiermeyer, "Das Typikon-Ktetorikon und sein literarhistorischer Kontext," OCF 58 (1992), 475–513.

⁵² (3) Theodore Studites, (4) Stoudios, (22) Evergetis, (27) Kecharitomene, (28) Pantokrator, (32) Mamas, (38) Kellibara I, (39) Lips, (40) Anargyroi, (46) Akropolites, (47) Philanthropos, (56) Kellibara II, (57) Bebaia Elpis, and (60) Charsianeites.

⁵³ (7) Latros, (9) Galesios, (16) Mount Tmolos, (19) Attaleiates, (20) Black Mountain, (21) Roidion, (30) Phoberos, (33) Heliou Bomon, (35) Skoteine, and (37) Auxentios.

⁵⁴ Mount Athos: (11) Ath. Rule, (12) Tzimiskes, (13) Ath. Typikon, (14) Ath. Testament, (15) Constantine IX, (41) Docheiariou, (44) Karyes, (48) Prodromos, (51) Koutloumousi, and (59) Manuel II; Crete: (8) John Xenos and (54) Neilos Damilas; elsewhere in Greece: (17) Nikon Metanoieite, (18) Nea Gephyra, (24) Christodoulos, (29) Kosmosoteira, (49) Geromeri, (52) Choumnos, (53) Meteora, and (58) Menoikeion.

⁵⁵ Italy: (2) Pantelleria, (25) Fragala, (26) Luke of Messina, and (43) Kasoulon; Bulgaria: (6) Rila and (23) Pakourianos; (former Yugoslavian) Macedonia: (10) Eleousa and (61) Eleousa Inv.; Jerusalem and the West Bank: (42) Sabas and (50) Gerasimos; Cyprus: (34) Machairas and (45) Neophytos.

⁵⁶ (6) Rila, (10) Eleousa, (11) Ath. Rule, (12) Tzimiskes, (13) Ath. Typikon, (14) Ath. Testament, (15) Constantine IX, (23) Pakourianos, (24) Christodoulos, (29) Kosmosoteira, (31) Areia, (34) Machairas, (41)

INTRODUCTION

Mount Athos; Meteora, Patmos, and Geromeri in Greece; and Machairas on Cyprus.⁵⁶ Others remained on site until relatively modern times, like (45) Neophytos, which remained in situ at its original monastery on Cyprus until the mid-seventeenth century, when its hard pressed monks sold their manuscripts to agents of the French crown.⁵⁷ Therefore it appears highly likely that the representativeness of the corpus for Byzantine monasticism as a whole is affected by the circumstances of their highly motivated preservation by the institutions for which they were composed. Necessarily, those parts of the Byzantine Empire which remained Christian through modern times are likely overrepresented in the surviving corpus of documents, most notably in the group from the Athonite monasteries. Portions of the empire now in Turkey, except for Constantinople, are likely underrepresented, though it must be admitted that there have been some remarkable survivals, e.g., (19) Attaleiates (isotype in the National Library, Athens) and (35) Skoteine (autograph, Vatopedi monastery, Mount Athos).

Inevitably, the long passage of time also distorts the sample chronologically somewhat. There are four documents from the fifteenth century; twelve from the fourteenth century; eight from the thirteenth century; thirteen from the twelfth century; eleven from the eleventh century; ten from the tenth century; two from the ninth century; and one each from the eighth and seventh centuries.⁵⁸ The impression of relative balance (except for the earliest centuries) is in fact deceptive, since most of the documents before the later eleventh century are very short, and many owe their preservation not as free-standing monastic foundation documents but as testaments encapsulated in hagiographic sources.⁵⁹

7. Utility for Monastic History

With careful exploitation, it is possible to utilize the documents in this collection to illustrate the outlines of the development of Byzantine monasticism from its origins to the end of the empire. The nine chapter introductions, prefaced by the discussion of early monastic rules, will attempt to Docheiariou, (42) Sabas, (48) Prodromos, (49) Geromeri, (51) Koutloumoussi, (53) Meteora, (58) Menoikeion, (59) Manuel II, and (61) Eleousa Inv.

⁵⁷ Cyril Mango and Ernest Hawkins, "The Hermitage of St. Neophytus and Its Wall Paintings," DOP 20 (1966), 128, 130.

⁵⁸ Fifteenth century: (54) Neilos Damilas, (59) Manuel II, (60) Charsianeites, and (61) Eleousa Inv.; fourteenth century: (46) Akropolites, (47) Philanthropos, (48) Prodromos, (49) Geromeri, (50) Gerasimos, (51) Koutloumoussi, (52) Choumnos, (53) Meteora, (55) Athanasios I, (56) Kellibara II, (57) Bebaia Elpis, and (58) Menoikeion; thirteenth century: (34) Machairas, (35) Skoteine, (36) Blemmydes, (37) Auxentios, (38) Kellibara I, (39) Lips, (40) Anargyroi, and (45) Neophytos; twelfth century: (25) Fragala [B], [C], (26) Luke of Messina, (27) Kecharitomene, (28) Pantokrator, (29) Kosmosoteira, (30) Phoberos, (31) Areia, (32) Mamas, (33) Heliou Bomon, (41) Docheiariou, (42) Sabas, (43) Kasoulon, and (44) Karyes; eleventh century: (8) John Xenos, (9) Galesios, (10) Eleousa, (18) Nea Gephyra, (19) Attaleiates, (20) Black Mountain, (21) Roidion, (22) Evergetis, (23) Pakourianos, (24) Christodoulos, and (25) Fragala [A]; tenth century: (5) Euthymios, (6) Rila, (7) Latros, (11) Ath. Rule, (12) Tzimiskes, (13) Ath. Typikon, (14) Ath. Testament, (15) Constantine IX, (16) Mount Tmolos, and (17) Nikon Metanoeite; ninth century: (3) Theodore Studites and (4) Stoudios; eighth century: (2) Pantelleria; seventh century: (1) Apa Abraham.

⁵⁹ (5) Euthymios, (6) Rila, (7) Latros (8) John Xenos, (9) Galesios, (17) Nikon Metanoeite.

INTRODUCTION

do this insofar as the current scope of scholarship allows. Given this intent, the geographical and chronological limitations on the Byzantine monastic foundation documents as discussed above will necessarily serve as caveats on our conclusions.

It should also be kept in mind that, ambitious as this current project has been, there are some other critically important bodies of source material that need to be well understood before a definitive history of Byzantine monasticism can be attempted. The hagiography project based at Dumbarton Oaks formerly under the direction of Alexander Kazhdan†, with the assistance of our translator Alice-Mary Talbot, promises to be one of these important sources. The on-going publication of the Actes de l'Athos, from which our own project has benefited, will continue to illuminate another important group of sources. Hagiography and the Athonite cartularies are especially important as correctives, in their own very different ways, for the normative bias of most of the Byzantine monastic foundation documents, aside from a few exceptional texts like (12) Tzimiskes, (15) Constantine IX, (21) Roidion, and (55) Athanasios I. Finally, John Thomas hopes to undertake a comprehensive study of the canon law tradition in the Byzantine world in order to illuminate the much-neglected viewpoint of the empire's public authorities on the essentially private world of Byzantine religious foundations.

Early Monastic Rules

The earliest of the documents in our collection, (1) Apa Abraham, dates from the first quarter of the seventh century, at which time Christian monasticism had already existed in the Eastern Mediterranean world for well over three hundred years. By the time the first surviving monastic typika, (2) Pantelleria and (4) Stoudios, made their appearance towards the end of the eighth and the beginning of the ninth centuries, respectively, approximately a half-millennium of monastic history had already taken place. Even if, as many contemporary experts suspect, a profound cultural and institutional break occurred between the end of late antiquity and the beginning of the medieval period during this interval,¹ our medieval Byzantine monastic foundation documents confirm that there was some continuity of monastic institutions and customs from the ancient world. The surviving monastic rules of late antiquity, considered together with our monastic foundation documents, enable us to form some estimation of the nature and extent of medieval Byzantium's inheritance from the monastic traditions of the ancient world.

A. The Ascetic Treatises of Basil of Caesarea

Basil, archbishop of Caesarea (370–379), was the author of the earliest surviving monastic rules composed in the Greek language. These are the so-called Longer Rules [LR] and Shorter Rules [SR].² As documents of late antiquity that are already readily available in English translations as well as in some other languages, these rules have not been retranslated for our collection of medieval Byzantine monastic foundation documents.³ Basil was also the author of some but by no means all of the other documents that circulated along with the rules as his Ascetic Treatises in many medieval Byzantine manuscripts.⁴

¹ See Alexander Kazhdan and Anthony Cutler, "Continuity and Discontinuity in Byzantine History," Byzantion 52 (1982), 429–78, and Warren Treadgold, "The Break in Byzantium and the Gap in Byzantine Studies," BF 15 (1990), 289–316 with references therein for a discussion of the problem.

² Regulae fusius tractatae, PG 31, cols. 889–1053 and Regulae brevius tractatae, cols. 1080–1306; valuable studies include: Emanuel Amand de Mendieta, "Le système cénobitique basilien comparé au système cénobitique pachômien," RHR 152 (1957), 31–80; Gustave Bardy, "Basile (Règle de saint)," DDC 2 (1937), cols. 218–24; Ferdinand Laun, "Die beiden Regeln des Basilius, ihre Echtheit und Entstehung," ZKG 44 (1925), 1–61; Adalbert de Vogüé, "The Greater Rules of Saint Basil—A Survey," Word and Spirit: A Monastic Review 1 (1979), 49–85.

³ English translations by W. K. L. Clarke, The Ascetic Works of Saint Basil (London, 1925), Longer Rules, pp. 145–228, Shorter Rules, pp. 229–351; Sister M. Monica Wagner, Saint Basil, Ascetical Works (New York, 1950), Longer Rules, pp. 223–337.

⁴ For a proposed list of the authentic ascetical works, see E. Amand de Mendieta, L'ascèse monastique de saint Basile. Essai historique (Paris, 1949), p. xxvi; Jean Gribomont, Histoire du texte des Ascétiques de saint Basile (Louvain, 1953), provides a description and classification of the manuscripts.

EARLY MONASTIC RULES

Unlike the later monastic typika, both of the Basilian rules are simply a series of responses to questions posed to Basil by his disciples. No certain evidence exists to fix a date for the Longer Rules, though they likely are from after Basil's return to Caesarea in 358 following his tour of monastic foundations throughout the eastern Roman Empire. They may have been intended to guide Basil's first monastic settlement near Annesi in Pontos in the 360s, but could also date from some time in the 370s during his episcopacy. Since the Shorter Rules reference the Longer Rules, they clearly were written somewhat later.

Although it seems to us that to label the entire Byzantine monastic tradition as "Basilian,"⁵ as is frequently done by non-specialist commentators, is mistaken, the Basilian tradition (including the Rules) certainly did serve as an enduring—if also inconsistent—influence on the later documents included in our collection. Therefore, without presuming to offer an authoritative summary of this tradition, it does not seem out of place to examine here briefly how Basilian monasticism related to its medieval Byzantine successors.

1. The Longer Rules

a. Regulation of Admissions and Departures

Significant differences with the later Byzantine monastic traditions appear in the Longer Rules' discussion of admissions to the Basilian monastery. Applicants were to be tested through hard labor [LR 10], an idea employed in those Byzantine monasteries in which manual labor remained an important part of daily life for at least some of the monks.⁶ Slaves [LR 11] could not be accepted, nor a married man [LR 12] without his spouse's consent. Medieval Byzantine founders, generally less respectful of public authority, were less scrupulous.⁷

In his day, Basil welcomed young orphans [LR 15], [LR 53] to the monastery, though they were to be housed, fed and educated apart from the adult monks. Many—but not all—medieval Byzantine founders, fearing the potential for sexual misconduct, came to disagree; the author of (36) Blemmydes [9] in the thirteenth century is a conspicuous exception.

Once accepted, monks could not leave the monastery [LR 14]—unless they had suffered injury, on pain of sacrilege. Medieval Byzantine attitudes varied.⁸ After attempting to enforce

⁵ For the traditional view, see Johannes Quasten, Patrology, vol. 3 (Westminster, Md., 1960), p. 213: "The Basilians are the one great order of the Orient," rightly rejected by Cyril Mango, Byzantium, The Empire of New Rome (New York, 1980), p. 110: "As has often been observed, there never existed in the Greek Church a 'Basilian Order' or, for that matter, any other monastic 'order' . . ."

⁶ For testing of novices through manual labor in Byzantine times, see (22) Evergetis [37], (29) Kosmosoteira [53], (30) Phoberos [51], (32) Mamas [22], (33) Heliou Bomon [22], and (34) Machairas [56].

⁷ In the fifteenth century, however, (54) Neilos Damilas [5] provides that women should not be admitted to the convent on Crete for which that document was written without the consent of their husbands.

⁸ For monastic stability in Byzantine times, often discussed in terms of the acceptability of an outside monk (a xenokourites) for tonsure, see (3) Theodore Studites [14], (4) Stoudios [24], (11) Ath. Rule [18], [34], (12) Tzimiskes [2], [4], [5], [8], (13) Ath. Typikon [22], (15) Constantine IX [7], (19) Attaleiates [30], (22) Evergetis [37], (23) Christodoulos [B12], (27) Kecharitomene [54], (30) Phoberos [52], (32) Mamas [22], [43], (33) Heliou Bomon [22], (34) Machairas [60], [148], (35) Skoteine [17], (37) Auxentios [3], and monastic stability in the tenth and early eleventh centuries, Byzantine founders of the reform era were more concerned that monks who wished to depart not be permitted to reclaim their entrance gifts; from the early thirteenth century some founders sought to enforce stability once again, but probably without a great deal of success.

EARLY MONASTIC RULES

b. Prohibition of Private Property

Like later monastic founders in the reform tradition, Basil was very much concerned with issues of property renunciation [LR 8] by postulants, and laid down specific rules [LR 9] for how this was to be distributed. However, some medieval Byzantine founders would not insist on a complete surrender of all personal property.⁹

c. Cenobitical Bias

Like most of the later monastic typika, the Longer Rules are forthrightly partial to cenobitical life and hostile to solitaries [LR 7], cf. [LR 24]. Coming from an era when the public authorities of the church (perhaps including Basil himself at this point) were still strong, it is not surprising that the multiplication of monasteries in one place is condemned [LR 35]. By medieval Byzantine times (indeed as early as the sixth century) the overwhelming reliance on private initiative for founding monasteries would have made any attempt to promote a diocesan centralization futile.¹⁰

d. The Superior's Style of Rule

The superior appears to have been a much less autocratic ruler than many of his early medieval Byzantine successors. "Aged and wise" monks were charged with admonishing [LR 27] an errant superior, a precaution revived periodically in later Byzantine times along with the provision that the superior should take counsel [LR 48] with them on important issues.¹¹ He should also meet

(39) Lips [20]; for bans on reclamation of entrance gifts, see (22) Evergetis [37], (27) Kecharitomene [7], (29) Kosmosoteira [55], (30) Phoberos [53A], (32) Mamas [5], (33) Heliou Bomon [5], and (34) Machairas [59]; for the revival of strictness, see (45) Neophytos [C5], [CB1] ff, cf. [4], (55) Athanasios I [7], and (59) Manuel II [8]. For a general discussion of the problem, see Emil Herman, "La 'stabilitas loci' nel monachismo bizantino," OCP 21 (1955), 115–42, and Donald M. Nicol, "Instabilitas Loci: The Wanderlust of Late Byzantine Monks," SCH 22 (1985), 193–202.

⁹ For the problem of whether to insist on a complete property renunciation or permit its partial retention, see (3) Theodore Studites [2], [7]; (9) Galesios [191]; (10) Eleousa [5]; (11) Ath. Rule [34]; (13) Ath. Typikon [30], [32]; (19) Attaleiates [33], [35]; (20) Black Mountain [84]; (21) Roidion [A3]; (22) Evergetis [22]; (23) Pakourianos [5]; (24) Christodoulos [A22]; (27) Kecharitomene [50]; (28) Pantokrator [32]; (29) Kosmosoteira [47]; (30) Phoberos [41]; (32) Mamas [26], [35]; (33) Heliou Bomon [34]; (34) Machairas [87]; (35) Skoteine [13]; (37) Auxentios [5]; (45) Neophytos [C10]; (52) Choumnos [B11], [B19]; (53) Meteora [8]; (55) Athanasios I [5]; (56) Kellibara II [9]; (57) Bebaia Elpis [46]; (58) Menoikeion [12]; (59) Manuel II [2], [12]; and (60) Charsianeites [B5].

¹⁰ See my Private Religious Foundations in the Byzantine Empire (Washington, D.C., 1987), pp. 46–47, 115–17, 123–33.

¹¹ For similar schemes of consultative governance in Byzantine times, see (3) Theodore Studites [22]; (13) Ath. Typikon [32]; (22) Evergetis [13], [14], [17], [19]; (23) Pakourianos [5], [19]; (29) Kosmosoteira [34], [41], [45], [78]; (30) Phoberos [35], [38]; (31) Areia [M9], [T10]; (38) Kellibara I [15]; (39) Lips [10], [27], [32], [38], [39]; (54) Neilos Damilas [18]; (55) Athanasios I [5]; (57) Bebaia Elpis [67]; (58) Menoikeion [22]; and (59) Manuel II [3], [6], [7].

periodically [LR 54] with the heads of other monastic communities on matters of common interest, advice that was rarely practical for medieval Byzantine monastic communities or desired by their jealous founders. Like the superiors of later Byzantine monasteries, the Basilian superior was told [LR 30] not to be proud of his rank, nor to rebuke [LR 50] his monks when angry.¹² The superior was further instructed [LR 31] to render personal service to the monks of his community, a precept evidently too radical even for reform-minded founders of medieval monasteries.

e. Daily Life of the Monks

The regulation of daily life bears a fair correspondence to many later Byzantine practices. Silence [LR 13] was recommended for novices; as in certain later medieval documents, other monks were to speak sparingly and laughter [LR 17] was proscribed.¹³ As in many but not all medieval Byzantine monasteries, confession was a superior's duty to offer [LR 25] and mandatory for monks [LR 26] who were told [LR 46] not to conceal sins from their superior.¹⁴

f. Importance of Manual Labor

In terms of the economic regime portrayed, there is a strong endorsement [LR 37] of manual labor. Monks were to pursue their appropriate trades [LR 38] as assigned by the superiors, with tools that were the common property [LR 41] of the community. Yet there were restrictions on commerce [LR 39], [LR 40], which was to have a strictly utilitarian focus. The advocacy of manual labor as a salutary discipline for all monks gradually died out in medieval Byzantine monasticism, to be replaced by an increasing emphasis on the performance of the monastic hours, psalmody, and other aspects of liturgical life.¹⁵ Ideology aside, however, some medieval monastic communi-

¹² For echoes of these injunctions in later Byzantine exhortations to the superior, see (10) Eleousa [12]; (22) Evergetis [17]; (27) Kecharitomene [12]; (29) Kosmosoteira [44]; (30) Phoberos [36]; (32) Mamas [42], [48]; (33) Heliou Bomon [41], [47]; (34) Machairas [144]; (58) Menoikeion [19]; and (60) Charsianeites [B9].

¹³ For restriction of conversation and proscription of laughter in later Byzantine documents, see (2) Pantelleria [7], [18]; (7) Latros [11]; (22) Evergetis [9], [21]; (27) Kecharitomene [41], [47]; (29) Kosmosoteira [21]; (30) Phoberos [21], [25], [39], [40]; (32) Mamas [17], [35]; (33) Heliou Bomon [17], [34]; (34) Machairas [63], [113]; (55) Athanasios I [4]; and (58) Menoikeion [8], [17].

¹⁴ For the requirement of confession to the superior and authorized alternatives in Byzantine times see (22) Evergetis [7], [15], (23) Pakourianos [13], (28) Pantokrator [20], (27) Kecharitomene [16], (29) Kosmosoteira [16], [17], (30) Phoberos [14], [35], (31) Areia [T2], (32) Mamas [29], [30], (33) Heliou Bomon [29], [30], (34) Machairas [50], [51], [53], [141], (39) Lips [11], (52) Choumnos [A17], (54) Neilos Damilas [9], (57) Bebaia Elpis [105], [109], [111], (58) Menoikeion [13], and (60) Charsianeites [B4].

¹⁵ For the practice of manual labor in Byzantine times, see (2) Pantelleria [14], [16]; (4) Stoudios [26], [33]; (6) Rila [17], (7) Latros [4]; (12) Tzimiskes [20]; (15) Constantine IX [4], [10]; (20) Black Mountain [78], [79], [80], [82], [83]; (22) Evergetis [4], [21], [33]; (23) Pakourianos [14]; (24) Christodoulos [A22], [A23]; (26) Luke of Messina [6]; (27) Kecharitomene [6], [25], [27], [75]; (29) Kosmosoteira [39]; (30) Phoberos [48]; (32) Mamas [19], [23], [35], [47]; (33) Heliou Bomon [19], [23], [46]; (34) Machairas [32], [33], [86], [113], [115], [120]; (35) Skoteine [23], [41]; (37) Mount Auxentios [6], [7]; (45) Neophytos [15], [18], [20], [C6], [C13]; (52) Choumnos [B8], [B17], [B18]; (54) Neilos Damilas [6], [7], [8], [10], [16]; (57) Bebaia Elpis [66], [95], [96], [97]; (58) Menoikeion [10], [12], [17]; and (60) Charsianeites [B20]. For the generally greater importance of liturgical functions, see (4) Stoudios; (10) Eleousa [6] ff.; (11) Ath. Rule; (19) Attaleiates [32]; (20) Black Mountain; (22) Evergetis [4], [7], [33]; (23) Pakourianos [6]; (24)

EARLY MONASTIC RULES

ties became even more entrepreneurial than Basil could have foreseen, despite similar anti-commercial regulation by the founders of their own era.¹⁶

g. Food, Clothing, and Medical Care

General guidelines on suitable food and on procedures for the refectory were influential in medieval times. Seating at meals was to be determined by the appropriate official [LR 21]. Monks were to taste all food put before them [LR 18]; simple, easily procured food was to be preferred [LR 19]; and no special food served for guests [20]. The superior was allowed a wide latitude in setting diets for individual monks that eventually becomes a part of medieval Byzantine monasticism as well. There was much subsequent elaboration on particulars of the monastic diet, however, for this was one of the favorite concerns of patrons in the eleventh and twelfth centuries.¹⁷ The regulation of clothing endorsed [LR 22] a single multi-purpose garment, especially one that was easy to obtain and maintain. Though more practical-minded in allowing additional garments, later Byzantine monasteries in the reform tradition endorsed the principles of ready access and easy maintenance.¹⁸ Basil guardedly endorsed [LR 55] the use of medical science, but also equated illness with punishment for sin. The authors of medieval Byzantine monastic documents did not share this belief, and were on the whole more sanguine about the value of medicine for their monks.¹⁹

h. External Relations

The extent to which monks should be allowed to maintain relations with their relatives was a Christodoulos [A15]; (28) Pantokrator [32]; (29) Kosmosoteira [3]; (31) Areia [M8], [T1]; (32) Mamas [21], (33) Heliou Bomon [21]; (34) Machairas [31], [35], [42] ff.; (35) Skoteine [14]; (39) Lips [4]; (44) Karyes [12]; (45) Neophytos [C3]; (46) Akropolites [7]; (48) Prodromos [9]; (52) Choumnos [A16], [B14]; (54) Neilos Damilas [10]; (55) Athanasios I [4]; (57) Bebaia Elpis [56]; and (58) Menoikeion [16].

¹⁶ For the views of medieval Byzantine founders on entrepreneurial activities, see (3) Theodore Studites [21]; (7) Latros [12]; (12) Tzimiskes [13], [15], [22], [24]; (13) Ath. Typikon [44], [53]; (15) Constantine IX [3], [4], [6], [9], [10], [12]; (24) Christodoulos [A22]; (26) Luke of Messina [8], [9]; (29) Kosmosoteira [66], [69], [86], [97]; (34) Machairas [110], [111]; (35) Skoteine [23]; (37) Auxentios [9]; (45) Neophytos [10], [C13]; (47) Philanthropos [2]; (53) Meteora [4]; (54) Neilos Damilas [7], [8]; (57) Bebaia Elpis [66]; (59) Manuel II [2]; and (60) Charsianeites [C8].

¹⁷ For a discussion of the monastic diet in Byzantine times, see Appendix B: The Regulation of Diet in the Byzantine Monastic Foundation Documents, along with the discussion in (43) Kasoulon Analysis, and the works cited in the General Bibliography, XXVII. Daily Life, B. Diet.

¹⁸ For monastic clothing in Byzantine times, see (3) Theodore Studites [12]; (4) Stoudios [38]; (9) Galesios [130], [187]; (10) Eleousa [9]; (11) Ath. Rule [35]; (22) Evergetis [25], [26]; (23) Pakourianos [9]; (27) Kecharitomene [52]; (28) Pantokrator [22]; (29) Kosmosoteira [52]; (30) Phoberos [44]; (31) Areia [T4]; (32) Mamas [28]; (33) Heliou Bomon [28]; (34) Machairas [102], [103]; (35) Skoteine [23]; (37) Auxentios [7]; (39) Lips [36]; (45) Neophytos [15], [C15]; (53) Meteora [8]; (56) Kellibara II [7], [8]; (57) Bebaia Elpis [68], [97] ff.; (58) Menoikeion [12]; (60) Charsianeites [B20]; and the works cited in the General Bibliography, XXVII. Daily Life, C. Dress.

¹⁹ For the care of sick monks in Byzantine times, see (10) Eleousa [13]; (22) Evergetis [26], [41]; (23) Pakourianos [28]; (27) Kecharitomene [56], [57]; (28) Pantokrator [10]; (29) Kosmosoteira [47], [53], [61]; (30) Phoberos [45], [55], [56]; (32) Mamas [33], [34]; (33) Heliou Bomon [33]; (34) Machairas [107], [108]; (39) Lips [33], [35]; (55) Athanasios I [4]; (56) Kellibara II [5]; (57) Bebaia Elpis [90], [91], [92]; and (60) Charsianeites [C3].

EARLY MONASTIC RULES

difficult question, and would remain so in later times.²⁰ The Longer Rules provide that a monk's (needy) pious relatives be cared for by the community as a whole [LR 32], but not even visits were to be permitted from those who were irreligious. Monks returning from a journey were to be interrogated on their return [LR 44], a practice revived by some monasteries in medieval Byzantium.²¹

Basil's foundation was a double monastery, paired with a nunnery [LR 33], an arrangement that was much rarer in medieval Byzantine times when founders generally insisted on a much stricter sexual segregation, though in the fifteenth century the author of (54) Neilos Damilas [8] would justify his own similar foundation by appealing to the Basilian precedent.

2. The Shorter Rules

The structure and content of the Shorter Rules differ considerably from those of the Longer Rules. The number of questions (313) is much greater than for the Longer Rules (55). Basil's replies are also very much briefer. Many have no regulatory content at all, but belong in the category of scriptural exegesis (e.g., [SR 282]). There is also a great deal of discussion of disciplinary and attitudinal problems, much of it repetitious. These Rules also lack any evident pattern of organization, leading one to suppose that they may have been compiled incrementally as questions arose and Basil replied to them. Nevertheless, there is some material (about one-third of the whole) which can be said to have a bearing on the regulation of monastic life as in the Longer Rules.

a. Regulation of Admissions

The regulation of admissions was another subject of common interest to both the Basilian and later Byzantine traditions.²² The Shorter Rules permit admissions for short stays [SR 97] that are usually not foreseen by the authors of the later Byzantine documents. Applicants enmeshed in worldly affairs were discouraged [SR 107]; the later Byzantine tradition agreed but in practice was more tolerant. Here, new admissions require the consent of the brotherhood [SR 112]; in the Byzantine tradition this was left to the discretion of the superior. Like later monastic reformers (if not the overall Byzantine tradition), the Shorter Rules are wary of accepting gifts from outside ²⁰ For monks' relations with their families in Byzantine times, see (3) Theodore Studites [3], [8], [9]; (12) Tzimiskes [14]; (13) Ath. Typikon [30], [32]; (22) Evergetis [14], [18], [22]; (23) Pakourianos [8]; (27) Kecharitomene [12], [17]; (30) Phoberos [37]; (31) Areia [T10]; (32) Mamas [44]; (33) Heliou Bomon [45]; (34) Machairas [136], [146]; (39) Lips [15]; (41) Docheiariou [5]; (45) Neophytos [C14]; (52) Choumnos [A4]; (54) Neilos Damilas [7]; (57) Bebaia Elpis [75], [76]; and (60) Charsianeites [B13], [B14], [C9].

²¹ For similar interrogations in Byzantine times, see (57) Bebaia Elpis and (59) Manuel II [5].

²² For qualifications for admission to monasteries in Byzantine times, see (3) Theodore Studites [18]; (4) Stoudios [24]; (7) Latros [9]; (11) Ath. Rule [18]; (12) Tzimiskes [4], [5], [16]; (13) Ath. Typikon [22], [34], [50]; (15) Constantine IX [1], [7]; (19) Attaleiates [30]; (22) Evergetis [37]; (23) Pakourianos [6], [7], [24], [25]; (24) Christodoulos [A26]; (25) Fragala [A8], [B8]; (26) Luke of Messina [5]; (27) Kecharitomene [4], [5], [30]; (28) Pantokrator [16]; (29) Kosmosoteira [3], [48], [49], [55]; (30) Phoberos [42], [51]; (32) Mamas [5], [22]; (33) Heliou Bomon [5], [22]; (34) Machairas [55], [56], [60]; (36) Blemmydes [9]; (37) Auxentios [12]; (38) Kellibara I [17]; (39) Lips [4], [17], [18], [20]; (42) Sabas [1]; (45) Neophytos [9], [C17]; (52) Choumnos [B17]; (54) Neilos Damilas [5]; (55) Athanasios I [7]; (57) Bebaia Elpis [22], [23], [146]; and (60) Charsianeites [B12], [C2].

EARLY MONASTIC RULES

ers.²³ The superior was to decide on gifts from postulants' relatives [SR 304] and others [SR 305]; the steward was responsible for providing any favor in return to benefactors [SR 308].

b. Prohibition of Private Property

The discussion of private property in the Shorter Rules foreshadows some major problems to come in this area later in Byzantine monasticism. These include the prohibition of private property in the brotherhood [SR 85], cf. [SR 92]—not excluding “personal effects” [SR 86]—and a discussion of whether admission to the community requires the payment of a gift [SR 89]. The Basilian tradition on these issues, ignored for a time in early medieval Byzantium, would be influential again during the late eleventh century with the advent of the monastic reform movement.²⁴

c. Food, Clothing, and Medical Care

The Shorter Rules also show that problems of diet were particularly troublesome, e.g., how to deal with demands of special diets [SR 71], self-imposed abstinences [SR 137] and private fasts [SR 138], claims that certain foods were harmful [SR 132], etc. These are either absent or not so prominent in the medieval Byzantine monastic foundation documents.²⁵ Yet the provisions for readings at mealtimes [SR 180] and for the punishment of monks late or absent for meals [SR 136] anticipate typical Byzantine monastic practices.²⁶

The Shorter Rules moderate the harsh (and no doubt untenable) position of the Longer Rules [LR 22] against more than one set of clothing and announce the principle that clothing should be appropriate to task and season [SR 210], cf. [SR 90], thereby bringing the Basilian tradition closer to the common-sense conventions of medieval Byzantine monasticism. Some harsh attitudes on the subject persist in the Shorter Rules, however, such as the declarations that while monks should ²³ For the views of medieval Byzantine founders on the acceptability of outside gifts and general discussions of patronage, see (6) Rila [7], [8]; (13) Ath. Typikon [36]; (19) Attaleiates [30]; (22) Evergetis, Appendix; (23) Pakourianos [20]; (24) Christodoulos [A6], [A9]; (25) Fragala [B11], [C1], [C3]; (27) Kecharitomene [8], [71], [76]; (28) Pantokrator [8]; (29) Kosmosoteira [86]; (31) Areia [M10], [T6]; (32) Mamas [5], [27], [37], [40]; (33) Heliou Bomon [5], [27], [37]; (34) Machairas [7], [9], [15], [22], [23], [153]; (35) Skoteine [9], [10], [11]; (37) Auxentios [15]; (39) Lips [19]; (45) Neophytos [20], (46) Akropolites [8], (49) Geromeri [15], (50) Gerasimos [2]; (51) Koutloumoussi [A8], [B12]; (52) Choumnos [A18], [A20], [A26], [B7], [B22]; (57) Bebaia Elpis [143], [156], [157], [158], [159]; (58) Menoikeion [1], [2], [21]; and (60) Charsianeites [A6], [A7], [A8], [A9], [A11], [A12].

²⁴ See discussion below in Chapter Four.

²⁵ For subsequent treatment of self-imposed dietary austerities, see (11) Ath. Rule [28], (20) Black Mountain [72], (22) Evergetis [9], (23) Pakourianos [15], (29) Kosmosoteira [24], (30) Phoberos [19], [24], (34) Machairas [66], (35) Blemmydes [11], and (45) Neophytos [C4]; for complaints about food, see (22) Evergetis [41], (27) Kecharitomene [57], (30) Phoberos [56], (32) Mamas [34], (33) Heliou Bomon [33], (34) Machairas [108], (45) Neophytos [C12].

²⁶ For similar refectory procedures in Byzantine times, see (4) Stoudios [8], [28]; (11) Ath. Rule [21]; (20) Black Mountain [33]; (22) Evergetis [9]; (23) Pakourianos [8]; (27) Kecharitomene [40]; (28) Pantokrator [9]; (29) Kosmosoteira [21], [24]; (30) Phoberos [21], [26]; (31) Areia [T3]; (32) Mamas [17]; (33) Heliou Bomon [17]; (34) Machairas [62]; (37) Auxentios [10]; (39) Lips [29]; (56) Kellibara II [4]; (57) Bebaia Elpis [85]; (58) Menoikeion [8]; and (60) Charsianeites [C10].

EARLY MONASTIC RULES

endure poor quality or even ill-fitting garments or shoes [SR 168]; it is also a sin for a monk to insist on cheap clothes or shoes [SR 50].

Treatment of the sick [SR 155] moderates the rather hostile tone of the Long Rules [LR 55]. The instruction to take sick monks to a hospital for treatment [SR 286] anticipates the usual medieval Byzantine practice.

d. Importance of Manual Labor

Like the latter, the Shorter Rules place a major emphasis on manual labor that is not generally to be found in later medieval documents. The treatment of how to deal with those who would not work [SR 61], [SR 119], those who refused [SR 121] or could not endure [SR 69] especially heavy labors, and of care for [SR 143] and loss of [SR 144] tools shows a level of detailed regulation indicative of the importance of manual labor in a late antique foundation. Not surprisingly, this detailed regulation is absent in the later Byzantine monastic tradition, which generally placed a considerably lesser value on manual labor itself, and often restricted the performance of necessary duties to a separate—and less prestigious—class of monks.

e. Importance of Reading and Literacy

Although the Shorter Rules endorse the reading of scripture for all [SR 95], the superior was to determine who was to be taught the arts [SR 105] and letters [SR 96]. Like the Longer Rules, the Shorter Rules endorse [SR 292] the religious education of lay children. Overall, a commitment to literacy and a sense of educational mission would be less prominent in medieval Byzantine monasticism.²⁷

f. External Relations

The Shorter Rules' regulation of the external relations of the monks demonstrates that the community was an integral part of the public world of late antiquity, with concerns like paying for the tax arrears of monks [SR 94]; the sharing of goods [SR 181], provision of mutual assistance [SR 284] and conduct of commercial transactions [SR 285] with neighboring monasteries; and a hostility to liturgies [SR 310] held in private dwellings. This was very different environment from the more insular, private world in which later Byzantine monasteries would find themselves.

Similarly, the close relations portrayed here with the neighboring nunnery [SR 108], [SR 109] would not find many parallels in later Byzantine monasticism. However, certain precautions (e.g., having a witness present) taken in this connection would be adopted in regulating other necessary contacts between the sexes in medieval times.²⁸

²⁷ For the educational functions of monasteries in Byzantine times and the rationale for not providing such services, see (10) Eleousa [17]; (23) Pakourianos [31]; (28) Pantokrator [55]; (36) Blemmydes [9]; (53) Meteora [6]; (54) Neilos Damilas [5]; (57) Bebaia Elpis [148]; and (58) Menoikeion [14].

²⁸ For medieval Byzantine precautions in connection with relations between the sexes, see (3) Theodore Studites [9], [15], [16], [17]; (9) Galesios [129]; (13) Ath. Typikon [34]; (22) Evergetis [38], [39]; (23) Pakourianos [23]; (24) Christodoulos [A10], [A13]; (27) Kecharitomene [17], [80]; (28) Pantokrator [18]; (29) Kosmosoteira [56], [84]; (30) Phoberos [55]; (31) Areia [M6]; (32) Mamas [27]; (33) Heliou Bomon [27]; (34) Machairas [115], [118], [119]; (37) Auxentios [12], [13]; (57) Lips [16], [26]; (42) Sabas [1]; (45) Neophytos [19]; (53) Meteora [7]; (54) Neilos Damilas [7]; (57) Bebaia Elpis [76]; (58) Menoikeion [14]; (59) Manuel II [13]; and (60) Charsianeites [C2].

EARLY MONASTIC RULES

g. Policies on Visits

Despite a critical tone, the Shorter Rules adopt what is in effect a relatively liberal regulation of visits and travel. As in the medieval Byzantine tradition, monks were not to travel without the superior's permission [SR 120], visits by friends and relatives were discouraged [SR 188] (but not forbidden), and only the steadfast were allowed home visitations [SR 189].²⁹ Reflecting a more open society than in medieval times, visits from the laity for prayer [SR 312] were encouraged, though these visitors were not to interrupt work [SR 313]. In the monasteries of medieval Byzantium, lay visitors (aside from patrons and their families) seem to have been less common.

h. Institutional Philanthropy

On some other matters, the Shorter Rules endorse charitable distributions [SR 100], to take place at the discretion of the steward [SR 302], but, significantly, not without limits [SR 101]. Still, charity had not yet become formulized and essentially ritualistic as it was in many monasteries in medieval times.³⁰ The reception of communion required a proper attitude [SR 172] and was not for the "unclean" [SR 309], anticipating the ever more cautious attitudes of the founders of Byzantine reform monasteries on the subject of frequent reception of the Eucharist.³¹ Confession was also recommended [SR 229], but only to priests [SR 288]; founders of Byzantine reform monasteries would attempt to restrict this further to an obligation to confess only to one's superior.

3. Other Testimonies to the Basilian Tradition

There are other ascetic works attributed to Basil but several may actually be the work of later authors writing for foundations loosely modeled on his. These documents provide further testimony on the Basilian monastic tradition. They include the Introduction to the Ascetic Life,³² which affirms the place of women within the monastic movement; the Discourse on Ascetic Dis-

²⁹ For travel and visitation policies for monks in Byzantine times, see (3) Theodore Studites [10]; (7) Latros [6], [12]; (9) Galesios [150]; (12) Tzimiskes [8]; (13) Ath. Typikon [33], [35]; (21) Roidion [B5]; (23) Pakourianos [8], [15]; (25) Fragala [B10]; (27) Kecharitomene [17], [29], [80]; (28) Pantokrator [13], [21]; (32) Mamas [12]; (33) Heliou Bomon [12]; (34) Machairas [118], [136]; (39) Lips [15], [16]; (42) Sabas [8], (44) Karyes [12]; (45) Neophytos [10], [C5], [C17]; (52) Choumnos [A21]; (55) Athanasios I [6]; (57) Bebaia Elpis [55], [72], [75], [76]; (59) Manuel II [5]; and (60) Charsianeites [B19], [C4], [C9], [C10].

³⁰ For charitable distributions to the poor in Byzantine monasteries, see (3) Theodore Studites [21]; (9) Galesios [192]; (13) Ath. Typikon [49]; (19) Attaleiates [2], [20]; (21) Roidion [B7], [B13], [B15]; (22) Evergetis [38]; (23) Pakourianos [10], [21], [26], [29]; (24) Christodoulos [A25]; (27) Kecharitomene [59], [61], [63], [64]; (28) Pantokrator [8], [11], [45]; (29) Kosmosoteira [6], [9], [10], [56]; (30) Phoberos [24], [54]; (32) Mamas [13], [39]; (33) Heliou Bomon [13]; (34) Machairas [29], [118]; (37) Auxentios [7], [9], [13], [14]; (45) Neophytos [C18]; (57) Bebaia Elpis [115], [149], [150]; (58) Menoikeion [7], [22]; and (60) Charsianeites [A9], [C14], [C15].

³¹ For discussions of the appropriate frequency of reception of the Eucharist in Byzantine times, see (22) Evergetis [5], (27) Kecharitomene [33], (30) Phoberos [11], (32) Mamas [32], (33) Heliou Bomon [32], (34) Machairas [37], and (58) Menoikeion [16].

³² Praevia instituto ascetica, PG 31, cols. 619–26, trans. Clarke, Works, pp. 55–59, and Wagner, Saint Basil, pp. 9–13.

EARLY MONASTIC RULES

cipline,³³ a succinct code of conduct for the pious monk also known in a Latin version of the fifth century; and two Ascetic Discourses,³⁴ the first, notable for its moderation, suggesting how a regulatory text like the later monastic typika could have developed out of a work of this genre, and another, quoted by some later Byzantine foundation documents for its analogy of the superior to an artist's model and its identification of inequality as the root cause of envy and hatred.³⁵

More influential than these texts was the Discourse on Renunciation of the World,³⁶ frequently quoted or endorsed by the typika of later reform monasteries for its condemnation of secret eating, its instruction to avoid quarrels over seating at meals, and its scriptural quotation that "the kingdom of heaven has suffered violence, and men of violence take it by force" (Matt. 11:12). The warning against homoerotic associations, not a concern of the Rules, suggests that this text is post-Basilian.

The Ascetic Constitutions, which is certainly not a genuine work of Basil of Caesarea, nevertheless was thought to be one by several of the authors of later Byzantine typika.³⁷ Another work from the Ascetic Treatises that was popular despite its illegitimate claim to genuine Basilian authorship was the Penitential, which was brought back into use by Theodore the Studite in the early ninth century and is quoted in two thirteenth-century typika.³⁸

The concerns and disciplinary provisions of these subsidiary works in the Ascetic Treatises are frequently quite different from those of the undoubted Basilian rules, raising some concern as to whether they can be used to establish a tradition dating back to the life of Basil himself. Perhaps these works are best seen as representatives of unidentified intermediary traditions between the Basilian Rules and the later monastic foundation documents included here in this collection that further study may elucidate.

³³ Sermo de ascetica disciplina, PG 31, cols. 647–52, trans. Clarke, Works, pp. 73–75, and Wagner, Saint Basil, pp. 33–36.

³⁴ Sermones ascetici I et II, PG 31, cols. 869–82 and 881–88, esp. 884B and 885A, trans. Clarke, Works, pp. 133–39, 141–44, and Wagner, Saint Basil, pp. 207–15, 217–22.

³⁵ For comparison of the superior to an artist's model, see (9) Galesios [180] and (57) Bebaia Elpis [30], cf. (30) Phoberos [3] and (29) Kosmosoteira [9]; for inequality as the source of envy and hatred, see (9) Galesios [187], (56) Kellibara II [3], and (57) Bebaia Elpis [83]; for a contrary view, see (37) Auxentios [4] and (52) Choumnos [B20].

³⁶ Sermo de renunciatione saeculi, PG 31, cols. 625–48, trans. Clarke, Works, pp. 60–71, and Wagner, Saint Basil, pp. 15–31. For possible use of this work in later Byzantine documents, see (7) Latros [10]; (22) Evergetis [9], [42]; (27) Kecharitomene [42], [45], [49], [78]; (29) Kosmosoteira [22], [23], [57]; (30) Phoberos [22], [23], [59]; (32) Mamas [20], [36], [46]; (33) Heliou Bomon [20], [36], [45]; (34) Machairas [20], [64], [166]; and (58) Menoikeion [20].

³⁷ Constitutiones asceticae, PG 31, cols. 1321–1428; no English translation; cited by (20) Black Mountain [42R], [75]; (22) Evergetis [17]; (24) Christodoulos [A15], [A26]; (27) Kecharitomene [12]; (29) Kosmosoteira [44]; (30) Phoberos [36] and [53B], a quotation in extenso; (32) Mamas [42]; (33) Heliou Bomon [41]; (34) Machairas [144]; (39) Lips [30]; (58) Menoikeion [19]. Many of these are indirect citations, however, through the medium of (22) Evergetis [17]. This list is most likely not exhaustive.

³⁸ Poenae in monachos delinquentes, PG 31, cols. 1305–20; no English translation; endorsed by (3) Theodore Studites and quoted (generally very loosely) by (34) Machairas [122] ff. and by (45) Neophytos [CB1] through [CB12].

4. Utilization by Later Authors of Monastic Typika

A close study not only of the acknowledged citations but also of the unacknowledged borrowings of the authors in our collection from the Basilian Ascetic Treatises will some day reveal the true extent to which medieval Byzantine monasticism was “Basilian” in its inspiration. Certainly Basil was a popular saint in many Byzantine monasteries. In our collection of documents alone, there are provisions for the observance of his feast day in the late eleventh century in (20) Black Mountain [22] and in (28) Pantokrator [7] and (31) Areia [B13] in the twelfth century. Also in the twelfth century, Appendix B of (27) Kecharitomene records the presence of an icon of the saint in that foundation’s collection of consecrated objects. In the early ninth century, (3) Theodore Studites [13] orders that Basil’s “laws and canons,” presumably including the pseudo-Basilian Penitential, were to be considered as authoritative. In the tenth century, Athanasios the Athonite, in (11) Ath. Rule [19], [34], is anxious to attribute a Basilian origin ([SR 44] and [SR 85]) to several regulations that likely came to him more directly from Studite rules. In the mid-eleventh century, an imperial injunction to monastic stability found in (15) Constantine IX [7] is justified by appeal to Basil too.

Various works of Basil were to be found in the monastic libraries of the foundations for which (19) Attaleiates [INV 7] and (23) Pakourianos [33] were written in the late eleventh century, (35) Skoteine [24], [42] in the thirteenth century, and the Inventory associated with (54) Neilos Damilas in the fifteenth century.

Only a few of our authors may have been able to use the Ascetic Treatises directly. One of them, the eleventh-century author of (19) Attaleiates, had the work in his library, but, judging from his typikon, made little use of it. His contemporary, Nikon, the author of (20) Black Mountain, shows such a wide acquaintance with the Ascetic Treatises that he may be reasonably presumed to have had a copy.³⁹ Another contemporary, the author of (24) Christodoulos, shows a direct acquaintance with both the Shorter Rules as well as the pseudo-Basilian Ascetic Constitutions.⁴⁰

The author (or authors) of (22) Evergetis, written for the great Constantinopolitan reform monastery of the late eleventh century, apparently had access to a fine library and used a small selection of patristic works, including the Ascetic Treatises, in the typikon.⁴¹ The authors of the subsequent typika in the Evergetian tradition generally use the Ascetic Treatises indirectly, through the medium of (22) Evergetis or some other Evergetian text,⁴² though there are some indications

³⁹ See the citations from the Asketika in (20) Black Mountain [9], [20], [22], [29], [37], [42R] (twice), [44], [45], [69], [70], [72], [74], [75], [78], and in (21) Roidion [B10], [B15].

⁴⁰ See (24) Christodoulos [A17], [A15] and [A26]; cf. language similar to Constitutiones asceticae in [A4], [A17], and [A18].

⁴¹ See (22) Evergetis [4], attributed to Basil but unidentifiable; [7], a quotation from Basil’s [LR 26]; and [17], a quotation from the pseudo-Basilian Constitutiones asceticae 28.

⁴² See (27) Kecharitomene [12], (29) Kosmosoteira [44], (30) Phoberos [36], (32) Mamas [42], (33) Heliou Bomon [41], and (58) Menoikeion [19], all citing Constitutiones asceticae 28 through the filter of (22) Evergetis [17]; also (29) Kosmosoteira [17], (30) Phoberos [14], (52) Machairas [52], all citing Basil, [LR 26] through (22) Evergetis [7], and again (29) Kosmosoteira [13], (30) Phoberos [9], (34) Machairas [31] citing an unidentified Basilian source through the intermediary of (22) Evergetis [4].

of independent access as well.⁴³ The late eleventh and early twelfth century seem to have been a high point of Basil's prestige, coinciding with the strongly pro-cenobitic monastic reform movement, since the author of (26) Luke of Messina [6] speaks of having collected Basil's works and Gregory, author of (25) Fragala [B4], claims to have given the saint's laws to his monks.

Actual quotations in extenso from the Ascetic Treatises are relatively rare. Those that do occur are invariably taken from works we now recognize as not being genuinely Basilian. In (30) Phoberos [53B] there is a very lengthy verbatim citation from Ascetic Constitutions [21] that disturbs the numeration of the typikon's chapters. In the early thirteenth century, the authors of two Cypriot typika, (34) Machairas [121] ff., and (45) Neophytos [CB1] ff. cite very loosely from what may have been contaminated texts of the pseudo-Basilian Penitential.

There are few explicit Basilian citations of any kind from the last centuries of Byzantine history (13th–15th c.) during the Palaiologan dynasty, though there is unacknowledged use of a fairly broad group of tracts in the Ascetic Treatises in documents like Theodora Synadene's (57) Bebaia Elpis, written for a fourteenth-century Constantinopolitan convent.⁴⁴ The impression of a broadening acquaintance with Basilian ascetic literature independent of citation is confirmed by Patriarch Matthew I in (60) Charsianeites [C10] in which he provides for regular readings from the Ascetic Treatises to his monks.

5. Legacy of the Basilian Tradition

The customs of the Basilian Ascetic Treatises and those found in subsequent medieval Byzantine monastic foundation documents (especially those in the Evergetian reform tradition) were similar in many ways, especially in the regulation of daily life. Yet the Basilian Rules were very different from what followed in such features as the acceptance of a nearby community of nuns, the maintenance of close relations with other monasteries and a companion nunnery, the heavy emphasis on manual labor, and the willingness to take in orphans of both sexes. Perhaps the most significant differences stem from the very different public world of late antiquity and the more private world of the middle ages. The foundation regulated in the Basilian Rules needed to take cognizance of and establish proper relations with groups and institutions external to it, both secular and ecclesiastical. The Basilian monastery then was necessarily less isolated from the external world of its day than its distant successors would become in medieval times.

B. The Pachomian Tradition

The Pachomian tradition embodies the oldest form of cenobitic monasticism in Christianity as developed by the fourth-century Egyptian monk Pachomios († 346).⁴⁵ It is represented in the first ⁴³ See (27) Kecharitomene [51], from [LR 18]; (30) Phoberos [24], [25], [53B].

⁴⁴ Late citations include (54) Neilos Damilas [8], [10]; (57) Bebaia Elpis [96], but see also unacknowledged use in [30], [79], [126]; and (58) Menoikeion [19].

⁴⁵ For Pachomios, see Heinrich Bacht, Das Vermächtnis des Ursprungs: Studien zum frühen Mönchtum, vol. 2: Pachomios—Der Mann und sein Werk (Würzburg, 1983); James Goehring, "New Frontiers in Pachomian Studies," in Roots of Egyptian Christianity, ed. Birger Pearson and James Goehring (Philadelphia, 1986), pp. 236–57, and "Pachomios' Vision of Heresy: The Development of a Pachomian Tradition," Le Muséon

instance by a small collection of rules, best known in a translation made indirectly by the church father Jerome into Latin in 404 from Coptic texts then in use at the Pachomian monastery of Metanoia near Alexandria in Egypt, to which he added his own Preface.⁴⁶ The translation was made more than a half century after the death of Pachomios himself. The Precepts, which are very similar in content to the typika of the medieval Byzantine monastic tradition, are the most important of the Pachomian documents. Jerome also translated the Precepts and Institutions and the Precepts and Penal Statutes, both primarily penitential texts, and the Precepts and Laws, which serve as a supplement to the Precepts. Long known only in Jerome's translation, extensive Coptic fragments of the documents are now available as a control.⁴⁷ The documents are readily available in modern English translation.⁴⁸

Although Jerome used a Greek translation of the Coptic originals for his Latin version, this has not survived. The Excerpts, a collection of quotations from the Rules, is preserved separately in Greek, and may indicate some continuing influence by the Pachomian tradition during the first few centuries of medieval Byzantium before most of the monastic typika were composed.⁴⁹ Unlike the Basilian Ascetic Treatises, which were known and used by some of the authors of the medieval foundation documents in our collection, it is unlikely that any of the authors of these documents—with the possible exception of the author of (2) Pantelleria—had access to the Pachomian Rules. On the other hand, certain fundamentals of cenobitic monasticism established by the Pachomians in Upper Egypt in the first half of the fourth century were the enduring legacy

95 (1982), 241–62; Philip Rousseau, Pachomius: The Making of a Community in Fourth-Century Egypt (Berkeley, 1985); Fidelis Ruppert, Das pachomianische Mönchtum und die Anfänge klösterlichen Gehorsams (Münsterschwarzach, 1971). For the relationship with the earlier anchoritic tradition, see Heinrich Bacht, "Antonius und Pachomius. Von der Anachorese zum Cönobitentum," in Basilius Steidle, Antonius Magnus Eremita (Rome, 1956), pp. 66–107.

⁴⁶ Amand Boon, Pachomiana Latina (Louvain, 1932). Praefatio Hieronymi, pp. 3–9, Praecepta, pp. 13–52, Praecepta et Instituta, pp. 53–62, Praecepta atque Iudicia, pp. 63–70, Praecepta ac Leges, pp. 71–74.

⁴⁷ Ed. L. Th. Lefort, Oeuvres de s. Pachôme et de ses disciples (Louvain, 1956) = CSCO, vol. 159, Scriptores Coptici, vol. 23, pp. 30–36. See also the editor's earlier studies, "La Règle de S. Pachôme (Etude d'approche)," Le Muséon 34 (1921), 61–70, and "La Règle de S. Pachôme (2^e étude d'approche)," Le Muséon 37 (1924), 1–28. Studies of particular interest include Heinrich Bacht, "Ein Wort zur Ehrenrettung der ältesten Mönchsregeln," ZKT 72 (1950), 350–59, and Peter Nagel, "Diktion der römischen Kommandosprache in den Praecepta des Pachomius," ZÄS 101 (1974), 114–20.

⁴⁸ Armand Veilleux, Pachomian Koinonia, vol. 2: Pachomian Chronicles and Rules (Kalamazoo, Mich., 1981). Translations of Jerome's Preface, pp. 141–44, Precepts, 145–67, Precepts and Institutes, 169–74, Precepts and Judgments, 175–79, and Precepts and Laws, 181–83. Bacht, Pachomios, has German translations of the Pachomian rules with extensive notes.

⁴⁹ Excerpta, ed. Amand Boon, Pachomiana Latina, pp. 169–82. Latin translation in PG 40, cols. 947–52. There is no English translation. For the subsequent history of Pachomian monasticism in Egypt, see Heinrich Bacht, "Pachome et ses disciples (IV^e siècle)," in Théologie de la vie monastique (Paris, 1961), pp. 39–71; Jean Gascou, "P. Fouad 87: Les monastères pachômiens et l'état byzantin," BIFAO 76 (1976), 157–84; James Goehring, Chalcedonian Power Politics and the Demise of Pachomian Monasticism (Claremont, Ca., 1989); Ewa Wipszycka, "Les terres de la congrégation pachômiennne dans une liste de paiements pour les apora," in Le monde grec. Hommages à Claire Préaux (Brussels, 1975), pp. 625–36.

EARLY MONASTIC RULES

of all later cenobitic traditions in the Eastern Mediterranean down to medieval times.⁵⁰

1. The Pachomian Rule

Of the constituent parts of the Pachomian Rule, the Precepts are the most comprehensive and offer the greatest number of parallels and contrasts to the later Byzantine monastic tradition. The extent to which the Precepts reflect the thought of Pachomios himself and the conditions of Egyptian monasticism in the mid-fourth century as opposed to the developed Pachomian monasticism of the end of the fourth century must be left to specialists to determine.⁵¹ The Precepts certainly form an incrementally developed text, with definite stages of composition like some later documents included in our collection (e.g., (22) Evergetis, (29) Kosmosoteira, and (30) Phoberos). Even though the Precepts form an early document, the similarity in structure to later Byzantine monastic typika is striking, except that there is little said about the liturgy and the monks' life of prayer. Also, this is in no way a personalized text (as many typika were) in which the author's imprint is readily evident.

a. Similarities with Medieval Byzantine Monasticism

Many of the conventions of Byzantine monasticism are already present in the Precepts. Officials rule in authoritarian fashion [47], [53], [55], [81], [84], [143], often in order to curb the assertion by monks that their personal relationships were more important than their communal obligations. The regulation of meals in the Precepts left a recognizable imprint (directly or indirectly) on medieval Byzantine monasticism with respect to such matters as proper deportment at mealtime [8], [29], [30], [31], [32], [90], the principle of equal portions of food for all [35], [41], and a prohibition on secret eating [78], [80], [114], though there is a provision for those abstaining from the common table to consume bread and water in their cells [79]. The Precepts stress punctuality, and those who were late for prayers and meals were to be punished [9], [32], though there was a concession for latecomers to night prayers [10]. Monks were not allowed to retain personal effects, which were subject to confiscation [81], [98]. Excuses for not participating in the common life of work, prayer, and eating were not to be tolerated [141], [142]. Hospitality [50], [51] was an important obligation incumbent on the community. Burial was also a common responsibility [127]. Certain auxiliary institutions of later monasteries such as the infirmary [42], [43], [93], [129] and the bakery [116], [117] are present already in the Precepts and taken for granted.

b. Differences with Medieval Byzantine Monasticism

The Pachomian tradition had some major differences with the monasteries portrayed later in the medieval Byzantine monastic foundation documents. First of all, the Pachomian foundation was large and structurally complex,⁵² unlike the mostly much smaller medieval foundations which followed. Manual labor was very important in the Pachomian tradition, and required a lot of special legislation (see [5], [58], [60], and [61] among many others). Like its Basilian counter-

⁵⁰ See Heinrich Bacht, "L'importance de l'idéal monastique de s. Pachôme pour l'histoire du monachisme chrétien," RAM 26 (1950), 308–26.

⁵¹ For a discussion of the problem, see Goehring, "New Frontiers," pp. 236–46.

⁵² See Praefatio Hieronymi [2].

EARLY MONASTIC RULES

parts, the Pachomian foundation was not an institution cut off from the outside world. Travel, while perhaps not encouraged, was seen as both necessary and inevitable. Characteristically for late antique monasticism then, the Pachomian tradition regulates travel and visitation for its monks [50], [51], [52], [53], [54], [55], [56], [57], [63], [64], [118], [142] leniently.

The Pachomians took self-reliance more seriously than in medieval times, so personal care and housekeeping [67], [68], [70], [97] required regulation too. Perhaps this self-sustaining ethic made the Pachomian tradition willing to accept postulants on easier terms [49] than would be the case later on in the Byzantine Middle Ages. In some respects Pachomian monks adopted a stricter lifestyle than many later medieval institutions, for there was no consumption of wine [45], [54]; and (apparently) no bathing [92], [93]. Also, odd and presumably uncomfortable chairs served as beds [86] for the monks.

Unlike many later medieval foundations, particularly those under the influence of the monastic reform movement,⁵³ those of the Pachomian tradition were not misogynist institutions; women were welcome as guests, even at night [52], cf. [143]. Yet there is a notable amount of discreet anti-homoerotic legislation [95], [97], [107], [109], [118] which seems to have been directly related to the presence of boys in the foundations (for which see the Precepts and Penal Statutes [7], [13]) as in Basilian foundations of the fourth century. By the early ninth century, “beardless youths” had been formally excluded from many Byzantine monasteries, though frequently they were still present in practice.⁵⁴ The tradition also routinely stressed the importance of catechetical instruction for all the monks [19], [20], [138] (cf. Precepts and Institutions [15]). Along with the regime of manual labor, perhaps the biggest difference between the Pachomian and later medieval traditions is the stress the former tradition put on literacy and reading [25], [100], [139], [140] (cf. Precepts and Laws [7]).⁵⁵ The Precepts flatly declare [139] “even if he does not want to he shall be compelled to (learn how to) read.”

⁵³ For the misogynist tendency of later Byzantine monasticism, see (3) Theodore Studites [9], [15], [16], [17]; (7) Latros [9]; (10) Eleousa [17]; (13) Ath. Typikon [34]; (22) Evergetis [38], [39]; (23) Pakourianos [23]; (24) Christodoulos [A10], [A13]; (28) Pantokrator [18]; (29) Kosmosoteira [56], [84], [86]; (30) Phoberos [55]; (32) Mamas [27]; (33) Heliou Bomon [27]; (34) Machairas [115], [118], [119]; (37) Auxentios [12], [13]; (42) Sabas [1]; (45) Neophytos [19]; (53) Meteora [7]; (58) Menoikeion [14]; (59) Manuel II [13]; and (60) Charsianeites [C2].

⁵⁴ For the subject of “beardless youths” in Byzantine monasteries, see (3) Theodore Studites [18]; (7) Latros [9]; (9) Galesios [196]; (10) Eleousa [17]; (12) Tzimiskes [16], [25]; (13) Ath. Typikon [34], [48]; (15) Constantine IX [1], [15]; (29) Kosmosoteira [3], [49]; (42) Sabas [1]; (58) Menoikeion [14]; (59) Manuel II [13], [14]; (60) Charsianeites [C2]; cf. (2) Pantelleria [5], [6], [7], [12], [20] and (45) Neophytos [C6], [C7], [C17], [CB6].

⁵⁵ For evidence of literacy in Byzantine monasteries, see (2) Pantelleria [9]; (3) Theodore Studites, Preface; Stoudios [A2], [A8–9], [AB12], [AB13], [B14], [B16], [AB26], [AB33], [AB36]; (6) Rila [16]; (9) Galesios [138], [182], [191], [246]; (10) Eleousa [13]; (11) Ath. Rule [1], [21], [37]; (13) Ath. Typikon [23]; (15) Constantine IX, Introduction; (17) Nikon Metanoieite, Foundation History; (19) Attaleiates [33], [40]; (20) Black Mountain [4], [17], [18], [21], [24], [33], [42], [56], [81], [89]; (22) Evergetis [4], [43]; (23) Christodoulos [A26], [B15]; (27) Kecharitomene [7], [15], [26], [32], [65]; (30) Phoberos [9], [15], [59]; (31) Areia [M4]; (28) Pantokrator [9], [24], [68]; (29) Kosmosoteira [13], [59], [106]; (32) Mamas [5], [10], [16], [32], [47]; (33) Heliou Bomon [5], [10], [16], [32], [46]; (34) Machairas [39], [60], [101], [167]; (35) Skoteine [12], (37) Auxentios [13]; (38) Kellibara I [17], cf. [3]; (39) Lips [8], [20], [28], [29]; (42) Sabas

2. Other Testimonies to the Pachomian Tradition

Jerome's Latin translations of documents from the Pachomian tradition also include the Book of Horsiesios, professedly the Testament of Horsiesios († ca. 380), Pachomios' second successor.⁵⁶ This document, of which there is no surviving Coptic or Greek text, demonstrates a very early stage in the evolution of the monastic testament as a regulatory text that would become one of the two principal formats of Byzantine monastic foundation documents in the medieval period. As such it deserves comparison with (1) Apa Abraham, the first document in our collection, which is more than two hundred years later in date, yet more primitive in construction and content.

Horsiesios' Testament marks a critical, defining turning point for the ideological development of the Byzantine monastic tradition. It condemns privatization of monastic property [22], denies monks the right to dispose of their personal effects [26], advocates equality as a principle of the monastic lifestyle [23], and is generally hostile to the outside world [39], [42]. These principles would eventually be taken up again by the Byzantine monastic reform movement in the eleventh century.⁵⁷ In his own day, Horsiesios had evidently come to realize the dangers close intercourse with the secular world posed for monastic communities. Specifically, Horsiesios astutely recognized the connection between the monks' maintenance of their personal possessions and ties to their lay relatives on the one hand and a corresponding threat to institutional well-being through privatization and secularization on the other. The peril was less well perceived in the early Pachomian tradition (see the Precepts) or in the early Basilian tradition (as exemplified by the Longer and Shorter Rules).

Just as the Book of Horsiesios anticipates the testamentary format of subsequent Byzantine monastic foundation documents, so the Regulations of Horsiesios look forward to the format of the monastic typikon.⁵⁸ If the Regulations are in fact correctly attributed to Horsiesios, then taken together with his Testament, they provide the first example of the coupling of a testament with a more formal regulatory document known from several examples in the Byzantine era.⁵⁹ The Regulations, preserved only in Coptic, provide a considerable amount of practical regulation on matters of everyday life, including cleanliness of kitchen vessels [25], kneading bread [47], irrigation

[2]; (43) Kasoulon [20]; (44) Karyes [8], [10]; (45) Neophytos [11], [13], [14], [22], [C18]; (51) Koutloumoussi [A10]; (52) Choumnos [A3]; (54) Neilos Damilas [2], [5], [13], [20], cf. [18]; (55) Athanasios I [8], [9]; (56) Kellibara II [1]; (57) Bebaia Elpis [62], [66], [85], [120]; (58) Menoikeion [8], [9]; and (60) Charsianeites [C] Preamble, [C10]. Also, the literacy of at least the choir monks in those Byzantine monasteries in which the performance of liturgical services was a prominent part of the activities in those institutions may be presupposed.

⁵⁶ Liber Orsiesii, ed. Amand Boon, Pachomiana Latina, pp. 109–47; English translation by Armand Veilleux, Pachomian Koinonia, vol. 3: Instructions, Letters, and Other Writings of Saint Pachomius and His Disciples (Kalamazoo, Mich., 1982), pp. 171–215, with notes 215–24; see also Heinrich Bacht, "Studien zum 'Liber Orsiesii,'" HJ 77 (1958), 98–124.

⁵⁷ For the monastic reform, see below, Chapter Four.

⁵⁸ Orsiesii Regula, Coptic text ed. L. Th. Lefort, Oeuvres, pp. 82–99; English translation by Armand Veilleux, Pachomian Chronicles, pp. 197–223.

⁵⁹ Compare to these later couplings: (3) Theodore Studites and (4) Stoudios; (13) Ath. Typikon and (11) Ath. Rule; (24) Christodoulos [A] and [B]; and (60) Charsianeites [A] and [C].

EARLY MONASTIC RULES

of fields [57] and care of livestock [59]. These concerns all followed naturally from the author's insistence on manual labor [18], and not surprisingly lack ready parallels in the Byzantine medieval tradition in which manual labor was less important.

Then there is the so-called Rule of the Angel,⁶⁰ preserved in Palladius' Lausiatic History. Specialists now seem convinced that it is not, as was once thought by some, a primitive rule anterior to the other documents in the Pachomian tradition.⁶¹ The treatment of diet [2], manual labor [12], and dress [3] seems vaguely Pachomian, but it is hard to recognize other features of the cenobitic life in this picture of a monastic community so large that it was obliged to perform prayers [6] and to eat meals [11] in rotating shifts. This was the one monastic rule in the Pachomian tradition preserved in a Greek edition that was potentially available to the later Byzantine tradition.

Finally, the hagiographic tradition preserves much valuable information about Pachomian monastic institutions although it needs to be interpreted very carefully to distinguish the customs of Pachomios' own times from those of his successors.⁶² There was a Greek textual tradition among the six versions of Pachomios' Life, so some details of the saint's life were considerably better known to later Byzantine authors than was his monastic legislation.

3. Utilization by Later Authors of Monastic Typika

Later Byzantine authors represented in our collection of documents made only erratic use of the Pachomian texts, often just the less authentic Rule of the Angel. They were surely limited by the unavailability of Greek texts for the Rule, except possibly for the Greek Excerpts mentioned above. Among our later Byzantine authors, only John, the author of (2) Pantelleria, provides some indication of his acquaintance with the Pachomian Rule, specifically the Precepts, though even he does not acknowledge this dependence.⁶³ In the late eleventh century, Nikon, author of (20) Black Mountain, cites the Rule of the Angel as well as the Greek Life of Pachomios; he also provides for the observance of the saint's feast.⁶⁴ In addition to Nikon, the Greek Life was known about the same time to the author of (24) Christodoulos [A18], who cites it for election of the superior by the brotherhood, and the author of (30) Phoberos [19]. Later, the Rule of the Angel was known to the author of (45) Neophytos [C9] in the early thirteenth century and to Patriarch Matthew I,

⁶⁰ Regula ab Angelo Allata, ed. Cuthbert Butler, The Lausiatic History of Palladius, vol. 2: The Lausiatic History, chap. 32, pp. 87–96; English translation by Veilleux, Pachomian Chronicles, pp. 125–29; there is also a free-standing exemplar of the text, ed. François Halkin, Le Corpus athénien de saint Pachôme (Geneva, 1982), pp. 95–97.

⁶¹ See summary of the scholarship in Veilleux, Pachomian Chronicles, pp. 50–56.

⁶² Ed. François Halkin, Sancti Pachomii vitae graecae (= Subsidia Hagiographica 19) (Brussels, 1932); see also Halkin, Corpus; English translation of the first Greek life by Apostolos Athanassakis, The Life of Pachomius (Vita Prima Graeca) (Missoula, Mont., 1975), and by Armand Veilleux, Pachomian Koinonia, vol. 1: The Life of Saint Pachomius and His Disciples (Kalamazoo, Mich., 1980), pp. 297–423. Veilleux also has translations of a Bohairic version and three Sahidic versions. For the Vita Prima Graeca, see Derwas Chitty, "Pachomian Sources Reconsidered," JEH 5 (1954), 38–77.

⁶³ For the Pachomian link, see Vera von Falkenhausen, "Patellaria," ODB, p. 1594.

⁶⁴ (20) Black Mountain [28], [29], [72], [78] (Rule of the Angel); [20], [29], [39], [42], [56], [78], [83] (Life); [89] (feast).

EARLY MONASTIC RULES

author of (60) Charsianeites [C1] in the early fifteenth century. In the mid-twelfth century, Athanasios Philanthropenos, author of (32) Mamas [24], and in the early thirteenth century, Neilos of Tamasia, author of (34) Machairas [133], both fail to recognize a provision from the Pachomian Rule; the latter mistakenly attributes it to Basil of Caesarea, into the manuscript of whose unauthentically attributed Penitential it had become incorporated.

4. Legacy of the Pachomian Tradition

The foundations for much of cenobitical monasticism as practiced in medieval Byzantium had already been fairly well established in the Pachomian tradition by the time of Jerome's Latin translations of many of its regulatory documents at the beginning of the fifth century, if not before. The Byzantine monasteries portrayed in the later foundation documents found in our collection unknowingly followed many Pachomian usages, particularly in matters of daily life, even though it is only very rarely possible to trace back a direct lineage to the Pachomian texts.

The major differences between the Pachomian and the later Byzantine monastic traditions are held in common by the Pachomians with the roughly contemporary Basilian tradition: 1. the greater scale and complexity of foundations; 2. the importance of manual labor; 3. the expectation of literacy; 4. the absence of overt misogyny; 5. the openness of the communities to boys; 6. a rather stricter personal regime (no use of wine or bathing); and 7. the relative accessibility to the outside world, with travel and visits accepted as normal phenomena of social intercourse. Despite a oft-stated yearning for a revival of early ascetic practices on the part of certain Byzantine monastic reformers starting in the late eleventh century, these features of genuine Pachomianism remained largely alien to the medieval monastic tradition.

The actual relationship of the ideology and practices popularized by the later Byzantine monastic reform to those of late antique asceticism is now fairly obscure. It need not remain so, however, since a great deal is known about what the reformers were reading in the way of ascetic literature from their acknowledged forebears.⁶⁵ The Pachomian Book of Horsiesios, while clearly a text that would have been ideologically attuned to the concerns of the reformers, could not itself have been on their reading list since it apparently did not circulate in a Greek version. However, eventually it will be possible, from the vantage point of future work on the subject,⁶⁶ to show just what works were most influential in development of the medieval reform program.

C. Monastic Rules of the Syrian Orient

Arthur Vööbus' recent, posthumously published study of the monastic rules of the Syrian Orient⁶⁷ has laid the foundations for the study of Syrian monasticism from an institutional viewpoint. The ⁶⁵ This was in essence the Evergetinon of Paul Evergetinos, as Paul Gautier, "Le typikon de la Théotokos Évergétis," REB 40 (1982), 7, n. 9 recognized, based on its coincidence with the corpus of ascetic literature recommended by the reformer John V, patriarch of Antioch in the latter's De monasteriis, ed. Paul Gautier, "Réquisitoire du Patriarche Jean d'Antioche contre le charisticariat," REB 33 (1975), 101–3.

⁶⁶ Especially that currently being undertaken by the Evergetis Project, based at Queens College, Belfast, which proposes to produce an annotated translation of the Evergetinon.

⁶⁷ History of Asceticism in the Syrian Orient: A Contribution to the History of Culture in the Near East, vol. 3 (Louvain, 1988) = CSCO, vol. 500, Subsidia, 50, Tomus 81.

EARLY MONASTIC RULES

documents for which his study provides English translations or summaries are outside the scope of our own collection of medieval Byzantine monastic rules, but since they provide the only link between the monastic traditions of late antiquity discussed above and our medieval rules, a brief discussion seems in order here.

1. Canons of Rabbula of Edessa

The Canons of Rabbula of Edessa (trans. Vööbus, History, pp. 71–74) were considered by their translator to be the oldest example of the genre in Syriac. Attributed to Rabbula, Bishop of Edessa, they reportedly date to the early years of the fifth century, about the same time as Jerome’s translation of the principal Pachomian rules. There are 26 canons in the main collection; Vööbus also translated four additional canons from what he called a “supplement” [S] attributed to the same author. Nearly the entire document is couched in terms of prohibitions, a convention typical of the canonical genre of monastic legislation. Vööbus noted (p. 70) the focus of the canons on problems of immediate concern, to the exclusion of more systemic treatments of ascetic practices, liturgical observances, and administrative matters. Despite this important difference with the more fully developed Byzantine monastic foundation documents, there are many areas of common concern, e.g., the regulation of commemorative feasts [8], the restrictions on the ownership of animals [9], obstacles placed in the way of monks wanting to adopt a solitary life [18], and the requirement that a monk have the permission of his superior before transferring to another monastery [26].

Vööbus believed (p. 70) that these canons anachronistically reflected early trends in Syrian monasticism. It seems more likely, however, that they are part of a later stage in the evolution of cenobiticism in which there was a greater awareness of the threats to institutional stability posed by the failure of earlier founders to restrict monks’ ties to the secular world. Many of the Canons testify unmistakably to this distrust of the secular world, such as various restrictions on entering local villages [2], on the ownership of animals [9], and on commercial transactions [11], as well as the prohibitions on visiting relatives [13] and on testifying in court [15]. The laity were discouraged from attending monks’ burials [24] or commemorative feasts [8], and for their part monks were told not to provide scriptural exegesis [19]. The admonition not to speculate in grain [25] fits in with the general hostility towards commercial activity [11] seen also in the Basilian Rules. The hostility of these canons to the use of medicine [14] also has a parallel in Basil’s Longer Rules.

Scruples against commercial activity might have led to a greater reliance on public charity [S15], mentioned here for the first time in the supplement, though manual labor [16], cf. [25] had not yet disappeared. The dependence on private charity was possible thanks to the existence of a network of monastic private churches [21], [22], [S15], [S29], another of this document’s novel features. The distinctly un-Pachomian banning of women [1], [S15] is another reflection of fears of external entanglements, as also, in a different way, the concern about heresy [10], [S49], yet the tradition of monastic hospitality [17] survives. The evident concern for maintaining a good public image (cf. [5], [6], and [19] ?) demonstrates an awareness that the late antique monastery for which these canons were written still had to relate to its surroundings. As in the Basilian and Pachomian traditions, personal property [12] and the use of wine [4] are not permitted. Literacy, vigorously promoted by the early traditions, is less prominently attested here [10], [19].

According to Vööbus (p. 76), an extensive manuscript tradition testifies to the enduring interest of this collection of canons. Later copyings produced small textual variations and reorderings in the interest of “greater accuracy and precision.” This phenomenon anticipates the adaptive use of some later Byzantine foundation documents, e.g., (4) Stoudios, (22) Evergetis, and (32) Mamas.

EARLY MONASTIC RULES

2. Canons of the Monastery of Mar Mattai

These canons (trans. Vööbus, pp. 173–75), composed for a West Syrian monastery and dated to 508/09, are another example of the genre of Syrian monastic canons that help fill in the gap between the earlier monastic traditions and the later Byzantine monastic foundation documents. Vööbus’ translation provides only summaries of the 24 canons. The monastery for which the canons were written was a private religious foundation in which the monks retained their personal property [10], [11], [12], [15], [23]. This was opposed to both the Pachomian and the Basilian tradition, and the practice of most (though not all) of the foundations represented by the later Byzantine foundation documents. The system of fines [4], [5], [6], [7] featured in these canons for punishing offenses was possible only because the monks retained their private resources after entrance. Resident monks apparently shared in the revenues of the monastery [15] even though there was some common property as in more conventional cenobitic institutions. The belongings of deceased monks were redistributed at death [10].

The Canons declare that the superior could not be removed from his office by a monk, layman or pasnasa (patron?) [21], and monks were explicitly warned against appealing to outsiders [6], [22] to settle internal disputes. These provisions imply that institutional governance was weak, with the superior possibly being obliged to share his authority with a non-resident patron. This combination of a weak superior and contentious monks with vested economic rights in their foundation would reoccur in Byzantine times (see (21) Roidion); it is a hallmark of the ambiguous governing structure under which many traditional private religious foundations operated.

3. Other Collections of Regulatory Canons

The sixth-century Canons of Johannan bar Qursos (trans. Vööbus, pp. 178–79) are really more a general letter of advice to sympathetic monasteries by this Monophysite bishop of Tella rather than a systematic attempt at legislation. The document is notable for its active encouragement of bringing lay children to the monastery [9], [10], [11] for their education. The Canons for the Nuns (trans. Vööbus, pp. 183–185), are a series of fourteen prohibitions regulating the life of an unnamed convent. Vööbus implied that this is a fifth-century text (an inference from the mention of stylites in [7]) of West Syrian provenance. This interesting document, possibly the earliest surviving regulation for female ascetics in the Eastern Mediterranean world, shares with subsequent Byzantine foundation documents for nunneries the overriding concern to maintain sexual segregation (though not claustration) for the sake of the moral probity of its inhabitants. The hostility of the canons to nuns receiving gifts from outsiders [3] (except for books!) and the restriction on conducting correspondence [9] with anyone except with close relatives would reappear in reform monasteries of the Byzantine era. Such suspicion of the outside world is also not out of character for an institution of the fifth century when the danger posed to a monastery by its inhabitants’ maintenance of close family ties had become fairly generally recognized.

EARLY MONASTIC RULES

The Canons for the Novices (trans. Vööbus, pp. 187–91) continue this unusual series of regulations for special audiences from the Syriac tradition. Preserved in a manuscript tradition going back to the ninth century, it is attributed later to a certain Johannan of Dalyata (Vööbus, pp. 186–87). Evidently intended for youthful postulants, the canons emphasize obedience to elders [2], [6], [7], etc., suppression of homoeroticism [9], [10], [12?], [26], [39], [46] and masturbation [11], and avoidance of female sexual temptations [35], [36], [37], [45]. There are obvious parallels to the Precepts of the Pachomian tradition as well as to the early Byzantine foundation documents (e.g., (2) Pantelleria) that reflect that tradition. The hostility towards maintaining family ties [38] marks this document as being no earlier than the fifth century, but the endorsement of consuming wine [5] (a staple of the Byzantine monastic diet) suggests strongly that it is actually later, perhaps from the sixth century.

The Canons for the Solitaries (trans. Vööbus, pp. 192–93), the third in this collection of canons for specialized audiences, is preserved only in a modern manuscript from an original of uncertain date and provenance. There are some other monastic rules in Vööbus' collection, e.g., the Alphabetical Admonitions Attributed to Aphrem (trans. Vööbus, pp. 79–81), the Rules from the Letter of Philoxenos of Mabbug (trans. Vööbus, p. 172), and the Rules for the Monastery of Mar Zakkai (trans. Vööbus, pp. 180–81), but these seem to have no obvious importance for the evolution of the medieval Byzantine monastic tradition.

4. General Observations

It is difficult to generalize about the Syrian monastic tradition from this diverse group of documents of which we have at present only a very rudimentary understanding. Characteristically, Syrian rules composed for men show a greater aversion to women than in the early Pachomian tradition. Like the later Pachomian documents (especially the Book of Horsiesios), Syrian monastic rules feared the consequences of allowing monks to retain close ties to their family members. Literacy, education and manual labor remained features of the Syriac tradition as they had been in Basilian and Pachomian monasticism, but seemingly less so than before. The Canons of Rabbula of Edessa show one monastery moving away from self-sufficiency and provide an early foreshadowing of the typical economic dependence of medieval Byzantine monasteries on outside support. Therefore, the Syriac tradition is an intermediary one both chronologically and in terms of its evolving institutions and concerns as these texts anticipate the medieval foundation documents presented in this collection.

CHAPTER ONE

Traditional Private Religious Foundations

“So, today we have been led by the fatherly commands to leave this rule in writing as an enduring monument for later generations; and as far as we can, we have submitted ourselves in obedience.” (4) Stoudios [1]

“I made up my mind . . . to leave you the present fatherly testament of mine, just as carnal fathers leave their children an earthly inheritance of silver and gold and other property . . .” (6) Rila [2]

“When I said: ‘But the brothers are afraid, father, that you will die suddenly and leave the monastery high and dry, without having either made a will or given any other instructions for the two monasteries,’ the father answered: ‘They have no cause for fear on that score; there will be a rule, and the emperor and patriarch are going to see it.’” (9) Galesios [223]

There are ten documents in this first group of Byzantine monastic foundation documents, dating from the early seventh to the late eleventh century. Most of these were written for the traditional private religious foundations that dominated the ecclesiastical landscape of the Byzantine Empire during these centuries.¹ Since monasticism itself had its origins in Egypt in the fourth century as a movement of lay piety, the first monasteries were themselves necessarily private foundations. Although the emperors and the ecclesiastical hierarchy sponsored churches from the time of Constantine (306–337), there was at first no tradition of patronage of monasteries by the public authorities of late antiquity. Many bishops who did later found monasteries, beginning in the fifth century, chose to regard them as personal possessions rather than as diocesan institutions. So even before the end of late antiquity, the tradition of the Byzantine monastery’s independence of public authority had struck deep roots.

This proved to be one virtually ineradicable legacy of late antiquity bequeathed to the medieval Byzantine monastic tradition. Indeed, most of the documents included in this chapter take for granted the private status of the foundations for which they were written. They typically offer little explicit evidence on their patronage and legal status until either alternative forms of private organization or threats to their independence emerged, both of which happened in a significant way in Byzantium only in the eleventh century.

¹ For a survey, see my Private Religious Foundations in the Byzantine Empire (Washington, D.C., 1987), esp. chaps. 1, 2, and 4.

CHAPTER ONE

A. Typology of the Documents

1. Predecessors to the Monastic Foundation Documents

The development of the monastic typikon, the Byzantine monastic foundation document par excellence, was one of the achievements of this era of private religious foundations. Already in late antique times, there were documents such as Basil of Caesarea's Longer Rules that covered much of the same content as later medieval typika even if their structure was entirely different. By the same token, there were documents like the Pachomian Precepts or the Regulations of Horsiesios that were structured somewhat like medieval typika even if the scope and content of their regulation was more restricted than the later, fully developed examples of the genre. These early documents, proto-typika really, coexisted with other kinds of texts like the Basilian penitential canons and those of the Syriac tradition that would also influence the development of the medieval Byzantine typika.

2. The Monastic Testament

The monastic testament, however, was the most important of the forerunners of the medieval Byzantine typikon, and the testamentary format would continue to have a long life well into late Byzantine times.² Seven of the ten documents in this chapter describe themselves as testaments. Foreshadowed by Horsiesios' fourth-century Coptic Testament, (1) Apa Abraham commences our collection of the medieval Byzantine monastic foundation documents preserved in Greek. This document's purpose was simply to transmit the private monastery for which it was composed from the author to his chosen successor; strictly speaking, there is no regulatory content. The other examples of the genre are (3) Theodore Studites in the ninth century, (5) Euthymios, (6) Rila, and (7) Latros in the tenth century, and (8) John Xenos and (9) Galesios in the eleventh century. Of these, (8) John Xenos is the most basic, a brief document asserting the foundation's independence (i.e., private status) without offering any disciplinary regulation for the guidance of the community. (5) Euthymios is similar, but it provides a little additional detail on the governance of its monastic community. While the other documents share the testamentary format, all contain substantial amounts of disciplinary regulation, an attribute more typically associated with monastic typika.

3. The First Regulatory Documents

The oldest straightforwardly regulatory document in the collection is (2) Pantelleria, which shares its format and, to a lesser extent, its content with the Pachomian Precepts. More fully developed is (4) Stoudios, produced by the Studite community to preserve the disciplinary regime of its spiritual father, the author of (3) Theodore Studites. This is the first pairing of a founder's testament with a regulatory typikon. The hagiographic Life in which (5) Euthymios is preserved, however, alludes to a now lost typikon that once regulated that monastic community, thus providing another testimony to the pairing of testament and typikon.

The subdivision of the monastic typikon into separate texts governing liturgical performances (the typikon leitourgikon) and determining the administrative matters (the typikon ktetorikon) was still in the future when (4) Stoudios was composed sometime in the ninth century. It exhibits features of both of these types of documents. Since the typikon leitourgikon was the more formulaic of the two types, even later not every founder thought it necessary to compose one of these documents. The author of the tenth-century (7) Latros [8], for example, enjoins his monks to follow the “Rule of Jerusalem,” a likely reference to the typikon leitourgikon of the monastery of St. Sabas near Jerusalem. Still, the principle of pairing two documents to govern the foundation was preserved.

² See Artur Steinwenter, "Byzantinische Mönchstestamente," Aegyptus 12 (1932), 55–64.

TRADITIONAL PRIVATE RELIGIOUS FOUNDATIONS

The document included here as (9) Galesios is in fact a collection of extracts from Gregory the Galesiote’s Life of the founder Lazarus that provides a fair idea of the content of the latter’s lost typikon which bore the formal title of Testament (diatyposis). The extracts demonstrate that by the mid-eleventh century, the composition of typika had become so standardized that scribes knew appropriate boilerplate passages that needed to be inserted to cover routine contingencies.

The last document in this chapter, (10) Eleousa, is the product of nearly two hundred years of literary evolution since (3) Theodore Studites, during which typika developed under the influence of and as a supplement to testaments, while testaments gradually took on more and more of a regulatory function and became more like typika themselves.

4. Accidents of Preservation

The tenuousness of the preservation of many of the documents in this chapter deserves emphasis. One, (1) Apa Abraham, comes to us as an original text preserved by chance on an Egyptian papyrus. Another, (2) Pantelleria, was preserved through an extremely circuitous route in an Old Church Slavonic translation. Four of the documents owe their preservation to encapsulation in hagiographic literature.³ The long historical continuity of the foundations for which (6) Rila and (10) Eleousa were written surely helped assure the preservation of those documents. Only (4) Stoudios, an influential text for at least a hundred years after its composition, is attested today in many manuscripts.

B. Concerns of the Authors

1. Transmission of the Monastery

The overriding concern of the author of (1) Apa Abraham was the successful transmission of his foundation to his designated successor. Like the authors of certain documents in the later Pachomian and the Syriac traditions, he was aware of the peculiar peril which faced private religious foundations: the possibility that family members would attempt to assert their property rights and thereby effectively secularize the monastery.

Assuring the succession to the leadership of his foundation is also the principal concern of the author of (5) Euthymios. (6) Rila is another testament designed chiefly to transmit the foundation, but with some disciplinary content.

2. Maintenance of Institutional Autonomy

The author of (8) John Xenos, the shortest document in our collection, is concerned only to ward off threats to the independence of his foundation.

³ (5) Euthymios, (6) Rila, (7) Latros, and (8) John Xenos.

CHAPTER ONE

3. Preservation of Morality and Discipline

(2) Pantelleria, a more sophisticated regulatory document, betrays its early date through its concerns about homoeroticism, shared with the Pachomian Precepts whose treatment it resembles on this subject. The importance of manual labor also marks it as a relatively early document in the Byzantine monastic tradition. On the other hand, the grim disciplinary regime and (curiously) the acceptance of the use of wine link it to practices shared in common with the Studite tradition and the documents associated with it.

4. The Studite Tradition

The strongly pro-cenobitic Studite monastic reform is only partially documented by (3) Theodore Studites and (4) Stoudios.⁴ (3) Theodore Studites demonstrates a concern, typical for this age, for strengthening institutional autonomy within the perilous legal framework of a private religious foundation and avoiding the threat to moral probity posed by close relations with women. Although the legislation of Basil of Caesarea is cited as a model, there is not much explicitly Basilian content. (4) Stoudios is primarily a detailed, but unsystematic, treatment of liturgical and dietary matters. It preserves roles for manual labor and for literacy, though both have clearly become less important than in the monastic rules of late antiquity.

The Testament of Paul the Younger, (7) Latros, written for a monastery under Studite influence, is a brief regulatory document with a diverse ideological heritage. The author cites Basil of Caesarea approvingly, and recommends the dietary tradition of the (Sabaitic) “Rule of Jerusalem” to his monks. The Studite influence is evident in the document’s ban on women and youths, disapproval of unnecessary travel, provision of a small role for manual labor, and warning against hoarding material goods.

5. The Defense of Cenobiticism

By the time (9) Galesios was written in the mid-eleventh century, the monastic communities it describes had been formally divided into groups of those monks who performed choir services and those who worked at ordinary labors. The founder Lazarus’ attempt to discourage cohabitation substitutes for the earlier Studite precautions against sexual temptations. The cenobitic life whose promotion was such an important part of the Studite reform had come under assault as many monks rejected common meals, retained personal property, and sought to embrace the lifestyle of solitaries. Thanks to its vivid portrayal of the decay of monastic life in old-fashioned private religious foundations, this document is a useful corrective to the preceding normative texts with their cenobitic bias.⁵

⁴ See Julien Leroy, “La réforme studite,” OCA 153 (1958), 181–214, and the discussion below in (4) Stoudios, The Studite Monastic Reform.

⁵ For the diversity of forms of Byzantine monasticism in the era before the great monastic reform began in the late eleventh century, see Denise Papachryssanthou, “La vie monastique dans les campagnes byzantines du VIII^e au XI^e siècle,” Byzantion 43 (1973–74), 158–80. Alexander Kazhdan, “Hermitic, Cenobitic, and Secular Ideals in Byzantine Hagiography of the Ninth through the Twelfth Centuries,” GOTR 30 (1985), 473–87, argues, however, for a cyclical variation on the popularity of cenobitic and hermitic alternatives.

TRADITIONAL PRIVATE RELIGIOUS FOUNDATIONS

6. Regulation of a Transitional Institution

(10) Eleousa presents one founder's attempt to preserve as much as possible of the old order of private patronage as a new order was dawning under the auspices of the monastic reform movement of the late eleventh century. In this document, liturgical performances assume an important place, while the practice of manual labor has apparently disappeared. Nothing is said about book learning and literacy, though the Studite concern about preventing sexual misconduct remains. The greatest perceived threat to the monastery's independence is no longer the founder's family, as in earlier centuries, but the public authorities of the imperial government and the ecclesiastical hierarchy.

C. Historical Context

1. Private Religious Foundations after Justinian

The earliest documents in this chapter come from the era following the dismantling of the regulatory system of Emperor Justinian (527–565), who had energetically sought to restrict the prerogatives of private ownership in religious institutions in order to subordinate these foundations to the ecclesiastical hierarchy and to prevent their use as refuges for religious dissidents.⁶

Our first document, (1) Apa Abraham, illustrates a typical private monastery of its era, handed down by its owner to his designated successor as if it were any other piece of ordinary private property. For all practical purposes, that was what many monasteries had become, for private benefactors began to enjoy a free hand again as they had in the era before Justinian's regulations, particularly as political conditions became more chaotic with the Arab conquest of North Africa, Syria, and Palestine in the later seventh and eighth centuries.

Our second document, (2) Pantelleria, was almost certainly written for a private foundation as well, for nowhere in it is there any mention of an external ecclesiastical authority or any other public official. Most likely this document was written in the late eighth century, well before the completion of the Arab conquest of neighboring Sicily.

2. Private Religious Foundations in the Iconoclastic Era

The bitter Iconoclastic controversy, which commenced in 726 and was resolved only in 843, stimulated the interest of the imperial government in the patronage and control of monastic institutions.⁷ Byzantine monasteries in the ninth century had a very different economic base from the Pachomian and Basilian foundations of late antiquity that institutionalized manual labor and strove for economic self-sufficiency for their communities, or even the monastic foundations of the sixth and early seventh centuries that had relied on cash incomes assigned by their patrons.⁸ While (3) Theodore Studites and (4) Stoudios show very little concern for such prosaic matters, they hint at the general changeover to formal landed endowments of property as the new means of supporting monastic foundations that other sources show took place at this time. Although the practice of manual labor was not yet abandoned and was still defended energetically on at least a theoretical level by Theodore the Studite himself, it became less important in the ninth century as it was no longer essential for an institution's support.

⁶ For the Justinianic regulatory system and his imperial-sponsored religious foundations, see Michel Kaplan, Les propriétés de la couronne et de l'église dans l'Empire byzantin (V^e–VI^e siècles) (Paris, 1976); A. Knecht, System des justinianischen Kirchenvermögensrechtes (Stuttgart, 1905); and my own Private Religious Foundations, chap. 2, pp. 37–58.

⁷ For an important study of the relationship between monasticism and Byzantine society during the Iconoclastic controversy, see Kathryn Ringrose, "Saints, Holy Men and Byzantine Society, 726 to 843" (Ph.D. diss., Rutgers University, 1976).

CHAPTER ONE

3. New Means of Financial Support

The adoption of landed endowments was not a drastic change, for it seems likely that few institutions had been truly self-supporting (in the Pachomian or Basilian sense) since Justinian's time. The reliance of many private monasteries on cash incomes during the sixth, seventh, and eighth centuries surely cushioned the impact of the further change that took place at the beginning of the ninth century. But as Byzantine monasticism emerges in clear view at this point after several centuries of poor documentary attestation, the overall impact turned out to be considerable, sharply differentiating medieval monasticism from its late antique forebears. To mention just one obvious change, the size of the typical foundation had been significantly reduced. Henceforth, Byzantine monasteries would more typically be populated by a dozen or perhaps a score of monks rather than by hundreds or (if some Pachomian and Studite sources are to be believed) upwards of a thousand ascetics. The high costs of maintaining large communities of economically unproductive monks in prayerful leisure were surely responsible for this scaling down in size, though there were some exceptions, notably the Lavra monastery on Mount Athos, which was the beneficiary of an extraordinary amount of imperial support (see below, Chapter Two).

4. The Benefits of Imperial Patronage

Since the individual private fortunes available to support these monasteries necessarily had their limits, some founders of the ninth and tenth centuries began to seek an alternative or supplementary source of income for their foundations from imperial patronage. The emperors, both iconoclasts and iconodules, seem to have welcomed these requests for support as a means of extending their influence and control over privately founded monasteries. (3) Theodore Studites and (4) Stoudios, for example, are associated with one of the most famous and influential monasteries of Byzantium, named after its founder Stoudios, a consul of the fifth century. By the time these particular documents were composed in the ninth century, however, the constitutional status of the Stoudios monastery, once undoubtedly a private monastery, had become less clear, thanks to its expropriation under Constantine V (741–775) and a subsequent tradition of imperial patronage.⁹ (5) Euthymios is likewise associated with a monastic foundation (of the early tenth century) developed by a private patron (a future patriarch of Constantinople) as the beneficiary of imperial patronage by Leo VI the Wise (886–912).

5. Private Religious Foundations at Their Height

The early tenth century was really a golden age for private religious foundations in Byzantium.

⁸ See the discussion in my Private Religious Foundations, pp. 123–25, 127–30; for earlier financing devices, see pp. 47–53, 115–18.

TRADITIONAL PRIVATE RELIGIOUS FOUNDATIONS

Leo VI had effectively dismantled the last remaining Justinianic restraints on the prerogatives of their founders, and public subsidies and other means of support for these foundations were increasingly common. Yet private benefactors were not willing to permit imperial patronage to compromise their control of these institutions. The ultimate success of the author of (5) Euthymios's attempt to "privatize" his imperial foundation is unknown, but other tenth-century founders sought to develop monasteries that would be immune from public control. In Bulgaria, (6) Rila, whose founder counsels [8] the rejection of gifts offered by "earthly kings and princes," and in Asia Minor, (7) Latros, whose author Paul ignores all public authorities, are illustrative of the trend.

6. The Crisis of Private Religious Foundations

In the second half of the tenth century, however, this favorable environment changed dramatically, first with the abortive ban on further private religious foundations issued by Nikephoros Phokas (963–969) in 964, withdrawn by Basil II (976–1025) in 988, then most menacingly of all with the innovation of the charistike, most likely about this same time. The charistike was a public program sponsored by the emperor and the ecclesiastical hierarchy for the private management of religious institutions.¹⁰ Temporary grants separated the rights of management and financial exploitation from the ultimate rights of ownership over older private religious foundations for the benefit of new private concessionaires, allegedly for institutional improvement and maintenance. At first only ruined foundations were brought into the program, but eventually what amounted to wholesale confiscations of private religious property became the rule.

7. Benefactors' Response to the Crisis

It was against the background of this infamous but lucrative charistike that the last documents in this chapter were written. Benefactors of the eleventh century, confronted frequently by hostile public authorities determined to assert control over the private monasteries located in their jurisdictions, responded commensurately. In 1031, the author of (8) John Xenos, clearly worried about a confiscation under this government program of his many dependent monasteries on Crete, pronounces [2] a curse on any emperor, patriarch or metropolitan who might dare to appropriate his foundation's properties. In more specific terms, (9) Galesios [141], [223] portrays its founder desperately trying to maintain his foundation's autonomy (i.e., its private status) from the local metropolitan of Ephesos. Finally, (10) Eleousa [16] shows its founder, a bishop, forbidding his own successors in office any rights over the foundation except for the blessing of a new superior.

8. Development of the Independent Monastery

By the late eleventh century, the independent and self-governing monastery, an attractive alternative form of institutional organization apparently invented in the mid-tenth century on Mount Athos, had become more common. The authors of (8) John Xenos, (9) Galesios, and (10) Eleousa all prudently exploited their friendly relations with a succession of emperors to gain recognitions

⁹ See the discussion below, (3) Theodore Studites, Institutional History.

¹⁰ For the charistike, see Michel Kaplan, "Les monastères et le siècle à Byzance: les investissements des laïcs au XI^e siècle," CCM 27 (1984), 71–83, and the other works cited in the General Bibliography, XXIV. Monasticism and the Charistike.

CHAPTER ONE

of the independence of their foundations. An independent monastery had its own endowment, under the administration of its superior, and was managed by its own officials without interference by or concession of economic benefits to the founder or his family. Though the independent and self-governing monastery was in its origins a deliberate mutation of the traditional private religious foundation, it necessarily obliged a founder to make substantially greater financial sacrifices. Therefore, despite its increasing prestige towards the end of the eleventh century, the new form of organization was not universally popular. Manuel of Stroumitza, author of (10) Eleousa, clearly hesitated between the traditional and the new form of institutional organization, finally opting for the latter, but was unwilling to permit it to take effect until another generation of leadership after his own had passed on.

1. Apa Abraham: Testament of Apa Abraham, Bishop of Hermonthis, for the Monastery of St. Phoibammon near Thebes, Egypt

Date: first quarter, 7th c.

Translator: Leslie S. B. MacCoull

Edition employed: F. G. Kenyon, Greek Papyri in the British Museum, vol. 1 (London, 1893), pp. 231–36 (= P. Lond. I.77), with corrections by Friedrich Preisigke, Berichtigungsliste der griechischen Papyrusurkunden aus Ägypten, vol. 1 (Berlin-Leipzig, 1922), p. 241.

Manuscript: Original document (papyrus)

Other translations: English, by C. W. Goodwin, “Curiosities of Law. 1. Conveyancing among the Copts of the Eighth Century,” The Law Magazine and Law Review 6, no. 12 (1859), pp. 237–48.

Institutional History

Apa Abraham, the author of this document and the founder of the monastery for which it was written, was the fourteenth bishop of the city of Hermonthis (modern Armant) in Upper Egypt, as we know from his diptych which is preserved in the British Museum.¹ According to Krause (“Testamente,” p. 58), he was born about 540–50, became a bishop in 590–600, and lived until circa 610–20; according to MacCoull (“Apa Abraham,” p. 127) he appears to have been born ca. 554 and he died in 624. A portrait of the bishop has survived and is now in the collection of the Egyptian Museum in Berlin.² Apa Abraham did not reside in his diocesan see but rather at the monastery of St. Phoibammon located some five miles from the west bank of the Nile between Hermonthis and Medinet Habu (Krause, “Beziehungen,” p. 31). The site was excavated by the Société d’Archéologie Copte in 1948–49.³ This was not the monastery for which this document was written, however, for Apa Abraham was pressured to relocate his residence, evidently a remote site of difficult access, by Damian (578–605), patriarch of Alexandria, as we know from a surviving ostrakon.⁴ Apa Abraham then chose the abandoned Temple of Hatshepsut (of the XI Dynasty) at Dêr el Bahri (Arabic for “North Monastery”) near Djême (ancient Thebes), a Coptic settlement itself located in the temple of Medinet Habu, as the site of a new Phoibammon monastery. A Coptic papyrus illustrates Papnute, the lashane or protokometes (village headman) of Djême, joined by the local clergy as representatives of the local residents, recognizing Apa Abraham’s ownership of the site in his capacity as superior of the new monastery.⁵ The monastery was located in the upper terraces of the temple and provided the Arabic name for the site.

A series of preserved testaments, including this document, illustrate the foundation’s superiors transmitting the monastery as a private possession to their successors. In the present document, Apa Abraham designates [2] his disciple the priest Victor as his successor. In a Coptic testament of 634, Victor’s successor Peter designates Iakobos as his own successor.⁶ The testament of this Apa Iakobos, dating from towards the end of the seventh century, is also preserved.⁷ It lists Abraham, Victor and Peter as his predecessors in office and designates Victor II as his own successor. Victor II was still superior in 711/12 but there is no surviving testament. Other Coptic documents preserve the names of superiors down to Suros, circa 770–82.⁸ The neighboring monastery of Epiphanius was also transmitted over the course of several generations by its superiors through use of private testaments, one of which survives from the seventh century.⁹ It is not known how long the monastery of Phoibammon was inhabited. Dated graffiti from the tenth, eleventh and twelfth centuries survive at the site, but these may not have been related to the monastic settlement.

SEVENTH CENTURY

European explorers found considerable remains of the monastery on site in the late eighteenth and early nineteenth century.¹⁰ Old photos show some of the monastic buildings and a thirty-foot tower. The papyrus containing (1) Apa Abraham was found at the monastery about 1856 and added to the collection of the British Museum. Towards the end of the nineteenth century, the French archaeologist E. Naville, working for the Egypt Exploration Society, demolished the Coptic buildings in order to uncover the Temple of Hatshepsut. Unfortunately he made no plans of the monastery before undertaking its demolition. Some ostraca found in the course of this excavation were eventually published by W. E. Crum in his Coptic Ostraca [CO] in 1902. Meanwhile, a silver treasure of liturgical vessels was found in the course of an excavation in 1893 of a small basilica dating from before 600 and located to the west of the great colonnade of the temple of Luxor, some of which bear the name of our bishop Abraham in Greek. These objects are now divided between the Egyptian Museum and the Coptic Museum in Cairo. Krause (“Disziplin,” p. 12) believes that the aforementioned diptych (purchased in Luxor in 1903) and portrait of Apa Abraham (bought in 1904), may also have come from the site of this church. In 1922, many Coptic ostraca written by the same individuals as those who wrote those published earlier by Crum, including Apa Abraham and his successor Victor, were found at Dêr el Bahri by excavators working for the Metropolitan Museum of New York in rubbish piles left behind by Naville after his excavation of the neighboring temple of Mentuhotep.¹¹ In his doctoral dissertation, Krause (“Apa Abraham,” pt. 1, pp. 132–33) listed 114 published and unpublished ostraca representing the correspondence of Apa Abraham, and more have been discovered since then. Thus there exists a considerable body of written sources as well as material artifacts that someday will make possible a better appreciation of the life of this monastery and its founder.

Analysis

Though there are other examples of the private testamentary transmission of a monastery extant from Egypt in Coptic, this is the only such testament composed in Greek. As such, it is an instructive forerunner (as Steinwenter, “Mönchstestamente,” p. 62, realized) of later Byzantine monastic testaments, particularly those like (5) Euthymios and (14) Ath. Testament in the tenth century as well as (8) John Xenos in the eleventh century, that are essentially transmissory documents rather than formal monastic rules. This type of simple testament would appear even later in Byzantine history, as (41) Docheiariou, (44) Karyes, (48) Prodromos, (49) Geromeri, and (50) Gerasimos illustrate.

1. APA ABRAHAM

Like all of these testaments, this document does not establish any regulations for the life of the monastic community for which it was written. There are certain features, such as the author's provisions [7] for his own burial and the performance of commemorative services, that will be developed into detailed regulations in subsequent documents, e.g., (29) Kosmosoteira [89] ff. and (27) Kecharitomene [71], among others. Although this author professes [9] to have only minimal assets, the disposition of the founder's property will likewise become an important subject of regulation in subsequent documents (see (19) Attaleiates [4], [5]). The concern of the author with keeping the monastery out of the hands of his family [5] will also be shared by subsequent founders of private religious foundations and those of some independent and autonomous foundations. Later Byzantine founders would share this author's fear that the resolution of conflicting claims over the rights to ownership would involve the monastery in burdensome and potentially damaging litigation.¹² Yet while our author here, still accustomed to a relatively strong public authority inherited from late antiquity, relies [6] on the threat of fines to deter transgressors of his testament, later authors would have to rely on curses, the hope of divine sanctions, and powerful lay protectors.¹³ Most significant for the future history of religious institutions in the Byzantine Empire is the author's decision, even though he was a bishop, to treat this monastery as his private property rather than as a diocesan foundation, a right that, as we have seen, the neighboring community of Djême explicitly recognized. This is the same attitude that most later episcopal authors of the documents in our collection would take towards their monasteries, to the detriment of their successors in office.¹⁴

Like many of his contemporaries, this monastic leader was literate, in Coptic, though not in Greek. The present Greek text was prepared for him by the notary Joseph, priest of the local public church of Hermonthis. Most of the witnesses to the document merely state that they have heard (i.e., not necessarily read) the Greek text.

Notes on the Introduction

1. See Krause, "Disziplin," p. 11.
2. See Krause, "Tafelbild," p. 108.
3. Results published in Ch. Bachatly, Le monastère de Phoibammon dans le Thébaïde, vol. 1 (Cairo, 1981), vol. 2 (Cairo, 1965), and vol. 3 (Cairo, 1961).
4. CO ad 59, as interpreted by Krause, "Beziehungen," pp. 31–34.
5. KRU 105, as interpreted by Krause, "Beziehungen," pp. 35–36; German translation by Till, Rechtsurkunden, pp. 188–90. In 408, CTh 16.10.19 permitted the public use of pagan temples that had been closed in 399 by CTh 16.10.16.
6. KRU 77, with Krause, "Phoibammon-Klöster," p. 266, and Till, Untersuchungen, p. 204. The first seven lines of the document are in Greek; a complete edition is still lacking.
7. KRU 65; for dating see Krause, "Beziehungen," p. 32; German translation in Till, Untersuchungen, pp. 152–58.
8. Krause, "Phoibammon-Klöster," p. 266; for a list with references to the Coptic documents, see Till, Datierung, p. 236.
9. KRU 75; German translation by Till, Untersuchungen, pp. 198–204. For a discussion of other monastic testaments from Coptic Egypt, see Steinwenter, "Rechtsstellung," pp. 12–16, and "Mönchstestamente," pp. 5–61.
10. For the rediscovery of the monastery and artifacts associated with Apa Abraham, see Kenyon, Greek Papyri, p. 231; Krause, "Phoibammon-Klöster," pp. 263–66, and "Disziplin," pp. 11–13.

SEVENTH CENTURY

11. In 1930, these were divided between the Metropolitan Museum (sold in 1959–60 to Columbia University) and the Egyptian Museum in Cairo (now in the Coptic Museum); additional texts were discovered by a Polish expedition working at Dêr el Bahri in 1961; see Krause, “Disziplin,” pp. 12–13, and “Phoibammon-Klöster,” p. 265; and W. Godlewski, Le monastère de St. Phoibammon (Warsaw, 1986).
12. See (23) Pakourianos [18] and (60) Charsianeites [C7].
13. For curses and heavenly sanctions, see (8) John Xenos [2], (9) Galesios [246], (10) Eleousa [19], (22) Evergetis [12], etc.; for lay protectors, see the introductory discussion below in Chapter Three.
14. See (5) Euthymios [1], (8) John Xenos [1], (10) Eleousa [16], [18], (31) Areia [M11], [M15], (34) Machairas [9], (44) Karyes [3], and (58) Menoikeion [1]; but cf. (55) Athanasios I [9] and (60) Charsianeites [C12].

Bibliography

- Bilabel, Friedrich, “Zu dem Testament des Bischofs Abraham von Hermonthis,” OL 27 (1924), 701–4.
- Crum, W. E., Coptic Ostraca (London, 1902). [CO]
- , The Monastery of Epiphanius, vol. 1 (New York, 1926), p. 108.
- Crum, W. E., and Steindorff, G., Koptische Rechtsurkunden des achten Jahrhunderts aus Djême (Theben) (Leipzig, 1912). [KRU].
- Krause, Martin, “Apa Abraham von Hermonthis: ein oberägyptischer Bischof um 600” (Ph.D. diss., Berlin, 1956), summarized by C. D. G. Müller, “Die koptische Kirche zwischen Chalkedon und dem Arabereinmarsch,” ZKG 75 (1964), 283–92.
- , “Die Beziehungen zwischen den beiden Phoibammon-Klöstern auf dem thebanischen Westufer,” BSAC 27 (1985), 31–44.
- , “Die Disziplin Koptologie,” in The Future of Coptic Studies, ed. R. McL. Wilson (Leiden, 1978), pp. 11–22.
- , “Die Testamente der Äbte des Phoibammon-Klosters in Theben,” MDAI Kairo 25 (1969), 57–69.
- , “Zur Lokalisierung und Datierung koptischer Denkmäler. Das Tafelbild des Bischofs Abraham,” ZÄS 97 (1971), 106–11.
- , “Zwei Phoibammon-Klöster in Theben-West,” MDAI Kairo 37 (1981), 261–66.
- Kreller, Hans, Erbrechtliche Untersuchungen auf Grund der graeco-ägyptischen Papyrusurkunden (Leipzig, 1915).
- Lewald, H., Review of Jean Maspero, Papyrus grecs d’époque byzantine (Cairo, 1912), in ZSR 46, r. a. 33 (1912), 620–28.
- MacCoull, Leslie, “Apa Abraham,” ODB, p. 127.
- Steinwenter, Artur, “Aus dem kirchlichen Vermögensrechte der Papyri,” ZSR 75, k. a. 44 (1958), 1–34.
- , Artur, “Byzantinische Mönchstestamente,” Aegyptus 12 (1932), 55–64.
- , “Die Rechtsstellung der Kirchen und Klöster nach den Papyri,” ZSR 50, k. a. 19 (1930), 1–50, esp. 12.
- Till, Walter C., Erbrechtliche Untersuchungen auf Grund der koptischen Urkunden (Vienna, 1954).
- , Die koptischen Rechtsurkunden aus Theben (Vienna, 1964).
- , Datierung und Prosopographie der koptischen Urkunden aus Theben (Vienna, 1962), p. 236 (list of the superiors of the Phoibammon monastery).
- Wenger, Leopold, “Eine Schenkung auf den Todesfall,” ZSR 32, r. a. (1911), 325–37.

1. APA ABRAHAM

Translation

[1.] . . . written¹ . . . to . . . who is also my *synkellos*² . . . since indeed there is an end for all, and lest I leave this life suddenly and unexpectedly by the collapse of this suffering body of mine, with the future being unclear. Wherefore I hastened [to set forth] this written and unaltered last testamentary assurance which has validity by force of law wherever it shall be produced in evidence and published. By this I declare that I entrusted [my possessions] to you of my own will and persuasion, subject to no trickery or fear or force or deception or necessity whatsoever, nor any legal dissembling nor swindling nor any kind of manipulation, without any sort of duplicity or malicious intent whatsoever, but rather from my own purpose and authentic intention, and my own free will, with a right understanding and firm faith, in [a position of] full ownership and unencumbered authority, persuaded by every intent, living, understanding and thinking, being of sound mind and with my intellect most sharp, walking upon the earth, going to the marketplace. This last will I have dictated in the Egyptian language, but I enjoined that it be also written in Greek words, as is proclaimed [p. 233] in the well and piously framed laws.

[2.] May it be possible for me to live and be in good health and enjoy all my modest goods! But should I (which I pray may be averted) suffer the common lot of humankind and leave this life, I wish and order that, after my death, you, the aforementioned Victor,³ the most pious priest and my disciple, shall enter upon all of the moderate property bequeathed by me and be my heir, viz. movable, immovable and animate property, of every kind and sort and of whatever type and quantity, in gold and silver and cloth and copper, and clothing and books and building sites and waste lands and buildings. In a word, [you will inherit] everything, from the most costly kind to the least and down to one jugerum and the worth of one *assarion*⁴ and one obol, and whatever there happens to be of pottery and wooden and stone household utensils, as regards all of that same moderate property bequeathed by me, including what I inherited from my forebears and what I acquired by my own sweat and by purchase and by charitable gift and by any manner or intent whatsoever, by written or unwritten means.⁵

[3.] Not only that, but also the holy monastery which is under me, that of the holy prize-bearing martyr Abba Phoibammon which lies in the aforementioned holy mountain of Memnonion, I leave to you in unhindered ownership, together with its venerable property, from the cheap kind to the costly, down to a cinder. I direct that you, the aforementioned Victor, the most pious priest and monk, my disciple, after my death immediately and forthwith are to enter upon the moderate property bequeathed by me, to manage it and own it and be master of it, of all the goods bequeathed by me, all of them from the small to least, down to one jugerum and one assarion and one obol, and whatever there happens to be of pottery and wooden and stone household utensils, even including the pure oratory together with its venerable property, from the cheap kind to the costly.

[4.] Just as [my] preceding statement made clear [you shall have the right] to possess, take care of, manage and improve the property, to dwell in it, build on it, enjoy [the revenues], rent it out, sell it, cede it, alienate it, give it as donation, grant it as a charitable gift or grant, and do everything concerning it as full owner without hindrance, and spend the revenues on the management of the aforementioned holy place and providing for the poor who come over.⁶ For this is what has seemed right and good to me and to this [decision] I have arrived gladly in the present complete testamentary guarantee.

SEVENTH CENTURY

[5.] So let no one of my close family or anyone else representing me, be it on [p. 234] my father's side or my mother's, brothers or sisters, relatives, cousins, or any other human being whosoever, be able at any occasion or time whatsoever to bring suit against you or your heirs or successors or assigns or any of your kinsfolk, neither bringing a charge nor having one brought, in court or out of court, in the local district or beyond the frontier, small or great, nor [shall they be able] to accuse you in the presence of friends nor to bring legal proceedings against you or those who come after you, before any magistrate or judge, neither by proclamation in the holy church nor in the praetoria,⁷ to make use of any other device or demand a divine and imperial decree with regard to this testament in whole or in part thereof, nor in any way to transgress it, on account of the fact that in every respect it has been deemed right and been compassed by me at my own good pleasure to receive and give whatever I am found to possess or owe or be owed, and to deal with all of my receipts and expenditures.

[6.] If anyone should try at any time to oppose this uncircumscribed testament, I declare the one doing any such thing at any time whatsoever in the first place to be liable to the divine and terrifying oath and the penalty and reproach that attend upon perjury, and to be subject to the fines appointed for those who dare to transgress divine and imperial oaths, and to pay to account of a fine for transgression six ounces of gold, by deed and power exacted from the property of the interloper and accuser.

[7.] Wherefore, since thus it is necessary to abide by everything written in this invulnerable testament, I wish and order that, after my exit from this life, the wrapping of my body and my holy [eucharistic] offerings⁸ and meals [in my memory]⁹ and the designated days of my death [period] be fulfilled by your care according to the custom of the country,¹⁰ and according to my intention and plan.

[8.] I charge you that, if another document should be brought forth, [p. 235] whether purporting to be earlier or later, to oppose this testament, I declare that that document is null and void and without force everywhere it may be produced as evidence, since this present document is what has the force of law.¹¹

[9.] For the support and guarantee of everything agreed upon by me, I swear by the holy and consubstantial Trinity and by the girdle¹² bound round me¹³ not to transgress or overturn in any way at all the things heretofore written, but direct that they are unshakeable and unbreakable in perpetuity by means of the present testament, from which may trickery and evil envy go away and stay away. So I have made this for you as a guarantee, which is valid and established wherever it shall be produced in evidence, and recognized by every government authority and power having the force of law, with its signature signed by me the signer and witnessed by trustworthy witnesses [whose signatures] follow, according to my intention and judgment; and having been asked about everything as interpreted for me in the Egyptian language by the notary [whose signature] follows, I agree and sign a release to the effect that everything is satisfactory as related by my own mouth, thus rightly to possess, to give, act upon, guard, respect, and abide by.

1. APA ABRAHAM

+ Wherefore clearly I have made plain, as far as gold and silver are concerned, that I swear by the faith of the Christians that I do not possess gold or silver, nor have I possessed them from birth. I have none, neither from inside nor from outside, up to one trimesion,¹⁴ and I have sworn an oath to that effect. +

Nor have I allowed [such possessions]. Even if I had any, I would have given them to the account of the poor. However, as I mentioned, I do not possess any gold or silver, and I am ready to give an account about this to my Master, God.+

[Subscriptions]¹⁵ + I, Abraham, by the mercy of God bishop and anchorite of the holy mountain of Memnonion, son of Sabinos of blessed memory, whose mother is Rebecca, the aforementioned, have made the present testamentary document in all the chapters and agreements in which it contains, together with the divine oath and the aforementioned stipulation of fine, and I assent to everything written as it stands, and give my release.

+ I, Joseph, son of John, most humble priest of the holy church of Hermonthis, having been requested to do so, wrote on his behalf since he does not understand [Greek] letters.¹⁶

+ I, Dioscoros, son of Jakobos, archpriest¹⁷ [p. 236] of the holy church of Hermonthis, am witness to the present testament, having heard it from the most holy Apa Abraham, bishop of Hermonthis, the one who also made it.

+ I, Flavios Pantonymos, son of Apadios, am witness to this present testament [having heard it] from the framer [thereof].

+ I, Flavios Abraham, son of Theodosios, member of the curial class¹⁸ of Hermonthis, am witness to this sale,¹⁹ having been asked to do so by the framer [thereof].

+ I, Paul, son of Abraham, most humble deacon, am witness to the present testament, having heard it from the framer [thereof]. P

+ I, Flavios Theophilos, by the grace of God, public defender²⁰ of Hermonthis, am witness to the testament, having been asked to do so by the framer [thereof]. P P P P

+ By me, Peter, this was written.+

SEVENTH CENTURY

Notes on the Translation

Editors' note: The assistance of our translator, Leslie S. B. MacCoull [LSBM], is gratefully acknowledged for the notes to this document.

1. Kenyon, Greek Papyri, p. 231, notes “The beginning of the document is lost, but it does not appear to have contained anything beyond the date and heading, except some reflections on the uncertainty of human life.”
2. synkellos: lit. “one who shares the same cell.” By the late fifth century the title was used especially for the adviser of a bishop or patriarch; see A. Papadakis, ODB, p. 1993; Bilabel, “Testament,” col. 702, supposed that this was Victor, Apa Abraham’s chosen successor.
3. For this individual, see also KRU 65, 77.
4. jugerum: a measure of land, approximately two-thirds of an acre; assarion: i.e., worth as little as an as, an obsolete Roman coin.
5. This seems to include a reference to the grant of civic property on which the monastery was built, for which see KRU 105.
6. Note the congruity with the bishop’s rights as described in KRU 105, lines 4–8, trans. Till, Rechtsurkunden, p. 188, after Steinwenter: “die nach Gottes und eurem Willen nach euch kommen werden, wie es sich gehört, weil ihr Herr des ganzen topos des Apa Phoibammon seid, dass ihr darin wohnt, aufbaut oder niederreisst, Leute zu euch hinein nehmt von allen, die einen gottesfürchtigen Lebenswandel führen, für die ganze Dauer eures Lebens und (des Lebens dessen), den ihr nach euch in den topos einsetzt, dass er die Angelegenheit des Almosens (agape) der Armen verwalte.”
7. The governor’s residence; see Lampe, PGL, pp. 1126–27.
8. prosporphorai; for which, see Lampe, PGL, p. 1184 and my own Private Religious Foundations, pp. 76–80: “Prosphora Donations,” with references therein.
9. agapai; for which see Eberhard Bruck, Totenteil und Seelgerät im griechischen Recht (Munich, 1926).
10. In the Coptic rite, a memorial liturgy is offered on the fortieth day after death. Whether “wrapping the body” means full mummification at this late date in the context of the Christian clergy is controversial. [LSBM]
11. Cf. (27) Kecharitomene [3], in which the author reserves the right to change her mind by issuing a supplementary document.
12. schema of monastic habit, for which see Lampe, PGL, p. 1359, 8C.
13. For oaths on the monastic schema, see P. Cairo Masp. III.67299.50. [LSBM]
14. trimesion, see Lampe, PGL, p. 1408: “coin worth one-third of the aureus” (standard gold coin, i.e. solidus).
15. As Krause, “Beziehungen,” p. 36, notes, there is no overlap between the individuals, including local officials and clergy, who sign here and their counterparts who signed KRU 105. This suggests a considerable gap between the composition of the two documents.
16. The author is perfectly literate in Coptic (see Krause, Apa Abraham, pt. 1, pp. 132–33, for a partial list of his correspondence), just not in Greek. [LSBM]
17. archipresbyteros, see Lampe, PGL, p. 240: “the senior priest who took the place of the bishop when absent, and performed administrative functions.”
18. politeuomenos.
19. Kenyon, Greek Papyri, p. 232: “presumably a business man, [who] by force of habit calls the process he is witnessing a sale instead of a will.” This is common in Coptic documents.
20. ekdikos (in Latin, defensor civitatis); see Lampe, PGL, p. 427.

2. Pantelleria: Typikon of John for the Monastery of St. John the Forerunner on Pantelleria

Date: probably late 8th c.¹

Translator: Gianfranco Fiaccadori

Edition employed: Ivan D. Mansvetov, Tserkovnii ustav (tipik), ego obrazovanie i sudba v grečeskoj i russkoj tserkvi (Moscow, 1885), pp. 441–45; cf. Ivan Dujčev, “Il Tipico del monastero di S. Giovanni nell’isola di Pantelleria,” BBGG, n.s., 25 (1971), 3–17, with untranscribed facsimile of the Bodleian manuscript at 5–12.

Manuscripts: Ms. Russian State Library (Moscow), formerly Theological Academy 54, fols. 91v ff. (16th–17th c.). There are two other manuscripts: State Historical Museum (Moscow), formerly Patriarchal Library, Undol’skij Collection, 110 of the Synodal Checklist, fols. 549 ff. (16th–17th c.), and Bodleian Library (Oxford), 995–92, fols. 124r–127v (16th–17th c.).

Other translations: Italian, by Dujčev, “Riflessi,” pp. 208–12, and “Il Tipico,” pp. 13–17, from the Bodleian manuscript.

Institutional History

Very little is known about this foundation, and not much can be said with certainty even about such basic matters as when its founder John lived, how long his monastery was in existence, and when it disappeared. In addition to the present typikon, the founder is also known from his appearance in various synaxaria of the Greek church, in which he is customarily described as “confessor” as well as superior of this monastery on Pantelleria.² This has led some scholars to speculate that he may have been a refugee from Iconoclasm, and that his monastery must therefore date from some time after 726.³ John’s successor, Basil, was also commemorated as a saint, and a canon dedicated to him is extant that appears to refer to John’s monastic rules.⁴ The canon features the hard ascetic life conducted by Basil, which appears consonant with the stern tenor of John’s typikon (see below). The canon obviously must be later than the typikon, but since its own dating is speculative, it is no help in dating the latter document.

A few facts known about the island of Pantelleria itself hint at the likely duration and ultimate fate of the foundation. Located southwest of the westernmost tip of Sicily and due east of Tunisia, as an Italian possession it is even today a remote and sparsely populated site. Known in classical times as Cossyra, it became known as Patellaria circa 700,⁵ that is about the time Arab rule became firmly established in Ifriqiya on the nearby African coast with the fall of Carthage in 698. It had served as a refuge for Christians fleeing the Arabs since the second half of the seventh century, but around 700 it was seized by the latter temporarily, who used it as a base for raiding Sicily.⁶ The period of its recovery by the Byzantines, which cannot be precisely dated, is the most likely time for the foundation of John’s monastery. During the years 803–806, three dissident ecclesiastical hierarchs, Euthymios of Sardis, Theophylaktos of Nikomedia, and Eudoxios of Amorion, were exiled on the island at the orders of Emperor Nikephoros I (802–811).⁷ A chance reference in a Carolingian chronicle records that in 806 raiders from Muslim Spain captured sixty monks on Pantelleria, presumably from John’s monastery given the small size of the island, some of whom the Frankish Emperor Charlemagne was able to ransom a year later and enable to return home.⁸ How much longer the monastery survived cannot be determined. The island was still in Byzantine hands at the time of a naval battle between forces dispatched by Ziyâdat Allâh I (817–838) against a Byzantine fleet in 835.⁹

EIGHTH CENTURY

By this time the Muslims had already settled in Sicily itself at Palermo, where they had established a capital in 831, though the conquest of the larger island took several decades. Syracuse did not fall until 878 and Taormina until 902 (later reoccupied and lost again in 962). Von Falkenhausen (“Patellaria,” p. 1594) broadly assigns the Arab conquest of tiny Pantelleria to the period between 836 and 864. Although Malta did not fall until 870, an early date within the range proposed seems preferable.¹⁰ At whatever time the island fell to the Arabs, the monastic community cannot long have survived as Pantelleria was thoroughly Islamicized thereafter.

Analysis

This document is the only monastic typikon that predates the Studite monastic reform. Widely assumed (without certain evidence) to be only a fragment of a longer document, it has been preserved only in an old Slavic version, surely the most curious means of preservation of any of our documents given its original place of composition on remote Pantelleria. Unlike many later typika, the document shows no interest in regulating constitutional, administrative and financial matters. Instead, like (3) Theodore Studites and even (4) Stoudios, the documents closest to it in date, its principal concern is the regulation of the lives of the monks of the monastery for which it was written.

The typikon depicts a community living under strict, authoritarian rule (n.b. [18], restricting whispering and written communications) in one of the most remote parts of the Byzantine Empire. The monks lived a life emphasizing prayer, singing, genuflections, strict fasting, and strenuous manual labor. This was a hierarchically organized foundation, under the firm rule of a superior, overseers, and elders. Monks were also assigned places in the church according to their rank. Anyone who dared to differ was to “be shown his place” [1]. The emphasis of the document is on duties and punishments for infractions of the rules, particularly latenesses and absences.¹¹ Punishments include: lying face down, deprivation of food, and expulsion from the community. The suppression of homoeroticism was a particular concern of the author.¹² The penal emphasis, present earlier in the Penitential mistakenly attributed to Basil of Caesarea, finds some echoes in ninth- and tenth-century Byzantine documents (such as (4) Stoudios and (11) Ath. Rule), then drops out of sight again until the twelfth century, when (31) Areia [T9] shows its influence. Direct Basilian quotes turn up again in Cypriot typika (34) Machairas and (45) Neophytos of the early thirteenth century. However, nowhere else among the medieval Byzantine monastic foundation documents or their late antique predecessors is there evidence of such a grim regime for daily life and discipline as found here. The possibility that this was in fact a monastic prison might well seem worth entertaining, were it not for the inclusion of expulsion among the recommended punishments.

2. PANTELLERIA

Overall, this is a document of some sophistication, a recognizable if also brief (and possibly incomplete) typikon, all the more remarkable for its early date, remote provenance, and bizarre means of preservation—in a rough Church Slavonic translation (no Greek original has been found yet) that, judging from its archaic language and character, was probably made in the ninth century; the present shape of the text, often corrupted and difficult to understand, may however be due to tradition and subsequent copies. The Pachomian influence astutely observed by von Falkenhausen¹³ is an indication that this is one of the very earliest documents in our collection, but should not be overemphasized. Manual labor, absent or at any rate seemingly less important in subsequent documents, still has a place here as it does in the Pachomian, Basilian, and (to a lesser extent) Syriac traditions. Yet features such as the use of wine [4] and the bows accompanying prayers [3] as well as the regulations for liturgical observances ([8] through [10]) demonstrate that, despite the links to Pachomios and Basil, this is a document of a later era.

Notes on the Introduction

1. An eighth-century date seems most likely in view of the chronological framework provided by the history of the island of Pantelleria (see below, Institutional History).
2. For details, see Scalia, “Pantelleria,” pp. 79–81.
3. First proposed by E. Golubinsky, Istoriia russkoi tserkvi, vol. 1 (Moscow, 1901), p. 652; see also Scalia, “Pantelleria,” p. 82, and von Falkenhausen, “Patellaria,” p. 1594, and “Monachesimo,” pp. 153–54 and 157.
4. Canon XV: In Sanctum Basilium Patellariae hegumenum, ed. Acconcia Longo, Canones Iunii, pp. 163–76, with commentary at pp. 375–81; the apparent reference to John’s typikon is at verses 63–64.
5. Scalia, “Pantelleria,” p. 74; there are many variants on the name, including Patallarea, Patelarea, Patalaria, etc.
6. M. Amari, Storia dei Musulmani di Sicilia, vol. 1, 2nd ed. (Catania, 1933), pp. 235, 290, based on Arabic sources.
7. See Jean Gouillard, “La Vie d’Euthyme de Sardes († 831), une oeuvre du patriarche Méthode,” T&M 10 (1987), 1–101, at 5, 17, 25–27.
8. Annales Fuldenses, sive annales regni Francorum orientalis, ed. Fr. Kurze (Hanover, 1891), Anno 807, p. 124.
9. See the Arab historian Ibn al-Athîr, in A. A. Vasiliev, Byzance et les Arabes, vol. 1: La dynastie d’Amorium (820–867) (Brussels, 1935), p. 360; Amari, Storia, p. 437.
10. This also provides a terminus ante quem for the iambic poem in honor of Antiochos of St. Sabas by the otherwise unknown Arsenios, “monk of Pantelleria, who became archdeacon.” See Odorico, “Sanzione,” pp. 11–13 and 16–19 (Greek text and Italian translation).
11. See [1], [5], [6], [7], [8], [10], [11], [13], [14], [15], [17], [20].
12. See [5], [6], [7], [12], [20].
13. See von Falkenhausen, “Patellaria,” ODB, p. 1594, and “Monachesimo,” pp. 155–57; and [6], [7], [8], [11], [13], [14], [17], [18]. For specific Pachomian parallels, see also notes to the translation for these chapters.

Bibliography

- Acconcia Longo, Augusta, Analecta hymnica Graeca e codicibus eruta Italiae inferioris, vol. 10: Canones Iunii (Rome, 1972), pp. 163–76, 375–81.
- Dujčev, Ivan, “Riflessi della religiosità italo-greca nel mondo slavo ortodosso,” in La chiesa greca in Italia dall’VIII al XVI secolo. Atti del Convegno storico interecclesiale (Bari, 30 apr.–4 magg. 1969), vol. 1 (Padua, 1973), pp. 181–212.

EIGHTH CENTURY

Falkenhausen, Vera von, "Patellaria," ODB, p. 1594.

———, "Il monachesimo greco in Sicilia," in La Sicilia rupestre nel contesto delle civiltà mediterranee: Atti del sesto Convegno Internazionale di studio sulla civiltà rupestre medioevale nel Mezzogiorno d'Italia (Catania-Pantalica-Ispica, 7-12 settembre 1981) (Galatina, 1986), pp. 135-74, esp. 152-57.

Odorico, Paolo, "La sanzione del poeta: Antioco di S. Saba e un nuovo carme di Arsenio di Pantelleria," BS 49 (1988), 1-21, esp. 11-13.

Rougeris, Petros, "Ricerca bibliografica sui 'Typika' italogreci," BGGG, n.s., 27 (1973), 11-42, esp. 14.

Scalia, Giuseppe, "Le Kuriate e Pantelleria. Osservazione onomastico-etimologiche," Bulletin Du Cange 43 (1981-82, pub. 1984), 65-100.

Translation

[Note: The translation below is based on Mansvetov's edition of the Ms. Russian State Library, supplemented by sections in pointed brackets based on Dujčev's facsimile of the Bodleian manuscript.]

Rules of the Monastery of Our Holy Father John the Priest, Superior of Pantelleria

From the holy books teaching salvation to all [men]. Whoever has rejected [this world] and has entered the monastic state for the sake of [his] salvation cannot be saved unless he observes [the rules] which I intend to write down [here].

[1.] At the striking of the [sacred] semantron, let [the monks] gather at the porch of the church and go into the church as soon as the elders arrive.¹ Let them all bow together to the cross and start singing the Lord's Prayer as well as perform in the proper order the hymns of either the matins or the vespers or the hours. Let each one stay constantly at the place which becomes his rank and have no permission to move from this place and stay at another one. Should he start acting thus, leaving his own place and staying at another one, let him be shown [his place] once, twice, and thrice. Should he not hearken [in spite of this], let him be expelled from the church congregation.

[2.] Likewise, let [the monks] approach the communion, the meal, and the salutation according to the order² of their status. Again, let them keep the proper order also during the day. Let them recite their prayers three times from the first to the third hour, three or four times from the third to the sixth, two times from the sixth to the ninth, until vespers, and three times during the night.

[3.] Let prayers be recited as follows: after the Lord's Prayer let [the monks] stand a short while and then bow³ nine times, if they are in good health, and each time they stand up again let them lift their hands to God imploring for his grace. {Let them bow three times and lift their hands three times as well.} When they have finished, let them bow three times, and then bow to one another and take leave. (Should they be unable to bow, as it has already been said, nine times, let them bow three times [only], and lift their hands three times as well, and then take leave.) In all it will amount to twelve [times]. This we order to be done in the winter days, but in the summer days let prayers be increased. Thus, when the days are lengthening, let one more prayer be added to each [further] hour.

2. PANTELLERIA

[4.] Once more, whoever seeks salvation and enters the monastic state, should he be physically healthy, [that is] able to do it, let him fast during the day.⁴ Should [he] instead be performing heavy work, let [him] have one fourth [of the regular portion], and a cup of wine before his meal. Whereas, should his body grow thin and look feeble, let him fast on Monday, Wednesday, and Friday [only]. He who is unwilling to comply with these commandments shall not achieve salvation.

[5.] When [the monks] gather in the cells where they sleep or while doing a service, it is unbecoming either to visit each other and sit on the bed or to ask concerning any matter.⁵ Should one's property be forcibly retained by someone else, let him go to the ecclesiastical overseers,⁶ that they repair this wrong [for him]. Should anyone manifestly disregard such rule, and not hearken two or three times to admonitions, let him be expelled from the monastery. Should anyone be seen drawing one of his brothers aside and taking him to his cell to converse with him, let that one be admonished [two or three times], then, if he is unwilling to hearken, let him be stripped of his garb and banished from the monastery. Again, should it be necessary for [one] to talk about any matter, let him stand and talk [to the other] outside the church before the brothers, so that no one may be misled.

[6.] Likewise, whoever is walking with another on a road, and they are seen holding hands or embracing or kissing, should one not hearken to admonitions, let him be expelled from the brotherhood, so that the others may not be corrupted at the sight [of this].⁷

[7.] Let also the monks not ride a beast of burden two of them together, but let each one go and ride in turn.⁸ The same [applies] to both sitting and sleeping.⁹ Whoever shall frequently converse with one, but it is not clear what the conversation is about, let him be liable to the aforesaid punishment.

[8.] When [the monks] get to the choir, should anyone come before [the beginning of] the song, let him enter, recite the prayer, and take his own place. Should anyone become lazy or, for any reason whatsoever, be late and not show up, let him stay outside the church and, as the brethren go out, let him fall down before them and explain the reason why he was not present, so that they come to know [it].¹⁰ Let the superior interrogate him, and if forgiveness is proper, let him forgive. If it is not, let him inflict the punishment. Let this be done for the matins or the vespers or any other service; for which, however, those who have arrived early must wait with the other brethren.

[9.] Should it happen that one is busy for whatever reason, let him join the [singing of the] canon later; and on account of this let the worshipers sing the odes, always in the entirety of their verses, and then start singing the troparia. When the nights are [too] short, let this be done after lunch time <as we have said>. We have also ordered that you, if at all possible, sing the odes in the entirety of their verses along with the troparia, but this is [left] to the authority of the elders. It is certainly always profitable to exert oneself on both the saints' and the Lord's days <in the summer>, but also in the winter¹¹ let us make every effort to sing the odes from the first to the last verse as well as the troparia. The ecclesiastical precept is the following: four kathismata and two lections during the winter, two kathismata and one lection during the summer (as for the lection, [let it be read] as long as the brethren are not judged to be overworked), and further prayers.

EIGHTH CENTURY

[10.] When you are <standing> in the church for the hymnody, listen to what the precentor says and sing [exactly] as he is prescribing. Let no one have power either to change any word or to sing a different hymn. Even if you become aware that the precentor is mistaken, only those who are in the front shall have the right either to change any of the words or to begin a different hymn. All others of you keep [observing] the proper order. Should anyone dare to break the present rule, let him be liable to the punishment of lying face downward. Again, we order to sing in the proper order, according to the habit acquired from deacon John. Let all sing in this way. Should any of you be accustomed to sing differently, we request him to relinquish his habit, and adapt to his brothers', [so that] harmony among the brethren be displayed in this matter.

[11.] As for the collective liturgy, should anyone fail to come [in time] without any reason, communion is not fitting for him. Should he start doing this often, let him be liable to the punishment of lying face downward.¹²

[12.] Rush zealously to the church and even more to the holy liturgy. Do not stay too close to each other. When you bow and recite the prayer, on bowing let each one keep away from the side of his brother and not stand close to him so that when he bows he crowds his brother.

[13.] Again, whenever a superior summons [the brethren] to meals, let [them] all move as [if they were going] to church. Should a few arrive before the others, let them wait a short while for their fellow [monks], and then start reciting the prayer over the food. Let the overseers interrogate anyone who comes late.¹³ Should he have been late because of laziness, let them send him back without food. Should it be Lent or the Christmas fast, let him remain [in this condition] until exactly the same hour of the next day. Should it not be a fast day, let him remain [thus] until evening; then, having obtained forgiveness, let him eat. Should he not repent his fault, let him not eat, for he is abusive of others and on account of this he refuses to humble himself to anyone.

[14.] Whenever the brethren are called to work, let them hasten [to it] as they do to food.¹⁴

[15.] Let the overseers keep the time for prayers and not strike [the semantron] whenever it is time to prostrate before Christ. There shall be two overseers, to announce the proper order of the mysteries, and if the brotherhood perceive that they are lazy, by the end of the day, there where they gather to eat, let it inflict upon them the punishment and say: "As our prayers were not perfect, [similarly] do not eat."

2. PANTELLERIA

[16.] Let it be forbidden to go to any kind of work without asking [permission from] the elders. Let these notify the monks who should leave to go to work and him who, instead, is ordered to sit in his cell while also working for the others, as is proper. Indeed, it is fitting that out of love you <do Christ's> work for one another.

[17.] Should anyone expose his garment outside, and the sun shines on it for three mornings, let him be liable to the appropriate punishment.¹⁵ Let him go himself to ask for punishment, confessing his sin, since he trespassed. Let this be done for any kind of fault, if one wants to be saved. Even if the elders do not come to know [of his sin], he himself must be conscious of both what it is and his desert. Whoever out of laziness does not care to undergo the punishment, may his soul have life!

[18.] Do not whisper among yourselves, since whispering presupposes the sin of theft.¹⁶ But should there be any necessity for conversing, then converse among yourselves in a clear manner, not shouting but with moderate voice. Let no one write any word on paper to another, unless he have a great need [for it], or else it be Lent. All the more so since we have already said to speak out in a clear voice.

[19.] We enjoin you to revere your overseers as [you would revere] God himself. Keep loving and revering not the elders alone, but all of you mutually. As we have said, your souls shall have life, or it will hardly be possible to have life.

[20.] Should a brother declare: "I cannot stay with this brother in the same cell or [sit] at the same table," let him be asked on account of what sin does he do (it).¹⁷ Should he answer [that it is] owing to extreme weakness, lest his brother cause scandal, we exact that an inquiry be made into this matter. Should the latter state: "[Yes], I am causing scandal," and this being the reason why he separates himself from the proper order of the brethren, and [why also he] says: "I wish to sit alone in my cell," let them bring the church priests to him and let him be instructed amidst the brethren. Should he still not hearken, let them take off his monastic garments in front of the church and then expel him from the monastery.¹⁸

[21.] For whoever does not observe all the monastic rules and, at the same time, does not keep and follow the present regulations becomes estranged from the Church. This is what is said in the book, and let this be done! He who loves his neighbor until death shall <be willing to> lay down his own life (for him), and shall serve him and remain¹⁹ with him. He who abides by such rules of our Fathers, and keeps them, shall have life.

Notes on the Translation

1. For use of the semantron, see (4) Stoudios [AB2], [B14], [AB31], [AB33], [AB36]; porch of the church: perhaps the narthex is meant here, cf. (4) Stoudios [AB2].
2. A reference to the performance of the canonical hours (the akolouthia).

EIGHTH CENTURY

3. For bows, see (4) Stoudios [A2], [A6], (22) Evergetis [4], and (29) Kosmosoteira [13].
4. Requiring monks to fast throughout the day is an extraordinary requirement in the context of what is known from our other documents; see Appendix B: The Regulation of Diet in the Byzantine Monastic Foundation Documents, A: General Rules.
5. For the discouragement of fraternization, compare to the regulation found in (4) Stoudios [18]; (7) Latros [11]; (22) Evergetis [9], [21]; (27) Kecharitomene [41], [47]; (29) Kosmosoteira [21]; (30) Phoberos [21], [25], [39], [40]; (32) Mamas [17], [35]; (33) Heliou Bomon [17], [34]; (34) Machairas [63], [113]; (55) Athanasios I [4]; and (58) Menoikeion [8], [17].
6. Slavonic pristavniki; for these overseers, see (4) Stoudios [18], (11) Ath. Rule [17], and (22) Evergetis [31], etc.
7. Vaguely reminiscent of the Pachomian Praecepta [95], ed. A. Boon, Pachomiana Latina (Louvain, 1932), p. 40; trans. A. Veilleux, Pachomian Chronicles (Kalamazoo, Mich., 1981), p. 161: “No one may clasp the hand or anything else of his companion; but whether you are sitting or standing or walking, you shall leave a forearm’s space between you and him.”
8. Cf. Pachomian Praecepta [109], ed. Boon, p. 42; trans. Veilleux, p. 162: “Two men shall not sit together on a bare-backed donkey or on a wagon shaft.”
9. Cf. Pachomian Praecepta [95], ed. Boon, p. 40; trans. Veilleux, p. 161: “Nor shall you sit two together on a mat or a carpet.”
10. Cf. Pachomian Praecepta [17], ed. Boon, p. 17; trans. Veilleux, p. 148: “If anyone is missing when one of the elders is chanting, that is, reading the psalter, he shall at once undergo the order of penance and rebuke before the altar.”
11. That is, on feasts of the Lord.
12. Cf. Pachomian Praecepta [9], ed. Boon, p. 15; trans. Veilleux, p. 146: “. . . anyone who comes after the first prayer shall be punished in the manner described above and shall remain standing in the refectory.”
13. Cf. Pachomian Praecepta [32], ed. Boon, p. 21; trans. Veilleux, p. 150: “If someone comes late to eat, without [being detained by] an order of the superior, he shall likewise do penance, or return to his house without eating;” for later interrogation of latecomers to meals, see (22) Evergetis [31], (27) Kecharitomene [25], (29) Kosmosoteira [37], and (30) Phoberos [48].
14. Cf. Pachomian Praecepta [58], ed. Boon, p. 31; trans. Veilleux, p. 156: “When the signal is given to go to work, the housemaster shall lead them, and no one shall remain in the monastery except by order of the father.”
15. Cf. Pachomian Praecepta [68], cf. [69], ed. Boon, p. 33; trans. Veilleux, p. 157: “They shall not go do laundry unless one signal has sounded for all. They shall follow their housemaster and do the washing in silence and with discipline.”
16. Cf. Pachomian Praecepta [94], ed. Boon, p. 40; trans. Veilleux, p. 161: “No one shall speak to his neighbors in the dark.” For the restriction of (external) written correspondence, see the Basilian Poenae 59, PG 31, col. 1313C, (22) Evergetis [22], (34) Machairas [131], and (45) Neophytos [CB5].
17. A disciplinary problem analogous to that of (22) Evergetis [9], which, however, focuses on arguments over precedence at table.
18. For the ceremony of stripping monastic vestments from an unworthy monk, see (20) Black Mountain [76], [77].
19. Slavonic ljazhet, i.e., be buried.

3. Theodore Studites: Testament of Theodore the Studite for the Monastery of St. John Stoudios in Constantinople

Date: 826¹

Translator: Timothy Miller

Edition employed: PG 99, cols. 1813–24 = J. J. Sirmond, Opera varia, ed. J. de la Baume, vol. 5: Sancti Theodori Studitae Epistolae aliaque scripta dogmatica (Paris, 1696), pp. 80–88.

Manuscript: Parisinus graecus 891 (1136 A.D.)²

Other translations: Latin, by Sirmond, Opera varia, vol. 5, pp. 80–88, reprinted in PG 99, cols. 1814–23; Bulgarian (partial), by I. Goshev, “Pravilata na Studijskija monastir. Vvod, tekst i izjasnenija,” Godishnik na Sofiiskiya Universitet VI. Bogoslovski Fakultet 17 (1939–40), 5–75, with translation at 17–21 and commentary at 21–24.

Institutional History

A. Foundation of the Monastery

The Monastery of St. John the Forerunner Stoudios can be traced back to its foundation by a private benefactor, a certain Stoudios who was consul in 454.³ Mango (“Studius Basilica,” p. 122) has shown that the monastery church (katholikon)—reportedly founded on the site of an earlier parochial church—was built before 454, possibly in 453 or, as recent archaeological evidence suggests, as early as 450.⁴ This church, which survives today as a ruin in Istanbul—the city’s oldest remaining ecclesiastical building of any size—is to be found in the southwestern corner of the old city in the former Psamathia region, near the Golden Gate. The church may have been built, as Mango suggests, in the anticipation of serving as the reliquary for the head of St. John that contemporaries believed had been discovered in 453 in Emesa, though the new foundation did not succeed in gaining this valued relic.

A few years later, perhaps in 460, Stoudios installed a group of the “sleepless monks” (akoimetoï), famous for their continuous liturgical services throughout the entire day, at a monastery attached to the church.⁵ Monks observing this usage continued to staff the monastery down to the end of the eighth century, except perhaps for a decade or more after the iconoclast Emperor Constantine V (741–775) expelled the capital’s iconodule monks in 765.⁶ The names of some of the monastery’s superiors are known, and there are a few incidental historical references, but the monastery did not play an important role in Byzantine ecclesiastical history for the first three hundred years of its existence.⁷

B. Theodore the Studite

The foundation achieved prominence when in 798 or 799 the iconodule Empress Irene summoned our author, Theodore, then director with his uncle Plato of a private family monastery at Sakkoudion in Bithynia, to Constantinople to assume the leadership of the Stoudios monastery, where fewer than ten of the sleepless monks had survived the iconoclast persecution.⁸ The constitutional status of the monastery at this point is obscure. It may well have been seized by the imperial government under Constantine V, which a grant by Irene to Theodore at this time would seem to suggest. In any event, Theodore chose to treat Stoudios as a private foundation, analogous to Sakkoudion—which continued in operation—as well as at least three other monasteries then under his control.⁹ As Kazhdan has noted (“Theodore,” p. 2045), Theodore’s intent, only partially realized, to be sure, was to create “an independent monastic organization able to resist imperial coercion.” Desirable as this goal must have seemed to iconodule patrons, many of whose foundations had been confiscated or even secularized under Iconoclasm, it proved impossible of attainment during Theodore’s lifetime, though the number of monks submitting to his authority is said to have ranged as high as 700–1000, apparently including those resident in the dependent houses (metochia) as well as at Stoudios itself.¹⁰

Theodore was a principled but also a highly contentious personality. He had generally bad relations with most of the Byzantine rulers after Irene. Even the iconodule Emperor Nikephoros I (802–811) was no exception, for he carried out the exile of the Studite leadership to the Princes’ Islands decreed by a church synod in 809 after Theodore refused to be reconciled to Patriarch Nikephoros I (806–815) in the Moechian controversy.¹¹ Dobroklonsky (Prepodobnii Theodor, vol. 1, p. 652) suggested that the resentment by other superiors of the monastic reforms Theodore was promoting (for which see the discussion below in (4) Stoudios, The Studite Monastic Reform) may have been a factor in the Studite superior’s downfall. Theodore was able to maintain a lively correspondence with various individual members of his monastic communities (which had been dispersed by the authorities) throughout this period of exile, which came to an end after the accession of Michael I (811–813).¹²

Theodore was exiled again in 815 after refusing to acquiesce in a revival of Iconoclasm under Emperor Leo V (813–820).¹³ Just before his departure, Theodore divided his monks into small groups and recommended that they disperse so as to avoid governmental pressure. Stoudios was reopened in Theodore’s absence, however, by the renegade monk Leontios, who thenceforth served as the monastery’s superior.¹⁴ Most likely Theodore never regained control of the Stoudios monastery. Finding himself in strict confinement under the watchful eye of the metropolitan of Smyrna from 819 to 821, Theodore wrote a letter in the form of a last testament in 819.¹⁵ Though Theodore was freed and recalled to Constantinople in 821 after Michael II (820–829) became emperor, he was unable to reach an accommodation with the new ruler.¹⁶ Instead, he seems to have gone voluntarily into exile again, probably in 823, first to the peninsula of St. Tryphon near Cape Akritas southeast of the city, and later to Prinkipo in the Princes’ Islands.¹⁷ He died there in November, 826, after having gotten his disciple and chosen successor Naukratios to write down his final Testament, which is translated here.¹⁸

C. Theodore’s Immediate Successors

It is unlikely that Theodore’s successors were able to return to the Stoudios monastery until after the death of the last iconoclast Emperor Theophilos (829–842). Shortly thereafter, the translation of the remains of Theodore and his brother Joseph from their original burial site on Prinkipo to

3. THEODORE STUDITES

Stoudios took place on January 26, 844.¹⁹ True to his teacher's ways, Naukratios (superior, 842–47) quarreled with the new orthodox Patriarch Methodios I (843–47) even though the latter's iconodule credentials were impeccable. Details are available from the hagiographic life of Naukratios' successor Nicholas the Studite (superior, 847–50 and 853–858).²⁰ This source also supplies us with the names of several other Studite superiors of the mid-ninth century as well as a discussion of Nicholas' refusal to accept Photios (858–67) as patriarch, preferring as he did to remain loyal to the deposed Ignatios (847–58).

D. Stoudios as an Imperial Monastery

In the early tenth century, during the final years of the reign of Leo VI (886–912), Stoudios seems to have changed over from its traditional oppositionist posture to being a predictable supporter of imperial authority, whose superiors and other high officials were entrusted by the emperors with many important missions, such as the Studite monk Euthymios whom Emperor John I Tzimiskes (969–976) sent to Mount Athos to adjudicate disciplinary problems, a mission that resulted in the issuance of (12) Tzimiskes (see below, Chapter Two). Also, beginning in 902 when Leo VI expelled Leo Musikos from the palace and had him imprisoned at Stoudios, the monastery came to serve the convenience of the emperors for this purpose as well, down into the 1070s.²¹ In the eleventh century, three former emperors were sent into exile at Stoudios: Michael V Kalaphates in 1042, Isaac I Komnenos in 1059, and Michael VII Doukas in 1078.²² The monastery's ability to supply three patriarchs of Constantinople, Antony III (974–979), Alexios Studites (1025–1043), and Dositheos (1189–1191), also testifies to its intimate connections with the imperial government. Therefore, it appears likely on circumstantial evidence that Stoudios had been an imperial monastery since circa 900, and perhaps considerably earlier.

E. Stoudios in the Last Centuries of the Empire

The monastery was quiescent during the Komnenian era and does not appear to have played an active part in the Evergetian monastic reform movement as it progressed throughout the late eleventh and twelfth centuries. Stoudios lost part of its relics during the Latin conquest of Constantinople in 1204, and was left abandoned in a neighborhood that became a sheep pasture. In 1293, Constantine Palaiologos, a brother of Emperor Andronikos II (1282–1328), restored the monastery by putting a new roof on the church, shoring up its walls, and recruiting new monks.²³ By the late fourteenth century, Stoudios ranked once again as the most honored monastery in Constantinople.²⁴ The monastery and its superiors continued to play an active part in Byzantine history right up to the fall of Constantinople to the Turks in 1453, at which time, however, the monks were likely dispersed and the foundation's thousand-year history as a monastery came to an end.²⁵

F. Conversion of the Church into a Mosque in Ottoman Times

Sultan Beyazid II (1481–1512) granted the buildings on the site to the Albanian Ilyâs (Elias) bey b. Abdullah, his imrahor or "stable-master," who converted the church into a mosque, which has henceforth been known as Imrahor or Mirahor Camii.²⁶ Evidently most of the monastery soon disappeared, since the traveler Peter Gilles found no trace of it during his visit to the site in the mid-sixteenth century. A fire that swept the old Psamatia neighborhood in 1782 damaged the mosque severely, but it was rebuilt in 1820. After an earthquake struck in 1894, the building fell into ruins.

G. Archaeological Evidence from the Site

Although no adequate excavation of the site or survey of the building has ever been completed, the Russian Archaeological Institute in Constantinople under Panchenko cleared the site, excavated a fifth-century crypt under the sanctuary, and made some preliminary observations in 1907–1909.²⁷ A few years later, Ebersolt and Van Millingen both published some plans before another fire damaged the remains further in 1920.²⁸ It has been determined that the monastery must have been located along the south side of the church's atrium, but only a cistern remains from that part of the foundation.²⁹ Old photographs, however, show that there was once a two-columned groin-vaulted chapel of middle or late Byzantine construction located over the corner of the cistern that must have been preserved down to the nineteenth century.³⁰

Analysis

Judging from the large number of provisions it shares with an earlier letter of Theodore's to his disciple Nicholas, Theodore's Testament must be considered a final copy of a work long in gestation.³¹ Therefore it should not be seen as reflecting only the reduced circumstances of the author's confederation of monasteries at the time of his death in 826, when the Stoudios monastery itself had been out of his control for over a decade. It is also just one of several important witnesses to Studite monasticism, for which we have an extraordinary wealth of source material, including the Studite typikon, (4) Stoudios, the next document in our collection.³²

The Testament illustrates the dramatic development of the testamentary format which took place in the two hundred years that had elapsed since the composition of (1) Apa Abraham. Unlike the latter, this testament has a great deal of regulatory content, though it may be considered to fall a little short of the scope of a typikon, even an early example of the genre like (4) Stoudios written for Theodore's own foundation after his death. A profession of orthodox faith heads up the document, a new feature, but one with subsequent parallels (e.g., (7) Latros [1] ff., (10) Eleousa [2], and (49) Geromeri [2] ff.).

Theodore enthusiastically (but vaguely) endorses [13] the patristic "canons and laws," especially those of Basil of Caesarea. There is, however, not much explicitly Basilian content in this document, which is true generally of Theodore's ascetic writings.³³ One readily apparent borrowing, the endorsement of the teaching of catechism [11], appears to have Pachomian roots, perhaps through the mediation of unidentified Palestinian ascetic sources of which our author was especially fond.³⁴

A. Lives of the Monks

The core of this document is made up of a series of injunctions in the style of the "canons" in the Syro-Palestinian tradition. The author directs most of his commandments to the superior; there are only a few general admonitions [25] ff. to the monks. An important theme in the injunctions is the avoidance of sexual temptations. Perhaps this is a recollection of perils that were more immediate when the foundation was being directed from the Stoudios monastery in Constantinople. Theodore is mostly concerned about women in this connection [9], [15], [16], [17], although he also forbids the superior an adolescent disciple [18], and there is a curious prohibition of female domestic animals [5] (to be repeated in (13) Ath. Typikon [31] and elsewhere).³⁵ Maintenance of sexual segregation evidently was difficult, especially in an urban and aristocratic milieu, and Theodore explicitly allows for exceptions [16]. Total segregation (as espoused later by (42) Sabas) was not thought to be practical.

3. THEODORE STUDITES

B. Constitutional Matters

The transmission of the monastery, the principal concern of (1) Apa Abraham, is our author's first concern here too after his profession of faith. Theodore exercises his patronal right to appoint his successor (not named, but known to be his disciple Naukratios). Subsequent superiors were to be chosen by the community, a common arrangement in medieval Byzantium which had the effect of lessening patronal influence after the next generation (cf. the arrangements in (10) Eleousa [16], cf. [11]).

An important theme in Theodore's admonitions to the superior is his concern, shared with the author of (1) Apa Abraham [5], that the superior not permit the monastery's resources to fall into the hands of outsiders; to this he adds the injunction that the superior not misuse the monastery's property for his own use either [3]. This reflects a strengthening of the notion of institutional integrity even within the context of private ownership.

It is important to view this document in the context of its association with a private religious foundation whose claim to independence from state control Theodore had been able to uphold with only partial success during his lifetime. Indeed, he had lost the Stoudios monastery itself, originally a gift from Empress Irene that her successors felt free to revoke twice, in 809 and in 815. In addition to confiscation, secularization was another threat, particularly during the bitter iconoclastic controversy in which Theodore and his monks had generally stood in opposition to imperial policy. Even aside from the extraordinary dangers of the times, for a superior of noble birth, kinship ties posed potential conflicts of interest [8]. The superior is explicitly told not to prefer eminent and powerful persons to the interests of the community [23].

Philosophically, Theodore preferred a consultative to an authoritarian style of rule, if not for himself (which seems doubtful), then at least for his successors. Accordingly, the superior was to supervise [22] the performance of the monks in various offices in conjunction with the "foremost brothers." Generally speaking, he was not to act [24] in any area without consulting with "those who are foremost in knowledge and prudence regarding the issue in question." Theodore even suggests [25] that the community itself is the ultimate source of authority within the institution by virtue of the fact that the monks have assented to the choice of their leader.

C. Financial Matters

Though there is no direct testimony, it would appear that the monastery itself was supported by the income from a landed endowment [4], cf. [21], worked, evidently, by free labor, since both agricultural and personal slaves are explicitly forbidden. Nothing is said about any manual labor engaged in by the monks, though we know from other sources that monks were engaged in agricultural labors at the Studite monasteries outside Constantinople, though not at Stoudios itself.³⁶

The author may have feared to arouse jealousy on account of the monastery's wealth, for modest clothing [19] is recommended for the superior and he is instructed not to flaunt the institution's wealth [20]. The monastery itself is not to store up gold; charitable distributions are enjoined for "sharing abundance" [21]. The superior is also ordered not to administer the monastery's finances personally, but to appoint officials for this task [24]. This separation of administrative and financial responsibilities is part of our author's preference for consultative (as opposed to authoritarian) rule.

D. Subsequent Influence

Overall, then, this is a distinctive document that is very much a product of the preferences and concerns of its time despite the author's stated allegiance to the revival of patristic tradition. It had the good fortune to be associated with the manuscript tradition of Theodore's popular Small Catecheses, with the result that it followed that work into wide circulation, particularly in the twelfth century at the very time that the later Evergetian monastic reform movement was coming to dominate the empire's religious life. Yet its earliest impact on the documents in our collection is to be found on (13) Ath. Typikon in the ninth century, which freely incorporates, generally verbatim, no less than 18 of the 27 chapters into which we have divided Theodore's Testament. While there would be no further literal quotations, such Studite institutions as the mandate [22], [24] for consultative rule and the ban [21] on accumulating cash assets in the monastery would be incorporated in the constitutions of later Byzantine monasteries.

Notes on the Introduction

1. The Testament was prepared shortly before Theodore's death on November 11, 826; see Naucratii confessoris encyclica de obitu sancti Theodori Studitae (BHG 1756), PG 99, cols. 1824–49, at 1844B, cf. Michael the Monk, Vita S. Theodori (Vita B) 66, PG 99, cols. 324D–325A.
2. There are many other witnesses, for the Testament is preserved along with Theodore's popular Small Catecheses; see Leroy, "Petites Catéchèses," p. 337, n. 37.
3. The standard history, though much dated, remains E. Marin, De Studio, supplemented by B. Panchenko, "Ha. Ioannes Studios," IRAIK 14 (1909), 136–52; 15 (1911), 250–57; 16 (1912), 1–359; Alexander Kazhdan et al., "Stoudios Monastery," ODB, pp. 1960–61, provide summary accounts of the history of the monastery.
4. Sources for the foundation are: Anthologia Palatina 1.4, ed. Hugo Stadtmüller (Leipzig, 1894); Suda, ed. Ada Adler, vol. 4 (Leipzig, 1935), p. 438; Theodore Lector, Historia ecclesiastica 384, ed. G. C. Hansen (Berlin, 1971), p. 108; cf. Theophanes, Chronographia, a.m. 463, ed. Karl de Boor, vol. 1 (Leipzig, 1883–85), p. 113. For archaeological evidence from brick stamps, see Urs Peschlow, "Die Johanneskirche des Studios in Istanbul," JÖB 32.4 (1982), 429–34.
5. For the akoimetoï, see General Bibliography, X. Early Constantinopolitan Monasticism.
6. Theophanes, Chronographia a.m. 765, ed. de Boor, pp. 443–45; Frazee, "St. Theodore," p. 31; Janin, Géographie, vol. 3, p. 430.
7. For a list of superiors, see Janin, Géographie, vol. 3, p. 432.
8. Vita B 19–20, PG 99, cols. 257B–260A, and "Theodore of Studium, Laudatio Platonis 32, PG 99, cols. 833D–836A; for the date, which cannot be precisely determined, see Henry, "Theodore," p. 47. Leroy, "Réforme," pp. 202, 205, rejects the traditional view that the move to the capital was motivated by the appearance of Arab raiders in Bithynia as mentioned in Theophanes, Chronographia a.m. 799, ed. de Boor, p. 473.

3. THEODORE STUDITES

9. Leroy, "Réforme," p. 206, nn. 191–93.
10. Vita B 20, PG 99, col. 260C (1000 monks); Theophanes, Chronographia a.m. 806, ed. de Boor, p. 481 (700 monks); rightly qualified by Henry, "Theodore," p. 49, Kazhdan et al., "Stoudios Monastery," p. 1960, and Leroy, "Réforme," p. 206, n. 200.
11. Vita B 27, PG 99, col. 269; Theophanes, Chronographia a.m. 809, ed. de Boor, p. 484; Frazee, "St. Theodore," p. 47; Henry, "Theodore," pp. 64–65.
12. Henry, "Theodore," p. 66, n. 1, based on Dobroklonsky, Prepodobnii Theodor, vol. 1, p. 671, reports 22 surviving letters from this period, with another 180 now lost. Notable among the surviving letters is one edited by R. Devreesse, "Une lettre de s. Théodore Studite relative au synode moechien (809)," AB 68 (1950), 44–57, that was addressed to Basil, superior of the monastery of St. Sabas in Jerusalem. For Theodore's recall to Constantinople, probably in 812 (so Grumel, Regestes, no. 387), see Laud. Plat. 40, PG 99, col. 844C, and Vita B 28, PG 99, cols. 272D–273A, with Henry, "Theodore," p. 68.
13. Vita B 37, PG 99, col. 288B, with Henry, "Theodore," p. 81; Frazee, "St. Theodore," p. 48, and J. Pargoire, "La Bonita de s. Théodore Studite," EO 6 (1903), 207–13.
14. Vita A 40–41, PG 99, cols. 196–97.
15. Ep. 22, ed. Georgios Fatouros, Theodori Studitae epistulae, vol. 1 (Berlin-New York, 1992), pp. 57–62, with Henry, "Theodore," p. 83.
16. Vita B 48, PG 99, col. 304; Frazee, "St. Theodore," p. 49; Henry, "Theodore," pp. 84–87, who at 88, n. 1, following Dobroklonsky, Prepodobnii Theodor, vol. 1, p. 859, n. 5, is surely right to challenge Gardner, Theodore, p. 197, 199, in her assertion that Theodore temporarily regained Stoudios at this time.
17. Frazee, "St. Theodore," p. 49; Henry, "Theodore," p. 88.
18. Naukratios, Encyclica de obitu s. Theodori Studitae, PG 99, cols. 1824–49; Vita B 66, PG 99, 324D–325A; with Frazee, "St. Theodore," p. 49, and Henry, "Theodore," p. 90.
19. See Van der Vorst, "Translation."
20. Vita s. Nicolae Studitae, PG 105, cols. 863–926; for a list of the superiors, see Janin, Géographie, vol. 3, p. 433.
21. For details and references to the sources, see Janin, Géographie vol. 3, p. 437.
22. For details and references, see Janin, Géographie, vol. 3, p. 427, with Kazhdan et al., "Stoudios Monastery," p. 1960.
23. Nikephoros Gregoras, Byzantina historia 6.5, ed. L. Schopen and I. Bekker, CSHB, vol. 1 (Bonn, 1829–55), p. 190; Janin, Géographie, vol. 3, p. 432; Müller-Wiener, Bildlexikon, pp. 149–50.
24. See Darrouzès, Regestes, vol. 1, pt. 6 (Paris, 1979), no. 2714 (March 1381) = MM 2, p. 22, with Janin, Géographie, vol. 3, p. 431, and Kazhdan et al., "Stoudios Monastery," p. 1960.
25. For details and references, see Janin, Géographie, vol. 3, p. 432.
26. Janin, Géographie, vol. 3, p. 432; Müller-Wiener, Bildlexikon, p. 150.
27. Results published in Panchenko, "Ha. Ioannes Studites" see comments by Mathews, Early Churches, pp. 19–20, and Byzantine Churches, p. 143.
28. Ebersolt and Thiers, Églises, pp. 3–18; Van Millingen, Byzantine Churches, pp. 35–61.
29. Mathews, Early Churches, p. 22.
30. Mathews, Byzantine Churches, p. 144.
31. Ep. 10, ed. Fatouros, vol. 1, pp. 31–34, with cross-references to (3) Theodore Studites in the Document Notes below.
32. For a discussion of the other sources for Studite monasticism, see below (4) Stoudios, The Studite Monastic Reform Movement.
33. See Leroy, "Influence," p. 491.
34. See the Pachomian Precepts and Institutes [15], ed. A. Boon, Pachomiana Latina (Louvain, 1932), p. 57, and trans. A. Veilleux, Pachomian Koinonia, vol. 2 (Kalamazoo, Mich., 1981), p. 171; for Theodore's partiality to Palestinian sources, especially Dorotheos of Gaza, see Leroy, "Réforme," pp. 188–90.

NINTH CENTURY

35. See also (12) Tzimiskes [22], [23]; (15) Constantine IX [3].

36. See Leroy, "Réforme," p. 204, with references in nn. 185–86, and "Vie," p. 37, n. 2, cf. p. 39, n. 1.

Biography of the Author

A. Hagiography

Halkin, François, Bibliotheca hagiographica graeca, 3rd ed. (Brussels, 1957), 1754, 1755, 1755d.

Latyshev, B., "Vita S. Theodori Studitae in codice Mosquensi musei Rumianzoviani no. 520," V V 21 (1914), 255–304 (Vita C).

Michael the Monk, Vita S. Theodori (Vita B), PG 99, cols. 233–328.

Vita S. Theodori (Vita A), PG 99, cols. 113–232.

B. Secondary Works

Dobroklonsky, A., Prepodobnii Theodor, ispododnik i igumen Studiiskii, 2 vols. (Odessa, 1913–14).

Fatouros, Georgios, Theodori Studitae epistulae, 2 vols. (Berlin-New York, 1992), with discussion of Theodore's life and work in vol. 1, pp. 3–38.

Frazer, Charles, "St. Theodore of Studios and Ninth Century Monasticism in Constantinople," Studia monastica 23 (1981), 27–58.

Gardner, Alice, Theodore of Studium, His Life and Times (London, 1905).

Hausherr, I., S. Théodore Studite, l'homme et l'ascète (d'après ses catéchèses), OC 6 (1926), 1–87.

Henry, Patrick, "Theodore of Studios: Byzantine Churchman" (Ph.D. diss., Yale University, 1968).

Hermann, Basilius, "Der hl. Abt Theodor, der asketische Meister von Studium und die Studitenmönche," ZAM 4 (1929), 289–312; 5 (1930), 121–46.

———, "Der hl. Abt Theodor von Studium (+ 11. Nov. 826), Erneuerer des basilianischen Mönchtums, im Lichte seiner Schriften," BM 7 (1925), 418–38.

Kazhdan, Alexander, "Theodore of Stoudios," ODB, pp. 2044–45.

Leroy, Julien, "Saint Théodore Studite," in Théologie de la vie monastique (Paris, 1961), pp. 423–36.

Marin, E., St. Théodore Studite (759–826) (Paris, 1906).

Schiwietz, S., De S. Theodoro Studita reformatore monachorum Basilianorum (diss., Breslau, 1896).

Schneider, G. A., Der hl. Theodor von Studion, sein Leben und Wirken (Münster, 1900).

Papadopoulos, Chr., "Ho hagios Theodoros Stoudites en to agoni autou hyper ton hieron eikonon," EEBS 15 (1939), 3–37.

Thomas, C., Theodor von Studion und sein Zeitalter (Leipzig, 1892).

Bibliography

Beck, Hans-Georg, Kirche und Theologische Literatur im Byzantinischen Reich (Munich, 1959), pp. 491–95, esp. 494.

Ebersolt, J., and Thiers, A., Les églises de Constantinople (Paris, 1913), pp. 3–18.

Hermann, Basilius, "Eucharistische Sitten im Leben des Hl. Theodor Studites," Liturgie und Kunst 4 (1923), 76–80.

Janin, Raymond, La géographie ecclésiastique de l'empire byzantin, vol. 3: Les églises et les monastères [de Constantinople], 2nd ed. (Paris, 1969), pp. 430–40.

Kazhdan, Alexander, Talbot, Alice-Mary, and Cutler, Anthony, "Stoudios Monastery," ODB, pp. 1960–61.

Leroy, Julien, "L'influence de saint Basile sur la réforme studite d'après les Catéchèses," Irénikon 52 (1979), 491–506.

———, "Les Petites Catéchèses de s. Théodore Studite," Le Muséon 71 (1958), 329–58.

———, "La réforme studite," OCA 153 (1958), 181–214.

———, "Un témoin ancien des Petites Catéchèses de Théodore Studite," Scriptorium 15 (1961), 36–60.

3. THEODORE STUDITES

- , “La vie quotidienne du moine studite,” Irénikon 27 (1954), 21–50.
- Mango, Cyril, “The Date of the Studius Basilica at Istanbul,” B&MGS 4 (1978), 115–22.
- Marin, E., De Studio, coenobio Constantinopolitano (Paris, 1897).
- Mathews, Thomas, The Byzantine Churches of Istanbul: A Photographic Survey (University Park, Pa., 1976), pp. 143–58.
- , The Early Churches of Constantinople: Architecture and Liturgy (University Park, Pa., 1971), pp. 19–27.
- Müller-Wiener, Wolfgang, Bildlexikon zur Topographie Istanbuls (Tübingen, 1977), pp. 147–52.
- Panchenko, B., “Ha. Ioannes Studios,” IRAIK 14 (1909), 136–52; 15 (1911), 250–7; 16 (1912), 1–359.
- Pargoire, Jules, “Une loi monastique de St. Platon,” BZ 8 (1899), 98–101.
- Van Millingen, A., Byzantine Churches in Constantinople, Their History and Architecture (London, 1912), pp. 35–61.
- Vorst, Ch. Van de, “La Petite Catéchèse de St. Théodore Studite,” AB 33 (1914), 31–51.
- , “La translation de S. Théodore Studite et de S. Joseph de Thessalonique,” AB 32 (1913), 27–62.
- Werner, E., “Die Krise im Verhältnis von Staat und Kirche in Byzanz: Theodor von Studion,” Berliner byzantinische Arbeiten 5 (1957), 113–33.

Translation

The Testament of our father, the holy, inspired confessor Theodore, the Studite superior, which was read aloud before his final repose.

[Preface]

Since this wretched body of mine has fallen into a constant state of ill health and I am unable to summon all of you—my sons, brothers, and fathers—at the time of my departure because the monasteries are located in diverse places and especially because some of you have journeyed afar on business, I have heeded the words of the sacred David, “I prepared myself and was not terrified” (Ps. 118 [119]:60); and again, “My heart is ready” (Ps. 56 [57]:7). Since the hour of my passing out of this life has already arrived, I have hastened to draw up this Testament beforehand. I thought that this was a fitting and sure method for you to hear my final utterance and discern exactly what I believe and think, and what sort of person I leave as a superior to succeed me so that you might thus enjoy harmony and peace in Christ—that peace which the Lord left to his holy disciples and apostles as he was about to return to the heavens.

Concerning Faith¹

Therefore, I believe in the Father and the Son and the Holy Spirit—the holy and consubstantial and primal Trinity, [in whose name] I was baptized and regenerated and perfected. I confess God the Father, God the Son and God the Holy Spirit—the three are one with respect to divinity just as conversely the one is three with respect to individual persons. For the Trinity is one God according to substance although it is divided by the distinction of persons. I also confess that one of the Trinity, our Lord Jesus Christ, came into the flesh out of immeasurable charity, that is to say for the salvation of our race, having assumed the flesh from the holy and blameless Mother of God.

NINTH CENTURY

He was born of her womb in accordance with the law of nature save for human procreation as the divine prophecy had foretold. This same Christ is dual [in nature], whole and complete in his divinity so that that which he was suffered no change, and whole and complete in his humanity so that that which he assumed lacked nothing. The same Christ is one in person as he is made manifest in two natures. So also he is manifest in two wills and two energies through which he acted in accordance with both things divine and things human. [col. 1816]

In addition, I follow the six holy and ecumenical councils and reject every error of heretical association. I also follow the Second Council of Nicaea which was recently assembled against the accusers of Christ. I accept and revere the sacred and holy images of our Lord Jesus Christ, of the Mother of God, of the apostles, prophets, martyrs, and of all the holy and just. Moreover, I ask for their undefiled intercessions to propitiate the Godhead. With faith and awe I embrace their all-holy relics as full of divine grace.

I also accept every God-inspired book of the Old and New Testaments as well as the biographies and divine writings of all the holy fathers, teachers, and ascetics. I say this on account of the crazed Pamphilos who has come from the East attacking these holy people—I mean Mark, Isaiah, Barsanouphios, Dorotheos, and Hesychios²—but not the Barsanouphios, Isaiah, and Dorotheos who belonged to the fellowship of the headless ones³ and had the same number of horns as did the ten-horned one,⁴ for these men were anathematized by the saintly Sophronios in his booklet.⁵ These last individuals are obviously different from those aforementioned men whom I accept as part of the patristic tradition after having questioned the patriarch Tarasios,⁶ who recently held the office of bishop [of Constantinople], and other trustworthy men, both natives and Easterners. Moreover, the image of Barsanouphios was placed on the sacred altar covering of the Great Church together with the holy fathers, Antony, Ephraem, and others.⁷ Also, I have found no impiety in their teachings, but on the contrary, much of spiritual assistance. I will accept them until some charge against them has been proven by a synodal inquiry. For, if these very men should appear worthy of anathema or others whom they have led to heresy, may they be anathematized and cursed, totally anathematized from the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit.

In addition, I acknowledge that the monastic life is lofty and exalted, even angelic, pure of every sin on account of its perfect way of life. It is clear that the monastic life must be ordered according to the ascetic rules of the holy Basil the Great and not by half measures so that some in one place choose some rules and let others go. For, one cannot choose to lead this life lawfully in some other fashion without the three revealed orders of the divine ladder.⁸ Nor is it possible to own a slave or a domesticated animal of the female sex because this would be alien to the religious profession and dangerous to souls.⁹ I have treated such things cursorily since there is not time to explain them fully, but only to prevent some from holding an inferior opinion of me contrary to what I truly think and believe. [col. 1817]

Concerning the Superior

Having treated of these points in this way, I shall speak in second place about the superior. Now as the first one I leave the lord, my father as well as yours, the most holy recluse and father who is both a luminary and a teacher. This man has been set before both you and me in the Lord and is established as the head even though he has removed himself to perfect his humility in solitude by imitating Christ. Through his directions and prayer I trust that you will be saved, if indeed on your part you show him attentive and ready obedience. Thereafter, elect someone by a common vote in a godly fashion and in the manner which the fathers have established, for my desire is to support whomever the community finds suitable.

3. THEODORE STUDITES

But now, my father and brother, whoever you are, before God and his chosen angels I entrust all the community in Christ to you so that you may receive it. But, how should you accept? In what grand manner should you guide them? In what fashion should you guard them? As the lambs of Christ! As your own dear limbs! Cherish and respect them, loving each one of them with an equal measure of charity since each man cherishes the limbs of his body equally.¹⁰ Open your heart in sympathy, welcome them all in mercy. Nurse them, reform them, make them perfect in the Lord. Sharpen your understanding with prudence; rouse your will with courage; make your heart steadfast in faith and hope. Lead them forward in every good work. Defend them against spiritual enemies. Shield them, regulate them. Introduce them to the place of virtue. Distribute shares in the land of tranquility. Therefore, I give you these rules which of necessity you ought to uphold.

Rules for the Superior

1. Therefore, save for grave necessity, you shall not alter at all the constitution and rule which you have received from my lowliness.
2. You shall not possess anything of this world nor store up anything for yourself as your own, not even one piece of silver.
3. You shall not divide your soul and heart by attachments and cares other than for those whom God has entrusted to you and I have handed over, those who have become your spiritual sons and brothers. You shall not use the things of your monastery for those who were at one time yours according to the flesh—either for your relatives or friends or associates. Neither in life nor after death shall you do this for these aforementioned people—neither according to the requirements of charity nor the rules of heredity. For you are not from those of the world so that you have to share with those of the world. But if some should cross over from the life of society to our order, then you should take thought for them in imitation of the holy fathers.
4. You shall not possess a slave either for your own use or for your monastery or for the fields since man was created in the image of God. This institution has been allowed only to those in worldly life just as marriage is. It is necessary for you rather to dedicate yourself spiritually as a slave to your brothers of the same spirit, [col. 1820] even though when appearing in public you are reckoned their lord and teacher.
5. For necessary duties you shall not have an animal from among those of the female race since you have renounced completely the female sex. You shall not have one either in the monastery or in the fields as no one of our holy fathers did nor does nature herself allow it.
6. You shall not ride on horses or mules when not necessary; rather you shall travel by foot in imitation of Christ. If it should be necessary, however, let your beast of burden be a colt.

NINTH CENTURY

7. You shall always be vigilant that all things in the community be held in common and be indivisible and that nothing be owned on the part of any individual, not even a needle. Your body and your soul, nothing else, should be divided up for all your spiritual children and brothers in the impartiality of love.

8. As a fugitive from the world and from marriage, you should have no part of adopting those of the world as brothers or engaging in spiritual relationships¹¹ with them since such practices are not found in the fathers, or if they have been found, then only rarely so that they do not constitute a law.

9. You shall not dine with women other than your mother according to the flesh and your sister, whether these be women in religious life or lay persons. I do not permit this unless some pressure or necessity should require it as the holy fathers warn.

10. You should not go out frequently or roam about unnecessarily, leaving your own flock. For, it is desirable that you have time to spend with the flock and be able to save these sheep endowed with reason, but most wily and given to straying.

11. You shall always be on your guard to teach catechism three times a week in the evening either by your own agency or through another of your children since this is the salutary tradition of the fathers.

12. You should not grant what they call the little habit and after that the great one, for the habit like baptism is one according to the usages of the fathers.

13. You should not transgress the laws and canons of the holy fathers, above all those of the holy and great Basil. Whatever you do or say, you should do it in accord with the testimony of the Scriptures or of patristic custom without violating the command of God.

14. You shall not leave your flock and transfer to another one or return to an office without the approval of your own community.

15. You shall not have a friendship with a woman in religious life nor enter into a women's monastery. Nor shall you speak alone with a nun or a woman of the world unless necessity at some time compels you and then with two persons from either party present since one person is easily influenced as they say.

16. You shall not open the door of the monastery for any woman at all to enter unless it is absolutely necessary. If you are able to meet discreetly, this opportunity should not be rejected.

17. You shall not make for yourself a lodging or a secular house for your spiritual children in which there are women and go there frequently. [col. 1821] Rather you shall choose to attend to your temporary and essential needs at the home of pious men.

18. You shall not have an adolescent disciple in your cell out of affection, but you shall be served by various brothers and by a person above suspicion.

3. THEODORE STUDITES

19. You shall not possess very distinctive and expensive clothing besides the priestly vestments. Rather, you shall put on humble clothes and shoes in imitation of the fathers.

20. You shall not spend lavishly either for your own lifestyle or for the reception of guests. This will distract you since it belongs to a life devoted to pleasure.

21. You shall not store up gold in your monastery, but you should share your abundance of whatever sort with those in need at the portal of your court as the holy fathers did.

22. You shall not take charge of the treasury room nor assume the cares of stewardship, but let your key be the greatest care of souls, of loosing and binding according to the Scriptures (cf. Matt. 16:19). You shall entrust the gold and other necessities to the stewards, the cellarers, and as seems appropriate to each service, all under your manifest authority. Together with the foremost brothers, you can take an account of each administration and transfer the offices to whichever person you decide.

23. You shall not place the person of any other man, eminent and powerful according to the present age, ahead of that which benefits the community. Nor shall you shrink from laying down your life even to the point of bloodshed in guarding these godly laws and commands.

24. You shall not make or do anything according to your own opinion whether regarding a spiritual or a physical matter of any kind. First, you should not act without the advice and prayer of your lord and father; second, without the advice of those who are foremost in knowledge and prudence regarding the issue in question. For there is need of one advisor or perhaps two, three, or more as the fathers have instructed us and as we have discussed in detail.

All these commands and whatever else you have received, you shall guard and observe that you may do well and prosper in the Lord. Far be it from [me] to say or even think of the opposite.

Rules for the Brothers

[25.] Now it is time for you, my children and brothers, to hear my most pitiful voice. Accept the lord your superior as you all selected him.¹² It is not possible for anyone in any way to choose any other life for himself other than that which is laid down. This is a bond of the Lord. Looking upon him with respect and honor, embrace him as my successor. Just as you did with me, so with him too observe the rule of obedience and do not think less of him because he has been recently appointed in the Lord. Nor should you expect anything more than the gifts which were given to him by the Holy Spirit. It is sufficient that he maintain that which was laid down by my humility. Love me, my children, and keep my commandments (cf. John 14:15). Keep peace among yourselves, [col. 1824] and marching in a heavenly fashion, preserve your angelic profession inviolate.

[26.] Hating the world, do not return to the works of the world. Having been loosed from the bonds of physical attachments, do not be bound again to the affections of the flesh. Having denied all pleasures and perishable things of the present life, do not depart from your struggle with obedience through negligence and become the sport of demons.

NINTH CENTURY

[27.] Stick to the race of obedience until the end so that you will “obtain the unfading crown of righteousness” (cf. I Pet. 5:4 and II Tim. 4:8). Led by humility, you should always deny your own will and pattern yourselves only after the judgments of your superior. If you keep in mind these things and if you should guard them to the end, you will be blessed. For the chorus of martyrs will receive you. Wearing crowns in the kingdom of heaven, you will enjoy the eternal blessings.

Epilogue

So farewell now, my children. I set out on a journey with no return, a journey which all those of old have traveled and on which you will set out in a short while after carrying out the duties of life. I do not know, my brothers, where I am going or what judgment awaits me or which place will receive me. For I have not completed a single good work before God. Rather I am responsible for every sin. But still, I rejoice and am glad that I am going from the world to heaven, from darkness to light, from slavery to freedom, from temporary lodging to true abode, from strange and alien lands—for I am a sojourner and a stranger as all my fathers were (cf. Ps. 38 [39]:12)—to my very own country. Still more boldly I will declare that I return to my Master, to my Lord and my God whom my spirit has loved, whom I have acknowledged as Father, even if I have not served him as a son. I have possessed him before all else, even if I have not served him as a noble slave. Raving, I have spoken these things, but I have said them for you so that you will take heart and pray for my salvation. If I achieve it, see, I give you my word before the truth that I will not be silent, but shall boldly beseech my Lord and Master for you all that you shall flourish, be saved, and multiply. I expect to see, receive, and embrace each and every one of you as you depart from the world. For I have such faith that, since you have observed his commands, his goodness just as he did here will also preserve you in the coming age for the same purpose: to sing the praises of his all-holy power. My children, remember my humble words. Keep the advice I have given in Christ Jesus our Lord in whom is glory and power forever and ever, Amen.

Being sixty-seven years old, our all-holy father and great confessor Theodore went to sleep in the month of November, the eleventh day, a Sunday, at the sixth hour, the fifth indiction, the year 6335 [A.M., = 826 A.D.].

Notes on the Translation

1. For an analysis of Theodore’s profession of faith and a discussion of the historical circumstances that promoted it, see Henry, “Theodore,” p. 173, n. 1.
2. Mark the Hermit: pupil of John Chrysostom, opponent of Nestorianism, and superior of a monastery at Ankyra in Galatia, who died sometime after 430; Isaiah: probably Isaiah of Skete or Gaza, fifth-century Egyptian monk who, Henry, “Theodore,” p. 173, n. 1, believes is identical with the Monophysite of this name condemned below; Barsanouphios: hermit who lived in the lavra of Seridos at Gaza, circa 540, and author of a collection of spiritual letters, for whom see Beck, KTL 395, and S. Vaillhé, “Les lettres spirituelles de Jean et de Barsanuphe,” EO 7 (1904), 268–76; Dorotheos of Gaza, pupil of Barsanouphios, superior of a cenobitic Palestinian monastery, and author, circa 540–60, of ascetic treatises that influenced Theodore the Studite, for whom see Beck, KTL, p. 396; Hesychios, perhaps

3. THEODORE STUDITES

- Hesychios of Jerusalem: for whom see B. Baldwin, "Hesychios of Jerusalem," ODB, p. 924. Some of the individuals cited here were important sources for the doctrine and institutions of the Studite monastic reform (see below, (4) Stoudios, The Studite Monastic Reform, C. The Sources of Theodore's Reform Program). Their accuser, Pamphilos, is probably to be identified with the 6th century presbyter, Pamphilos of Jerusalem, author of a tract against the Monophysites. See Beck, KTL, p. 379
3. Barsanouphios: Monophysite bishop of the sixth century condemned by Sophronios, for whom see Beck, KTL, p. 395; Isaiah, moderate Monophysite of the fifth century and author of ascetic tracts, for whom see L. Petit, "2. Isaïe," in DTC, vol. 8, pt. 1, cols. 79–81; Dorotheos: a sixth-century Monophysite bishop; akephaloi, the "headless ones," a name for the extreme Monophysites who refused to accept the Henotikon issued by Emperor Zeno (474–491) in 482.
 4. dekakeratos: derisive epithet of Monophysites. See Lampe, PGL, s.v.
 5. Patriarch of Jerusalem (634–638); the reference is to his letter to Patriarch Sergios (610–638) of Constantinople, ed. PG 87.3, cols. 3148A–3200C, that was read out during the Sixth Ecumenical Council at Constantinople in 681; see Henry, "Theodore," p. 173, n. 1.
 6. Patriarch of Constantinople (784–806).
 7. Antony: Egyptian monk († 356), recognized as the founder of anchoritic monasticism; Ephraem: Ephraem Syrus († 373), Syriac monk, regarded as the founder of Syriac monasticism.
 8. John Klimakos, Scala paradisi, PG, 88, cols. 632A–672B: renunciation (apotage biou), freedom from desire (aprosatheia), and solitude (xeniteia).
 9. See below, [5].
 10. For the anatomical analogy, drawn from Pseudo-Basil, Constitutiones asceticae, PG 31, cols. 1381B, 1396B, 1417BD, etc., see Leroy, "Réforme," p. 199.
 11. The reference is to adelphopoiia (the adoption of a brother or sister for reasons of mutual support) and synteknia (baptismal sponsorship). On these spiritual relationships and the obligations and legal impediments they created, see R. S. Macrides, "Adelphopoiia," ODB, 19–20; eadem, "Godparent," ODB, p. 858.
 12. Naukratios, Theodore's designated successor.

Document Notes

- [1] Inalterability of the constitution (typos) and rule (kanon). Ep. 10, ed. Fatouros, vol. 1, p. 31, lines 4–6, is similar. Copied later by (13) Ath. Typikon [30].
- [2] Ban on personal possessions. Ep. 10, ed. Fatouros, vol. 1, p. 31, lines 6–7, is similar. Copied later by (13) Ath. Typikon [30].
- [3] Prohibition on use of monastic property for friends or relatives. Ep. 10, ed. Fatouros, vol. 1, pp. 31–32, lines 7–16, is similar. Copied later by (13) Ath. Typikon [30].
- [4] Ban on personal or agricultural slaves. Ep. 10, ed. Fatouros, vol. 1, p. 32, lines 16–21, is similar. This is probably a feature of Theodore's reform program intended to return monasticism to the economic self-sufficiency more common in monasteries of late antiquity; possibly anticipated by his uncle Plato at the Sakkoudion monastery. See discussion by Leroy, "Réforme," pp. 191–92, with Pargoire, "Loi monastique." Copied later by (13) Ath. Typikon [31].
- [5] Ban on female domestic animals. Ep. 10, ed. Fatouros, vol. 1, p. 32, lines 21–24, is identical. See discussion by Pargoire, "Loi monastique," and Leroy, "Réforme," pp. 191–92. Leroy believes this is not moral legislation but an attempt to curtail cattle breeding and the attendant commercial activity to which that might give rise. This seems to have been the motivation for related legislation in (12) Tzimiskes [22], [23] and in (15) Constantine IX [3], but see (45) Neophytos [19] where the identical prohibition is motivated by fears of bestiality. Copied later by (13) Ath. Typikon [31].
- [6] Ban on the use of horses or mules. Ep. 10, ed. Fatouros, vol. 1, p. 32, lines 24–26, is similar. See subsequent related provisions in (12) Tzimiskes [22], (13) Ath. Typikon [31], and (15) Constantine IX [3]

NINTH CENTURY

- [7] Communal ownership of property. Ep. 10, ed. Fatouros, vol. 1, p. 32, lines 26–33, is similar. Copied later by (13) Ath. Typikon [32].
- [8] Ban on adoptions and spiritual relationships with lay people. Ep. 10, ed. Fatouros, vol. 1, p. 32, lines 33–36, is identical. Copied later by (13) Ath. Typikon [32]; alluded to later by (26) Luke of Messina [3].
- [9] Ban on dining with women. Ep. 10, ed. Fatouros, vol. 1, p. 32, lines 37–39, is similar. See also [15] and [16] below. Alluded to later by (26) Luke of Messina [3].
- [10] Condemnation of frequent and unnecessary absences. Ep. 10, ed. Fatouros, vol. 1, pp. 32–33, lines 40–43, is similar. Copied later by (13) Ath. Typikon [33].
- [11] Teaching of catechism. Ep. 10, ed. Fatouros, vol. 1, p. 33, lines 44–46, is similar. See provision for catechetical instruction in (4) Stoudios [B16], [21], [36], with Leroy, “Petites Catéchèses,” p. 335. Vita B, PG 99, col. 264A, identifies the tracts read as being from the Small Catecheses.
- [12] Rejection of distinctions in monastic dress. Ep. 10, ed. Fatouros, vol. 1, p. 33, lines 47–49, is similar. By the time (4) Stoudios [A2] was drawn up by Theodore’s successors, the distinctions had become accepted. See discussion of this issue in (9) Galesios [130] and (36) Blemmydes [9].
- [13] Endorsement of patristic laws (nomoi) and canons (kanones). Ep. 10, ed. Fatouros, vol. 1, p. 33, lines 50–53, is similar. See discussion of Theodore’s respect for patristic precedent in Leroy, “Réforme,” pp. 187–90, with a partial list of patristic sources utilized at p. 188, n. 58; for an inventory of Theodore’s Basilian citations, see “Influence,” p. 495. The Basilian reference here is probably to Pseudo-Basil, Poenae, PG 31, cols. 1305–20.
- [14] Requirement of community approval before the superior can transfer to another office. Ep. 10, ed. Fatouros, vol. 1, p. 33, lines 54–55, is similar. Copied later by (13) Ath. Typikon [34].
- [15] Ban on relations with nuns or private conversations with any women. Ep. 10, ed. Fatouros, vol. 1, p. 33, lines 56–59, is identical. See also [9] above; for a later discussion of this problem, see (26) Luke of Messina [3].
- [16] No access by women to the monastery. Ep. 10, ed. Fatouros, vol. 1, p. 33, lines 60–62, is similar. This principle is adopted later by (22) Evergetis [39] and related documents.
- [17] Ban on frequenting inns or private residences frequented by women. Ep. 10, ed. Fatouros, vol. 1, p. 33, lines 63–66, is identical. Copied later by (13) Ath. Typikon [34].
- [18] Ban on adolescent disciples. Ep. 10, ed. Fatouros, vol. 1, pp. 33–34, lines 67–69, is identical. Copied later by (13) Ath. Typikon [34].
- [19] Recommendation of humble clothing. Ep. 10, ed. Fatouros, vol. 1, p. 34, lines 70–71, is identical. For Theodore’s views, see Leroy, “Réforme,” p. 192, with references to our author’s other writings. Copied later by (13) Ath. Typikon [33].
- [20] Ban on lavish personal spending and entertainment by the superior. Ep. 10, ed. Fatouros, vol. 1, p. 34, lines 72–74, is similar. Copied later by (13) Ath. Typikon [33].
- [21] Ban on accumulating cash assets. Ep. 10, ed. Fatouros, vol. 1, p. 34, lines 75–77, is similar. Compare to contrary provisions in (23) Pakourianos [26] in the eleventh century and (27) Kecharitomene [24] and (29) Kosmosoteira [94] in the twelfth; in the late thirteenth century, however, (37) Auxentios [9] returns to the Studite practice.
- [22] Superior not to administer finances directly. See also [24] below. Ep. 10, ed. Fatouros, vol. 1, p. 34, lines 77–83, is similar. Copied later by (13) Ath. Typikon [32]; a possible influence on other later documents, e.g., (32) Mamas [48] and (33) Heliou Bomon [48]. Similarly, the governing role accorded to the “foremost brothers” is adopted in (22) Evergetis [13], [14] and documents following it closely like (30) Phoberos [35], [38], and (29) Kosmosoteira [34], [35]. Collaborative rule would become even more common in late Byzantine monasteries (see below, Chapter Nine).
- [23] Interests of outsiders not to be preferred to those of the community. Not in Ep. 10, ed. Fatouros. Copied later by (13) Ath. Typikon [35]. See subsequent discussions in (22) Evergetis [18] and related documents.
- [24] Recommendation of consultative rule. Ep. 10, ed. Fatouros, vol. 1, p. 34, lines 83–90, is similar. See also [22] above.

3. THEODORE STUDITES

[25] – [27] Rules for the brothers. Copied later by (13) Ath. Typikon [56]. See discussion by Leroy, “Influence,” p. 505, of the importance of obedience (hypotage) to Theodore’s conception of monasticism.

4. Stoudios: Rule of the Monastery of St. John Stoudios in Constantinople

Date: after 842¹

Translator: Timothy Miller

Editions employed: First recension [A]: Aleksei Dmitrievsky, Opisanie liturgicheskikh rykopisei, vol. 1: Typika, pt. 1 (Kiev, 1895), pp. 224–38. Second recension [B]: Angelo Mai and J. Cozza-Luzi, Nova patrum bibliotheca, vol. 5 (Rome, 1849), pp. 111–25, reprinted in PG 99, cols. 1704–20.

Manuscripts: [A] Codex Vatopedi 322 (956) (13th–14th c.); [B] Codex Vaticanus graecus 2029, fols. 179–85 (9th–10th c.).²

Other translations: Latin, by Mai and Cozza-Luzi, NPB, vol. 5, pp. 111–25, reprinted in PG 99, cols. 1704–20. Bulgarian, by Ivan Goshev, “Pravilata na Studijskija monastir,” Godishnik na Sofiiskiia Universitet VI. Bogoslovski Fakultet 17 (1939–40), pp. 27–37, with commentary at 37–44.

The Studite Monastic Reform

The present document and the preceding (3) Theodore Studites provide only a very incomplete and—to some extent—misleading picture of Studite monasticism. Moreover, the monastic reform launched by Theodore the Studite was to dominate Byzantine monasticism until a new monastic reform, typified by (22) Evergetis, swept its usages away in the course of the twelfth century except in peripheral areas like Southern Italy, Sicily, and Cyprus. Since among the other documents in our collection only (11) Ath. Rule and (13) Ath. Typikon can be said to stand directly in the Studite tradition, it seems useful to discuss briefly various aspects of the Studite reform as background to both those documents and (4) Stoudios as presented here.

A. Additional Sources for the Study of the Studite Reform

1. Hagiographic Sources

Theodore the Studite is probably the best documented of the authors of our documents. Four hagiographic lives have been preserved.³ As Kazhdan (“Theodore of Stoudios,” ODB, p. 2045) observes, these are unusual for their genre in eschewing accounts of miracles and for portraying (accurately) Theodore as a politician and administrator. We have, therefore, very useful information on Theodore’s personal role in creating his monastic confederation seen against the background of his generally hostile contemporaries. Vita B, the earliest Life, is by Michael the Monk, a Studite who most likely did not know Theodore personally (Leroy, “Petites Catéchèses,” p. 334), but was acquainted with those who did, like the later superior Nicholas the Studite. Michael’s Life was probably written after the latter’s death in 868. The anonymous Vita A appears to be a tenth-century embellishment of Michael’s Life, while Vita C, later still, conflates the accounts found in its two predecessors. The claim of Vita D, contained in an unedited manuscript in Mainz, to being an independent witness to Theodore's life is unproven.⁴ Two associated texts, the Encyclical Letter of Theodore's successor Naukratios and the anonymous account of the translation of Theodore's relics to the Stoudios monastery in 844, provide important information on the composition of (3) Theodore Studites and the canonization of its author, respectively.⁵

4. STODIOS

2. Theodore's Own Works

Theodore's own substantial body of writings is even more important to our understanding of the Studite monastic reform. His Eulogy of his uncle Plato, founder of the first family monastery at Sakkoudion circa 780, is useful for the question of what Studite customs might have originated at that institution.⁶ Some 556 letters, now available for the first time in a much-needed modern edition, have also survived.⁷ These show how their author utilized his personal correspondence to hold the support of influential backers both in ecclesiastical ranks and among the laity as well as to keep a sense of brotherhood alive among his monks when they suffered dispersion during their leader's several exiles. Theodore also wrote many hundreds of catechetical lessons on ascetic subjects that were gathered into two collections. The Great Catecheses, made up of three books, are presently only partially edited.⁸ They appear to provide the most important testimony on the actual customs of Studite monasticism in Theodore's own lifetime; some date back to the original foundation at Sakkoudion. According to Leroy ("Petites Catéchèses," p. 336), they were not originally intended for publication, and at any rate are much rarer in manuscript than the more widely disseminated Small Catecheses, of which 160 witnesses (so Leroy, "Vie," p. 24, n. 1) are known. These latter are a complete collection of 134 items, apparently assembled for liturgical purposes.⁹ Van de Vorst ("Petite Catéchèse," pp. 31–41) fixed their composition to the years 821–26, that is, at the end of Theodore's life during his voluntary exile from Constantinople. Both collections need to be examined carefully before Studite monasticism can be reasonably well understood. Leroy maintained, however, that the customary provisions of the Catecheses were consonant with the content of the later Studite typikon, our (4) Stoudios Vers. [B] as reproduced below.¹⁰

The authenticity of the Penitentials traditionally attributed to Theodore has been questioned,¹¹ but Leroy ("Réforme," p. 210) maintained that a reading of the Catecheses indicates the existence of a penitential during Theodore's lifetime. One of the Penitentials features punishments particular to the anticipated offenses of the incumbents of various offices, which finds a parallel in another of Theodore's works, his Iambics, many of which take the form of generic exhortations of monastic officials.¹² Finally, there are some Hymns attributed to Theodore that are occasionally useful for aspects of the Studite monastic reform.¹³

B. Principles of the Studite Reform

1. Revival of Cenobitic Monasticism

Broadly stated, the aim of Theodore's monastic reform was to revive cenobitic monasticism as it had been practiced in late antiquity, a goal that he thought could be mapped out by a close study of the relevant literary texts (Leroy, "Réforme," p. 187). Reviving the prestige of cenobiticism was a difficult undertaking, since Byzantine monasticism traditionally honored the solitary life as the pinnacle of personal pietistic achievement, even within the context of a cenobitic institution.¹⁴

Moreover, the most prestigious monasteries of Theodore's own day, the Bithynian monasteries on Mount Olympos, also saw cenobitic life as a preparation, for the select few to be sure, for a solitary life.¹⁵ But Theodore claims that it was his uncle Plato, who himself lived the life of a solitary as superior of Sakkoudion, itself a Bithynian monastery, who instituted the first components of what later became the Studite monastic reform, specifically the bans on slaves and female animals that turn up later in (3) Theodore Studites [4], [5].¹⁶ These basic elements of the reform were important for reviving the practice of manual labor by the monks themselves and—by virtue of making cattle breeding impossible—removing them from what was thought to be unnecessary commercial activity. Michael the Monk more plausibly attributes these bans to Theodore himself rather than his uncle Plato, although we learn from Theodore's Great Catecheses that his monks still possessed slaves as well as female animals even after the relocation to Stoudios in Constantinople.¹⁷ This suggests that these particular reforms cannot have been successfully implemented until the early years of the ninth century, if then.

2. Manual Labor

There is no question that Theodore, readily perceiving the importance of manual labor in his patristic sources, was an advocate of hard work for the monks in his own times, as reportedly every one of his Great Catecheses (so Leroy, "Réforme," p. 195) testifies. So this too, integrally related to the "Platonic" reforms discussed above, must be considered an integral part of the ideology of the Studite monastic reform. Yet, as will be seen, the regulation of manual labor was not one of the principal concerns of (4) Stoudios. As Leroy himself admits ("Réforme," p. 204), the relocation of Theodore and many of his monks to Stoudios at the end of the eighth century inevitably meant that the type of work pursued changed from being primarily agricultural at Sakkoudion to mostly artisanal at the new foundation in Constantinople, though the other monasteries of the emerging confederation located in rural locations perhaps continued to practice agricultural works. The institutional allegiance to the principle of self-sufficiency that is implicit in the practice of manual labor may have weakened considerably by the time (4) Stoudios was composed in the mid-ninth century or later, and perhaps even more so as the foundation came under imperial patronage in later times.

3. Definition of Administrative Offices

More enduring features of the Studite monastic reform were Theodore's exaltation of the importance of a monk's submission (hypotage) to the will of the superior (Leroy, "Influence," p. 505) and his notion of the monastic community as a mystical body, with the superior as the head, the officers as the hands and eyes, and the ordinary monks as the feet. As an outgrowth of the latter conception, Theodore developed a fairly elaborate structure of monastic offices for his foundation, whose responsibilities he discusses not only in the Great Catecheses but also in his Iambics and (implicitly) in one of his Penitentials.¹⁸ His biographer Michael the Monk states that this delimitation of functions was one of the essential aspects of the reformer's work.¹⁹

4. Liturgical Life

Another enduring feature of Theodore's reform, though one not much discussed in his work, was his importation of the office of the St. Sabas monastery near Jerusalem into the Stoudios monastery, displacing the continuous 24-hour service that was the trademark of the “sleepless” monks previously resident there since the middle of the fifth century.²⁰ In time this would merge with the office of the cathedral church of Hagia Sophia to produce a hybrid Studite office.

4. STODIOS

C. The Sources of Theodore’s Reform Program

1. Extent of Basilian Influence

Michael the Monk tells us that at the beginning of his monastic career Theodore studied the texts of the fathers, particularly Basil of Caesarea.²¹ Yet as Leroy (“Influence,” p. 504) convincingly demonstrated, the Basilian influence in Theodore’s work is not sufficient to term the latter a Basilian disciple. In all of Theodore’s huge corpus of published and unpublished work, there is only one precise reference to a Basilian text (“Influence,” p. 492), though as Leroy correctly realized, we must assess the Basilian impact on Theodore not only by actual citations but also by vaguer allusions and palpable evidence of Basilian impact in the absence of precise quotations. Even so, Basil is mentioned only 78 times in all of Theodore’s works, 39 times in his 556 letters, 32 times in the 395 authentic Catecheses, 3 times in his Iconodule tract, the Antirrhetics, and no more than once in all the other works (Leroy, “Influence,” p. 495).²² These citations are neither numerous nor particularly important for content.

Outside of the Catecheses, Theodore’s Basilian citations are usually dogmatic in character. Despite the intent of the Catecheses to justify the Studite reform by an appeal to tradition, citations are rare there too, although with Dorotheos of Gaza, a sixth-century Palestinian ascetic author, Basil is the patristic source Theodore does cite when he is inclined to seek external support. According to Leroy (“Influence,” p. 498) these citations, rarely literal, fail to exploit the central themes of Basilian spirituality, though they do demonstrate Theodore’s acquaintance with the works in the Basilian Ascetic Treatises, including those like the Penitential and the Ascetic Constitutions now thought to have been erroneously attributed to Basil.²³ Leroy (“Réforme, p. 190) believed that this last work had a very great influence on Theodore’s doctrines and teachings, including his notion of the monastery as a mystical body,²⁴ but he thought that much of this influence came through the mediation of similar work by Dorotheos of Gaza.

2. Palestinian Sources

Indeed, it seems that overall, Dorotheos, along with his teachers Barsanouphios and John, had a more important influence on Theodore than Basil. Leroy noted that Theodore cites Dorotheos, whose own collection of 24 Catecheses may have been collected at Stoudios, more frequently than Basil, though perhaps only because, having lived in the sixth century, he was considerably closer to Theodore’s own time and therefore was able to advocate a more advanced form of cenobiticism than was possible for Basil in the fourth century.²⁵ In any event, the complex administrative organization Theodore set up for Stoudios has a parallel in Dorotheos’s Palestinian monastery, and the two institutions shared a number of the same officials, though as Leroy rightly noted, many of the offices probably had already entered the mainstream of Byzantine monasticism in the long intervening period before the Studite reform.²⁶

Theodore also apparently looked to his Palestinian sources for some of the ideological components of his reform. The notion of monastic submission, absent in Basil, was to be found in the more authoritarian monasticism of Dorotheos, along with a variety of other technical terms that Theodore was accustomed to use.²⁷

It is difficult to pinpoint the source of Theodore's interest in reviving manual labor, since it was so common in the cenobitic monasteries of late antiquity and correspondingly prominent in the ascetic literature that was available to him.²⁸ Yet other elements of the reform can be traced to Palestinian origins with certainty. Long before the composition of (4) Stoudios, Theodore had his monks follow the Testamentary Rule (diatyposis) of Theodosios the Koinobiarch († 529), an older contemporary of Dorotheos of Gaza and Sabas of Jerusalem, for the regulation of diet.²⁹ This rule may in fact be incorporated at least in part in (4) Stoudios [28], [29] below. Finally, we know that Theodore wrote to Patriarch Thomas of Jerusalem to ask him to send monks to introduce the Sabaitic chants at the Stoudios monastery.³⁰

D. Subsequent Influence of the Studite Reform

1. The Early Versions of the Studite Rule

Initially, the present document, (4) Stoudios, was the means by which many of the institutions of Studite monasticism were handed down to later monasteries. Our Version [B] of this document, known only in Italo-Greek manuscripts, appears to be a lightly edited version of the prototype of (4) Stoudios that was surely closer if not identical to our Version [A].³¹ Leroy ("Vie," p. 24) dated the appearance of (4) Stoudios in Greek monasteries in Calabria to the end of the ninth or the beginning of the tenth century. In the tenth century, Athanasios the Athonite, founder of the Lavra monastery on Mount Athos, made use of a version of (4) Stoudios that combined elements of both Versions [A] and [B] in his own (11) Ath. Rule, but without feeling the need to acknowledge his source, just as he was to use (3) Theodore Studites some years later in his (13) Ath. Typikon (see below, Chapter Two).³² In 1034, one of the later superiors of the Stoudios monastery who had been promoted to the patriarchate as Alexios Studites (1025–1043) founded a monastery at Constantinople dedicated to the Mother of God for which he composed a typikon, now lost, that evidently was based on (4) Stoudios.³³ Subsequently, Theodosios Pétcherski had a complete Slavonic version of Alexios Studites' now lost typikon prepared for the Monastery of the Caves at Kiev in 1061. This survives in several manuscripts but has never been edited even though there are partial translations available in both Russian and (recently) English.³⁴ It is likely that further study of the unpublished witnesses to the manuscript tradition of (4) Stoudios and closely related documents, particularly those with a provenance in Byzantine Italy, will yield important insights into the dissemination of Studite liturgical traditions that cannot now be surmised. We already know that in its own right and through its adaptation in the liturgical typikon accompanying (22) Evergetis, the Studite typikon found acceptance in most Byzantine monasteries outside of Palestine until the thirteenth century.³⁵

2. Influence of Theodore's Own Works

As will be seen, (4) Stoudios is concerned primarily with the regulation of liturgical and dietary matters. Other Studite usages were transmitted through the dissemination of Theodore's personal writings. Of these, the Small Catecheses were by far the most popular, having circulated widely in more than 70 surviving manuscripts dating from before the sixteenth century.³⁶ In the late eleventh century in the midst of the Evergetian monastic reform, John V, Patriarch of Antioch, included them on his list of essential works of ascetic literature,³⁷ and they are cited as an authority by another reformer of the late eleventh century, Nikon of the Black Mountain, in (20) Black Mountain [56]. Indeed, they served as a kind of liturgical book for catechetical purposes in some monasteries, such as the Constantinopolitan monastery of St. John the Forerunner of Petra where, according to a manuscript of the Small Catecheses drawn up by the monk Arsenios in 1136, there were to be three readings per week from the collection throughout the year.³⁸ Theodore's Testament, our (3) Theodore Studites, is to be found in this manuscript as well as in many others of the Small Catecheses, and so its usages may have gained some currency along with the better known document.

4. STODIOS

The Great Catecheses, which contain so much of the institutional and ideological content of the Studite reform, apparently remained behind at the Stoudios monastery, in Leroy's words "as a piece of the family archives" ("Réforme," p. 212). Slowly they began to circulate, with the surviving manuscript tradition suggesting some usage in Southern Italy, particularly Sicily, in the eleventh and twelfth centuries, though generally only in partial editions.³⁹ In the mid-eleventh century, Paul Evergetinos, founder of the famous Constantinopolitan reform monastery for which (22) Evergetis would later be written, made use of the Great Catecheses in the compilation of his own catechetical collection, the Evergetinon.⁴⁰ Later, a manuscript of Paul's work would pass to another reform monastery in Constantinople, Christ Philanthropos, and an unidentified nunnery, most likely its sister institution for which (27) Kecharitomene was written (see below, Chapter Five).⁴¹

3. Subsequent Role of Stoudios in Byzantine Monasticism

The monks and the monastery of Stoudios and, to a lesser extent, the traditions of the Studite reform, continued to play a part in the rest of the documents in our collection. As noted above, the tenth century (11) Ath. Rule is textually dependent upon a version of (4) Stoudios while (13) Ath. Typikon makes some considerable use of (3) Theodore Studites. In the contemporary (12) Tzimiskes [28], we find the Studite monk Euthymios sent out by Emperor John Tzimiskes to arbitrate various disputes among the monks of Mount Athos; Euthymios was also the actual author of this document, as (15) Constantine IX [15] states in the middle of the next century. Later on in the eleventh century, the author of (19) Attaleiates [38], [41] entrusted the superior of the Stoudios monastery with the responsibility of consecrating the superior of his own monastery at Constantinople. This monastery also had a copy of the Studite Catecheses (see [INV 7]), most likely the Small Catecheses.

4. Stoudios and the Monastic Reform Movement

The importance of Stoudios to the great monastic reform movement of the eleventh and twelfth centuries is confirmed by (20) Black Mountain, which cites approvingly both (4) Stoudios and the Catecheses.⁴² (22) Evergetis, the most important typikon of the monastic reform movement, does not cite any of Theodore's works directly, but shares at least a part of its ideological outlook with (3) Theodore Studites. An unidentified book by Theodore was in the library of the reform monastery for which (23) Pakourianos [33] was written towards the end of the eleventh century. In (24) Christodoulos [B8], the author's nephew Theophanes is mentioned as being the current assistant steward at Stoudios, but the nephew is expressly denied any inheritance rights to the author's reform monastery on Patmos.

5. Studite Influence in Norman Italy and Sicily

The popularity of the Studite tradition in Southern Italy and Sicily suggested by the provenance of our surviving manuscripts of the Catecheses as well as of (4) Stoudios is confirmed by the testimony of (25) Fragala [B4], whose author claims to have bound his monks to the observance of "the rule of Theodore of Stoudios" among other patristic documents and who in [B7] refers to (3) Theodore Studites as a precedent for his own testamentary provision. The author of another Sicilian document of the twelfth century, (26) Luke of Messina [10], cites (4) Stoudios as one of the sources of his own rule.

6. Waning of Studite Influence in the Twelfth Century

Elsewhere during the twelfth century, the prestige of (22) Evergetis, its companion liturgical typikon, and the typika of other monasteries in the Evergetian reform tradition began to displace (4) Stoudios as a document of reference. (31) Areia, which references (4) Stoudios both for dietary regulation and liturgical services, is a provincial exception.⁴³ (32) Mamas is more typical, gladly relying on the prestige of the Studite superior Theophylaktos and five of his monks as witnesses to a judicial confirmation (in the First Semeioma) but providing [46] that the Evergetian synaxarion, i.e., its liturgical typikon, was to guide the services in its own foundation. A few years later, however, (33) Heliou Bomon, otherwise a very close follower of its model, (32) Mamas, returns [45] to a recommendation of the Studite typikon, the last citation of it to appear in our collection of documents.

7. Stoudios' Role in the Last Centuries of the Empire

Thereafter, Stoudios appears to have had no direct impact on Byzantine monasticism, surely in no small part due to the fact that the monastery itself lay abandoned during most of the thirteenth century, thanks to the Latin occupation of Constantinople, up until 1293. The popularity of the pseudo-Basilian Poenae among certain Cypriot foundations of the thirteenth century, however, may reflect indirect Studite influence.⁴⁴ The monastery makes one last appearance in our documents in the fifteenth century in (60) Charsianeites [A7], where it—benefiting as usual in its later history by its close ties to the imperial government—is the recipient of a property confiscated from the Charsianeites monastery.

Analysis

This document is the first extant typikon preserved in Greek from the medieval Byzantine monastic tradition. The anonymous author⁴⁵ acknowledges existence of many rivals, but asserts that this is the "best," chosen "by a majority of excellent monks." None of these rival contemporary typika survive, though there are a number of testaments preserved from the early medieval period (7th–11th centuries), probably because, being shorter and essentially biographical, they lent themselves to incorporation into hagiographical literature. In the case of this foundation, however, both a testament, (3) Theodore Studites, and the present typikon have survived, illustrating how these two types of documents complement one another.

At this point in the still very preliminary research on the Studite reform tradition, it seems most prudent to interpret this typikon as a document in the Studite tradition rather than as an explicit statement of the founder's own views on the concerns addressed.⁴⁶ It is even hard to say how far removed was its date of composition from Theodore's death in 826. The latter half of the ninth century, after the definitive defeat of Iconoclasm in 842, seems a reasonable supposition, though any date prior to that of (11) Ath. Rule in the mid-tenth century is possible. A more precise dating will have to await further study.

4. STOUDIOS

We present here the two versions of this document that have appeared in printed editions although readers should be aware that other versions exist in manuscript.⁴⁷ Version [A] derives from a 13th-14th century manuscript in the Vatopedi monastery on Mount Athos, while Version [B] is derived from an Italo-Greek manuscript of the late ninth or early tenth century. They have been translated here in parallel columns. A comparison of the two versions illustrates how an influential model typikon could be adapted in different ways for monasteries in other locations.

The restricted scope of this typikon, which is primarily (though not exclusively) concerned with the regulation of dietary matters and liturgical services, reflects the circumstances that are thought to have given birth to the genre in medieval Byzantium. First of all, there was the problem of how to resolve conflicts among the cycles of the proper of the liturgy, specifically the regular weekly services, the services for the feasts of the saints occurring on particular days during the year, and the Paschal cycle determined by the date of Easter. The first typika are intended to provide some guidance for resolving these conflicts (Taft, "Mount Athos," p. 182). Then there was the analogous problem of reconciling conflicting dietary prescriptions, specifically the regular rules for normal consumption or fasting on particular days of the week, the provisions for feasts of the saints marked by special dietary treats, and the obligation to observe specific periods of fasting, not only Lent but also other fasts such as those of the Holy Apostles after Pentecost and of St. Philip before Christmas. Finally, the monastic observance of a solar day necessarily meant that the lengths of the hours in any given day would vary considerably from season to season, with very short hours in winter and very long ones in summer (Leroy, "Vie," p. 28). This alone had a considerable impact on the scheduling of liturgical services, which in turn affected when meals, work, and all other activities could be fitted into the daily schedule as well. Eventually, increasingly sophisticated resolutions of these problems would lead to the development of more specialized texts, and the definitive division of the typikon genre into the typikon ktetorikon (regulating administrative and disciplinary matters) and the typikon leitourgikon (regulating liturgical and dietary matters).

A. Lives of the Monks

1. Liturgical Duties

The discussion begins with the Easter service, which would become the trademark of typika, like (22) Evergetis and other documents influenced by it, in the Studite tradition (Taft, "Stoudite Typika," p. 1961), then continues through the calendar of the liturgical year, not in any systematic way, but in order to resolve cyclical conflicts of the sort described above (e.g., the order of psalms and readings on certain feasts [12], [13]), that presume a basic understanding of the calendar. Similarly, particular problems relating to the service of the hours are discussed in several places (e.g., [3], [4], [5], [10], [11]) but nowhere is there a comprehensive treatment, as in the Basilian rules. This is despite the fact that we know (Leroy, "Cursus," p. 17) that the Studites observed seven canonical hours: 1) the canon, which included the midnight office (mesonyktikon) and matins (orthros), 2) prime, 3) terce, 4) sext, 5) none, 6) vespers (lychnikon), and 7) complines (apodeipnon). Perhaps it was this “incompleteness” of the liturgical regulation which led Beck (KTL, p. 494) to suspect that the document is itself incomplete.

NINTH CENTURY

2. Manual Labor

Despite Theodore’s own well-known allegiance to the practice of manual labor, it is absent from (3) Theodore Studites, and is mentioned [26], [33] only in passing here.⁴⁸ It does not receive either the vigorous defense seen in the Basilian rules or the detailed regulation seen in the Pachomian tradition. Actual hours of work varied seasonally [33]; Leroy (“Vie,” p. 47) estimates between eight hours in the middle of summer to only four and a half hours during the shortest days of winter.

3. Sacramental Life

There is a provision [22] for the superior to hear the monks’ confessions at the matins service, though this exagoreusis does not necessarily imply confession in the sacramental sense (Leroy, “Vie,” p. 33). There is an incidental reference [A38], [B37] to the reception of communion. Catechetical instruction, seen earlier in the Pachomian Rules, returns to prominence here, with provisions for it at compline during Lent [AB21] as well as for lessons from Theodore’s own Catecheses [B16], [AB36] at other times (cf. (3) Theodore Studites [11]).

4. Diet

The typikon presents the first lengthy treatment ([28] through [31]) of the monks’ diet to be found in the monastic foundation documents.⁴⁹ As with the treatment of the liturgy, there is no systematic discussion, however, just prescriptions for decorum in the refectory [28], and special diets for the Easter season and the fasts of the Holy Apostles and of St. Philip [29], for Lent [30], and for the feast of the Annunciation [31]. As in later documents, the diet is mostly vegetarian, permitting fish but not meat. Wine is the staple beverage (except during fasts), a difference from the Pachomian and the earlier part of the Syrian monastic tradition, but not the more liberal (2) Pantelleria, which also allows the use of wine. There was a midday meal [28] for which food was prepared, and (at least during the Easter season) an optional evening meal [29] of bread and leftovers. Aspects of the regulation [28] for decorum at table, especially the reading, would become part of the mainstream Byzantine tradition.

5. Clothing

The provisions for clothing, footwear, and bedding [A37], [B38] are, as one might expect, more generous, sturdy, and (concerning bedding) less idiosyncratic than in the Pachomian tradition, sited as it was in a much hotter climate in Egypt.

6. Length of the Novitiate

The period of testing [24] for postulants is brief (2–3 weeks) compared to later monastic traditions. They were to be kept in the monastery’s hospice during this period, then brought to the superior for instruction and enrollment.

4. STODIOS

7. Importance of Reading

Reading [26] coexisted and indeed alternated with manual labor,⁵⁰ but as Leroy (“Vie,” p. 47) has estimated, the time available was generally no more than three hours, except in the summer when days were longer. There was a keeper of books and a kind of library system for checking books out by the day. Copyists [33] are mentioned, and were exempted from recitation of the psalter during their work. That monks could read seems presumed, and there is an incidental reference [36] to some of them who were learning the psalter, but the aggressive pro-literacy stance of the Pachomian tradition is absent here. It is noteworthy that sleeping [A33] is offered as an entirely acceptable alternative to studying during midday breaks.

8. Disciplinary Regime

The discussion [25] of confinement and corporal punishment (the former endorsed and the latter rejected) is based without attribution on the pseudo-Basilian Penitential and recalls the stern disciplinary regime of (2) Pantelleria. It will be repeated in (11) Ath. Rule [19], then drop out of our documents entirely until the twelfth century. In the same spirit, there is a provision for the public humiliation of a monk who might have accidentally broken a ceramic or a metal vessel [35].

B. Constitutional Matters

Despite the well-attested interest of Theodore in the subject, the typikon has little to say about the administration of the monastery. Certain officers identified include: disciplinarians, two choir monitors, wakers, and two overseers [18].

C. Differences between the Two Versions

Version [B], though somewhat shorter than Version [A], is more logically organized, with paragraph numberings that are original to the text. These have been editorially inserted where possible in [A] to support comparisons between the two texts. Topographical information provided in conjunction with the description [A2] of the monks' procession during Easter week serves to identify [A] as the one closest to the original setting of the document at the Studios monastery. This version also provides [A2] a considerably longer regulation of Easter week services than is found in Version [B2], but the latter has a treatment ([B14] through [B17]) of special problems associated with Holy Week and Easter that is not found in [A]. The regulation of the Lenten diet in [A30] is longer than that in [B30]. In [B8], the graveside memorial service for departed monks elaborates on the singing of canons for the departed found in both versions [7] and looks forward to the great importance commemorative observances were to have in later monastic foundation documents. The relative positions of [37] and [38] are reversed in the two documents. There are also many smaller differences.

Although the evidence is slight, Version [B] seems to have been written for an institution that was smaller than the Studios foundation (cf. Easter procession [A2] and [B2]), possibly in a location where the climate was cooler (cf. [A28] and [B28]) and where olives were not part of the diet (cf. [A30] and [B30]), and heavier clothing was needed (cf. [A37] and [B38]).

NINTH CENTURY

Notes on the Introduction

1. One must distinguish the date of the prototype of the present document from the likely dates of the two versions presented here. Leroy, "Vie," p. 24, citing the conformity of contents to Theodore's other works, argued for a date soon after the latter's death in 826, but the tone of the document suggests a considerable passage of time. Since the Studites most likely did not regain possession of the Stoudios monastery itself until 842, it seems to us that the original document must have been written after that date. Leroy dates the Italo-Greek manuscript tradition represented by [B] to the late ninth or early tenth century, which seems reasonable to us, but argued for its priority over [A], which he termed (p. 24, n. 4) "a certainly posterior redaction of this text, not earlier than the middle of the thirteenth century." However, even a cursory comparison of [A] and [B] will show that the former, with its geographically specific references [A2], cf. Janin, Géographie, vol. 3, p. 439, to the Constantinopolitan topography around the Stoudios monastery that are lacking in the latter, is surely the earlier document, and closer to the prototype.
2. For the manuscript tradition, see Leroy, "Vie," p. 24, n. 5, and Taft, "Mount Athos," p. 182, n. 30.
3. Published editions for Vitae A, B, and C are listed above in (3) Theodore Studites, Biography of the Author. For details, see P. Henry, "Theodore of Studios: Byzantine Churchman," (Ph.D. diss., Yale University, 1968), p. 25, n. 1.
4. Monacensis gr. 467; see the contradictory assessments of Leroy, "Réforme," p. 187, n. 45, and "Petites Catéchèses," p. 333, n. 17.
5. Naukratios, Encyclica de obitu S. Theodori, PG 99, cols. 1824–49; Translatio Theodori et Iosephi fratris, ed. Ch. Van de Vorst, "La translation de S. Théodore Studite et de S. Joseph de Thessalonique," AB 32 (1913), 27–62.
6. Laudatio sancti Platonis hegumeni, PG 99, cols. 804–49.
7. The new edition by Giorgios Fatouros, Theodori Studitae Epistulae, 2 vols. (Berlin, 1992) replaces the separate editions by J. J. Sirmond, Opera varia, ed. J. de la Baume, vol. 5: Sancti Theodori Studitae Epistolae, aliaque scripta dogmatica (Paris, 1696), reprinted in PG 99, cols. 903–1669, and J. Cozza-Luzi, NPB, vol. 8, pt. 1 (Rome, 1871). For an overview, see A. Tougard, "La persécution iconoclaste d'après la correspondance de s. Théodore Studite," RHQ 1 (1891), 80–118.
8. Ed. J. Cozza-Luzi, NPB, vol. 9, pt. 2 (Rome, 1888), pp. 1–127 (77 items), and A. Papadopoulos-Kerameus, Tou hosiou Theodorou tou Stouditou Megale Katechesis (St. Petersburg, 1904) (143 items, including 23 shared with Cozza-Luzi); cf. Beck, KTL, p. 492. For details on the manuscript tradition, see Leroy, "Petites Catéchèses," p. 336, n. 34.
9. Ed. E. Auvray, Sancti patris nostri et confessoris Theodori Studitis praepositi parva catechesis (Paris, 1891), pp. 1–318; see also Vita B, PG 99, col. 264A. For details on the manuscript tradition, see Leroy, "Petites Catéchèses," p. 336, n. 34.
10. Leroy, "Petites Catéchèses," p. 355, n. 127; "Réforme," p. 208; "Vie," p. 24.
11. See Beck, KTL, p. 494; Leroy, "Petites Catéchèses," p. 356, n. 130, affirms the authenticity of the Penitentials of the first series, PG 99, cols. 1733–1748.
12. Speck, Theodorus Studites; German translation by Franz Schwarz, Theodoros Studites Monastische Epigramme, in Leroy, Studitisches Mönchtum, pp. 105–16.
13. Ed. J. B. Pitra, Analecta sacra et classica spicilegio Solesmensi parata, vol. 1 (Paris, 1876), pp. 336–80.
14. For the coexistence of cenobitic and solitary forms of monasticism in this era, see Denise Papachryssanthou, "La vie monastique dans les campagnes byzantines du VIII^e au IX^e siècle," Byzantion 43 (1973–74), 158–80; Alexander Kazhdan, "Hermitic, Cenobitic, and Secular Ideals in Byzantine Hagiography of the Ninth Centuries," GOTR 30 (1985), 473–87, esp. 476.
15. For Bithynian monasticism as centered around Mount Olympos, see B. Menthon, L'Olympe de Bithynie (Paris, 1935); Janin, Géographie, vol. 2, pp. 126–91; Leroy, "Réforme," p. 183.
16. Laudatio Platonis, PG 99, col. 824D, with J. Pargoire, "Une loi monastique de St. Platon" BZ 8 (1899), pp. 98–101.

4. STODIOS

17. Vita B, PG 99, col. 245B; GC 2.109, ed. Papadopoulos-Kerameus, Megale Katechesis, p. 802, with discussion by Leroy, "Réforme," p. 191.
18. Iambics, ed. Paul Speck, Jamben, nos. 4, 6–19, 26–29, pp. 118–20, 124–53, 167–75; Penitential, PG 99, cols. 1733–1748; for references to various offices in Great Catecheses, see Leroy, "Réforme," p. 201, nn. 158–164.
19. Vita B, PG 99, col. 261A, with Leroy, "Réforme," p. 200.
20. For this development, see Taft, "Mount Athos," p. 182, based on Miguel Arranz, "La liturgie des heures selon l'ancien Euchologe byzantin," Studia Anselmiana 68, Analecta liturgica 2 (Rome, 1979), pp. 1–19.
21. Vita B, PG 99, col. 245BC, with Leroy, "Réforme," p. 187.
22. Leroy, "Influence," p. 495; for details of citations in particular works, see pp. 495–97.
23. For Basilian citations in Theodore's Great Catecheses and Small Catecheses, see Leroy, "Influence," p. 189, n. 59, for the three citations of the pseudo-Basilian Constitutiones asceticae, p. 189, n. 63, and for the single citation of the Poenae, p. 189, n. 61.
24. Constitutiones asceticae, PG 31, cols. 1381B, 1396B, 1417BD, and 1421A; with Leroy, "Réforme," p. 199.
25. Leroy, "Influence," p. 190, with Theodore's citations of Dorotheos in n. 66. For the latter's works, see L. Regnault and J. de Préville, Dorothee de Gaza. Oeuvres spirituelles (= SC 92) (Paris, 1963).
26. Leroy, "Réforme," p. 190, with a list of shared officers in n. 67.
27. Leroy, "Cursus," p. 18, and "Influence," p. 505.
28. For a list of the sources from the Paterikon and the Gerontikon known to Theodore, see Leroy, "Réforme," p. 188, n. 58.
29. According to Leroy, "Réforme," p. 209, n. 220, Theodore refers to this rule twice, in Great Catecheses 1.53 (unedited) and Carmina 3.40, ed. Pitra.
30. Ep. 2.15, PG 99, cols. 1160–64, and 2.16, cols. 1164–68, with Taft, "Mount Athos," p. 182.
31. For the provenance of [B], see Leroy, "Vie," p. 24, n. 5. Leroy failed to realize that (11) Ath. Rule contains elements of both [A] and [B] and therefore cannot be used as an argument for the priority of [B] over [A].
32. Julien Leroy, "S. Athanase l'Athonite et la Règle de S. Benoit," RAM 29 (1953), 108–22; Ph. Meyer, Die Haupturkunden für die Geschichte der Athosklöster (Leipzig, 1894), pp. 15–20.
33. For this monastery, see Janin, Géographie, vol. 3, pp. 18–19.
34. For details, see Dmitrievsky, Opisanie, vol. 1, pp. xx–xxx; K. Menges, Die Sprache der altrussischen Übersetzung des Stoudion-Typikon (Gräfenheinen, 1935); M. J. Rouët de Journel, "Byzance et le monachisme russe," SBN 7 (1953), 317–21; and Leroy, "Réforme," p. 213, and "Vie," p. 24. Discussion and partial Russian translation by Evgenii Golubinsky, Istoriia Russkoi Tserkvi, vol. 1, pt. 2 (Moscow, 1904), p. 607ff.; resume given by Rouët de Journel, Monachisme et monastères russes (Paris, 1952), 28–32. Partial English translation by David M. Petras, The Typicon of the Patriarch Alexis the Studite: Novgorod-St. Sophia 1136 (Cleveland, Ohio, 1991).
35. For unedited manuscripts of (4) Stoudios, see Leroy, "Vie," p. 24, n. 5; for its liturgical dominance, see Taft, "Mount Athos," pp. 182–87, and "Stoudite Typika," ODB, p. 1961.
36. Leroy, "Réforme," p. 212; cf. "Vie," p. 23, with n. 1.
37. John of Antioch, De monasteriis, chap. 5, lines 190–91, ed. Paul Gautier, "Réquisitoire du patriarche Jean d'Antioche contre le charisticariat," REB 33 (1975), 77–132, at 103.
38. Paris gr. 891, as described in Leroy, "Petites Catéchèses," p. 337, n. 37; for liturgical use of Small Catecheses, see also "Réforme," p. 212.
39. Leroy, "Réforme," p. 212, with n. 259, and "Vie," p. 24, with n. 3.
40. Julien Leroy, "Un nouveau témoin de la Grande Catéchèse de Saint Théodore Studite," REB 15 (1957), 73–88, and "Réforme," p. 213.
41. Leroy, "Vie," p. 26, n. 3.

NINTH CENTURY

42. (20) Black Mountain [22], [23], [31], endorsing (4) Stoudios; [56] endorsing the Catecheses.
43. (31) Areia [M6], [T3], [T5] cite (4) Stoudios for dietary regulation, [T1] for liturgy.
44. (34) Machairas [122] ff., and (45) Neophytos [CB1] ff.
45. Perhaps Nicholas the Studite (superior, 842–47), who was responsible for editing Theodore’s correspondence; see Leroy, “Nouveau témoin,” p. 73, n. 1.
46. Against Leroy, “Petites Catéchèses,” p. 355, n. 107, “Réforme,” p. 208, and “Vie,” p. 24, who, based on a cross-examination of Theodore’s Catecheses, considered this document a generally trustworthy record of the usages of Theodore’s own times. The difficulty is determining which of the manuscript witnesses, including those currently unedited, are closest to the prototype typikon, for they clearly do differ in their prescriptions, as a comparison of the translations of [A] and [B] presented here shows.
47. E.g., the version by the eleventh-century monk and hagiographer Niketas Stethatos, mentioned by Leroy, “Réforme,” p. 208, n. 214; see also “Vie,” p. 24, n. 5.
48. See Leroy, “Vie,” pp. 36–47, who gives, however, a greater importance to the subject than does (4) Stoudios itself.
49. The Studite diet is analyzed by Jeanselme, “Régime alimentaire,” pp. 15–16, and by Maria Dembinska, “Diet: A Comparison of Food Consumption between Some Eastern and Western Monasteries in the 4th–12th Centuries,” Byzantion 55 (1985), 431–62, at 445–49.
50. See Leroy, “Vie,” pp. 47–48, with Nikephoros Eleopoulos, He bibliotheke kai to bibliographikon ergasterion tes mones tou Stoudiou (Athens, 1967), esp. pp. 11–18.

Bibliography

- Beck, Hans-Georg, Kirche und Theologische Literatur im Byzantinischen Reich (Munich, 1959), p. 494.
- Dmitrievsky, A., Opisanie liturgicheskikh rykopiesi, 3 vols. (Kiev, 1895–1901; Petrograd, 1917), I, pp. xii–xxxii.
- , “Zapadnie, tak nazivaemie, ktitorskie ili studiiskie Tipikoni,” TKDA (December 1895), 633–79.
- Eleopoulos, Nikephoros, He bibliotheke kai to bibliographikon ergasterion tes mones tou Stoudiou (Athens, 1967).
- Guetet, F.-M., “Une recension stoudite des règles basiliennes?” in Mélanges bénédictins publiés à l’occasion du XIV^e centenaire de la mort de saint Benoît (Fontenelle, 1947), pp. 61–68.
- Jeanselme, Edouard, “Le régime alimentaire des anachorètes et des moines byzantins,” extract from 2^e Congrès d’Histoire de la Médecine (Evreux, 1922), 28 pp.
- Leroy, Julien, “Le cursus canonique chez S. Théodore Studite,” EphL 68, (1954), 5–19.
- , “L’influence de Saint-Basile sur la réforme studite d’après les catéchèses,” Irénikon 52 (1979), 491–506.
- , “Un nouveau témoin de la Grande Catéchèse de Saint Théodore Studite,” REB 15 (1957), 73–88.
- , “La réforme studite,” OCA 153 (1958), 181–214.
- , Studitisches Mönchtum. Spiritualität und Lebensform (Graz, 1969).
- , “Un témoin ancien des Petites Catéchèses de Théodore Studite,” Scriptorium 15 (1961), 36–60.
- , “La vie quotidienne du moine studite,” Irénikon 27 (1954), 21–50.
- Nikitin, Avgustin, “Das Studios-Kloster und die alte Rus,” OS 37 (1988), 107–47.
- Pandurski, Vasil, “Prep. Sava Osveshcheni-osnovopolozhnik na Ierusalimskiya ustav,” Godishnik na Duchovnata Akademiya ‘Sv. Kliment Ochridski’ 6 (32), 11 (1956–57), 425–449. An analysis of the liturgical typikon of St. Sabas in comparison with the rule of the Studite monastery.
- Rezac, Giovanni, “Le diverse forme di unione fra i monasteri orientali,” OCA 153 (1958), 99–135.
- Speck, Paul, Theodoros Studites, Jamben auf verschiedene Gegenstände (Berlin, 1968).
- Taft, Robert, “Mount Athos: A Late Chapter in the History of the Byzantine Rite,” DOP 42 (1988), 179–94.
- , “Stoudite Typika,” ODB, p. 1961.
- Vorst, Ch. Van de, “La Petite Catéchèse de St. Théodore Studite,” AB 33 (1914), 31–51.

4. STODIOS

Volk, Otto, “Die byzantinischen Klosterbibliotheken von Konstantinopel, Thessalonike und Kleinasien,” (Ph.D. diss., Munich, 1955), pp. 80–91.

Volk, Robert, Gesundheitswesen und Wohltätigkeit im Spiegel der byzantinischen Klostertypika (Munich, 1983), pp. 61–67.

Translations

Version A

With God’s Help, the Rule of Observance of the Most Holy Monastery of Stoudios [p. 224]

[1.] Although there are many and various traditions from prior times holding sway in the holy monasteries and although different monasteries are administered and governed by different rules for the heavenly kingdom, there is one of all these—the one in force among us—which is the best and most excellent, avoiding both excesses and deficiencies. This rule we have received from our great father and confessor Theodore.¹ [p. 225] We are not alone in choosing it; the majority of excellent monks have chosen it as well. So, today we have been led by the fatherly commands to leave this rule in writing as an enduring monument for later generations; and as far as we can, we have submitted ourselves in obedience. For, clearly, through our shepherd’s prayers on our behalf, God provides us the appropriate style in composing this treatise in order to present in a sound fashion the helpful and salutary precepts of our inspired father. We have done this for the glory of the Father and the Son and the Holy Spirit and for the protection and safety of those who have chosen to observe these precepts in faith. Therefore, let this composition begin whence came the first fruit of men’s salvation.

Version B

The Rule of Observance of the Monastery of Stoudios [p. 111]

1. Although there are many and various traditions from prior times holding sway in the holy monasteries and although different monasteries are administered and governed by different rules for the heavenly kingdom, there is one of all these—the one in force among us—which is the best and most excellent, avoiding both excesses and deficiencies. This rule we have received from our great father and confessor Theodore.¹ We are not alone in choosing it; the majority of excellent monks have chosen it as well. So, today we have been led by the fatherly commands to leave this rule in writing as an enduring monument for later generations; and as far as we can, we have submitted ourselves in obedience. For, clearly, through our shepherd’s prayers on our behalf, God provides us [p. 112] the appropriate style in composing this treatise in order to present in a sound fashion the helpful and salutary precepts of our inspired father. We have done this for the glory of the Father and the Son and the Holy Spirit and for the protection and safety of those who have chosen to observe these precepts in faith. Therefore, let this composition begin with God’s help.

NINTH CENTURY

Concerning the holy Paschal feast

[2.] It should be known that after the second or third watch, that is the ninth hour, has passed, the signal of the water clock² strikes, and at this signal the waker is roused together with the precentor. Both receive the blessing before the superior, and the waker goes around to the bed chambers with a lantern summoning the brothers to raise up the morning doxology. The precentor departs to sound the wooden semantron in the appointed places. While all the brothers assemble in the narthex of the main church and pray silently, only those consecrated—both the deacons and the priests—together with the superior enter the church. The person whom the superior shall designate to take the censer receives the superior's blessing and with hands washed clean censes first the holy sanctuary. From there he walks through the screen in front and passes along the north side of the church while before him the ecclesiarch marches with a bright candle of large size. Arriving at the so-called royal gate,³ he makes the sign of the cross [p. 226] over the middle of the lintel and begins to cense the brothers. After he has censed all and when one of the deacons has said in a loud voice the "O Father, bless," the priest intones the "Glory to the holy, consubstantial, and life-giving Trinity now and always." Immediately, he begins the troparion "Christ is risen" in the first plagal mode.⁴ As all the brothers sing together in the same manner, they enter the church. The priest, however, returns by the south side while censing and enters into the sanctuary.

How we conduct services for the holy and glorious Resurrection of our Savior on the third day.

Concerning the wooden semantron

2. It should be known that after the second or third watch of the night has passed, that is when the signal of the water clock² strikes at the sixth hour at the point where the seventh hour is beginning, at this signal the waker is roused. He goes around to the bed chambers with a lantern summoning the brothers to raise up the morning doxology. Immediately, the wooden semantra sound up and down [the monastery].

While all the brothers assemble in the narthex of the main church and pray silently, the priest takes the censer in his hands and censes first the holy sanctuary.

From there he walks through the screen in front and passes along the north side of the church.

Arriving at the royal gate,³ he censes the brothers and immediately returns by the south side [of the church] to the place whence he came out.

4. STOUDIOS

When the brothers have finished chanting the “Christ is risen” three times, the priest places aside the censer, and standing with his face toward the sanctuary, he says the verse, “This is the day which the Lord has made; celebrate the feast with thick branches” (Ps. 117 [118]:24–27) as far as [the end]. He adds the doxology while the brothers sing the “Christ is risen,” each one of them. After completing this, he begins “Let us sing to the Lord” (Exodus 15, 1), and immediately “The day of resurrection,” since we do not sing the Six Psalms⁵ during this week. There is one reading from [St. Gregory] the Theologian, “The day of the resurrection and the right beginning.”⁶ In addition, after the sixth ode, there is the kontakion “Having seen the resurrection of Christ” and also the fiftieth psalm. With this the service of matins is dismissed.

It should be known that the aforementioned assembly of brothers in the narthex and the routine service of the precentor and the waker just described extend to the whole year. In the same way the priest’s rite is performed without delay at every matins service except for the doxology in the narthex instead of the sanctuary. On account of the holy resurrection of Christ our God, the fathers decided to change the routine of this Radiant week only. [p. 227]

It should be known that after completing the matins of the Radiant Sunday, the embrace takes place as follows⁷. Changing his sacerdotal robes, one of the deacons takes the holy Gospel and stands before the entrance of the holy sanctuary. Coming forward, the superior kisses the holy Gospel and then the deacon; after doing this, the superior stands beside him.

The brothers enter the church behind him. Having put aside the censer in the sanctuary, the priest comes out and stands with his face towards the sanctuary to begin the troparion in the first plagal mode⁴ “Christ is risen from the dead.” After this has been sung [p. 113] the third time by both the priest and the brothers, he says the verse “This is the day which the Lord had made” (Ps. 117 [118]:24); the brothers repeat the troparion, then [the priest] recites the second verse: “Celebrate the feast” to its conclusion. Again the congregation repeats the troparion and concludes with the doxology. After this has been completed, the canon is begun immediately, since we do not sing the Six Psalms⁵ during this entire week. Two readings then take place, and after the second reading, the Fiftieth Psalm. When matins has been completed, the embrace and dismissal occur.

NINTH CENTURY

Next, with their candles in hand, every one of the priests and the brothers kiss one another in the same fashion according to the appropriate order. They say, “Christ is risen” and those so greeted respond, “For He is risen indeed.” All stand in a row while the choir monitors maintain this good order. When they reach the royal gates, they [all] return to the same royal gates and then they fill up the other section of the church in the same fashion as all sing in a loud voice the “Christ is risen.” Thereupon, they take up the “Let the heavens rejoice and the earth exult” (Ps. 95 [96]:11).

Thereafter, the precentor, or perhaps another of the brothers, goes up to the ambo and reads the sermon of our holy father John Chrysostom, the one which begins “Whoever is pious and loves God.”⁸ When the reading is completed, all assemble in a group and give thanks to the Lord. After they have made three bows, a prayer is said by the superior and the service of matins is dismissed.

It should be known that at the divine liturgy we do not say the antiphons which are normally sung, the “Bless the Lord, O my soul” (Ps. 102 [103]:1) and the rest; rather we say what is traditional at the Great Church. Similarly, we act in the same fashion at every other feast of the Lord. The deacon recites the prokeimenon and the apostolic reading together with the alleluia within the sanctuary; in the same manner the senior priest reads the Gospel.

It should be known that at the office of lamplighting during this entire week, the customary prooimion is not said, but only the “Christ is risen” and immediately the “O Lord, I have cried [to thee]” (Ps. 140 [141]:1). This is also the case at the dismissal. [p. 228] At we say the “Christ is risen” and immediately the “O Lord, I have cried [to thee]” (Ps. 140 [141]:1) and at the dismissal the “Christ is risen.”

At the office of lamplighting during this week

4. STOUDIOS

the office of lamplighting of the Radiant Sunday, when the entrance has taken place, the prokeimenon is said and then the Gospel according to John, “On the evening of that day” (John 20:19). At compline, then, we say only the trisagion hymn and the “Kyrie eleison” twelve times.

Next morning, at the second hour of the day when the precentor knocks three times, we assemble in the Church of [St. John] the great Forerunner. Vested in their priestly robes, the priests and all the brothers take up the venerable crosses and the revered and holy icons. We circle the vineyard close to the monastery with all of us saying in a loud voice the “Christ is risen.” Then, we go out in the same manner to the shore of the sea. Having finished an ektenes, we go over to the Church of the all-holy Mother of God. Saying an ektenes there as well, we turn back to the Church of [St. John] the Holy Forerunner. Before the entry of the procession, the precentor gives a signal and the opening prayer is offered. When the priests have walked in, the divine liturgy takes place. In the same manner, we conduct processions on Palm Sunday and on the Annunciation if atmospheric conditions are clear.

It should be known that on the Tuesday of Renovation [Easter Week] we grant the great habit to those brothers who have been designated to receive it.

It must be noted that on the Saturday of Renovation [Easter Week], at the office of lamplighting, we begin to sing the customary prooimion “Bless the Lord, O my soul” (Ps. 102 [103]), and immediately the “O Lord, I have cried [to thee]” (Ps. 140 [141]:1), and at compline we say the “God is with us.”⁹ We always sing in this same manner on all the other Saturdays.

Similarly, during the compline [we say] the trisagion hymn and the “Kyrie eleison” twelve times.

On the Saturday of Renovation [Easter Week] and on the evening of Low Sunday at compline we say the “God is with us”⁹ and the rest.

NINTH CENTURY

[3.] On the Sunday of Renovation we begin the Six Psalms. We also sing the “God is the Lord” (Ps. 117 [118]:27) in the grave mode¹⁰ and the troparion “When the tomb was sealed” and immediately the canon.

On this Sunday in the evening we also begin the [p. 229] “Blessed is the man” (Ps. 31 [32]:2) in the first resurrection mode. It should be known, however, that the “Blessed is the man” (Ps. 31 [32]:2) is always begun at the office of lamplighting in the fourth plagal mode, then the second and third [parts of the psalter] are begun in the mode of the day. “O Lord I have cried [to thee]” (Ps. 140 [141]:1), however, is sung in the mode of the stichera belonging to the feast.

[4.] The next morning at matins after the Six Psalms, we sing the “God is the Lord” (Ps. 117 [118]:27) in the first mode, the troparion “When the stone was sealed,” and one kathisma of psalms. Then, we have three readings. When the readings are finished, there follow the gradual antiphons in the first mode, the resurrection prokeimenon “Let everything that has breath” (Ps. 150:6) and the Gospel; then the “In the nights” (Ps. 133 [134]) and the “Having seen the resurrection of Christ,” the fiftieth psalm, and immediately the canon.

3. On the evening of the Sunday of the Radiant Week [Low Sunday] the Six Psalms are begun, and we sing the “God is the Lord” in the fourth plagal mode. Then, immediately, we sing the gradual antiphons in the same mode, the prokeimenon “Let everything that has breath” (Ps. 150:6) and finally the Gospel. Then, we sing the “In the nights” (Ps. 133 [134]) and after the Fiftieth Psalm, the canon is begun. Two readings also take place.

On Sunday evening the “Blessed is the man” is begun, and on Monday at matins we sing again the “God is the Lord” in the first mode and one kathisma of the psalms followed by the canon of the Resurrection. Then, three readings take place. From that time on, we carry out the full compline services except for a Saturday evening, a feast of the Lord, or a commemoration [p. 114] of a saint which brings for us rest from our work, our hours, and our prostrations whenever these occur, for on those days [we do only the prayers] from the “God is with us” and what follows. We begin performing our tasks again on Tuesday morning of the second week [after Easter]. At the office of lamplighting we sing the prokeimena of each day until the feast of Pentecost.

4. It should be known that at all lamplighting offices of feasts of the Lord the “Blessed is the man” (Ps. 31 [32] 2) is begun in the fourth plagal mode. Then, the second and third parts of the psalter are begun in the mode of the day. Then follows the “O Lord, I cried [to thee]” (Ps. 140 [141]:1), in the mode of the verses of the feast.

4. STOUDIOS

[5.] It should be known that until the holy Ascension, the resurrection triodia precede the canon of the day just as the resurrection stichera precede the other stichera with the exception of those dealing with the crucifixion. Also, until this feast, we say each day the “Having seen the resurrection of Christ” before the fiftieth psalm.

5. It should be known that until the feast of the Ascension, resurrection stichera precede the penitential kathismata and those of the apostles.

6. It should be known that from Easter until the Ascension we say the “Resurrection of Christ,” then the fiftieth psalm, and hymns in honor of the martyrs in the psalmody. This is not done after the feast of the Ascension.

[6.] It should be known that until the holy day of Pentecost we do not sing the hours nor genuflect; in place of genuflections those who are zealous perform bows. [p. 230] So, too, the proimnia of the hours with the trisagion are sung at each hour.

[7.] It should be known that even though we reckon these days as those of the resurrection, we nevertheless sing the canons for the dead on Saturdays and on any other day if it happens to be a commemoration of a brother.

7. It should be known that until Pentecost, even though we neither sing the hours nor bend our knees, we do sing the canons for the dead on Saturdays, and we sing them on any other day if there happens to be a commemoration of a brother.

[8.–9.] It should be known that on the holy day of Pentecost the morning Gospel is not read nor is anything sung from the Oktoechos, but only that which pertains to the feast.

8. It should be known that on the Saturday of Pentecost at the exaposteilarion we sing the “O Lord, the remembrance of those who have fallen asleep.” Singing this, we go to the graves of the brothers, and while standing there, we sing the stichera of the day, and matins closes. We do this again on the Saturday of Meatfare.

NINTH CENTURY

9. It should be known that in the evening on the Sunday of Holy Pentecost at the office of lamplighting [p. 115] we make three genuflections and say immediately after the proimion the “O Lord I have cried [to thee]” (Ps. 140 [141]:1) and in the morning at matins after the Six Psalms we say the “God is the Lord” (Ps. 117 [118]:27). Immediately, the canon and two readings follow. We pass this week as well without singing the hours.

[10.] Then the Fast of the Holy Apostles arrives,¹¹ and we begin to sing the hours with the kathismata at all times. When the psalmody is finished, we say the “Kyrie eleison” twenty times. At first, we make three genuflections at the same rate, all following the superior and stretching our hands out a little way toward God. Then, we genuflect twenty times more in the same fashion each at his own speed. This is the order at each service. At compline we genuflect fifty times and at matins forty.

It should be known that, when we sing any canon whatsoever, everyone sings the first hour in a plain fashion. Whenever we sing the three kathismata, the psalter, and the triodion however, we all join together and sing the first hour together with the kathisma at the ninth hour. If a canon should be sung during the Great Lent, all chant the first hour together.

[11.] It should be known that at each matins service, we rise up after the reading is completed and say twelve times the “Kyrie eleison,” and thus the psalmody takes up again.

[12.] It should be known that on Saturdays and Sundays we read the Apostolos whenever there is no feast of the Lord or commemoration of a saint on those days. On Saturdays we sing a kathisma at matins before the psalm “Blame-

10. Then the holy fast of the Holy Apostles arrives, and we begin to sing the hours with the kathisma at all times. When the psalmody is finished, we say the “Kyrie eleison, Christe eleison.” At first, we make three prostrations at the same rate, all following the superior and stretching our hands out a little way toward God. Then, we genuflect twenty times more in the same fashion each at his own speed. This is the order at each service. At compline we genuflect fifty times and at matins forty.

11. It should be known that at each matins service, we rise up after the reading is completed and say twelve times the “Kyrie eleison,” and thus the psalmody takes up again.

12. It should be known that on Saturdays and Sundays we read the Apostolos whenever there is no feast of the Lord or commemoration of a saint on those days. On Saturdays we sing a kathisma at matins before the psalm “Blameless” (Ps. 118 [119]), then this psalm followed by the fiftieth psalm and [p. 231] the canon. Three readings then take place. For we do not have a reading at the psalm “Blameless.” In place of the exaposteilarion we say the “The righteous shall be in everlasting remembrance” (Ps. 111 [112]:6). [This order stipulating] what we sing and how much we sing extends as far as the Exaltation of the Life-giving Cross.¹²

4. STOUDIOS

[13.] It should be known that at the Transfiguration and at the Dormition of the All-holy Mother of God,¹³ that is in the evening at the office of lamplighting of the afterfeast, the “O Lord I have cried [to thee]” (Ps. 140 [141]:1) immediately follows the prooimion. Also, in the morning at matins the Six Psalms come first, followed by the “God is the Lord” (Ps. 117 [118]:27), and immediately the canon, and then two readings.

The same order is followed at the Exaltation, at the Birth of the Mother of God,¹⁴ and at the Nativity of Christ as well as at the Feast of the Epiphany¹⁵ and at the Feast of the Presentation of Christ in the Temple.¹⁶ The other feasts besides those listed above are not celebrated in two days.

From the Exaltation to Eastertide, another kathisma is added to the matins services. Moreover, the troparia of the kathisma are repeated twice and a verse is recited in between. There are also four readings. On these Saturdays we sing two exaposteilaria before the psalm “Blameless” (Ps. 118 [119]), then this psalm followed by the canon. There are also four readings inasmuch as we do not read at the psalm “Blameless.” [p. 232] less” (Ps. 118 [119]), then this psalm followed by the fiftieth psalm and the canon. Three readings then take place. For we do not have a reading at the psalm “Blameless.” In place of the exaposteilarion we say the “The righteous shall be in everlasting remembrance” (Ps. 111 [112]:6). [This order stipulating] what we sing and how much we sing extends as far as the Exaltation of the Life-giving Cross.¹² [p. 116]

13. It should be known that at the Dormition of the All-holy Mother of God,¹³ that is in the evening at the office of lamplighting of the afterfeast, the “O Lord I have cried [to thee]” (Ps. 140 [141]:1) immediately follows the prooimion. Also, in the morning at matins the Six Psalms come first, followed by the “God is the Lord” (Ps. 117 [118]:27), and immediately the canon, and then two readings.

The same order is followed at the Exaltation, at the Birth of the Mother of God,¹⁴ and at the Nativity of Christ as well as at the Feast of the Epiphany¹⁵ and at the Feast of the Presentation of Christ in the Temple.¹⁶ The other feasts besides those listed above are not celebrated in two days.

From the Exaltation to the Great Lent, another kathisma is added to the matins services. Moreover, the troparia of the kathisma are repeated twice and a verse is recited in between. There are also four readings. On these Saturdays we sing two exaposteilaria before the psalm “Blameless” (Ps. 118 [119]), then this psalm followed by the canon. There are four readings in as much as we do not read at the psalm “Blameless.”

NINTH CENTURY

Concerning the Holy Lent

[14–17.] Not in Version [A]

14. It should be known that during the Holy and Great Lent we sing four kathismata and the triodion. There are also four readings. When the brothers have rested a little while, the ecclesiarch gives the signal about dawn, and when all have assembled in the main church, we sing the first hour with a kathisma, but we do not have a reading at this time. At the third, sixth, and ninth hour, however, we do read. At each antiphon, that is doxology, there is a prayer by the priest and the deacon. Both at these hours and at the office of lamplighting we perform thirty prostrations, at compline one hundred and at matins eighty.

15. It should be known that during all of Holy Week—with the exception of Holy Saturday—we sing the hours just as we do during the previous weeks. We also make our prostrations until [p. 117] the time when the morning trisagion begins, which is said after the stichera of the verse. After this comes the prokeimenon, the reading of the Apostolos, the reading of the Propheteia, and the Gospel.

16. It should be known that on Wednesdays, Fridays, and Sundays, the Catechesis of our God-bearing father Theodore is read after the dismissal of matins. Thereupon, the superior imparts one of his own [thoughts] to instruct the brothers. After this Catechesis is completed, they say the doxology together with the “Our Father” and the “Bless, O holy ones, bless O father.” Then they are dismissed. This is the order throughout the whole year.

17. It should be known that on Saturday the Resurrection stichera are repeated three times at the “O Lord I have cried [to thee]” (Ps. 140 [141]:1), and two times at the lauds. The same is true on feasts of the Lord.

4. STOUDIOS

[18.] It should be known that there are to be disciplinarians to whom the faults of the junior brothers are referred and who undertake their correction. There should also be two choir monitors, one in each choir, who are to remind the brothers to stand in an orderly manner at choir. There should also be a waker who at the matins readings goes quietly around to the brothers and wakes those sleeping. Moreover, two overseers should be appointed who, each evening after the wooden semantron sounds, are by turns to urge the slothful to run to compline services and again, after the service is dismissed, are to visit the hidden places of the monastery and with fitting severity break up those who are meeting at an improper time.

[19.] It should be known that at each compline all the community should greet one another with the hands in the form of a cross,¹⁷ a sign of reconciliation one with another for all the offenses which have arisen during the day.

[20.] It should be known that on the vigil of the Nativity of Christ and of Epiphany as well as on the evenings of Holy Thursday and of Holy Saturday, we do not sing compline but rather each by himself sings the trisagion.

[21.] It should be known that at almost all of the compline services during Holy Lent either the superior or one of the older brothers who is also experienced in speaking should give a catechism lesson to the brothers.

[22.] It should be known that at each matins service the superior leaves the choir at the beginning of the fourth ode, and taking his seat, receives the brothers who come forward for confession and ministers to each one of them for their benefit.

18. It should be known that there are to be disciplinarians to whom the faults of the junior brothers are referred and who undertake their correction. There should also be two choir monitors, one in each choir, who are to remind the brothers to stand in an orderly manner at choir. There should also be a waker who at the matins readings goes quietly around to the brothers and wakes those sleeping. Moreover, two overseers should be appointed who, each evening after the wooden semantron sounds, are by turns to urge the slothful to run to vespers and to compline services and again, after the compline service is dismissed, are to visit the hidden places of the monastery and with fitting severity break up those who are meeting at an improper time.

19. It should be known that at each compline we should greet one another with the hands [p. 118] in the form of a cross,¹⁷ a sign of reconciliation one with another for all the offenses which have arisen during the day.

20. It should be known that on the vigil of the Nativity of Christ and of Epiphany as well as on the evenings of Holy Thursday and of Holy Saturday, we do not sing compline but rather the trisagion in the refectory.

21. It should be known that at almost all of the compline services during Holy Lent either the superior or one of the older brothers who is also experienced in speaking should give a catechism lesson to the brothers.

22. It should be known that at each matins service the superior leaves the choir at the beginning of the fourth ode, and taking his seat, receives the brothers who come forward for confession and ministers to each one of them for their benefit. [p. 119]

NINTH CENTURY

[23.] It should be known that during Holy Lent an aged brother is chosen who should at the third hour visit each of the ministries, and [p. 233] making a deep bow, say: “Brothers and fathers, brothers and fathers, let us take thought for ourselves, since we shall die, we shall die, we shall die.”

[24.] It should be known that when we receive brothers, either those from another monastery or laymen seeking the monastic life, we require them to stay in the hospice for two or three weeks to see and to experience the monastery. Then, if he remains steadfast in his decision, after the superior has informed him of what awaits him, he, thereupon, introduces him to instruction and enrolls him into his flock. With the permission of the superior the newly arrived prostrates himself before the brothers while they pray for him.

[25.] It should be known that we have also places of confinement in which disobedient and refractory brothers are to be confined; there they are to eat only dry food as they are disciplined in virtue. Punishment with the whip, however, was properly judged unacceptable by the fathers, though it is suitable in the secular world.

[26.] It should be known that on the days when we rest from our corporal work, the keeper of the books sounds the wooden semantron once, and the brothers assemble at the book station; each one takes a book and reads it until the evening. Before the signal for the office of lamplighting, the man in charge of the books sounds the semantron again, and all the brothers come to return their books in accordance with the register. If anyone is late in returning his book, he should suffer some penalty.

[27.] It should be known that when we observe the ninth hour, the priest celebrates the liturgy

23. It should be known that during Holy Lent an aged brother is chosen who should at the third hour visit each of the ministries, and making a deep bow, say: “Brothers and fathers, let us take thought for ourselves, since we shall die, we shall die, we shall die; let us also be mindful of the heavenly kingdom.”

24. It should be known that when we receive brothers, either those from another monastery or laymen seeking the monastic life, we require them to stay in the hospice for two or three weeks to see and to experience the monastery. Then, if he remains steadfast in his decision, after the superior has informed him of what awaits him, he, thereupon, introduces him to instruction and enrolls him into his flock. With the permission of the superior the newly arrived prostrates himself before the brothers while they pray for him.

25. It should be known that we also have places of confinement in which disobedient and refractory brothers are to be confined; there they are to eat only dry food as they are disciplined in virtue. Punishment with the whip, however, was properly judged unacceptable by the fathers, though it is suitable in the secular world.

26. It should be known that on the days when we rest from our corporal work, the keeper of the books sounds the wooden semantron once, and the brothers assemble at the book station; each one takes a book and reads it until the evening. Before the signal for the office of lamplighting, the man in charge of the books sounds the semantron again, and all the brothers come to return their books in accordance with the register. If anyone is late in returning his book, he should suffer some penalty.

27. It should be known that when we observe the ninth hour, the priest celebrates the liturgy at the sixth; if, however, we are going to eat at the sixth, [the liturgy takes place] at the third hour. If we are not performing the hours and are working, the signal for the divine liturgy is at the third hour. When the liturgy is finished, the wooden semantron sounds three times, and all the brothers assemble in the same place, and after singing the required verses and receiving the blessed bread, they go down to the refectory.

4. STODIOS

Concerning what is to be eaten and drunk and how much and also concerning the proper order at table

[28.] When the brothers come down for the mid-day meal, they should carry a verse [of the psalm] on their lips. They are to sit nine to a table. The [p.234] monitors ensure that the tables are filled up in an orderly fashion without commotion. A reading then takes place, and if it is wintertime the brothers wear their cowls on their heads. The signal for ending this reading is the sound of the spoons at the last serving, when all together toss them on their dishes. Similarly, at a signal the wine is poured and food is served.

[29.] It should be known that from Eastertide until All Saints¹⁸ we eat two cooked dishes—garden vegetables and legumes with olive oil. We also eat fish, cheese, and eggs; we drink three [measures of wine] at midday and three in the evening. When the wooden semantron sounds, the brothers come down and eat their bread as well as any food that may have been left over from the morning. For there is not food prepared especially for the evening; [they also drink] two servings of wine.

During the Fast of the Holy Apostles we do not eat fish, cheese, or eggs except on the days we [p. 120] at the sixth; if, however, we are going to eat [at the sixth, the liturgy takes place] at the third hour. If we are not performing the hours and are working, the signal for the divine liturgy is at the third hour. When the liturgy is finished, the wooden semantron sounds three times, and all the brothers assemble in the same place, and after singing the required verses and receiving the blessed bread, they leave for the refectory.

Concerning what is to be eaten and drunk and how much and also concerning the proper order at table

28. When the brothers come over for the mid-day meal, they should carry their verse [of the psalm] on their lips. They are to sit nine to a dining table. The monitors ensure that the tables are filled up in an orderly fashion without commotion. A reading then takes place while the brothers wear their cowls on their heads. The signal for ending this reading is the sound of the spoons at the last serving, when all together toss them on their dishes. Similarly, at a signal the wine is poured and food is served.

29. It should be known that from Eastertide until All Saints¹⁸ we eat two cooked dishes—garden vegetables and legumes with olive oil. We also eat fish, cheese, and eggs. We drink three [measures of wine] at midday. When the wooden semantron sounds, the brothers come out to eat their bread as well as any food that may have been left over from the morning. For the community has no food prepared especially for the evening. [They also drink] two servings of wine.

During the Fast of the Holy Apostles we do not eat fish, cheese, or eggs except on the days we do not sing [the hours]. Instead, we eat two cooked dishes—one vegetable dish with olive oil and one of legumes without oil—and [have] two servings of wine at the ninth hour and two in the evening. On feast days, however, on which we are permitted cheese and other [such] foods, we eat at the sixth hour and drink three [measures of wine] at the sixth hour and two in the evening. This regimen is also maintained during the Fast of the Holy Apostle Philip.¹⁹

From the feast of the Holy Apostles to the commemoration of St. Philip, on Wednesdays and Fridays we perform the ninth hour. On these days too we observe the same regimen regarding food and drink as we do during these two fasts. If the commemoration of a saint falls on one of these days, we rest from the hours and from prostrations. We eat fish, if offered to us, together with three servings of wine at midday and two in the evening.

Concerning the Holy Lent

[30.] During the Holy and Great Lent, we have only one meal a day except on Saturday and Sunday. During the first week and during the Great Week [p. 235] our meals are unvaried—that is, boiled beans and chickpeas, *almaia*²⁰ without olive oil, five dried figs per person, and if possible, chestnuts, cooked pears, and prunes. During the second, third, fifth, and sixth weeks excluding Wednesdays and Fridays, we eat as follows: boiled beans and olives in a bowl, a cooked dish of legumes with a vegetable [seasoned] with ground nutmeg. During these weeks, on the other hand, we do not eat fruits or dried figs. On Wednesdays and Fridays, however, we eat as we do during the first week.

do not sing the hours. Instead, we eat two cooked dishes at the ninth hour [p. 121]—one vegetable dish with olive oil and one of legumes without oil—and [have] two servings of wine at the ninth hour and two in the evening. On feast days, however, on which we are permitted cheese and other [such] foods, we eat at the sixth hour and drink three [measures of wine] at the sixth hour and two in the evening. This is also the regimen during the Fast of the Holy Apostle Philip.¹⁹ On account of the short days during the fast of Saint Philip, however, we eat one meal, but drink three [measures of wine].

From the feast of the Apostles to that of St. Philip, on Wednesdays and Fridays we perform the ninth hour. If the commemoration of a saint falls on one of these days, we rest from the hours and from prostrations, and we eat cheese, eggs, and fish, if God should provide it for us, together with three servings of wine at midday and two in the evening.

Concerning the Holy [and] Great Lent

30. During the Holy and Great Lent, we have only one meal a day except on Saturday and Sunday. During the first week and during the middle week our meals are unvaried—that is, boiled beans and *almaia*²⁰ without olive oil, five dried figs per person, and if possible, chestnuts, cooked pears, and prunes.

During the second, third, fifth, and sixth weeks we eat as follows: boiled beans and almaia in a bowl and a cooked dish of legumes [seasoned] with ground nutmeg. During these weeks, on the other hand, we do not eat fruits or dried figs.

4. STOUDIOS

With the exception of the sick or the aged, we drink eukraton throughout the entire Holy Lent. This eukraton consists of pepper, cumin, anise, and hot water.

It should be known that on the first Saturday, starting on Friday evening, we do not perform prostrations. On the same Friday we eat boiled beans with white and black olives, almaia, and kollyba. We all drink up to one measure of wine as well. On Saturday at the midday meal we eat two cooked dishes with olive oil and drink two measures of wine per person; we drink two measures of wine in the evening as well. Moreover, the order is the same for the first Sunday when the commemoration of the holy prophets and of orthodoxy is celebrated as well as for the Sunday of the Great Week when we sing the Canon of the venerable cross.²¹ So also is the order for the Saturday of Lazarus²² and for the commemoration of the Forty Saints²³ save that at that time we sing the hours and perform only three prostrations at each service.

In honor of finding the venerable head of our lord [St. John] the Forerunner,²⁴ we eat two cooked dishes—vegetables and legumes—each with olive oil and also green bean-like (?) olives.²⁵ We drink three [measures of wine] each. We observe the same regimen on Palm Sunday and when the Great Canon is sung.²⁶

On Holy Thursday, however, we eat one cooked dish of legumes with ground nutmeg and boiled beans. Moreover, we drink up to one [measure of wine]. On Holy Saturday, the office of lamplighting begins at the eleventh hour and when the dismissal has come, we eat bread and fruit and drink each two cups of wine.
[p. 236]

With the exception of the sick or the aged, we drink eukraton throughout the entire Holy Lent. This eukraton consists of pepper, cumin, anise, and hot water.

On Holy Monday, Tuesday, Wednesday, Thursday, and Friday the food [p. 122] is similar to that of the first week.

On Holy Thursday, however, we eat one cooked dish of legumes with ground nutmeg and boiled beans, and we drink up to one [measure of wine]. On Holy Saturday at the eleventh hour the office of lamplighting begins. When the dismissal has come, we eat cheese, fish, and eggs, and we drink three cups of wine.

NINTH CENTURY

Concerning the Annunciation

[31.] It should be known that at the sixth hour the wooden semantron sounds and we all assemble in the house of the All-spotless Mother of God and before the office of lamplighting we raise up a litany as we march around the monastery. We return, sing the office of lamplighting, and then the entrance and complete liturgy take place. Afterwards, we eat fish and olive oil and drink each three [measures].

[32.] It should be known that each day during the Great Week of the Holy Lent after the ninth hour has been sung, the life-giving wood is presented before us and we all do reverence.

Concerning the organization of tasks

[33.] It should be known that during the Holy and Great Lent after we have sung the first hour and the sun has already risen, each goes to his own task. While performing these, the entire psalter is recited, except in the case of the copyists. The brothers work until the ninth hour and thereafter each occupies himself as he wishes, either studying or sleeping until the signal sounds three times. After the signal we assemble in church and hold the office of lamplighting. We go down to table and after eating, we do not labor, but study. On the other days of the year, when we do [not] sing the hours, the signal sounds three times in the morning, and each one goes off to his own task and works until the midday meal. After eating, each one occupies himself in the fashion we have mentioned until the seventh hour. At the seventh hour the signal sounds three times and again each one goes off to his own task until the office of lamplighting. When we do sing the hours, however, the brothers celebrate the

Concerning the Annunciation

31. It should be known that at the sixth hour the wooden semantron sounds and we all assemble in the house of the All-spotless Mother of God. When the office of lamplighting begins, a few brothers stand there to perform it, while the others raise up a litany and march around the monastery. When they return, the entrance [takes place] and a complete liturgy. Afterwards, we eat fish and olive oil and drink each three [measures].

32. It should be known that each day during the middle week of the Holy Lent after the ninth hour has been sung, the life-giving wood is presented before us, and we all do reverence.

Concerning the organization of tasks

33. It should be known that during the Holy and Great Lent after we have sung the first hour and the sun has already risen, each goes to his own task. While performing these, the entire psalter is recited, except in the case of the copyists. The brothers work until the ninth hour. After we sing the office of lamplighting and eat, each occupies himself as he wishes.

On the other days of the year, [p. 123] when we do not sing the hours, the signal sounds three times in the morning, and each one goes off to his own task and works until the midday meal. After eating, each one occupies himself as he wishes, either studying or sleeping until the eighth hour. At the eighth hour the signal sounds three times and again each one goes off to his own task until the office of lamplighting. When we do sing the hours, however, the brothers celebrate the first hour in the morning and go first hour in the morning and go off to their individual tasks and labor through to the sixth hour, whether or not there is a ninth hour. After the sixth hour each one rests as was stated until the ninth hour; thereafter the same order follows. [p. 237]

4. STOUDIOS

[34.] It should be known that during the vigil of Palm Sunday at the “O Lord I have cried [to thee],” (Ps. 140 [141]:1) the choir changes place, those on the right crossing over to the left side and those on the left to the right side.

[35.] It should be known that whenever a brother breaks a vessel either of earthenware or of metal at the midday meal, while the brothers are eating, he stands near to the superior’s table with his cowl covering his head and holds the vessel he has smashed in his hands as a sign of his own fault.

[36.] It should be known that when we sing the canon for matins, the one in charge of the canon sounds the signal three times at dawn. The brothers rise up and each one performs the first hour in a plain fashion and goes off to his proper task. The signal sounds again three times when the canon is about to be sung and at the third doxology of the kathisma so that those who are still learning the psalter can be assembled, for they go out after the Six Psalms and study until this time. The signal sounds again three times at lauds when the Catechesis of the great father and superior Theodore is about to be read.

Cf. [A38]

off to their individual tasks and labor through to the sixth hour, whether or not there is a ninth hour. After the sixth hour each one rests as was stated until the eighth hour.

34. It should be known that during the vigil of Palm Sunday at the “O Lord, I have cried [to thee],” the choir changes place, those on the right crossing over to the left side and those on the left to the right side.

35. It should be known that whenever a brother breaks a vessel either of earthenware or of metal at the midday meal, while the brothers are eating, he stands near to the superior’s table with his cowl covering his head and holds the vessel he has smashed in his hands as a sign of his own fault.

36. It should be known that after we have recited the psalter, the one in charge of the canon signals three times at the third doxology of the kathisma so that those who are still learning the psalter can be assembled so that we can sing the canon together. For these [brothers] go out after the Six Psalms and study up until this time. The signal sounds again three times at lauds when the Catechesis of the great father and superior Theodore is about to be read.

37. It should be known that on the vigil of the Feast of Epiphany after the dismissal [p. 124] of the divine liturgy, we receive blessed bread. Afterwards, those who have received communion take a sip of a drink,²⁷ but we do not eat the blessed bread. Having collected the vessels, the priest goes to the holy doors and, having offered a prayer, he exits to the fountain [in the atrium of the church] singing the “While thou wert being baptized in the Jordan, O Lord.” When this is said, the synapte is recited by the deacon. When this is finished, the priest begins the prayer of blessing [of the water]. After the waters have been sanctified and the brothers sprinkled, the troparion “The voice of the Lord sounded over the water saying” is sung in the fourth plagal mode. The first verse is “The sea saw and fled” (Ps. 113 [114]:3); the second verse, “What ailed thee, O sea, that thou fleddest?” (Ps. 113 [114]:5). After this troparion has been sung three times we go back into the church, and in the fourth mode we sing the troparion “He who divinely clothes himself with light.” When this is repeated three times, the priest offers a prayer, and the holy doxology is finished. Thereupon, the brothers file out in order to the refectory. In the same fashion the washing of the feet takes place on Holy Thursday after the [monks have received] communion and taken a sip of a drink. When all have had their feet washed, they file out to the refectory.

NINTH CENTURY

Concerning the amount of clothes and footwear and the arrangement of bedding

[37.] It should be known that each of the brothers ought to have two undergarments, two woolen tunics, one outer garment not made of wool, two cowls, a small scapular for work, and another more copious one for church which according to custom is used on Saturday evening at the office of lamplighting and on Sunday at matins and again in the evening at the office of lamplighting until the “Lord, vouchsafe,” and before that at the divine liturgy. This is also the custom on feasts of the Lord. Each brother

Concerning the amount of clothes and footwear and the arrangement of bedding and concerning other such matters [p. 125]

38. It should be known that each of the brothers ought to have two undergarments, two outer garments, one woolen garment, two cowls, a small scapular for work, and another more copious one for church which according to custom is used on Saturday evening at the office of lamplighting, and on Sunday at matins, and again in the evening at the office of lamplighting, and before that at the divine liturgy. This is also the custom on feasts of the Lord. Each brother should also have another should also have another large woolen scapular; for footwear, he should have short-legged boots, additional long-legged boots, and leggings. For his bed he should have a straw mat, a mat of Cilician goat hair, and two fleece woolen blankets. [p. 238] large woolen scapular. For footwear, he should have short-legged boots, additional long-legged boots, and shoes. For his bed he should have a straw mat, a mat of Cilician goat hair, and two fleece woolen blankets.

4. STOUDIOS

[38.] It should be known that on the vigil of the Feast of Epiphany after the dismissal of the divine liturgy, we receive blessed bread. Afterwards, those who have received communion take a sip of a drink²⁷, but we do not eat the blessed bread. Having collected the vessels, the priest goes to the holy doors and, having offered a prayer, he exits to the fountain [in the atrium of the church] together with the brothers who sing the troparion “The voice of the Lord on the waters” in the fourth mode. When this has been chanted three times and the customary readings have been finished, the deacon recites the synapte. When this is finished, the priest begins the prayer of blessing [of the waters]. After the waters have been blessed, and the brothers have been sprinkled, the troparion “While thou wert being baptized in the Jordan, O Lord” is sung in the first mode.

Cf. [B37]

After this troparion has been sung three times, we go into the church singing the troparion “Today the Trinity in the unity of Divinity.” When this is sung three times, the priest offers a prayer and the holy doxology is finished. Thereupon, the brothers file out in order to the refectory. In the same fashion the washing of the feet takes place on Holy Thursday after [the monks have received] communion and taken a sip of a drink. When all have had their feet washed, they file out [to the refectory].

NINTH CENTURY

Notes on the Translation

Editors' note: The assistance of our translator, Timothy Miller [TM], is gratefully acknowledged for the notes to this document.

1. Theodore is not known to have composed a written monastic rule (aside from his Testament, (3) Theodore Studites), but the reference may be to the oral tradition received from him, for which see Leroy, “Réforme,” p. 209: “An unwritten rule is no less a rule.”
2. For the mechanical water clock, see Leroy, “Cursus,” p. 8, n. 10; cf. (22) Evergetis [6].
3. The wider, central doorway among the five doors leading from the narthex into the nave of the church; see T. Mathews, The Early Churches of Constantinople (University Park, Pa., 1971), p. 22.
4. On the eight sets of melodic formulas in Byzantine music known as modes (echoi), see O. Strunk, Essays on Music in the Byzantine World (New York, 1977), pp. 3–36.
5. The Six Psalms (Hexapsalmos) of matins are Ps. 3, 37 [38], 62 [63], 87 [88], 102 [103], and 142 [143].
6. Gregory Nazianzen, Oratio I, PG 35, col. 396A.
7. Iamprophoros Kyriake, i.e., Easter Sunday.
8. Pseudo-Chrysostom, Homilia in Sanctam Pascham, PG 59, col. 721.
9. See Is. 8.9 and Mega Horologion, ed. M. Saliveros (Athens, n.d.), pp. 203–4.
10. The grave mode is mode seven, or the third plagal mode; [B3], however, prescribes for the fourth plagal mode. [TM]
11. Fast of the Holy Apostles, from Monday after the feast of All Saints (Sunday after Pentecost) through the vigil of the feast of Sts. Peter and Paul, June 28.
12. Feast of the Exaltation of the Holy Cross, September 14.
13. Feast of the Transfiguration, August 6; feast of the Dormition of the Mother of God, August 15.
14. Feast of the Birth of the Mother of God, September 8.
15. Feast of the Epiphany, January 6.
16. Feast of the Presentation of Christ in the Temple, February 2.
17. On this form of salutation and its symbolic meaning, see Niketas Stethatos, “De salutatione manibus facta,” PG 120, 1009A–1012A.
18. Feast of All Saints, the Sunday after Pentecost.
19. Fast of St. Philip, from November 15 until Christmas.
20. Cabbage preserved in brine and vinegar. See Koukoules, BBP, v. 5, p. 93.
21. The third Sunday of Lent.
22. The Saturday before Palm Sunday.
23. Feast of the Forty Martyrs, March 9.
24. Feast of the Discovery of the Head of St. John the Baptist, February 24.
25. prophaia kokkoelaia: neither word is attested in the standard dictionaries. The reference is most probably to small olives harvested for pickling before they ripen and turn dark.
26. A very long penitential hymn by Andrew of Crete (d. 740), sung in its entirety during the fifth week of the Great Lent. See PG 97, cols. 1305–44.
27. diaklyometha: The terms diaklyein and diaklysmos (lit. “rinsing of the mouth”) refer to a drink of water or wine—as is the case here—or to a collation of wine and a piece of blessed bread given to the monks after communion (cf. C. Du Cange, Glossarium ad scriptores mediae et infimae Graecitatis [Lyon, 1688; repr. Gratz, 1958] s.v. diaklyein / diaklyzein, (20) Black Mountain [73] and (31) Areia [T] 2). P. Gautier’s view that diaklysmos consisted of “a piece of bread dipped in oil, water and wine” is not supported by the evidence in the typika (cf. Gautier, “Le typicon du Christ Sauveur Pantocrator, REB 32 (1974), 88, n. 15). (19) Attaleiates [36] and (28) Pantokrator [44]—the only documents, in addition to (20) Black Mountain [73], which contain information regarding the food served as collation—provide only for wheat and wine to be used for the collation and make no mention of oil. Finally it must be noted that (22) Evergetis [9], [10], (27) Kecharitomene [47], (29) Kosmosoteira [21], (30) Phoberos

4. STOUDIOS

[21], [28], (32) Mamas [17], [18], and (33) Heliou Bomon [17], [18] do not specify that diaklysmos following the liturgy was limited to recipients of communion, while (28) Pantokrator [44] associates it with a memorial service for the founders and (23) Pakourianos [8] uses diaklysis to denote a refreshment offered to visitors of the monastery.

Document Notes

- [2] Regulations for Easter Service. See G. Bertonière, The Historical Development of the Easter Vigil and Related Services in the Greek Church (= OCA 193 [Rome, 1972]). Version [A] is considerably longer than Version [B]. The ceremony prescribed in the former is more complex, the official participants more numerous, and the liturgical prescriptions more precise than in the latter, all of which suggests that the monastery for which [A] was drawn up was larger than that of [B]. [A] also takes place within the geographical context of Stoudios itself, mentioning local Constantinopolitan landmarks such as the Sea of Marmora and a chapel of the Mother of God (for which see Janin, Géographie, vol. 3, p. 439). This chapter is copied later by (11) Ath. Rule [1], [2], and [3], using both [A2] and [B2].
- [3] Liturgical prescriptions for the Sunday of Renovation. This is the Sunday after Easter, variously titled “New Sunday” (Nea Kyriake) [A], the Sunday of the Radiant Week [B], or “Low Sunday” in the Latin rite. [A] and [B] both begin with the Six Psalms, but the services diverge thereafter. Both mention the vespers service, but only [A] offers details, including the specification of the proper plagal modes (paralleled below in [B4]). [B3] continues, paralleling [A4]. This chapter copied later by (11) Ath. Rule [3].
- [4] Performance of the hours during Easter Season. [A4], paralleled by part of [B3], prescribes at length for the matins service. This portion is copied later by (11) Ath. Rule [3]. [B3], treating matins more briefly, then discusses exemptions from performance of compline and, again briefly, vespers. The discussion of compline is utilized later by (11) Ath. Rule [3] as well. [B4], treating vespers services for dominical feasts, has the same prescriptions as [A3] does for the Sunday of Renovation vespers service.
- [5] Specifications for the canon during Easter Season. In the Studite usage, the canon [A] is a combination of the midnight office (mesonyktikon) [B] and matins (orthros); see Leroy, “Cursus,” p. 15. The concluding portion of [A5] is paralleled by [B6]. Copied later by (11) Ath. Rule [4].
- [A6] Omission of hours and genuflections during Easter Season. Copied later by (11) Ath. Rule [6].
- [B6] Liturgical observances during Easter Season. Parallels the conclusion of [A5].
- [7] Canons for the departed not to be omitted. Piety towards the souls of the departed outweighs the Eastertide exemption from chanting the hours. Version [B7] copied later by (11) Ath. Rule [6].
- [8], [9] Liturgical observances for Pentecost Sunday. The treatment in [A] is much briefer than that in [B8] and [B9]; a numeration for [A8] has been reserved to preserve subsequent parallelism between [A] and [B].
- [B8] Graveside memorial for departed monks on Saturdays of Pentecost and Meatfare. These are the traditional days of remembrance for the departed. Entirely omitted in [A].
- [A9] Liturgical prescriptions for Pentecost. The import is that the weekly proper (the oktoechos) is not to be used for this feast. Omitted in [B].
- [B9] Vesper service on Pentecost Sunday. Omitted in [A]. Copied later by (11) Ath. Rule [7].
- [10] Liturgical procedures for the fast of the Holy Apostles. Governs the ecclesiastical calendar from the second week after Pentecost to June 29; cf. dietary provisions below in [29]. [A] contains additional instructions for the performance of the first hour omitted by [B]. According to Jacques Froger, Les origines de Prime (Rome, 1946), p. 73, this document is where the office of prime makes its first appearance in the Byzantine Empire (see also [B14], [33] and [A36] below); but Leroy, “Cursus,” p. 15 argues that its existence is implied in Theodore’s earlier use of the term “canon.” This chapter is copied later by (11) Ath. Rule [7], [9].
- [11] Recitation of the kyrie at matins. Copied later by (11) Ath. Rule [12].
- [13] Liturgical procedures for feasts. These are the feasts of the Dormition (August 15), the Transfiguration

NINTH CENTURY

- (August 6), the Exaltation (September 14), the Nativity of the Virgin (September 8), the Epiphany (January 6), and the Presentation of Christ in the Temple (February 2). [B] omits the feast of the Transfiguration. Copied later by (11) Ath. Rule [13].
- [B14] through [B17] Liturgical prescriptions for the Lenten Fast. These four chapters are missing in [A], but the numeration is reserved to preserve subsequent parallelism between [A] and [B].
- [B14] Performance of the hours during Lent. Copied later by (11) Ath. Rule [15].
- [B15] Performance of the hours during Holy Week. Copied later by (11) Ath. Rule [15].
- [B16] Catechesis of St. Theodore after matins. Cf. [36], (3) Theodore Studites [11] and Leroy, “Petites Catéchèses,” p. 355. The provision below in [21] for another catechism lesson at compline led Leroy, p. 356, to speculate that the morning lesson was taken from the Small Catecheses and the evening from the Great Catecheses.
- [18] Officers of the monastery. For references to these officers in Theodore’s own writings, see Leroy, “Réforme,” p. 201, n. 162 (disciplinarians), n. 163 (choir organizers), n. 164 (overseers); p. 190, n. 67 (waker, possibly an office borrowed from Dorotheos of Gaza). Copied later by (11) Ath. Rule [17].
- [20] Omission of compline on eve of major feasts. As a substitute, [A] provides for solitary recitation of the trisagion, while [B] has the trisagion sung in the refectory. Copied later by (11) Ath. Rule [4].
- [21] Lenten catechism lesson at compline. Cf. [B16], [36], and (3) Theodore Studites [11]; discussion by Leroy, “Petites Catéchèses,” p. 355.
- [22] Confession at matins. See discussion by Leroy, “Vie,” p. 33; according to Leroy, “Réforme,” p. 188, n. 54, Theodore argues for the importance of confession as an obligation imposed by patristic authorities in his Great Catecheses 1.31 (unedited).
- [23] Lenten reminder of death at the third hour. See discussion by Leroy, “Vie,” p. 45. Copied later by (11) Ath. Rule [16].
- [24] Testing of novices. Compare to the novitiate of six months prescribed by (22) Evergetis [37] for “common and the unknown” applicants. Copied later by (11) Ath. Rule [18].
- [25] Confinement; prohibition of corporal punishment. The use of imprisonment is confirmed by Theodore the Studite, Great Catecheses 1.27, 81 (unedited), according to Leroy, “Réforme,” p. 211, n. 238. Copied later by (11) Ath. Rule [19]. For the use of monasteries as jails, see André Guillou, “Le monde carcéral en Italie du sud et en Sicile au VI^e–VII^e siècle,” JÖB 33 (1983), pp. 79–86.
- [26] Procedures for reading on days of rest. According to Theodore the Studite, Great Catecheses 2.89, ed. Papadopoulos-Kerameus, Megale Katechesis, p. 634, Sunday was the day consecrated to reading; see Leroy, “Vie,” p. 48, with n. 1.
- [27] Timing of the liturgy and meals. According to Leroy, “Vie,” p. 46, the celebration of the liturgy took place at the sixth hour, but was advanced during Easter season to the third hour because there were two daily meals at that time, the first of which was taken at midday (i.e., when the liturgy would otherwise have taken place). Copied later by (11) Ath. Rule [8].
- [28], [29] Dietary regulations and refectory procedures. Beck, KTL, p. 494, regards this as a separate work that has been encapsulated within the typikon. Possibly part of the lost Testamentary Rule of Theodosios the Koinobiarch, for which see Leroy, “Réforme,” p. 209, n. 220.
- [28] Refectory procedures. [A] allows monks to wear cowls on their head “in wintertime;” [B] does not so restrict. Copied later by (11) Ath. Rule [21].
- [29] Diet from Easter to All Saints (first Sunday after Pentecost). Includes also regulations for the fasts of the Holy Apostles (from Monday after the feast of All Saints to the vigil of the feast of Sts. Peter and Paul, June 28) and of St. Philip (the Christmas fast, from November 15, the day after the feast of St. Philip). The diet for the last fast is stricter in [B], with the evening meal being eliminated “on account of the short (winter) days.” Copied later by (11) Ath. Rule [22], [23], [24].
- [30] Diet for the Lenten fast. Both [A] and [B] require that the strict fast of the first week of Lent be observed again during the middle (fourth) week of Lent. [B] omits olives from the list of foods permitted on the non-fast regular days of the week. [A] provides for prostrations of repentance starting on Friday of the first week that are omitted in [B]. [A] also is alone in extending the more lenient weekday diet to Orthodoxy Sunday (first Sunday in Lent), the Sunday of the Veneration of the Cross (third Sunday in Lent), and the feasts of St. Lazarus (the day before Palm Sunday) and the Holy Martyrs (of Sebaste, March 9), while it allows an even more lenient diet for the feast of St. John the Forerunner (February 24), Palm Sunday and the days when the Great Canon is sung. [B] is more lenient than [A] only in the diet for Holy Saturday. This chapter is utilized later by (11) Ath. Rule [25], [26] in its own Lenten dietary prescriptions.

4. STOUDIOS

- [31] Feast of the Annunciation. The breaking of the Lenten fast for the celebration of this feast (March 25) was a common yet also controversial feature of the dietary regulation of Byzantine monasteries, accepted without qualification by (7) Latros [5], (20) Black Mountain [60], and (22) Evergetis [10] among others, but limited by (30) Phoberos [28], (29) Kecharitomene [47], and (34) Machairas [71], particularly when the feast occurred during Holy Week.
- [32] Veneration of the Holy Cross. Great Week [A] and middle week [B] are equivalent. Utilized later by (11) Ath. Rule [28].
- [33] Regulation of hours for work. On days when hours were not recited (i.e., non-fast days), [A] has a work day that is an hour longer than [B]. For the length of the Studite work day, see Leroy, “Vie,” p. 45.
- [35] Punishment for breaking dishware. This stray chapter seems out of place both in [A] and [B]. For this offense and punishment, see also Theodore the Studite, GC 2.59, ed. Papadopoulos-Kerameus, Megale Katechesis, p. 424, with Leroy, “Réforme,” p. 211.
- [36] Regulation of the canon of matins. For a historical discussion of the office, see M. Arranz, “Les prières presbytérales des matines byzantines,” OCP 37 (1971), 406–36, and 38 (1972), 64–115.
- [A37] (= [B38]) Regulation of clothing and bedding. [A] and [B] differ in their prescriptions for clothes, with [B] favoring apparently heavier items. Both are utilized later by (11) Ath. Rule [35]. For Theodore’s views on clothing, see (3) Theodore Studites [19] and Leroy, “Réforme,” pp. 192 and 193, n. 85. In his day clothes were redistributed weekly on Sunday. Monks slept in cubicles (koitaria), apparently individual cells (Leroy, “Vie,” p. 30).
- [A38] (= [B37]) Feast of the Epiphany. [B] has chosen a more logical place for this chapter within the document. The text of [B37] is a little longer than [A38], thanks to careful identification of the prescribed troparia. See also later treatments of this feast in (20) Black Mountain [92] and (27) Kecharitomene [72].

5. Euthymios: Testament of Euthymios for the Monasteries of Psamathia and Ta Agathou

Date: 917¹

Translator: Patricia Karlin-Hayter

Editions employed: P. Karlin-Hayter, Vita Euthymii Patriarchae CP (Brussels, 1970), with text at pp. 3–147 (Testament = chap. 23, pp. 143–47), and commentary, pp. 148–233; replaces “Vita S. Euthymii,” Byzantion 25 (1955–57), 1–172.

Manuscript: Former Berlin, State Library, graecus fol. 55 (12th c.)²

Other translations: P. Karlin-Hayter, Vita, pp. 142–46, employed here with minor adjustments to harmonize with the editorial conventions of this collection; Russian, by Alexander Kazhdan, Dve vizantiiskie chroniki x veka (Moscow, 1959), pp. 80–81.

Institutional History

The Testament is encapsulated in the anonymous Life of St. Euthymios, itself an important source of information on patronage in this era of traditional private religious foundations. Euthymios was the spiritual father of Emperor Leo VI the Wise (886–912), who had offered him (Vita, chap. 4, p. 24) the directorship of the imperial monastery of Sts. Sergios and Bakchos in Constantinople. This offer Euthymios turned down, declaring “God forbid that I should water another’s plantation.” Euthymios particularly objected to the necessity to cancel the rules drawn up by the previous founder in order to set up his own regulations and canons “as I would not be pleased to have happen to me at another’s hand.” In this way Euthymios showed the pietistic respect of one generation of founders towards the legislative arrangements of its predecessors, but he demonstrated even more strongly the typical Byzantine founder’s preference for a new institution all his own, “raised up for me from the very foundations,” as he put it. Yet he agreed (Vita, chap. 5, p. 29) to accept a property near the Stoudios monastery in the Psamathia quarter of Constantinople where there was an existing church of Sts. Kosmas and Damian suitable for enlargement.³ This had belonged to the disgraced courtier Leo Katakoilas, a relative of the deposed Patriarch Photios (878–886) and former admiral of the fleet, who had purchased the property privately, only to see the emperor confiscate it (presumably in 886) along with the rest of Katakoilas’ properties. When the disgraced courtier’s relatives protested the award to Euthymios, he scrupulously insisted that Leo VI recall Katakoilas from exile, pay him a just price for the confiscated properties, and receive from him the deeds of title in return. The account illustrates the contemporary acceptance of the sale and purchase of religious institutions as well as how private founders respected one another’s property rights in them.

Euthymios persuaded Leo VI to enlarge the monastery by adding subsidiary chapels dedicated to St. John the Forerunner and the Archangel Michael. Patriarch Stephen (886–893) officiated (Vita, chap. 5, p. 35) at the dedication, probably before 890, to which the emperor had also summoned “the chosen band” of the Studite monks. There is an interesting account (Vita, chap. 9, pp. 51–55) of Leo VI’s visit to Euthymios’ monastery in 899, on which occasion Euthymios hailed him as the founder (ktetor). The emperor arrived at supper time and commented on the “detestable” quality of the wine, the quantity (if not the quality) of which he was told was prescribed “according to the rule we have received,” an allusion to a now lost typikon for the foundation like (4) Stoudios. Indeed, given the close friendship of Euthymios with Arkadios, the superior of the Stoudios monastery (Vita, chap. 9, pp. 55, 57), and before him, an earlier Studite superior Anatolios (Vita, chap. 2), it is not impossible that this typikon was a variant of (4) Stoudios. To remedy the deficiency in the quality of the monks’ wine, Leo VI awarded the monastery a property formerly possessed by Empress Theophano capable of supplying a wine of suitable quality.

5. EUTHYMIOS

Euthymios’ biographer is anxious (Vita, chap. 8, p. 47) to establish his hero’s opposition to Leo VI’s controversial relationship with Zoe Carbonopsina, for which he claims Euthymios was exiled for two years at the monastery of St. Diomedous, a foundation rebuilt by Leo VI’s father Basil I (867–886).⁴ But eventually Euthymios proved more flexible on the issue than the patriarch, Nicholas I Mystikos (901–907), for Euthymios was chosen to replace the latter in that office in 907. In 910, the emperor’s powerful courtier Samonas, one of several high officials opposed by Euthymios, was temporarily confined at the monastery.⁵

Euthymios’ foundation also had a dependency (metochion) in the Asiatic suburbs of the city (Vita, chap. 16, p. 109) known as the monastery of Ta Agathou, that is, “on the estates of Agathos.”⁶ The identity of the individual who gave his name to the site and the precise location of this monastery are unknown, but the monastery itself was founded by Patriarch Nikephoros I (806–815), perhaps in a private capacity before his elevation to the patriarchate (Janin, Géographie, vol. 2, p. 23). After his deposition by Emperor Leo V (813–820), the patriarch was exiled here briefly before being transferred to another of the monasteries he had founded nearby.⁷ The estates on which the monastery was located were among those confiscated by Leo VI from Leo Katakoilas. Later, Leo VI awarded these properties, along with Katakoilas’ estates in Psamathia, to Euthymios (Vita, chap. 5, p. 29). The monastery once again became home to a deposed patriarch when Euthymios himself was exiled here (Vita, chap. 19; cf. 20) after his own deposition by Emperor Alexander I (912–913) on May 15, 912. Euthymios’ predecessor Nicholas I Mystikos (912–925) then returned to office for a second term as patriarch. After the death of that emperor in 913, Euthymios turned down (Vita, chap. 21) an appeal from Leo VI’s widow Zoe, then embroiled in a bitter struggle with Nicholas Mystikos, to accept reinstatement as patriarch. Euthymios was reconciled (Vita, chap. 32, pp. 141–43) with Nicholas Mystikos there in late July 917, shortly before Euthymios died at the dependency in early August 4 of that same year. Nothing is known of either the Psamathia foundation or its dependency after Euthymios’ time.

Analysis

Euthymios’ Testament is preserved at the end of the Life (= Vita, chap. 23). In it he provides [1] for a collective leadership of three of his subordinates for the 24 monks at Psamathia.⁸ He prescribes a similar arrangement of three monks providing the collective superiorship for the 12 monks at Ta Agathou. Subsequently, the community at Psamathia would elect a new superior in an open vote; a steward would be appointed from among the monks at Psamathia to administer Ta Agathou. The new superior of Psamathia would be responsible for the overall administration of both facilities. There is another reference [2] to the lost rule governing the foundation mentioned earlier (Vita, chap. 9). A discussion of Euthymios' burial wishes follows, at which point the text breaks off.

As with the Stoudios monastery at that time, both a typikon and a testament governed this foundation, but here the order of composition of the documents was reversed. This would become the more typical pattern for Byzantine monasticism (e.g., (11) Ath. Rule, followed by (14) Ath. Testament). Like Euthymios, founders frequently were willing to allow their communities to exercise a form of self-governance in the next generation (see (10) Eleousa [16]), which suggests that there was a built-in tendency towards institutional autonomy even in private foundations.

The nature of the legal relationship between lay (and imperial) patrons and monastic directors, which is quite a common one in the Byzantine era, calls for further study. After Leo VI's death in 912, that is during the period of his own exile at Ta Agathou, Euthymios seems to have come to view at least this dependency and perhaps also the monastery at Psamathia as his private property (see Vita, chaps. 19, 20). Apparently Euthymios was unwilling to accord Leo VI's successors either the late emperor's status as founder or his rights of patronage. The present document represents Euthymios' bold attempt to extend his de facto control over Ta Agathou to the Psamathia monastery as well, though the apparent unwillingness [4] of the ecclesiastical hierarchy (in the conjectural textual restoration of de Boor) to allow his burial there (with all that that would imply for his proprietorship) suggests that this venture met with determined opposition.

Notes on the Introduction

1. The dating assumes the genuineness of Euthymios' Testament as encapsulated in the Vita, and that it was dictated from his deathbed shortly before his death on August 4, 917; the Vita itself dates from after 932, so Sophianos, "Bios," p. 296, and Kazhdan, "Euthymios," p. 756; Karlin-Hayter, Vita Euthymii, p. 10, however, dates the Vita to 920–925, on the presumption that the second deposition of Patriarch Nicholas I Mystikos in 925, had it already occurred, would have been alluded to in the Vita.
2. The manuscript, discovered by G. Hirschfeld in 1874 in the remains of a monastery library on an island in Lake Egerdir, disappeared from Berlin during the Second World War; see Karlin-Hayter, Vita Euthymii, pp. 5–6.
3. For details on the history of the foundation, see Janin, Géographie, vol. 3, pp. 116–17.
4. For this foundation, see Janin, Géographie, vol. 3, pp. 95–97.
5. Symeon Magister, ed. I. Bekker, in Leo Grammatikos, Chronographia, CSHB (Bonn, 1842), p. 713; John Skylitzes, Synopsis historiarum, ed. J. Thurn (Berlin-New York, 1973), p. 191.
6. For the history of the dependency, see Janin, Géographie, vol. 2, p. 23.
7. Ignatios the Deacon, Vita S. Nicephori, ed. Karl de Boor, Nicephori archiepiscopi Constantinopolitani opuscula historica (Leipzig, 1880), p. 201.
8. Compare to similar ambiguous administrative arrangements in (48) Prodromos [6], (50) Gerasimos [3] and (52) Choumnos [A3], all written for later private religious foundations, which may reflect a division of institutional property rights.

Bibliography

- Beck, Hans-Georg, Kirche und theologische Literatur im byzantinischen Reich (Munich, 1959), p. 563.
 Bees, Nikos, "He biographia tou Oikoumenikou Patriarchou Euthymiou A' antiballomene pros ton Berolineion

5. EUTHYMIOS

- kodika Graec. fol. 55 [= 291],” Praktika tes Akademias Athenon 19 (1944), 105–20.
- Boor, Karl de, Vita Euthymii, Ein Anecdoton zur Geschichte Leo's des Weisen (Berlin, 1888).
- Darrouzès, Jean, “Euthyme I^{er},” DHGE, vol. 16 (1967), 58–59.
- Flusin, Bernard, “Un fragment inédit de la Vie d’Euthyme le Patriarche?” T&M 9 (1985), 119–31.
- , “Un fragment inédit de la Vie d’Euthyme le Patriarche? II. Vie d’Euthyme ou Vie de Nicéas?” T&M 10 (1987), 233–60.
- Halkin, François, Bibliotheca hagiographica graeca, 3rd ed. (Brussels, 1957), p. 651.
- Janin, R. La géographie ecclésiastique de l’empire byzantin. vol. 2: Les églises et les monastères des grands centres byzantins (Paris, 1975), p. 23; vol. 3: Les églises et les monastères [de Constantinople], 2nd ed. (Paris, 1969), p. 116–17.
- Jugie, Martin, “La vie et les oeuvres d’Euthyme patriarche de Constantinople,” EO 16 (1913), 385–95, 481–92.
- Kazhdan, Alexander, “Euthymios,” ODB, pp. 755–56.
- , Dve vizantiiskie chroniki x veka (Moscow, 1959), introduction to the Vita, pp. 9–26, Russian translation, pp. 27–81, and commentary, pp. 85–137.
- Sophianos, Demetrios, “Ho bios tou Euthymiou (Vita Euthymii) Patriarchou Konstantinoupoleos (+917) kai ho chronos syngraphes autou,” EEBS 38 (1971), 289–96.
- For the author’s other works, see Jugie, “Vie,” pp. 486–92, and Kazhdan, “Euthymios,” p. 756.

Translation

[1.] On the second day of August, whereon the memory of St. Stephen, the first martyr, is celebrated, our father, who is now with the saints, sent to the monastery of Psamathia, to summon all the monks to the monastery of Ta Agathou; and calling round him likewise those there, he spoke of the constitution of the two monasteries, how, on the one hand, there were at Psamathia twenty-four of the brothers consecrated to God and attending to the church. “Now those whom I have ordained, I order to rule over them, to the number of three of those who have served me; but when they are gone from you, a vote of the whole brotherhood [p. 145] shall elect whom God pleases and they desire to be their shepherd. Likewise, in this monastery of Ta Agathou also, I prescribe that twelve of the brothers be consecrated to God, attending to the church, and up to three, already designated by my humble self, to perform the office of superior. Afterwards, they being gone from you, you will appoint a steward from among your brothers who are at Psamathia, and both flocks will be led by one shepherd in the same rule and ordinance, by him whom the providence of God has entrusted with the superiorship of the monastery of Psamathia, as this deed of union in my own hand sets forth in detail.

[2.] “Children, the tradition you have received from me, guard in unity and brotherly love, and with all your strength do not weary of fervently praying the Divinity. Now indeed pray for this least of men, that I may obtain the wish of my great desire. For once that is achieved, I will not rest from entreating and imploring for you, taking to myself and embracing each one of you. Yet know this, after my going from you, you will meet with such straitening and want and distress, that you will lay hands on the sacred vessels themselves. But the Lord God will send you help from on high, may he defend you, and help you, and supply that which was lacking in me (I Cor. 16:17).

TENTH CENTURY

Only do not set at nought my commands, though I be the least of men, nor, I charge you, be backward in observing the rule I have given you, which I fashioned in sweat with many strivings.” While the father was thus prophesying, and all of them in tears, he fell into a swoon; and as he remained silent, they went out.

[3.] Next day, which was the fourth of the month of August [917], our father Euthymios began to labor and pant, and his strength began, as it were, to leave him, when he himself, recognizing the end, in the hearing of all addressed these last words to himself: “Behold, holy Euthymios, the (II Tim. 4:6) time of thy departure is at hand, and the axe (cf. Matt. 3:10) is near that shall cut thee down, thou unfruitful tree. Why then dost thou kick? What fearest thou, summoned to incorruptibility, passing from slavery to freedom? There is no envy, nor strife, nor malice, nor the swarming presence of those who grieve and ill-use. To a merciful master thou goest. Do not be faint-hearted nor discouraged. [p. 147] For he is compassionate, long-suffering and of great mercy. If thou hast shown thyself unworthy (Eph. 4:1) of the vocation wherewith thou wert called, having achieved nothing, yet seventy-five years hast thou fulfilled in the monastic ranks. But now thou goest to thy Master, to thy God and Lord, whom thou hast loved from an infant, whom thou hast followed from an early age. Then do not resist, do not be ill-pleased. Go forth confident, not (cf. Tit. 3:5) in thine own works, but in his love toward man, and grace, ineffable compassion and most boundless goodness.”

[4.] But having called Basil, his nephew, he said, “Prepare for my burial; for tomorrow I leave the things here to go to another world. So it has been revealed to me.” So the other asks him; “Where do you wish your body to lie, that we may prepare a grave?” He [Euthymios, replied]: “At Psamathia, by the sacred shrine of the Anargyroi, in the right-hand chapel, that is dedicated to [St. John] the Forerunner, beneath my lord and master, Peter the Confessor and bishop of Gordorynia.”¹ Whereupon, the other answered him: “According to the patriarch, the me[tropolitans] are not willing [for your body to enter the city . . .]²

Notes on the Translation

1. For Peter of Gordorynia, whose remains Euthymios had translated (Vita, chap. 9, p. 59) to the Psamathia monastery from their original resting place at a chapel dedicated to St. Nicholas outside of Constantinople, see also Theophanes Continuatus, Chronographia, ed. I. Bekker, CSHB (Bonn, 1838), p. 378; Symeon Magister, ed. Bekker, in Leo Grammatikos, Chronographia, CSHB, p. 716.
2. Conjecture of de Boor, Vita Euthymii, 22, line 14.

6. Rila: Testament of John of Rila

Date: 941

Translator: Ilija Iliev

Edition employed: Iordan Ivanov, Sv. Ivan Rilski i negoviyat monastir (Sofia, 1917), pp. 136–42.

Manuscript: 19th-c. copies at Rila of a 14th-c. transcription¹

Other translations: Bulgarian, by Ivan Dujčev, Rilskiyat svetets i negovata obitel (Sofia, 1947), pp. 138–61.

Institutional History

A. Foundation of the Monastery

The monk John laid the foundations for what was to become the greatest monastery of medieval Bulgaria circa 930–31 in the mountains to the east of the Struma river valley in western Bulgaria.² Born around 876–880, not much more than a dozen years after Boris-Michael (852–889), ruler of the Bulgars, had accepted Christianity in 865, John began his monastic career at the monastery of St. Dimiter near his birthplace, then lived for many years as a hermit. His final settlement was a site north of the Rila river, to the east of the present Rila monastery. Remains of the foundations of the first buildings are to be seen in the meadows south of the hermitage dedicated to St. Luke.³ Jealous of his independence, John refused to welcome the Bulgarian ruler Peter (927–969), who came to pay him homage. John's Testament, translated below, was issued March 25, 941 to regulate the cenobitic community and is his only literary work. John then retired to his accustomed solitary life, and died on August 18, 946. He was a popular subject among hagiographers; seven lives in Bulgarian and two in Greek were composed between the twelfth and the nineteenth centuries.⁴

B. Subsequent History of the Monastery in Medieval Times

Little is known about the Rila monastery during the Byzantine dominion over Bulgaria (1018–1185). The earliest Slavonic life of John of Rila, the so-called “Popular Life,” was composed in Bulgarian towards the end of this period, as was the first life in Greek, authored by George Skylitzes, an official on the staff of the Byzantine governor at Srédetz (modern Sofia) during the reign of Emperor Manuel I Komnenos (1143–1180), that now survives only in a Slavonic translation.⁵ The monastery's fortunes revived considerably later during the Second Bulgarian Empire (1186–1396). Rila and several other monasteries, richly endowed by the Bulgarian rulers with new lands and villages, seem to have enjoyed considerable prosperity in the fourteenth century.⁶ There is also a charter of 1378 preserved in the monastery of the last Bulgarian king, Ivan Shishman (1371–1393), that confirms the tax exemptions of the monastery's existing properties and awards new lands as well; it refers to similar charters now lost that earlier Bulgarian monarchs had awarded to the monastery dating back to the middle of the thirteenth century.

TENTH CENTURY

Earlier in the fourteenth century, Rila had benefited also from a local patron, the protosebast Hreljo, a local lord and sometime vassal of the Serbian tsar Stephen Dušan (1331–1355), who erected a new monastery on the site of the existing Rila monastery, to the west of John's original foundation, which continued in operation as the "Old Hermitage." Hreljo built a 75-foot protective tower, still preserved, in 1335. It included living quarters for Hreljo and his family as well as a chapel on the top floor dedicated to the Transfiguration.⁷ A brick inscription records Hreljo's erection of this structure. In 1343 he also built a stone church, which survived until 1834. There were similar towers built at this time for the monasteries on Mount Athos (see (51) Koutloumousi [A4]), and there is one still existing at the Hilandar monastery. Forced to become a monk at the order of Dušan, who distrusted his loyalty, Hreljo was strangled to death by hired assassins in his tower in 1343, probably also at Dušan's instigation. Hreljo's gravestone, broken into many pieces, is preserved in the monastery's museum and speaks of his entry into the monastery and unnatural death.⁸

In 1385, Dometian, the monastery's superior, had John's Testament recopied while hiding away the original along with the foundation's other valuables for fear of the Turks, who had taken Srédetz in 1382. At about this time too Evtimij, the last Bulgarian patriarch of Turnovo, wrote his widely popular version of the Life of John of Rila.

C. Rila under Ottoman Rule

The Turkish sultans Beyazid I (1389–1402) and Mehmet I (1413–1421) issued firmans confirming the privileges Rila had received earlier from Bulgarian monarchs, but this did not save the monastery from later depredations, with the result that it was abandoned by the middle of the fifteenth century.⁹ There was a revival, however, in the second half of the century. Around 1460, the three brothers David, Joasaf and Teofan, sons of a certain Jakov, bishop of Krupnik, worked to strengthen and repair the damaged buildings. Shortly thereafter, a pact was reached in 1466 with the Russian monastery of St. Panteleemon on Mount Athos obliging Rila and the former institution to assist one another as needed in the future. Permission was obtained from the Turkish authorities in 1469 to transport the relics of John of Rila from Turnovo, the old capital of the Second Bulgarian Empire, where they had been since 1195. The translation considerably increased the Rila monastery's prestige. A dependency (metoh) dedicated to Sts. Peter and Paul was built to the southwest of the main monastery in 1478.

Firmans issued by sultans Beyazid II (1481–1512) in 1498, Selim I (1512–1520) in 1519, and Murad III (1574–1595) confirmed the monastery in the possession of its properties, but like the earlier series of firmans, these did not succeed in protecting the foundation from the depredations of various brigands.¹⁰ Beginning in 1558–59, the monks succeeded in establishing direct relations with Russia, whose rulers they hoped would be sympathetic to their complaints of oppression at the hands of their Ottoman masters.

Despite extremely difficult conditions, which continued well into the second half of the eighteenth century, including attacks by robbers in 1766 and 1779, the monastery not only managed to survive but served as a kind of center of Bulgarian culture. Additional churches were built as dependencies towards the end of the eighteenth century and in the early years of the nineteenth century, then a complete reconstruction of the main monastery was begun in 1816.¹¹ A fire in 1833, however, destroyed all the buildings there except for Hreljo's tower and his fourteenth-century stone church. The monastery was rebuilt once again in 1834 while the church was torn down to make room for a larger structure; both the monastery and the nineteenth-century church still stand today, along with Hreljo's tower, the only medieval structure preserved on the site.

6. RILA

Analysis

Experts have endorsed the essential authenticity of the document.¹² It is an example of the testamentary genre of monastic foundation documents, whose author seems to have made some use of (3) Theodore Studites and even (4) Stoudios.¹³ There are indeed some resemblances to the former document, such as the statement of purpose [3], the prohibition of changes [4], and the admonition to preserve the faith [5]. The use of the wilderness topos in the brief foundation history [1] also has a close parallel in (29) Kosmosoteira [1], a twelfth-century document. On the whole, however, this is a distinct document with its own concerns for the ordering of monastic life at Rila.

A. Lives of the Monks

Like his Stoudite predecessors, John of Rila endorses [10] the cenobitic lifestyle, but also urges his monks to establish [15] relations with and support neighboring solitaries. This coexistence of cenobitic and eremitic lifestyles, prefigured in John's own career, would be one of the notable characteristics of Byzantine monasticism. The author demonstrates an acquaintance with the ascetic tradition of late antiquity, quoting [13] Ephraem Syrus and recommending [16] the study of patristic literature, in particular the Lives of St. Antony, founder of anchoritic monasticism, Theodosios the Koinobiarch, "and others" as well as respecting canon law. John also invokes [17] patristic authority for the practice of manual labor.

B. Constitutional Matters

While there is genuine disciplinary content in this document, its chief purpose, as in most testaments, was to designate [20] a successor, here the monk Gregory. John then announces his intent to retire into seclusion as part of an arrangement for assuring an orderly succession to the superiorship that is similar to that proposed in the eleventh century in (22) Evergetis [13].

C. Financial Matters

Aside from the commitment to self-sufficiency that seems implicit in his endorsement of manual labor, there are no indications of how John expected the foundation to support itself financially. He proudly asserts [7] that he refused a royal donation, perhaps an annuity like the solemnia attested in Byzantium in the tenth century, and he advises [8] his community not to seek favors from "earthly kings and princes" [8]. This deliberate shunning of material support is unusual. Many later founders did not fear for the independence of their foundations when accepting imperial largess or tax exemptions (e.g., (13) Ath. Typikon [36] or (19) Attaleiates [22]), nor did Rila itself long after John's death. As Dujčev ("Réforme," p. 263) surmised, John probably was concerned about Bulgarian monasticism being too submissive to secular authority, understandably given the prior history of Bulgarian monasticism under royal patronage.

TENTH CENTURY

Notes on the Introduction

1. According to a note to the text of (6) Rila itself, the original was lost after a copy was made in 1385 by the superior Dometian. Later, the later's disciple Savatij made a copy of this copy. Both of the medieval transcriptions are now lost, and we are now dependent on modern copies of Savatij's version of the document (Dujčev, "Réforme," p. 263).
2. Browning, "John of Rila," p. 1066.
3. Hristov et al., "Rila Monastery," p. 12.
4. For details, see Péchayre, "Vies," pp. 386–90; with Margaritov, Rila-Kloster, p. 13.
5. Péchayre, "Vies," pp. 386–88.
6. Chavrukov, Bulgarian Monasteries, p. 15.
7. For Hreljo's tower, see Hristov et al., Rila Monastery, pp. 35–37; Prashkov, Khrel' ovata kula, pp. 146–48, describes the frescoes in the chapel of the Transfiguration.
8. Margaritov, Rila-Kloster, p. 15.
9. Hristov et al., Rila Monastery, p. 13.
10. Hristov et al., Rila Monastery, p. 14.
11. Hristov et al., Rila Monastery, pp. 24–25.
12. Goshev, "Zavetât," pp. 431–37; Dujčev, "Réforme," p. 263; Margaritov, Rila-Kloster, p. 163, n. 9.
13. Goshev, "Zavetât," pp. 473–77.

Bibliography

- Beck, Hans-Georg, Kirche und theologische Literatur im byzantinischen Reich (Munich, 1959), p. 662.
- Browning, Robert, "John of Rila," ODB, pp. 1066–67.
- Chavrukov, Georgi, Bulgarian Monasteries (Sofia, 1974), pp. 258–77.
- Dujčev, Ivan, "La réforme monastique en Bulgaire au X^e siècle," in Études de civilisation médiévale (IX^e–XII^e siècles). Mélanges offerts à E.-R. Labande (Potiers, 1974), pp. 255–64.
- , Rilskiyat svetels i negovata obitel (Sofia, 1947).
- Fekeldzhiev, Ivan, Narodni legendi za Ivan Rilski (Sofia, 1979).
- Goshev, Ivan, "Zavetât na sv. Ivan Rilski v svetlinata na starobŭlgarskoto i na vizantiiskoto literaturno predanie ot IX–XIV vek," Godishnik na Duchovната Akademiya 'Sv. Kliment Ochridski' 4 (30) 10 (1954–55), 431–507.
- Hristov, Hristo, Stojkov, Georgi, and Mijatev, Krastju, The Rila Monastery (Sofia, 1959).
- Ivanov, Iordan, "Zitiya na sv. Ivana Rilski," Godishnik na Sofiiskiya Universitet. Istoriki-Filologicheski Fakultet 32 (1936), 108 pp.
- Kiselkov, V. S., Rilskiyat Manastir (Sofia, 1937).
- Margaritov, Mikhail, Das Rila-Kloster in Bulgarien (Kaiserslautern, 1979).
- Péchayre, A. P., "Les vies du saint Jean de Rila," EO 37 (1938), 385–90.
- Prashkov, Liuben, Khrel' ovata kula (Sofia, 1973), with English summary, pp. 146–48.
- Schwartz, Ellen, "Rila," ODB, p. 1796.
- Stamov, S., Angelova, R., et al., The Architectural Heritage of Bulgaria (Sofia, 1972).
- Zlatarski, Vasil N., "Georgi Skilitza i napisanoto ot nego zhitie na sv. Ivana Rilski," Izvestiia na Istoricheskogo Druzhestva v Sofiya 13 (1933), 49–80.

6. RILA

Translation

[Note preceding the text of the Testament]

This testament of our holy father John, citizen of the Rila wilderness, which he delivered to his disciples before he died, was rewritten from a parchment with great preciseness by the most honorable and reverend among priests, lord Dometian, a man of erudition and intelligence, who was a disciple of the reverend hermit Varlaam, who lived nine years on the Cherna mountain, which is called now Tsrna¹ and at the Old Hermitage [founded by John of Rila himself] for twenty-eight years. After his “Old Man”² died, he [Dometian] became superior and tutor of the Great communal lavra of Rila. [The testament] was rewritten for easier reading and for commemoration [of Dometian] by all the monks in that monastery, because the parchment on which the testament was written originally was hidden carefully together with the other [precious] objects of the monastery because of the great fear which was reigning in that time from the impious sons of Agar [the Turks].³ In the year of the creation of the world 6893 and from the Nativity of Christ 1385, on the twelfth day of the month of February, on the memorial day of St. Meletios of Antioch.

From that copy, I made another copy, I Savatij, the humble holy monk and ecclesiarch, and everlasting disciple of the most honorable superior and tutor Dometian.⁴

[Testament]

[1.] I, John, the humble and sinful, who has never done anything good on earth, when I came into this wilderness of Rila, I found no man over here, but only wild animals and impenetrable thickets. I settled alone in it among the wild animals, without food nor shelter, but the sky was my shelter and the earth my bed and the herbs my food. But the good Lord, for the love of whom I disregarded everything and endured hunger and thirst, frost, the heat of the sun, and corporal nakedness, did not abandon me, but like a merciful and child-loving father he lavishly satisfied all my needs. What shall I contribute to the Lord for all he has given me? Many are his benefactions to me, for he looked from his holy height at my humbleness (cf. Luke 1:48) and lent his support to me to go through everything—not I, but the might of Christ, which is in me—because every good gift and every perfect gift is from him (James 1:17).

[2.] Seeing you today gathered together in the Lord here, where, as I told you, no man has dwelled until now, but only wild animals, and foreseeing that the end of my life here is soon coming on, because of this I made up my mind, before my departure (II Tim. 4:6) from life here, to leave you the present fatherly testament of mine, just as carnal fathers leave their children an earthly inheritance of silver and gold and other property, so that when you commemorate your father in the Holy Spirit, you do not forget his testament.

[3.] I know, my beloved children in God, I know you very well, that you, being beginners, are not confirmed yet in the monk’s life, but fear not, for the Lord’s “power is made perfect in weakness” (II Cor. 12:9). Just because of this I made up my mind to write for you this rough and ignorant testament of mine, so that you will keep it always in your minds to become stronger in body and soul, in the Lord, and go forward through the virtues in fear of God. Because I believe in my God, whom I have served since my youth and to whom I submitted zealously, after my departure, this wilderness, which until now was terrible and uninhabited, will be inhabited by a multitude of desert-citizens. What was written about it will be fulfilled: “The desolate hath many more children than she which hath a husband” (Is. 54:1; Gal. 4:27).

TENTH CENTURY

[4.] Because of this I beg you, my children, whom I have gathered in the Lord, I beg of you, my flesh and blood, do not neglect your father’s admonition and together with the apostle I say: “I am in travail again until Christ be formed in you” (Gal. 4:19). I beg you and make you swear on the dread name of God not to violate or abandon anything after my death, but everything I have written let be carried out, as it is written and as you have promised before God. Whosoever oversteps or violates something of it, let him be damned and separated from the Father and the Son and the Holy Spirit, to have no share with the saints, who were pleasing to God ages ago, but let his share be with those who had crucified the Lord of Glory (Acts 7:2) and with his betrayer Judas, to be erased from “the book of life” (Phil. 4:3) and not to be inscribed [in it] with the righteous.

[5.] First of all, I bequeath to you the obligation to preserve the holy faith immaculate and unaffected by any false teaching, just as we received it from the holy fathers, without “being led away with diverse and strange teachings” (Heb. 13:9). Hold fast and keep the traditions you have heard and seen from me. Do not deviate either to the right, or to the left, but walk along the royal road. Keep yourselves carefully away from worldly fascinations and always remember why you have come out of the world, and why you have despised it and worldly things.

[6.] Now again, keep yourselves away from the avaricious snake, “for the love of money is the root of all evil” (I Tim. 6:10), according to the apostle, who calls it a second idolatry. Because for the hermit wealth consists not in silver and gold,⁵ but in perfect poverty, in the denial of his personal will, and in lofty humbleness. I am not telling you this as my commandments, but [I am] recalling for you the commandments of Christ. For he told his holy disciples and through them everybody who had renounced the world: “Take no gold, nor silver, nor a bag, nor copper in your belts” (Matt. 10:9) and so on. For gold and silver are great enemies of the monk and bite those who have them like a snake.

[7.] If we, however, have undoubted hope in God, he will not leave us deprived of anything, for he himself says: “A woman may forget her children, yet will I not forget thee” (Is. 49:15). Also in another place: “But seek first the kingdom of God, and his righteousness; and all these things shall be yours as well” (Matt. 6:33). For in the beginning, when I came to this wilderness, the sly enemy attempted to allure me, for the pious king sent to me a lot of gold.⁶ For the sake of God I refused to see him, for I understood that it was a perfidy of the devil. I did not accept it, but returned it to those who sent it, for I thought to myself: “If I wished to have gold and silver, and suchlike things, why came I into this terrible and impenetrable wilderness, where I found no man, but wild animals?” So I saved myself from the intrigues of the sly tempter, who endeavors to trip us up in those things, which we renounced willfully. That is why you are not to look for any of these things, “for your heavenly Father knows that you need them all” (Matt. 6:32) before your prayer [is offered].

6. RILA

[8.] Nor look to be recognized and beloved by earthly kings and princes, nor put your hope in them, leaving the heavenly King, with whom you enlisted to be soldiers and “wrestle not against flesh and blood,” but “against the ruler of the darkness of this world” (Eph. 6:12). For the prophet Jeremiah also threatens us speaking so: “Cursed be the man that hopeth in man” and the rest. Enumerating the evils, he adds that “blessed is the man that hopeth in the Lord” (Jer. 17:5-8). Do not say: “What shall we eat, or drink, or in what shall we be dressed?” for the gentiles seek after these things. “Look at the birds of the air: for they neither sow nor reap, nor gather into barns; yet your heavenly father feeds them. Are you not of more value than they?” (Matt. 6:26). As soon as you have come out of the world, do not go back, neither with your body, nor with your mind, for, as it is said, “No man, having put his hand to the plough, and looking back, is fit for the Kingdom of Heaven” (Luke 9:62).

[9.] The Apostle [Paul] too, however, teaches us to “forget what lies behind and strain forward to what lies ahead” (Phil. 3:13). What does “forgetting those things which are behind” mean, my children? Nothing else except to deliver to oblivion all those things which, coming out of the world for God’s sake, we have left and despised, and to strive towards the feat which lies before us, to which we were called by our taskmaster, our most gracious God and Lord Jesus Christ, who has enabled us to endure his gentle yoke, “For his yoke is easy, and his burden is light” (Matt. 11:30).

[10.] As the grace of the Holy Spirit brought you together, so must you endeavor to live with one heart and one mind and one spirit, directing your eyes only towards the eternal reward, which God has prepared for those who have loved him. The communal life is in every way more useful for monks than the solitary one, for solitude is not suitable for the many, but only for a few who are perfect in all monastic virtues. The common life, on the other hand, is useful in general for everybody, about which the patristic books tell us and teach us sufficiently. The spirit-speaking prophet David glorified it saying: “See now what is so good and so pleasant as for brethren to dwell together in unity!” (Ps. 133:1). In addition to this, one spirit-moved ecclesiastical hymn writes in this way: “Because in this the Lord promised eternal life.” But also our good Master Lord God Jesus Christ, does he not say to us himself, by his immaculate lips: “Where two or three are gathered together in my name, there I am in the midst of them”? (Matt. 18:20). Our God-bearing fathers say for the solitary life: “Woe to him that is alone when he falls; and there is not a second to lift him up” (Eccl. 4:10).

[11.] That is why, children, as the Holy Spirit through the mouth of the prophet glorifies the communal life, do you not neglect it either, but on the contrary, confirm it and be like “one body in the Lord” (Rom. 12:5), which has different members. Some of them form, however, the head which governs, others the feet which toil and bear, so that there is formed from all a single spiritual body in the Lord, created with a single mind and logical spirit, and directed by spiritual reasoning, in no wise having divisions. When such a dwelling and life in God is arranged, then he himself will be in the midst of you, governing you invisibly.

TENTH CENTURY

[12.] Do not seek the first place and authority, but remember those who have said: “If one would be first, he must be last of all, and servant of all” (Mark 9:35). Elect for yourselves preceptors and appoint superiors, whom God will show you, that is, men “of good report” (Acts 10:22) among everybody in spiritual matters and surpassing everybody in intelligence and spiritual discernment, and able to pasture well and comfortably the flock entrusted to them down the meadows of piety and of the life-giving commands of Christ. For these men it is proper to seek confirmation more from God than from our opinion.

[13.] If, as our great father and monastic preceptor, the reverend Ephraem Syrus says,⁷ all of you begin to desire authority and presidencies, and all of you to be abbots, and all of you preceptors, and interpreters, and teachers, and among you spring up rivalries, quarrels, disputes, zealotry, calumnies, haughtinesses, envy and other passions indecorous for monks, then certainly be aware that Christ is not among you, for Christ is not the teacher of discord and dissent, but of peace and unity. For he prays to God the father for his holy disciples to be united, that is, of one mind—they themselves and everybody who believes in him through them, and says as follows: “Holy Father, keep them in thy name that they may be one, as we are” (John 17:11). In another place: “I do not pray for them only but also for those who believe in me through their word that all may be one” (John 17:20–21). If you will be one, be at peace one with another. For he said to his disciples, “Peace I leave with you, my peace I give you.” (John 14: 27) For such is this peace of Christ, children, that again he speaks, saying, “Not as the world gives, do I give to you” (John 14:27). But this peace of Christ surpasses every mind. This is the peace, about which the prophet talks: “And his peace has no bounds.” But also the apostle teaches us saying: “Strive for peace with all men and for the holiness, without which no man shall see God” (Heb. 12:14). May you have such a peace, now, among you, and let you arrange everything for God with great unity of mind and heart, so as not to enrage your own God and master.

[14.] If somebody is found among you who sows weeds, discords and other temptations, you have to eliminate at once such a man from your assembly, so that this will not be transfigured into a devouring canker, according to the apostle, and not to spread the evil among the good ones, and “lest any root of bitterness spring up and cause trouble by it, and the many be defiled” (Heb. 12:5); and the wicked wolf not trouble the peaceful flock of Christ, because this sort [of men] will appear. For of them Christ prophesies saying: “For it is necessary that temptations come; but woe to the world for temptations to sin!” (Matt. 16:7). For this and you, children, keep away from these things and do not allow them to live among you, but divert them away from yourselves as the shepherd chases away the scabby sheep from the pure flock.

[15.] Living together for the Lord’s sake and bearing the burdens of one another, do not neglect those who live in solitude and “wandering over deserts and in mountains, and in dens, and in caves of the earth, of whom the world was not worthy” (Heb. 11:38), but supply them as much as you can, in order to hold them as your petitioners before God, for the prayer of the pious may achieve much.

6. RILA

[16.] Instruct yourselves in the Lord’s law day and night (Ps. 1:2). Read often the patristic books and try to be imitators of our holy fathers Antony, Theodosios and the others, who shone like lamps in the world with their good deeds.⁸ Hold firmly to the church rule, leaving or neglecting nothing of this, which is established by the holy fathers.

[17.] Manual labor must not be neglected by you, however, but work must be in your hands, and the prayer “Lord Jesus Christ, Son of God, have mercy on me, a sinner” must be permanently on your lips, as well as the memory of death in your mind. This was the practice of the ancient desert fathers. They did not eat their bread in vain, and they not only lived themselves by labor of their own hands, but they gave to the needy too, and so they were not disappointed in their hope. “For,” says the apostle [Paul], “it is well that the heart be strengthened by grace; not with foods which have not benefited their adherents” (Heb. 13:9). He says too: “Let brotherly love continue. Do not neglect to show hospitality to strangers; for thereby some have entertained angels unawares” (Heb. 13:1–2).

[18.] Establish the newly enlightened from your own race in the faith and instruct them to abandon the indecent pagan rites and the evil customs which they keep even after the acceptance of the holy faith. But they do this because of ignorance, and thus they need to be brought to their senses.

[19.] I had much more to say to you, my beloved children in the Lord, but it is impossible to write everything. I deliver you to him who is the source of all wisdom and reason, and the true Comforter—to the Holy and life-giving Spirit, in order that he himself gives you wisdom, to bring you to your senses, to enlighten you, to teach and instruct you in every good deed.

[20.] Now I leave you our beloved brother Gregory for instructor and superior in place of me, about whom all of you testify that he is able to govern you well and according to God, and you elect him by consensus as superior, even though he does not want it, but because of obedience and humility he acquiesces to your request. After him, [choose] whomever God will show you.

As for myself, I wish henceforth to live in quiet and silence, to repent my sins and to beg mercy of God. Have mercy on me, your sinful father, always in your prayers that I may receive mercy on judgment day, for I have done nothing good on earth and fear that judgment and torment prepared for sinners like me. So may the blessing of God be with you all, guarding and protecting you from all evils. Amen.

I have written this in the year from the creation of the world 6449 (= A.D. 941) on the twenty-fifth day of the month of March.

TENTH CENTURY

I, the humble and most sinful John, first inhabitant of the wilderness of Rila, sign with my own hand and confirm the above-written [testament].

Notes on the Translation

Editors' note: The assistance of our translator, Ivan Iliev [II], is gratefully acknowledged for the notes to this document.

1. Both Cherna and Tsrna, dialectical variants, mean "Black." [II]
2. A play on words: Varlaam also means "Old Man," a title of dignity. [II]
3. An allusion to the fall of Srédetz (Sofia) to the Ottoman Turks in 1382. [II]
4. Neither the original text nor the copies mentioned above survive today. The text depends on nineteenth-century copies. [II]
5. Compare to (3) Theodore Studites [21] prohibiting the storing up of cash assets in the monastery.
6. An allusion to John's rejection of the friendly overtures with implied offer of financial support made by the Bulgarian ruler Peter (927–969) as described in the various vitae; see Dujčev, "Réforme," p. 263, and Hristov et al., Rila Monastery, p. 12.
7. According to Goshev, "Zavetât," pp. 449–61, this author's Parainesis had been available in a Slavonic translation since the reign of Symeon (893–927).
8. For the translation of some of the late antique classics of ascetic literature into Slavonic, see Dujčev, "Réforme," p. 262.

7. Latros: Testament of Paul the Younger for the Monastery of the Mother of God tou Stylou on Mount Latros

Date: 955

Translator: Gianfranco Fiaccadori

Edition employed: Hippolyte Delehay, Monumenta Latrensia hagiographica, in Theodor Wiegand, Milet, Ergebnisse der Ausgrabungen und Untersuchungen, vol. 3, pt. 1: Der Latmos (Berlin, 1913), pp. 105–53. The Testament is encapsulated in the Laudatio S. Pauli junioris, pp. 136–57, at 152–53.¹

Manuscript: Codex Vaticanus graecus 704 (14th c.)

Other translations: None, but there is a Latin translation of the Vita by Hippolyte Delehay, “Vita S. Pauli Iunioris in monte Latro,” AB 11 (1892), 5–74, 136–182.

Institutional History

A. Foundation of the Monastery

The founder Paul was born at Elaia near Pergamon, probably towards the end of the ninth century (Vita, chap. 2, p. 21). Orphaned at an early age, he was brought by his brother Basil to Peter, founder and superior of the monastery of Karya on Mount Latros northwest of Miletos, who provided him with his introduction to the ascetic life (Testamentum, p. 200). After Peter’s death, his successor gave Paul permission to adopt a solitary life. Athanasios, superior of the neighboring patriarchal monastery of Christ the Savior (Christos Soter, see Janin, Géographie, vol. 2, p. 240), suggested a rock formation as the site where Paul could live as a kind of stylite (Vita, chap. 13, p. 44). As Papachryssanthou (“Vie monastique,” p. 173) notes, this is one of the rare occasions on which we can follow the development of a major monastery from its origins. After attracting a number of disciples, Paul had an oratory dedicated to the archangel Michael built on the site (Vita, chap. 17, p. 51). Eventually a church dedicated to the Mother of God tou Stylou was erected as well, the patronal attribute being either an allusion to Paul’s rock formation (so Janin, Géographie, vol. 2, p. 233) or to St. Paul as the “pillar” of the church (Talbot and Wharton, “Latros,” p. 1189). Most of his disciples adopted a cenobitic lifestyle, sharing meals in a refectory and sleeping together in a dormitory, but others lived as solitaries (Vita, chap. 17, pp. 51–53). The beginning of the monastery is dated to 920–930 (Bokotopoulos, “Latros,” p. 77). Except for a brief absence on Samos, Paul spent the rest of his life there. A few days before his death on December 15, 955 (Vita, chap. 45, p. 164), he dictated a series of rules to his successor Symeon (Vita, chap. 43, pp. 159–61). Paul was originally buried in the narthex of the Stylos church, but his remains were disinterred by Symeon and reburied in a chapel specially built for this purpose (Vita, chap. 46, p. 167).

B. Sources for the Subsequent History of the Foundation

A list of Paul's successors as superiors of this foundation, starting with Symeon, has survived in a copy of a manuscript drawn up in 1049.² This manuscript, possibly prepared for the purpose of carrying out liturgical commemorations of departed superiors (so Janin, Géographie, vol. 2, p. 236), was evidently one of those that Christodoulos brought from Latros to his new Patmos monastery (see (24) Christodoulos [C6]) in the late eleventh century, though it was later returned to its place of origin by one of his successors. Additional names were added to the list after 1049, down to 1222.

Another important source of information on the later history of the foundation is the partially preserved cartulary of which some 16 documents survive that, supplemented by other sources, allow the reconstruction of a dossier of 40 pieces of official correspondence down to the middle of the fourteenth century.³ Included in the dossier are a small donation of Emperor Romanos I Lekapenos (919–944) to the monastery in 941, and requests for the prayers of the monks for military expeditions being undertaken by emperors Constantine VII Porphyrogenitos (913–959) in 945/55 and by Nikephoros Phokas (963–969).⁴ The superior Gabriel who, according to the above-mentioned list of superiors, was Paul's fourth successor and bore the title of "founder" (ktetor), appears in four of the documents in the cartulary dated to 985–987, defending the foundation's property rights in disputes with a neighboring monastery.⁵

C. Reorganization as an Independent Monastery

Eventually the foundation acquired a formal written typikon (now lost) which asserted the independence of the monastery.⁶ Janin (Géographie, vol. 2, p. 237), speculates that Gabriel, in his capacity as (new) "founder," was responsible for drawing up this document towards the end of the tenth century. This is technically possible, but it is more likely that the monastery claimed an independent charter for itself in the late eleventh century when many other foundations, inspired by the monastic reform movement, did the same (see below, Chapter Four).

D. Superiorship of Christodoulos

In 1076, Patriarch Kosmas I Hierosolymites (1075–81) appointed Christodoulos as superior of this monastery as well as protos of the confederation of neighboring monasteries at Latros.⁷ According to (24) Christodoulos [A4], the Stylos monastery was still functioning somewhat as in Paul's day, with some monks practicing the cenobitic life and others a hybrid form of monasticism in which they lived apart during most of the week but came together on Sundays for liturgical services and fellowship. Especially in view of the circumstances of his own appointment, Christodoulos had to struggle to establish his foundation's right to independence from patriarchal control.⁸ Also, contrary to his fond recollections of this time years later, Christodoulos' tenure of office was troubled by repeated disputes of obscure origin and appeals over his head to the patriarchs of Constantinople, culminating in his resignation in 1087 (Janin, Géographie, vol. 2, p. 219).

E. Fate of the Foundation

Despite the Turkish threat to the security of the monastic communities on Latros that Christodoulos later preferred to cite as the reason for his departure, it seems that at least the principal monasteries, including this one, survived for another two hundred years. In the Nicaean Empire during the thirteenth century, the foundation was able to have its standing as the ranking monastery of Latros recognized by Patriarch Manuel I Sarantenos (1215–22) in 1222 and its exemption from visitations by patriarchal functionaries confirmed by Patriarchs Germanos II (1222–40) in 1225 and Manuel II (1244–55) in 1246.⁹ The last official mention of the monastery occurs in a patriarchal act of 1360, but the neighboring metropolitan see of Miletos was abandoned in 1369, which suggests that monastic life there did not survive much longer.¹⁰

7. LATROS

F. Archaeological Excavation of the Site

A German archaeological expedition explored the sites of the monastic settlements at Latros in 1905, including that of this foundation.¹¹ An enclosure wall surrounds Paul's natural column, the stylos, and grotto as well as the foundations of the monastery church, an auxiliary chapel, some other buildings, and a cistern.¹² Frescoes on the walls of Paul's grotto, probably of the eleventh or twelfth centuries, depict the founder as well as his successor Gabriel.¹³

Analysis

The Testament translated here is encapsulated in the anonymous Eulogy (Laudatio, chaps. 46–49, ed. Delehay, pp. 152–53) of the founder. The Eulogy's Testament is an expansion of parallel remarks by Paul to his disciple Symeon found in the earlier Life (Vita, chap. 43, pp. 159–61), and so a certain amount of subsequent editing of Paul's precepts as found in the Eulogy cannot be ruled out. To complicate matters, there is also another text bearing the title of Testament that was copied at the end of the Vita in a 16th-century manuscript (ed. Lampros, "Diatheke," pp. 199–202), but on linguistic evidence this appears to be a later composition.¹⁴

A. Typology and Sources

Although professedly a testament, this document actually assumes the form of a miniature typikon. Also, unlike the authors of other testaments, Paul does not use his Testament to transmit his foundation to his successor. The document begins with a confession of faith [1], [2] which cites Basil of Caesarea and Maximos the Confessor, and an affirmation of the seven ecumenical councils [3]. These introductory materials parallel the format of (3) Theodore Studites. Paul is fairly unusual in his straightforward denial of originality in his Testament. Paul claims to be relying upon "the precepts of the fathers" and those of his own ascetic master Peter, i.e., the superior of the monastery of Karya, under whom he began his career. Yet the document also draws on other traditions as well, most notably the "Rule of Jerusalem," presumably some early version of the liturgical typikon of the monastery of St. Sabas, which was to regulate [8] fasting. Paul was also acquainted with the Basilian tradition, citing [10] a scriptural quotation which appears in the Sermo de renunciacione saeculi. The standards for personal decorum [11] also appear to have Basilian roots.

B. Lives of the Monks

In terms of practices prescribed, the document fits fairly well into the context of Byzantine monasticism in the mid-tenth century. The regular weekday practice of manual labor is implied by [4] its prohibition on Sundays. Like (3) Theodore Studites [16], [18], Paul bans [9] women and beardless youths from the monastery. The warning against hoarding material goods [12] likewise follows (3) Theodore Studites [21], as does his disapproval [12] of unnecessary travel (cf. (3) Theodore Studites [10]). Paul goes further by requiring the monks to stay enclosed [6] during Lent until the Easter feast. There is a hint [7] of the firm superior's discipline characteristic of some other documents of the eighth through ninth centuries,¹⁵ but no particulars. Fasting, while generally following [8] the above-mentioned "Rule of Jerusalem," appears [5] to have been stricter for Lent, basically allowing only bread and water. This is considerably more austere than the equivalent provisions in (4) Stoudios [30], [31].

Notes on the Introduction

1. See discussion in "Analysis."
2. See Janin, Géographie, vol. 2, pp. 234–36, for a full discussion.
3. Ed. MM 4.290–329, with detailed analysis by Janin, Géographie, vol. 2, pp. 441–54.
4. Janin, Géographie, vol. 2, p. 442, "Les actes du Latros," nos. 3, 4, 7.
5. Janin, Géographie, vol. 2, pp. 443–44, "Actes," nos. 8, ed. MM 4.307–08, 9, ed. MM 4.310, 10, ed. MM 4.308–13, and 11, ed. MM 4.312–15.
6. The monks were able to demonstrate their claim to institutional independence successfully in 1196 by reference to a provision to this effect in their typikon, for which see Janin, Géographie, vol. 2, pp. 448–49, "Actes," no. 28, ed. MM 4.305–7; "Actes," no. 15, ed. MM 6.17–19, suggests that such a provision was already to be found among the monastery's rules circa 1078–79.
7. Janin, Géographie, vol. 2, p. 445, "Actes," no. 14.
8. Janin, Géographie, vol. 2, p. 218, n. 7, and p. 445, "Actes," no. 15, ed. MM 6.17–19.
9. Janin, Géographie, vol. 2, pp. 450–52, "Actes," no. 31, ed. MM 4.295–98, no. 32, ed. MM 4.298–300, and no. 37, ed. MM 4.300–301.
10. Janin, Géographie, vol. 2, pp. 453–54, "Actes," no. 40, ed. MM 1.391–97.
11. Discoveries summarized in Guyer, "Klöster," pp. 134–37.
12. See Wiegand, Milet, vol. 3, pt. 1: Der Latmos, pp. 68–72, with plan of the site; Janin, Géographie, vol. 2, pp. 220, 238.
13. Schiemenz, "Paulos-Höhle," pp. 46–53; Janin, Géographie, vol. 2, pp. 238–39.
14. See Mercati, "Minuzie," pp. 335–36, and Halkin, BHG 1474h.
15. See especially (2) Pantelleria, (4) Stoudios [25], and (11) Ath. Rule [19].

Bibliography

- Acta monasterii Sancti Pauli in monte Latro prope Miletum*, in F. Miklosich and F. Müller, Acta et diplomata graeca medii aevi sacra et profana, 6 vols. (Vienna, 1860–90), 4.290–329; summarized by R. Janin, La géographie ecclésiastique de l'empire byzantin, vol. 2: Les églises et les monastères des grands centres byzantins (Paris, 1975), pp. 441–54.
- Beck, Hans-Georg, Kirche und theologische Literatur im byzantinischen Reich (Munich, 1959), pp. 211–12.
- Bokotopoulos, P.A., "Latros," EEBS 35 (1966–67), 69–106.
- Guyer, S., "Die byzantinischen Klöster im Latmos-Gebirge bei Milet," Klio 9 (1909), 134–37.
- Halkin, François, Bibliotheca hagiographica graeca, 3rd ed. (Brussels, 1957), 1474 (Vita), 1474d (Laudatio); cf. 1474h (Testamentum).
- , "Une vie prétendue de saint Athanase l'Athonite," Makedonika 5 (1961–63), 242–43.
- Janin, Raymond, La géographie ecclésiastique de l'empire byzantin, vol. 2: Les églises et les monastères des grands centres byzantins (Paris, 1975), pp. 217–20, 233–39, 441–54.
- Kazhdan, Alexander, "Hermitic, Cenobitic, and Secular Ideals in Byzantine Hagiography of the Ninth through

7. LATROS

- the Twelfth Centuries,” GOTR 30 (1985), 473–87, esp. 477.
- , “Paul of Latros,” ODB, p. 1608.
- Lampros, Sp., “Diatheke Paulou tou Latrenou,” NH 12 (1915), 198–203.
- Mercati, Giovanni, “Minuzie. 24. Falsa finale del Testamento di S. Paolo Latreno,” Bessarione 33 (1917), 335–36.
- Papachryssanthou, Denise, “La vie monastique dans les campagnes byzantines du VIII^e au XI^e siècle,” Byzantion 43 (1973), 158–80, esp. 173–75.
- Schiemenz, G., “Die Malereien der Paulus-Höhle auf dem Latmos,” Pantheon 29 (1971), 46–53.
- Talbot, Alice-Mary, and Wharton, Annabel, “Latros,” ODB, pp. 1188–89.
- Vasilievsky, V., “O zhizni i trudakh Simeona Metafrasta,” ZMNP 212 (1880), 379–437.
- Volk, Otto, “Die byzantinischen Klosterbibliotheken von Konstantinopel, Thessalonike und Kleinasien” (Ph.D. diss., Munich, 1955), pp. 167–69.

Translation

*Eulogy of Saint Paul the Younger*¹

Chapter 46

Yet, being a man, he [Paul], too, was fated to pay the debt of destiny or better to be released and discharged from his long sufferings, and be with Christ according to the saying of the Apostle (Phil. 1:23). As he had, of course, foreseen this, he composed for his disciples the following rule of monastic life:

Know, my dearly beloved brethren, that monastic life is the more lofty and angelic as it is without any sin and full of every virtue. Whence our forerunners in this way of life, in order to strengthen their instruction, left us their spiritual struggles like a rule and standard in keeping with [their] behavior. Now, although we have their precepts along with their deeds, we do give but little thought to putting this into practice, and I am by far the worst offender. May no one, however, by looking at me, spend his lifetime at ease, or come to me and say: “Physician, heal yourself” (Luke 4:23). For, if I spent my life thoughtlessly, I want you instead to take care of your own salvation. Accordingly, so that those who will come after you may have no excuse to say: “Had we ever lighted upon standards and rules, we would have observed them,” for this very reason, in legislating, I introduce the present [rule] not by devising it myself, but by applying the precepts of the Fathers as well as those which I received from our God-bearing Father Peter.²

[1.] First, it is necessary to believe in one God, the Father almighty, creator of heaven and earth, without beginning, ungenerated, formless, incorporeal; in one Lord Jesus Christ, the Son of God, begotten of the Father timelessly before all ages, of one substance with the Father; and in the Holy Spirit who proceeds from the Father, who together with the Father and the Son is worshiped and glorified.³ The Holy Trinity is uncreated, undivided, unconfused, and distinguished in persons by individual properties. According to Basil the Great, its operation, being the common operation of the three Persons, is also uncreated and undivided.⁴ Those whose essence is uncreated, their operation is also uncreated, [as stated by] Maximos [the Confessor], who was full of divine wisdom.⁵

TENTH CENTURY

[2.] Next, [it is necessary] to acknowledge that one [Person] of the Trinity, the Son and Word of God, was incarnated from the Holy Spirit and the Virgin Mary and became man for the sake of our salvation; that he was at the same time perfect God and perfect man in one person and in two natures and operations, in the manner appropriate to each of the natures and operations; that he was crucified for us in actual fact, not by means of illusion, as it has been insanely said by some who were raving;⁶ and that he rose again on the third day, ascended to Heaven, and will come again with glory to judge the living and dead, and pay each one according to his actions.

[3.] Then, [it is necessary] to accept the Seven Ecumenical Councils, and refuse all the heretical blasphemies which have rightly been banished from the Church; and to receive the Holy Sacraments as truly partaking of the body and blood of Our Savior Jesus Christ; and also to prostrate oneself before and kiss the venerable and holy images of Our Lord Jesus Christ, the Mother of God, and all the saints, since, according to theology, “the cult of the images passes on to the prototype.”⁷

Chapter 47

[4.] Moreover, [it is necessary] to keep the feasts of the Lord as well as every single Sunday, and to rest from every labor except in praise of God unceasingly according to the rule and order of the Church of Christ.

[5.] [It is necessary] also to observe the fast of the Holy and Great Lent, and to feed as much as possible on bread and water alone, and most moderately even on those, except for refreshing oneself during the feast of the Annunciation by eating olive oil and fish with moderation, and partaking of enough wine mixed with water on Saturday and Sunday because of lack of strength.

[6.] [It is necessary] also to avoid going out until the bright feast of Easter. Instead [you must] stay quiet inside the monastery and conduct the services without fail.

[7.] Whoever shall violate the [aforesaid] regulations, whether from ignorance or pressure of necessity, let him undergo the proper punishments by the superior at the time.⁸ Should he act contemptuously and remain incorrigible, let him be expelled absolutely from the monastic community, so that he does not infect the others with his sickness.

[8.] As regards the other fasting transmitted in the canons, [it is necessary] to practice them as the tradition harking back to the Rule [p. 153] of Jerusalem established from the beginning.⁹ [p. 153] Also, let fasting be observed in proportion to the strength of each one and as approved by the superior: Wednesday and Friday on bread and water alone, except in the case of physical infirmity or a feast of the Lord. However, [it is necessary] to keep without fail the remaining [fast days], knowing that no one is losing the reward of his labors, but “each shall receive his [wages] according to his labor” (I Cor. 3:8).

7. LATROS

Chapter 48

[9.] This also is what I order: that never any smooth-looking beardless fellow under twenty years of age be admitted into the community of Lavra, nor that women enter [it], according to the traditions of the Holy Fathers. Whoever shall act otherwise, let him be under curse and anathema, as overstepping the limits established by the Fathers.

[10.] Know then that “the road leading to life is narrow and hard” (Matt. 7:14), and “the Kingdom of Heaven has suffered violence, and men of violence take it by force” (Matt. 11:12).¹⁰ Therefore, it is necessary that you have death before your eyes, since you are destined to account for your deeds; that you resist intemperate impulses; that you keep most carefully free from evil thoughts; that you be humble-minded and not overbold about the works of virtue. Virtue must always be zealously pursued by works, but through Christ’s love of man for “all our justice with its pride and arrogance is an abomination in the eyes of God” (Luke 16:16).

Chapter 49

[11.] Have love for, and be at peace with one another, as in peace Christ summoned us, and “we are members one of another” (Eph. 4:25), according to the Apostle. [It is necessary] also to refrain from speaking evil of one another and envying one another’s virtue. Neither should you laugh or chatter idly, especially while attending to the hymns of God, so that we may not arouse the Divinity’s irritation while we intend to propitiate him.¹¹ Should some of you ever quarrel among themselves, let them put an end to their enmity in brotherly love within the evening (cf. Eph. 4: 26); if not, let them remain without food. Should they persist in their wickedness, let them be expelled from among you. For to such ones the Kingdom of Heaven is walled off. Every bearer of malice breaks the law and, since he breaks the law, he is also unclean.

[12.] Above all, you must not step easily out of the monastery without need, since it is both unsuitable to the [monastic] profession and dangerous. Rather, [you must] give up most corporeal things and the hoarding of material goods. From them comes the ruin of the soul, as the mind is removed from God because of the unsuitable diversion. Only one concern and diversion is commendable: meditation on the eternal blessings, “and all the rest will come to us as well” (Matt. 6:33), as the divine voice says. The writings of the saints alone and the traditions of the Gospels and Apostles shall lead us to the justice of God. “If you know these things, blessed are you if you do them” (John 13:17).

Notes on the Translation

1. Delehaye divided the sections of the Eulogy that preserve the Testament into chapters 46–49; we have assigned a new continuous numeration to the Testament, however, to facilitate cross-referencing from other documents.

TENTH CENTURY

2. For Peter, Paul's spiritual father and superior of the monastery of Karya, see the Vita, chap. 6, p. 26.
3. Cf. Symbolum Nicaenoconstantinopolitanum; borrowed words in boldface.
4. Basil of Caesarea, Adversus Eunomium 4, PG 29, col. 676A.
5. Maximos the Confessor, Disputatio cum Pyrrho, PG 91, col. 340A.
6. Interesting allusion to the phantasiast or docetist heresy, following the doctrine formulated by Julian of Halicarnassus. See Barry Baldwin, "Julian of Halikarnassos," ODB, p. 1080.
7. Cf. Basil of Caesarea, De spiritu sancto 45, PG 32, col. 149C.
8. See Kazhdan, "Paul of Latros," ODB, p. 1608, for Paul's willingness to resort to physical punishment to discipline his disciples.
9. This is a reference not to the final generation of Sabaitic liturgical typika popular in Byzantine monasteries from the thirteenth century onwards (for which see Robert Taft, "Sabaitic Typika," ODB, p. 1823), but rather some exemplar of a much earlier generation of these documents, which regulated both liturgical matters and diet, and which, along with Constantinopolitan liturgical usages, contributed to the development of Stoudite typika like (4) Stoudios. See Taft, "Athos, Mount," ODB, p. 182, and "Stoudite Typika," ODB, p. 1961.
10. Cf. the Basilian Sermo de renunciatione saeculi, PG 31, col. 645D.
11. Cf. Basil of Caesarea, Regulae fusius tractatae 17 [LR 17], PG 31, col. 957B.

8. John Xenos: Testament of John Xenos for the Monastery of the Mother of God Antiphonetria of Myriokephala on Crete

Date: September 20, 1031

Translator: Gianfranco Fiaccadori

Edition employed: N. B. Tomadakes, “Ho hagios Ioannes ho Xenos kai Eremites en Krete (10os–11os aion),” EEBS 46 (1983–86), 1–117, with edition at pp. 11–12.

Manuscript: Codex Cisamensis (1703 A.D.)

Other translations: None

Institutional History

The history of John Xenos’s foundation is known chiefly from two versions of his Autobiography (Bios kai politeia), one derived from a fifteenth-century manuscript in the Bodleian Library, Oxford (Bios C), and the other derived from a local Cretan manuscript dated to 1703, Codex Cisamensis (Bios K). Only the latter contains the full text of John’s Testament, while the former is content with a brief summary.

John was born to wealthy parents, in the year 970 according to the Codex Cisamensis, at Siba, which Petit (“Jean Xenos,” p. 7) identified with Sivas, an inland village on the south side of Crete east of the Bay of Mesara.¹ This was less than a decade after Nikephoros Phokas reconquered the island from the Arabs in 961, ending over 130 years of Muslim rule. After pursuing a wandering solitary life for a time, John arrived in the vicinity of Rethymno on the island’s north shore, where, in obedience to a vision from Sts. Eutychios and Eutychianos, he built his first in a series of churches in their honor.² Another celestial vision led to his construction of a monastery in honor of the Mother of God Antiphonetria “on the mountain of Myriokephala.”³ A small monastery is still in existence on the site in the village of Myriokephala at the end of a mountain road a considerable distance southwest of Rethymno.

Additional foundations followed, including a church dedicated to St. George Doubrikas, probably located where the village of Rhoustika is now to be found on another mountain road southwest of Rethymno, and another dedication to St. George Opsaropiastes, perhaps at Choromonasteri southeast of Rethymno.⁴ As was his practice with his previous foundations, John left each of these in the care of a disciple, usually an ordained monk. He then returned to Myriokephala, where he found the monks he had left behind in dire straits. He bought arable land from the local peasants to provide his monks there with more dependable support, and established a dependency in honor of St. Patapios for the supervision of various agricultural pursuits.⁵ These provisions were sufficient to support the needs of a dozen monks.

At this point John decided to take a trip to Constantinople to obtain additional philanthropic support and the privileges he thought important for securing the future of his foundations.⁶ According to the Codex Cisamensis, John obtained from the emperor Romanos III Argyros (1028– 1034) a chrysobull awarding his foundation a yearly cash subvention as well as a dozen sets of monastic clothing. From Patriarch Alexios Studites (1025–1043) John obtained a patriarchal stauropegion, a foundation charter, which exempted his foundation from interference by lay or ecclesiastical officials, prohibited the latter from exacting any ecclesiastical taxes, and, most significantly, recognized his monasteries as being independent (autodespota); only liturgical commemoration (anaphora) was reserved as a patriarchal right. The version of the Autobiography represented by the manuscript in the Bodleian Library does not refer to any patriarch, and attributes all the concessions to “our orthodox emperors,” left unnamed. Supporters in the capital sent John back to Crete with sacred vessels, books, and icons for distribution to his monasteries.

John continued his itinerant lifestyle, founding another church dedicated to the Mother of God at Kouphou, which he supported with the acquisition of landed property and the establishment of a vineyard.⁷ A village of this name still exists to the southeast of Chania, a considerable distance up the north coast from John’s original center of activity around Rethymno. An oratory in honor of St. Paul near Aigialos and a sanctuary dedicated to St. George (John’s third to this dedicatee) at Nazogeraia followed.⁸ These seem to have been located a little inland from the south shore in the western end of Crete near the present village of Azogyres. Fleeing his many admirers, John next settled on the west coast of the island in the vicinity of Kisamos near Akte.⁹

Although neither version of his Autobiography provides any information on John’s further travels, local tradition holds that he also resided for a time at the village of Spelia, where there is an oratory dedicated to him, and at his traditional place of burial, the monastery of Gouverneto on the large peninsula of Akrotiri on the north coast, due east of Chania.¹⁰

In his Testament, John chose to subordinate [1] all the rest of his churches and monasteries to Myriokephala. At present, little is known of the subsequent history of either the main monastery or its many dependencies. Gouverneto remained an active monastery, with its superior Ananias helping to instigate a revolt against the island’s Venetian rulers in 1570.¹¹ Taking confidence in its name, Gouverneto’s monks came to believe that they had authority over all the other monasteries on the island. Reportedly damaged if not destroyed by the Turks in 1770, Myriokephala preserves some wall paintings dating from the early eleventh century.¹² It is possible that there are other religious foundations on Crete that can plausibly trace their origins to John Xenos.

Analysis

Like (5) Euthymios and (7) Latros then, John’s Testament is encapsulated in a kind of hagiographic document, to which fact it undoubtedly owes its preservation.¹³ It is the briefest document in our collection, and has only one purpose, assuring the integrity of all the foundation’s properties. Probably on the basis of his patriarchal stauropegion from Alexios Studites, John Xenos considered this foundation to be private property, and hence not subject to either imperial or ecclesiastical control. In earlier eras, founders took their private ownership rights for granted; if they perceived any threat, it was likely from other private individuals, chiefly members of their own families (cf. (1) Apa Abraham [5]), who could conceivably press inheritance claims to a religious foundation and its assets if this was not foreclosed. John Xenos and his monasteries, however, lived under the threat of the charistike, that mostly infamous program co-sponsored by Emperor

8. JOHN XENOS

Basil II (976–1025) and the ecclesiastical hierarchy which resulted in many private religious foundations being granted out to new private concessionaires, usually with disastrous results.¹⁴

The document is dated to A. M. 6536 (= Sept. 1027–Aug. 1028) which accords with the note in both versions of John's Autobiography that he drew up his Testament after his trip to Constantinople that itself must have taken place, according to Codex Cisamensis, early in the reign of Romanus III (1028–34). That Codex is alone in identifying John's Constantinopolitan benefactors and in providing us with John's year of birth. In (7) Latros we have already seen the phenomenon of a more precise text developed alongside (if not actually out of) another that is a more strictly narrative account of the same circumstance. It remains for future study to determine whether the greater precision of both the Codex Cisamensis version of the Testament and also of (7) Latros is an indication of their accuracy and genuineness (as opposed to the more general accounts to be found in their conventional hagiographic counterparts) or is simply a device employed by later generations in the confection of documentary evidence designed to meet the needs of another era.

Notes on the Introduction

1. Bios C 1, ed. Tomadakes, "Hagios Ioannes," (1983–86), p. 4; Bios K, p. 8.
2. Bios C 1, p. 5; Bios K, p. 8; see Petit, "Jean Xenos," p. 7, for identification of the site, southeast of Rethymno.
3. Bios C 2, p. 5; Bios K, p. 9; Petit, "Jean Xenos," p. 8.
4. Bios C 2, p. 5; Bios K, p. 9; Petit, "Jean Xenos," pp. 8–11.
5. Bios C 3, p. 6; Bios K, p. 10; Petit, "Jean Xenos," p. 11–12. For the use of a monastic dependency to supervise properties located at some distance from a monastery, see (9) Galesios [144], (13) Ath. Typikon [9], and (35) Skoteine [10].
6. Bios C 3, pp. 6–7; Bios K, p. 10; Delehaye, Deux typika, p. 189; Petit, "Jean Xenos," p. 12.
7. Bios C 4, p. 7; Bios K, p. 11; Petit, "Jean Xenos," p. 12.
8. Bios C 4, p. 7; Bios K, p. 11; Petit, "Jean Xenos," p. 14.
9. Bios C 4, p. 7; Bios K, p. 11; Petit, "Jean Xenos," pp. 14–15.
10. Petit, "Jean Xenos," pp. 15–16.
11. Ibid., p. 16.
12. Ibid., p. 8; Gregory and Kazhdan, "Crete," p. 546; Antourakes, Myriokephalon.
13. The Testament, found in its complete version only in Codex Cisamensis (Bios K), should be compared carefully with the abbreviated account found in the version (Bios C) based on the Bodleian manuscript (= Halkin, BHG 2196), ed. Tomadakes, "Hagios Joannes," EEBS 46, pp. 7–8, lines 122–35.
14. For the charistike, see General Bibliography, XXIV: Monasticism and the Charistike, along with the discussion below in Chapter Three, Historical Context.

Bibliography

- Antourakes, G., Hai monai Myriokephalon kai Roustikon Kretes meta ton parekklesion auton (Athens, 1977).
- Beck, Hans-Georg, Kirche und theologische Literatur im byzantinischen Reich (Munich, 1959), p. 590, with note 1.
- Delehaye, Hippolyte, Deux typica byzantins de l'époque des Paléologues (Brussels, 1921), pp. 188–90.
- Gregory, Timothy, and Kazhdan, Alexander, "Crete," ODB, pp. 545–47.
- Kazhdan, Alexander, "Xenos, John," ODB, p. 2209.
- Petit, Louis, "Saint Jean Xénos ou l'Érémite d'après son autobiographie," AB 42 (1924), 5–20.

ELEVENTH CENTURY

- Tomadakes, N. B., "Ho hagios Ioannes ho Xenos kai he diatheke autou," KC 2 (1948), 47–72, at 61–6.
———, "Ho hagios Ioannes ho Xenos kai Eremites en Krete (10os – 11os aion)," EEBS 46 (1983–86), 1–117.
———, "Hymnographika kai hagiologika Ioannou tou Xenou," EEBS 20 (1950), 314–30.
———, "Ioannes ho Xenos," TEE 6 (1965), cols. 1243–45.

Translation

[1.] In the name of Our Lord Jesus Christ, this is what I order and enjoin, dispose and recommend to everyone that all the monasteries and churches which I by the grace of God have raised and founded, as well as those movable and immovable properties I have donated to them, I wish all of them to be with no exception under the authority of the lady Mother of God of Myriokephala until the end of the present world.¹

[2.] If any of the men on the face of the earth, either emperor or patriarch or metropolitan, either ruling or ruled, great or small, shall dare to deny the real and personal estate donated by me precisely to those monasteries which I have founded (let instead the aforesaid monastic community of Myriokephala own all of it as we have ordained!), may such a one be first accursed by God the Almighty and Our Lord Jesus Christ, and have neither share in the immaculate mysteries nor resolution into dust after death.² May then his portion and lot be with Judas the Betrayer, and may he have the anathema of the [p. 12] three hundred and eighteen God-inspired fathers of the first Nicaean synod; may he inherit the eternal punishment.³

[3.] On the contrary, whoever shall keep undisturbed this testament of mine, let him also preserve unchanged what I have recommended, and may the holy and heavenly God, along with the lady Mother of God, mediatrix of the whole universe, forgive all his sins. At the time of the fearful judgment, may he forgive his faults in both the present and the world to come, and place him on his right-hand side. May such a one be heir of his reign. So be it.⁴

[On the] twentieth [day], in the month of September, year of the world 6536 [= A.D. 1027/28], year of the Lord 1027.⁵

The hand of Moschos, deacon and notary of the fort of Chandax, has signed.⁶

I, Philaretos Bracheon, protospatharios and strategos of Crete, being present to this testament of the monk John, have signed upon summons.

I, Eumathios, protospatharios and strategos of Crete, being present to this testament of the monk and hermit John, have signed.

I, the priest Leo Daphereras, notary by the imperial authority, have transcribed the present testament of our holy father John of Crete, surnamed "Xenos (the) monk."

8. JOHN XENOS

Notes on the Translation

1. Bios C 4, p. 7, mentions only churches among the protected institutions, to which Bios K adds here monasteries. Bios C 4, however, mentions “animate” property, i.e., livestock, which Bios K’s Testament omits. The attribution of ownership to the Mother of God is found only in Bios K.
2. Bios K here has a longer list of potential violators of the foundation’s autonomy, though curiously it omits bishops, who are mentioned in Bios C 4’s account. The protection of donated personal property and real estate is found only in Bios K; so also the declaration of subordination of all the monasteries to Myriokephala.
3. This is a slightly different and longer version of the curse found in Bios C 4; for some other examples from the eleventh century, see (9) Galesios [246], (10) Eleousa [19], (18) Nea Gephyra [4], (19) Attaleiates [8], [23], (22) Evergetis [12], and (24) Christodoulos [B14].
4. Bios K here adds the Mother of God to the Divinity himself as a protector of John’s Testament.
5. Bios C is undated.
6. Bios C 4, a narrative account, lacks signatories.

9. Galesios: Testament of Lazarus of Mount Galesios

Date: October 31, 1053¹

Translator: Patricia Karlin-Hayter

Edition employed: Reconstructed from the Vita S. Lazari auctore Gregorio monacho, ed. Hippolyte Delehaye, Acta sanctorum novembris, vol. 3 (Brussels, 1910), pp. 508–606.

Manuscript: Codex Lavrioticus I.127, fols. 81–293 (14th c.)

Other translations: None

Institutional History

A. Early Career of the Founder Lazarus

Lazarus' life and the history of his monastic foundations are known almost exclusively from the Life composed by his disciple Gregory, which Delehaye justly praised as one of the most substantial and interesting works of the Byzantine hagiographic genre.² The Life also preserves the surviving fragments of Lazarus' Testament as translated below. The Life records his birth as Leo in the village of Theotokos near Magnesia on the Meander, not far from Ephesos; calculating backwards from his reported death at the age of 86 in 1053, he would appear to have been born in 967/68.³ There is, however, an unpublished manuscript in the Historical Museum, Moscow, which indicates that he died at the age of 72; if true, this would mean that he was born about 981.⁴ After being educated locally for a career as a notary, Leo became a monk at a monastery in the vicinity of Attaleia in Pamphylia, taking the monastic name of Lazarus. He lived here as a solitary for seven years. Then he realized a long-frustrated ambition to visit the Holy Land, where he served in both the monastery of St. Euthymios and the St. Sabas monastery near Jerusalem.⁵ The superior of the latter institution bestowed on him the great habit and ordained him as a priest. Increasing Arab pressure on the local Christian community seems to have been a factor in his decision to return to his homeland after an absence of twenty years.

Lazarus found himself back home near Ephesos, either in 1005 (so Janin, Géographie, vol. 2, p. 242, n. 6) or in 1013 (so Delehaye, Stylites, p. cxv). He decided to settle down as a stylite close by an existing oratory of St. Marina. After gathering disciples, Lazarus obtained funding from a pious lay woman to pay for the construction of a monastery as well as a new church to replace the little oratory; the local metropolitan of Ephesos contributed landed property for the support of the foundation.⁶ Lazarus remained here for seven years, then he sought refuge from the press of his many admirers as well as the increasingly meddlesome metropolitan of Ephesos by heading off for Mount Galesios (modern Alamandağ) north of Ephesos beyond the Kaystros River.

9. GALESIOS

B. Establishment of Lazarus' Monasteries on Mount Galesios

Summoned back to St. Marina by his metropolitan, Lazarus escaped again with a few companions, including his younger brother Ignatios, and established a new monastic settlement on Mount Galesios dedicated to the Savior (Soter).⁷ Galesios would be Lazarus' home for the rest of his life, though he felt constrained to move higher up the mountain as time went on to escape the curiosity of visitors. Lazarus lived near the Savior monastery on a new column for twelve years, then he himself moved further up the mountain while the monastery continued to function under his direction. Lazarus next had a new column and a church dedicated to the Mother of God (Theotokos) constructed at a higher elevation on the mountain.⁸ He is reported to have lived there for twelve years as well. Lazarus' final residence on the mountain was on a column adjacent to a new monastery dedicated to the Resurrection (Anastasis), which became the most important of the three monasteries under his direct administration.⁹

In addition to these three directly administered monasteries, there were others near the mountain that were associated more loosely with Lazarus' foundation. At some point during his residence on Galesios, Lazarus' steward Gabriel sought to take advantage of the good relations between the Galesian monastic community and Emperor Constantine IX Monomachos (1042–1055) to endow a new imperial monastery that would be immune from the claims of the metropolitan of Ephesos. The foundation, the imperial monastery of the Mother of God at Bessai, was supported by a gift of landed property offered by the emperor in the memory of Maria Skleraina, who died circa 1046.¹⁰ Although this proved to be a prosperous foundation with some 300 monks, several times more than all the rest of Lazarus' directly administered monasteries combined, he never really welcomed the new foundation as a member of the Galesian community. Bessai was self-governing (autodioiketos), and was the only monastery associated with Lazarus that had its own superior and a separate landed endowment, the estate (proasteion) of Eoptine. The monastery church was likely that dedicated to the Mother of God, the Consolation (Pausolype), as a memorial for Maria Skleraina by her brother Romanos Skleros, who had paid a visit to Lazarus on an earlier occasion.¹¹ Lazarus' mother also established a nunnery in the vicinity of Galesios which bore her monastic name, Eupraxia; it does not seem to have been an administrative dependency of Lazarus' foundation.¹²

Lazarus' three directly administered monasteries, the Savior, the Mother of God, and the Resurrection, were supported by estates donated by various benefactors, which were in turn administered by various stewards appointed for this purpose.¹³ The metropolitan of Ephesos had evidently reclaimed the administration of St. Marina after Lazarus' departure from that monastery. Lazarus' Testament, drawn up eight days before his death, prescribes for the support of forty monks at the monastery of the Resurrection and twelve each at the monasteries of the Savior and the Mother of God; Bessai, having its own endowment, was to share in the common revenues of the other three monasteries only if there was a surplus.¹⁴

C. Preservation of Institutional Independence

After Lazarus' death in 1053, the concerns of his monks for preserving their institutional independence made even the place of interment for his remains a matter of controversy.¹⁵ Some thought the original burial place in the right side of the narthex of the church of the Resurrection would serve as a pretext for the metropolitan of Ephesos to seize control over the adjacent monastery, while a proposed alternative, burial at the imperial monastery at Bessai, risked a loss of autonomy to another master. Eventually there was a translation of the founder's relics, commemorated in a synaxarion on July 17, but the site of the new depository is not known.

ELEVENTH CENTURY

D. The Galesios Monastery in the Thirteenth Century

After the translation of the founder, little is known of the Galesios monasteries thereafter until the thirteenth century, when, treated at that time as a single administrative entity, the Galesios foundation seems to have partaken in the general revival of monasteries during the Nicæan Empire (1204–61).¹⁶ Later, one of its superiors was elected patriarch of Constantinople as Joseph I (1266–75 and 1282–83). On at least one occasion this patriarch benefited his old monastery by abolishing the independent constitution of the monastery of Christ-Who-Is, regulated by the author of (36) Blemmydes (for which see below, Chapter Seven), and annexing that monastery to Galesios as a dependency (metochion).¹⁷ After Joseph's deposition in 1275 for refusing to support the church reunification policies of Emperor Michael VIII Palaiologos (1259–82), Galesiote monks were prominent among the emperor's opponents.¹⁸ Upon Joseph I's return to office in 1282 after Michael VIII's death, the Galesiote monk Galaktion took the lead in purifying the Constantinopolitan cathedral church of Hagia Sophia. Joseph I's successor Gregory II Kyprios (1283–89) was interested enough in Galesios to compose a hagiographic Life of Lazarus, which, however, is not an independent historical witness, but rather a reworking of Gregory the Galesiote's eleventh-century Life.¹⁹ A letter of this patriarch mentions the monastery and shows its monks in a dispute with the local metropolitan of Ephesos, John Cheilas, just like their respective predecessors in the eleventh century.²⁰ The future patriarch Athanasios I (1289–93 and 1303–9), author of (55) Athanasios I (for which see below, Chapter Nine), spent some ten years at the Galesios monastery, where he was ordained a priest and made good use of what he considered to be an excellent library.²¹ Some manuscripts from this library are still preserved.²²

E. Administrative Union with the Anastasis Monastery

As the Turks consolidated their control around Ephesos towards the end of the thirteenth century, the Byzantine authorities sought to save what they could of the important monastic foundations in that area. In a preserved chrysobull dating from the early years of his reign, Emperor Andronikos II (1282–1328) Palaiologos chose to unify Galesios with the church of the Resurrection (Anastasis) then being restored by George Akropolites.²³ Later George's son Constantine would write (46) Akropolites for that foundation (see below, Chapter Eight). It was likely also at this time that the head of St. Lazarus of Galesios was brought to Constantinople, as commemorated on October 25.²⁴ The imperial chrysobull does not explicitly refer to the destruction of the old monastery of Galesios but it is likely, based on the evidence from notes in some contemporary manuscripts, that this did occur and that the surviving monks were then relocated to the capital.²⁵

9. GALESIOS

Analysis

This composite “document” is surely the most unconventional one in our collection. Like (5) Euthymios and (7) Latros, what we know of Lazarus’ Testament (diatyposis) is encapsulated [246] as part of a much longer hagiographic Life. The author Gregory was a cellarer (kellarites) in Lazarus’ foundation who wrote during the superiorship of Ignatios, Lazarus’ brother and successor, while a good many of the founder’s associates were still living.

In addition to supplying [246] a summary of the contents of the lost Testament, Gregory’s Life also provides unique details on the process of the creation of a testamentary typikon, illustrating the role of both oral tradition and the spiritual director’s jurisprudential teaching in determining the rules for the life of this foundation. The exceptional interest of the Life in this case seemed to us to justify a translation not only of Gregory’s brief summary of the Testament but also of the excerpts which shed light on the circumstances of its composition and on various customs of the foundation that once may have been included in it. Janin (Géographie, vol. 2, p. 245, n. 5) believed that other provisions of the lost Testament were to be found disseminated throughout the narrative of the Life in the form of Lazarus’ responses to various inquiries by his monks.

Unlike most typika, which present idealized, normative views of their communities, this highly conjectural and only partially reconstructed document affords an unusually frank, unvarnished perspective on the disciplinary problems of a traditional private religious foundation on the eve of the monastic reform of the late eleventh century.

A. Contents of the Lost Testament

According to Gregory’s summary [246] of the “essential points” of the lost rule, the Testament included standard features such as a founder’s biography, an inventory of landed properties, administrative prescriptions, limits on the number of brothers, instructions for the election of the superior and appointment of a financial steward, regulations for diet and clothing, and provisions for church services as well as “boilerplate” provisions such as a curse on transgressors (cf. (8) John Xenos [2]). The provision [246] that the monastery’s dependents not be “reduced to hardship” is an ambiguous confirmation that Lazarus’ monks had abandoned Studite aspirations to economic self-sufficiency and now relied on the labor of others to support their lives of prayer.

It also is worth mentioning here that towards the end of the last century, Manuel Gedeon believed that he had located the liturgical typikon of the Galesios foundation in a thirteenth-century manuscript originally copied at the Resurrection monastery on Mount Galesios that is now in the library of the Lavra monastery on Mount Athos.²⁶ Though Papadopoulos-Kerameus rejected this attribution, considering Gedeon’s document to be only a copy of a common Palestinian liturgical typikon that just happened to be copied at Galesios, a review of the evidence may show that Gedeon was correct.

B. Lives of the Monks

Gregory’s Life enables us to fill in this bare outline of his summary with some details on the lives of the monks at Lazarus’ foundation. It amply demonstrates lax disciplinary standards common to monks at this time, particularly with respect to their possession of private property. Although he exhorted postulants to give away their personal possessions upon entrance [192], some kept a portion of their private fortunes, while others surrendered their assets but “compelled the father to rule that certain comforts be supplied them by the monastery . . . [and] in this way introduced more than a few scandals into the monastery and drew others to their ways.” Lazarus was forced to bargain with prospective monks in exchange for their financial contributions to the monastery. Monks were also permitted [191] to retain private wealth gained after admission and to own [138] their own icons (with votive lamps) for personal veneration in their cells.

There is other evidence of the unpopularity of cenobiticism such as the monks who refused to take common meals [147] and other monks who insisted on leaving the community to pursue the solitary life [189], cf. [141]. Moreover, in what would become a common feature of later Byzantine monasteries, even in the era of the monastic reform, the community was divided [182] into literate members of the choir and the illiterate brothers who could not sing (and who presumably worked at manual labors).

Some of his monks were troubled by the obvious inequality of resources and the prevailing hierarchy of rank among the members of their community, yet Lazarus himself considered [130] the contemporary hierarchy of monastic habits—martyrs, apostles, and angels—a regrettable but ineradicable innovation. Although his instincts were reformist, his policies were almost invariably accommodationist. Faced with cohabiting monks who had fathered children [129], Lazarus preferred occasional lapses from celibacy to concubinage. He recommended spiritual exercises for conquering homoerotic longings [196] for young people in the vicinity of the monastery. Unable to reform his own foundation, Lazarus espoused a bolder philosophy [187] for patrons who asked for rules for their own monasteries, specifically, “not to differ in food, clothing, or any other necessities for the body in order to preserve, through equality in these matters, the rule of submission unshaken and unhurt.”

C. Constitutional Matters

According to his biographer Gregory, Lazarus had been able to enforce [191] the traditional ban on the ownership of private property at his two earlier monasteries, those dedicated to the Savior and the Mother of God, but not at the Monastery of the Resurrection, since “some of those who have been tonsured in the monastery have brought money with them from the world, and would absolutely not give it up, because they could not be satisfied with what the monastery provides,” perhaps a reference to the personal endowments known as prosenexeis brought to monasteries by monks of aristocratic origin.²⁷ This suggests that the monasteries of the Savior and the Mother of God were organized cenobitically, perhaps on the model of older Studite monasteries, while the Resurrection must have been a mixed community in which some monks lived separately on their private resources or incomes, coming together with the cenobitic members of the community only for certain special purposes.

Clearly, Theodore the Studite’s charismatic, authoritarian model of monastic governance was neither practical nor dispositionally suited for Lazarus, who ruled his monasteries from atop various columns for many decades.²⁸ Taking advantage of Lazarus’ accommodationist disposition, many of his monks showed their traditional partiality for solitary forms of monasticism in preference to the cenobitic form promoted earlier by Stoudios, while still other monks of a different temperament began to show their disgust with the disciplinary lapses and financial compromises that were endemic in non-cenobitic monasticism. The contemporary Athonite typikon, (15) Constantine IX, demonstrates the latter phenomenon even more clearly in its record of hostility to the numerous secular interpenetrations of monasticism by manifestations of aristocratic privilege.

Lazarus was anxious to protect his foundation from harm at the hands of representatives of the metropolitan of Ephesos [141], cf. [247]. The threat of dissolution or, perhaps more realistically, of the foundation's forcible participation in the charistike, gave urgency to the composition of his testamentary typikon, which Lazarus signed (if indeed he did at all) only on his deathbed [250]. The imperial monastery of Bessai that was associated with Lazarus' personally administered monasteries was already "independent," and thus thought to be immune from any attempt to usurp control over it by the local hierarchy.²⁹ Just before Lazarus' death, a deputation was sent [223] to Constantinople to obtain confirmation of the foundation's independence from Emperor Constantine IX Monomachos and Patriarch Michael Keroullarios (1043–58). The long-term effectiveness of these precautions against the charistike cannot be determined in default of evidence about the foundation's history during the crucial period of the last half of the eleventh century when the threat posed to private and independent religious institutions from that notorious management program was at its peak.

Notes on the Introduction

1. For dating, see [246], with Janin, Géographie, vol. 2, p. 245, and Malamut, "Bessai," p. 244.
2. Halkin, BHG 979; for the Vita S. Lazari, see Delehaye, Acta, pp. 502–8, and Stylites, pp. cvi–cxvi; Kazhdan, "Lazaros," p. 1198.
3. For the traditional dating, see Vita, chap. 254, ed. Delehaye, Acta, p. 588; Delehaye, Stylites, p. cxv; Janin, Géographie, vol. 2, p. 242, cf. 246, n. 6; Stiernon, "Lazare," col. 110.
4. Ms. Moscow, Hist. Mus. 369/353, fol. 220, for which see Kazhdan, "Ideals," p. 476, n. 16, and "Lazaros," p. 1198.
5. For Lazarus' career in the Holy Land, see Vita, chaps. 14–30, ed. Delehaye, Acta, pp. 513–19; Delehaye, Stylites, p. cix; Janin, Géographie, vol. 2, p. 242, with n. 6; Stiernon, "Lazare," col. 110. The precise chronology is uncertain.
6. For Lazarus' tenure at St. Marina, see Vita, chaps. 31–53, ed. Delehaye, Acta, pp. 519–26; Delehaye, Stylites, pp. cx, cxv; Janin, Géographie, vol. 2, pp. 242–43; Malamut, "Bessai," p. 246; Stiernon, "Lazare," col. 110. Once again, the chronology is uncertain.
7. For the Soter monastery, see Vita, chaps. 53–57, ed. Delehaye, Acta, pp. 526–27; Delehaye, Stylites, pp. cx–cxi; Janin, Géographie, vol. 2, p. 243.
8. For the Theotokos monastery, see Vita, chap. 43, ed. Delehaye, Acta; Delehaye, Stylites, p. cxi; Janin, Géographie vol. 2, pp. 243–44.
9. For the Anastasis monastery, see Vita, chaps. 110–11, 162, 246, ed. Delehaye, Acta, pp. 541–42, 557, 585; Delehaye, Stylites, pp. cxi–cxii; Janin, Géographie, vol. 2, p. 242.
10. For the Bessai monastery, see Vita, chaps. 202, 216, 218, 238–39, 245–47, ed. Delehaye, Acta, pp. 570–71, 574–75, 582, 584–86; Janin, Géographie, vol. 2, pp. 244–45; and especially Malamut, "Bessai," pp. 246–48.
11. So Malamut, "Bessai," p. 247; for this church, see Vita, chaps. 245 and 247, ed. Delehaye, Acta, pp. 584–86, and Janin, Géographie, vol. 2, pp. 244–45; for Romanos Skleros' visit, see Vita, chap. 87, p. 536.
12. For the nunnery of Eupraxia, see Vita, chaps. 164 and 201, ed. Delehaye, Acta, pp. 558, 570, with Janin, Géographie, vol. 2, p. 245.
13. See Lazarus' brother Ignatios, steward of the proasteion of Philippikos, Vita, chap. 221, ed. Delehaye,

ELEVENTH CENTURY

- Acta*, p. 575, Cyril, steward of the proasteion of Pentakrene, Vita, chap. 244, p. 584; Vita, chap. 221 also mentions another dependency, Kampsai; see discussion in Janin, Géographie, vol. 2, p. 246, n. 1.
14. Vita, chap. 246, ed. Delehay, Acta, p. 585.
 15. Vita chaps. 252–54, ed. Delehay, Acta, pp. 587–88; Janin, Géographie, vol. 2, pp. 246–47.
 16. For the later history of Galesios, see especially Janin, Géographie, vol. 2, pp. 247–50.
 17. For Joseph's election, see Pachymeres, 4.2, ed. A. Failler, Georges Pachymérés, Relations Historiques, vol. 2 (Paris, 1984), pp. 333–35; cf. Nikephoros Gregoras, Byzantina historia, 4.8, ed. L. Schopen and I. Bekker, CSHB, vol. 1, p. 107; for the annexation of Nikephoros Blemmydes' monastery, see Pachymeres, De Michaele Palaeologo, 5.2, CSHB, vol. 1, p. 342.
 18. See Janin, Géographie, vol. 2, p. 248, with sources in nn. 3, 4, 5.
 19. Halkin, BHG 980; for this Vita, see Delehay, Stylites, p. cviii; Stiernon, "Lazare," col. 110.
 20. Laurent, Regestes, vol. 1, pt. 4, no. 1500 (ca. 1286–87).
 21. Theoktistos the Studite, Vita s. Athanasii, chap. 6, ed. Hippolyte Delehay, "La vie d' Athanase patriarche de Constantinople," MAH 17 (1897), 39–75, at p. 51.
 22. For details, see Volk, "Klosterbibliotheken," pp. 150–58, with assessment by Janin, Géographie, vol. 2, p. 249.
 23. Franz Dölger, Regesten der Kaiserurkunden des oströmischen Reiches von 565–1453, vol. 1 (Munich-Berlin, 1924–32), no. 2085, ed. MM 5.264–67; see discussion by Janin, Géographie, vol. 2, p. 249.
 24. For this translatio, see Janin, Géographie, vol. 2, p. 247.
 25. See Janin, Géographie, vol. 2, pp. 249, 250.
 26. Ms. Lavra lambda 99; see discussion in Janin, Géographie, vol. 2, p. 246.
 27. For prosenexeis, see (22) Evergetis [37] and related documents in the Evergetian tradition, with Emil Herman, "Die Regelung der Armut in den byzantinischen Klöstern," OCF 7 (1941), 406–60, esp. 439–42.
 28. For a different view, see Kazhdan, "Ideals," p. 476: "Lazaros . . . administered with an iron hand the monasteries built around his column."
 29. See Vita, chap. 245, ed. Delehay, Acta, p. 584.

Bibliography

- Beck, Hans-Georg, Kirche und theologische Literatur im byzantinischen Reich (Munich, 1959), p. 210.
- Delehay, H., Acta sanctorum novembris, vol. 3, pp. 502–8.
- , Les saints stylites (Brussels-Paris, 1923), chap. 6: Saint Lazare le Galésiot, pp. cvi–cxvi.
- Gedeon, Manuel, "Gnoseis ek tou typikou ton monon tou Galesiou orous," EA 18 (1898), 27–31, 61–67; rev. by A. Papadopoulos-Kerameus, EA 20 (1900), 259–62, and by Waldemar Nissen, BZ 9 (1900), 541–44.
- Halkin, François, Bibliotheca hagiographica graeca, 3rd ed. (Brussels, 1957), 979, cf. 980.
- Janin, Raymond, La géographie ecclésiastique de l'empire byzantin, vol. 2: Les églises et les monastères des grands centres byzantins (Paris, 1975), pp. 241–50.
- Karlin-Hayter, Patricia, "Lexicographical Notes, 1. Diakrisis, 2. Paraphylakteon," Byzantion 55 (1985), 589–91.
- Kazhdan, Alexander, "Hermitic, Cenobitic, and Secular Ideals in Byzantine Hagiography of the Ninth Centuries," GOTR 30 (1985), 473–87, esp. 476.
- , "Lazaros of Mount Galesios," ODB, p. 1198.
- Lampsides, O., "Anekdoton keimenon peri tou hagiou Lazarou tou Galesiotou," Theologia 53 (1982), 158–77.
- Loparev, Chrysostom, Kratkiya otset o poezdke na Athon letom 1896 goda (St. Petersburg, 1897), pp. 15–21.
- Malamut, Élisabeth, "A propos de Bessai d'Éphèse," REB 43 (1985), 243–51.

9. GALESIOS

- Ševčenko, Ihor, "Constantinople Viewed from the Eastern Provinces in the Middle Byzantine Period," HUS 3–4, pt. 2 (1979–80), 712–47, esp. 723–26.
- Stiernon, Daniel, "Lazare le Galésiole," Catholicisme, vol. 7 (Paris, 1975), cols. 110–11.
- Volk, Otto, "Die byzantinischen Klosterbibliotheken von Konstantinopel, Thessalonike und Kleinasien" (Ph.D. diss., Munich, 1955), pp. 150–58.

Translation

[p. 546]

128. . . . The brothers would often discuss with each other points arising, whether from the Holy Scriptures or from the things that happened to themselves, sorrows, insults and all the other things that men consider and call ills, or again, concerning the differences between the sin and the sinner, and when they questioned the father about these things, he would give them the shrewdest and most admirable interpretations and solutions, such as the one about to be related, and others no less remarkable.

129. A brother asked the father about monks who fall into the sin of fornication. "[There are] those who fall again and again [indiscriminately], regularly trying to repent [and reform], but because of the grip of habit, falling back into their old ways. Then there are those who fall once for all, sticking to one same person in their error. Which was the best?" he asked. The father replied: "Neither is right, neither is blameless, and if they fail to repent and right their ways, they are certainly [both] guilty and liable to punishment. However, as I see it, he who falls indiscriminately is more likely to turn and repent than a man who has settled [his affection] on one person, and wants the situation to continue. A man who has attached himself in this way to one [p. 547] person, particularly if, furthermore, he has children by her, will hardly repent, unless an exceptional mercy of God—he who makes a way where no way is—through some special dispensation, set his affairs right. But the indiscriminate sinner, pricked by his own conscience, jeered at each time and insulted by men, may yet repent and change his ways." Such the question, such the answer given by the father.

130. Some of the brothers once questioned him about the monastic habit.¹ "Seeing there was only one," they asked, "how had the custom arisen making three out of it?" To this question also he replied: "The habit" he said "is indeed one, even if some people have attributed two classes to it.² As for our contemporary trick of dividing it into three classes, this was first established because of the slackness and impotence of the present generation, yet not altogether vainly and irrationally. This too is a type that mirrors something greater and higher. For this division seems, in a way, to represent the array of the three following orders, martyrs, that is, apostles and angels. He who applies himself to observing the rule of the first order is enrolled with the choir of the martyrs, he who [observes the rule] of the second with those of the apostles, the third with those of the angels. This is clear from the names themselves, since we regularly talk of the angelic, of the apostolic habit, and of the garment of submission, which goes to show. So much for the habit."

[p. 548]

135. This too deserves mention. The brothers disagreed once over the service, some saying the theotokion should be sung along with the troparia of [every] feast day, while the others would not agree to this. They went to the father, asking what they should do. He [replied]: “Yes, indeed, it is appropriate to sing the theotokion on every occasion. Just as in all seasoning salt plays the most important part, so in all Christian singing of praise, praise of God’s mother is most appropriate and most necessary. If you like, I will give [the brothers] a suitable talk to accompany what I am saying.”

[p. 549]

138. But let the narrative proceed. Laurentios—who is now a stylite—was standing with me, once, in front of the father’s column, and put some questions to him, about lamps in church and in the cells. The father answered: “The church represents the type of heaven, and the lights in it represent the stars. But as for those in the cells, at any rate so it seems to me, he who has in his heart the light that is apprehended by the mind does not need the light apprehended by the senses. If one [of you] wishes to sing something he does not know by heart, or if he has something to read, he may light his lamp, finish his office or whatever he has to read, and then put it out. For if a monk has a lamp burning in his cell while he sleeps he shall be reckoned as dead to God. If anyone owns an icon, let him take it to the church; for himself, let him erect a wooden cross facing him, and so say his prayers. When he goes to church, let him embrace the holy images.” All this the father said, not legislating, so to speak, or laying down a rule that no one should have an icon in his cell, but urging [us to embrace] poverty, and securing thereby those he won over against distraction.

139. The brothers of the monastery once denounced John Smyrnaios to the father, [saying] he leaned on a staff when standing in church. When the father questioned him, he answered: “As you know, father, I am weak and not able to stand like the rest of the brothers. It is so as not to leave the church, go to my cell and lie down in slackness and sleep that I have taken to this.” Then the father to him: “Since this is your condition, from now on prop yourself on two staffs if you like; only do not leave the church on that account.”³

140. On one occasion, on some major saint’s day, the brothers, standing, according to custom, before the column, said to the father: “Give us a treat,⁴ father, [in honor of] the saint whose memory we are celebrating, and send and buy us some fish.” Then the father said to them: “It was not through luxury and ease that he became a saint, but through fasting and much striving. We too, if we wish to celebrate the holy days of the saints as God approves and in a manner pleasing to the saints themselves, must imitate their life to the best of our ability.” One of the brothers, by name Pachomios, rejoined: “As Christ said to the apostles, the wedding guests cannot fast so long as the bridegroom is with them, but the days will come when the bridegroom shall be taken away from them, and then they will fast” (Matt. 9:15). The brother’s aim in saying this did not escape the father. Turning his face away and not looking at the brother who had spoken, but averting his eyes, he said: “The case of Christ and his disciples is as you say. But as for me, I trust in Christ my God that after my death you will receive [all that you need] and lack nothing.”

9. GALESIOS

141. This the father said, not on this occasion only, but frequently. But on this point the brothers heard him without enthusiasm. They did not expect the monastery to survive after his death, for emissaries from the metropolis⁵ were daily badgering us to withdraw from the mountain. As a result, most of the brothers, some privately and individually, others openly and in front of all, begged him to consent to their leaving after his death. To some he gave his consent, but others, on the contrary, he bound by his impending departure itself to stay. When some said to him whoever took his place as superior of the monastery would not be capable of the same spiritual discernment towards those under him, nor of taking upon himself adequately the weaknesses of all, and of seeing to their spiritual and material needs in a suitable manner, he answered and said to them: "I know that it is impossible that the monastery should not have, after my death, a superior who, with help from above, will take your material needs satisfactorily in hand, and to him you will be obedient in everything, as is proper, having the same faith in him as you now confess for myself. As for spiritual questions⁶ the superior, it is true, will not always be here, but, by the grace of God, you have elders. The experience of many years has given them a sure knowledge of the spiritual way. Take them as guides. Lay bare to them the workings of your soul. Whatever you do, do it after inquiring of them and with their approval, and I know that you will not stray from the straight way. If, as you hint, they should drive any one of you from the monastery, let the expelled man remain outside, before the gates, for seven days. If during those seven days they neither bring him food or drink from the monastery nor are willing to admit him, then let him remove himself and to where he wishes, for this man's [right] will be allowed both by God and by me."

[p. 551]

144. Someone came up by night once, stole from the monastery stable one of the monastery horses with the very pack on its back and made off. On being informed next morning the father sent out some of the brothers to investigate. They set forth, inquired everywhere, and returned without having discovered anything. On which account, they banded together with the other brothers. All went together to the father and pestered him to have a wall built around the monastery and control going out and coming in with lock and key.⁷ "For" said they "the same thing has happened to us on numerous other occasions." But the father would hear none of it, saying to them: "St. Sabas tried to do the same thing in his lavra, and had already got some way with the building, but he was stopped by God's mother, who appeared to him saying: 'If you wish to have me as guardian of your lavra, leave it as it was before. If [you prefer] the wall, have your way and build it.'⁸ He dropped the building on the spot, entrusting to God's mother and no one else the guard of his lavra; and to this day it stands. Therefore, neither shall we, if our hope and trust are firm in Christ Jesus and in her who bore him, his all-holy mother, depend on walls and enclosures for safety." While he said this to those who were pestering him about the wall before dismissing them, at the same time, seeing St. George's day was at hand and some of the brothers were preparing to go, as was their custom, to the monastery's dependency at Mathaia and to the church there of the said great martyr, the father said to them: "Say to St. George: Unless the horse is found tomorrow, in the monastery, from now on I shall no more celebrate your feast." With these words, and having blessed the brothers, he dismissed them. The next day, the monastery's lost horse, with its pack, was found grazing on the foothills of the mountains and moving towards the monastery. The monk who had found it caught it and led it in. Seeing this the father said, “Well, St. George has lost no time in giving us back our horse.”

[p. 551]

147. On a solemn holiday, once, some of the brothers did not, as is the custom, join the others at the common table, but ate in their own cells. Learning about this after the brothers had left the table, the father summoned them and, from the top of the column, addressed them cheering their souls with his sweet, mellifluous words—for this was always the father’s way, unless it was impossible—and besides his other exhortations, this too was wafted down for all to hear: “If anyone fail, on feast days, to join the other brothers at table, he is under a curse.”

[p. 552]

150. Some of the brothers pressed the father to give a ruling concerning the strangers who daily turned up at the monastery, to the effect that they stay for three days only and then leave—for his wish was that, however long anyone might wish to stay in the monastery, stay he should and be pushed out by none—they pestered him likewise about [visiting] monks, vagrants in particular, [asking] that they should not eat at the [monks’] table, but in the hospice.⁹ They had asked this a number of times, and insisted, without being able to persuade him, when, all at once, seizing, as they thought, on a good pretext, they approached him and said: “There is trouble over the strangers. The guestmaster does not look after them, either in their service or elsewhere. He takes the legumes from the cellarer for cleaning, and gives them to them. They take them, pick out all that is sound and eat them, leaving whatever is rotten for us. Since you will neither listen to us nor follow the rule of other monasteries, at least listen to Christ himself when he says it is not fair to take the children’s bread and throw it to the dogs (Matt. 15:26) and [p. 553] make it a rule that they should stay three days and then leave.” When they had said this, the father, pretending to be angry with the guestmaster, sent for him. When he had him fetched: “Is this” says he “how you look after the stranger brothers? You furnish them properly neither with water nor with proper service. Are you unaware that the good care or contempt you mete out to strangers reverts to Christ? Be assured that if, from now on, I learn that a stranger has been grieved by you, you are going to grieve, in no uncertain manner. However, as my fathers insist, let them spend three days [here] and then leave. But it is my wish the monks should share their table. Even if they are poor and vagrants, yet because of the habit they are our brothers, and it is not fitting they should eat with laymen in the hospice.”¹⁰ When the father had spoken the guestmaster bowed deeply and asked forgiveness, and having received it, went away to his work.

[p. 562]

180. I have related all these incidents concerning our fathers and brothers, as I said at the beginning of my narrative, so that “the tree be known by its fruit” (Matt. 12:33) and the master by his disciples. For indeed, looking to his mode of life as to a pattern and picture, or rather, guided and governed by him, they progressed in every virtue.¹¹ A holy emulation was to be seen among them, as, through their ascetic labors, they sped with eager foot along the “narrow and hard way” (Matt. 7:14), striving along it to reach the broad space of eternal felicity. For they were obedient, as has been said, to his godly counsels and instructions, and followed them without swerving, and therefore bore easily the hardships of the ascetic ring. To all those who came to him and chose to make their abode with him, he taught one thing above all else, making it the preliminary foundation and a favorable starting point for progress and amelioration: that they do not hide their thoughts from him, neither having nor doing anything without his approval, following their own wishes; that they do nothing beyond what is enjoined on them, neither undertaking efforts above their strength, nor binding themselves, in accordance with their own whims, to fasts or vigils or anything else outside the rule of the monastery.¹² “Carry out with all zeal the rule of the monastery, in the church, at table and in everything else; accept thankfully what is given; leave, each of us, the church or the table in silence, our mind full of praise, and go straight to our cell, not clustering together [p. 563] to spend time in idle talk, not sitting drinking and eating together, not leaving our cells out of akedia, and going to the cells of others—unless it should be necessary—but rather remaining steadfastly in our own cell. Lest” he would say “leaving our own cells and going off to those of others, we should see or hear or say things we would rather not. For this is what leads to words, in this way we come to judge our brothers and abuse them, till the blinded soul loses her way and strays from the right goal. We give up looking at ourselves to gossip about the faults of others, unable to stop ourselves or recognize our own weakness, we begin bandying insults and quarreling and daily provoking scandals with the brothers.” Such were his daily lessons, spoken privately to particular individuals or addressed to all, and he would add this last word: “Anyone who observes all this with all the might that is in him, and receives gratefully what the monastery supplies at table and for his other needs, and is satisfied with that, I am confident in my Christ that he will have a place beside Antony and the other inspired fathers.”

9. GALESIOS

[p. 563]

182. To those who questioned him about places in church, he replied by saying: “Those who know the Scriptures and stand in the choir to sing are like the reapers in the field, while the ignorant, who cannot read and do not know how to sing, and for that reason stand behind the singers, listening to the chant, are like those who follow behind the reapers and pick up the ears that fall or are overlooked. The reapers,” says he, “frequently collect tares in their fistfuls of wheat, while those who follow pick up nothing but wheat. For it is through those who stand and sing in the choir that the service of the church is celebrated, yet, because sometimes they attend to what they are singing, but at others raise their voice at the wrong moment because they are not paying attention to what they are singing—for this I compared to tares—they do not perform [the service] quite without introducing impurities and stains. While the illiterate, if they stand soberly and attend to what those in the choir are singing—for the accidents referred to do not trouble them, unless they fall asleep because of indifference—even if they do not recognize everything [they hear], yet all they do manage to grasp they hold safe in their mind.” In this way he humbled the pride of the former while strengthening the resolution of the latter to stand patiently and soberly in church.¹³

He further ordered that to those who did not arrive for the service at the beginning of the matins, the cellarer should not supply the portion of wine allotted to them, or even, sometimes, food. Conversely, those he saw eager and persevering in church, standing and singing, he would often praise in the presence of the brothers and favor them, besides which he would on occasion do the opposite for the slackers and the sluggish. He did not do this purposelessly, as you might think, but in order to increase the zeal of the former—for he knew that praise often increases the zeal of those who are striving for virtue, and also the contrary—and to rouse the others from their laziness and slackness.

[p. 564]

184. To those who questioned him about slackness over hours, he said: “If any monk, except from compelling necessity or some other [overriding] circumstance, takes food before singing his hours, God will reckon it as if he has skinned seven dead donkeys and eaten with unwashed hands.”¹⁴ When some of them asked whether penalties would be exacted for this by God, “Yes,” said he, “unless they confess, for whoever makes a full confession, and receives absolution from him who has received his confession, may be confident that he receives it from God too, so long as he does not fall again into the same faults.” All this the father said to all in general.

185. But for those whose days were absorbed by their offices he framed his exhortations differently, admonishing and instructing them, before all else, to carry out the office entrusted to them honestly and with a will.¹⁵ Next to that he exhorted them “not to disregard hours and other liturgies, but whenever they had a respite to go to the church, in particular for matins, for the holy Eucharist, as well as for the office of lamplighting also of course. But if they have not a break, they should ever have the trisagion on their tongue and in their mouth, and if the beginning of any psalm comes into their mind, let them hum it softly with their lips. If they cannot manage even this, at least let them not dispense with mental prayer; and if, during the night a favorable moment should occur, let them rise straight and pay the daytime’s debt, attentive not only to psalm-singing, but to confession with hot tears. For this,” he was in the habit of saying, “is of more use to those in office than chanting.” This was what he frequently practiced himself, for whenever he was distracted by numerous cares throughout the day, so that he could not offer up thoroughly the service he had fixed himself by rule, he used the night to make good the day’s obligations, in particular that of tears, so that during the vigils, while the brothers sang the polyeleos, he wept and lamented without interruption.

[p. 565]

187. To outsiders who came to him for his blessing and asking to be given rules and canons for the founding of a monastery where they might collect a brotherhood and lead the spiritual life, this was his exhortation, in everything to display the rule in their own persons to their flock, and not to differ [from them] in food, clothing, or any other necessities for the body in order to preserve, through equality in these matters, the rule of submission unshaken and unhurt. “For through inequality,” says he, “the rule of submission habitually suffers.”¹⁶ He would also warn them not to prefer the more able [brothers] because they were energetic in their offices, and despise the weaker as useless, nor, on the contrary, as sometimes happens, stoop [to the level of] the weaker brothers, and not demand of them all the rigor the monastery requires. So, with these exhortations and suggestions and many more, he dismissed them with his customary blessing; and they, acting on these instructions given them by our holy father, as they put them into practice discovered their value, and by the grace of God stand fast to this day, leading a virtuous life.

[p. 565]

189. When brothers wished to follow the solitary life in preference to that of submission, he would refuse permission to some while with others he took the opposite course, for, through discernment and much experience, or rather, to speak nearer the truth, in everything he did initiated by the Holy Spirit, he knew exactly in what sphere each one would succeed. That is why numbers who rejected his words and persisted in following their own will realized too late that even their good works performed out of obstinacy had turned, for them, to the opposite.

9. GALESIOS

190. Then there were also the brothers assigned to services away from the monastery. If one of them happened to fall into some fault, and word came to his ears, he did not allow the brother to spend any more time there, but immediately recalled him and sent another. This he did for fear habituation should [make the culprit's fault] [p. 566] totally incurable,¹⁷ as usually happens with long custom.

191. He used to advise and urge all those who practiced a handicraft to pay the profits of their work into the common fund of the brotherhood, and if anyone, from poor health or any other reason, wished to spend part of it on his private needs, if it was one of those who served in church, he first offered to supply the [brother's] needs himself. If he saw that the brother was not content with this, he allowed that he should satisfy his own need from his own work, but in consultation with himself. If he saw him opposed to this too, he left him to follow his own will and do as he liked.

If, however, it was one of those who could not read, he would in no circumstances give permission, unless it was the holder of some office and he had done the work in his moments of leisure. For he said that the church [brothers] have a job to do, service in the church, and something should be allowed them, especially as they received nothing more than was supplied at table. "Whereas you," says he, "who cannot read, there is not the same reason for allowing you anything, since you play no active part in the church, and for the services entrusted to you, you get a little compensation." For his instructions to the cellarer were to supply a little more food and drink to those who had services than to the others. These, however, were the father's rules before moving up to the Holy Resurrection, since at the Savior's and at the Mother of God's [monasteries] it was not like this, but everything belonged to all in common, and no one had any private property in his cell. This would be the rule to this day, but that some of those who have been tonsured in the monastery brought money with them from the world, and would absolutely not give it up, because they could not be satisfied with what the monastery provides.

192. For indeed our holy father exhorted alike all those who came to him, advising them, above all, according to the word of the Lord, to distribute all [they had] and divest themselves of it, and so enter the life of the Cross (cf. Luke 9:23).¹⁸ Some obeyed, and approached the monastic life in this spirit, either distributing [their goods] to the poor or making an offering of them to the father and the monastery. For indeed, if anyone who was giving up the world brought an offering, he accepted it, but certainly did not himself press any to do so, nor ask any gift for the monastery; but anything anyone offered spontaneously, of his own initiative, that he did not reject.¹⁹ Some, however, acting with more "wisdom," supposedly, decided to keep for themselves a part of their money. But they spent it to no good end, and neither their keeping nor their spending of it were well-advised. Others, again, decided to surrender all, but, because they compelled the father to rule that certain comforts be supplied them by the monastery, they too, without realizing it, missed the true goal. For in this way they introduced no few scandals into the monastery, and drew the others to their ways, for vice excites more envy than virtue, and men find it easier to share the former than the latter.

[p. 567]

196. If [a brother], seeing [the father's] mode of life, was in a hurry to emulate it and imitate it to the best of his ability, or troubled by the affections of the flesh, wished to cope by a rather harsher regimen than that of the monastery, and went to the father to beg permission, he would put him on his guard, and say: "Take a good look, brother, at what you are undertaking; perhaps you will be unable to carry it through. For many have started off and, unable to complete that which they had begun, gone backwards [instead of forwards], losing [the benefit of] their self-willed and premature achievement twice over, because they were not content with what the monastery offered them.²⁰ But those who proceed by the rule of the monastery, treading untroubled the 'royal road' the fathers prescribed,²¹ advancing with discretion and not singularity, do not stumble, for they have not stirred up against themselves the ingenious and multiform malice of the demons, because they proceed in simplicity. For a monk," says he, "must care more for the soul's simplicity and innocence than for physical asceticism. He must shun the company and conversation of the many, in particular the young, being young himself. The enemy has delivered many to perdition this way. That which began as a so-called spiritual friendship, by his contriving has ended in fleshly perdition, so that in them are fulfilled the words of the Apostle: 'Having begun with the spirit, are you now ending with the flesh?' (Gal. 3:3) For this reason, [a brother] not only ought not to frequent these [young persons], he must even, if he can, make his eyes understand they should not gaze fearlessly on such faces, for fear the sower of evil take occasion to implant some wicked thought in his heart. Let him rather keep his eyes lowered and his thoughts to himself, and if ever any such thought spring or stir in his heart, straightaway let him fix his mind on God, and, by straining towards him, refuse from the outset to entertain the pleasant idea of mutual feeling, and at the same time let his tongue sing thus and invoke [God]: 'Lord Jesus Christ, Son of God, help me;' 'They have now cast me out and compassed me round about' (Ps. 16 [17]: 11), '[Thou art] my joy; deliver me from them that have compassed me!' (Ps. 31 [32]: 7), 'Draw nigh, O God, to my help' (Ps. 69 [70]: 1), 'Judge them, O Lord, them that injure me' (Ps. 34 [35]: 1). If, when he has prayed in this way, the sinful thought is laid, thanks be to God; but if the obsession and the compulsion are still there, here is an ingenious counter-scheme for scheming against [the Devil's] manifold ingenuity for evil, and escaping the damage that would be incurred by giving in to this thought. Just as it is preferable, they say, when faced with two evils to choose the lesser, so here, diverting one's thoughts to a different [sin] may serve—love of gold or love of praise, or some other such preoccupation. By favoring it and giving it rein, play your mind a little trick and shake off the violent onslaught and assault of the other.

"Yet [the real solution is], rising at dawn, to strive to offer to God the first-fruits and first movements of the mind [in order to] sow the wheat before the enemy can mix his tares with the seed, spending the whole day in physical labor, with a humble mind, to be able to say with the inspired David: 'Look upon my affliction and my trouble, and forgive me all my sins' (Ps. 24 [25]: 18). In the evening, making exact confession of the faults into which he has fallen throughout the day, and, when he lies down on his bed, not letting his mind be lured away through wicked ideas into unseemly and improper imaginings, but through attentive study of the divine pronouncements checking and collecting himself, and binding himself with the recollection of death, and so sleep.

9. GALESIOS

“Let him have a guard on his thoughts secretly at work, and continuously converse with it, to avoid his wandering thoughts being carried away by emotions. Let him not look for the faults of others, judge, envy, backbite, or listen with pleasure to others backbiting. Let him not return evil for evil, if anyone should wrong him unintentionally, but bear everything magnanimously, willingly forgiving and forgetting any wrong done to him, that he, in return, may be able boldly to say to God: ‘Forgive us our trespasses as we forgive them that trespass against us’ (Matt. 6:12).

“He must take care, too, and guard against wounding the conscience of a brother by his assumed spiritual attitudes and practices. He must not be led astray for the sake of filling his stomach, but every day eat as having, once and for all, adopted the rule of the monastery: not [to eat] to satiety; on the contrary, to stop [eating] before the stomach is satisfied. For this was the judgment of the fathers.²² They ruled that, rather than fasting two or three days and then eating one’s fill, it was better to eat every day, but only a little. As for clothes, always the more modest.

“Quite simply, he who truly wishes to be saved should always pursue those things that conduce to humility, simplicity, and innocence, and shun everything that exalts and has a vain name. He who does this and acts in this way, putting all his hope in God and trusting in him as helper and as supplier of all good things, and not in his own efforts and asceticism, easily gets the better of his passions.”

[p. 576]

223. A little while before the father’s death, I went up to him, and he said to me: “I wish, if it is possible, you would not let the brothers come up to me, but stop them. I cannot, in the grip of this sickness, answer each one of them.” When I said: “But the brothers are afraid, father, that you will die suddenly and leave the monastery high and dry, without having either made a will or given any other instructions for the two monasteries,”²³ the father answered: “They have no cause for fear on that score; there will be a rule, and the emperor and the patriarch are going to see it.”²⁴ He said the same to the monk Laurentios, the stylite: “After my demise, you will see the rule, [sealed] with an imperial bull.” And behold, just as our holy father foretold to myself and to the monk Laurentios, so we have it now, sealed with an imperial bull, and the emperor and patriarch saw it and took it in their hands. If there was some trickery and the second took the place of the first born, nonetheless, on that occasion he who was blessed was blessed as first born (cf. Gen. 25:29–34), and in this matter too our holy father’s words were not given the lie.

The brothers went up to the city [of Constantinople], saw the emperor, [and] settled everything satisfactorily.²⁵ For they found the emperor ready to accede to everything, even if earlier he had been irritated against them, because of what the father had written him and sent by the monk Kosmas,²⁶ blaming his unjust and unreasonable acts. . . .²⁷

[p. 585]

246. When the brothers sent by the father, both to the city and elsewhere, returned to the monastery, as the father had instructed them, as already mentioned, he fell straightaway into the sickness that removed him from this life. Eight days before his death he sent for Nicholas, the aforementioned scribe, and told him to write out a rule for him. So the brother questioned him and was told all the points he was to note in the rule, went off, wrote it out and brought it back to him. When he had read it out to him, the father was content and said it was good.

But at this point I too must note briefly the essential points of what the father had him write. So it included how the father had left his own country and gone to the Holy Land, and, returning again thanks to God's providence, reached this mountain, ascended it and built the three monasteries on it, gathered monks in them and, up to that date, continued to govern them to the best of his powers. Not only that, but concerning the estates that God sent, [gifts] from such as love Christ, that they should be given to Bessai—for there he directed that there should be a superior—but administered at Galesios. Forty brothers to be at the Holy Resurrection, twelve at the Savior, and twelve at the Mother of God. From among these the superior is to be elected, in consultation with the brothers and with their approval, a man capable of administering the monastery's affairs well. He is to appoint a steward, and entrust to him the whole care for the brothers on the mountain. He is not to be hindered by the Bessai people, nor meet with obstruction in anything he does. However, once a year, at the end of the month of August, the superior is to carry out a check, and if he finds any surplus from the produce of the estates, it shall be collected and carried to Bessai, but if he finds no surplus he shall not harry [the steward] nor demand anything of him so that this should not be the cause of his reducing those settled here to hardship.

It included too [instructions] for the brothers' daily diet, and not only that, but also for the special fare for feast days. Likewise concerning their clothes, footwear, and other needs, and [the duty] of the steward of the day to supply these unflinching to the brothers. "As I have done," says he, "so far."

Later, questioned by the brothers, he said: "The service of the church is to stay as it is, undisturbed. But for my miserable body, drag it away by one foot, and throw it into the ravine to be food for the beasts of the earth and the birds of the sky."

At the end, as usual when making rules, the brother who wrote it out put in the curse of the three hundred and eighteen inspired fathers, and also the bit about whoever should dare to destabilize or transgress even one syllable of this testament meeting our holy and inspired father Lazarus himself, on the fearful Day of Judgment, ready to arraign him at the tribunal of Christ.²⁸

I have written this concerning the rule of our holy father, not pointlessly, so to speak, but in order that we may be able to discover the truth as if we were inquiring of our holy father himself.

But as the illness that had him in its grip prevented him from coming to the window or by any other means taking hold of the rule and signing it, it remained without signature until the day he died. For neither the man who had written it out and kept it in his possession, nor any other of the brothers could or dared force him to sign it, because all still hoped he would live. For which of us expected to see his death? Even after he died it seemed unbelievable to many, although they saw him lying before their eyes.

247. As some of the brothers were talking about the [p. 586] estates, that they should be administered at Bessai, the father answered: "No, everything that lies inside the ridge dividing the two monasteries is to be administered here.²⁹ As I said before, the superior is empowered to take and remove from here only what he shall find in excess in his yearly check on the steward, and nothing more. As for the Pausolype monastery, it is self-governing and owns the estate of the Eoptine, as you all well know. God who approved the founding of that monastery, being good, foresaw and provided the means for it to be self-sufficient and self-governing.”

When the brother Kyrillos said: “You have been very generous with our food and comforts in writing the rule. I do not know, I am at a loss to imagine, where we are going to find it all so easily.” The brother said this because of the shortage, even of necessities, and scarcity [of everything] prevailing at that time in the monastery, and because no one expected that after his death it would survive. So, when he said this, the father answered: “I trust in my Christ that if you do as I have instructed you, everything will be yours in abundance.” Questioned about a superior, he answered: “Whoever God wills, do you appoint.”³⁰ So much for these matters.

[p. 587]

250. That was the state the brothers were in, when the father slowly half-opened his eyes and looked at them. On seeing this, the brothers began one after another to call out in a loud voice: “Absolve us, father.” On hearing this cry from them, the father, raising his right hand a little, and with a matching movement of his lips, gave each one absolution. When they also brought the rule for him to sign, as he was incapable of taking it in his hands and signing, brother Kyrillos—for he too was inside the column—putting the pen in the father’s hand and guiding the slight movement the father imparted to it, signed.³¹

He remained thus till the second hour, as if half asleep, then, after partaking of the sacred mysteries—for one of the priests among the brothers had celebrated the sacred mystagogy in the right hand side of the narthex—as in an untroubled and peaceful sleep, he surrendered his saintly soul to the Lord by the hand of holy angels, falling asleep and sleeping the same sleep that all the saints know, of eternal rest in Christ.

Notes on the Translation

Editors’ note: The assistance of our translator, Patricia Karlin-Hayter [PKH], is gratefully acknowledged for the notes to this document.

1. schema: both the monastic habit and the monastic life. The habit is the symbol of the life, and interference between the two meanings often makes adequate translation impossible. Cf. Theodore the Studite, Ep. 1.10, PG 99, col. 941C. [PKH]
2. For the two classes of monastic habit, see (3) Theodore Studites [12], which condemns the distinction, but cf. (4) Stoudios [A2] which accepts the distinction without comment, as does (27) Kecharitomene [30].
3. The opposite, rigorist position returns to favor much later with (36) Blemmydes [13]; cf. (55) Athanasios I [4].
4. diakrisis, meaning something special to eat, and specifically, a good meal, see P. Karlin-Hayter, “Lexicographical Notes,” pp. 589–90; cf. (10) Eleousa [13]. Typically, outside benefactors were expected to provide such “treats”; see (22) Evergetis [10] and related Evergetian documents.
5. Agents of the metropolitan of Ephesos.
6. logismoi: thoughts, mental processes, etc., in particular “good thoughts” and “bad thoughts.” Here Lazarus is somewhat elliptically referring to the confession of the latter, normally made to the superior. [PKH]
7. For some examples of walls erected around monasteries, see (24) Christodoulos [A12], (27) Kecharitomene [73], (29) Kosmosoteira [101], and (33) Heliou Bomon, Prologue; the foundation for which (7) Latros was written was also enclosed by a circuit wall.

ELEVENTH CENTURY

8. This vision is in fact not found in Cyril of Skythopolis, Vita Sabae, ed. Ed. Schwartz, Kyrrillos von Skythopolis (Leipzig, 1939).
9. The three-day limit on hospitality is found also in (21) Roidion [B2] and (34) Machairas [118]; perhaps Lazarus was influenced by the more generous seven days' hospitality at the Monastery of St. Sabas, testified to later in (42) Sabas [8].
10. Note the special obligation to feed supplicant monks more generously than ordinary beggars that is assumed in (32) Mamas [13] and (33) Heliou Bomon [13].
11. Cf. the Basilian Sermo asceticus II, PG 31, col. 884B; (57) Bebaia Elpis [30], cf. (30) Phoberos [3] and (29) Kosmosoteira [9].
12. For two differing views on this problem from other eleventh-century documents, see (23) Pakourianos [15], which like Lazarus is critical of self-imposed ascetic practices, and (20) Black Mountain [72], which encourages them.
13. Cf. the treatment of this issue under the monastic reform in (22) Evergetis [33].
14. For later exhortations not to neglect the performance of the office, see (32) Mamas [21], (33) Heliou Bomon [21], (34) Machairas [49], and (55) Athanasios I [4].
15. See also (31) Areia [T7].
16. Cf. the Basilian Sermo asceticus I, PG 31, col. 885A; (56) Kellibara II [3]; (57) Bebaia Elpis [83].
17. The text presents a lacuna; it should be filled in the following sense: hina me chronisas ho eis to pathos empeptokos, to ptoma poioie pante aniaton . . . [PKH]
18. That is, the monastic life, also called "the angelic life," etc., cf. [130]. [PKH]
19. Lazarus' distinction between compulsory and voluntary entrance gifts anticipates that made later by the reform movement, above all in (22) Evergetis [37].
20. The object of the self-imposed ascetic observances here is not, as in [180], a rejection of the official diet, but rather of the monastery's prescribed spiritual exercises. [PKH]
21. Ps.-Basil of Caesarea, Constitutiones asceticae, 4.2, PG 31, col. 1349B.
22. Cf. the treatment of diet and clothing in Basil, Regulae fusius tractatae 19 ([LR 19]), 22 ([LR 22]), PG 31, cols. 968–69, 977–81; Regulae brevius tractatae 210 ([SR 210]), PG 31, cols. 1221–24.
23. The two foundations, the imperial monastery of Bessai and the three Galesiote monasteries, are meant here and below in [247].
24. The reference is to Emperor Constantine IX Monomachos (1042–1055) and Patriarch Michael Keroullarios (1043–58).
25. Dölger, Regesten, no. 922, with discussion by Janin, Géographie, vol. 2, p. 246, n. 3.
26. See Vita, chap. 230, ed. Delehaye, Acta, p. 579; the emperor's reply is Dölger, Regesten, no. 855; see discussion in Delehaye, Stylites, p. cxv.
27. Part of [245] has been omitted here in our translation.
28. For curses of this sort in other eleventh-century documents, see (8) John Xenos [2], (10) Eleousa [19], (18) Nea Gephyra [4], (19) Attaleiates [18], (22) Evergetis [12], and (24) Christodoulos [B14].
29. See the discussion in Malamut, "Bessai," pp. 245–47.
30. Lazarus' indifference to the choice of his successor is unusual, but in fact his younger brother Ignatios was chosen for the office after the founder's death.
31. Kazhdan, "Ideals," p. 476, with n. 16, and "Lazarus," p. 1198, reports that the unpublished Ms. Moscow, Hist. Mus. 369/353, fol. 220, explicitly states that Lazarus had died before signing the Testament.

10. Eleousa: Rule of Manuel, Bishop of Stroumitza, for the Monastery of the Mother of God Eleousa

Date: 1085–1106¹

Translator: Anastasius Bandy

Edition employed: Louis Petit, “Le Monastère de Notre-Dame de Pitié en Macédoine,” IRAIK 6 (1900), 1–153, with text at 69–93 and commentary at 94–114. Photoreproduction of the text in Petar Miljković-Pepek, Veljusa: Manastir Sv. Bogorodica Milostiva vo seloto Veljusa kraj Strumica (Skopje, 1981), pp. 258–72.

Manuscript: Parisinus, supplément grec 1222 (19th c.)²

Other translations: Macedonian, by Miljković-Pepek, Veljusa, pp. 258–72.

Institutional History

A. Foundation of the Monastery by Manuel, Bishop of Stroumitza

As we learn [1] from the Rule itself, the author Manuel was once a monk at the famous monastery of St. Auxentios near Chalcedon. After he became bishop of Stroumitza (ancient Tiberiupolis) on the empire’s Balkan frontier, he resolved to found a monastery dedicated to the Mother of God Eleousa (of Mercy)³ on property that he purchased [3] with his own money (an important detail) in his diocese at Palaiokastron. The monastery’s church still stands in the village of Veljusa (a corruption of Eleousa) near Strumica in the southeastern corner of what is now the newly independent Republic of Macedonia. There is a donor’s inscription over the principal door to the church that records Manuel’s construction of the building “from the foundations” and is datable to 1080.⁴

B. Patronage by Alexios I Komnenos

Although he was at best a reluctant follower of the monastic reform movement (for which see below, Chapter Four) that was just then beginning to introduce profound changes in the attitudes of contemporary patrons towards their religious foundations, Manuel took the precaution of obtaining from Emperor Alexios I Komnenos (1081–1118) a chrysobull that granted his foundation exemption from all public charges and independence from both civil and religious authorities.⁵ This document, dated to July 1085, is still extant as part of Eleousa’s cartulary. It also grants Eleousa the coveted status of a self-governing (autodespotos), independent (autexousia), and free (eleuthera) foundation. The composition of the Rule, which bears no date, may have followed shortly thereafter, but surely before Alexios’ second chrysobull of August 1106.⁶ A visit by the emperor to Eleousa while on a campaign against the Serbians made him aware of the extreme indigence of its monks and prompted the issuance of this second chrysobull that grants the monastery twelve peasants (paroikoi), freed of all fiscal obligations, to help them cultivate their land.

ELEVENTH CENTURY

The monk Clement, one of Manuel's successors as bishop of Stroumitza, subscribed to the rescript⁷ that orders the registration and delivery of this chrysobull. This same bishop attests to the accuracy of the copy of Manuel's Rule which has assured that document's preservation.

C. Patronage by John II Komnenos and Manuel I Komnenos

Alexios' son and successor John II Komnenos (1118–1143) also issued a decree (prostagma) for Eleousa,⁸ but according to a scribal note in the cartulary it was lost during the era of Latin rule (i.e., after 1204). Several documents issued by John's son Manuel I Komnenos (1143–1180) in favor of Eleousa are preserved however, including a rescript (epilysis) of January 1152 inserted in a praktikon of Michael Tzankitzakes, an imperial official responsible for investigating complaints by Eleousa's superior Dionysios that the monastery's peasants had been unjustly registered on the tax rolls.⁹ Manuel's rescript also forbids Clement, the bishop of Stroumitza, from entering the monastery, citing not only his predecessors' chrysobulls but also Eleousa's typikon. Whether this individual was the same bishop who had previously authenticated Manuel's Rule or not, it appears that he was unreconciled to Eleousa's institutional independence. Four years later, in an effort to assure that Eleousa did not again lose the services of its assigned peasants, Manuel issued an ordinance in May 1156 declaring their status to be hereditary.¹⁰ In 1159, the emperor confirmed the monastery in all of its privileges.¹¹ Finally, by a decree (prostaxis) of May 1160, Manuel awarded Eleousa an annual income of thirty nomismata from the local tax revenues.¹²

Eleousa then stood in an enviable position in the second half of the twelfth century. With imperial assistance, the monastery had fended off an attempt by the local bishop to compromise its autonomy, recovered its peasant cultivators with a re-establishment of their tax-exempt status, and secured a modest imperial subsidy as well.

D. Eleousa in the Thirteenth Century

The foundation appears to have fared less well during the disruptions that accompanied the fall of the Byzantine Empire to the Latin crusaders after 1204, though documentation for this crucial period is relatively scarce. The monastery's inventory, (61) Eleousa Inv., drawn up much later in the fifteenth century, refers [4] to several lost documents, including a judicial decision of John Komnenos, archbishop of Bulgaria (Ochrid), recognizing the foundation's independence, and a chrysobull of the Nicaean Emperor John III Doukas Vatatzes (1222–1254). As another Balkan foundation, the Rila monastery, was to do in the fifteenth century, Eleousa sought out a protective relationship with an Athonite monastery, in this case the Iveron monastery.¹³

The date at which Eleousa formally became a dependency (metochion) of Iveron is not known, but it must have occurred before 1250, when the Nicaean Patriarch Manuel II (1244–1255) sat with his synod to decide a dispute between Iveron, represented by its superior Nicholas, and the diocese of Stroumitza, represented by the bishop Michael, over their respective rights in Eleousa.¹⁴ In support of his position, Nicholas brought forth chrysobulls of Nikephoros III Botaneiates (1078–1081), Alexios Komnenos, and the Bulgarian king John Asen II (1218–1241); of these, only the chrysobull of Alexios (possibly that of July 1085 mentioned above) is otherwise attested. The synod's decision, said to be in conformity with these documents, grants ownership (somatike despoiteia) to Iveron but reserves correction of spiritual faults, commemoration (mnemosynon), and an ecclesiastical tax on monasteries (the kanonikon) to the bishopric of Stroumitza. Thus the monastery of Iveron was apparently unsuccessful in maintaining Eleousa's independence of the local bishop, for the rights accorded Stroumitza considerably exceed those conceded [16] by the founder Manuel in the Rule translated below.

10. ELEOUSA

E. Subsequent History of Eleousa Down to Modern Times

At present, little is known about the history of the foundation from the fourteenth century down to modern times. After sixty years of Serbian rule (1334–94), the area around Stroumitza became part of the Ottoman Empire in 1394. The monastery's inventory, (61) Eleousa Inv., was produced in 1449 and authenticated by Clement, the contemporary bishop of Stroumitza. Eleousa's formal association as a dependency of the Iveron monastery continued until 1913, when, after the Balkan Wars of 1912–13, the area around Stroumitza came under Serbian administration. Restoration of the church was carried out in 1968–69, and the structure still stands on a hill over the village of Veljusa in Macedonia.¹⁵

F. Architectural Evidence from the Site

Architectural investigation of the church shows that the structure dates mostly from the original foundation in 1080.¹⁶ The frescoes of the choir, the naos, the narthex, and the small south chapel (laid out just like the main church on a small scale) are thought to date from the late eleventh century. A masonry tomb, probably that of the founder Manuel, was found in the south arcosolium of the narthex; there are other tombs dating from the twelfth to the sixteenth centuries in the church's southern portico. There were renovations and additions in the second half of the twelfth century, when the frescoes of the south portico and other parts of the exonarthex were executed. Some reconstructed parts of the exonarthex were decorated with other frescoes in the thirteenth or fourteenth century. The naos of the church was repainted in the nineteenth century and a donor's portrait of the founder Manuel, possibly based on a now lost original composition found over his tomb in the south arcosolium of the narthex, was painted on the west facade of the exonarthex.¹⁷

Analysis

This document employs several traditional elements seen in earlier documents, such as the author's reflection on death [1] shared with (5) Euthymios [3], (6) Rila [2], and (7) Latros, the profession of faith shared with (3) Theodore Studites and (7) Latros [1], [2], [3], the foundation history [3] shared with (6) Rila [1] and (9) Galesios [246], and the concluding injunction [22] to preserve his commands unaltered shared with (3) Theodore Studites [24], (5) Euthymios [2], (6) Rila [5], (8) John Xenos [3], and (9) Galesios [246]. By expanding its scope beyond these traditional elements to include disciplinary regulations and certain constitutional provisions, this Rule continues the trend observable in some of these earlier documents¹⁸ of the steady evolution of the genre into a form recognizable as the medieval Byzantine typikon.

Reflecting the growing cult of the Mother of God—paralleled at this time in the medieval West—Manuel named his foundation in her honor. In Byzantium this was a phenomenon of the eleventh century—witness the dedications of the foundations for which (8) John Xenos, (21) Roidion, (22) Evergetis, and (23) Pakourianos were written, as well as one of the monasteries included in (9) Galesios [246]—and continued with varying degrees of enthusiasm down to the end of the empire. Her feast day was the occasion [13] for a festal meal and what was becoming (in contrast to the late antique monastic traditions) increasingly token, ritualistic charity.

In its administrative conventions, this is a conservative document, generally reflecting the usages of traditional private religious foundations. In ideological terms, however, (10) Eleousa is more in tune with the progressive sentiments of its contemporaries, championing the cenobitic life, endorsing the notion of monastic equality, and eliminating the monks' ownership of private property.

A. Lives of the Monks

As in (4) Stoudios, the regulation of liturgical services and diet [13] (but with exceptions for old and sick monks) are major concerns of our author. This foundation was like many reform monasteries in emphasizing the priority of various liturgical duties, especially performance of the office, over all other pursuits. Perhaps this predisposition to emphasize the spiritual life may have been related to an unwillingness to tolerate the pursuit of private crafts to which many of the monks at Lazarus the Galesiote's Resurrection monastery were devoted in (9) Galesios [191], [192].

Manuel's decision to restrict [5] the personal property of his monks to "their beddings and clothes and holy icons for worship" shows the founder aligning himself with the contemporary monastic reform tradition on an important point of controversy (cf. (9) Galesios [192] and (22) Evergetis [22]). This reflects the author's partiality to the cenobitic life, an outlook he shared with the reformers. Manuel has even absorbed and endorsed the added refinement of allowing [4] no differences in the food and drink served to his monks (so also (22) Evergetis [26]).

Unlike the monastic traditions of late antiquity, which welcomed youths into monastic communities both as postulants and in some cases (as in the Basilian tradition) as students, as early as (3) Theodore Studites [18], founders of monasteries in medieval Byzantium had been hostile to them. Manuel professes to share this hostility [17], yet, like the author of a contemporary document, (23) Pakourianos [31], he provides for the maintenance of youths in a monastic dependency preparatory to their admission to the monastery on reaching adulthood. He also pairs [3] older and younger monks in cells, apparently without fears for sexual misconduct.

B. Constitutional Matters

1. Private Ownership with an Independent Constitution

As we have seen, Manuel took the precaution in 1085 of obtaining [18] an imperial chrysobull from Alexios Komnenos to secure his foundation's title to being an independent monastery, yet what this Rule describes is in all essentials a traditional private religious foundation. The author is careful to note [3] that he bought the land on which the monastery stands, then built it, as founders liked to boast, "from its very foundations." In the discussion [11] of the lifetime rights (pronomia) of the monk Elias, his designated successor as superior, Manuel pointedly turns over the monastery held in "private ownership" (idioktetos) with all of its possessions. These rights include Elias' irremovability (either by an outsider or by one of Manuel's relatives), free use of the foundation's possessions "by his own will and absolute rule," tonsuring of whomever he chooses, and expulsion, after warnings, of factious and disobedient monks.

As usual for a foundation of this type, Manuel recognizes the possibility [11] that his secular relatives will make property claims against the institution, and attempts to foreclose it. Also, while explicitly denying [16] the inheritance of his patronal rights by Elias' successors, Manuel nevertheless permits them to expel an incorrigible monk, even one of his own blood relatives, thereby implicitly ranking good order over familial privilege.

Along with many of his contemporaries, both those who were reform-minded like the author of (23) Pakourianos [3], and those who were not, like the author of (19) Attaleiates [8], Manuel needed to preserve his foundation from the threat posed by the charistike. This surely was the reason why he was so fearful of the consequences of interference by his episcopal successors, motivating his declaration [18], (cf. [21]) of the foundation's independence. Manuel had only a very limited grasp of the broad implications of institutional independence, however, and in practical terms the monastery's independent constitution was to have no internal administrative significance until the end of Elias' upcoming tenure as superior. That Manuel should have chosen an independent constitution anyway does show the burgeoning prestige of the contemporary concept of the "independent and autonomous" monastery (for which see the discussion below in Chapter Four).

2. Election of the Superior

The unsuitability of the family as a dependable intergenerational vehicle for the administration of private religious foundations had been increasingly clear to benefactors since the tenth century.¹⁹ Therefore, procedures for the internal election of a new superior became an important topic of regulation. Manuel discusses both the desired qualifications for Elias' successor [15] and also procedures [16] for his selection and installation. He envisions a choice by the current superior "and the preeminent monks" (who were to play an increasingly important administrative role in reform monasteries), with "the knowledge and approval of all the rest of the brothers." His statement that he has chosen Elias as superior, "a member of your select group [of monks] and not an alien one" [11], shows a further sensitivity to reform ideas (cf. (14) Ath. Typikon [20] ff.) heightened by fear of the charistike.

3. Removal of an Unworthy Superior

Like some of his reformist contemporaries, such as the author of (22) Evergetis [14], Manuel was willing to contemplate the removal of an unworthy superior. The grounds for deposition included [16] appropriation of the monastery's property and "annoying" the monks by setting aside the founder's regulations. The mechanism prescribed for deposition of the superior is unfortunately lost in a lacuna in the text, but may have relied on the same "preeminent monks" whom he has designated for the selection of the superior.

4. Style of Rule

The authoritarian style of rule favored in practice if not in theory by Theodore the Studite came naturally to our author, but Manuel does caution [12] his successor Elias not to be too severe in punishment: "whip them not with a strap and rod but with a spiritual penalty" (cf. punishment by confinement mentioned in (4) Stoudios [25] and (11) Ath. Rule [19]). Moreover, his successor was not to be too ready to use his right of expulsion. Nevertheless this document suggests what the implications of the "absolute rule" to which Elias was entitled [11] might be in another private monastery.

C. Financial Matters

1. Size Limitation

With the decline in the importance of manual labor, which is nowhere mentioned in this document, the ability of foundations like Manuel's to support monks became directly linked to the productivity of their endowments. Thus we see a new feature, size limitations [3] on the number of monks (initially here only 10), which will be increasingly common for these sorts of foundations. As the subsequent history of this foundation makes clear, it proved difficult to support even this small number of monks without significant assistance from the emperors in the course of the twelfth century (see above, Institutional History).

2. No Inventory

Readily dispensing with canon law²⁰ when he thought its requirements to be irksome, Manuel orders [18] that no inventory of the monastery's possessions is to be drawn up, an example of his almost petulantly stubborn insistence on patronal prerogatives. There was, however, to be an examination of these possessions in the presence of Manuel's relatives, perhaps so that they could be assured that these valuables in which they too had a vested interest had not been secretly alienated. Manuel's injunction is doubtless one reason why no inventory was drawn up for this monastery until the fifteenth century (see (61) Eleousa Inv.).

D. External Relations

A bishop himself, Manuel is ambivalent [18] about endorsing the canonical prerogatives of his successors in the see of Stroumitza over his foundation. He allows [16] the monks to take a newly elected superior to the local bishop to receive a blessing (sphragis) in exchange for a cash gift, but the bishop was not to assume entitlement to any patronal rights from this concession. Manuel, however, provides no role for the bishop in the actual election of the monastery's superior.

Notes on the Introduction

1. For the dating of this document, see Petit, "Monastère," p. 15; the dates proposed are those of the two chrysobulls of Alexios I Komnenos, the first of which our author refers to in [18] while one of his episcopal successors is a witness to the rescript accompanying the latter. In view of the document's traditional approach to the foundation's governance, a date in the eleventh century is to be preferred.
2. Petit's edition is based only on a transcription made before 1865 by Emmanuel Miller of a manuscript in the Iveron monastery that itself appears to be a medieval copy of the official authenticated copy (the isotypon) of the original Rule; see Volk, Gesundheitswesen, p. 105, n. 232. Petit, "Monastère," p. 2, supposed that the Iveron manuscript, of which he had seen only photographs sent to him by Theodor Uspensky, was of the fifteenth century. Papageorgiu, "Dokumenten," p. 70, considered the Miller transcription to be of poor quality. If the Iveron manuscript is still available, a critical edition would be most welcome.
3. For the iconography of the Mother of God Eleousa, see Petit, "Monastère," 48–50.
4. See Petit, "Monastère," p. 6; Miljković-Peppek, Veljusa, pp. 32–33, with text at p. 253.
5. Dölger, Regesten, no. 1124, ed. Petit, "Monastère," doc. 1, pp. 25–27, and reproduced in Miljković-Peppek, Veljusa, pp. 253–55; see discussion by Laurent, "Recherches," p. 9, Miljković-Peppek, pp. 33–34, and Petit, p. 8.
6. Dölger, Regesten, no. 1231, ed. Petit, "Monastère," doc. 2, pp. 28–30, and reproduced in Miljković-

10. ELEOUSA

- Pepek, Veljusa, pp. 256–58; see discussion by Miljković-Pepek, pp. 34–36, and Petit, p. 9.
7. Ed. Petit, “Monastère,” doc. 3, p. 30, with discussion, p. 9.
 8. Dölger, Regesten, no. 1328; cf. discussion by Petit, “Monastère,” p. 9.
 9. Dölger, Regesten, no. 1385, ed. Petit, “Monastère,” doc. 4, p. 31 = Praktikon, doc. 8, pp. 36–37, reproduced by Miljković-Pepek, Veljusa, pp. 275–76; see discussion by Miljković-Pepek, pp. 48–52, and Petit, pp. 9–11.
 10. Dölger, Regesten, no. 1409, ed. Petit, “Monastère,” doc. 6, pp. 32–33, reproduced by Miljković-Pepek, Veljusa, p. 281; see discussion of this and the following two documents by Miljković-Pepek, pp. 56–64, and Petit, pp. 12–13.
 11. Dölger, Regesten, no. 1337, ed. Petit, “Monastère,” doc. 7, p. 33, reproduced by Miljković-Pepek, Veljusa, p. 282. Although technically this document can be dated to either 1144 or 1159, only the latter date fits the context of events at Eleousa.
 12. Dölger, Regesten, no. 1437, ed. Petit, “Monastère,” doc. 5, pp. 31–32, reproduced by Miljković-Pepek, Veljusa, pp. 282–83.
 13. See discussions in Laurent, “Recherches,” pp. 12–13; Miljković-Pepek, Veljusa, pp. 64–75; and Petit, “Monastère,” p. 14.
 14. Laurent, Regestes, no. 1312; ed. Laurent, “Recherches,” pp. 23–27, with discussion, pp. 5–7, 23.
 15. For the modern history of Eleousa, see Angelopoulos, Boreios Makedonia; Pandevski and Stoev-Trnkata, Strumica; Volk, Gesundheitswesen, p. 108.
 16. The architectural survey is based on Miljković-Pepek, Veljusa, pp. 109–22, with French summary, p. 310; Babić, Chapelles, p. 94; for architectural plans, see Tatić, “Dva ostatka,” pp. 88–95.
 17. See Miljković-Pepek, Veljusa, Fig. 74; cf. Ill. 36.
 18. Particularly (3) Theodore Studites, (6) John of Rila, (7) Latros, and (9) Galesios [246].
 19. See the extended discussion in Nikephoros Phokas, Novella de monasteriis (JGR 3.292–96 = Zepos, Jus 1.249–52); for awareness of the problem among Manuel’s contemporaries, see (19) Attaleiates [10], [13], [43]; (23) Pakourianos [18].
 20. For the canonical requirement of an inventory, see C. Const. I et II, c. 1 (R&P 2.648–49).

Bibliography

- Angelopoulos, Athanasios, Boreios Makedonia. Ho Hellenismos tes Stromnitses: Topographia, historia, ekklesia, paideia, ethnike kai koinotike zoe (Thessalonike, 1980).
- Beck, Hans-Georg, Kirche und theologische Literatur im byzantinischen Reich (Munich, 1959), p. 646.
- Babić, Gordana, Les chapelles annexes des églises byzantines: Fonction liturgique et programme iconographique (Paris, 1969).
- Laurent, Vitalien, “Recherches sur l’histoire et le cartulaire de Notre-Dame de Pitié à Stroumitsa,” EO 33 (1934), 5–27.
- Miljković-Pepek, Petar, Veljusa: Manastir Sv. Bogorodica Milostiva vo seloto Veljusa kraj Strumica (Skopje, 1981).
- Pandevski, Manol, and Stoev-Trnkata, Gorgi, Strumica i strumichko niz istorijata (Strumica, 1969).
- Papageorgiu, P. N., “Zu den Dokumenten des Gottesmutter-Klosters in Makedonien,” BZ 11 (1902), 70–73.
- Talbot, Alice-Mary, “Veljusa Monastery,” ODB, p. 2157.
- Tatić, Zharko, “Dva ostatka vizantiske arhitekture u strumichkom kraju,” Glasnik Skopskog Nauchnog Drushtva 3 (1928), 83–96.
- Volk, Robert, Gesundheitswesen und Wohltätigkeit im Spiegel der byzantinischen Klostertypika (Munich, 1983), pp. 105–8.

Translation

[This is] the copy of the Rule of our most holy father, Manuel, monk and founder of the monastery of the supremely holy Mother of God, the Merciful, which has been established in the theme of Stroumitza and in the village called Ano Palaiokastron.

1. Truly “the life of human beings is a shadow” (I Chron. 29:15; Job 8:9), as the saying goes. This has not resulted without cause. For since after the transgression and that curse which was transmitted to us, we have come under the dominance of time, as condemned we have both fallen into corruption and have surely had to proceed towards non-existence. For this reason, in fact, we must consider the dissolution of the body and make a continuous study of death, which, inasmuch as it belongs to “the highest and more noble pursuit of knowledge” (cf. Col. 3:2), is in reality honest and certain. We must carefully consider that unbribable examination, yea, indeed, “the unbiased judgment of God” (cf. I Pet. 1:17), too, which is severe and shuddering to those who have been condemned, and besides also the continuous and inevitable punishments after such a judgment. According to the statement of [Gregory] the Theologian,¹ we must not continually be engrossed by things that are seen and to be beguiled by their spells. [p. 70] Therefore, because I consider these things to be such as I have distinctly stated, I, Manuel, the least monk and bishop of Tiberiopolis, that is, Stroumitza, having been one of the congregation of monks in the venerable monastery of Saint Auxentios² and having long ago pursued for some time the ascetic course in this monastery and having absorbed the good milk of the solitary way of life as best I could, being terrified at the sickle of excision, namely death, and expecting it, moreover, every hour, and pondering that undeceivable judgment seat before which I am going to stand, “seized by the neck” (cf. Heb. 4:13), in order that I may be asked for reasons for the deeds that I have done, having my mind sound and my body by God’s grace healthy and free of any illness whatsoever, have decided that I must set in order the matters that concern me, which, indeed, I set in order as follows.

2. “I believe in one God, all-sovereign . . .” and so forth (for, in fact, I must begin from the very One from whom all of us have had our beginning and towards whom we are led by means of the most beautiful mode of life; for it is actually faith which truly achieves everything). “I profess one baptism for forgiveness of sins. I expect the resurrection of the dead and the life of the future age. Amen.” (cf. Symbolum Nicaenoconstantinopolitanum) I so think with unwavering and unequivocal resolve. I so profess and declare wholeheartedly. I so profess and proclaim with a clear voice, being both united and “joined together” (cf. Eph. 2:21; 4:16) to the God-chosen society of the Church of the faithful in accordance with the traditions of the God-inspired fathers. I agree also with their divinely wise teachings and dogmas that have been enunciated and ratified on behalf of this our Christian orthodox faith in the seven holy and ecumenical councils; and avoid the accursed and profane tenets and propositions alike of the heretics who accuse the Christian faith which have been anathematized by the same divine fathers in these [councils]. I loathe them for being different in character from this our undefiled faith. As if they were pestilential and Arabian wolves, [p. 71] not only do I turn away from the inventors of such propositions and tenets as well, and stigmatize them as heretics, but I also subject to a curse the newly appearing teachings and tenets that are introduced by them, and, since they are spurious, I detach and separate them from our holy and apostolic church and its God-established tradition. Holding fast to this most noble “trust” (I Tim. 6:20, II Tim. 1:14) of the faith in such manner as I have shown, I pray that I may keep possessing it as “a firm anchor” (Heb. 6:19) in the present age, and that in the extended and future one (in which idle reasoning and movement of mind as well as thought that occur to us with our cooperation, that is, and approval will be weighed by God, who is unbiased, at his undeceivable and shuddering judgment-seat). I may be enriched with it as a defender and “helper who cannot be shamed” (cf. II Tim. 2:15) and an advocate and most valiant protector against my bitter accusers and auditors alike, as the saying goes. Furthermore, [I pray that my faith may be] also a passport and an indestructible bridge to the future life, which does not perish but is truly permanent if, indeed, I am not deceived in my hope. However, I have this [hope] in the Lord firm and unbroken. My account has in summary sufficiently discussed this concerning, that is, both my resolve and declaration regarding the undefiled orthodox Christian faith.

10. ELEOUSA

3. Regarding, however, my newly acquired monastery, which I built from its very foundations, bearing the name of the Mother of God, who pities me (for, in fact, this [monastery] has had the good fortune to bear this name), my writing will discuss more at length and also at the same time more leisurely and will clarify more distinctly both my wish and desire for this [monastery]. For, after I had, in fact, purchased with my own money the place for this monastery, which was formerly a fallen mass of debris and useless and happened to be in the theme of Stroumitza and was situated at Palaiokastron, and had brought it round with boundless expenditures to the condition that is seen at the present time, I dedicated it as both a useful and useless dedication to the Mother of God inasmuch as I had erected on it a very beautiful church for her and [p. 72] a worthy dwelling place for one such as she, even though the Divine Spirit “does not dwell in temples made with hands” (Acts 7:48. 17:24; cf. Heb. 9:11, 24) but rather in the tabernacle in us, I mean the soul’s substance (for how can that which has no visible shape [dwell] in things that have visible shape and that which is without shape and form [dwell] in material [objects] with concrete form?). But since it is truly estimated by faith and disposition, it is perceived as casting a shadow upon the divine churches and through them it sanctifies us by its invisible overshadowings and transmissions, inasmuch as we subject ourselves to it through our divine and glory-ascribing gatherings and hymns. Thereafter I also tonsured monks who were attested for their wisdom and virtue and had their calling assured by their deeds, and I “settled them together” (cf. Ps. 132 [133]:1) in the same monastery, according to the Psalmist, partly to send up to the Mother of God the hymn of glory at the assigned times and partly, in addition to these supplicatory prayers, to utter also pro-pitiatory words on my behalf.

4. I prescribe that there be no difference in respect of foods in the case of those men who live by a cenobitic manner of life, and that they not thereby destroy the cenobitic manner of life, but that all of them gratefully share equally in the same foods and drinks alike. For a really cenobitic manner of life is this: that it not admit of any difference and diversity in the case of some, but that even he who holds the office of superior share and be reckoned as one of those who sit for the partaking of things that are brought to the table, or rather be one who is both “an example” (I Pet. 2:21) and model of the true and first shepherd, Christ our God, and “a servant” (Luke 22:26), in accordance with the statement of the Lord himself, and that he be eager to be considered as being “all things to all men” (I Cor. 9:22) the brothers in order that he may gain and save them and be rather by his deeds “a shepherd and not a hireling” (Cf. Mark 1:20; John 10:11–12).

5. I prescribe that the monks who are going to spend their lives in this monastery of the Mother of God, who pities me, be ten in number (if, however, through the wholly pure intercessions of the Mother of God the affairs of the monastery progress well, then the number of the monks shall grow), having in their cells only [p. 73] their bedding and clothes and holy icons for worship and at the same time affirmation of our undefiled and divine Christian faith and nothing else at all. For how will those who are eager to appropriate to themselves that which is shared in common and who intensely strive towards diversity and difference be called members of a cenobitic community and practitioners of the solitary life if they reckon that “mine” and “yours” ought to be preferred to that which is shared in common? [For these are] the words which cool and break down into members and parts the things that are well-joined together and at the same time tear them asunder and also cause and produce difference and separation in many things.³ [I prescribe] also that they “submit to the superior” (Heb. 13:17) of the monastery respectfully in all matters and not prefer their will to his command, but that they be obedient to him as to a father, in accordance with their truly more divine regeneration [in the monastic life], taking the place of a son. I also prescribe that two monks dwell in each cell, namely an elderly one and a young one, in order that the young one may be remolded by the traits of the elderly one and display “the wisdom of old age” (cf. Wis. 4:9) in youth.

6. When all the monks enter the divine church itself of the Mother of God at the time of the doxology and are going to perform the appointed office, I both wish and desire that this be performed by them with undistracted and intense eagerness, as I distinctly state in my typikon, and that they stand together at the time of matins in the narthex of this divine church.

For, in fact, according to the divine prophet, “what else is so pleasant as for brothers to dwell together?” (Ps. 132 [133]:5). For thus, precisely because I settled in the monastery of the Mother of God men who are of such disposition as to lead a solitary life, I myself, too, will likely be reckoned blessed, in accordance with the statement of the same prophet (cf. Ps. 83 [84]:5). Let them perform not only the midnight services and alone speak to God alone with undistracted resolve, but let them also complete in this manner the entire nightly office without fail.

After the completion of these services let them again begin the trisagion [p. 74] (the really best and timeless beginning, the one “towards which every activity of serious import tends,”⁴ as the saying goes), and let them offer a propitiatory prayer on behalf of the permanence of our most mighty emperors. Next I want [the members of] my flock to collect their souls’ senses away from external disturbances and distractions and, with steadfast concentration, to utter in this manner with guileless (to state it thus) and honest voice the verses, “Come, let us worship” and then to sing the divine nineteenth psalm, “The Lord hear thee in the day of trouble,” and going back again to the very good beginning, [i.e.,] the trisagion, let them make this both the beginning and apt ending of the intervening [psalms].

[Afterwards] let them sing with one voice the [troparion of the Exaltation] of the Cross,

10. ELEOUSA

“Save, O Lord, thy people” and so forth, and also intone the Gloria. Thereupon, let them sing “Thou who wert raised upon the cross” and after intoning “Now [and forever],” let them sing again “Speedily prevent us” and cry out “Kyrie eleison” twenty-four times, in confirmation and conclusion of the preceding office. Then let them begin the six psalms⁵—I mean the best address—and through them and the remaining office and service [let them] speak to God truly with an unwavering mind, “face to face,” (Exod. 33:11) and propitiate him.

7. After the hymnody of matins has been completed, let the doxology of the hours be performed, just as if it were a golden chain, I mean through the beautiful and most salvific order of sequence: [for] the first hour, as it were, precedes the others, since, in fact, the announcement of the resurrection was transmitted to all on this [hour]. Next, then, let the hymn of ascription of glory to God pass over to the third hour. For on this [hour] “we were recalled from the ancient deceiver’s long-time deceit and our fall;”⁶ and, because we had accepted the grace of the [p. 75] new and divine covenant, we perceived the light from the light, as the saying goes (cf. Ps. 35 [36] 9), inasmuch, as the Comforter had come upon the disciples of the Word, (cf. Acts 2:1–4) and through them upon us “who sat in darkness and in the shadow of ignorance” (Luke 1:70). [The Comforter] illuminated us more brightly than the sun and enlightened us with the rays of the knowledge of God and led us to the co-eternal and “unapproachable light” (I Tim. 6:16) by the divinely wise teachings [of the apostles].

After the prayer of the third hour, let in turn the divine hymnody of the sixth hour begin. For on this [hour] the Savior of our souls, because he had been fixed to the cross bodily because of his compassion [for us], healed through the [tree of the] cross the tasting of the [forbidden] tree; and because “he had become a curse, he redeemed us from the curse” (Gal. 3:13); and because we had become captivated by “pleasure-loving” sin (cf. II Tim. 3:4), “the Good Shepherd laid us on his shoulders” (Luke 15:5), as the saying goes, and brought us back to heaven from our humiliation in this world, that is.

After the hymnody of the sixth hour has been completed, let in turn the doxology of the ninth hour begin. For on this [hour] the Mortifier of passions, because he had been put to death as a mortal man by his own volition, revived us who had been subjected to death, having mortified our carnal surges and thoughts alike, and “the Author of life” (Acts 3:15) consented of himself to live in us who had deadened ourselves to the world, that is.

8. Fathers and brothers and spiritual children in the Lord, when you perform these truly divine services, as I have pointed out, along with the mesoria, in accordance with the traditional rule among you, do not stand at the time of these gatherings as though you were lifeless and indolent. I paternally beseech you, to whom I have now made this exhortation and instruction to the best of my ability, and whom I have gathered together to the same place with eager zeal and have loved with heartfelt disposition, and I am confident that I have you in the Lord as a source of pride and boast and a truly delightful exultation. But since you have comprehended [the purpose] for which you have been called, hasten to confirm this with deeds and, according to the saying, “to be found worthy of your Master Christ, who called you [p. 76] to this most noble way of life and change” (cf. Matt. 22:3, 8–9). Since you have your calling agreeing with your ways, gather your soul’s senses, as I have indicated above, together and by themselves, as the saying goes, and alone speak to God alone through your prayers. For in this manner “your conversation will be pleasing to him” (Ps. 103 [104]:32), according to the divine David, because your disposition has been freed, that is, from the cares that confine it like a prison.

For obviously, if, when praying, you have your soul’s senses beclouded and you are distracted in soul—a thing that I pray may not happen—and you make [your soul] have two natures instead of one through the passionate attachment to the things of the world and you become distracted in mind by evil reflections. Not only “the lifting up of your hands” (Ps. 140 [141]:2), [as] you certainly know, will not be directed straightforwardly at the time of your prayer, when your thoughts waver, that is, while those who are carefully observing them are standing there and estimating them by intention rather, and not by voice and tongue, but also your petition to God and address will become fraught with danger inasmuch as the enemy, who envies your good deeds, has carefully watched both the relaxation and slackening of your mind and has construed this as a windfall for your destruction. He easily shakes the changeful movements of your thoughts by insinuating and implanting contrary thoughts, through which he undertakes to choke and to extirpate completely, alas, even the divine seed, which is the word of God (cf. Matt. 13:25; Luke 8:11). When the truly fierce one removes from you your spiritual “burden” (cf. Matt. 11:30), the spirit in you which resembles a smooth sea, that is, because your state is peaceful and spiritual, he stirs up [in you] a fierce surf and sinks [you], alas for me, in the depth of despair. For these reasons, brothers, you must be “sober and watchful” (I Pet. 5:8) at the time of your work lest “the heavenly [p. 77] Bridegroom, having arrived and having found you sleeping, consider you unworthy workers” (cf. Matt. 25:1–13) and consign you as “utterly evil” (Matt. 21:41) to the fire of hell.

9. Or do you not know what sort of vows we professed to him when we were actually making our promise on the things that we were proclaiming, frequently repeating our consent with both a subdued posture and a calm voice? Since angels had invisibly recorded both these promises and consents at the time of their enunciation, they will inevitably seek from us at the time of our decease the fulfillment of such [promises and consents] and will severely exact punishments from those who have been neglectful with regard to this [fulfillment]. At that time the means of help for us, frequently turning around this way and that way and having our conscience a patent accuser, will not depend upon relatives and acquaintances but upon our deeds alone, “which” undoubtedly even after our decease “we have proceeding before us” (cf. Apoc. 14:13).

Let us keep in mind, spiritual children in the Lord, the symbols of the holy habit with which, that is, we have been clothed and the white garments [we put on] at the time of our tonsure, as these decisively are symbols that by their nature are indicative of angels and of purity, being administered bodily and at the same time symbolically.⁷ For, in fact, the cuttings of our hair, which the scissors removed at various times, precisely as is the custom at the sacrificial altars, and furthermore also the consecrations of our heads, have caused us more than other men to be called Nazirites (cf. Num. 6:18; Jud. 13:5), that truly revered name.

What does this word indicate? [That] we are certainly consecrated to God. Let us respect our calling. Let us preserve our dignified state. Let us understand the gain of this divine mystery. Also let us anticipate him who called us, and “let us come before his presence” (that is, the visitation of his manifestly probative power against sinners) “with thanksgiving” (Ps. 94 [95]:2) and tears [p. 78] for our transgressions. Since we have become lofty by our habit, let us not make ourselves debased by our deeds.

10. ELEOUSA

For how, indeed, have you not become lofty if you are willing to walk uprightly and by means of a sacred life to return to “the common head, Christ” (Eph. 4:15), the very one to whom you have totally sacrificed yourselves, having long ago severed from mixing with the crowd and having crucified your flesh (cf. Gal. 6:14). By your ragged dress, too, you have indicated the appearance of servitude in order that, having struggled well, you may “receive in return adoption” (Gal. 4:5) as most genuine sons and be established as heirs of his eternal kingdom, which, as you know “those who force themselves” (Matt. 11:12) and hold absolutely fast to the toils of the monastic life receive as a worthy repayment.

Since you have “crucified your limbs” (Gal. 5:24; Col. 3:5) by your cruciform scapular and hold on to this as an unconquerable weapon, repel the attacks of the adversary. Again, since you have “girded your loins” (Eph. 6:14) by your divine strap and by it you have been made dead to the world, nobly fight against “the passions of the flesh” (I Pet. 2:11; Gal. 5:16), according to the saying.

Since you have put upon yourselves your sacred cowl as a “helmet” (Eph. 6:17) and a defensive weapon (for “our struggle is, in fact, not against blood and flesh but against both the principalities and powers of the terrible world-ruler” [Eph. 6:12] according to Paul), protect your backs, against which is [directed] the evil one’s attack, in order that, being fortified all round from every side and clearly becoming incontestable and invincible soldiers of the universal Sovereign, Christ, by his power, you may run in the stadium the noble course of the monastic life, and, having in reality contested well and “having pleased him who enlisted you” (II Tim. 2:4), according to the divinely inspired Paul, soaring with eagerness through the sacred scapular that has been placed around you, you may fly as if with wings and may piously find rest, as I pray, [by him] from whom we have dementedly fallen away, and, having kept your pledge, you may receive the mystical grace of the all-Holy [p. 79] Spirit.

For this is the goal of your race in God or to God, which these singularly spiritual weapons of yours procure. For “God is Spirit, and those who worship him must worship him in spirit and truth” (John 4:24), having deadened themselves, that is, by the Spirit and having lived by themselves, as I have often said. For this reason hasten forward to “sing the praises of true wisdom in the streets” (cf. Prov. 1:20) (to cite opportunely to you Solomon’s statement) in order that you may enlarge yourselves by the truly God-pleasing pursuits and become rich in your confidence in God.

10. Yes, spiritual children in the Lord and beloved by me, yes, a sacred community and a host that is precious and chosen by God (for I beseech you once again as an affectionate father, seeking and desiring your salvation), in such manner, as I have pointed out, strip yourselves for the monastic life’s “struggle that lies before you” (Heb. 12:1), in such manner engage in this struggle to the end. Do not make me carry off to Hades my concern for you as a distressing shroud. For you are to me a daily care and a solicitude that is deep-seated and grieves my soul, and a limb and part and heart and “light of my eyes” (Ps. 37 [38]:10), according to the saying, and everything that anyone can say about things that bound [us] together in love and sincerity. But “let him who is strong in words strengthen with admonitions and kindly exhortations whoever is not so” (cf. Rom. 15:1), according to the Lord’s commandment; and when his limb is not well, let him make it healthy appropriately.

For you are, I am convinced, a limb and body in God and “one composite whole that is fitted together and at the same time brought together in oneness” (Eph. 4:16). For this reason, in fact, let not any of the things that are to be deprecated and that are contrary to the things that are morally good interpose itself among you, children, inserting harm in your souls and making room in them for the hater of good and wicked demon. But let also strife and grudge-bearing, which is generated from the latter, be absent from you. For these are the principal sources of “the flaming darts of the evil one” (Eph. 6:16) through which he confuses our minds and counterplans to withdraw us from God. But if such things do, indeed, occur among you—a thing that I pray may not happen—through conciliation with [p. 80] one another let them be banished from your souls and let the sun “not go down on your anger” (cf. Eph. 4:26).

Likewise, also detest with your soul and ardently the rest of the things that are in reality diametrically evil and rivals of the former [evils], I mean lechery, drunkenness, gluttony, loquaciousness, lying, back-biting, heartlessness, inhumanity as well as hatred of mankind, envy, which begets murder, love of money, which is truly “the second idolatry” (Col. 3:5) and vices that are like these. For, since I wish you to be superior to such passions, I want you to go through life and to conduct yourselves with this good conduct in such manner that, by sprouting forth “the fruit of the Divine Spirit” (Gal. 5:22) (I mean “unhypocritical love” [Rom. 12:9] and compassion for one another, both absence of anger and at the same time absence of grudge-bearing, and moderate thinking in all things), “your soul’s light shall break forth as the morning, your health shall speedily spring forth” (Is. 58:8), according to the saying, because the True Light, Christ our God (John 1:9), has invisibly descended upon your minds and has overshadowed and “lived or truly dwelled in them” (II Cor. 6:16) and has made you, by the divine sharing of it, perfect lights, or, to state it better, “products of the Perfect Light,”⁸ according to [Gregory] the Theologian.

For our Master and Lord is, in fact, such that “when he has perceived that we are aroused to the performance of good works” (cf. Luke 12:37) and that we are anxious to cause the seed that is stored up in the furrows of our mind, which is the teaching that is conducive to salvation, to sprout forth and “to yield its fruit in its season” (cf. Ps. 1:3) in large quantity, he hastens to pour forth in full strength the mercy of his love for humanity, because the Bountiful One anticipates our requests to him with his bounties and is truly most ready for this.

Since we have such a Master, so loving and “forbearing” (II Tim. 2:24), both compassionate and at the same time sympathetic, and one who awaits our conversion (for he does not willingly desire the death of us sinners, so that we may repent and live [cf. Ezech. 33:11], thirsting, as he is all-merciful, for our salvation and as our God reckoning the latter as a personal gain), [p. 81] let us not depart far from him because we have become indifferent. Let us not [do that], fathers and brothers and spiritual children in the Lord, in order that we may not be miserably delivered to destruction. For “those who” through indifference “remove themselves far from him shall perish” (Ps. 72 [73]:27).

Let us not become a refractory and rebellious people. Let us not turn back again to our carnal cravings in order that we may not, because we have let our mind become callous or hardened in them, become “a pillar of salt” (Gen. 19:26), as the saying goes. Let us not become eager to choose earthly things instead of heavenly ones. Do not prefer over the eternal joy in the other world the temporary life of pleasure, which makes those who embrace it bear afterwards retributions more bitter than gall. May you not, because you pursued “praise from men” (Rom. 2:29), be disregarding of “the glory which is going to be revealed” (Rom. 8:18) at the time of the frightful advent of our Lord Jesus Christ to those who have been well pleasing to him. Do not, because you have become indifferent, shut off for yourselves the heavenly bridal chamber, in order that you may not hear the detestable voice which says, “I do not know you” (Matt. 25:12). But with compassion towards one another and as though you had kindled from the latter the oil-lamps of your souls, hasten rather to enter into the same undefiled bridal chamber along with Christ the Bridegroom and to be called prudent, or rather to appear at his side, as I pray.

10. ELEOUSA

But these things are, indeed, sufficient, fathers and brothers and spiritual children in the Lord, for your admonition and edification and truly ultimate rule. Accordingly, engrave them “in the tablets of your hearts” (II Cor. 3:3) and “preserve them as a trust indeed” (I Tim. 6:20; II Tim. 1:14) with eager mind, I implore you, and keep struggling to execute them, considering me, the lowly one, though departed from life, as being present with you by the spiritual, that is, and indissoluble bond of my love towards you, in order that you may benefit yourselves very greatly and thereby procure a reward for me, the sinful founder of your monastery.

11. Since I prescribed and appointed with my sigillion the most honorable monk lord Elias to hold the office of superior over both you and this monastery that I hold in private ownership, including all things in it, [p. 82] I also turned over to him during my lifetime the privileges that belonged to me over this monastery and the things in it and besides you, too, my brothers in the Lord, the monks. These privileges are, to wit, precisely the following: The fact that [lord Elias] is to be the superior over this monastery that I hold in private ownership, up to the end of his life, and he is not to be removed from it by anyone whosoever, whether he happens to be a person related [to me] or a stranger. The fact that by his own will and at the same time absolute rule he is to make full use of the things in it. The fact that he is to tensure in it whomever he chooses, and again, to expel from this monastery, after a first, second, and third admonition as well as instruction, those monks among you who perchance appear openly factious and disobedient towards his injunctions to you regarding the goals of the monastery.

Also now, too, I formulate and prescribe that these privileges be preserved both inviolable and inviolate in the hands of this most honorable man up to the end of his transitory existence in this life, as I have distinctly stated, inasmuch as he has been associated with me over many years and is known to me as God-loving.

I ask you, O fathers and brothers and spiritual children in the Lord, or rather I admonish you as beloved to me, to obey him as a father in all things and to subject yourselves to him with the appropriate honor, rejoicing in the leadership of this truly most honorable man for a twofold reason: both because he is a member of your select group and not of an alien one, and because you have obtained a shepherd who is dexterous and able to make you perfect in the Lord, and to lead you back to godly pastures.

For this most devout monk happens to be one of those who are celebrated for virtue inasmuch as he has been consecrated to God from the “first hair of his head” as the saying goes, and “has chosen rather to be an abject in his house” (Ps. 83 [84]:10), according to the Davidic statement, than to be involved in worldly matters and by the distractions of the passions to contaminate the soul’s substance (which carries about in itself the image of the divine substance, preserving, that is, in itself the virtues unimpaired) and to run after [p. 83] the flesh, that is, [after] its cravings. Inasmuch as this “excellent fellow,” as the saying goes, has pursued the ascetic course for many years and “has put to death his limbs” (Col. 3:5), according to the divine apostle, and makes him who wishes to exercise discrimination well understand from the condition that is manifested in him the authority and independence of mind and, generally speaking, has gathered together, as does an industrious bee, the beautiful flowers of virtue and has deposited these in his mind, just as if in a beehive, and in the course of a protracted period of time has produced the good honey of virtue and by his inclination and elevation to higher things has become a towering “tree planted by the brooks of waters” (Ps. 1:3), to speak in accordance with the divine David, or, to state it better, a second paradise, he because of the luxuriance of his virtues will furnish you, O brothers and spiritual children in the Lord, the greatest benefit if you are eager to elevate yourselves so as both to resemble and imitate him.

For which of you, if he is conceited, when he has perceived his [the superior’s] moderation and humility, will not immediately suppress his arrogance and ameliorate himself [by correcting] such a fault? Who again, if he possesses an inordinate impulse and a loquacious as well as contentious tongue, will not become gentle-minded and “set a guard on his mouth” (Ps. 38 [39]:1; 140 [141]:3) when he observes his gentleness and tranquillity? Who, again, if he has his soul’s disposition inflamed with anger and grudge-bearing, will not restrain himself when he has undergone a change, will not then rouse himself towards reconciliation with the brother with whom perhaps he means to contend? Who will not cast off from himself that which grieves him and be forthwith elevated to a state of cheerfulness when he has seen with his own eyes this man’s graciousness as well as sweetness of countenance? Who, when he has discerned that the aforesaid most devout man “has become in everything all things to all men” (I Cor. 9:22) (not to recount in sequence each of his good attributes individually), will not return to that which is better, having deemed this amiable man blessed not only for his way of life and character but, indeed, also for nature itself, as is right, inasmuch as [nature] had attached to this man every form of virtue?

It is for this reason, in fact, that [p. 84] I offer with a very clear voice my gratitude to the Mother of God, because by her invisible supervisions she disclosed the man to me as a windfall that profits the soul and revealed him as your shepherd. Therefore, because he is such as I have pointed him out, accept him with glad welcome and render to him the honor that befits him and offer him your obedience in all things, as I have distinctly stated. He, too, when he has you obedient to him, “will shepherd you” in a manner that is both pleasing to God and skillful and, having nurtured you well, “will make you dwell in a place of green grass” (Ps. 22 [23]:1–2), I mean in the heavenly and beloved abodes.

12. As for you, my most honorable superior (for, since I am ostensibly departing from life and I am being led on to the places of judgment in the other world, I shall address myself to you and make this instruction), inasmuch as you have been appointed to shepherd the aforesaid monks by my humility, as I have said, or rather by the nod and decree of the Mother of God (for these men are, in fact, not only a flock but also at the same time a portion [of the Mother of God] and a truly “especial people” (Tit. 2:14) of hers, to whom, indeed, you are going to give an account as regards these men at the undeceivable and frightful judgment-seat), do be willing to prefer nothing at all to their souls’ salvation and their bodily care, but, as an affectionate father, embrace and accept them favorably as spiritual children.

10. ELEOUSA

Affectionately and kindly feel passionate love for them. Protect them from the snares of the evil one, even more at the present time, in which this truly crafty-minded one and hater of good “cunningly contrived stratagems” (Ps. 82 [83]:3) against our undefiled Christian faith, and those who cooperate with this clearly evil demon in his deeds and “who hate us have lifted their head” (Ps. 82 [83]:2) because they had not differentiated between the sanctity of the aforementioned orthodox faith and their loathsome and profane tenets, even if we, too, are culpable for these evils, pouring out against ourselves the cup of the Lord’s anger and “having drained the cup of calamity” (Is. 51:17, 22).

Alas! Who will lament these things properly? What sort of lamentations will he find that compensate for such an [p. 85] inhuman assault? It is for this reason, in fact, that I have borrowed Jeremiah’s statement at the present time and I say in lamenting in my heart, “Let me weep bitterly over the destruction of the daughter of my people” (Is. 51: 17, 22). For our affairs are “on the axe and the mason’s chisel” (Ps. 73 [74]: 6), according to the saying.

For these reasons, therefore, I shall surely cry out to him who is able to save, “Draw nigh to our help” (Ps. 69 [70]:1) who seek thee out, Lord, thou who art quick to comfort and to help, “and give not thine heritage to complete extermination and destruction in order that those who are wholly profane will not boast against us and say: ‘Where is their God?’ Let them know that thou art ‘the one who defends us’ (Prov. 30:5) ‘overlooking our sins’ (Wis. 11:23) because of thine abundant goodness.”

But my account must run back again to its sequence, even if it has diverged a little from the direct path. Anoint them, I beg you, “the congregation” (cf. II Cor. 11:28) of my monastery (to speak in accordance with the divine apostle) with exhortations for the good race of asceticism. As a disciple of the peaceful Christ, pacify them whenever they quarrel, if ever it will be necessary. Comfort them whenever they grieve. Care for those who are ill in accordance with your ability. Be kindly minded, feel compassionate love for all of them equally, and not for some more, while for others less. Do not refuse to make healthy and sound those who are ill and lame in soul. For not everyone’s responsibility is it to make sound that which is lame and to restore to well-being that which has need of it.

Do not reproach them because of simplicity. Do not despise them. Do not readily expel from the monastery those who perhaps have made a false step over something, but whip them not with a strap and rod but with a spiritual penalty. In the case of those who have repented, expel with a very gracious countenance the timidity of their souls that stems from their false step after the rendering of the prayers that are customary for them.

13. Refresh them at the cenobitic table, sitting down together with them and partaking without discrimination of both the same foods and drinks equally with them. For how shall a difference be made in the case of those who are brotherly minded unless, that is, a need of the body is pressing, someone of the monks having perhaps become ill or even having reached a ripe old age? Therefore, if some of them should happen to be so, I prescribe that they be deemed worthy of commensurate special fare. [p. 86] I both wish and order that two courses prepared with legumes and vegetables of whatsoever kind with seasoning be served up to such monks, that is, on Wednesdays, Fridays, and Mondays; but on the rest of the days, that is, Tuesdays, Thursdays, Saturdays, and Sundays, three courses likewise with legumes and fish.

ELEVENTH CENTURY

On the twenty-first day of the month of November, that is, the festal day of the Entrance of the Mother of God, my Mistress who is merciful to me, into the divine temple (which day I formulate that my aforementioned newly acquired monastery celebrate annually in accordance with tradition, and on which it is my wish that the copy of my present Rule, which has been confirmed, as is customarily done, be read within earshot of you, the superior at that time, after matins or even during the partaking [of food] at the cenobitic table) I prescribe that a special fare be offered to the aforesaid monks in accordance, that is, with the capability of this monastery and your, its superior's, wish.

Let, however, the same special fare be offered also on the twenty-third day of the same month for my remembrance and forgiveness of the sins that I have committed during my lifetime. I prescribe that a distribution be made also on the same two feast days at the gate of the monastery to my brothers in Christ. I prescribe that, in addition to the aforementioned special fare, a distribution of this sort be held also at my departure from the body, its commemoration, and the night offices of my third-day and ninth-day memorials, and that both you, the most honorable superior, and the monks under the monastery's jurisdiction, make mention of my humility in your entreaties.

14. I formulate and prescribe these things, in fact, for both you, the superior, and the monks, as I have already distinctly stated, whom, indeed, I entrust to the Mother of God, who pities me, and with tears I address her for your sake both suppliantly and at the same time boldly, "Guard, I beg thee, O Mistress, both the shepherd and the flock unoffended by the snares of the evil one. Protect them as thy God-chosen [p. 87] flock. Lead them on to the divine abodes through a God-pleasing conduct, having deemed me, too, the least, worthy to be led up along with them to the eternal abodes themselves, as I pray to thee and entreat thee, in order that, when I stand before the frightful judgment seat of our God, who became incarnate from thee, I may utter aloud with outspoken voice this assuredly delightful to me and lovely statement, 'Here am I and the children which thou hast given me, Master' (Is. 8:18); and may I hear from him the prayed-for voice which leads me 'into the joy' (Matt. 25:21) which is unending, and enjoins me gently and genuinely to enter into it together with them."

15. I wish and prescribe that he after you, the aforesaid most honorable superior lord Elias, who is going to receive in succession the office of superior of this monastery that I hold in private ownership, and besides his successors, too, are to be of this sort. Not only are they to be renowned for understanding and propriety and irreproachable life, and able to instruct besides, and make the monks in it perfect (as I have indicated above), but, also to manage skillfully all the things under its jurisdiction, having sufficient experience, that is, in its affairs. That none of these persons, because he is parsimonious, is to claim as his own the things of the monastery and to embezzle them to the deprivation of the brothers. That he is not to be heartless nor haughty, neither a drunkard nor quick-tempered and at the same time grudge-bearing and truly a treasury of bad things.

Rather he is to be an abode of good things, and to possess the following superior qualities which produce goodness: discretion and at the same time humility, love and hospitality towards all, in order that through the latter [virtue] he, too, may receive God in his soul, as if in a tabernacle, as did Abraham. He is also to have the fountainhead that is mixed with such virtues, I mean charity, while possessing a “temper which is free of avarice” (Heb. 13:5) and to lead his own flock well. [p. 88]

16. I prescribe that the appointment of superiors of this sort be done as follows. After the one who is worthy to hold the office of superior has been selected without bias and with fear of God by him who at the time holds the office of superior of the aforesaid monastery and the preeminent monks under its jurisdiction, with the knowledge and approval also of all the rest of the brothers, they are to take him up to the most God-loved bishop of Stroumitza, whoever happens to be in office at that time, to receive from him the sphragis. As a gift and [token] of my generosity the aforesaid bishop is to receive for this sphragis three nomismata of the impress that prevails, that is, at the time and is in effect in the land of him who conducts the affairs of the imperial authority, even if perhaps just now for each sphragis one nomisma of the same impress is offered by canon law and regulation to him who happens to be the prelate in the area.

The most God-loved bishop himself of Stroumitza, however, is surely not to take such sphragis as a privilege or authority over the monastery which I hold in private ownership. For not, in fact, as an overseer or wielder of authority ought he to confer on him the sphragis who is to hold the office of superior and to receive the three nomismata, as I have distinctly stated, but as a local prelate, in accordance with the regulation of the sacred canons. If, however, the aforesaid bishop, because he is perhaps greedy, is not content to have received the three nomismata but undertakes rather to do something against the monastery and the things under its jurisdiction, it is my wish that the sphragis not be conferred by him but by the one who at that time holds the office of superior. My present Rule will suffice in place of the sphragis by such a superior.

After he who is going to hold the office of superior received the sphragis and has departed to the monastery together with the monks, in the course of the customary [liturgical] office for his [installation], let him take the pastoral staff from the holy altar after, that is, the trisagion has been performed and he has made a genuflection, and then thus let him assume the leadership of the monastery.

The privileges that through my sigillion have been lavished upon you, the above-mentioned most honorable lord Elias, and have been drawn up in my present Rule are to cease and be completely inoperative with regard to him who becomes the superior after you [p. 89] and those after him. In fact, the following privilege alone is to be preserved with regard to those who are to be superiors after you, as I have indicated, namely, that if he shall find anyone being either unruly or rebellious or engaging in harm to the monastery from the ranks of the monks in it and remaining incorrigible after a first, second, and third admonition as well as instruction, he is to expel him from the aforesaid monastery as a manifestly spoiled and useless member, even if he, indeed, happens to be from the ranks, that is, of my blood relatives.

ELEVENTH CENTURY

Just as, again, if one of the very men chosen to hold the office of superior of this monastery appears to be corrupt—a thing that I pray may not happen—and claims as his own the things that belong to this [monastery] and also annoys the monks and sets aside the things that have been prescribed by me, and, to state it concisely, is clearly shown by his deeds to be a hireling and not a shepherd (John 10:12), I prescribe that after the [admonition and instruction] to him . . .⁹

17. If some strangers come to the monastery, I direct that in that eventuality they be shown hospitality and find refreshment at the instruction of the superior. If, however, some come to some of the monks in this monastery for the sake of conversation, I prescribe that such men not be permitted to come in the monastery secretly, contrary to the instruction of the superior, but I direct that first the gatekeeper make a report to him concerning them, and, after he has been instructed, permit them to enter, and that, if the time of day requires, they, too, be refreshed at the cenobitic table.

I also prescribe that the entrance of the monastery be completely closed to women. But neither is it, indeed, my wish that any youth who is younger than eighteen years of age be accepted in this my monastery. Let its dependency,¹⁰ therefore, admit one who is under eighteen years of age; and when he becomes eighteen years of age, let such a person be accepted in the monastery and tonsured. [p. 90]

18. I wish and prescribe that this, the monastery that I hold in private ownership and which bears the name of the Mother of God, who pities me, be self-governing and administered by itself, and that it not be subject perchance to any personage, ecclesiastical or magisterial, but to the Mother of God alone, whom, in fact, I have instituted as heir and through her the aforementioned most honorable superior, lord Elias, and those who after him are to hold the office of superior of both this monastery and those things in it that have been assigned to it by me, namely immovable, movable, and animate [property], and besides, sacred vessels and utensils.

Nor do I wish and prescribe that after my departure to the Lord an inventory be made over all these things, as the laws determine, but only an examination in the presence of my relatives by the superior of the monastery at that time and the monks in it. I instruct that such an examination be conducted after the death of the aforesaid superior at that time, namely, the most devout monk lord Elias, inasmuch as one such as he carries during his lifetime my privilege over both this the monastery that I have in private ownership and all the things in it, as I have stated.

As a matter of fact, this monastery shall not be subjected in any way whatsoever by anyone to any keeping of accounts. It shall not undergo removal of the things in it that have been attached to it partially or entirely, as I have explained. It shall not be transferred to any person by way of grant (for how shall this monastery be even brought under subjection to a person's authority since it has been consecrated absolutely to her who incomparably transcends the heavenly authorities and powers alike and is descriptively called her place?), but neither shall it be assigned to imperial rights perhaps on the pretext that it has been built on imperial land. Yea, rather this monastery will remain over and above all extraordinary impositions that are exacted and demanded now as well as in the future.

10. ELEOUSA

For, in fact, according to the chrysobull that has been issued to me and is attached to this [typikon] by our most excellent and holy emperor, Lord Alexios [I] Komnenos (1081–1118),¹¹ for the sake of a supplicatory prayer on behalf of the permanence of his divine sovereignty, no one of the tax collectors in the region, I mean the state officials who have been entrusted with any services whatsoever in the theme of Tiberiopolis, that is, Stroumitza, [p. 91] or, after my lowliness, [any] of the most God-loved bishops of the most holy bishopric in the aforesaid theme of Stroumitza, and [any] of the most holy prelates themselves of the archbishopric of Bulgaria, will be permitted, on pretext of any reasonable right or privilege or even specious manipulation contrived by them in any way whatsoever, to innovate and to injure or to abuse at all this monastery of the Mother of God, who pities me, and the immovable things that have been assigned by me in the aforesaid [monastery], as I have distinctly stated.

19. Thus, if anyone of the above-mentioned holy persons, O Christ (for I shall raise my voice in heartfelt anguish to thee, who art consubstantial with thine inoriginate Father and the all-Holy Spirit) (cf. Symbolum Nicaenoconstantinopolitanum) shall attempt in any way whatsoever, as I have explicitly stated, either to abuse or to innovate this my monastery that I hold in private ownership, which was founded by my lowliness and humility in the name of the Mother of God, who pities me, namely thine all-Holy Mother, and the things in it that have been assigned to it, or to cast at all a gluttonous eye upon my labors, “do thou not direct the works of his hands” (Ps. 89 [90]:17).

“Let such a person,” while he is alive on earth, “have no helper” (Ps. 108 [109]:12). Let the contagious leprosy of Gehazi (IV Kings 5:27) and the trembling of the fratricide Cain (Gen. 4:12–14) from thy just judgment come upon him and those who are descended from him. “Let strangers spoil his acquisitions” (Ps. 108 [109]: 11). Let him be an heir to the curse of the three hundred and eighteen holy and God-bearing fathers. “Let his memorial perish out of the earth” (Job 18:17) and “let his habitation be made desolate” (Ps. 68 [69]:25; Acts 1:20) in accordance with the saying. May, again, such a person, when he has departed from life, not see thy countenance, Master. May he not hear thy prayer for life. May he not attain a position at thy right but may he be granted a lot with thy lawless and evil minded disciple, the one who had betrayed thee, my Master and Lord, and [with] the unmerciful and heartless rich man (Luke 16:23) who is dreadfully being fried in the flame of hell [p. 92].

20. In just the same manner, again, may he who has clearly preserved inviolable and inviolate the things that have been prescribed by me with respect to both this monastery that I hold in private ownership and the things in it, be deemed worthy of blessing from thee, Lord, the God of our fathers, while he is a wayfarer in life, and may he be satiated “from the fatness of the earth” (Gen. 27:28, 39). May such a person be as “a fruitful vine” (Ps. 127 [128]:3) in his pursuits in his lifetime. “May thou make him rejoice in thy strength” (Ps. 20 [21]:1). “May no enemy prevail over him” (Ps. 12 [13]:4). May he not fall into [diabolic] encounters in his life, but “let thine eyes continually gaze over him” (cf. Ps. 33 [34]:15). May he be deemed worthy of a position at thy right after his departure from this world. May paradise, the sacred precincts worthy of love, the unfailing dignified state, the most beautiful way of life, that is delightful and truly to be sought by those who are beneficent, be allotted to him just as a worthy reward for having made the right judgment of observing the things that have been enjoined by my lowliness. But these things have been formulated for the above-mentioned persons.

ELEVENTH CENTURY

21. You, however, the most honorable superior of this monastery that I hold in private ownership, and those who after you are going to hold the office of superior in this [monastery] and besides, the monks too, in this monastery, I enjoin in the Holy Spirit and at the same time order that none of you ever transfer this monastery to anyone by way of gift or epidosis or alienate any of those things that have been assigned to it or even give out anything from its immovable possessions to any person by way of leasing out or in any other way to betray utterly any of my labors.

For, even if anyone from your ranks should attempt to violate a single one of those very things that have clearly been enumerated and indicated in my present Rule and have been forbidden by command by my humility, as I have explicitly stated, and proceed to overturn the things that have been prescribed by me, not only will he be liable to the above-mentioned curses but also whatever he might have done to harm the monastery, as I have indicated, will be reckoned invalid and as not even having been done at all, [p. 93] such a person being expelled from the monastery for “having removed the landmarks which his fathers placed” (Prov. 22:28, 23:10; Deut. 19:14), as it has been written.

22. Therefore, now that I have both formulated and prescribed in writing all these things in the text of my present Rule and have confirmed them, as is customarily done, through my personally written signature, I implore you, the most honorable superior lord Elias, and those who after you are going to hold the office of superior of the very monastery that I hold in private ownership, and besides also the monks in it, namely, those who are and those who will be, to preserve them without innovation and without violation, and with much eagerness to execute them and at the same time to see to it that they are executed, knowing that, if you shall set aside any of those things that have been put into this my Rule, you are going to render accounts to me at the undeceivable and frightful judgment seat, or rather to the Mother of God, who pities me, by whose vigilant and most saving intercessions may you be saved, I pray, O fathers and brothers and spiritual children in the Lord, unoffended by the snares of the evil one. Be superior to every kind of bodily ill-disposition, continually mindful also of my humility, particularly in your prayers, for the glory of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Spirit, the life-giving and consubstantial Trinity, which maintains and governs this earthly world and us who dwell upon it, now and always, and unto the ages of ages. Amen.

The Signature

I, Manuel, the least monk and bishop of Tiberioupolis, that is, Stroumitza, and servant, even if unworthy, of the supremely holy Mother of God, who pities me, have signed with my own hand.

+++

Having compared the present copy of the regulation and having found it to be exact, I have signed it. +

The lowly bishop of Stroumitza, Clement,¹² monk. +

Notes on the Translation

1. This quotation is not found among the works of Gregory Nazianzen.
2. For this monastery, see Janin, Géographie, vol. 2, p. 47.
3. Cf. John Chrysostom, De sancto Philogonio, PG 48, col. 749.
4. Cf. Gregory Nazianzen, Oratio 25, In laudem Heronis philosophi, PG 35, col. 1200A.
5. Ps. 3, 37 [38], 62 [63], 87 [88], 102 [103], 142 [143]; cf. (4) Stoudios [2].
6. Cf. Gregory Nazianzen, Oratio 44, In novam Dominicam, PG 36, col. 609A.
7. Cf. Gregory Nazianzen, Oratio 25, In laudem Heronis philosophi, PG 35, col. 1200B.
8. Gregory Nazianzen, Oratio 39, In sancta lumina, PG 36, col. 336C.
9. Lacuna in the text at this point.
10. Perhaps this is the metochion at the village of Roulina near Mostenitz mentioned in the Praktikon of Michael Tzankitzakes, ed. Petit, “Monastère,” doc. 8, p. 38.
11. Dölger, Regesten., no. 1124, ed. Petit, “Monastère,” doc. 1, pp. 25–27, and reproduced in Miljković-Peppek, Veljusa, pp. 253–55.
12. If this individual is identical with the bishop of the same name found in the Praktikon of Tzankitzakes, ed. Petit, “Monastère,” doc. 8, p. 38, then the certification must have been made circa 1152.

Document Notes

- [1] Meditation on death. Compare to similar discussions in (5) Euthymios [3], (6) Rila [2], and (7) Latros, Introduction.
- [2] Profession of faith. Compare to similar statements in (3) Theodore Studites; (7) Latros [1], [2], [3]; (49) Geromeri [2] ff.; and (54) Neilos Damilas [1].
- [3] Foundation history. Compare to parallel histories in (6) Rila [1], (9) Galesios [246], (13) Ath. Typikon [2] ff, (17) Nikon Metanoite, (18) Nea Gephyra [1], (19) Attaleiates [1], [2], (22) Evergetis [2], (23) Pakourianos [1], and (24) Christodoulos [A2] ff, etc. The wasteland topos has parallels in (6) Rila [1] and (29) Kosmosoteira [1].
- [4] Equality in food and drink for all; so also [13] below. This is a key concept of the cenobitic life as developed by the monastic reform movement; see (22) Evergetis [26], (27) Kecharitomene [56], (29) Kosmosoteira [53], (30) Phoberos [45], (32) Mamas [34], (33) Heliou Bomon [33], and (34) Machairas [106].
- [5] Size limitation; restriction of personal effects; placement of two monks in a cell. For similar size restrictions, see (9) Galesios [246], (16) Mount Tmolos [1], [2], (19) Attaleiates [27], (23) Pakourianos [6], (27) Kecharitomene [5], (29) Kosmosoteira [3], (30) Phoberos [42], (32) Mamas [5], (33) Heliou Bomon [33], and later documents. The restriction of personal effects, while stricter than in (9) Galesios [191], [192], is more lenient than in the militantly reformist (22) Evergetis [22], (20) Black Mountain [84], and related documents. Even the items permitted here could be—and probably were—communally supplied. The pairing of monks in cells is also found in (22) Evergetis [24].
- [6] Midnight and morning offices. Compare to treatments in (4) Stoudios [11]; (11) Ath. Rule [11], [12]; (20) Black Mountain [15] ff.; (22) Evergetis [7]; (27) Kecharitomene [38], [39]; (29) Kosmosoteira [15]; (30) Phoberos [12], [13]; (32) Mamas [47]; (33) Heliou Bomon [46]; and (34) Machairas [45], [46], [48].

ELEVENTH CENTURY

- [7] Daytime offices. Compare to treatments in (11) Ath. Rule [8]; (20) Black Mountain [9] ff.; (22) Evergetis [6]; (27) Kecharitomene [35], [36]; (29) Kosmosoteira [15]; (30) Phoberos [12]; (32) Mamas [47]; (33) Heliou Bomon [46]; and (34) Machairas [42], [43], [44].
- [8] Proper deportment at services. See also (36) Blemmydes [13], (55) Athanasios I [4], and (57) Bebaia Elpis [58], [59].
- [9] Discussion of monastic vows.
- [10] Moral exhortation.
- [11] Rights of the new superior; admonition to obedience. For other examples of exceptional privileges accorded only to the first incumbent of an administrative office, see (19) Attaleiates [26], [33], and (32) Mamas [15]. The admonition is a traditional element, see (3) Theodore Studites [25], (22) Evergetis [16], (27) Kecharitomene [12], (29) Kosmosoteira [43], (30) Phoberos [36], and (34) Machairas [142], etc.
- [12] Admonition to the superior. This is another traditional element, employed by reform founders to urge a moderation of the superior's absolute disciplinary authority; see also (22) Evergetis [17], (27) Kecharitomene [12], (29) Kosmosoteira [44], (30) Phoberos [36], (32) Mamas [42], (33) Heliou Bomon [41], (34) Machairas [144], and (58) Menoikeion [19].
- [13] Dietary concessions for old and sick monks; celebration of the patronal feast. Note justification of this important exception from the general principle of dietary equality (cf. [4] above). (4) Stoudios [30], (11) Ath. Rule [25], (22) Evergetis [26], (27) Kecharitomene [56], (29) Kosmosoteira [53], (30) Phoberos [45], (32) Mamas [34], (33) Heliou Bomon [33], and (34) Machairas [107] also make selective provision for dietary concessions to the elderly and the sick. For the treatment of patronal feasts at other monasteries, see (4) Stoudios [A30], (21) Roidion [B9], (22) Evergetis [10], [11], (27) Kecharitomene [59], (29) Kosmosoteira [10], [29], (30) Phoberos [32], (33) Heliou Bomon [48], and (34) Machairas [27], [29]. The provision here for the reading of Manuel's Rule is a standard feature of reform typika such as (22) Evergetis [43] and related documents.
- [14] Appeal to the Mother of God for protection. See similar appeals for heavenly assistance in (19) Attaleiates [7], [15]; (28) Pantokrator [71]; and (29) Kosmosoteira [119].
- [15] Qualifications for the superiorship. Documents from reform monasteries such as (22) Evergetis [13], (27) Kecharitomene [11], (30) Phoberos [35], (34) Machairas [80] also illustrate this concern with the moral qualities of the superior.
- [16] Selection and installation of the superior; limited rights of Elias' successors; removal of a bad superior. Manuel envisions the superior selecting his own successor with the advice of the prokritoi and the consent of the other monks; cf. the more complex arrangements found in (22) Evergetis [13]. His willingness to have his monks present the new superior to the local bishop for the sphragis, for which the latter would receive a consideration of three nomismata, was shared by the authors of (29) Kosmosoteira [33], (32) Mamas [1], and (33) Heliou Bomon [1], but not those of (22) Evergetis nor (29) Kecharitomene [11]. The notion of restricting the rights of successors to the founder's hand-picked administrator is found also in (19) Attaleiates [26], [33] and (32) Mamas [15]. Documents drawn up for reform monasteries also provide for the removal of a bad superior, most commonly for financial misconduct; see (22) Evergetis [14], (23) Pakourianos [19], (24) Christodoulos [A20], (29) Kosmosoteira [41], and (30) Phoberos [35].
- [17] Hospitality; ban on admission of women and youths; housing of young novices in the dependency. For a contemporary discussion of the requirements of hospitality, see (21) Roidion [B2] ff. Manuel's ban on the admission of women parallels the hostility of reform monasteries to access by the opposite sex, for which see (22) Evergetis [39], (27) Kecharitomene [17], (29) Kosmosoteira [84], (30) Phoberos [55], (32) Mamas [27], (33) Heliou Bomon [27], (34) Machairas [115], and later documents. (23) Pakourianos [31] features a school for future monks under the tutelage of an elderly priest at that foundation's dependency.
- [18] Self-governing status; no inventory to be drawn up. For the development of the concept of the independent and self-governing monastery, see (13) Ath. Typikon [13] with the discussion in Chapter Two. Centuries later, an inventory was in fact drawn up; it is included as the last document in our collection as (61) Eleousa Inv.

10. ELEOUSA

- [19] Curses on violators. The use of curses seems directly related to the advent of the charistike and the increasing peril it posed in the eleventh century to the well-being of private religious foundations. For other eleventh-century examples, see (8) John Xenos [2], (9) Galesios [246], (18) Nea Gephyra [4], (19) Attaleiates [23], (22) Evergetis [12], and (24) Christodoulos [B14].
- [20] Rewards for preservers. See also (19) Attaleiates [34]. As reform sentiments became more common towards the end of the eleventh century, founders sought also to enlist the support of the pious laity and public officials for the preservation of their typika.
- [21] Warning to dishonest officials. See also (22) Evergetis [32], [42]. Assuring honest administration was one of the most important concerns of monastic reformers in the course of the transition from traditional family patronage to genuine institutional independence.
- [22] Injunction to preserve the founder's commands. Compare to other examples found in (3) Theodore Studites [24], (5) Euthymios [2], (6) Rila [5], (8) John Xenos [3], and (9) Galesios [246]; eventually personal injunction is transformed into a command for the preservation of the founder's typikon, as in (22) Evergetis [40], backed up by the periodic public reading [43] of that document.

CHAPTER TWO

Athonite Monasteries

“In my own case, now, I have absolute dominion, and not even one person can gainsay my command . . .” (13) Ath. Typikon [16]

“My majesty does not wish that anything novel should be undertaken on this Holy Mountain, but rather that the ancient laws and rules be observed and that all be done according to the orders of the emperors of blessed memory.” (15) Constantine IX, Preface

“Once we succeeded in acquiring a deeply spiritual understanding of the matter, it was found that both parties were absolutely guiltless, strange as this may sound. The dispute which had arisen between them was recognized as having been caused by the activity of Satan.” (12) Tzimiskes, Preface

There are five documents in this second group of Byzantine monastic foundation documents, clustered together in less than a century’s span of time from the second half of the tenth to the first half of the eleventh century. They are all associated with the monastic communities located on Mount Athos on the southeastern peninsular extremity of the Chalkidike in northern Greece.

A. Typology of the Documents

Three of the documents, (11) Ath. Rule, (13) Ath. Typikon, and (14) Ath. Testament, all of the last half of the tenth century, share an author, Athanasios the Athonite, founder of the famous Lavra monastery on Mount Athos. Like (4) Stoudios, upon which it is heavily dependent, (11) Ath. Rule is an example of an early typikon in which the regulation of liturgical performances and some administrative matters are combined in a single document, the genre not yet having evolved into separate typika leitourgika and typika ktetorika. (13) Ath. Typikon, despite its title, is generically a testament, borrowing a significant amount of its content, in fact, from (3) Theodore Studites, the prototypal testament of the previous century. The last Athanasian document, (14) Ath. Testament, is a result of the author’s need to re-examine the administrative arrangements he had made for his foundation approximately a decade earlier in (13) Ath. Typikon.

The other two documents, (12) Tzimiskes and (15) Constantine IX, have a quasi-judicial character. They are records of imperial inquests by special representatives of the monarchs whose names they bear into disciplinary problems affecting all the monasteries on Mount Athos, not just Lavra. While these imperial documents are not unique, another example of the genre will not be found in our collection until (59) Manuel II in the fifteenth century, although (55) Athanasios I, a patriarchal document from the early fourteenth century, exhibits certain similarities. The objection raised that the two documents in this chapter are not really typika is unjustified.¹ The authorship and format may be atypical, but these documents were indubitably intended to be prescriptive for the governance of the monastic communities whose leaders subscribed to them, and on this basis merit their place in our collection.

CHAPTER TWO

B. Concerns of the Authors

1. The Studite Legacy

Athanasios' first two documents, (11) Ath. Rule and (13) Ath. Typikon, illustrate the continued influence and prestige of Studite monasticism, as they borrow freely from (4) Stoudios and (3) Theodore Studites respectively, though without attribution. It is likely that the Studite typikon, (4) Stoudios, had already been in circulation for more than a century by the time Athanasios made extensive use of a version of it that was evidently rather different from and later than either of the two versions, [A] and [B], now available in printed editions that we have presented in translation in Chapter One. By Athanasios' time, it had likely become a kind of "off-the-shelf" product, stripped of specifically Studite customs, Constantinopolitan geographic references, etc., that could be customized for any cenobitically-organized monastery to fit a founder's preferences for the liturgical and dietary matters with which it is primarily concerned.

The Studite Testament, (3) Theodore Studites, was another matter altogether. It is much more tightly bound than the Studite typikon to the context of its times in the early ninth century. It partakes of an anti-entrepreneurial bias that is even more archaic, rooted in an ideology of modest self-sufficiency that can be traced back to the document's late antique sources. It evidently suited Athanasios' needs at the time that he composed his own (13) Ath. Typikon, circa 973–75, to pay tribute to these aspects of Studite monasticism, utilizing (3) Theodore Studites selectively and even adding some provisions of his own in the same vein. Just a short time before, he had survived an imperial inquest, memorialized in (12) Tzimiskes, and a concerted attempt by his Athonite neighbors to have him expelled from the Mountain for pursuing an entirely opposite policy of aggressive economic activity and territorial aggrandizement that threatened their way of life.

In the long run, Studite institutions had a more lasting impact on the daily life of Lavra's monks, broadly based on cenobitic principles, than on the foundation's external relations, economic policies, or territorial ambitions. It may be significant that when Athanasios drew up (14) Ath. Testament towards the end of his life, he took care to note the continued validity of (11) Ath. Rule in an apparent allusion to that earlier document, but ignored (13) Ath. Typikon and superseded many of its provisions with new administrative arrangements.

2. Institutional Autonomy and Financial Security

Athanasios' three foundation documents, composed over the course of approximately thirty years from circa 963 to sometime after 993, demonstrate the founder's considerable ingenuity and flexibility in responding to the challenges of his times. This was a very tumultuous era in the institutional history of Byzantium's religious foundations, and yet Athanasios managed to assure the protection of his monastery from assorted threats and predators. Thus we are presented with a rare opportunity (as also later with (25) Fragala and (51) Koutloumoussi) to study the evolution of a founder's approach to balancing the frequently conflicting needs for institutional autonomy and financial security for his monastery.

¹ Cf. Catia Galatariotou, "Byzantine Ktetorika Typika: A Comparative Study," REB 45 (1987), 77–138, at 84.

3. Birth of the Independent Monastery

Lavra, moreover, was no ordinary monastic foundation. (13) Ath. Typikon provides invaluable testimony to the origins of the "independent and self-governing" monastery in Byzantium, a form of organization that would come to dominate the ecclesiastical landscape of the Byzantine world from the late eleventh century down to the empire's collapse in the fifteenth century and even beyond (see below, Chapters Four, Five, Six, Seven, and Nine). Generally, if private monasteries like the monastery of Kolobou near Hierissos and the monastery of St. Andrew Peristerai near Thessalonike, to name two examples near Athos founded in the late ninth century, sought imperial financial support, they ran the risk of being taken over by the government and being converted into imperial foundations, as these two were in the course of the ninth century.² For a time it appeared as if Lavra might follow the same pattern, having been built by Athanasios at the orders of Nikephoros Phokas while the latter was still a general in the service of Romanos II (959–963); then with its patron's accession to the emperors in 963 the new foundation suddenly found itself a de facto imperial monastery. Through a brilliant set of tactical maneuvers, including temporarily resigning his superiorship and leaving for an intended pilgrimage to the Holy Land, followed by hard negotiating with the new emperor himself in Constantinople, Athanasios essentially succeeded in sparing Lavra this fate without giving up the advantages of generous financial assistance.

The critical document that made this feat possible was Nikephoros II Phokas's chrysobull of 964,³ portions of which are preserved in (13) Ath. Typikon and (14) Ath. Testament. A reconstruction of the fragments of this text follows:

Frag. 1: We decree that after us this Lavra is to be under the dominion of the most reverend monk Athanasios, and while my majesty is still alive we want this same most reverend monk Athanasios to be the undisturbed superior of the eighty monks in this Lavra and in the cells round about the Lavra. Everything is to be administered by him in accord with what is dear to God and consonant with the monastic constitution. After his death, if my majesty is still alive, the person who has distinguished himself in that same Lavra and the cells subject to it and in whom that most reverend monk Athanasios before dying should have placed his trust, that man should be installed in the position of superior. But when God shall call us from this vain life and have us partake of the common chalice of death, we want nobody else at all to be appointed as superior of this lavra except him whom the monks of the Lavra and the cells subject to it, having gathered together and after careful examination, shall look upon as distinguished in virtue and capable of exercising this office, and they shall establish him as superior. Under no circumstances at all do we permit a person from a different lavra or monastery to become superior of this one. Even after our death we do not want anyone to be allowed to grant this Lavra to any secular or ecclesiastical person or even to a monk or to make it subject to another monastery. It is our will and command, rather, that it remain free and self-governing. = (13) Ath. Typikon [12]

² For these monasteries, see Denise Papachryssanthou, Actes du Prôtaton (= Archives de l'Athos 7) (Paris, 1975), pp. 35–41.

³ Franz Dölger, Regesten der Kaiserurkunden des oströmischen Reiches von 565–1453, 5 vols. (Munich-Berlin, 1924–65), no. 704.

CHAPTER TWO

Frag. 2: We do not want anyone advanced to the position of superior of this Lavra except that person whom the monks of the Lavra after careful investigation shall find to be outstanding in virtue and suitable for the task, and they shall install him as superior.
= (13) Ath. Typikon [18]

Frag. 3: The superior of the Lavra must not be appointed from anywhere else except from among the brothers persevering in it, and he must be distinguished in intelligence and in virtue. = (14) Ath. Testament [3]

As Athanasios' selection of excerpts from Nikephoros Phokas' chrysobull shows, he realized that the right to name a superior was one of the traditional keys to control of a monastic institution. By securing the emperor's assent that the choice of the superior should eventually be determined internally within Lavra, Athanasios hoped to make his foundation effectively an independent institution despite its continued dependence on the emperor for financial support.

4. The Costs of Growth

To a limited extent, the entire monastic community on Mount Athos had benefited financially from imperial patronage since Romanos I Lekapenos (920–944) granted an annual pension known as the roga, probably in the amount of three pounds of gold.⁴ This sum was shared among many institutions, however, while Athanasios had an analogous annual pension from Nikephoros Phokas exactly twice as large all to himself, even though he took the precaution of getting the emperor to raise the general Athonite pension to seven pounds. Athanasios' imperial subvention allowed him to support Lavra's relatively large contingent of eighty monks even as early as 964. A doubling of the subsidy later by Emperor John Tzimiskes (969–976) made it possible to increase the maximum number of monks supported to 120. Yet after Athanasios' death, Lavra was to grow to almost nine times its original size, reaching 700 monks by the time (15) Constantine IX [4] was issued in the mid-eleventh century.

Athanasios, like monastic directors elsewhere, had to face the consequences of the almost inescapable nexus of growth and the increased economic activity needed to support it. His statements in the Studite-inspired (13) Ath. Typikon notwithstanding, Athanasios seems to have had few compunctions about permitting a level of economic activities sufficient to support his monks, but he had the advantage of extra flexibility thanks to his large imperial subsidy. Most other Athonite ascetics, less well-connected than he, simply lacked Athanasios' access to patronage on this scale. Some, untroubled by the consequences of increased economic activity, opted for self-help. Others preferred to rely on the subsistence existence, perhaps assisted by a small share in the general imperial subsidy, that was traditional on Athos for solitary ascetics and small groups of monks living in individual cells called kelliotai.

⁴ For the first imperial subsidy see Papachryssanthou, Prôtaton, p. 54; Lavra's financial support from the emperors is discussed below in (11) Ath. Rule, Institutional History, A 7–11.

ATHONITE MONASTERIES

5. Protection for More Perilous Times

Despite his assertion of Lavra's institutional independence, Athanasios still found it difficult not to think like a traditional patron, as in (13) Ath. Typikon [16], where he declares in connection with the choice of his successor, "In my own case, now, I have absolute dominion, and not even one person can gainsay my command." The appeal of the conventions of the old order was not merely psychological; as external threats to the well-being of monastic institutions increased towards the close of the tenth century (see below, Historical Context) prudent founders of the new independent monasteries like Athanasios realized that it was simply too dangerous not to find a replacement for the role formerly played by the private patron.

In (14) Ath. Testament Athanasios chose the protectorate for this role, embodied in two administrators (epitropoi), one on Mount Athos itself and another residing at court in Constantinople. The local administrator, Athanasios' friend and fellow ascetic John the Iberian, was to enjoy what were traditional patronal rights over Lavra despite Athanasios' concession of "absolute authority and dominion" in the governance of both spiritual and material affairs to his successor as superior. Therefore some thirty years after Lavra's initial designation as an "independent" monastery, the internal contradictions between traditional needs for protection and new aspirations for self-governance had not yet been resolved.

During Athanasios' lifetime, he skillfully parried the recurring opposition of his Athonite neighbors and managed to maintain the imperial subsidy, even gaining another increase from Basil II in 978, all the while retaining a free hand in administering Lavra as he saw fit. After his death, and throughout the eleventh century, arrangements for Lavra's governance remained subject to change, responsive to emerging threats to its institutional autonomy and problems the monks encountered in governing themselves. In this era, as earlier, protection and financial support were the currencies with which interested parties—the emperors, patriarchs, local notables—bought patronal privilege in the empire's religious institutions. Following the example of its founder, Lavra generally drove a hard bargain.

6. The Future Direction of Athonite Monasticism

Aside from the three Athanasian texts, the other two documents in this chapter's grouping are (12) Tzimiskes and (15) Constantine IX. Both are of considerable value to us since they stand outside of the normative conventions of most other monastic typika and illustrate how very different actual circumstances might be from the theoretical organization enjoined in the more conventional foundation documents. These documents are also critical witnesses to an ongoing struggle in the late tenth and early eleventh centuries for the heart and soul of Athonite monasticism.

Under its traditional pattern of organization, Athos had a delicate balance of a variety of monastic lifestyles under a loose organizational structure headed by a protos at the principal settlement, Karyes, and was governed by a council of elders and periodic assemblies of all the mountain's monks.⁵ During the reign of Leo VI the Wise (886–912), the Athonites had successfully fought off an attempt at annexation by the neighboring cenobitic monastery of Kolobou.⁶ Athanasios, who had initially been warmly received by the Athonites, must have given them reason to fear a repetition of Kolobou's initiative when he began to develop Lavra as a large, economically aggressive, and territorially expansionist cenobitic monastery during Nikephoros Phokas' reign (963–969).

CHAPTER TWO

7. Reconciliation of Divergent Forms of Monastic Life

The actual author of (12) Tzimiskes, the Studite monk Euthymios, may have been chosen in 971–72 to conduct Emperor John Tzimiskes' inquest primarily because of his monastery's traditionally close association with the emperors (for which see (5) Euthymios, Institutional History) but it is not unreasonable to suspect that Athanasios had some influence in the selection of the leader of a cenobitic monastery linked by its customary to his own for an investigation on whose outcome the fate of Athanasios' lifetime work depended. In any event, Euthymios attempted to provide for the interests of all the forms of monastic organization on Mount Athos, the emerging cenobitic monasteries like Lavra as well as the more traditional small groups of kelliotic monks and solitary ascetics.⁷ He made a modest attempt to reform some of the disciplinary abuses present in traditional Athonite monasticism—such as the vagabond priests who presumed to celebrate the liturgy without authorization from their bishops—that were endemic to the Byzantine private church system, yet he also permitted the continuance of the commercial aspects of that system, especially the sale, donation and bequeathing of monastic buildings and properties. His attempt to restrict the Athonites' other commercial activities, even those engaged in for profit with laymen beyond the Mountain, were half-hearted and ultimately ineffective. So not only were Athanasios and his brand of cenobitic monasticism enabled to stay on Mount Athos, but also the circumstances for its expansion at the expense of other forms of monastic life were especially propitious.

8. The Challenge of the Monastic Reform

The controversies of (12) Tzimiskes were re-examined in (15) Constantine IX in 1045, 73 years later, in another imperial inquest, led this time by the monk Kosmas Tzintziloukes. In the interim, Lavra, as noted, had grown to nearly nine times its original size, and along with other large cenobitic monasteries had come to dominate Mount Athos. Indeed, the last of the ascetics living in the traditional way with a minimum of work and alms received from other monasteries had been obliged to adopt a cenobitic organization before the close of the tenth century.⁸ This time the challenge to Lavra and the other large monasteries, Athos' exponents of "big monasticism," apparently came from the smaller cenobitic institutions. Their leaders, reformist partisans of a fundamentalist persuasion, achieved their first success even before Constantine IX dispatched Tzintziloukes on his mission by getting the emperor to order the use of (12) Tzimiskes along with certain imperial chrysobulls as the documents of reference for adjudicating the controversies with ⁵ For the governmental institutions of Athos, see Papachryssanthou, Prôtaton, pp. 11–64.

⁶ See the Act of Leo VI (908), ed. Papachryssanthou, Prôtaton, pp. 52–54, with discussion 38–41.

⁷ For this interpretation, see Papachryssanthou, Prôtaton, p. 100.

⁸ See Papachryssanthou, Prôtaton, p. 102.

their opponents. Ironically, (12) Tzimiskes, a document notable in the context of its own times for doing little to restrict the growth of Lavra, was now readily employable as a base-line standard for those who now wished to curtail the activities of the much larger Lavra of the mid-eleventh century.

In Chapter One, we have already seen how some reform-minded monks and aspiring patrons in (9) Galesios were appalled by the decay of cenobitical institutions and sought the founder Lazarus' guidance on how to do better. Virtually contemporaneously, the fundamentalist reformers on Mount Athos were launching their own revolt against aristocratic privilege and permissive attitudes towards a whole range of economic activities that they thought were incompatible with the monastic life. In addition to asserting the authoritativeness of (12) Tzimiskes, these reformers also attempted to set up patristic authority as an equally valid touchstone of authority. The fundamentalist recovery of late antique patristic precedents, just noticeable here, would become a development of great significance as the monastic reform movement progressed during the rest of the eleventh century.

It is noteworthy how the dynamics of the struggle changed in another way since (12) Tzimiskes. Leaving aside economic issues, three-quarters of a century earlier, Athanasios could with some justice see Lavra as the center of at least disciplinary reform against the background of the mores of traditional private religious foundations on Athos. Now in the middle of the eleventh century, Neophytos, one of Athanasios' successors, was among the participants in the assembly memorialized in (15) Constantine IX, but the mighty superior of Lavra, attended by his entourage of servants, could no longer be considered to be an agent of reform in any sense. The hostility of the smaller houses towards what they deemed to be the arrogance of the larger monasteries is quite manifest. Yet the larger houses—Lavra and Vatopedi are mentioned by name—convincingly argued that their very size justified a lenient interpretation of what was to be permitted in the way of sustaining economic activities. As Tzintziloukes quickly realized, times had changed so much that the economic provisions of (12) Tzimiskes could no longer simply be reinstated despite his mandate from the emperor to do just that. An enforcement of the disciplinary legislation in (12) Tzimiskes was easier to achieve, as was a partial curtailment of the honorary prerogatives of the superiors of the great monasteries. So neither side was able to win a complete victory here.

9. The Continuing Debate on Economic Activities

The participants in the inquest that resulted in (15) Constantine IX were engaged in a lively debate over the appropriateness of various economic activities for individuals in monastic life. As before, the tolerance of the various Athonite monastic communities for these activities had determinative implications for the size of their foundations, and tended to shape attitudes on related moral and disciplinary problems as well.

The larger institutions tended over the long course of time to become more traditional (and entrepreneurial) in outlook regardless of their ideological origins. By the mid-eleventh century the Athonite establishment monasteries like Lavra had in effect fallen back on the reliable if hardly abuse-free model available in the old private religious foundation. The mores of this model stressed freedom from interference by outside (i.e., public) authority, and accommodated self-sustaining growth by tolerating considerable economic activity, including transactions with laymen. Despite his mandate from the emperor to decide the issues in dispute on the basis of the prescriptions in pre-existing typika and chrysobulls, Tzintziloukes found the logic of the great monasteries' endorsement of this model compelling, since the economic activity they willingly accepted could be abolished only at the cost of drastically reducing the overall size of the monastic settlement on Athos.

CHAPTER TWO

The reformers, ideologically hostile to most commercial activities, had perforce to content themselves with smaller foundations in order to maintain consistency with their principles since—unlike Lavra—they were not recipients of specially-earmarked and generous imperial largess. The attitudes associated with a “smaller is better” philosophy naturally appealed to smaller institutions. Most later reform monasteries in succeeding centuries would tend to be small in size too, at least those that did not have access to imperial support.

As Tzintziloukes must have realized, the mid-eleventh century was hardly a propitious time to embrace a vision of fundamentalist monasticism that could not accommodate growth without outside financial support. The public authorities of the empire, both the imperial government and the ecclesiastical hierarchy, were at that very time enthusiastically cooperating in the use of the charistike, an extensive program to redistribute older private foundations among a new class of private patrons that also encompassed the effective privatization of existing publicly supported religious institutions. So massive imperial support, the solution devised for Lavra by Athanasios for assuring its institutional independence, was now hardly practical as a model for other institutions. Few contemporaries could have expected therefore that the fundamentalist reform party would have had much of an impact on the future of Byzantine monasticism, but the very smallness and relative insignificance of their foundations enabled them to escape the wave of de-facto secularization through the charistike that overwhelmed virtually all other monastic foundations in the course of the eleventh century.⁹ By the century's end, their foundations were well positioned to lead a reform with the support of sympathetic patrons of all social classes.

C. Historical Context

The broader historical context of this period helps us gain a better understanding of this micro-view of monastic history on Mount Athos in this hundred-year period from the mid-tenth through the mid-eleventh century.

1. The First Imperial Agrarian Legislation

A famous novel of Romanos Lekapenos issued in 934 included superiors, the directors of philanthropic institutions, archbishops, metropolitans, and other ecclesiastical officials along with lay magnates in the list of individuals who were forbidden to obtain the property of peasants under any circumstances.¹⁰ Romanos' successor Constantine VII (944–959) confirmed these restrictions in a law of his own dated to 947.¹¹ These laws had the effect of practically prohibiting extensions of the endowments of monasteries in order to increase revenues.

⁹ So John of Antioch, Oratio de monasteriis, chap. 9, ed. Paul Lemerle, “Réquisitoire du patriarche Jean d'Antioche contre le charisticariat,” REB 33 (1971), 213–84, at 109.

¹⁰ Romanos I Lekapenos, Novella de potentibus ab acquisitione praediorum arcendis (934) (JGR 3.241–52 = Zepos, Jus 1.205 ff.) = Dölger, Regesten, no. 628.

2. Nikephoros Phokas' Ban on Construction of Religious Facilities

Athanasios' patron Nikephoros Phokas thought that the number of monasteries and philanthropic foundations in the Byzantine Empire had become disproportionate to the need for them. Accordingly, shortly after his initial patronage of the Lavra monastery, he issued a controversial law,¹² probably in 964, which recommends that wealthy benefactors should henceforth sell properties that they would otherwise have donated to new foundations and give the proceeds to the poor. Alternatively, his law suggests that these benefactors turn their attentions to ruined and dilapidated foundations that badly needed financial assistance for repairs and capital improvements. These would use the benefactors' money to acquire field hands and livestock in order to put their current properties to better use. The law strictly forbids benefactors to make direct grants of lands and buildings although it makes special provision for exemptions for institutions that had shortages of endowed properties. While the law did not abolish private monasteries, it did prevent the endowment of any new ones with landed property. Individual monastic cells (kellia) and lavras (lavrai), or collections of such cells, were excepted from the restrictions too.

3. Relevance of Nikephoros Phokas' Law to Mount Athos

Nikephoros Phokas' law thus reflects a specific policy of encouraging small-scale lavriotic and kelliotic monasticism while simultaneously curtailing the further growth of large landowning monasteries.¹³ Whether Lavra was a foundation in accord with this policy or a special exception is difficult to say. Certainly Lavra was eventually to become just the sort of foundation of which the emperor would not have approved. The foundation's terminological ambiguity, called "Lavra" but operated as a koinobion, may have been intended to take advantage of one of the law's largest loopholes. On the other hand, Athanasios' heavy reliance at first on imperial subsidies may have kept Lavra within the spirit as well as the letter of Nikephoros Phokas' law. Even when his successor John Tzimiskes made an additional grant to Lavra, recorded by (13) Ath. Typikon [36], that was derived from tax receipts from the island of Lemnos, once again no land grants were involved.

4. Background to the Development of the Charistike

Nikephoros Phokas' law most likely remained at least nominally in force until repealed by Basil II in 988.¹⁴ At about the same time Patriarch Nicholas II Chrysoberges (980–992) unsuccessfully

¹¹ Constantine VII, Novella de potentibus praedia pauperum acquirentibus (JGR 3.252–56 = Zepos, Jus 1.214 ff.), esp. chap. 2 = Dölger, Regesten, no. 656.

¹² Nikephoros Phokas, Novella de monasteriis (964) (JGR 3.292–96 = Zepos, Jus 1.249–52) = Dölger, Regesten, no. 699; translation and commentary by Peter Charanis, "Monastic Properties and the State in the Byzantine Empire," DOP 4 (1948), 53–118, at 56–57.

¹³ For the interpretation of the law and its relevance to Lavra, see Rosemary Morris, "The Two Faces of Nikephoros Phokas," B&MGS 12 (1988), 83–115, esp. 105–7.

¹⁴ Basil II, Novella quae legem Nicephori de monasteriis tollit (988) (JGR 3.303 = Zepos, Jus 1.259) = Dölger, Regesten, no. 772. Authenticity questioned by N. Svoronos, "Histoire des institutions de l'empire attempted to assert control over the monastery of Piperatos (once owned by Romanos I Lekapenos), but the owners objected and Basil II upheld their private property rights in the institution.¹⁵ The owners were able to establish that their monastery was independent (autodespotos), like Athanasios' Lavra, and had never been conceded to an ecclesiastical overlord.

CHAPTER TWO

There is no indication of what legal mechanism, if any, had been employed to permit private benefactors to undertake the restoration of ruined ecclesiastical foundations under the provisions of Nikephoros Phokas' law before its repeal. It is possible that the essential features of what would become known as the charistike were already in place in the 960s,¹⁶ but more likely that incidents like the Piperatos case provided the stimulus for its development since that judgment established that the ecclesiastical hierarchy could not take over an old institution without regard for the owner's property rights.

5. Impact of the Charistike on Lavra

The soon-to-be infamous charistike was a public program employed by the emperor and the ecclesiastical hierarchy for the private management of religious institutions.¹⁷ It did not disturb the ultimate rights of ownership but separated the rights of management and financial exploitation for a third party. All grants were temporary and limited to one, two, or (rarely) three lifetime tenancies. The charistike originated and flourished in the tolerant atmosphere of a society long accustomed to lay and governmental exploitation of ecclesiastical institutions and their properties, but contemporary benefactors like Athanasios who were committed to preserving the independence of their foundations could not but see it as a serious threat to their interests. Athanasios' establishment of a protectorate for his foundation in (14) Ath. Testament, sometime after 993, most likely reflects his perception of this threat and constitutes his attempt to ward it off by designating a high court official, the epi tou kanikleiou, and his successors in perpetuity as administrative trustees for Lavra.

6. Ecclesiastical Opposition to the Charistike

As we have seen, two distinct views on the proper conduct of monastic life on Mount Athos developed during the interval of approximately 50 years between (14) Ath. Testament and (15) Constantine IX in 1045. This was a time of great stress for the Byzantine church generally that was directly related to the charistike. Roughly contemporaneously with the drafting of (14) Ath. Testament, the charistike was challenged by Patriarch Sisinnios II (996–998) who terminated patriarchal participation in the program and ordered the return of all patriarchal monasteries alienated by his predecessors not only under the charistike but also under epidosis.¹⁸ This latter was a program parallel to but older than the charistike, designed to facilitate the transfer of monasteries byzantin," Annuaire de l'École pratique des hautes études, IV^e section (1970–71), 353–65, at 357, but see my "A Disputed Novel of Basil II," GRBS 24 (1983), 273–83.

¹⁵ Eustathios Rhomaios, Peira (JGR 1.43); for the foundation, see Janin, Géographie, vol. 2, p. 39.

¹⁶ See (12) Tzimiskes [7] with note.

¹⁷ For the charistike, see General Bibliography, XXIV: Monasticism and the Charistike.

¹⁸ Grumel, Regestes, no. 809; recorded by Theodore Balsamon, Comm. ad C. Nicaen. II, c. 13 (R&P 2.612).

from one ecclesiastical authority to another. It had been used since the late tenth century to compensate for significant differences in the endowments of episcopal, archiepiscopal and metropolitan sees. Even Athanasios had been one of its beneficiaries when Nicholas II Chrysoberges employed it in 989 to donate to Lavra a dilapidated monastery of the Mother of God of Gomatou.¹⁹

7. Basil II's Agrarian Law of 996

Basil II, however, remained committed to the use of the charistike, as his famous law Peri ton dynaton, issued just before Sisinnios II's elevation to the patriarchate in 996, makes clear.²⁰ Among other problems addressed in this law was the challenge of how to reconcile operation of the charistike with the imperial government's longstanding agrarian policy of reversing the increasing concentration of rural land ownership in the hands of the aristocracy. Apparently local bishops, relying on the charistike, were annexing small religious foundations in villages upon the deaths of their peasant proprietors and then granting them out to wealthy magnates under this program. As a result, magnates were continuing to gain communal property in violation of the spirit of existing imperial agrarian legislation. This the emperor was unwilling to countenance any longer, but his law makes generous allowance for donations of other, larger foundations so that the charistike could continue. Foundations, like Athanasios' Lavra monastery, that were under imperial oversight (pronoia) by virtue of having received dedicatory offerings (solemnia) or allowances for expenses of illumination (photapsiai) were also excluded from liability to being granted out under the charistike. This exception, granted at a critical time in the history of Athanasios' foundation, perhaps accounts for Lavra's ability to escape from participation in the charistike during the eleventh century.

8. Basil II's Law on the Allelengyon (1002)

Basil II increased the pressure on the ecclesiastical hierarchy with his law of 1002 that required wealthy property owners to assume the burden of the defaulted taxes of their poorer neighbors, an obligation known as the allelengyon.²¹ Patriarch Sergios II (999–1019), supported by a delegation of bishops and monastic superiors, took the lead in protesting against the burden this law placed on the empire's ecclesiastical institutions. Basil II's refusal to repeal this law probably motivated the patriarchate to reconsider its opposition to the charistike. In any event, Sergios II eventually saw fit in 1016 to resume use of the charistike and epidosis. Even if this decision relieved the church of some of its fiscal burdens, it did not suffice to gain a cancellation of the law on the allelengyon from the emperor when the patriarch sought this favor a second time in 1019. The law remained in force even after Basil II's death in 1025, and was repealed only after the accession of Romanos III Argyros (1028–1034).

¹⁹ Paul Lemerle et al., Actes de Lavra, pt. 1: Des Origines à 1204 (= Archives de l'Athos 5) (Paris, 1970), doc. 8 (989), pp. 115–17.

²⁰ Basil II, Peri ton dynaton (996) (JGR 3.306–18 = Zepos, Jus 1.262–72) = Dölger, Regesten, no. 783.

²¹ Dölger, Regesten, no. 793.

CHAPTER TWO

9. Patriarch Alexios Studites' Reform of the Charistike

It was left to Alexios Studites (1024–1043), the last patriarch chosen during the reign of Basil II, to make the first attempts at reforming the abuses that became endemic in the charistike.²² Synodal legislation issued in 1027 set up the office of the patriarch's chancellor (chartophylax) to serve as a clearinghouse for the approval and registration of all grants of ecclesiastical institutions. Further legislation in 1028 ordered the expulsion of corrupt beneficiaries (the charistikarioi) and denied the competence of secular courts to entertain countersuits. This legislation also attempted to restrict the charistike to non-diocesan monasteries. The patriarch's decision to attempt to reform rather than abolish the charistike probably reflects the inability of the hard-pressed public churches to take back all of the institutions that had been conceded to laymen over the previous forty years and thus be responsible for their tax obligations under the then still current law on the allelengyon.

10. Renewed Peril from the Charistike

It may be doubted how effective Alexios Studites' legislation was in curbing abuses of the charistike. As (9) Galesios [141] shows, by the mid-eleventh century the provincial hierarchy eagerly sought to suppress the independence of or else simply dissolve privately founded monasteries. Lazarus, that document's author, sought to prevent this by gaining an independent constitution for one of his monasteries and by drawing up a typikon for the others, to be confirmed later by Constantine IX and Patriarch Michael I Keroullarios (1043–1058). Since by that time the emperor and the patriarch were among the most prolific users of the charistike, this was necessarily a dangerous game, yet one that the Athonite monks showed could still be played with success.

11. Historical Background to (15) Constantine IX

Therefore, when the assembly of the Athonite community attested to by (15) Constantine IX met in 1045 under the leadership of the emperor's personal representative Kosmas Tzintziloukes, Athos' monasteries were, despite their constitutional and ideological differences, anomalous elements in the contemporary ecclesiastical landscape otherwise dominated by the charistike. The knowledge of the blatant economic exploitation visited upon other ecclesiastical institutions included in the charistike probably helped the directors of the great Athonite monasteries like Lavra feel justified in their pursuit of various commercial activities and vigorous territorial expansion. At the same time, the example of the charistike probably served to reinforce the pre-existing casualness with which private benefactors were prone to treat their foundations and their properties (see especially (15) Constantine IX [9], [11]). Conversely, the fundamentalist reformers reacted in horror against ²² Alexios Studites, Hypomnema A' (R&P 5.20–24) = Grumel, Regestes, no. 833; Hypomnema B' (R&P 5.25–32) = Grumel, Regestes, no. 835.

11. Ath. Rule: Rule of Athanasios the Athonite for the Lavra Monastery

Date: Original composition, 963; possibly revised ca. 1020¹ Translator: George Dennis Edition employed: Ph. Meyer, Die Haupturkunden für die Geschichte der Athosklöster (Leipzig, 1894), pp. 130–40.

Manuscript: Codex Iveron 754 (16th c.)²

Other translations: None

Institutional History

A. Athanasios the Athonite and the Foundation of Lavra

1. Sources

As with Theodore the Studite's famous monastery of Stoudios at Constantinople, we are fortunate to have a considerable group of sources to illustrate the history of this foundation. Athanasios was the probable author, not only of the present document, but also of the later (13) Ath. Typikon and (14) Ath. Testament, which taken together enable us to follow the evolution of his ideas on the organization of Lavra over a troubled period of at least twenty years in the last half of the tenth century. Also, the cartularies of both Lavra and Protaton, the administrative center of Mount Athos, preserve documents dating back to the late ninth century, including several that date from Athanasios' lifetime. Both (12) Tzimiskes and (15) Constantine IX are preserved in the Protaton cartulary. The cartularies of some other Athonite monasteries, particularly that of the Georgian monastery of Iveron, are useful too, both for the early history of Lavra and for the balance of its history during Byzantine times down to the fifteenth century. Hardly less important are the contributions of the hagiographic tradition, especially the two Lives of Athanasios, for which J. Noret has provided a much-needed modern critical edition, and the Georgian Life of Athanasios' collaborator John the Iberian and his son Euthymios.³

The relationship between the two Athanasian Lives, their authorship, dating, and place of composition have all been subject to considerable controversy.⁴ The conclusions of Noret (Vitae duae, pp. cviii–cxxix) are accepted here: that Life A is the earlier of the two documents, having been composed by Athanasios, a monk of the Panagios monastery in Constantinople, in the capital in the first quarter of the eleventh century before the death of Basil II in 1025, while Life B was written at Lavra, utilizing Life A as well as other written sources, at some time after 1028, most likely considerably later, as late, in fact, as the first half of the twelfth century.

2. Athanasios' Monastic Vocation

The early life of Athanasios is known exclusively from the two Lives.⁵ He was born at Trebizond ca. 925–930, and given the baptismal name of Abraamios. Brought to Constantinople for studies during the reign of Romanos I Lekapenos (920–944), he later became a professor. His attraction to the monastic life was due to Michael Maleinos, the superior of the Kyminas monastery on Mount Olympos in Bithynia.⁶ The latter, known to us from a hagiographic Life by his disciple Theophanes, had been a solitary ascetic before he built a lavra, a monastic institution designed to prepare monks for solitary life, for the benefit of his disciples. Maleinos drew up a typikon for this foundation that no longer survives. Abraamios became a monk at Kyminas under the name of Athanasios circa 952 and resided there for about five years, eventually progressing to the solitary life. During his residence, Michael introduced him to his nephew, the future emperor Nikephoros II Phokas (963–969), then strategos of the Anatolic theme and one of Kyminas' patrons.

3. Athanasios' Arrival on Mount Athos

Athanasios left Kyminas for Mount Athos, supposedly to escape the burdens of his growing notoriety. On his arrival, either at the end of 957 or the beginning of 958, he sought anonymity and even lived under an assumed name.⁷ He was welcomed both by an individual Athonite monk named Zygus, with whom he lived for a year, and later, by the Athonite community at Karyes, where he was installed in a kellion toward the end of 959. Sought out and eventually discovered by Leo Phokas, brother of Nikephoros, Athanasios nevertheless gained for himself a year of solitude during 960 at Melana, a desolate site near the southeastern tip of the Athonite peninsula ceded to him by the protos, the leader of the Athonite monks. It was here that the Lavra monastery would be erected a few years later.

4. Foundation of Lavra

(13) Ath. Typikon preserves the founder's own official account of the circumstances of the foundation of Lavra. This document, however, must be considered in conjunction with the hagiographic testimonies that not only present a different chronology but also record some important episodes that Athanasios chose to suppress.⁸ Summoned to Crete where Nikephoros Phokas was concluding his successful reconquest of the island for Byzantium, Athanasios arrived either just before or shortly after the fall of Chandax in March 961. Athanasios and his patron discussed the latter's idea of joining him in retirement on Mount Athos, but nothing definite was determined at that time. Later, Nikephoros Phokas sent Methodios, a monk and future superior of Kyminas, to Athanasios with sufficient funds to construct a lavra and the necessary associated buildings at Melana. Life A makes 961 the decisive year for the building of the Lavra, while (13) Ath. Typikon [6], [7] requires a chronology that would place the construction in 962–963.⁹ In any event, during the six months that Methodios was resident with Athanasios on Mount Athos, the latter began work, completing a group of cells designed for five solitaries and a refectory in which they could take meals together, then starting work on a church, a katholikon dedicated to the Annunciation of the Mother of God. Both the refectory and the katholikon, though much changed over the last thousand years, are still in existence today.¹⁰ The hagiographic sources record that Athanasios also fixed "in great detail" administrative, liturgical, and disciplinary procedures for his monks at this time.¹¹ The discussions clearly indicate that this was when the present document, (11) Ath. Rule, was drawn up, at least in its initial form.

11. ATH. RULE

5. Lavra's Patron Nikephoros Phokas Becomes Emperor

Work on the church was interrupted when the news of Nikephoros Phokas' accession to the throne reached Mount Athos; since he was acclaimed by his army at Caesarea in July 963 but not crowned in Constantinople until August, this must have been towards the end of summer or early fall 963. In (13) Ath. Typikon [7], Athanasios implies that he left promptly for Constantinople to reproach the emperor for his breach of engagement, but from the hagiographic tradition we learn that Athanasios' actions in response to the anticipated loss of his patron, partner, and financial backer were considerably more complicated.¹² He evidently considered abandoning his own association with Lavra, even going so far as to propose the monk Euthymios to Nikephoros Phokas as a suitable candidate for the superiorship, a nomination that the emperor accepted. Athanasios himself intended to make a pilgrimage to the Holy Land, but political conditions there were unstable, so he halted his journey at Cyprus, where the superior of the Monastery of the Saints lodged him and his disciple Antony for a time. Prompted by a vision to return to Lavra where, Euthymios having declined to assume the superiorship, conditions had deteriorated in Athanasios' absence, the holy man arrived at the end of 963 or early 964, warmly welcomed by his monks as well as by the other Athonites.

6. Athanasios' "Conversion" to Cenobiticism

Athanasios actually appeared at Constantinople before Nikephoros Phokas only in 964, sometime before May, the date of a chrysobull awarding Lavra three relics including a fragment of the Holy Cross and the head of St. Basil of Caesarea.¹³ As noted by Papachryssanthou (Prôtaton, p. 81), the year 964 was a turning point in the history of both Lavra and Athonite monasticism, for by virtue of the fact that Lavra's founder (its ktetor) had become emperor, it was transformed into a de facto imperial monastery, which could not but have consequences for all of Mount Athos. Also, Athanasios' "conversion" to cenobitic monasticism becomes clear at this time. Before his accession to the throne, Nikephoros Phokas seems to have envisioned an individual kellion attached to a traditional Byzantine lavra (hence the foundation's name) as his place of retirement on Mount Athos.¹⁴ Yet subtly, as Leroy ("Conversion," p. 110) realized, Athanasios modified his patron's plans to make Lavra (despite its name) a cenobitic foundation. Despite the fact that there is nothing in Athanasios' background to suggest that he might be receptive to this form of organization rather than the lavriotic and solitary forms of monasticism that he himself had practiced over the years, his choice of (4) Stoudios as the unacknowledged model for (11) Ath. Rule (for which see below, Analysis) certainly indicates that somehow he had come around to the idea of installing a cenobitic foundation on Athos.

7. Nikephoros Phokas' Chrysobulls for Lavra

In any event, the concessions Athanasios obtained from Nikephoros Phokas during the former's visit to Constantinople in 964 enabled him to support a large cenobitic foundation and assure its autonomy.¹⁵ Of the chrysobulls that the emperor awarded at this time, only the one mentioned above donating relics survives. This document confirms two earlier chrysobulls whose content must be reconstructed from scattered quotations and references elsewhere. The more important of these two chrysobulls awarded an independent constitution to Lavra and (probably) also the revenues required to support 80 monks, specifically a cash annuity (solemnion) of 244 nomismata, an annual payment in kind, and the monastery of St. Andrew of Peristerai near Thessalonike with all its properties (subordinated to Lavra under epidosis). The other chrysobull may have granted Lavra 32 tax-exempt peasants on a property near Hierissos, or some other combination of benefits from among those listed above.

TENTH CENTURY

8. Lavra and Its Athonite Neighbors

As Papachryssanthou (Prôtaton, p. 83) notes, these concessions and grants made Lavra a rich and powerful monastery, especially within the context of the other generally smaller, differently organized monastic foundations on Mount Athos. Perhaps conscious of the jealousy Lavra's good fortune might provoke or else to honor prior engagements to neighboring institutions, Athanasios also got the emperor to increase the annual pension for all of Mount Athos from three to seven pounds of gold and to make a promise to rebuild the Protaton church at Athos' administrative headquarters at Karyes.¹⁶ Yet these benefactions would not suffice to win Athanasios the good will of his neighbors. The murder of Nikephoros Phokas by his successor John Tzimiskes (969–976) four years later left Lavra without a patron and encouraged opponents of Athanasios on Mount Athos to hope to enlist the support of the emperor for his expulsion from the mountain.

9. The Tragos Affair

Athanasios' opponents included not only the solitaries whose traditional way of life his expansionist cenobitic monastery threatened, but also the Athonite elders who objected to his promotion of large-scale farming and viticulture, seen as a reversal of "ancient usages and customs." Eventually the new emperor dispatched Euthymios the Studite to the mountain to investigate the complaints. The inquest led to the issuance in late 971 or early 972 of the first typikon to govern Athos, (12) Tzimiskes, nicknamed the "Tragos" or "billy goat" after the parchment on which it was written, which sought (so Papachryssanthou, Prôtaton, p. 100) to safeguard the interests of each of the groups, the solitary hermits, the leaders of small bands of monks in kellia, and the burgeoning cenobitic monasteries like Lavra, so that all could share the mountain harmoniously.¹⁷ In his own writings, Athanasios ignores the inquest; the hagiographic tradition treats this, the most serious threat Athanasios ever faced to his position on Mount Athos, with a certain disingenuousness, turning the inquest into a favor granted by Tzimiskes to Athanasios to promote good-will among his Athonite opponents, who allegedly had been overawed by the results of a quick visit Athanasios had made to the capital that won the emperor over to his side. Regardless of the intent of (12) Tzimiskes, the result was a victory for Athanasios and his cenobitic version of monasticism, to the detriment of more traditional forms. Either personally or through the agency of his trusted collaborator John the Iberian, Athanasios secured from John Tzimiskes a doubling of his predecessor's cash annuity, which made it possible now to support up to 120 monks at Lavra.¹⁸

10. Continued Athonite Opposition to Athanasios

Both the hagiographic tradition and modern scholars view Athanasios' successful survival of the imperial inquest as a turning point, but opposition to Athanasios seems to have remained strong for the rest of his life.¹⁹ There was an attempted assassination by a monk in his own community who hated the cenobitic life, while another monk, whose grievance is not stated, sought to employ sorcery against him.

11. ATH. RULE

11. Athanasios' Political Skills

Athanasios drew up (13) Ath. Typikon, his foundation's typikon, later in the reign of John Tzimiskes, probably sometime between 973 and 975.²⁰ Like (11) Ath. Rule, it is textually linked to an earlier Studite document, (3) Theodore Studites, but once again without explicit acknowledgement. While most founders drew up their typika at the ends of their lives, Athanasios was far from finished with his career. Gifted with impressive political skills, Athanasios ably charted a course for his foundation during the troubled last quarter of the tenth century, getting the next emperor Basil II (976–1025) to confirm the chrysobulls of his predecessors Nikephoros Phokas and John Tzimiskes as well as to bestow others that left Lavra richer and more populated.²¹ In 978, the government of Basil II and Constantine VIII issued one such chrysobull that increased Lavra's financial assistance to the level where 500 monks could be supported. Athanasios even managed to benefit from one of the era's controversial programs for the management of religious institutions by obtaining from Patriarch Nicholas II Chrysoberges in 989 the donation under epidosis of a dilapidated monastery of Gomatou near Hierissos which he later converted into a Lavriote dependency.²²

12. Athanasios' Provision for a Protectorate over Lavra

It was at least a decade after the composition of (13) Ath. Typikon that Athanasios drew up what was to be the last of his three foundation documents, (14) Ath. Testament, sometime after 984. Accommodating himself skillfully, as usual, to changed political circumstances, he made a provision in this document, to be kept secret until his death, for a dual protectorate for Lavra, to be filled by two administrators (epitropoi), Nikephoros, the emperor's epi tou kanikleiou or chancellor in Constantinople, and Athanasios' old collaborator John the Iberian. The latter appointment was the culmination of a long friendly relationship between Athanasios and the Georgian community on Mount Athos, which had by this time been established in the Monastery of Iveron.²³

13. Last Challenge to Athanasios' Authority

Athanasios faced one more serious challenge to his authority on Mount Athos, the revolt of the "young superiors."²⁴ According to the account in the hagiographic tradition, certain superiors of the younger generation, jealous of Athanasios and resentful of his success in reducing the authority of the protos, the nominal leader of Athos, succeeded in persuading Phakenos, who held that office in the last decade of the tenth century, to join them in a personal appeal against Athanasios to Basil II, who was then in the vicinity with his troops in Macedonia. Athanasios quickly divined their intentions, but allowed them to proceed on their way to the emperor. As it happened, they were set upon by Turkish mercenaries allied to the Byzantines who robbed them and left them stripped naked on the road, where Athanasios discovered them later and took pity on them. These superiors are said to have still been alive when Life A was composed in the first quarter of the eleventh century.

14. Circumstances of Athanasios' Death

It was appropriately ironic that Athanasios should meet his death while engaged in an ambitious project to rebuild Lavra's katholikon to accommodate the sixfold increase in the number of monks since 964.²⁵ Along with six other monks Athanasios fell from the scaffolding on which he was standing to make a work inspection, and was crushed on a pile of building debris. The sudden, violent, and unconventional manner of his death may have pleased some of his enemies, for the author of Life A was motivated to assert at length that such a death was not always a sign of divine displeasure. Athanasios died on July 5, but the year is unknown. Judging from documents in Lavra's cartulary, he was still alive in 996 but deceased in 1012; he is also known to have predeceased John the Iberian, who himself died in 1008.²⁶ Lemerle (Lavra, pt. 1, p. 48) supposes that he died in the first years of the eleventh century, perhaps in 1001.

B. The History of Lavra after Athanasios

1. Athanasios' Legacy

When Athanasios died, his designated successor Antony was in Constantinople conducting business for the monastery. This Antony was likely, but not certainly, Athanasios' companion on the latter's flight to Cyprus back in 963–964.²⁷ There is no direct attestation in the sources, but it appears that Antony later resigned his superiorship to become director (and possibly founder) of the monastery of Panagios at Constantinople.²⁸ If this monastery was not a formal dependency of Lavra, as Noret (Vitae duae, p. cxxiv) supposed, it was at least an alternative (and possibly rival) center for the Athanasian tradition; sometime before 1025, Antony's disciple, Athanasios of Panagiou, wrote here the first of the hagiographic lives of the late Athanasios the Athonite, Life A.²⁹ Panagios' own typikon, now lost, would serve as the model for the important reform typikon, (23) Pakourianos, towards the end of the eleventh century (see below, Chapter Four).

At Lavra, rivalries between the Greek monks there and the Georgians at Iveron frustrated Athanasios' hopes for utility of the protectorate under John the Iberian († 1008) and his son and successor Euthymios († 1028).³⁰ Turnover in the office of superior was frequent, and we do not even know the names of the incumbents during the 1020s. A dispute between the administrator (epitropos) Euthymios and the monks of Lavra over some administrative matter led the latter to appeal for relief to Constantine VIII (1025–1028), who summoned Euthymios to Constantinople for an inquiry. The enlargement of the katholikon begun by Athanasios was completed by 1004, however, with the financial assistance of the other administrator, Nikephoros epi tou kanikleiou. Mylonas ("Catholicon," p. 104) believes that the two side chapels dedicated to the Forty Saints and St. Nicholas, mentioned in Life B as well as in (11) Ath. Rule [1] but not in Life A, were built subsequent to the composition of the last-named document, i.e., after 1025.³¹ Mylonas' supposition that (11) Ath. Rule must have been re-edited or at least interpolated in the 1020s to reflect the existence of these side chapels is certainly possible, as it is a document in the Studite tradition that was itself a product of evolutionary change over more than a century since the original composition of (4) Stoudios.

2. Chrysobulls of Constantine IX Monomachos

By the mid-eleventh century, reform currents stirring in monastic circles emboldened opponents of the great Athonite monasteries like Lavra, Vatopedi, and perhaps also Iveron, to appeal to the emperor for a return to the provisions of (12) Tzimiskes as issued three-quarters of a century earlier. As will be seen in the discussion of (15) Constantine IX in this chapter, neither side won a complete victory in this second imperial inquest, conducted this time by the monk Kosmas

11. ATH. RULE

Tzinziloukes, which led to the issuance of the second typikon governing the monastic communities on Mount Athos in 1045.³²

Although Lavra's superior Kosmas succeeded in preventing the imperial inquest from returning Athos to the terms of (12) Tzimiskes, an outcome that would have been disastrous for this very large monastery so dependent on extensive economic enterprise for its support, Lavra continued to be troubled by the demands of local imperial officials as well as the disorder and indiscipline of its own monks. Attributing these troubles to the lapse of its protectorate after the deaths of Euthymios († 1028) and Nikephoros the epi tou kanikleiou, Lavra's monks requested Constantine IX Monomachos to appoint a new lay administrator; the local administrator's position on Mount Athos was not proposed for revival, however. The emperor obliged, issuing a chrysobull in 1052, appointing John, the current incumbent of the office of epi tou kanikleiou, to the office.³³

3. Lavra's Imperial Relations down to Alexios I Komnenos

Judging from (15) Constantine IX [4], Lavra was able to support as many as 700 monks by mid-century. Exploiting its status as an imperial monastery without effectively surrendering its claim to independence, Lavra continued to accumulate donations and privileges for the balance of the eleventh century. Michael VI Stratiotikos (1056–1057) issued a chrysobull in 1057, of which an original copy is preserved, increasing Lavra's solemnion to the equivalent of 812 nomismata.³⁴ Originally set by Nikephoros Phokas at 244 nomismata, it was increased as we have seen by John Tzimiskes to 488 and then by Basil II to 596 nomismata.

In 1060, in another document still preserved in the original, Constantine X Doukas (1059–1067) acceded to a request by the Athonite monks that he confirm both Constantine IX Monomachos' (second) chrysobull restoring the protectorate over Lavra as well as another chrysobull (now lost) of Constantine VII Porphyrogennitos (944–959) that granted privileges to Lavra's dependency, the monastery of St. Andrew of Peristerai.³⁵ This last chrysobull, evidently granted to St. Andrew's before that monastery was subordinated to Lavra under epidosis by Nikephoros Phokas in 964, is said to have recognized Peristerai as an imperial monastery exempt from the control of the metropolitan of Thessalonike, and may therefore have served as a model for Lavra's own charter of independence. In Constantine X Doukas' chrysobull here, Lavra's protectorate is described for the first time as an ephoreia (see discussion below in Chapter Three).

4. Lavra in the Era of the Monastic Reform

Although at the time of its foundation in the tenth century, Lavra could be considered as a kind of "reform" monastery in the Studite tradition, its astounding growth thanks to generous imperial patronage and its willingness to engage in extensive commercial activity made it a very different kind of institution by the mid-eleventh century at the time of Constantine IX Monomachos' imperial inquest in 1045. The vigorous dissent of Athonite reformers against the Lavriote brand of "big monasticism" detectable in (15) Constantine IX did not succeed at that time in curbing Lavra's continued growth, nor that of similar large cenobitic institutions, yet the seeds of a successful monastic reform eventually took root elsewhere. As will be seen below in the discussion accompanying Chapter Four, the Constantinopolitan monastery represented by (22) Evergetis would eclipse Lavra and indeed all of Mount Athos as the most important center of Byzantine monasticism in the twelfth century.

The nature of the monastic reform's impact on Lavra, which had become by the end of the eleventh century a rich but ideologically conservative institution, has not yet been studied. Yet some indications of the reform's impact on Lavra and on Mount Athos generally are readily apparent. A serious moral scandal, the "Vlach Question," due to consequences of the settlement of Vlach shepherds on the mountain, was uncovered circa 1100, resulting in the expulsion of these lay settlers at the instigation of the ecclesiastical reform party.³⁶ Also, the reform-minded Patriarch Nicholas III Grammatikos (1084–1111) tried to impose punishments and excommunications as part of an attempt to establish his jurisdiction over the monasteries of Mount Athos.³⁷

Though Lavra continued to receive benefits from the emperors, including a donation of an additional annual revenue of 100 nomismata awarded by Alexios I Komnenos (1081–1118) on the occasion of his installation of Theodore Kephalas as Lavra's superior,³⁸ both the monastery's imperial stipends and the growth in its landed estates must have come to a halt with the Latin conquest of 1204.

5. Lavra in Late Byzantine Times³⁹

Lavra's fortunes resumed with the growing power of the Nicaean Emperor Michael VIII Palaiologos (1259–82), who in 1259 confirmed Lavra's existing properties and added another village to its endowment. This emperor, despite his recovery of Constantinople in 1261, was generally unpopular on Mount Athos because of his determination to enforce compliance with his Unionist policy towards the Latin church. Under Andronikos II (1282–1328), Lavra benefited from generous imperial donations, but also witnessed the attempt by Patriarch Athanasios I (1289–93 and 1303–9), circa 1303–5, to convert it into a patriarchal monastery (see below, Chapter Nine, (55) Athanasios I), and had to accept the imposition of the requirement of its superiors' obtaining patriarchal investiture that this emperor imposed in 1312. Several important figures in the late Byzantine church, such as the hesychast theologian Gregory Palamas and Patriarch Philotheos Kokkinos (1354–55 and 1364–76), had served as superiors of Lavra at early points in their careers. Generally speaking, Lavra continued to prosper economically through the first half of the fourteenth century, then suffered along with all of Mount Athos as political conditions deteriorated with the slow but inexorable collapse of the Byzantine Empire during the latter half of that century.

6. Lavra under Ottoman Rule⁴⁰

Like the rest of Mount Athos, Lavra passed under Ottoman hegemony in 1423/24, a few years before the fall of Thessalonike in 1430 to Sultan Murad II.⁴¹ Despite the sultan's recognition of Athonite autonomy in exchange for the payment of annual tribute, Lavra inevitably lost many, if not all, of its far-flung estates outside Athos itself. By the early sixteenth century, the number of monks had become dangerously low, and at that time, if not earlier, the cenobitic regime was abandoned for an idiorhythmic form of monasticism that, by permitting the monks to earn their own livings generally as they saw fit, proved less burdensome on the monastery's resources. Circa 1525 a patron, Neophytos, metropolitan of Serres, commissioned the mural decoration of the katholikon by Theophanes of Crete. An earthquake destroyed the cupola of Lavra's katholikon in 1526, but the monastery was able to get it repaired thanks to the generosity of another patron, either a certain Vladislav or else Gennadios, another metropolitan of Serres who rehabilitated the refectory a year later in 1527. Theophanes of Crete also decorated the refectory, circa 1527–30. A second earthquake of 1584–85, which damaged the cupola again as well as the two choirs, was likewise repaired by a benefactor, Anthimos, metropolitan of Adrianople, who later became patriarch of Constantinople.

11. ATH. RULE

Sylvester, the orthodox patriarch of Alexandria, is said to have attempted a restoration of cenobitic life in 1579, but without enduring success. By the beginning of the seventeenth century, Lavra was reduced to only five or six monks, but the monastery was rescued when Patriarch Dionysios III decided to retire here in 1665, bequeathing all of his property to the monastery. Sometime before 1744, extensive additions to the katholikon were undertaken, with the open colonnade between the two side chapels being blocked off to create a second narthex, in front of which an exonarthex was constructed.

7. Lavra in Modern Times⁴²

Lavra still functions as a monastery, though it now follows an idiorhythmic form of organization. Of the twenty monasteries recognized by the Athonite constitutional charter of 1924, the Great Lavra holds the first rank of honor. In 1980, there were 376 monks, including 56 living at the Lavra itself and 320 living at the various dependencies, including Lavra's three sketae.⁴³ There was a major rehabilitation of the katholikon in 1899, with the three entrances being redecorated in neo-renaissance style, giving the building its present form. The building is now dedicated to the Dormition of St. Athanasios the Athonite, probably having been reconsecrated in the fifteenth century. The treasury, a freestanding building behind the katholikon, also houses the library, which contains some 2,046 manuscripts, of which at least 800 are from the Byzantine era, as well as 172 Byzantine charters.⁴⁴

Analysis

Although only the scribal title identifies the author of this document, Athanasios cross-references it in (13) Ath. Typikon [39] and in (14) Ath. Testament [3] which are undoubtedly his work. The document is undated, but the hagiographic tradition associates it with Lavra's foundation.⁴⁵ Indeed, as Lemerle (Lavra, pt. 1, p. 21) observed, it would be surprising if this, the most fundamental of Athanasios' three foundation documents, was not instituted in the first years of Lavra's existence.

A. Use of the Model Typikon

As Leroy ("Conversion," p. 115) realized, (11) Ath. Rule is modelled very closely on the Studite typikon, (4) Stoudios. Athanasios certainly had some version of that document in front of him while composing his own Rule. This document, therefore, is an important testimony to the continued influence and prestige of Studite monasticism nearly a century and a half after the death of Theodore the Studite. Of the 37 chapters into which our translation of this document has been divided for ease of cross-reference, 23 chapters contain quotations from (4) Stoudios. Within the chapters of the Athanasian Rule, there are many more quotations—all of them unacknowledged—the precise number and delimitations of which are difficult to determine. Only two, to be found in [25] and [26], can be traced solely to (4) Stoudios Version [A], while just five, located in [3], [6], [7], [15], and [24], can be traced exclusively to Version [B]. All the rest, with the exception of some found in [1], are shared with both Versions [A] and [B]. (11) Ath. Rule [1] is a special case, weaving back and forth from line to line from a dependence on both Versions [A] and [B] to an exclusive dependence on Version [B].

In our presentation of the translation of (11) Ath. Rule below, we have endeavored to illustrate the linkages between this document and (4) Stoudios by presenting the former's quotations from the latter's Version [A] in boldface, those from Version [B] in italic, and those from both versions in boldface italic type. As even a cursory examination of our sourcing of (11) Ath. Rule will demonstrate, the textual variants of (4) Stoudios represented by [A] and [B] had thoroughly interpenetrated one another by the time Athanasios was ready to use that document as his model in the middle of the tenth century. This complex pattern of textual dependency suggests that the precise Studite model for the Athanasian Rule was neither [A] nor [B], but rather another, subsequent version of (4) Stoudios, either lost or presently unedited. This version was more heavily influenced by [B] than [A], yet it also drew independently on the latter.

Despite the generally very close correspondence between (11) Ath. Rule and its model, some 18 chapters of (4) Stoudios are missing from the Athanasian Rule entirely.⁴⁶ Some of these are the chapters that relate most specifically to the Stoudios monastery itself and its patron Theodore.⁴⁷ On the other hand, there are 14 new chapters in the Athanasian Rule that cannot be traced to any currently known Studite predecessors.⁴⁸ Nine of these are to be found in the most original portion of the Athanasian Rule which begins with [27]. Indeed, in [28] Athanasios alludes to the prior treatment of the common life of the community "as has already been discussed" immediately after what turns out to be the penultimate quotation from the Studite Rule. This sort of redundant treatment is a sure sign of a break in authorship.⁴⁹ Thereafter, there is only one brief quotation [35] on the subject of garments. It seems safe then to attribute these last ten chapters (from [27] through [37], excepting [35]) to the author of the Athanasian Rule.

Yet it is also evident that, in using his Studite model, Athanasios made some changes in the earlier portion of his own Rule too, certainly including the references to the side chapels in [1] and [27] as well as the distinctive list of monastic officials in [17]. The deletion in [26] of eukraton, the Lenten beverage that the Studites employed to substitute for wine, as well as his indignant banning [20] of the use of staffs and footstools in the church may also have occurred in Athanasios' final edit of his model for the Rule.

However, not all of the substantial differences between the two edited versions of (4) Stoudios on the one hand and (11) Ath. Rule on the other can be prudently attributed to Athanasios' editorial discretion. The model text he used quite likely reflected the evolution of certain aspects of Studite monasticism in the first half of the tenth century, particularly in terms of regulation of the liturgy and dietary observances.⁵⁰

The liturgical and disciplinary regime presented here by the Athanasian Rule then is a complex composite of Studite observances endorsed either unreservedly or, more typically, in modified form, to which the author has added certain new provisions of his own.

B. Lives of the Monks

The disciplinary regime of (4) Stoudios strongly influenced the provisions of this document governing the lives of the monks. The length of time for testing newcomers [18], the practice of scriptural readings at mealtimes [21], the veneration of the Holy Cross [28], prescriptions for clothing and shoes [35], and even the endorsement of monastic prisons [19] all have Studite precedents.⁵¹ Even in some cases where there is no direct textual dependency between the respective rules, Studite observances can be seen as models for the declaration of hostility [34] to personal property, as in (3) Theodore Studites [7], requiring [33] the monks to offer their confessions to the superior, as in (4) Stoudios [22], and for alternating [32] manual labors and spiritual reading, as in (4) Stoudios [26].

11. ATH. RULE

Sometimes, however, the Athanasian Rule cites Basil of Caesarea [19], [34] or patristic tradition generally [33], [34] as authorities even when the regulations in question have solid Studite precedents with which the author was undoubtedly acquainted. This is an indication of an increasing acquaintance with and appreciation for the patristic traditions that lay behind the disciplinary practices of Theodore the Studite.

1. Liturgical Duties

The Athanasian Rule's indebtedness to the Studite Rule is most evident in the former's adaptation of many Studite liturgical prescriptions. Like its model, this is primarily a liturgical text, starting with regulations for the Easter service [1], [2]. Despite the indebtedness to the Studite Rule in matters of liturgical observance, there are some chapters [5], [10], [11], [14] on the subject not found in the published exemplars of that rule, though some of these additions, as noted above, may predate the composition of the Athanasian Rule. The outdoor procession [27] before vespers, however, is almost surely a new liturgical observance particular to Lavra.

2. Manual Labor

Perhaps the most important feature of this document is its testimony [29], [30] to a greater practice of diversified, manual labor, noted also by Leroy ("Conversion," p. 115, n. 88), than can be seen in the model Studite Rule. This alone required the author to allow the superior considerable flexibility [30], [31] in determining appropriate diets for the monastery's metal workers, muleteers, shipwrights, carpenters, vineyard and bakery workers. The hagiographic tradition abundantly confirms the importance Athanasios placed on manual labor (he himself was a calligrapher),⁵² and of course the commercial activity portrayed (critically) in (12) Tzimiskes [15], [22], [24], etc. would have been impossible in its absence.

3. Sacramental Life

Curiously, the parallel Studite provisions related to this subject are prominent among those not adopted by the Athanasian Rule,⁵³ though there is a provision [33] for confession to the superior analogous to but textually independent of (4) Stoudios [22].

4. Diet

In the typical fashion of a typikon leitourgikon, the Athanasian Rule's dietary regulations ([22] through [26]) lend themselves to a discussion paralleling the annual liturgical cycle. Here too Studite observances are influential, though there are many minor variations, and perhaps a greater willingness to concede [30], [31] a considerable amount of discretion to the superior in moderating the rules.

5. Importance of Reading

If the Athanasian Rule placed a greater emphasis on manual labor than its model, it also apparently placed a lesser emphasis on reading, for (4) Stoudios' chapters on the alternation of reading with manual work [26], on copyists and the library [33], and on teaching monks the psalter are all missing in (11) Ath. Rule. As at the Stoudios monastery, however, at least some monks are presumed to be literate [29], [32], cf. [21], and the hagiographic tradition is nonetheless eager to assert Athanasios' interest in teaching his illiterate monks how to read.⁵⁴

6. Disciplinary Regime

It is unclear if the deletion of the Studite ban on corporal punishment in the chapter [19] endorsing monastic confinement is significant; elsewhere there is a provision [17] for the use of "moderate punishments." Like others before and after him, Athanasios was concerned to restrict [34] departures by disgruntled monks, preferring to place them with another spiritual director or make "other arrangements for their welfare."

C. Constitutional Matters

Like its Studite model, the Athanasian Rule was not much concerned about administrative and constitutional matters, which Athanasios would treat adequately later in his (13) Ath. Typikon and (14) Ath. Testament. Here he employs (4) Stoudios [18] for the designation [17] of some of the monastery's functional officials: disciplinarians, a waker, and an overseer. Perhaps a heightened concern for security motivates him to add both a doorkeeper [17] for the church and a gatekeeper [36] for the entrance to the monastery; the latter is specifically responsible for the prevention of theft.

Finally, there is a provision [37] for reading the rules in assembly which was to have many imitators among founders of later eras anxious to see their prescriptions for community life endure.

Notes on the Introduction

1. For dating, see the apparent reference to this document in Vita A, chap. 84; cf. Vita B, chap. 26, which would have occurred before the news of Nikephoros Phokas' elevation to the throne (963) reached Mount Athos. Lemerle, Lavra, pt. 1, p. 21, however, proposes a dating of 964–973, interpreting (11) Ath. Rule [28] as a reference to the relic of the Holy Cross donated by Nikephoros Phokas in his chrysobull of May 964 (Dölger, Regesten, no. 706, ed. Lemerle, Lavra, pt. 1, no. 5, pp. 103–6), considering that our document must be subsequent to that chrysobull and prior to (13) Ath. Typikon, which is thought to date to 973–75. The relevant passage of (11) Ath. Rule [28], however, is a borrowing from (4) Stoudios [AB32], so it cannot be used to establish a terminus post quem. Mylonas, "Catholicon," pp. 95–96, 104, arguing from archaeological evidence, is inclined to accept a much later date of 1020 as originally proposed by Meyer, Haupturkunden, pp. viii, 273 for the document "as it now exists," or, alternatively, to postulate the reference to subsidiary chapels in (11) Ath. Rule [1] as an interpolation of the text as originally drawn up at the time of Lavra's foundation.
2. See Meyer, Haupturkunden, pp. 270–73, and Lemerle, Lavra, pt. 1, p. 21, cf. 13–14; as Lemerle notes, a true critical edition remains to be done on the basis of Lavra ms. E 194 (14th–15th c.), for which see Noret, Vitae duae, p. xxxii. This manuscript also contains Vita A, an Enkomion (= Halkin, BHG 189), (13) Ath. Typikon, and (14) Ath. Testament as well as some other documents associated with Athanasios.
3. Athanasian Vitae, ed. Noret, Vitae duae; the Georgian Life of John the Iberian and Euthymios by George

11. ATH. RULE

- the Hagiorite (from before 1044) is accessible through the Latin translation of P. Peeters, “Histoires monastiques géorgiennes,” AB 36–37 (1917–19), 8–68.
4. Petit, “Vie,” believed that Vita B was dependent upon Vita A; Lemerle, “Vie ancienne,” pp. 61–63, accepted this conclusion enthusiastically and thought that Vita A was written on Mount Athos by a Lavriote monk named Athanasios in the first decade of the eleventh century; Leroy, “Deux vies,” pp. 411–28, argued for the importance of Vita B and implied that it might actually be older than Vita A, which he thought was written not on Mount Athos but at the Constantinopolitan monastery of the Panagios by a monk named Athanasios who was the disciple of Athanasios the Athonite’s successor Antony; in Lavra, pt. 1, pp. 24–26, Lemerle defended his original views against Leroy’s proposals; Mossay, “Note,” p. 124, sided with Leroy on the Constantinopolitan origin of Vita A, but thought that it was impossible to establish a priority of Vita A over Vita B solely on the basis of internal evidence.
 5. For Athanasios’ early life and his monastic profession, see Vita A, chaps. 4–37, ed. Noret, Vitae duae, pp. 4–18, and Vita B, chaps. 2–12, ed. Noret, pp. 128–39; with Lemerle, Lavra, pt. 1, pp. 30–31, and Leroy, “Conversion,” pp. 106–8.
 6. Vita, ed. Louis Petit, “Vie de saint Michel Maléinos,” ROC 7 (1902), 543–603 (= Halkin, BHG 1295); for the typikon, see Petit, p. 560, cf. the hypotyposis of Basil, one of Michael’s successors, pp. 598–603; for the foundation, see Janin, Géographie, vol. 2, pp. 115–18; general discussion by Leroy, “Conversion,” pp. 106–8.
 7. For Athanasios’ arrival on Mount Athos, see Vita A, chaps. 38–59, ed. Noret, Vitae duae, pp. 18–29, and Vita B, chap. 13–21, ed. Noret, pp. 139–47; with Lemerle, Lavra, pt. 1, pp. 32–33, and “Vie ancienne,” pp. 72–75.
 8. For the foundation of Lavra, see (13) Ath. Typikon [2] – [8]; Vita A, chaps. 68–81, ed. Noret, Vitae duae, pp. 32–38, and Vita B, chaps. 22–25, ed. Noret, pp. 147–53, with Lemerle, Lavra, pt. 1, pp. 33–35, and “Vie ancienne,” pp. 75–76.
 9. See discussion in Lemerle, Lavra, pt. 1, pp. 34–35.
 10. See Mylonas, “Trapéza,” p. 154, and “Catholicon,” p. 103.
 11. See Vita A, chaps. 84, 86–89, ed. Noret, Vitae duae, pp. 39–42, and Vita B, chaps. 26, 29, ed. Noret, pp. 153–54, 157–59, with Lemerle, “Vie ancienne,” p. 76, n. 55, and the discussion below in Analysis.
 12. For this troubled period, see Vita A, chaps. 90–95, ed. Noret, Vitae duae, pp. 42–45, and Vita B, chaps. 30–32, ed. Noret, pp. 159–63; cf. (13) Ath. Typikon [7]; with discussion by Lemerle, Lavra, pt. 1, p. 35, and “Vie ancienne,” pp. 77–78.
 13. For Athanasios’ visit to Constantinople, see (13) Ath. Typikon [7], Vita A, chaps. 100–101, ed. Noret, Vitae duae, pp. 48–49, and Vita B, chap. 34, ed. Noret, pp. 165–66; for the chrysobull, see Dölger, Regesten, no. 706, ed. Lemerle, Lavra, pt. 1, doc. 5, pp. 103–6.
 14. For Nikephoros Phokas’ original intent, see (13) Ath. Typikon [5], Vita A, chap. 70, p. 33, and Vita B, chap. 22, ed. Noret, Vitae duae, p. 148, with discussion by Papachryssanthou, Prôtaton, pp. 77–78; see also the emperor’s views on monasticism in general in his Novella de monasteriis of 964 (JGR 3.292–96) = Dölger, Regesten, no. 699, a general prohibition on the founding of new monasteries, with kellia and lavrai conspicuously excepted.
 15. For the concessions obtained from Nikephoros Phokas, see Vita A, chap. 103, ed. Noret, Vitae duae, pp. 49–50; Vita B, chap. 34, ed. Noret, pp. 165–66; (13) Ath. Typikon [12], [13], [18], [20], [23], [36], [42]; (14) Ath. Testament [3]; Lemerle, Lavra, pt. 1, doc. 5, pp. 103–6, and doc. 6, pp. 106–10; with discussion by Lemerle, Lavra, pt. 1, pp. 36–39, and Papachryssanthou, Prôtaton, pp. 81–83. Two of these chrysobulls are in Dölger, Regesten, nos. 704, 706.
 16. For the concessions obtained for Mount Athos, see Dölger, Regesten, no. 705; Vita A, chap. 104, ed. Noret, Vitae duae, p. 50, and Vita B, chap. 34, p. 166; with discussion by Papachryssanthou, Prôtaton, p. 83.
 17. For the Tragos affair, so called after the nickname for Tzimsikes’ typikon, Dölger, Regesten, no. 745, ed. Papachryssanthou, Prôtaton, doc. 7, pp. 202–15, see (12) Tzimsikes, Vita A, chaps. 114–23, ed. Noret,

TENTH CENTURY

- Vitae duae*, pp. 54–58, and Vita B, chap. 36, ed. Noret, pp. 168–69; with discussion by Lemerle, Lavra, pt. 1, pp. 39–41, and “Vie ancienne,” pp. 79–80, and by Papachryssanthou, Prôtaton, pp. 95–102.
18. Dölger, Regesten, no. 744, mentioned in (13) Ath. Typikon [36], [51], in Vita A, chap. 116, ed. Noret, Vitae duae, p. 56, and in Vita B, chap. 36, ed. Noret, p. 169; in a document of 984, Athanasios himself attributes this increase to the efforts of John the Iberian in Lefort et al., Iviron, pt. 1, doc. 6; cf. comment by Lemerle, Lavra, pt. 1, p. 43, n. 156: “So it is possible that despite the Vita, Athanasios never met this emperor.”
 19. See Vita A, chaps. 125–28, ed. Noret, Vitae duae, pp. 59–62, and Vita B, chaps. 38–39, ed. Noret, pp. 170–72; with discussion by Lemerle, Lavra, pt. 1, p. 41.
 20. For dating, see Lemerle, Lavra, pt. 1, p. 17.
 21. For Athanasios’ relations with Basil II, see Dölger, Regesten, nos. 758 and 760, ed. Lemerle, Lavra, pt. 1, doc. 7, pp. 111–14; with discussion by Lemerle, p. 46.
 22. Lemerle, Lavra, pt. 1, doc. 8, pp. 115–17.
 23. For Athanasios’ relations with John the Iberian, see Lemerle, Lavra, pt. 1, pp. 43–44, and Papachryssanthou, Prôtaton, pp. 83–85.
 24. For the revolt of the young superiors, see Vita A, chaps. 209–11, ed. Noret, Vitae duae, pp. 100–102, and Vita B, chap. 58, ed. Noret, pp. 194–95; with discussion by Lemerle, Lavra, pt. 1, pp. 46–47, and “Vie ancienne,” p. 81.
 25. For Athanasios’ death, see Vita A, chaps. 234–46, ed. Noret, Vitae duae, pp. 112–17, and Vita B, chaps. 65–68, ed. Noret, pp. 200–203; for the discussion of its implications, see Vita A, chaps. 231–33, ed. Noret, pp. 110–12.
 26. For the parameters for Athanasios’ death, see Lemerle, Lavra, pt. 1, doc. 13 (996), pp. 130–33, and doc. 16 (1012), pp. 141–44.
 27. For Athanasios’ successor, see (14) Ath. Testament [17], Vita A, chap. 247, ed. Noret, Vitae duae, pp. 118–18, and Vita B, chap. 69, ed. Noret, pp. 203–4; with discussion by Lemerle, Lavra, pt. 1, p. 48.
 28. Antony’s resignation and transfer to Panagios was first suggested by Leroy, “Deux vies,” to reconcile the apparent Constantinopolitan origin of Vita A, self-attributed to a certain Athanasios, who identifies himself in chap. 213, ed. Noret, Vitae duae, p. 105, as a disciple of Antony, with the testimony of Vita B, chap. 78, ed. Noret, pp. 211–12, in which Antony, the superior of Panagios, is identified as a disciple of Athanasios (the Athonite). Lemerle, Lavra, pt. 1, p. 26, rejected the hypothesis, but Noret, p. cxvii, accepts it as a reasonable way of reconciling our evidence.
 29. For Athanasios the Athonite, see Noret, Vitae duae, pp. cxxx–cxlv.
 30. For Lavra in this era, see the discussion by Lemerle, Lavra, pt. 1, pp. 48–49; a list of Lavra’s superiors after Athanasios down to 1218 is to be found at p. 55; for the administrator Nikephoros, see Mylonas, “Catholicon,” p. 104.
 31. For the side chapels, see (11) Ath. Rule [1], [27], and Vita B, chap. 25, ed. Noret, Vitae duae, p. 151; if one is to believe that the chapels postdate Athanasios, both references must be seen as anachronistic. Moreover, since Vita A was apparently written at Constantinople, the absence of the side chapels in its parallel account, chap. 81, ed. Noret, p. 37, cannot be considered really firm evidence for their subsequent construction.
 32. Ed. Papachryssanthou, Prôtaton, doc. 8, pp. 216–32, with commentary, pp. 102–7; translated below in this chapter as (14) Constantine IX. See also the emperor’s confirmation issued in 1046, doc. 9, pp. 233–38.
 33. Dölger, Regesten, no. 907, ed. Lemerle, Lavra, pt. 1, doc. 31, pp. 189–92, with discussion, pp. 45, 52.
 34. Dölger, Regesten, no. 932, ed. Lemerle, Lavra, pt. 1, doc. 32, pp. 192–94, with discussion, pp. 52–53; for the number of monks at mid-century, see Talbot and Kazhdan, “Lavra,” p. 1190.
 35. Dölger, Regesten, no. 946, ed. Lemerle, Lavra, pt. 1, doc. 33, pp. 195–99, with discussion, p. 45; note the similar protectorate assigned to the logothete of the drome for Iveron by Nikephoros III Botaneiates (1078–81) in a chrysobull of 1079, ed. Lefort et al., Iviron, pt. 2, doc. 41 [= old Dölger, Schatzkammer, no. 35].

11. ATH. RULE

36. The central document for the “Vlach Question” is the Diegesis merike, ed. Meyer, Haupturkunden, pp. 163–84, with commentary, pp. 38–47; see also Ferdinand Chalandon, Essai sur le règne d’Alexis I^{er} Comnène (1081–1118) (Paris, 1900), pp. 288–89, and Lemerle, Lavra, pt. 1, p. 53.
37. Alexander Kazhdan and Alice-Mary Talbot, “Protos,” ODB p. 1747.
38. Dölger, Regesten, no. 1227, with a proposed date of 1105; see discussion by Lemerle, Lavra, pt. 1, p. 53, who dates the grant provisionally to 1107.
39. For the late Byzantine period, see Lemerle et al., Lavra, pt. 4, “Chronologie de Lavra de 1204 à 1500,” pp. 3–64, with a list of Lavra’s superiors during these centuries at pp. 61–64; in the same work, Nicolas Svoronos, “Le domaine de Lavra sous le Paléologue,” pp. 65–173; Kadas, Mount Athos, pp. 31, 36; Talbot and Kazhdan, “Lavra,” p. 1190.
40. For the Turkokratia, see Kadas, Mount Athos, pp. 15, 32–36; Mylonas, “Catholicon,” pp. 91–94, 104–5.
41. Nicolas Oikonomidès, “Monastères et moines lors de la conquête ottomane,” SF 35 (1976), 1–10, at 10.
42. For Lavra and its buildings in modern times, see Kadas, Mount Athos, pp. 16, 36, 38, 40; Mylonas, “Catholicon,” pp. 89–91, 106, and “Trapéza,” p. 155.
43. Kadas, Mount Athos, p. 40.
44. Kadas, Mount Athos, pp. 39–40; Talbot and Kazhdan, “Lavra,” p. 1191.
45. Vita A, chaps. 84, 86–89, ed. Noret, Vitae duae, pp. 39–42, and Vita B, chaps. 26, 29, ed. Noret, pp. 153–54, 157–59; with discussion in Leroy, “S. Benoît,” p. 115.
46. (4) Stoudios [1], [8], [12], [13], [16], [17], [19], [20], [21], [22], [26], [31], [33], [34], [35], [36], [B37], [A38].
47. E.g., (4) Stoudios [1], [19], and [36]; so also Leroy, “Conversion,” p. 115.
48. (11) Ath. Rule [5], [10], [11], [14], [20], [27], [29], [30], [31], [32], [33], [34], [36], and [37].
49. See the discussion below in Chapter Five, (29) Kosmosoteira, Analysis, Stages of Composition.
50. See, in connection with the subject of (4) Stoudios’s once militantly pro-cenobitic outlook, the warning of Papachryssanthou, Prôtaton, p. 100, against assuming that the customs of Studite monasticism as practiced in Athanasios’ lifetime and later were essentially unchanged from Theodore’s time.
51. See (4) Stoudios [24] for testing of newcomers, [28] for scriptural readings, [32] for veneration of the Holy Cross, [A37] and [B38] for clothing.
52. See Vita A, chaps. 53, 138, 139, 172, ed. Noret, Vitae duae, pp. 26–27, 65–66, 81, and Vita A, chaps. 19, 40, ed. Noret, pp. 144–45, 172–73; with discussion by Lemerle, Lavra, pt. 1, p. 80.
53. (4) Stoudios [B37] and [A38] on communion; [B16], [21], and [36] on catechetical instruction, this despite the evidence of Vita B, chap. 65, ed. Noret, Vitae duae, p. 200, that at the end of his life Athanasios was employing Theodore of Studios’ Catecheses of his monks. The hagiographical tradition also records Athanasios’ encouragement of confession: see Vita A, chaps. 173–74, ed. Noret, Vitae duae, pp. 81–82, and Vita B, chap. 45, ed. Noret, pp. 181–82.
54. See Vita A, chap. 165, ed. Noret, Vitae duae, pp. 78–79, and Vita B, chap. 45, ed. Noret, pp. 179–80.

Biography of the Author

A. Hagiography

- Dumont, Pierre, “Vie de saint Athanase l’Athonite,” Irenikon 8 (1931), 457–99, 667–89; 9 (1932), 71–95, 240–64. French translation of Vita B.
- Halkin, François, Bibliotheca hagiographica graeca, 3rd ed. (Brussels, 1957), pp. 187, 188.
- Noret, J., ed., Vitae duae antiquae sancti Athanasii Athonitae (Louvain, 1982). Modern critical edition of Vita A and B.

B. Secondary Works

- Kazhdan, Alexander, and Ševčenko, Nancy, “Athanasios of Athos,” ODB, p. 219.
- Lemerle, Paul, “La vie ancienne de saint Athanase l’Athonite composée au début du XI^e siècle par Athanase

TENTH CENTURY

- de Lavra,” in Le millénaire du Mont Athos, 963–1963, vol. 1 (Chevetogne, 1963), pp. 60–100. Study of Vita A.
- Leroy, Julien, “Les deux vies de S. Athanase l’Athonite,” AB 82 (1964), 409–29.
- Le millénaire du Mont Athos, 963–1963*, vol. 1 (Chevetogne, 1963); vol. 2 (Venice-Chevetogne, 1965).
- Mossay, Justin, “A propos des ‘Actes de Lavra.’ Note sur les deux Vies de Saint Athanase l’Athonite,” AB 91 (1973), 121–32.
- Noret, J., “La vie la plus ancienne d’Athanase l’Athonite confrontée à d’autres vies de saints,” AB 103 (1985), 243–52.
- Petit, Louis, “Vie de saint Athanase l’Athonite,” AB 25 (1906), 5–89.

Bibliography

- Darrouzès, Jean, “Liste des protes de l’Athos,” in Le millénaire du Mont Athos, 963–1963, vol. 1 (Chevetogne, 1963), pp. 407–47.
- Doens, Irénée, “Bibliographie de la Sainte Montagne de l’Athos,” in Le millénaire du Mont Athos, 963–1963, vol. 2 (Venice-Chevetogne, 1965), pp. 336–495. A comprehensive bibliography on Athonite monasticism.
- Dumont, Pierre, “L’higoumène dans la règle de Saint Athanase l’Athonite,” in Le millénaire du Mont Athos, 963–1963, vol. 1 (Chevetogne, 1963), pp. 121–34.
- , “Vie cénobitique ou vie hésychaste dans quelques ‘typica’ byzantins,” in L’Église et les Églises, vol. 2 (Chevetogne, 1955), pp. 3–13.
- Kadas, Sotiris, Mount Athos: An Illustrated Guide to the Monasteries and Their History (Athens, 1980), pp. 35–41.
- Lefort, Jacques, Oikonomidès, Nicolas, and Papachryssanthou, Denise, Actes d’Ivion, pt. 1: Des origines au milieu du XI^e siècle (= Archives de l’Athos 14) (Paris, 1985).
- Lemerle, Paul, et al., Actes de Lavra, pt. 1: Des origines à 1204 (= Archives de l’Athos 5) (Paris, 1970), esp. pp. 13–55.
- Lemerle, Paul, et al., Actes de Lavra, pt. 4: Études historiques-Actes serbes-Compléments et Index (= Archives de l’Athos 11) (Paris, 1982), esp. pp. 3–64.
- Leroy, Julien, “S. Athanase l’Athonite et la Règle de S. Benoît,” RAM 29 (1953), 108–22.
- , “La conversion de Saint Athanase l’Athonite à l’idéal cénobitique et l’influence studite,” Le millénaire du Mont Athos, 963–1963, vol. 1 (Chevetogne, 1963), pp. 101–20.
- Mamalakes, John, To Hagion Oros (Athos) dia Mesou ton Aionon (Thessalonike, 1971).
- Mylonas, Paul, “Le plan initial du catholicon de la Grande-Lavra au Mont Athos et la genèse du type du catholicon athonite,” CA 32 (1984), 89–112.
- , “La trapéza de la Grand Lavra au Mont Athos,” CA 35 (1987), 143–57.
- Panteleemon Lavriotes, “Sympleromatikos katalogos cheirographon kodikon Hieras Mones Megistes Lauras,” EEBS 28 (1958), 87–203, esp. 118–20.
- Papachryssanthou, Denise, Actes de Prôtaton (= Archives de l’Athos 7) (Paris, 1975), esp. pp. 69–85.
- Rezac, Giovanni, “Le diverse forme di unione fra i monasteri orientali,” OCA 153 (1958), 99–135.
- Talbot, Alice-Mary, and Kazhdan, Alexander, “Lavra, Great,” ODB, pp. 1190–91.
- Vassilopoulos, A. E., “L’organisation et l’administration du saint Mont Athos,” RDC 13 (1963), 19–47.
- Volk, Robert, Gesundheitswesen und Wohltätigkeit im Spiegel der byzantinischen Kloostertypika (Munich, 1983), pp. 67–71.

Translation

Key to Sources

Boldface Type = (4) Stoudios Vers. [A]ItalicType = (4) Stoudios Vers. [B]Boldface Italic Type = (4) Stoudios Vers. [A] & [B][Rule of Observance of the Lavra of the holy Athanasios.][= (4) Stoudios [B2]]: How we conduct services for the holy and glorious resurrection of our savior Jesus Christ on the third day.

[1.] [= (4) Stoudios [AB2]]: It must be noted that after the third watch of the night, that is the ninth hour, has passed, and the tenth is beginning, [p. 131] the signal of the water clock strikes, and at this signal they immediately arise and sound the wooden semantra.¹ While all the brothers assemble in the narthex of the main church and pray silently, the priest takes the censer in his hands and censes first the holy sanctuary and from there, with a large candle being borne in front of him, he walks through the screen in front and passes along the north side of the church by the Forty Saints. Arriving at the royal gate he censes the brothers and immediately returns by the south side. The brothers then enter the church behind him carrying large candles, while the priest enters the sanctuary through the oratory on the right. He puts aside the censer in the sanctuary, and then comes out and stands with his face towards the sanctuary to begin the troparion in the first plagal mode: “Christ is risen from the dead.” After this has been sung three times by himself and the brothers, the priest recites the verse: “This is the day which the Lord has made” (Ps. 117 [118]:24). The brothers repeat the troparion, and then the priest recites the second verse: “Celebrate the feast” (Ps. 117 [118]:27) to its conclusion. Again the congregation repeats the troparion and concludes with the doxology. After this has been completed, the canon begins immediately, since during this whole week we do not chant the Six Psalms.² One reading follows the third [ode], and we sing the kontakion after the sixth [ode], followed by the fiftieth psalm. When matins has been completed, the embrace takes place as the brothers sing the “Christ is risen.” Then the “Day of the resurrection” is read, followed immediately by the great synapte and the dismissal.

[2.] [= (4) Stoudios [AB2]]: During this week at the office of lamplighting,³ we recite the “Christ is risen from the dead,” followed immediately by “Oh Lord I have cried [to thee]” (Ps. 140 [141]). At the dismissal we repeat the “Christ is risen.” Similarly, at compline the “Christ is risen,” the trisagion hymn, and the “Kyrie eleison” twenty times.

[3.] [= (4) Stoudios [AB2]]: On the Saturday of Renovation⁴ at the vespers, we begin [to sing] the customary psalm (Ps. 102 [103]), and immediately the “O Lord I have cried to thee” (Ps. 140 [141]:1), and at compline “God is with us” (Is. 8:9) and the rest. [= (4) Stoudios [AB3]]: On the Sunday of the Radiant Week⁵ the Six Psalms begin, and we sing the “God is the Lord” (Ps. 117 [118]:27) in the grave mode and then only the canon of the day. There is one reading, the holy gospel after the conclusion of the morning office. In the evening the “Blessed is the man” (Ps. 31 [32]:2) is followed by the rest of the service and the resurrection *troparia*⁶ in the first mode as prescribed for Sunday. At compline we say “He who dwells” (Ps. 2:4) and the prokeimenon “God is with us,” and so forth. [= (4) Stoudios [AB4]]: On Monday at matins we again sing the “God is the Lord” [p. 132] in the first mode, and we also sing one kathisma, then the gradual antiphons in the same mode, the prokeimenon, “Let everything that has breath [praise the Lord]” (Ps. 150:6), the first gospel of the morning, the fiftieth psalm, and then the canon of the resurrection. For we celebrate Monday as though it were Sunday without any change. There are two readings. [= (4) Stoudios [B3]]: From that time on, we carry out the full compline service, except on Saturday evening, a feast of the Lord, and the commemoration of a saint, which brings for us rest from our work, our hours, and our prostrations whenever they occur. On these days we sing “He who dwells,” and what follows.

[4.] It should also be known that after celebrating the feast of Low Sunday, immediately after compline we begin the night office. Until All Saints we do only the canon, followed by the [psalm] “Blameless” (Ps. 118 [119]). From that time until the Exaltation [of the Cross] we add six psalms, during which we make three prostrations and standings. After the Exaltation we chant twelve [psalms], and we carry out the rest of the service until great Lent. Then at each single trisagion we do the prostrations and the standings. [= (4) Stoudios [AB20]]: On the vigil of the Nativity of Christ and Epiphany, as well as on the evenings of Holy Thursday and Holy Saturday we do not sing compline, but only a trisagion. [= (4) Stoudios [B3]]: We begin performing our tasks again beginning on Tuesday morning of the second week [after Easter]. Until All Saints we chant the prokeimenon of each day at the office of lamplighting. [= (4) Stoudios [AB5] and [B6]]: Until the feast of the Ascension the kathismata and stichera for the resurrection precede the penitential ones and those of the apostles and of the martyrs in the psalmody, but not those dealing with the crucifixion.

[5.] [= (4) Stoudios [B4]]: It should be known that at the office of lamplighting on all the feasts of the Lord, of [St. John] the Forerunner, of the Holy Apostles, and of the rest of the more notable saints on which we are not busy with our labors, “Blessed is the man” is begun in the fourth plagal mode, then “O Lord I have cried to thee” in the mode of the stichera of the feast. On all the other days we do “To the Lord” (Ps. 140 [141] and 141 [142]) in the mode assigned to be sung.

[6.] [= (4) Stoudios [A6] and [B7]]: It must be noted that until Pentecost we do not sing the hours nor genuflect. [= (4) Stoudios [AB7]]: On Saturdays we do not sing the canons for the dead. [= (4) Stoudios [B8]]: It should be known that on the Saturday of Pentecost at the exaposteilarion we sing “The remembrance of those who are at rest.” Singing this we go out to the graves of the brothers, and while standing there, we sing the stichera of the day and likewise the other hymns for the dead. [p. 133] This concludes matins. We observe this also on the Saturday of Meatfare.

11. ATH. RULE

[7.] [= (4) Stoudios [B9]]: *It should be known that in the evening on the Sunday of holy Pentecost at the office of lamplighting we make three genuflections and say immediately after the prooimion the “O Lord I have cried [to thee]” (Ps. 140 [141]) and in the morning at matins after the Six Psalms we say the “God is the Lord ” (Ps. 117 [118]: 27). Immediately, the canon and two readings follow. We pass this week as well without singing the hours. [cf. (4) Stoudios [AB10]]: Then the fast of the Holy Apostles arrives and we begin to sing the hours with the kathismata, but leave out the first and the ninth hours. These we recite only in the great Lent. We also say the ninth hour in the fast of saint Philip,⁷ and at its conclusion we recite “Kyrie eleison” thirty times. At first we make three prostrations at the same rate all following the superior. During this we also keep up our prostrations for a little while. Standing erect once again we stretch our hands out towards God, then we do twelve more in the same way following the lead of the superior. We then stand for a longer period in prayer, and this is immediately followed by the dismissal. Such, therefore, is our observance for each service during the year in which we do not celebrate a feast. During the great Lent, moreover, we add twelve more prostrations and another period of standing.*

[8.] [cf. (4) Stoudios [AB27]]: It should be known that when we are not performing the hours and are working, the signal for the divine liturgy is at the beginning of the fourth hour. When the liturgy is finished, the wooden semantron sounds three times and all the brothers assemble in the same place and after singing the required verses and receiving the blessed bread, they leave for the refectory. When we do the hours, the divine liturgy is celebrated after the chanting of the third hour. [The brothers] in a file⁸ enter [the refectory] at the fifth hour; while the sixth and the ninth hours are sung at the same time after the liturgy, the first with a kathisma and the other plain. In the fast of Saint Philip when we sing the ninth hour, the divine liturgy is celebrated at the sixth. Joining vespers with the ninth hour, we omit the recitation of the vesper [psalms].

[9.] Let it be noted that we do two hundred prostrations each day in the course of all the services during the day and night. This comes to [cf. (4) Stoudios [AB10]]: forty at matins, twenty during each of the hours, thirty at vespers, and fifty at compline. During great Lent we even [p. 134] increase them by doubling the number at compline and matins and adding up to ten at the other services.

[10.] In each vesper service it should be noted, at the “O Lord I have cried [to thee]” (Ps. 140 [141]), we intercalate six verses and repeat the stichera of the saints. On Saturday and on feasts of the Lord we intercalate eight verses, and we repeat the first of the resurrection troparia, but not the others. We recite those of the feasts three times.

[11.] It must be noted that in each matins service the signal of the water clock strikes after the conclusion of the seventh hour, on Sundays after the sixth, and on feasts of the Lord at the beginning of the fifth.

[12.] It must also be kept in mind that in each matins office we intercalate eight verses on weekdays and ten on Sundays and on feast days. [cf. (4) Stoudios [AB11]]: After the reading is com- pleted, we rise up and say “Kyrie eleison” twelve times, and then the psalmody takes up again. This same number and selection of psalms lasts until the Exaltation of the life-giving wood [of the cross].

[13.] [= (4) Stoudios [AB13]]: It should be known that on the Dormition of the all-holy Mother of God, that is, in the evening at the office of lamplighting of the after feast, after the prokeimenon psalms, we sing “O Lord I have cried [to thee]” (Ps. 140 [141]), and in the morning at matins after the Six Psalms again the “God is Lord” (Ps. 117 [118]:27), followed immediately by the canon and two readings. The same order is followed on her Nativity and on her Entrance [into the temple], in like manner also for the Nativity of Christ, for the Epiphany, and for the feast of the Presentation of the Lord in the Temple, and for the Exaltation [of the Holy Cross]. The other feasts besides those listed above are not celebrated in two days. From the Exaltation to the Paschal Celebration another kathisma is added to the matins service, as well as one reading. We intercalate ten or more verses in the canon, depending on how many are prescribed for the canon and the day.

Holy Lent

[14.] Let it be noted that on the Monday of the first week, since the brothers have been enjoying some relaxation, we sing only two antiphons and do two readings and the triodia. Thereafter we do three antiphons and three readings. We rise at the end of the fifth hour, then we relax a little after matins, and at daybreak we begin the first hour. If indeed the canon for Monday happens to be for an anniversary observance, then we sing one kathisma after the Six Psalms, then the [p. 135] fiftieth psalm, then the canon and the triodia, and there are two readings.

[15.] [cf. (4) Stoudios [A10, B14]]: It should be known that during this period of Lent if we sing a canon, we do the first hour all together with a kathisma but without a reading in it. We do have readings at the third, sixth, and ninth hours. [cf. (4) Stoudios [B15]]: It should be known that during Holy Week until Holy Thursday we sing the hours and do the prostrations just as in the days before that. But then on the Holy Thursday, as also on Holy Friday, we chant the [hours] in a plain fashion. We join the troparia of the holy passion together with the hours, along with the rest of the entire service for that day, and we chant the [hours] in a plain fashion.

[16.] [= (4) Stoudios [AB23]]: It should be known that during the Holy Lent a prudent brother is chosen who should at the third hour visit each of the ministries, and making a deep bow, say: “Brothers and fathers, let us take thought for ourselves since we shall die, we shall die, we shall die. Let us also be mindful of the eternal punishment.” The brothers immediately drop what they have in their hands, arise, recite the trisagion, and sit down again.

[17.] [cf. (4) Stoudios [AB18]]: It should be known that there are two disciplinarians, one in each choir, who are to remind the brothers to stand in an orderly manner in the choirs. After the wooden semantron sounds, they urge on the slothful to run to the service. From those who have stayed behind they demand the reason for their doing so. By means of rather moderate punish- ments they provide an incentive for those who have been tardy to do better. In addition, there is the waker who at the matins readings goes quietly around to the brothers and wakes those sleeping. There is also the overseer who night and day wanders among the cells, places of service, and the other places of the Lavra, and with fitting severity and an appropriate penance breaks up those who are meeting at an improper time. There is also a doorkeeper who guards the entrance to the church, whose first task is to demand of those who come late a reason for their tardiness, and then, after one exit, he forbids those who want to leave at an inopportune moment from going out again.

11. ATH. RULE

[18.] [= (4) Stoudios [AB24]]: It should be known that when we receive brothers whom we do not know either those from another monastery or even laymen seeking the monastic life, we require them to stay in the hospice for two weeks or even [p. 136] three to see and experience the monastery. Then, if they remain steadfast in their decision, after the superior informs them of what awaits them, once and then a second time, he thereupon introduces them to instruction and enrolls them into his flock. With the permission of the superior the newly arrived prostrates himself before the brothers while they pray for him.

[19.] [cf. (4) Stoudios [AB25]]: We must admit that we have places of confinement, in accord with the precept of the great Basil⁹ in which, after many warnings and admonitions, the disobedient and refractory brothers are confined, put on a diet of dry food and disciplined in virtue. Those, however, who do not improve their attitudes even by these means, but persist in the same behavior even after lengthy punishment, as diseased limbs should be cut off from the rest of the body of the community, so that their own contagion may not spread to their neighbors.

[20.] This too must be known. Standing with staffs or entering the church with them and likewise making genuflections on footstools is far removed from us altogether as a sign of laziness and contempt for God.

The quantity and the quality of the food and drink
Proper order at table

[21.] [cf. (4) Stoudios [AB28]]: It must be known that at the signal given by the bell, when the brothers come down to the midday meal, they should carry a verse [of the psalms] upon their lips, just as [they should] after rising [from the table] until they have gone over to the narthex to perform the thanksgiving for the food they have shared. They take their seats in the order which they have received. A monitor ensures that the tables are filled up in an orderly fashion without commotion. A reading then takes place. The ecclesiarch, that is, divides up the readings. He makes sure that none of the material that there was no time to read in the church is left out. The signal for the ending of this reading is the sound of the spoons at the last serving when all together toss them on their dishes. Similarly, at a signal the wine is poured and at another signal food is served.

[22.] [= (4) Stoudios [AB29]]: It should be known that from Eastertide until All Saints we eat two cooked dishes—garden vegetables and legumes and season them both with three litrai of olive oil. On feasts of the Lord, unless there is also a relish dish, we add one more [litra] [p. 137], since another cooked dish is added, of course. On these days we also eat fish, if available, cheese, and eggs. We drink three [measures of wine]. In the evening when the signal is struck the brothers who so wish come out to eat their bread as well as any food that may have been left over from the morning. For the community has no food prepared especially for the evening; [they also drink] two servings of wine.

[23.] [cf. (4) Stoudios [AB29]]: On Monday, Wednesday, and Friday during the fast of the Holy Apostles we do not use oil and we do not drink wine. As on ordinary days we partake of these on the remaining days of the week, but we abstain from fish, apart from Sundays and feasts when we relax from labor and the recitation of the hours.

[24.] [cf. (4) Stoudios [AB29]]: It should be known that even though on the above-mentioned three days of the week we do not use olive oil, the dishes are the customary ones, those which we always have, I mean vegetables and legumes. This rule also applies for the fast of St. Philip, except that sometimes, as in Great Lent, we eat one meal a day. From the memorial of the Holy Apostles to that of St. Philip, on Wednesday and Friday we do not partake of olive oil or wine. But if a feast of the Lord or the commemoration of a saint falls on one of these days, which grants us a holiday, then, if available, we eat cheese, eggs, and fish. As on the other days there are three servings of wine at midday and two in the evening. From the Nativity of Christ to the end of the twelfth day our diet is like that of the pentecostal season. After that the rule of the previous days is again observed until Cheesefare Week. The week of Cheesefare is absolutely free [of fasting].

[25.] [= (4) Stoudios [AB30]]: During Great Lent we have only one meal a day except for Saturday and Sunday. In the first and the fourth weeks our meals are unvaried, that is, beans or boiled chick peas, on occasion almaia without oil, or chestnuts or some other boiled fruit. In the second, third, fifth, and sixth weeks this is what we eat: boiled beans and a dish [seasoned with] ground nutmeg, except that on Wednesday and Friday the food we eat is the same as that of the first week. Throughout the entire Holy Lent we do not drink wine apart from Saturday and Sunday with the exception of the sick and the aged.

[26.] [cf. (4) Stoudios [AB30]]: It should be known that on the first Saturday, starting on Friday evening, we do not perform prostrations. Also on Saturday and Sunday we use [p. 138] olive oil and wine, up to two servings at the midday meal and one in the evening, just as on the other Saturdays and Sundays, and for the Forty Saints, and when we sing the Akathistos hymn and the great canon. On Monday, Tuesday, Wednesday, and Friday of Holy Week the food is similar to that of the first week. On Holy Thursday we may use olive oil and wine. On Holy Saturday in the middle of the twelfth hour we begin vespers, and the dismissal will come at whatever time [the service is concluded], but the refectory is not opened because the liturgy finishes so late and because a large meal would weigh heavily on the stomach and on the mind. We are content with the blessed bread, and can partake of about two servings of wine in the narthex.

11. ATH. RULE

[27.] It must be noted that at the completion of the fourth hour the wood is struck and we are led into the church. Taking up the litany we go off to St. Nicholas, if the weather is clear, and to the Forerunner. There we turn around and begin vespers, without reciting the psalter. Then we enter for the complete liturgy. We can then have fish, oil, and wine.

[28.] [cf. (4) Stoudios [AB32]]: It should be known that in the middle week of Holy Lent the life-giving wood [of the cross] is presented on that Holy Sunday after matins, and we all do reverence. We do the same thing on Wednesday. The order of the common life of the community has already been discussed. Each individual has permission in accord with his own ability and enthusiasm to carry on his struggle with the aid of the words and the advice of his spiritual father and superior.

[29.] Also recall that in the first week of Holy and Great Lent the brothers are excused from their duties outside and are free to take part in the services in the church and in concentrating on themselves and in reading. They should not go out to their tasks outside unless there should be some necessity or unless the superior should command some of the brothers to go out. In like manner they should be excused during the week of Renovation, especially until that Wednesday. On the rest of the days of Holy Lent, when the signal for the first hour is given, those who are assigned should go out to their tasks, each to his own work. Those who are laboring in the vicinity of the monastery should assemble in the church at the doxology of the office of lamplighting and then go in to table. Those who have gone further away should come for compline.

[30.] When they are working, the metal workers, the muleteers, the shipwrights, and the carpenters should be given on the third hour [p. 139] bread and wine, up to two measures of wine, except on Monday, Wednesday, and Friday, for on those days we do not want anyone to drink wine unless they are infirm. Those who go out to perform the rest of the chores and who are unable to eat once a day should take some bread and eat it with water, not with wine. In the evening they may be served whatever happens to have been put aside at table. After Holy Lent has passed, the muleteers and metal workers are given bread and a measure of wine before the main meal each day, since they are engaged in heavy labor. The same applies to the carpenters and shipwrights when they are working. The workers in the vineyard shall also be given one measure, but only on the days when they are pruning the branches, and likewise for those who work in the bakery when they have kneading [to do]. All the rest should be content with the common fare.

[31.] The arrangements to be made for those faint of heart and weak persons are left entirely to the judgment of the superior. On Wednesday and Friday during the fast before Christ's Nativity wine should not be permitted except to the infirm, even though the superior may decide in favor of some receiving wine. On the remaining days of this fast, Monday, Tuesday, Thursday, when the brothers eat only one meal a day, then before the meal the metal workers, muleteers, carpenters, and shipwrights may be given two measures. When there is a memorial of a saint which frees us from reciting the hours, and meals are served twice, then the above-mentioned craftsmen receive an additional measure if they are laboring. If they happen to be without work, they too should be content with the diet of the community. For the brothers who are in ill health there is no fixed rule, but depending on the gravity of the illness of each we ought to give them proper care and encouragement.

TENTH CENTURY

[32.] It should be noted that we must not spend the days on which we are free from manual labor in idleness and laughter, but rather in prayer and reading, so that on feasts such as these we may receive enlightenment of soul and spiritual grace, and not condemnation.

[33.] Remember that it is an ancient tradition and precept of the holy fathers that the brothers ought to [p. 140] lay before the superior their thoughts and hidden deeds, and they should conform to whatever the superior determines.

[34.] No brother is allowed to possess any personal property and private funds or coins or currency without the approval and knowledge of the superior. This is absolutely forbidden by our holy fathers and by the great Basil.¹⁰ In the same way the holy fathers have judged that secretly leaving the monastery is utterly alien to the monastic promise. Nobody, therefore, is allowed to leave secretly. But if a person finds that his soul is not at ease in our Lavra, let him inform the superior of the reason. If the man appears to have good cause to seek a change, then the superior should transfer him to another spiritual director or make some other arrangements for his welfare. In this way his departure from the monastery will be accompanied by prayer and blessing, and will not be the sort that was forbidden, cursed, and condemned by the holy fathers.

[35.] [cf. (4) Stoudios [A37] and [B38]]: It should be known that each brother ought to have two undergarments, two outer garments, one woolen garment, one cowl, two monastic cloaks, a shorter one for work and another more copious one which according to custom must be used in church, a heavy cloak, shoes, boots, and his bed clothing.

[36.] At the gate of the monastery station a wise old monk, or if not an old one, at least a monk who knows with good sense how to reply to inquiries as well as to answer them. This gatekeeper ought to have a cell close to the gate, so the visitor will always find someone to answer his questions right away. He should also be there to prevent anyone from stealing from what belongs to the craftsmen and then going out the gate. Whoever commits such a theft of the goods, the products, and services of the monastery should undergo the death of Ananias and Sapphira (Acts 5: 1–11), who indeed underwent bodily death, whereas these will end up under a curse with the death of their souls.

[37.] In conclusion, I want all of these regulations which I have laid down to be read regularly in the assembly so that none of the brothers may be able to plead ignorance. May the Lord grant my request that, having received these rules with full confidence, you will produce worthy fruits of the spirit with the blessing of God and the cooperation of our Lord Jesus Christ, to whom be the glory together with the Father and the Holy Spirit forever and ever. Amen.

11. ATH. RULE

Notes on the Translation

1. “They” must refer to the waker (aphypnistes) and perhaps his assistants, for whom see Vita A, chap. 84, ed. Noret, Vitae duae, p. 39, Vita B, chap. 26, ed. Noret, p. 153, and below, [17]. These monks would be aroused by a signal or alarm in the water clock and would then awaken the others by banging with a mallet on a wooden semantron.
2. Ps. 3, 37 [38], 62 [63], 87 [88], 102 [103], 142 [143].
3. Lychnika, the first part of the office of vespers, when the lamps were lit, sometimes synonymous with vespers; see Lampe, PGL, p. 817.
4. Week of Renovation, name given to the week after Easter.
5. Sunday after Easter or “Low Sunday.”
6. Anastasima: troparia stressing the theme of the Resurrection.
7. Also known as the Christmas fast, which begins on the day after the feast of St. Philip (November 14).
8. The meaning of this passage is clarified by (4) Stoudios [38], where the word stichos refers to the “file” of monks entering the refectory.
9. The monastic prison does not seem to be a genuine Basilian institution; see Basil of Caesarea, Regulae brevius tractatae 44 ([SR 44]), PG 31, col. 1109D for his preferred method of punishment.
10. Basil of Caesarea, Regulae brevius tractatae 85 ([SR 85]), PG 31, col. 1144A; cf. his Regulae fusius tractatae 8 ([LR 8]), PG 31, cols. 933–41 and the patristic citations in E. Herman, “Die Regelung der Armut in den byzantinischen Klöstern,” OCP 7 (1941), 406–60, here 406–9.

Document Notes

- [1] Regulations for the Easter Service. The text appears to draw alternately on (4) Stoudios [AB2] and [B2], with a brief portion towards the end coming exclusively from [A2]. Most likely an intermediary Studite typikon has developed this particular synthesis. The references to the chapel of the Forty Saints (see also below, [26]) and the oratory on the right (of St. Nicholas, also in [27] below) reflect the topography of Lavra’s katholikon; see the site plan in Mylonas, “Catholicon,” p. 90. Mylonas, p. 96, believes that these references are interpolations or else an indication that this document was revised ca. 1020 at which time he believes that these chapels were added to the katholikon.
- [2] Regulation of hymnody for Easter week. Text shared with (4) Stoudios [AB2].
- [3] Liturgical prescriptions for Renovation Sunday services. Renovation Sunday is the first Sunday after Easter. This complex chapter has been formed (probably by an intermediary) utilizing parts of (4) Stoudios [A2], [AB2], [AB3], [B3], and [A4].
- [4] Regulation of hymnody for the rest of the year. This is another complex chapter formed out of (4) Stoudios [AB20], [B3], [AB5], and [B6].
- [5] Regulation of hymnody for feasts of the Lord. This is a new chapter not traceable to the edited versions of (4) Stoudios.
- [6] Special observances for Easter season and Pentecost. This chapter has been formed out of (4) Stoudios [A6], [B7], [AB7], and [B8]. The prohibition on singing canons for the dead on Saturdays (during Easter season) is at variance with (4) Stoudios [AB7].
- [7] Vesper service on Pentecost Sunday; liturgical prescriptions for the fasts of the Holy Apostles and of St. Philip. This chapter has been formed out of (4) Stoudios [B3] and [AB10]; other portions may be original to Athanasios or derived from an unknown version of the Studite typikon.
- [8] Timing of the liturgy and meals. The first portion of this chapter is identical to (4) Stoudios [AB27], except that the liturgy here starts at the fourth hour instead of at the sixth hour at Stoudios on those days free from the recitation of the hours.
- [9] Number of prostrations during performance of the hours. This chapter has only a minor textual link to (4) Stoudios [AB10]. Note the increase in the importance and number of prostrations.
- [10] Specifications for the vesper service. This is a new chapter not traceable to the edited versions of (4) Stoudios.

TENTH CENTURY

- [11] Timing of the morning office. This is another new chapter independent of the edited versions of (4) Stoudios; for the water clock, see also (4) Stoudios [2].
- [12] Hymnody at the morning office. This chapter utilizes part of (4) Stoudios [AB11].
- [13] Order of psalms at feasts of the Lord and those of the Mother of God. This chapter follows (4) Stoudios [AB13] closely, except for the addition here of the Virgin's feast of the Entrance into the Temple.
- [14] Daily routine for Lent. This is an apparently new chapter not traceable to the edited versions of (4) Stoudios.
- [15] Liturgical prescriptions for Lent. This chapter is derived from (4) Stoudios [B14] and [B15]; there is no parallel treatment in [A]. In the Studite tradition of [B], the regular performance of the hours and prostrations continues until Holy Saturday.
- [16] Lenten reminder of death. This chapter follows (4) Stoudios [AB23] closely; here a "prudent" brother substitutes as the messenger for the "elderly" monk found in the Studite tradition.
- [17] Officers of the monastery. This chapter makes considerable use of (4) Stoudios [AB18], but the author has adapted his source for his own needs, authorizing the use of punishments (cf. [19] below), adding a doorkeeper and making a reference to the cells (kellia), places of service, i.e., workshops (diakoniai), etc. that were particular to Lavra. There is also a discussion of the officers of the monastery in Vita A, chap. 84, ed. Noret, Vitae duae, pp. 39–40, and Vita B, chap. 26, pp. 153–54.
- [18] Testing of novices. This chapter follows (4) Stoudios [AB24] closely, but the superior is obliged to repeat his synopsis of the novices' obligations as monks. For the sensitive topic of the treatment of monks tonsured in other monasteries, see Vita A, chap. 89, ed. Noret, Vitae duae, pp. 41–42, Vita B, chap. 29, ed. Noret, p. 159, and (13) Ath. Typikon [22] through [29].
- [19] Place of confinement. This provision is adopted from (4) Stoudios [AB25] but attributed to Basil of Caesarea. The failure to include the Studite ban on corporal punishment, like the new provision for expulsion, may be significant.
- [20] Use of staffs and footstools in church prohibited. A new chapter; compare to the rigorist attitude found much later in (36) Blemmydes [13]; (22) Evergetis [4] and related documents, however, permit the use of footstools.
- [21] Refectory procedures. This chapter is based on (4) Stoudios [AB28] with substantial additions. See also the description of refectory procedures in Vita A, chaps. 86–87, ed. Noret, Vitae duae, pp. 40–41, and Vita B, chap. 29, ed. Noret, pp. 157–59. The references to a single narthex (only) here and below in [26] have implications for dating architectural features of Lavra's katholikon; see Mylonas, "Catholicon," p. 95. The specification that the ecclesiarch is to perform the reading is not found in the Studite Rule.
- [22] Diet from Easter to the feast of All Saints (first Sunday after Pentecost). This chapter is based on (4) Stoudios [AB29], with the addition of concessionary supplements to the diet on feasts of the Lord occurring during the Easter season.
- [23] Diet for the fast of the Holy Apostles. This chapter makes a very slight use of (4) Stoudios [AB29] but the diet is prescribed more succinctly and may be less strict than in the Studite tradition.
- [24] Dietary regulations for the fast of St. Philip and for the Christmas season. This mostly new chapter makes some minor use of (4) Stoudios [B29] and [AB29].
- [25] Diet for the Lenten fast. This chapter is based closely on [AB30], with a brief quotation found only in [A30]. The Athanasian regulation here follows [B30] in requiring that the strict fast of the first week of Lent be observed again during the fourth week.
- [26] Special Lenten regulations; diet for Holy Week. This is a chapter of complex derivation, employing (4) Stoudios [A30], then [B30], and then [AB30]; considered with [1], [3], and [4] above, this suggests Athanasios' reliance on some intermediary Studite typikon for the drafting of this document rather than a direct use of either or both of the versions on which our printed editions are based. The dietary concession for the feast of the Forty Saints (Martyrs), on March 9, which was to be only a minor feast in (20) Black Mountain [89], must have been in honor of the dedicatees of the north side chapel of Lavra's katholikon.

11. ATH. RULE

- [27] Procession before vespers and the liturgy. This is a new chapter, specific to Lavra. The reference to St. Nicholas is to the south side chapel of Lavra's katholikon or perhaps, as implied here, some predecessor structure detached from the main church; the other topographical reference is to the free-standing oratory of St. John [the Baptist] the Forerunner, mentioned in Vita A, chap. 73, ed. Noret, Vitae duae, p. 35, and Vita B, chap. 23, ed. Noret, p. 149, as having been built by Athanasios at the instructions of Nikephoros Phokas; cf. Mylonas, "Catholicon," p. 103.
- [28] Veneration of the Holy Cross; permission for individual ascetic observances. The first part of this chapter is derived from (4) Stoudios [AB32], the penultimate Studite quotation in this document, after which (except for [35] below) the remaining materials appear to be original to Athanasios. His cross-reference to an earlier discussion of the common life probably refers to preceding treatment of dietary observances, beginning with [21]. (13) Ath. Typikon [38] is more critical of self-imposed ascetic observances, while in the late eleventh century, (20) Black Mountain [72] was to encourage and (23) Pakourianos [15] was to discourage them.
- [29] Suspension of outside work during first week of Lent and Easter week. For a contemporary example of the practice of seclusion during all of Lent, see (7) Latros [6]. Note the differentiation among laborers who report back at different times depending on the distance of their worksites from the monastery.
- [30] Special arrangements for feeding laborers; dietary concessions for same. In (43) Kasoulon [19], monks absent on assignments have a share of food saved for them until their return, while [25] allows that monastery's fishermen to eat fish, use oil, and drink wine during Lent, a concession that apparently was later withdrawn.
- [31] Dietary concessions for the sick; additional concessions for laborers. See (22) Evergetis [33], some comparable laborers in another monastic community.
- [32] Prayer and reading on feast days. This is a new chapter, but it is analogous to (4) Stoudios [AB26] without the latter's provisions for a lending library and a structured time for reading.
- [33] Confession to the superior. Again, this is a new chapter, but analogous to (4) Stoudios [22]. The focus here, however, is on obligatory confession, which is taken up later by (22) Evergetis [7], [15] and related documents of the monastic reform movement.
- [34] Prohibition of personal property; procedures for leaving the monastery. The former was to be one of the principles of the militantly cenobitic monastic reform movement: see (22) Evergetis [22] and related documents. For the condemnation of unauthorized departures, see Basil of Caesarea, Regulae fusius tractatae 14 ([LR 14]), PG 31, cols. 949–52, along with the references to canonical legislation on this subject in E. Herman, "La 'Stabilitas loci' nel monachesimo bizantino," OCP 21 (1955), 115–42.
- [35] Regulation of clothing. This chapter is a condensation of the analogous Studite regulations, (4) Stoudios [A37] and [B38], providing for essentially the same items of clothing. For some later descriptions of monastic clothing, see (22) Evergetis [25], (28) Pantokrator [22], (31) Areia [T4], (32) Mamas [28], and (33) Heliou Bomon [28].
- [36] Gatekeeper and his responsibilities. Provision for a gatekeeper. See description of this officer's responsibilities in (27) Kecharitomene [29], (32) Mamas [12], (33) Heliou Bomon [12]. The focus of responsibilities here on prevention of theft is unprecedented elsewhere in the documents in our collection. Leroy, "S. Benoît," pp. 117–19, believed that this chapter contains unattributed quotations from the Rule of St. Benedict; cf. Regula monasteriorum, chaps. 57, 66, ed. Cuthbert Butler (Downside, 1912), pp. 99, 116.
- [37] Reading of the rules in assembly. Seen here for the first time, this was to become a very popular custom as monastic typika became institutionalized in Byzantine monasteries, though usually in the context of a seasonal recitation at mealtime. See (22) Evergetis [43], (27) Kecharitomene [65], (29) Kosmosoteira [59], (30) Phoberos [59], (32) Mamas [16], (33) Heliou Bomon [16], etc. Leroy, "S. Benoît," pp. 117–19, believed that this chapter contains an unattributed quotation from the Rule of St. Benedict; cf. Regula monasteriorum, chap. 66, ed. Butler, p. 117.

12. Tzimiskes: Typikon of Emperor John Tzimiskes

Date: 971–72¹

Translator: George Dennis

Edition employed: Denise Papachryssanthou, Actes du Prôtaton (= Archives de l’Athos 7) (Paris, 1975), pp. 202–15, with text at 209–15.

Manuscript: Original charter preserved in the archives of the Protaton monastery (Karyes)²

Other translations: Russian, by Porfirii Uspensky, Vostok kristianskii. Athon. Istoriiia Athona, vol. 3, pt. 1 (Kiev, 1877), pp. 81–89.

Analysis

This document, known also as the Tragos or “billy goat” in allusion to the parchment on which it was written, is more a juridical document than a traditional typikon. A bitter rivalry between Athanasios the Athonite and his fellow monks of Mount Athos led to an appeal by the latter to Emperor John Tzimiskes (969–976), probably soon after the emperor’s accession.³ Surely it was on his own initiative that the emperor sent Euthymios, the superior of the Stoudios monastery, to investigate the problems and restore peace to Mount Athos. The Athanasian hagiographic tradition, however, represents the imperial inquest as having taken place at the request of Athanasios in contradiction to the account in the preface of the present document. Unlikely as this is, there are some grounds for suspecting that Athanasios either influenced the choice of the imperial arbitrator or at any rate had reason to be pleased that Euthymios was selected. The conflict between Lavra’s cenobitic form of monasticism and the alternatives popular elsewhere on Mount Athos was at the root of many of the difficulties, and so it was to Athanasios’ advantage that a superior of one of the empire’s most famous cenobitic monasteries, and one from which his own (11) Ath. Rule was derived, had been chosen for this assignment. Moreover, on another occasion Euthymios is reported to have joined with Athanasios and the latter’s collaborator John the Iberian in an unsuccessful appeal to John Tzimiskes to donate the imperial monastery of Kolobou near Hierissos to Lavra.⁴ However, it does not necessarily follow from the likelihood that Euthymios was a mediator friendly to Athanasios that he was sent to impose cenobiticism on Athos. Rather, a close reading of the present document will show, as Papachryssanthou (Prôtaton, p. 100) has demonstrated, that Euthymios endeavored to preserve the interests of each of the three important forms of monastic life on Mount Athos, not only the large cenobitic monasteries but also the small independent (kelliotic) groups and the solitary hermits, though without enduring success.

Perhaps the most salient feature of this document is the evidence of widespread commercial activity not only among the various Athonite communities themselves but even with the outside world. The biased Athanasian hagiographic tradition nevertheless acknowledges that Lavra’s aggressive pursuit of agricultural enterprise under Athanasios’ direction was especially offensive to Athos’ other ascetics who were accustomed to a quieter, more traditional way of life. Later,

12. TZIMISKES

Athanasios himself would find it prudent in (13) Ath. Rule [10] to denounce outside commercial activity as “dishonorable” and even to censure [11] other Athonites for their purchases and development of fields and vineyards. In this document, commercial activity such as Athanasios himself is said to have practiced, despite his later disavowals, seems to flourish. The attempts [13], [15], [24] to restrict it are tentative and riddled with exceptions, a pattern that would be repeated in the eleventh century with (15) Constantine IX. Also, the indulgent standards of traditional private religious foundations prevailed with respect to the bequeathing, donation, transfer and outright sale of monastic cells and associated properties [2], [6], [7], requiring a provision for restricting outright speculative activity [13] and other regulations to discourage monks [8] wandering about without subordination to a superior or unknown priests [11] celebrating the liturgy without written authorization from their bishops. These latter provisions are typical of official attempts (usually futile) to curb abuses endemic in the traditional, free-wheeling private-enterprise approach to the ownership of Byzantine religious foundations.⁵ Indeed the assertion [6] that a superior was free to sell, donate or transfer his land “to any person he wishes” recalls a similar claim made by the author of (1) Apa Abraham [4] in seventh-century Byzantine Egypt.

Along with the other superiors of Athos, Athanasios attended the assembly which led to the drafting of this document and placed his signature on it immediately after those of the emperor himself and Athanasios the protos, the head of the Athonite community. The impact of this document on Lavriot monasticism and vice-versa is hard to determine. A few years later Athanasios of Lavra would incorporate in his own (13) Ath. Typikon some of the customs and usages agreed upon here, including the year’s probation [3] for candidates for tonsure, the requirement [10] that monks seek permission before becoming solitaries, and the bans on spiritual relationships with laymen [14], on tonsuring youths or eunuchs [16], cf. [25], and on importation of livestock [22], cf. [23]. Some of the provisions for observing the Lenten fast [12] seem to be derived from the earlier Studite tradition while others are shared with (13) Ath. Typikon [29]. It is taken for granted in (12) Tzimiskes that the Athonite superiors (even Athanasios) should have personal servants, despite the explicit condemnation of (13) Ath. Typikon [34] and the Studite tradition. Likewise, this document assumes that monks will retain personal financial resources and even draw cash incomes from their monasteries [18], [19], [27] despite the weight of the Athanasian and Studite traditions to the contrary. Athanasios’ disposition to restrict the practice of non-cenobitic monasticism in his community by banning the erection of new kellia in (13) Ath. Typikon [45], [53], cf. [44] did not sway his colleagues in the assembly that drew up this document, who were more concerned to uphold the property rights [18] of those kelliotic monks who continued to build them. There is also no evidence from this document to suggest that Athanasios’ pioneering attempt to establish institutional autonomy for his own foundation under the patronage of the previous emperor Nikephoros Phokas (for which see (13) Ath. Typikon [12]) had inspired imitators among the other monasteries on Mount Athos.

Yet as Papachryssanthou (Prôtaton, p. 101) has noted, what was left unsaid in this document was perhaps as important as, or more so than, what its terms in fact provide. Most important of all for Athanasios, either before or after Euthymios’ arrival he managed to prevent his opponents the protos Athanasios and Paul Xeropotamites from securing his expulsion from Mount Athos. The failure to restrict economic activities such as sale of monasteries and landed properties, even if, as seems likely, their preservation was desired by the kelliotic and solitary monks, ultimately doomed their way of life on Athos since Lavra and the other large monasteries with vast resources remained free to expand at their neighbors' expense.

Notes on the Introduction

1. The document is undated; the proposed dating here follows Papachryssanthou, Prôtaton, p. 207, after Dölger, "Echtheit," p. 346, and Lemerle, Lavra, pt. 1, p. 22; cf. Anastasiević, "Date," p. 11, who argued for 970.
2. The document is preserved on very thick rolled parchment in a sealed chest in the Protaton monastery at Karyes. It is the oldest original charter on Mount Athos and the oldest document bearing an autograph signature of an emperor. See discussion in Lemerle, Lavra, pt. 1, p. 22, and Papachryssanthou, Prôtaton, pp. 202–4, with illustrations in the Album, pls. XI–XIX.
3. For the background to the Tragos affair, see Vita A, chaps. 114–23, ed., J. Noret, Vitae duae antiquae Sancti Athanasii Athonitae (Louvain), 1982), pp. 54–58, and Vita B, chap. 36, ed., Noret, pp. 168–69; with discussion by Lemerle, Lavra, pt. 1, pp. 39–41, and "La vie ancienne de saint Athanase l'Athonite composée au debut du XI^e siècle par Athanase de Lavra," in Le millénaire du Mont Athos, 963–1963, vol. 1 (Chevetogne, 1963), pp. 79–80, and by Papachryssanthou, Prôtaton, pp. 95–102.
4. See Papachryssanthou, Prôtaton, p. 98, with n. 34.
5. See my Private Religious Foundations in the Byzantine Empire (Washington, D.C., 1987), pp. 111–15, 125–27, 133–6.

Bibliography

- Anastasiević, D. "La date du typicon de Tzimisès pour le Mont Athos," Byzantion 4 (1927–28), 7–11.
- Beck, Hans-Georg, Kirche und theologische Literatur im byzantinischen Reich (Munich, 1959), p. 589.
- Darrouzès, Jean, "Liste des prôtes de l'Athos," in Le millénaire du Mont Athos, 963–1963, vol. 1 (Chevetogne, 1963), pp. 407–47.
- Decarreux, J., "Du monachisme primitif au monachisme athonite," in Le millénaire du Mont Athos, 963–1963, vol. 1 (Chevetogne, 1963), pp. 19–54.
- Dölger, Franz, "Die Echtheit des Tragos," BZ 41 (1941), 340–50.
- , Die Regesten der Kaiserurkunden des oströmischen Reiches, vol. 1 (Munich, 1924), no. 745.
- Kazhdan, Alexander, "Protos," ODB, pp. 1746–47.
- Lake, Kirsopp, The Early Days of Monasticism on Mount Athos (Oxford, 1909).
- Lemerle, Paul, et al., Actes de Lavra, pt. 1: Des origines à 1204 (= Archives de l'Athos 5) (Paris, 1970), pp. 22–24, 39–41.
- Papachryssanthou, Denise, Actes du Prôtaton (= Archives de l'Athos 7) (Paris, 1975), pp. 95–103.
- Talbot, Alice-Mary, "Athos, Mount," ODB, pp. 224–29.
- , "Tragos," ODB, p. 2103.
- Volk, Robert, Gesundheitswesen und Wohltätigkeit im Spiegel der byzantinischen Klostertypika (Munich, 1983), p. 71.

12. TZIMISKES

Translation

[Preface]

The reverend monks of the renowned Mount Athos, Athanasios the reverend monk and protos of the Mountain, and the reverend monk Paul, have presented themselves in the God-guarded city before our benevolent emperor.¹ For some time now, they explained, certain problems and disputes had arisen between them and the reverend monk Athanasios, superior of the imperial lavra called Ta Melana. The result was that several monks were injured and unjustly treated by him. They reported that they could find no way of solving the problem and no way of guaranteeing peace among them. Our mighty emperor, crowned by God, living by his laws and guarded by righteousness, places great importance on the monks, more than anyone else, being at peace and leading undisturbed and tranquil lives. He is, moreover, reluctant to have them brought before a secular tribunal, or to have their affairs investigated by civil officials and their charges against one another brought before the general public. Laymen, in addition, have no real understanding of monastic life. As the behavior of monks is different, so the charges are different. The charges which might be brought against them differ from the accusations and the judgments likely to be made against laymen. As a result, the emperor ordered our humble selves to betake ourselves to the place, and bring both sides together, and listen attentively to the charges brought by them. We were then to concentrate on straightening out matters properly according to the dictates of the holy canons.

We did indeed betake ourselves there, and both parties in the dispute also presented themselves. All the superiors of the Mountain sat together with us in council, while the entire assemblage of the brothers was also in attendance.² For an entire week the dispute was aired and very thoroughly investigated. Once we succeeded in acquiring a deeply spiritual understanding of the matter, it was found that both parties were absolutely guiltless, strange as this may sound. The dispute which had arisen between them was recognized as having been caused by the activity of Satan. The result was that, by God's graceful assistance, they merited the reward of a profound and unshakable peace, with all points of controversy resolved.

While engaged in this, we discovered that several other matters stood in need of correction, and we did our best to rectify them carefully in accord with the holy canons. We also found that some other monks were quarreling and making accusations against one another. We arranged to bring them to a settlement and establish peace. Closer study of the situation revealed that it was the assemblies which provided the occasion for some problems, quarrels, and seeds of discord. Now, we knew that those who had conceived of these assemblies had intended them to be beneficial and supportive for the brothers, but it turned out that they were having the opposite effect. We, therefore, all the reverend monks and superiors, whose names and signatures are given at the conclusion of this typikon, meeting in council, have by common consent, demand, and will determined and ordained that the two assemblies, the one at Easter and the one at the holy Nativity of Christ, are to be discontinued. Instead, the brothers are to gather and hold their assembly just once a year on the venerable feast of the immaculate Bearer of God and Mother of God.³ [p. 210] The allowance should also be kept until that day.⁴ We also lay down that on the assigned feast, the protos should come with only three disciples, the reverend Athanasios, superior of the Great Lavra, with two, and the monk Paul with one. The rest of the superiors, kelliotai, and solitaries should all come to the assembly without any servants, since we have discovered that it is the servants who generally cause the disorder and strife. As best we could, so we believe, we have devised a remedy which should aid both parties among the monks in being concerned about reverence and devotion. A peaceful situation should prevail in all respects and keep them from splitting into factions or separate groups and from becoming a scandal to laymen in the future, and especially from disturbing the sacred ears of our devout and mighty emperor. Now if, as time goes by, with the graceful assistance of God, the situation improves to such an extent that everyone agrees that they want to hold a second assembly, we rejoice and are very pleased at this. All we request is for them to inform us in writing, so that nothing will slip by which might weaken any prescription of the typikon. We, therefore, instruct them to observe these norms which have been approved by the prudent judgment of all the superiors on Mount Athos and which, I am sure, will be acknowledged as pleasing to God and acceptable to our virtuous emperor as befitting the ascetical life.

TENTH CENTURY

[1.] We have, in addition, determined that in case anything should occur which needs to be corrected, either in the community or individually regarding one of the brothers, no one of the superiors has permission to make direct inquiries about such a failing, or to correct it, or to censure or condemn the offender without the knowledge of the protos. On the other hand, without meeting with the superiors of the Mountain, and without their consent and advice, the protos does not have authority to do anything with which they disagree, even if it should seem particularly beneficial to the common good or to some individual person.

[2.] Concerning monks who have been tonsured in other monasteries, then left them and come to this venerable Mountain and been deemed worthy of reception, we order and we desire that they should not have the authority to purchase fields or to take possession of unclaimed places on their own initiative and will. They are not to direct a kellion without obtaining the approval and permission of the protos and the superiors.

[3.] All who come to you and promise to receive the monastic tonsure ought to be received by each one of the superiors. By no means should they be permitted outside the spiritual enclosure. They should not be tonsured right away, but should observe the ecclesiastical canon⁵ by devoting one year to being trained in the monastic way of life. They should give evidence that their resolve is firm and unshakable. When they show that such is the case, then, the superior may judge that they be clothed in the monastic habit. But if someone comes out of urgency or for some other reason, for whom it is not possible to wait out the year, and he requests to be enrolled immediately, we should leave this to the judgment of the superior. We suggest that the same consideration be granted to someone who is anxious to be tonsured and be garbed with the monastic habit because of some infirmity, fearful that death may intervene, and he may depart this life before he completes the assigned time we have stipulated.

[4.] A layman who has come to one of the superiors and stays with him for six months or an entire year, but who becomes dissatisfied with the superior's direction for certain causes and has good reason to claim that he has not been helped by him, may give himself to another spiritual director, whomsoever he might select, provided that other persons testify that this new director is irreproachable and capable of helping souls. [p. 211] He should not be allowed to go off to him without the consent, knowledge, and blessing of the first director, but he must present himself to whomever he has chosen with the advice and knowledge of the former.

12. TZIMISKES

[5.] If a monk has cause to be dissatisfied by his association with his superior for certain reasons which could be harmful to his soul, even though he may have received the monastic habit from him, he can nonetheless find another superior and with the knowledge, advice and permission of his previous father present himself to him. We recommend that it should not be permitted for any superior to receive the disciple of another superior without that person's knowledge. But if anyone is detected making a captive of such a disciple, he should not be entrusted with the disciple.

[6.] If one of the superiors should choose to sell, donate, or otherwise transmit his own plot of land to any person he wishes, either while he is still alive or to have such disposition of his possessions made after he has departed this life, we consent that he be permitted to exercise his ownership and authority with full freedom, and he is not to be restricted. If he should wish to transmit the ownership and possession of such a plot of land to his disciple, he is allowed to do this also, and he should not be hindered by anyone.

[7.] If, when he is close to death, one of the superiors on the Mountain shall leave his land to one of the administrators, so it will be well and properly managed and administered, no one of them may be allowed to have the authority to annex the dead man's land either to the Great Lavra, or to any other, or to someone else's land or to his own. He may, however, sell or donate it to a worthy and devout person if it turns out that that person has no other land. In like manner, from the present time on, these same regulations should be observed in the case of lands given to someone by charistike.

[8.] All those who withdraw from their own superiors and who do not choose to settle under the obedience of a father in accord with the typikon published by us, but who prefer to wander in a bold and undisciplined way around the whole Mountain, and to offer their services for hire, these should be warned once, twice, and more often. If they refuse to obey the men giving them such salutary advice, they should, even though unwilling, be handed over to spiritual fathers.

[9.] In accord with the ancient decrees of the holy fathers, we insist and we sternly declare that no one is to be allowed to ridicule or publicly expose the thoughts and confessions of anyone. If a person should be caught doing this, no matter who he may be, let him be subject to the canonical punishments.

[10.] Those subjects who have sufficiently advanced in spirituality and asceticism by the practice of virtue, and whose superiors deem capable of stripping to enter the stadium of solitude, we too permit and agree that they may dwell apart by themselves to practice asceticism according to the pleasure and judgment of their superiors.

TENTH CENTURY

[11.] Regarding unknown priests coming here, we must insist that they do not have authority, either privately or publicly, to presume to celebrate the divine liturgy, unless they have an official letter from their bishops or some solid testimony in their favor.

[12.] We also make this recommendation. During the period of Holy Lent, all the solitary ascetics and those living in community should spend the time in silence, and they should not visit one another except for a good reason, an emergency, or to seek treatment for evil and shameful thoughts. None of the superiors, moreover, should busy himself with any work during these holy days, except on Saturday, or anything else unless it is related to spiritual matters. In addition, you may not partake of fish at all on these holy days, [p. 212] except on the revered feast of the Annunciation⁶ of the very holy Mother of God and in case of some infirmity.

[13.] Concerning monks who possess fields and sell them, then purchase others in turn, and sell them again for the sake of profit and shameful gain, and who do not cease engaging in mercenary pursuits, we command that they be made to refrain completely from any such business so harmful to their souls or that they be simply expelled from the Mountain, that is, if after one or two admonitions they have not reformed or turned from their wicked ways.

[14.] No one of the brothers is to be allowed to leave the mountain to form a bond of spiritual relationship or adoptive brotherhood with laymen. If some of them have already concluded a bond of this sort for themselves, they must still not go off to their houses or have lunch or dinner with them or join them at all in drinking.

[15.] Since you clearly wanted instructions on what you have to do in this matter, by common consent we lay down this regulation concerning wine. We do not permit anyone to dare to sell wine to laymen from the Zygos river in towards the Mountain. This allows outsiders to spend too much time with the monks and fill them with worldly corruption. If, however, anyone has more of a vintage than he needs, let him sell it to monks, and from the buyers let him receive what he does not have in return. For some of the monks on the Mountain lack necessities. Everyone does not have everything. If some laymen should happen to frequent the Mountain with some supplies which are lacking there, then in that case, because of the unavoidable shortage, it is allowed to give them wine in exchange.

[16.] We must strictly enjoin that boys, beardless youths, and eunuchs who journey to the Mountain to be tonsured should not be received at all. But in case it cannot be avoided, and the situation becomes urgent, we order that nothing should be done, and nobody should be admitted or tonsured unless the protos and all the superiors of the Mountain have investigated the case and freely consent. But if one of the superiors or kelliotai out of contempt for these stipulations should introduce into his field or cell a eunuch or a child, and after being denounced for this once and then twice, and should give no evidence of changing his ways, then we consider it best simply to drive him away from the Mountain.

12. TZIMISKES

[17.] Any brothers who happen to lack an education but who are proficient in spirituality and who have become superiors should have permission to tonsure candidates who come to them just as the rest of the superiors, and they should not be hindered. Nonetheless, we order that those who are superiors because they seized this office first, but who are not really capable of directing themselves, should be assigned to spiritual fathers and reap some benefit from them by confessing their thoughts.

[18.] If anyone enters upon obedience to one of the superiors or comes to him from another, and should construct a cell with his consent and approval, but then instead of remaining there wants to get up and leave without his superior causing him any trouble, let him take half of what he spent for the cell. But if he wants to move away because the superior has been harassing him, we enjoin that he should take the entire amount of his expenses and so leave. We decree the same regarding fields and vineyards.

[19.] If a monk comes and agrees to work for one of the superiors for a year, but before the designated time is up neglects his duty and departs, let him be allowed to take the payment for his work with him. But if the superior acts wickedly and, after the monk had served him [p. 213] for a period of four or six months, he should try to harm the brother by chasing him away without pay, we order that he should receive the entire amount of his salary. But if the one who is wickedly depriving him should become obstinate and not pay the salary to the worker, he should be accused before the elders. Without delay let them demand the full amount of the salary from him, and let it be given to his accuser. In like manner, if a person entering upon a period of obedience and service without a contract, but who is chased away by the superior or harassed by him, gets up and leaves, we order that he should receive the full amount of his allowance from the superior.

[20.] We think it fitting to put an end to the so called “forced labor” imposed upon the kelliotai by the superiors. For these are indications of worldly, not monastic, life. But if someone, without being forced, freely chooses to come and help another, this lies in his power.

[21.] We order that the steward⁷ entrusted with the supervision of the Mese⁸ should have the authority to expel from the Mese those whom he might discover stirring up scandals or contention. If they happen to sow discord, and the steward does not take the proper steps to correct it, then the fault is his. If some compelling business causes him to be absent from the Mountain, he should leave in his place a competent man, superior to the others, who can guide the monks along the path of peace. But if some scandal occurs outside the Mese on the Mountain, then we order that the steward should take along with him three or four superiors from the vicinity of the place in which the scandal occurred and after careful examination apply a fitting solution to the problem.

[22.] Some years ago because of the incursion by foreign peoples the animals of the great monastery found their way to the Mountain with the knowledge of the monks of the Great Lavra. While that may be true, we order that it should not happen again, apart from necessity or another foreign incursion. This same rule must also be observed by the rest of the superiors, so that no individual may bring them in on his own authority. Regarding those animals which habitually come onto the Mountain, we leave any decision about them up to the council of the elders who may choose to prohibit them from being led here or not.

TENTH CENTURY

[23.] We decree that none of the superiors should have yokes of animals. The only exception is the Great Lavra, which may have one yoke because it is needed, and because of the large number of monks there, and because without such a yoke it would be impossible for the Lavra to function.

[24.] Regarding firewood which has been cut on the Mountain by the monks, we desire that it not be transported and sold outside, but that it be sold on the Mountain. In an emergency, though, let it be sold to laymen.

[25.] Concerning construction workers who come here, it is our view that they should not bring boys along to work with them as assistants or apprentices.

[26.] Regarding the appointment of the steward, we order that during the assembly on the revered feast of the Dormition of the very holy Mother of God he should give an account of the stewardship entrusted to him. If it is found that he has carried it out well, and if the protos and all the superiors are pleased with him, let him continue undisturbed in his service. But if they are not pleased, then we allow them to take that responsibility away from him and pass it on to another.

[27.] With the suppression of the two assemblies there is bound to be a surplus of the funds which were supposed to be paid out for the comfort of the elders. These should be added to the allowance and distributed to the monks. [p. 214]

[28.] Regarding the appointment of the protos we prefer that the ancient rule which has been followed from the beginning be maintained firmly and without change.

We are convinced that it is to the advantage of all the superiors and monks of the Mountain to adhere to all the regulations laid down here and that nobody should dare attempt to overturn any of the chapters in this typikon. But, if anyone should be detected holding these matters in contempt which were regulated and decreed not merely by our own initiative and authority, but by the common intent of all, let him be subject to the penalties of the holy canons, inasmuch as he has trampled on his own conscience and become a source of scandal and very great harm to everyone. These matters have been decreed and stipulated with the common intent and accord of all the reverend superiors of Athos by Euthymios, monk of the most holy monastery of Stoudios. Moreover, so they might be more perfect, secure, firm, solid, and lasting, they were referred to the judgment and review of our virtuous, mighty peace-making emperor John. For we had been ordered by the living voice of his unconquered, mighty majesty and, according to the esteemed, holy command of the sacred imperial letters which we received, we were assigned the mission of conducting a detailed investigation, of resolving all disagreement, of establishing peace, and of issuing regulations on all these matters. These have been accepted as canonically valid and confirmed by the imperial seal.

12. TZIMISKES

- + John in Christ our God faithful emperor of the Romans
- + Athanasios, monk and protos
- + Athanasios, monk and superior of the Great Lavra
- + Christodoulos, monk and superior of the Protaton
- + Iakobos, monk, priest, and superior
- + Thomas, monk, priest, and superior
- + John, monk and priest
- + Kallinikos, monk, priest, and superior
- + Anthimos, monk and superior
- + Elias, monk, priest, and superior
- + Arsenios, monk and superior
- + Daniel, monk and superior
- + John, monk and superior
- + Antony, monk and superior
- + Theodosios, monk and superior
- + Andrew, monk and superior
- + Dionysios, monk, priest, and superior
- + Kosmas, monk and superior
- + Thomas, monk and superior
- + Hilarion, monk and superior
- + George, the painter
- + Methodios, monk and superior
- + Nikephoros, monk and superior
- + Theodoulos, blind monk and superior [p. 215]
- + Euthymios, monk and superior
- + Zacharias, monk and superior
- + Michael, monk and superior
- + George, monk and superior
- + Michael, priest and superior
- + Luke, monk and steward
- + Nikodemos, monk and superior
- + John, monk and superior
- + Luke, monk +
Ignatios, monk
- + Stephen, monk +
Paul, monk and priest +
Andrew, monk and superior
- + Arsenios, monk and superior
- + Gabriel, monk and superior

TENTH CENTURY

- + Damian, monk and superior +
- + Nikephoros, monk and superior
- + Basil, monk and superior
- + Basil, monk and superior + Symeon, monk and superior
- + Mark, monk, priest, and superior
- + Kosmas, monk and ecclesiarch
- + Theophilos, monk and superior
- + Nicholas, monk and superior, the calligrapher
- + Sergios, monk and superior
- + Kosmas, monk and superior
- + Kosmas, monk and superior of Theoktistos
- + Demetrios, monk and superior
- + Lazarus, monk and superior
- + Symeon, monk and superior
- + Antony, monk and superior
- + Theodoulos, monk and superior
- + Nikephoros, monk and priest
- + Sabas, monk and superior and *koubouklesios*⁹ +

Notes on the Translation

1. For the protos Athanasios, the third known incumbent of this office, see Papachryssanthou, Prôtaton, p. 130; for his office, see pp. 123–29; for Paul Xeropotamites, see pp. 66–68.
2. For the Athonite council and assembly, see Papachryssanthou, Prôtaton, pp. 115–21.
3. This is the feast of the Dormition, August 15 (see [26] below).
4. The roga, the annual pension from the emperor first granted by Romanos I Lekapenos; see Papachryssanthou, Prôtaton, pp. 54, 122.
5. Cf. NJ 5.2, which provides for a three-year novitiate.
6. March 25.
7. For the office of the steward, see Papachryssanthou, Prôtaton, pp. 151–55; the incumbent was the monk Luke, who signs this document.
8. Mese is used here as a synonym for Karyes, i.e. the Protaton monastery; see Papachryssanthou, Prôtaton, p. 152.
9. Title born by patriarchal chamberlains; cf. Darrouzès, Οφφικια, pp. 39–44. As Papachryssanthou notes (Prôtaton, 207–8), it is not clear whether Sabas held this title before arriving at Mt. Athos or this office existed at the Prôtaton in the 10th c.

Document Notes

- [1] Rights of the protos and the superiors. There was to be a more extensive development of this topic in (15) Constantine IX [14].
- [2] Permission of the protos and a superior needed for non-Athonite monks to direct a kellion. See also [18] below and the discussion by Papachryssanthou, Prôtaton, p. 101. In (15) Constantine IX [11], the protos was forbidden to make grants of common land.
- [3] Novitiate of one year. (13) Ath. Typikon [50] provides similarly, but like later documents, e.g., (22) Evergetis [37], makes an exception for those who are “pious and well known.”

12. TZIMISKES

- [4] Postulants may change spiritual directors. See also below [5], [8], and [18].
- [5] Previous superior's permission required to transfer to another monastery. See also above [4], and below [8], [18]; reaffirmed by (15) Constantine IX [7].
- [6] Superiors allowed to sell, donate or bequeath personal property freely. Cf. (1) Apa Abraham [4] and (41) Docheiariou [5]. These rights were later restricted in (15) Constantine IX [9].
- [7] Regulation of personal property of superiors held in trust by administrators. The intent is to prevent Lavra from annexing other monastic foundations upon the deaths of their owners. The mention of the charistike could be 1) a generic "act of donation," as in an act of Emperor Leo VI dated to 908, ed. Papachryssanthou, Prôtaton, doc. 2, pp. 181–85, at 184, line 12, 2) an early example of the infamous public management program of that name for ecclesiastical foundations developed later in the tenth century, or 3) a synonym for epidosis, a similar but older public management program for transferring control of a religious foundation from one ecclesiastical authority to another, under which Lavra received the monastery of St. Andrew of Peristerai from Nikephoros Phokas in 964 (see the Athanasian Vita A, chap. 103, ed., Noret, Vitae duae, p. 50, and Vita B, chap. 34, ed. Noret, p. 166).
- [8] Monks not to allowed to wander without supervision. The cross-reference is to the regulations in [3] ff.
- [10] Solitaries permitted. See also [18], [20] below. A system like that in (13) Ath. Typikon [40], cf. [42] is envisioned, in which the superior advances to solitary status a select number of cenobitic monks; see the discussion of the status of solitaries in Papachryssanthou, Prôtaton, p. 101.
- [11] Unknown priests not to celebrate liturgy without written authorization from a bishop. For the problem of migratory clerics, see Private Religious Foundations, pp. 111–15.
- [12] Lenten observances. Cf. similar provisions for seclusion in (7) Latros [6] and (13) Ath. Rule [29]; the exception for the feast of the Annunciation is found in (4) Stoudios [AB31] but not in (13) Ath. Rule.
- [13] Monks not to engage in real estate speculation or other mercenary pursuits. Cf. the critical comments of Athanasios in (13) Ath. Typikon [10], [11] as well as the Athonite critique of Athanasios himself in Vita A, chap. 114, ed. Noret, Vitae duae, pp. 54–55 and Vita B, chap. 36, pp. 168–69.
- [14] No spiritual relationships or adoptive brotherhoods with laymen. Utilized later by (59) Manuel II [10]. These are also forbidden by (3) Theodore Studites [8], which is in turn quoted without attribution in (13) Ath. Typikon [32].
- [15] No sales of wine to laymen. Note Athanasios' attempt to limit Lavra to a single vineyard in (13) Ath. Typikon [53], and his condemnation of commerce in wine [10] and extensive plantings [11] by others.
- [16] Youths and eunuchs banned. See also [25] below. Utilized later by (59) Manuel II [13]. (3) Theodore Studites [18], quoted without attribution by (13) Ath. Typikon [34], bans adolescent disciples in the superior's cell; a ban on eunuchs is also found in (13) Ath. Typikon [48]. The bans are repeated in (15) Constantine IX [1], cf. [15].
- [18] Compensation due monks who leave behind the cells they have built when they change superiors. These kellia, designed for kelliotic monks and their small bands of followers, are discussed in (13) Ath. Typikon [44], [45], and [47].
- [19] Payment of contract workers engaged by superiors. This is part of the legislation intended to prevent the exploitation and expropriation of solitary and kelliotic monks; see also [18] above and [20] below.
- [20] Superiors not to impose forced labor on kelliotic monks. See also [10], [18], and [19] above, with discussion by Papachryssanthou, Prôtaton, p. 101, and (13) Ath. Typikon [41].
- [21] Steward of the Mese responsible for its good order. For this official's subordination to the protos and his council of superiors, see [26] below. The reference to scandals at Karyes (Mese) is obscure, but cf. (15) Constantine IX [12] for evidence of persistent problems relating to unspecified commercial activities.
- [22] Ban on the importation of animals. This provision will be repeated later in (15) Constantine IX [3]; note exception in [23] below. In (13) Ath. Typikon [31], Athanasios, quoting (3) Theodore Studites [4] without attribution, bans the use of female animals for any kind of work.
- [23] Only Lavra permitted to have a yoke of animals. (15) Constantine IX [4] cross-references this chapter, and extends the privilege of having a yoke of cattle for kneading bread to the Vatopedi monastery. In (13) Ath. Typikon [53], however, Athanasios rejects the prospect of Lavra's ownership of sheep and goats.

TENTH CENTURY

- [24] Restriction on the sale of firewood to laymen. In (15) Constantine IX [6], the sale of lumber and other shipbuilding supplies to laymen is banned also, while [10] issues regulations for the monks' cutting wood for fuel and construction.
- [25] Construction workers not to bring boys with them. That is, in violation of the principle behind [16] above, which see. Utilized later by (59) Manuel II [15].
- [26] Steward's rendering of accounts on the feast of the Dormition. See also [21] above and discussion by Papachryssanthou, Prôtaton, pp. 121–22, 152.
- [27] Surplus funds formerly used to pay for two of the assemblies to be given to the monks as part of their allowances. See discussion by Papachryssanthou, Prôtaton, pp. 54–55.
- [28] Retention of the traditional procedure for the selection of the protos. The “ancient rule” is no longer preserved, but later it is probable that the protos was chosen by the Athonite assembly, most likely at the initiative of the “notable monks”; see discussion by Papachryssanthou, Prôtaton, p. 124.

Subscriptions. For the prosopography of the known individuals, see Papachryssanthou, Prôtaton, pp. 207–8.

13. Ath. Typikon: Typikon of Athanasios the Athonite for the Lavra Monastery

Date: 973–975¹

Translator: George Dennis

Edition employed: Ph. Meyer, Die Haupturkunden für die Geschichte der Athosklöster (Leipzig, 1894), pp. 102–22.

Manuscript: Lavra, unnumbered ms. (1814 A.D.); Codex Iveron 754 (16th c.)²

Other translations: None

Institutional History

For the institutional history of the Lavra Monastery, see (11) Ath. Rule, Institutional History.

Analysis

This document shares Athanasian authorship with (11) Ath. Rule, which it cross-references [39], and (14) Ath. Testament. Repetitious treatment of certain topics suggests multiple stages of composition.³ The document can be divided for analysis into four sections:

A. Foundation History

The document commences with a foundation history, [2]–[8] (cf. the earlier and less well developed example of the genre in (6) Rila [1], [2]). This is an official history from the author's viewpoint that eliminates certain episodes, such as his flight to Cyprus after the unexpected accession of the patron Nikephoros Phokas to the emperorship in 963 and the attempt to expel him from Athos in the Tragos affair of 971–972. There are also chronological differences with the account preserved in the Athanasian hagiographical tradition.⁴ The history is nevertheless of considerable interest, since it vividly portrays the nature of a traditional patronal relationship between a private founder, who provided the inspiration and funding, and a monastic holy man, who actually carried out the work of constructing what was then conceived of as a private monastery and its associated buildings. Moreover, the patron's elevation to the emperorship launched this foundation on a path different from that originally envisioned for it, as Lavra became a new kind of independent monastery under imperial patronage.

B. Constitutional Status and Succession to the Superiorship

Thanks to these circumstances, then, this is the earliest document in our collection composed for an “independent and autonomous” monastery, a category of constitutional organization of enduring significance for the rest of Byzantine history (see below, Chapter Four). (8) John Xenos, (9) Galesios (in part), and (10) Eleousa provide later examples of documents written for independent monasteries in the eleventh century. Athanasios quotes [12], [18] and summarizes [13], [20], [23], [36], [42] a lost imperial chrysobull of Nikephoros Phokas, one of three awarded to Lavra in 964, that evidently served as a kind of proto-typikon and which granted the monastery its self-governing status.⁵ Papachryssanthou (Prôtaton, p. 82) has skillfully reconstructed the content of this chrysobull. Athanasios claims [13] he himself was behind the crucial passages on the foundation's constitutional status and the succession to the superiorship.

The possibility that someone might impose a future superior from outside Lavra on the monastery was appropriately Athanasios' greatest concern [20] for the future of his foundation, "For if it were permitted that the superior could be appointed by some stranger, then the Lavra would end up under the authority of that person." Perhaps Athanasios was already worried about the threat that the notorious public management program, the charistike, would pose to his and other privately founded monasteries by the end of the tenth century, as seems indicated in the later (14) Ath. Testament.⁶ Yet even earlier, there were other reasons to be concerned about the loss of a private foundation's autonomy from the public authorities, as Athanasios knew well, since in 964 he had exploited the system of imperial concessions to gain control of the wealthy, formerly private monastery of St. Andrew of Peristerai near Thessalonike under epidosis, a program for the concession of ecclesiastical institutions to other religious authorities that had been in existence since at least the beginning of the tenth century.⁷

Whatever the precise nature of the threat Athanasios perceived, the independent and self-governing constitution that he had extracted from Nikephoros Phokas in 964 was his defense. This could well, as Athanasios comes close to claiming, have been an original concept of his own, though there are also some possible precedents.⁸ It would be a long time, however, before the implications of genuine self-rule became evident.⁹ Here, recognizing the traditional connection between the right to appoint the superior (which typically belonged to the founder or patron) and actual control of the institution itself, Athanasios insists [16] on his "absolute authority" to choose his own successor. As a practical matter, however, he was willing to exercise this right after consultation with the monastic community. Subsequent superiors were to choose their successors in the same way [15], [19], cf. [12], but without outside interference.

Yet the very provision [20] designed to protect Lavra from falling under outside control had created an unanticipated problem, since it could be interpreted to make any monk not actually tonsured at the monastery ineligible for the superiorship. Since the foundation was at this time not much more than a decade old, a strict interpretation of the chrysobull would have eliminated many of Athanasios' closest and oldest disciples from consideration. Athanasios therefore argues [21] ff. strenuously for the acceptability of "foreign" monks (xenokouroi) as future superiors, provided they had been living in the community for two or three years.

C. Studite Quotations

Although this document is self-described and functions as a typikon, it is textually linked to (3) Theodore Studites, a testament, just as (11) Ath. Rule is to (4) Stoudios. There are literal but unattributed quotations from 18 of the chapters in the Studite Testament.¹⁰ The integration of these quotations from a much earlier and rather different era of Byzantine monasticism into the text of the present document is not entirely satisfactory, though Athanasios does group them in a more logical order than in the original Studite Testament. Athanasios' reluctance to acknowledge his debt to (3) Theodore Studites is curious; as in (11) Ath. Rule, however, he actually takes some trouble to refer instead to patristic sources that happened to underlie Studite observances.¹¹ In any event, Athanasios provides [30] an implicit endorsement of Theodore's prohibitions on changes in the rule, on worldly possessions, and on the diversion of monastic property to friends or relatives. Athanasios' bans [31] on personal and community slaves and female animals, his endorsement [32] of communal ownership of property, and the requirement that a superior should not administer finances directly are all derived from (3) Theodore Studites too. Following Theodore on other matters, Athanasios also urges his successors as superior not to adopt [33] a luxurious lifestyle and to refrain [34] from seeking higher office. In another implicit endorsement of the canons of the Studite tradition, Athanasios views worldly entanglements and sexual misconduct (with the one seen as leading to the other) as the primary threats to the morality of the monks.¹² Athanasios adds [33] a warning from Antony, the founder of Egyptian monasticism, against lengthy absences from the monastery in support of a like-minded (but unattributed) prohibition from the Studite Testament. Athanasios shared with the Studite tradition a concern with reconciling the mandate [35] to provide hospitality to strangers with the need [34] to isolate the monks from secular (and especially sexual) intercourse.

As Leroy ("Conversion," pp. 113–14) realized, it is also worth noticing what provisions of (3) Theodore Studites Athanasios chose not to adopt for the present document.¹³ The omission of (3) Theodore Studites [9], [15], [16], which deal with relations with women, is understandable since they were absent from Mount Athos; [12], prohibiting the distinction between the great and the small habit, was already a dead letter by the time (4) Stoudios [A2] was composed.¹⁴ Some other Studite provisions, like the ban [6] on the use of horses or mules for transport, the admonition [21] not to store up wealth in the monastery, and the recommendation [24] of consultative rule, must have been rejected because they were clearly opposed to Athanasios' own opinions on due privilege, extensive economic activity, and style of rule. The Studite endorsement [12] of patristic authority was perhaps redundant in view of Athanasios' own propensity to make direct citations. Finally, the omission of the provision [11] for the teaching of catechism is puzzling, but apparently deliberate, since references to catechetical instruction found in (4) Stoudios were not adopted in (11) Ath. Rule either, even though there is an attestation in the hagiographic tradition that Athanasios employed the Studite catecheses in the instruction of his monks.¹⁵

D. Administrative Dispositions

Such non-Studite legislation as appears in this document is to be found at the end, beginning with [36], along with a treatment of relations with Lavra's ascetics and various dependent communities elsewhere on Mount Athos.

In this document, Athanasios professes to be hostile to excessive entrepreneurial activity, an attitude that he may have picked up from the Basilian tradition. He explicitly rejects [11] economically expansionist foundations elsewhere on Mount Athos as suitable models for his own foundation. To back up his own more modest vision, he bans [53], cf. [45] the construction of additional detached cells (kellia) or the development of more cultivated fields or vineyards, making an exception [34] from a rule against further acquisitions of landed property only for an anticipated dependency to be located in the capital city of Constantinople.

Not only did Athanasios (and his successors) fail to observe these restrictions subsequently, but curiously, the hagiographic tradition depicts his aggressive pursuit of just the sort of economic development program here condemned as the primary reason his fellow Athonites sought his expulsion during the Tragos affair in 971–972.¹⁶ This complicates an analysis of the many links between the present document and the provisions of the slightly earlier (12) Tzimiskes.¹⁷

If the hagiographers, who were undoubtedly acquainted with Lavra's expansionist policies by the time they wrote in the eleventh century and later, simply erred in reading back these policies as the likely grievances of the Athonites against their hero in the Tragos affair, then perhaps Athanasios' very different policies as announced here in (13) Ath. Typikon may be taken at face value. In that event, Athanasios and the Lavriotes would have been a party arguing for restraint of mercenary activities at the Tragos inquest, and their policies an important influence on the provisions of (12) Tzimiskes.

If, on the other hand, the hagiographers have accurately represented the substance of the complaints of Athanasios' opponents, they and not he must be seen as the motive force behind such restraints on economic activity as (12) Tzimiskes did in fact impose, and similar provisions to it found here in (13) Ath. Typikon would have to be interpreted as a discreet bow to the former document's authority, to be set aside when circumstances might permit. Perhaps Athanasios traded acceptance of his own disciplinary observances (Studite in origin) in exchange for his own agreement, for a time, to abide by certain economic restrictions demanded by his Athonite neighbors.

Unlike the cautious John, the author of (6) Rila [7], who warily refused royal benefactions, Athanasios welcomed [36] cash annuities (solemnia), from both Nikephoros Phokas and his successor John Tzimiskes.¹⁸ He was also willing to accept entrance gifts [49] from postulants, but like some later reform-minded founders, e.g., the author of (22) Evergetis [37], he feared the divisive psychological effects they might have on the community. Athanasios resolved this by ordering such gifts to be given away. Charity then is here a convenient way of disposing of a problem rather than an imperative in its own right. Athanasios was unwilling, however, to allow [44] outsiders to purchase cells with entrance gifts. Eunuchs, young or old, were not acceptable [48] as postulants; other suitable applicants could be tonsured [50] as members of the community but only after a year of examination except for those with a well-attested reputation for piety.

Lavra's complexity obliged Athanasios to address certain institutional relationships not discussed in the Studite documents. These include a discussion of how Lavra as a cenobitical community would relate to its neighboring solitaires [40], [41], to the dependency (metochion) of St. Andrew of Peristerai [51], [52] and the group of cells [47] Athanasios had granted to his long-time friend and collaborator, John the Iberian. Athanasios' tolerance of a limited practice of solitary monasticism, carefully subordinated to the koinobion on the model of the traditional lavra, serves to distinguish him from the more militantly cenobitic Studite monasticism, at least as the latter was practiced during the lifetime of Theodore the Studite.¹⁹ Earlier in the document's foundation history, Athanasios makes [9] a reference to another dependency of St. Eustathios, then later on [34] also to a possible future dependency to be located in Constantinople.

The document concludes with a message [56] to the brothers urging them to give obedience to Athanasios' successor that is another unattributed quotation from (3) Theodore Studites [25]–[27].

13. ATH. TYPIKON

Notes on the Introduction

1. For dating, see Lemerle, Lavra, pt. 1, p. 17, who assumes it was drawn up during the reign of John Tzimiskes (Dec. 969–Jan. 976) and after (12) Tzimiskes, which is commonly thought to date to 971–972.
2. See Meyer, Haupturkunden, pp. 270–73, and Lemerle, Lavra, pt. 1, pp. 13–14; as Lemerle notes, a true critical edition remains to be done on the basis of Lavra ms. E 194 (14th–15th c.), for which see J. Noret, Vitae duae antiquae sancti Athanasii Athonitae (Louvain, 1982), p. xxxii, and another manuscript, reputedly of the 10th–11th c. that Panteleemon Lavriotes, “Sympleromatikos katalogos cheirographon kodikon Hieras Mones Megistes Lauras,” EEBS 28 (1958),” p. 115, claimed was “probably” from the hand of Athanasios himself. The former manuscript also contains Vita A, (11) Ath. Rule, and (14) Ath. Testament, while the latter contains just (14) Ath. Testament.
3. Note repetitive treatments of: [15] ff. the succession to the superiorship, cf. [19]; [17] exclusion of xenokouroi from the succession, cf. [20]; [21] exceptions to this exclusion, cf. [23], with different terms of service for qualification; [25] punishment of discriminators against xenokouroi, cf. [29]; [31] ban on certain animals, [53]; [34] ban on youths, [48]; and [31] prohibition on construction of additional cells, cf. [53]. This pattern suggests the document was composed in at least five sittings.
4. See the discussion in Lemerle, Lavra, pt. 1, pp. 33–36, with proposed solution at 36.
5. Dölger, Regesten, no. 704; see above, (11) Ath. Rule, Institutional History, A 7. The excerpts are collected and translated in the introduction to this chapter.
6. Cf. the reference to charistike in (12) Tzimiskes [7], with discussion in note.
7. For the concession of this monastery, see Vita A, chap. 103, ed. Noret, Vitae duae, p. 50, and Vita B, chap. 34., ed. Noret, p. 166, with discussion by Papachryssanthou, Prôtaton, pp. 35–36, 82; for ecclesiastical epidosis, see my Private Religious Foundations in the Byzantine Empire (Washington, D.C., 1987), pp. 156–57, cf. 146–47; above, (12) Tzimiskes [11] note.
8. See Basil I’s grant of immunity to the monastery of Kolobou and the monks of Athos (883), ed. Papachryssanthou, Prôtaton, doc. 1, pp. 177–81, at 180, line 21, and a lost chrysobull of Constantine VII Porphyrogenetos (944–959) that denied the metropolitan of Thessalonike any rights in the monastery of St. Andrew of Peristerai, mentioned in a chrysobull of Constantine X Doukas (1060), ed. Lemerle, Lavra, pt. 1, doc. 33, pp. 195–99, at 197, line 35.
9. Note the difficulties that Manuel, bishop of Stroumitza had, even at the end of the next century, in attempting to reconcile traditional notions of private ownership in a religious institution with an independent constitution; see (10) Eleousa, Analysis, B. Constitutional Matters.
10. (3) Theodore Studites [1], [2], [3], [4], [5], [7], [8], [10], [14], [17], [18], [19], [20], [22], [23], [25], [26], [27].
11. (11) Ath. Rule [19], [34]; (13) Ath. Typikon [33].
12. (13) Ath. Typikon [31], [32], [33], [34], cf. [40].
13. (3) Theodore Studites [6], [9], [11], [12], [13], [15], [16], [21], [24].
14. Athanasios had himself received the small habit at Kyminas from Michael Maleinos and the great habit on Mount Athos from the hermit Elias, for which see Vita A, chaps. 24, 79, ed. Noret, Vitae duae, pp. 13, 36, and Vita B, chaps. 9, 25, ed. Noret, pp. 135, 151.
15. Note (4) Stoudios [B16], [AB21], [AB36], none of which were adopted in (11) Ath. Rule; for Athanasios’ use of the Studite Catecheses, see Vita B, chap. 65, ed. Noret, Vitae duae, p. 200.
16. For Athanasios’ failure to observe his own restrictions, see Papachryssanthou, Prôtaton, p. 101; for the hagiographic account of the origins of the Tragos affair, see Vita A, chap. 114, ed. Noret, Vitae duae, pp. 54–55, and Vita B, chap. 36, ed. Noret, pp. 168–69; as Papachryssanthou, p. 96, observes, the list of Athonite grievances against Athanasios is a “virtual resume of Athanasios’ [economic] activities.”
17. Cf. (12) Tzimiskes [3] and (13) Ath. Typikon [50] on the length of the novitiate; (12) Tzimiskes [10], [18], [20] and (13) Ath. Typikon [40], [42] on the regulation of solitaries; (12) Tzimiskes [13] and (13) Ath. Typikon [10], [11] on restriction of mercenary pursuits; (12) Tzimiskes [14] and (13) Ath. Typikon [32] banning spiritual relationships; (12) Tzimiskes [15] and (13) Ath. Typikon [10], [11], [53] prohibiting sales of wine to laymen; (12) Tzimiskes [16] and (13) Ath. Typikon [34], [48] banning youths and eunuchs; (12) Tzimiskes [20] and (13) Ath. Typikon [41] on exemption of solitaries from labor services; and (12) Tzimiskes [22] and (13) Ath. Typikon [53] on the importation of animals.

TENTH CENTURY

18. See discussion above in (11) Ath. Rule, Institutional History, A 7–8.

19. Cf. the observation of Papachryssanthou, Prôtaton, p. 101, on the evolution of Studite monasticism towards a similarly tolerant view of invidual ascetic practice.

Bibliography

Lemerle, Paul, et al., Actes de Lavra, pt. 1: Des origines à 1204 (= Archives de l'Athos 5) (Paris, 1970), pp. 13–18.

Leroy, J., “La conversion de Saint-Athanase l’Athonite à l’idéal cénobitique et l’influence studite,” Millénaire du Mont Athos 963–1963, vol. 1 (Chevetogne, 1963), 101–120.

Meyer, Ph., Die Hauptkunden für die Geschichte der Athosklöster (Leipzig, 1894), pp. 270–73.

Morris, Rosemary, “The Two Faces of Nikephoros Phokas,” B&MGS 12 (1988), 83–115.

Peeters, P., “Histoires monastiques géorgiennes,” AB 36–37 (1917–19), 8–68. Includes a Latin translation of George the Hagiorite’s Life of Sts. John (the Iberian) and Euthymios.

Shepard, A. M., The Byzantine Reconquest of Crete (Annapolis, Md., 1941).

Tsougarakis, Dimitris, Byzantine Crete from the 5th Century to the Venetian Conquest (Athens, 1988).

Volk, Robert, Gesundheitswesen und Wohltätigkeit im Spiegel der byzantinischen Klostertypika (Munich, 1983), pp. 67–71.

Translation

As noted above, this document employs part of the text of (3) Theodore Studites. In our translation, the borrowings are indicated in boldface type.

Typikon or Canonical Rule of our holy, God-bearing Father Athanasios of Athos

[1.] Those who exert themselves in journeying along the single-minded way of the solitary life and who do not deviate in striving to attain its holy goal, who by purity of mind and soul and body have conditioned themselves for the brilliant enlightenment which comes from the Holy Spirit, end up by suffusing not only themselves with light, or, to put it more correctly, a godlike appearance, but also everyone in the world with whom they converse. They enlighten other people of any rank or calling whatever. They challenge them and incite them on to a like goal, drawing and attracting them as the light of a beacon fire or a magnet.

[2.] An ardent supporter and lover of this solitary life was the revered and great emperor Nikephoros [II Phokas (963–969)], famous for his valor and virtue, to whom God, the master craftsman, granted the reward he merited of subduing the barbarian cities of the foe. He would have sealed his devout intentions with a proper conclusion if he had not been hindered by those who then wielded the scepters of the Roman Empire. Impelled, therefore, by this holy zeal, he founded numerous centers of asceticism about the Mount Kyminas¹ and settled monks in them. He generously provided for their needs partly from his own abundant resources, and partly by intervening with successive emperors he provided them with support and assistance in the form of annual subsidies. He enthusiastically endowed them with gifts and donations at regular intervals. Indeed, he displayed the same largess in his benefactions to the monks on Mount Olympus. Even though he did not clothe himself with the monastic habit for the reason we mentioned, he nonetheless surpassed the monks spending their lives on the mountain because of his practice of virtue, his strict control over his mind, his lengthy fasts [p. 103], his strenuous vigils, and his continual sleeping on the ground. He carried on his struggle and controlled his desires to such an extent that we cannot even describe it in words.

13. ATH. TYPIKON

[3.] As a matter of fact he came regularly to the lavra of his blessed nephew Michael,² the most holy monk, who was also my superior. This emperor, whose memory is eternal, thus became acquainted with me and placed some confidence in my lowly self, as well as a spiritual affection and an unexpected love. For there was no trace of evasiveness or hypocrisy in that holy and irreproachable soul. Therefore, since this was his disposition toward me, he disclosed his thoughts about how he would have preferred to live a solitary life and how he had been prevented by the emperors.

[4.] Later on, after some time had passed, not long after I had departed from Mount Kyminas and had crossed over to that of Athos, he was commanded by the most blessed emperor Romanos [II (959–963)] to lead an expedition against the godless Cretans,³ and so he encamped in the island. Engaged though he was in combat, several times he sent for me to cross over to the island of the barbarians and join him. When I refused to budge, he simply sent more letters and did not give in at all until I actually made the voyage there.

[5.] During my sojourn with the emperor in this island of the barbarians, he did not let up in his earnest entreaties and his efforts to persuade my lowly self to permit a lavra to be built by my humble cell, so that he might himself come to Mount Athos after he had completed the task assigned to him by imperial decree and had captured the barbarian city.⁴ If things went well he would renounce the world and live the life which had been his choice from way back. I was not easily persuaded to go along with his plans, because I wanted to live by myself and be left alone, to continue in my accustomed fashion, and to avoid being constantly preoccupied and bothered by disturbances and distractions. For I was thinking only of my own salvation, and perhaps I was not solicitous enough for the salvation of others. But, although I stoutly affirmed that I was to return to Mount Kyminas proper and that I would be unable to attend to any further dealings with friends, his eagerness did not abate, nor did his entreaties, as he advised me to take steps to bring his plan to fruition. [p. 104]

[6.] Now then, after all his triumphs and victories, he settled in Constantinople, while I returned to my cell. After some time he sent his servant, the monk Methodios, to me. He found me in the place which had been given to me by the most blessed and revered lord Stephen,⁵ at that time protos of Mount Athos, and by the rest of the elder monks, in accord with their custom. For when a person perseveres for two or three years on the holy mount and chooses to lead a solitary life, he is to receive, with their approval, a location for himself wherever he likes. This Methodios⁶ handed me a letter from the emperor and some gold, amounting to six litrai. He then stayed with me in my cell for about six months. He put a great deal of pressure on me to accommodate myself to the wishes of the emperor, who had not yet assumed that rank, and to have the lavra built, and I finally agreed. While Methodios was still there, we quickly got the building started and completed the cells for the emperor, which are still standing there to this day. The man then happily departed as we were undertaking the construction of the church.

TENTH CENTURY

[7.] We kept on with the work, but four months had not elapsed when we heard that Nikephoros had been proclaimed emperor and had taken possession of the palace. I left the work on the church half finished and traveled to the capital city. On coming into his presence, I strongly reproached him, not without reason I believed. “The orders you gave me dealt with one thing,” I said, “but it would seem that you were thinking about and planning something else, as events have proven.” I treated the most revered emperor as though he were at fault, believing that he would bear all that I had to say meekly. But he replied by stubbornly defending himself, and he assured me on oath that he held the diadem in utter contempt, as well as the imperial majesty itself. He assured me, moreover, that he had no relations at all with his wife. When the time was propitious, he would escape from all that is now considered an obstacle and he would travel to the holy mountain and fulfill the compact he had made to the Lord. He concluded with this one remark: “Do not lose heart. Do not leave the church there only half built.” Let everyone, therefore, put aside any thought of disbelief and know for certain that, if the Lord, for reasons which he alone knows, had not decreed that he should conclude his life with a martyr’s death, he would have put a fitting seal on his compact and his promises to God. “All,” however, “that the Lord willed he did in heaven [p. 105] and on the earth” (Ps. 134 [135]:6),” as the prophet says.

[8.] With such assurance, then, and trusting in his words, I returned to my cell and again concentrated on the construction of the church. The emperor indeed contributed money, expenses for supplies, and grants of salaries for the workers who were toiling away at building the church. He certainly made his contribution. Nonetheless, compared to what I was spending, the amount given by the thrice-blessed emperor did not seem nearly enough. Most of the contributions, as if they were donations and requisitions of produce, were given to my lowly self for the completion of the church by other lovers of Christ. But how much hard work, the afflictions I suffered, the trials and hardships I endured, the expenditures I put out for quarrying of stone, excavating, heaping up earth, transporting stones, the rooting up, the cutting down, the removal of branches, bushes, and trees, in order to build the holy church of the most holy Mother of God,⁷ and setting the entire lavra in place, to discuss all this in detail would take longer than the time at my disposal. It is enough that the Lord alone knows exactly what I mean. For he gently guides all things from not being into existence.

[9.] There is another little place about ten miles distant from the Lavra, precipitous and overgrown, which has been named Mylopotamos. By clearing out the woods and rocks and leveling the site, I established a church and some cells there in the name of the holy, great martyr Eustathios to serve as a dependency. I also planted a vineyard to provide wine for the Eucharist, and so that the brothers persevering in the name of the Lord in the Lavra and the guests sojourning there might be able to have some wine.

13. ATH. TYPIKON

[10.] Mindful of that pertinent and ancient precept of the fathers, I ought to have kept myself undistracted and free of preoccupations. For lack of distraction means fewer anxieties, and being free of anxiety means fewer disturbances, and the confluence of all this results in a better and more perfect state of being. Many reasons, though, led my lowly self to this decision. The seashore along the mountain was precipitous and without any harbors on both sides, to the north, that is, and to the south, for more than eighty miles. The mountain resembles a peninsula which extends toward the sea in the shape of a cross. The islands in the sea, Lemnos, Imbros, Thasos, and the rest are a great distance away. Because of this, when winter comes, [p. 106] a ship is unable to sail from the mountain to the mainland to procure necessary provisions or to sail back from there to the mountain. It cannot find any sort of anchorage because the seashore on both sides provides no shelter. On the other hand, there is absolutely no way for a person to transport his own provisions by dry land, partly because the road is so long, and partly because the mountain is practically impassable for pack animals. From the mainland to the tip of the mountain facing the rising sun, where the sea forms a deep gulf, and where the lavra is built, is a distance, more or less, of a hundred miles. For this reason I was moved to plant a vineyard, for the need had to be met, especially for the church offering. For even if I were to admit that some commercial activity could be carried on, although it is actually impossible, I do regard it as dishonorable and out of place to dispatch monks to sell wine in the villages and cities, to spend a lot of time visiting with secular persons, to intermingle with them, to sojourn in their houses, and in this connection to converse freely with women and to make no effort to run from the filth and harm produced by such encounters.

[11.] It is true that many here on the mountain have busied themselves with cultivating fields and have planted vineyards. Some have purchased ones already prepared and have worked hard to improve them and make them look more flourishing. But we do not look upon them as models, and may we never do so. Still, considering what is beneficial, harmless, and not injurious for the brothers assigned to these services, just as I would do in my own case, I was moved to take these steps. At any rate, enough has been said about these topics.

[12.] The blessed, Christ-loving emperor, whose public life was worthy of the name he bore,⁸ while he was still alive planned ahead for the needs and governance of the brothers who were serving in the newly constructed lavra. He issued a revered chrysobull, and decreed that dominion and ownership⁹ of [the Lavra and] its territory devolved upon my lowly self and my successors, as is clearly expressed in the words of the chrysobull:

“We decree that after us this Lavra is to be under the ownership of the most reverend monk Athanasios, and while my majesty is still alive we want this same most reverend monk Athanasios to be the undisturbed superior of the eighty monks in this Lavra and in the kellia round about the lavra. Everything is to be administered by him in accord with what is dear to God and consonant with the monastic constitution. [p. 107] After his death, if my majesty is still alive, the person who has distinguished himself in that same Lavra and the kellia subject to it and in whom that same most reverend monk Athanasios before dying should have placed his trust, that man should be installed in the position of superior. But when God shall call us from this vain life and have us partake of the common chalice of death, we want nobody else at all to be appointed as superior of this Lavra except him whom the monks of the Lavra and the kellia subject to it, having gathered together and after careful examination, shall look upon as distinguished in virtue and capable of exercising this office, and they shall establish him as superior. Under no circumstances at all do we permit a person from a different lavra or monastery to become superior of this one. Even after our death we do not want anyone to be allowed to grant this Lavra to any secular or ecclesiastical person or even to a monk or to make it subject to another monastery. It is our will and command, rather, that it remain free and self-governing.”

[13.] This is what that marvelous and irreproachable soul decreed, and it was not far removed from my own views. Let no one think, therefore, that a mere word was included in the chrysobull without my full knowledge and approval, but it was as though I had suggested them to him. Since, then, according to the intent of the chrysobull, while he was still alive, he had referred everything to my judgment, I would be the one to choose how things were to be managed, to make arrangements, and to organize matters concerning this most holy Lavra. I was to exercise dominion and authority as I might wish. To the best of my ability, I was to set the standards, establish a regular order, and give serious thought to the ways in which the monastic enterprise is best served and put it into practice.

[14.] It is easy enough to imagine that after this blessed man departed this life, I would have a great deal more freedom and authority, since I would be in charge, to establish rules and standards. Moreover, on reaching the end of my own life, I would leave behind me the person whom God should have approved and who should appear satisfactory to me and worthy of this pastoral service. For I had been praying that the man would remain alive, not just for my own sake, but that his invincible leadership would serve the common good of the whole world. My prayer was that I could entrust my affairs and those of this Lavra to him so that his profound and prudent mind might better manage and order them. [p. 108] But what I was praying for did not come about as I had hoped, but as seemed good to God’s providence. Beyond any expectation or suspicion of mine, by an incomprehensible judgment known to God his providence took care to have him exchange life here for an untroubled and more perfect life, and granted him the undefiled and unshaken kingdom of heaven as a worthy reward for his many and great labors.¹⁰ Meanwhile, I was left to continue living this laborious and wretched life, filled as it is with countless adversities.

[15.] I enjoin, under threat of condemnation, upon the one to be chosen superior after myself, while at the same time commending and also earnestly entreating him, to be bound by the holy, consubstantial, immaculate, and life-giving Trinity and by my humble self that, when his turn comes to depart this perishable life, which contains nothing lasting or firm, he too may leave behind him a successor for the position of superior. He should be fully assured in the sight of God that this man is suitable and capable of assuming that position. He should be a man whom the light of his own virtues clearly places in the forefront and who is recognized as such by the more prominent and more devout brothers.

13. ATH. TYPIKON

[16.] In my own case, now, I have absolute dominion, so that not even one person can gainsay my command, and yet I have no intention of leaving my successor behind without consulting the brothers. If, when it comes to choosing a superior, anyone, deceived by demonic thoughts and led astray by his own willfulness, should promote the candidacy of anyone else but the one whom the superior and the whole assemblage of the more preeminent brothers shall judge best and shall elect, and should be detected forming factions, unlawful gatherings, divisions, and schism, ought to be pursued and cut off from the community as a diseased limb, as not living in the community in the manner intended by God, and as not seeking what would aid its progress and would truly benefit it.

[17.] If it might happen, as is surely possible, that the superior should die while away from the Lavra, then the preeminent and more devout brothers, as said, should assemble, investigate matters, and so arrive at a decision and vote. For we do not grant this power of making the decision to everyone indiscriminately. We enjoin and command that the superior must be selected only from this particular community. He should not be a man who has come here from some other monastery, been formed anew in a single day, and right then and there be put in charge. For he brings with him nothing that would aid the brothers in the practice of virtue, except that he wants them to vote for him as their leader, although they know nothing of his manner of life. Let the holy assemblage of the brothers be sure of this [p. 109], that we regard it as essential that a stranger coming from another monastery should not straightaway assume the superiorship.

[18.] In fact, a chapter in the chrysobull expressly forbids this. "We do not want anyone advanced to the position of superior of this Lavra except that person whom the monks of the Lavra after careful investigation shall find to be outstanding in virtue and suitable for the task, and they shall install him as superior." For no other reason had I advised the thrice-blessed emperor to add this clause than to keep the Lavra from becoming subject to some other person. Neither the patriarch nor the [head of] the sakellion, nor any other person should arrogate to himself the authority to appoint the superior. The Lavra is to remain sovereign and independent, as I have said.

[19.] For if it were to be permitted that the superior could be appointed by some stranger, then the Lavra would end up under the authority of that person. But it is my judgment and my command that the superior at the time, when he comes to depart this life, ought to have the authority to leave behind him a most competent and suitable man as his successor to be in charge of the brothers. I have accordingly planned for this in advance. But if it should happen that the superior dies without having designated the person he would leave as his successor, then we prescribe that the monks should assemble, deliberate, and come to a decision on naming their superior. He must definitely be chosen from this community. He should not be a man who has come here from some other monastery, be formed anew in a single day, and all of a sudden be put in charge. He should not be one who brings with him nothing to aid the brothers in the practice of virtue except that he wants them to vote for him as their leader, although they know nothing of his manner of life. In the event that I find myself at a loss in choosing a successor to leave behind as a shepherd to the brothers as I should wish, I intend to leave the selection of the superior to the judgment and to the vote of the monks.

TENTH CENTURY

[20.] This is also included in the chrysobull. By no means at any time at all do we receive a person from a foreign lavra or monastery as superior. I brought this to the attention of the revered emperor and suggested that it be made clear in the chrysobull to avoid any misunderstanding. That person we recognize as a stranger who, as has been clarified above, has not been in attendance here at the Lavra, who has not been conspicuous among the brothers, who has not struggled alongside them in their spiritual battles and meditations. He has given no evidence of the strength of his perseverance in the services, the stations, the prescribed observances, and the recitations of the psalter. Just recently arrived, almost this very day, as in that monstrous fable about the giants,¹¹ is he, on the spur of the moment, to be placed in charge [p. 110] who has been formed by some other sort of leadership, foreign to ours and not to be taken seriously?

[21.] Still, I also thought it might help to add this stipulation. A person who has persevered in our monastery and who has lived together with the brothers for three or even two years, even though he may have come to us from some other monastery, such a person I do not call a stranger, but look on him as a son, a member of the church, and one of my own community. He is no different from those whom I have tonsured but is equal to them. In every way they are honorable and true sons, especially those who have left their own monasteries and assigned all they had to my lowly self. Such men as these I consider sons and heirs and children of my heart and leave them behind together with the entire community. I therefore enjoin upon all future superiors, my successors, to give assurance under bond of punishment and to swear according to the most terrible fear of God, that they will make no distinction at all between these men and those in the Lavra who have received the holy habit from us. Even more so, if they are distinguished in virtue, they should be all the more kindly disposed toward them and offer them fitting encouragement corresponding to their virtue, and in like manner regard them and actually show preference for them because of their piety. This is my command to you.

[22.] If it is observed that one of these monks, I mean one of those who has come here from a different monastery, clearly stands out in the monastery, and is competent, suitable, and should appear deserving of leadership over the brothers, then without hesitation or further ado let him be put in charge. Not only should the superior who is approaching death testify that he wants to leave him behind as his successor, but that monk should also be the choice of all the brothers in the Lavra.

[23.] In no way does the above prescription contradict or weaken the stipulation in the revered chrysobull, although its words might convey that impression. Rather, it is in full harmony with it. Shortly before this it was explicitly declared that a person is defined as a stranger who without serious thought and of his own accord has moved from a different monastery in order to become superior of the Lavra or whom the hand of the powerful has brought in with the intention of becoming master of the Lavra. It is our desire that never should such a person be chosen by the brothers, or should they look for one until he has shared their manner of life and remained among them for at least a year, the shortest possible time. I thought I ought to explain these matters so that I could make the intentions of the most revered and most holy emperor very clear to everyone who wishes to read the present testament, and I have [p. 111] clearly set down my own views concerning the object of my efforts, the goal for which I have striven. To tell the truth, both of us share the same zeal and concern that the church too should not become subject to some unsuitable or unqualified person.

13. ATH. TYPIKON

[24.] In addition to all these matters I enjoin and I order once more the superior and all the brothers, from the greatest to the least, and I declare subject to penance in the name of the Lord God Ruler of All and of the truly all-holy Mother of God that they must not speak maliciously or act arrogantly on any pretext at all toward those who transfer here to us from various monasteries because of the love of God and of ourselves, and who have been numbered and listed among the brothers of our community. They must not treat them with contempt or insult them as “foreign tonsure.”

[25.] I have heard that in certain communities some insecure men who have no fear of the Lord have often acted in such a manner. They make insulting remarks such as: “This individual was tonsured in a foreign monastery and for that reason is to be held in contempt. This individual is from our monastery and so must be treated with respect.” If anyone in our Lavra should be detected doing such a thing after my death, he should be subject to the punishment we have assigned in the name of the Lord God Ruler of All, and on the day of judgment may he have the most holy Mother of God condemning him, as well as my lowly self. For we look upon this illness of the soul as more injurious than a pestilential disease.

[26.] But why even call this a disease? It is a heresy and the most harmful of heresies. For to split asunder and to regard the habit of some monks as different is worse than heresy. That monk does not belong to a foreign race; he does not profess another doctrine; his soul was not created in a different manner than this one, nor does he have a different divine Lord. Both monks hold to sound doctrine, and both belong to the one Christ and Lord and to his church. “For the earth is the Lord’s and everything in it” (I Cor. 10:26 = Ps. 23:1), under one ruler and lord, as the saint has said. What then makes this monk different from that one except for the place where he made his profession and received the habit? In fact, this one will be no different from the other to justify calling one “tonsured at home” and the other “foreign tonsure.”

[27.] What we strive for is the eradication of our own will, this is our highest goal, and concentrating on virtue and on comprehending the fact that we have been called to sorrow, not to delights.

Each of us must not follow his own desires. Even if some monasteries were established out beyond Cadiz and some monks from those places visited here [p. 112] and then chose to be enlisted among our brothers, we would not call them foreigners. For I am reluctant to designate a monastery as foreign, since that word suggests to me a separation from God.

[28.] If, as some men affirm, the greatest act of righteousness, one which requires no further accomplishment or improvement, is the granting of the tonsure, this would be sufficient for everyone, and there would be absolutely no need for any other labor. Yet, I will not look favorably on the monk whom I myself have tonsured should he become careless, lazy, and mediocre, although I do approve one who has come from another place and been clothed with the monastic habit there, especially if he be adorned with all sorts of excellent virtues. Conversely, this one is my genuine son and heir and a child of the church. But this other here in this place who has been granted the tonsure and the cutting of his hair, but who is without virtues, is an absolute foreigner to me, completely alien, and an enemy of the church. For if we all belong to the one Christ, as by his grace we in fact do, and to one mother, the holy church of God; if we are of the same faith and the one profession, then let there be no quarrels among you, and let not one be called a foreigner and another an undoubted native. Virtue alone is to be held in honor.

[29.] I therefore enjoin upon the superior and those of my brothers who hold leading positions, as well as my sons and fathers, that they be watchful for anyone who is careless enough to utter insults of this sort against the brothers. If such a person, carried away by some misguided impulse or pettiness of spirit, be so boorish as to insult a brother by calling him “foreign tonsure,” let him be cut off from the church, that is, not partaking of the sacred mysteries, for three weeks. He should not come in and join the brothers at their common meals, but should eat by himself, abstaining from wine and oil, and thus do penance. If indeed he should correct himself, so that his tongue is reined in by silence and his hand is over his mouth, then thanks be to God. If, however, he should again be detected thinking such thoughts and uttering more insults, then he should be completely cut off from the Lavra and expelled as an unhealthy, gangrenous limb of the body of the church, so that his disease and corruption may not spread to the others.

[30.] After this, the man who succeeds me in charge of the community must be introduced to those matters which he is obliged to observe and to do. [p. 113] [= (3) Theodore Studites [1]]: Save for grave necessity, you shall not alter at all the constitution and rule which you have received from my lowliness. [= (3) Theodore Studites [2]]: You shall not possess anything of this world nor store up anything for yourself as your own, not even one piece of silver. [= (3) Theodore Studites [3]]: You shall not divide your soul and heart by attachments and cares other than for those whom God entrusted to you, your spiritual sons and brothers, not even for those who are yours according to the flesh—either your relatives or friends or associates. Neither in life nor after death shall you use the things of the monastery for the aforementioned people—neither according to the requirements of charity nor the rules of heredity. For you are not of the world so that you have to share with those of the world. But if some should cross over from ordinary life to our order, then you should take thought for them in imitation of the holy fathers.

[31.] [= (3) Theodore Studites [4]]: You shall not possess a slave either for your use or for the monastery entrusted to you or for the fields since man was created in the image of God. This institution has been allowed only to those in worldly life just as marriage. [= (3) Theodore Studites [5]]: For necessary duties you shall not have an animal from among those of the female race since you have completely renounced the female sex.

[32.] [= (3) Theodore Studites [7]]: You shall always be vigilant that all things in the community be held in common and be indivisible and that nothing be owned on the part of any individual, not even a needle. Your body and your soul, nothing else, should be divided up for all your spiritual children, brothers and fathers. [= (3) Theodore Studites [8]]: As a fugitive from the world and from marriage, you should have no part of adopting those of the world as brothers or engaging in spiritual relationships with them. [= (3) Theodore Studites [22]]: You shall not take charge of the treasury room nor assume the cares of stewardship, but let your key be the greatest care of souls, of loosing and binding according to the Scriptures. You should entrust the gold and other necessities to the stewards, the cellarers, and, as seems appropriate to each service, all under your manifest authority. Together with the foremost brothers, you can take an account of each administration and transfer the offices to whichever person you decide.

[33.] [= (3) Theodore Studites [19]]: You shall not possess very distinctive or expensive clothing. Rather, you shall put on humble clothes and shoes in imitation of the fathers. [= (3) Theodore Studites [20]]: You shall not spend lavishly either for your own lifestyle or for the reception of guests. This will distract you since it belongs to the pleasurable side of the present life. [= (3) Theodore Studites [10]]: You should not go out frequently or roam about unnecessarily, leaving your own flock. [p. 114] For it is desirable that you have time to spend with the flock and be able to save these sheep endowed with reason, but most wily and given to straying. Without due examination you should not permit the brothers under your charge to go off traveling anywhere at all, especially during the season of winter. During that time, even when they want to, they may not be able to return because of the difficulty of sailing. Be aware that sojourning outside one's cell and spending time with worldly people by its very nature produces, as the great Antony says, eternal death.¹²

[34.] [= (3) Theodore Studites [14]]: You shall not leave your flock and transfer to another one or return to a higher office. [= (3) Theodore Studites [17]]: You shall not make for yourself a lodging or a secular house for your spiritual children in which there are women and go there frequently. Rather you should choose to attend to your temporary and essential needs at the home of pious men. [= (3) Theodore Studites [18]]: You shall not have a disciple in your cell out of affection, for this can harm the unstable, but you shall be served by a person above suspicion. You should not acquire an estate or field in the Lavra, which would be harmful and cause inopportune distraction to the community, except for a dependency in the City to provide a place to stay for our brothers going there. For what has been bequeathed to them by me, by the providence and grace of God, is sufficient for them if they take care of it.

[35.] You will not hinder the provisioning with necessities of those spending the winter in the hospice by the harbor for as many days or months as they may need. You shall not diminish the service offered to guests even if because of economic adversity the resources and needs of the Lavra should be reduced to one modios. [= (3) Theodore Studites [23]]: You shall not place the person of any other man, eminent and powerful according to the present age, ahead of that which benefits the community. Nor shall you shrink from laying down your life even to the point of bloodshed in guarding these godly laws and commands.

[36.] We command that in addition to the eighty monks, as laid down by order of the most blessed emperor lord Nikephoros in his revered chrysobull, that there be added another group of forty monks, so that with both groups the total number of monks will be a hundred and twenty, along with those residing in the dependency. Similar to the grant made by the most blessed emperor lord Nikephoros, the lord John [I Tzimiskes (969–976)], our most revered emperor, has added 244 nomismata to the donation made regularly to our Lavra. [p. 115] In his chrysobull emperor John decreed that this sum should be provided in perpetuity for our Lavra from the levy¹³ imposed on Lemnos, and at the same time he confirmed the general arrangement expressed in the chrysobull of the most blessed emperor lord Nikephoros.

[37.] Of these one hundred and twenty monks we desire that five monks, kelliotai of the Lavra, should dwell in solitude outside. They are to be accorded an annual stipend of up to three nomismata and five modioi of grain. We order that they are to be without possessions, exercising abstinence, and observing absolute reverence and humility toward the superior. We stipulate that if any of them are capable on their own to be in charge of a companion, they may have one, and only one, disciple. I do not want anyone to have two disciples, and even more so, no kelliotas should think of adding another cell without my knowledge and approval. Rather, if at some time one of these five should depart or should die, then, if another one is found who is suitable and capable of living such a life, let him be brought in to make up for the missing one. But, if not, let them remain as they are. I do not want these [cells] to be allocated to the kelliotai simply at random.

[38.] We decree that all the others should be under the obedience, as well as the guidance and care of one shepherd. After close study of the matter over a long period of time, as well as hard work and trial, I have found by experience that it is right and beneficial, in fact, it is my judgment, and I declare it best and less fraught with danger for all the brothers to live in common. All together they are to look to the same goal of salvation. Although the entire fullness of the community is joined together from diverse links, they form one heart in their common life, one will, one desire, and one body, as the apostle prescribes (Rom. 12:4; I Cor. 12:12). Let them show true, perfect, and unfeigned obedience to the superior. True and blameless obedience of subjects toward their superior is shown in this way, by not only refraining from what the superior regards as out of place, but also by not even letting themselves do what is praiseworthy without his knowledge. [p. 116] I would not want to contend that exercising abstinence and afflicting one's body does not have any beneficial effect, but if a person is doing what he thinks better for himself without having first asked about it, he is relying on his own initiative, and he will be making more of an error than doing something virtuous. But the reward of obedience is greater than what one achieves by abstinence.

13. ATH. TYPIKON

[39.] We exhort all to share their meals in common and to celebrate the entire common service in the holy church of God both at night and during the day, as I have made clear to them by deed and have ordered and transmitted in writing.

[40.] If anyone with the support and cooperation of God should ever desire to exchange the bother of obedience for the solitude and individual residence in a kellion, let him inform the superior of his wish. Let him, in turn, carefully examine the man's condition. If indeed he does possess the strength and diligence required of those who reside in the kellia, if he has been previously exercised in obedience, if he has learned to stay in a cell with concentration and strict guard over his mind, if he has learned to pray and keep vigil, to control himself, to exercise abstinence, to meditate, to devote himself to the study of the Scriptures with humility, and attach some importance to working with his hands, then let him be permitted to do this. But if a person has no experience of this hard way of life, let him rather be put to work at serving and be instructed to keep himself busy, so that not even what he may appear to possess should be destroyed by his stupid idleness and he be struck down by the spirit of akedia and love of pleasure. Let such a man know precisely that he seeks to live apart and by himself for no other reason but to be able to go here and there whenever he wants and wander about outside his kellion, while having unlimited food, drink, and sleep, and no end of relaxation for his flesh, with the result, as the saying goes, of making his prison even more harsh for himself.

[41.] Moreover, I enjoin upon him who will be in charge of the brothers after me, having him swear by the living God, that in the course of time those to whom the Lord shall furnish the desire and the strength, I mean among those persevering in obedience within the monastery, shall not be hindered by anyone from living in solitude and serious meditation in their cells. They shall not be prevented or disturbed in a contentious or insulting manner, nor by the imposition of services, nor by murmurings, nor on any other pretext at all. [p. 117] They should, rather, strive and show great eagerness to put them at ease, both in the essential needs and in everything which is due to them. Their solitude and diligent [pursuit of virtue] ought not to be regarded as idleness. For frequently I myself have prayed to God, as I still pray, that all may become like them. They have remained consistently obedient to their father and superior and have not relinquished their solitude. In both respects, surely, they have acquired a twofold reward.

[42.] It was chiefly with this in mind that I saw to it that the most blessed emperor had it written, stated distinctly, and carefully noted in the chrysobull, that the regular donation of grain is to be apportioned between the church and the monks in the kellia, that is, the kelliotai. I also command and strongly urge that those monks who are persevering in their solitude under the obedience of their father the superior, and who are struggling, as it is said, with humility for the glory of God and for their own benefit and that of the community, as well as for the support of the Lavra, are to be taken care of in every way by both the superior and the brothers, so they need not be concerned about their bodily needs and may be completely undisturbed. Just as I, while still alive, have made a special effort to take care of them superabundantly, so I want them to be taken care of by the one who will succeed me after I leave this life.

TENTH CENTURY

[43.] If God should grant some of them the strength to carry on greater struggles by withdrawing to a more remote and isolated solitude, they should not be prevented from making trial of this. For the cells of the most blessed and revered emperor¹⁴ are only a short distance from the Lavra, as are those of Saint John Chrysostom, as well as the church of the Holy Trinity with its complex of cells and other properties under the obedience of the Lavra, and these I reserve for the sake of those thus struggling.

[44.] If anyone should ever come forward offering an entrance gift for the purpose of residing in those cells, or like a tenant, giving a sum of money to the Lavra, or to certain individuals, in order to rent them out for a certain number of years, the superior may not be allowed to accede to that person's request. As we have laid down, we reiterate that these cells come under the authority and ownership of the Lavra and are for the benefit and repose of those selected disciples of ours to go out, to struggle, and to prove themselves, and [p. 118] to enter again into obedience.

[45.] I do not want other kellia, alleged places of retreat, to be constructed closer to the Lavra or anywhere in the surrounding area. For there are already enough for those who are capable of dwelling alone by themselves. I trust in God that if five such men should be found (cf. Gen. 18:32) the Lavra will be sustained and the brothers make rapid progress because of the prayers, counsel, and spiritual advice of these men. But it is possible that they may grow faint-hearted and subject to akedia, for it does happen that solitaries become discouraged and feel compelled to change their way of life for a while and be in need of a little consolation and renewal of spirit, so that they may once more take hold of their labors with greater intensity and stand firm on their own strength. In such a situation, let the superior allow that monk to move to Mylopotamos¹⁵ on the presumption that the very change of locale might provide an appropriate remedy and lead him back to a good frame of mind.

[46.] The monks who find they are not capable of leading such a life ought to stick to submission to the rule and carry on their struggle as athletes and martyrs, so they do not end up falling short of both goals. For before God and the angels I bear witness that those who persevere in genuine obedience and who remain firm in the love of God and in true affection for one another do not take second place to those carrying on the struggle special to solitude. But they shall be found to be superior and deemed worthy of eternal crowns by the good and impartial judge.

[47.] I want the cells of lord John the Iberian to be maintained just as I have set down in the grant I addressed to him. That is to say, his successors ought to preserve the good relationship existing between them and us. They ought to refrain from whatever is forbidden by the laws, especially regarding any extension beyond what has been decreed, either by going beyond the number of eight, or trying to sell them or make a donation of them, or in any other way at all to separate them from the Lavra.

13. ATH. TYPIKON

[48.] I also enjoin that every safeguard be taken to observe the following. I order the superior and the brothers who have positions of leadership after him never to receive a eunuch in our Lavra, even if he be an old man, nor [should they receive] a young boy, even though he should be the son of the man who holds in his hands the imperial scepter. If anyone transgresses this [p. 119] command of mine by receiving such forbidden persons, let him be separated from the Father and the Son and the Holy Spirit, from the holy, consubstantial, and life-giving Trinity; let him also receive the curse of our holy fathers and be anathematized from the inheritance of the just.

[49.] As far as others are concerned, if a person arrives and chooses to offer an entrance gift and be enrolled in our spiritual community and share the life and sufferings of its members according to the command of Christ, both in the service of the church and in the common fare at table, then he should certainly be received. But his entrance gift should be given to the poor, so he may not be constantly tempted on account of this gift and put on airs before the brothers as though he had done some great deed which serves as a reproach to his brothers, and so causes friction among them. But if he comes with testimonials concerning his good behavior, and his reputation is such that the superior foresees that no harm will result for any such reason, and if the man wishes to make an offering to God from his possessions, this ought not to be rejected. Of course, not even this should be allowed without some testing.

[50.] This now is what we have to advise and prescribe concerning the tonsure of the brothers. The superior is not allowed to tonsure anyone immediately, without any preliminaries, but only after an entire year. An exception might be made in the case of some who are pious and well known and whose religious way of life is well attested. For I regard it as a desirable work of extreme and primary importance to accept such persons and to attend to their special needs.

[51.] Let it also be known that the Peristerai, that is, the monastery of Saint Andrew, the leader of the holy apostles, comes under our authority and ownership, as is included and decreed in the two venerable chrysobulls, that of the revered, thrice-blessed emperor lord Nikephoros and that of our present devout emperor lord John, the one who now holds the scepter of the empire of the Romans. We have, therefore, determined to make the following arrangement. It is our wish that Stephen, the most devout monk and superior, remain absolutely undisturbed in his position of caring for and governing this monastery, and not be accountable to anyone. None of my successors has authority to remove him or to terminate his governance of this monastery of Peristerai for the rest of his life. For he has served us with all his strength [p. 120], as far as possible he has been of great comfort to us, he has accorded proper honor and displayed the submission one would expect. He also seems to have made many and great improvements in the monastery. After I depart this life anyone attempting to remove him from the governance of this monastery or otherwise in any manner at all causing him any sort of trouble shall be cut off from the holy, life-giving, and consubstantial Trinity, and shall fall under my own curse. Indeed now, I order that he be commemorated continuously in the sacred liturgies celebrated by the priests of the Lavra while he is alive, and that after his death a memorial service be held for him every year. After the departure from this life of the monk and most reverend superior Stephen, we want another superior appointed to succeed him by the superior of the Lavra.

TENTH CENTURY

[52.] Since, however, the essentials of monastic life had been totally neglected by previous superiors in this monastery for a long time, and practically all the monks in the monastery had yielded to complete indifference and carelessness, I realize that economy must be employed in having everyone in this monastery look toward one man and serve under one man, namely, the superior of the Lavra. Under the rule of one man they might be drawn together toward more spiritual goals in their prayers, psalmody, and readings, and also in their food and drink, as the service and labor of each, their travel and age, or the illness and health of each shall demand at different times. I therefore order that very competent stewards and priests be dispatched from the Lavra by its superior. They should be thoroughly examined and tested by him, as well as by the monks subject to him. [The stewards] will attend to the proper management of more corporeal needs, while [the priests] will associate the brothers with them and make them perfect in virtuous words and manners and in actions pleasing to God. When this shall have happened, I am convinced that, with God's help, they will benefit and derive great profit from one another and in one another, both as a community and as a single entity. For neither those from the Lavra nor those from the oft-mentioned monastery will differ from one another because of a twofold government, but they will continue to work together toward the unity of love [p. 121] and the union of minds by fixing their gaze on being under one sole and primary rule. If anyone should ever attempt to break up this beneficial and salutary arrangement of ours, let him be cut off from love, inasmuch as love is God (1 John 4: 8).

[53.] Let this too be added to the prescriptions I have set down. If any of our brothers persevering in the Lavra or any who have come here from a different monastery should wish to build additional cells or to dig up a field and cultivate it, by no means is this to be permitted in the entire circumference of the Lavra, I mean from the cape of the storehouses as far as Antiathos.¹⁶ This sort of thing generally gives rise to disturbances and scandals. In particular, such activity nearby will of its very nature eat away bit by bit at the basic elements of isolation and solitude. For this reason I forbid the superior of the Lavra or any other person to allow a cell or a cultivated field. Furthermore, I do not want another vineyard planted, not even to the extent of a flower-bed-sized piece of land,¹⁷ either in the entire circumference of the Lavra or in Mylopotamos. For, as already mentioned, by God's providence, what I have left behind is enough. I thought it superfluous to make special mention of sheep and goats, since I believe it is completely out of place for monks to possess them, especially the monks residing on the mountain.

[54.] You have now received all of this and whatever else I have to pass on, written and unwritten, my father and brother, whoever you may be, who, to put it briefly, as superior have received from God and from my lowly self that power and complete authority over the Lavra which I too had. [= (3) Theodore Studites [24]]: You shall observe and guard it for the glory of God, for my honor, for the assistance of those wishing to learn and for instilling divine zeal in those who shall see and hear. May you do well and may you prosper in the Lord. Far be it from [me] to say or even to think of the opposite.

[55.] Behold, therefore, I commit to you, in the presence of God and his chosen angels, the entire community in Christ. Welcome them, take them to yourself, guide and protect them as lambs of Christ, as beloved members, tend each one of them with respect and loving care, with an equal measure of love for each, for each man loves all the members of his body equally. [p. 122]

[56.] [= (3) Theodore Studites [25]]: But now it is time for you, my children, brothers, and fathers, to hear my most pitiful voice. Accept and welcome the lord your superior as I have myself selected him. Looking upon him with respect and honor, embrace him as my successor. Just as you did with me, so with him too observe the lawful rule of obedience and do not think less of him because he has been recently appointed in the Lord. Nor should you expect anything more than the gifts which were given to him by the Holy Spirit. It is sufficient that he maintain that which was laid down by my humility. “If you love me,” my children, and you bear in mind my love, “you will keep my commandments” (John 14:15). Keep peace among yourselves. Preserve a good disposition, humility, and obedience to your superior until death, not contradicting or annoying him in any respect. Preserve your angelic profession inviolate.

[= (3) Theodore Studites [26]]: Hating the world, do not return to the works of the world. Having been loosed from the bonds of physical attachments, do not be bound again to the affections of the flesh. Having denied all pleasures and perishable things of the present life, do not depart from your struggle with obedience through negligence and become the sport of demons.

[= (3) Theodore Studites [27]]: Stick to the race of obedience until the end so that you will obtain the “unfading crown of righteousness” (cf. I Peter 5:4 and II Tim. 4:8). Led by humility, you should always deny your own will and pattern yourselves only after the judgment of your superior. If you keep these things in mind and if you should guard them to the end, you will be blessed. For the chorus of martyrs will receive you. Wearing your crowns in the kingdom of heaven, you will enjoy the eternal blessings in Christ Jesus our Lord. So farewell now, my children, and remember my lowly self.

Notes on the Translation

1. On this monastic center in Bithynia, see Janin, Géographie, vol. 2, pp. 116–18.
2. Michael Maleinos, Nikephoros Phokas’ nephew and the founder of the above-mentioned Kyminas monastery, for whom see Louis Petit, “Vie de saint Michel Maléinos,” ROC 7 (1902), 543–603.
3. The Arab rulers of Crete, originally refugees from al-Hakam, the Umayyad ruler of Spain, who conquered this Byzantine possession circa 828.
4. Chandax (Candia), capital of the island of Crete under Arab rule.
5. For the protos Stephen, see the Athanasian Vita A, chap. 44, ed. Noret, Vitae duae, pp. 22–23, with Papachryssanthou, Prôtaton, p. 129.
6. For Methodios, a monk and future superior of the Kyminas monastery, see Lemerle, Lavra, pt. 1, p. 34.
7. The Lavra katholikon.

TENTH CENTURY

8. That is “Nikephoros,” lit. “bearer of victory.”
9. Kyriotes and despoteia; for which, see R. Morris, “Legal Terminology in Monastic Documents of the Tenth and Eleventh Centuries,” JÖB 32.2 (1982), 281–90, at 284–85.
10. Nikephoros Phokas was murdered on December 10, 969, in the course of a coup d’etat engineered by his successor John Tzimiskes.
11. See Hesiod, Theogony, 185.
12. Cf. Apophthegmata patrum 10, PG 65, col. 77BC.
13. Epeixis means a pressing need or an emergency, but here it must refer to an “imposition” or tax.
14. Nikephoros Phokas, cf. [6].
15. That is, the dependency of St. Eustathios mentioned in [9]; cf. [53].
16. Mountain top on the Athonite peninsula, between the monasteries of Simonos Petra and St. Paul.
17. For this meaning of the word plinthion, see Megale Hellenike Enkyklopaideia (Athens, 1932), vol. 20, p. 348, s.v. plinthion. It is obvious from the context that Athanasios is not referring to the land measure by the same name which was the equivalent of 3 modioi (E. Schilbach, Byzantinische Metrologische Quellen [Thessalonike, 1982], p. 186).

Document Notes

- [1] Praise of the solitary life. Applicability for most monks limited in [38]; see [37], [40], and [43] below for preservation of a role for solitaries within Lavra’s cenobitic constitution.
- [2] Nikephoros Phokas and his patronage of monasteries. For this emperor, see Morris, “Two Faces of Nikephoros Phokas,” 83–115, esp. 100–11; for his patronage of his uncle Michael Maleinos’ monastery on Kyminas, see the Athanasian Vita A, chaps. 28–30, ed. Noret, Vitae duae, p. 15, and Vita B, chap. 11, ed. Noret, pp. 136–38.
- [3] Athanasios’ relationship with Nikephoros Phokas. There is a parallel account in Vita A, chap. 30, ed. Noret, Vitae duae, p. 15, and Vita B, chap. 11, ed. Noret, p. 137.
- [4] Nikephoros Phokas’ conquest of Crete. For a general discussion, see Shepherd, Byzantine Reconquest of Crete. Lemerle, Lavra, pt. 1, p. 33, dates the departure of the Byzantine fleet from Constantinople to conquer Crete to the summer of 960. According to the parallel account in Vita A, chaps. 60–67, ed. Noret, Vitae duae, pp. 30–32, and Vita B, chap. 22, ed. Noret, pp. 147–48, Athanasios was successfully pressured to go to Crete by the Athonite elders, who were anxious to obtain the release of some monks who had been taken captive to Crete.
- [5] Discussion of plans for Lavra. These discussions are placed here before the fall of the Cretan capital Chandax, which occurred on March 7, 961, but the parallel account in Vita A, chap. 68, ed. Noret, Vitae duae, p. 32, and Vita B, chap. 22, ed. Noret, pp. 148–49, has Athanasios arriving in Crete after the fall of the enemy capital; see discussion in Lemerle, Lavra, pt. 1, p. 33. According to Vita A, chap. 70, ed. Noret, p. 33, and Vita B, chap. 21, p. 47, Nikephoros Phokas offered money at this time for the construction of Lavra, but Athanasios refused to accept it.
- [6] Athanasios agrees to begin construction. There is a parallel account with many more details in Vita A, chaps. 71–83, ed. Noret, Vitae duae, pp. 33–38, and Vita B, chaps. 23–25, ed. Noret, pp. 149–53. The implied chronology of the account here of Methodios’ visit and the commencement of construction differs from that of the hagiographic tradition; see Lemerle, Lavra, pt. 1, pp. 33–35, who proposes that Methodios’ six-month visit occurred from autumn 962 to spring 963, during which time the first construction work took place.
- [7] Nikephoros Phokas acclaimed emperor; Athanasios journeys to Constantinople to reproach him. This chapter telescopes a series of events after Nikephoros Phokas’ proclamation by his army at Kaisareia, July 3, 963, and his coronation in Constantinople a month later on August 16 (for dates, see Lemerle, Lavra, pt. 1, p. 33). Here Athanasios suppresses his flight to Cyprus and his return to Lavra, for which see the parallel account in Vita A, chaps. 90–100, ed. Noret, Vitae duae, pp. 42–48, and Vita B, chaps. 31–33, ed. Noret, pp. 161–65. Athanasios is thought to have fled Athos in distress soon after the news of the emperor's accession reached Athos, perhaps in September; he was absent in Cyprus for at least four or five months, returning to Lavra by the end of 963 or early 964 (see Papachryssanthou, Prôtaton, p. 77). Athanasios' audience with Nikephoros Phokas took place sometime in early 964, before May (Lemerle, Lavra, pt. 1, p. 35).

13. ATH. TYPIKON

- [8] Account of Lavra's construction. The hagiographic tradition differs in placing all the construction work, including that for the katholikon (see Vita A, chap. 81, ed. Noret, Vitae duae, pp. 36–37, and Vita B, chap. 25, ed. Noret, p. 151), before Nikephoros Phokas' accession. Modern scholars, including Mylonas ("Le plan initial du catholicon de la Grande-Lavra au Mont Athos et la genèse du type du catholicon athonite," CA 32 [1984], p. 103), accept the implication that work resumed in 964 after Athanasios' return from Constantinople.
- [9] The dependency of St. Eustathios at Mylopotamos. The church and kellia established here were intended to help Lavra control a detached property; see (8) John Xenos, Institutional History, (9) Galesios [144], and (35) Skoteine [10]. There is a cross-reference below in [45] to the use of this dependency by solitaries.
- [10] Lavra's isolated location. According to Vita A, chaps. 106–10, ed. Noret, Vitae duae, pp. 50–52, and Vita B, chap. 35, ed. Noret, pp. 166–67, Athanasios later rectified the lack of an anchorage by building a port for the convenience of Lavra's visitors.
- [11] Condemnation of commercial activity elsewhere. This chapter shows a sensitivity to the condemnation of "mercenary pursuits" in (12) Tzimiskes [13].
- [12] First quotation from Nikephoros Phokas' chrysobull. The document is Dölger, Regesten, no. 704; see discussion by Lemerle, Lavra, pt. 1, pp. 37–38, and Papachryssanthou, Prôtaton, pp. 81–83, with reconstruction of probable contents at 82. See the second quotation in [18] below and other references to this chrysobull in [13], [20], [23], [36], and [42]; the surviving fragments are translated in the introduction to Chapter Two.
- [13] Athanasios' role in the formulation of the chrysobull. A novel approach to a traditional problem of monastic organization is implied here, but see above, Analysis, n. 7, for possible precedents.
- [14] Original plans for Lavra's administration. A gradual transformation from a directly administered private monastery to a more genuinely independent foundation was contemplated, perhaps like the arrangements outlined in (10) Eleousa [11], [16]. Athanasios discreetly passes over the circumstances of Nikephoros Phokas' violent death at the hands of his successor John Tzimiskes, the reigning emperor.
- [15] Future superiors to designate their successors. The implication, for which see also [16] below, is that the superior was to consult with the "more prominent brothers" in making his choice, as in (10) Eleousa [16], though the quotation from Nikephoros Phokas' chrysobull in [12] above hints at a somewhat broader conception of this informal electorate. A formal election, like those that would take place in reform monasteries of the twelfth century (for which see Chapters Five and Six), is not contemplated here except under the circumstances outlined below in [17].
- [16] Assertion of patronal authority to designate a successor; warning against factionalism. Athanasios' rights derive from Nikephoros Phokas' chrysobull as quoted above in [12]; for another such exercise of patronal rights, see (10) Eleousa [11]. (22) Evergetis [14] provides a discussion of the evil consequences of factionalism from a monastic reform perspective.
- [17] Procedure for election of a new superior if the incumbent dies suddenly. The franchise is restricted to the "preeminent and more devout" monks, cf. [15], [16] above; xenokouroi are excluded from consideration, cf. [13] above and [20] below. This procedure is amended later by (14) Ath. Testament [12], [13].
- [18] Second quotation from Nikephoros Phokas' chrysobull. This excerpt recognizes Lavra's right to choose its own leader, the key to effective self-government. In rejecting claims to this right by the imperial treasury and the patriarchate, Athanasios likely had in mind the recent award of the monastery of St. Andrew of Peristerai, an imperial monastery listed in the inventory of the treasury (sakelle) according to a chrysobull of Constantine X Doukas, ed. Lemerle, Lavra, pt. 1, doc. 33, pp. 195–99, at 197, line 39, under (patriarchal) epidosis to Lavra at the bequest of Nikephoros Phokas in 964 (for which see Vita A,

TENTH CENTURY

- chap. 103, ed. Noret, Vitae duae, p. 50, and Vita B, chap. 34, ed. Noret, p. 166).
- [19] Recapitulation of arrangements for the succession. Summarizes [15], [16], and [17] above.
- [20] Exclusion of xenokouroi from the succession in the chrysobull. This is a reference to a provision in the chrysobull as quoted above in [12]; Athanasios has made the same point already in [17].
- [21] Exception for monks resident for two or three years. See discussion above in Analysis, 2. Constitutional Status and Succession to the Superiorship. Circumstances under which such monks could be chosen are discussed below in [22], where the prescribed probationary status is decreased to as little as a year.
- [22] Eligibility of such xenokouroi for the superiorship. Athanasios addresses the apparent contradiction with the chrysobull below in [23].
- [23] Exception does not contradict Nikephoros Phokas' chrysobull. There is no quotation here since Athanasios' assertion is based on the intent rather than the letter of the law.
- [24] Injunction not to discriminate against xenokouroi. For one such xenokouros, Antony, a monk tonsured in the Kyminas monastery, see (14) Ath. Testament [18].
- [25] Punishment appropriate for those who so discriminate. Details of the punishment are provided below in [29].
- [26] Such discrimination is heretical. Although Athanasios asserts here the equivalence of monks "tonsured at home" (an esokouros) and a monk "foreign tonsure" (a xenokouros), a distinction in favor of the former had evidently taken root, perhaps linked to the charisma of tonsure by the holy man himself, for which see [28] below.
- [27] Even monasteries founded beyond Cadiz not "foreign." Cf. the wide geographic appeal of Athanasios as reported in the hagiographic tradition, Vita A, chap. 158, ed. Noret, Vitae duae, pp. 64–75, and Vita B, chap. 43, ed. Noret, p. 176, including monks from Italy, Georgia, and Armenia.
- [28] Monks Athanasios has tonsured not to be preferred to others. See comments in [26] above.
- [29] Specific punishment for those who discriminate against xenokouroi. Cf. [25] above. This passage is partly quoted and summarized in Vita A, chap. 89, ed. Noret, Vitae duae, pp. 41–42, and Vita B, chap. 29, ed. Noret, p. 158, an indication of its importance.
- [30] No unnecessary changes in the rule; ban on worldly possessions; prohibition on alienation of monastic property to friends or relatives. These provisions are literal but unattributed quotations from (3) Theodore Studites [1], [2], and [3], respectively.
- [31] Prohibition of individual or collective ownership of slaves; ban on female animals. These rules are literal, unattributed quotations from (3) Theodore Studites [4] and [5]. A ban on sheep and goats is found below in [53].
- [32] All possessions to be held in common; prohibition of adoptions and spiritual relationships; superior not to administer finances directly. These are literal, unattributed quotations from (3) Theodore Studites [1], [7], and [22] respectively. The injunction to hold all possessions in common is discussed also in Vita A, chap. 88, ed. Noret, Vitae duae, p. 41, and Vita B, chap. 29, ed. Noret, p. 158.
- [33] Guidelines for the superior's life. These are literal quotations from (3) Theodore Studites [20], [10], with an additional regulation by the author particular to Lavra.
- [34] Superior is not to seek higher office, lodge in places where women live, nor have a disciple or servant; prohibition on further acquisitions of property. (12) Tzimiskes [16] banned youths—who commonly served monks—entirely, but as Papachryssanthou, Prôtaton, p. 84, n. 221, observed, this provision was frequently transgressed. The last provision on property acquisitions is original to this document and is reinforced by [45] and [53] below; the others are derived from (3) Theodore Studites [14], [17], and [18], respectively. (3) Theodore Studites [18] has "adolescent disciple."
- [35] Hospitality for guests enjoined; injunction not to give preference to powerful persons. The last provision is an unattributed quotation from (3) Theodore Studites [23].
- [36] Number of monks increased to 120. The reference is to Dölger, Regesten, no. 744; see also the account of how this chrysobull was secured in Vita A, chap. 116, ed. Noret, Vitae duae, p. 56, and Vita B, chap. 36, ed. Noret, p. 169; with discussion by Lemerle, "La vie ancienne de saint Athanase l'Athonite

13. ATH. TYPIKON

- composéé au debut du XI^e siècle par Athanase de Lavra,” Le millénaire du Mont Athos, 963–1963, vol. 1 (Chevetogne, 1963), p. 79, and Lavra, pt. 1, pp. 39, 43. According to Athanasios’ account in his donation to John the Iberian in 984, ed. Lefort et al., Actes de Iviron, pt. 1, doc. 6, however, it was John who actually obtained this chrysobull from John Tzimiskes.
- [37] Provision for five kelliotic monks. See also [40] below for rules for transfer to the kellia and [43] for the identification of some of the sites; cf. the treatment of solitaries in (12) Tzimiskes [10], [12], [18], [20].
- [38] Most monks to observe communal living. (11) Ath. Rule [28] is more tolerant of self-imposed ascetic observances.
- [39] Common meals and liturgical services. There is an apparent reference to Athanasios’ prior legislation on these matters in (11) Ath. Rule, helpful for confirming his authorship of that document.
- [40] Qualifications for transfer from communal to solitary life. Cf. Athanasios’ own promotion by Michael Maleinos to the solitary life at Kyminas as discussed in Vita A, chap. 26, ed. Noret, Vitae duae, p. 14, and Vita B, chap. 9, ed. Noret, pp. 135–36.
- [41] Solitaries not to be harassed. For the imposition of (labor) services on the solitaries, see (12) Tzimiskes [20].
- [42] Apportionment of the imperial grain donation. The reference is to an otherwise unattested benefaction of Nikephoros Phokas, presumably granted to Lavra in 964, for which see Papachryssanthou, Prôtaton, p. 82.
- [43] Description of cells available for use by kelliotic monks. For the cells of the emperor, see Vita A, chap. 73, ed. Noret, Vitae duae, p. 35, and Vita B, chap. 23, ed. Noret, p. 149; according to P. Dumont, “Vie cénobitique ou vie hésychaste dans quelques ‘typica’ byzantins,” L’Église et les Églises, vol. 2 (Chevetogne, 1955), p. 487, n. 1, an oratory associated with this facility still exists under the name of the kathisma of St. John the Forerunner a short distance from Lavra. Among the available cells not mentioned specifically here were those located [9] at the dependency of St. Euthymios at Mylopotamos.
- [44] Rental of cells in exchange for entrance gifts not permitted. Cf. (12) Tzimiskes [6], permitting superiors to sell, donate or bequeath personal property, and [2], permissions required for settlement of non-Athonite monks in kellia; here Athanasios is determined to bring the residents of these cells under the superior of Lavra’s discipline. The general acceptability of an entrance gift (apotage) is indicated in [49] below.
- [45] No other cells to be constructed. This is consonant with Athanasios’ disinclination (in this document at any rate) to permit Lavra’s continued expansion, for which see also [34] above and [53] below. For Mylopotamos, see [9] above and [53] below.
- [46] Unsuccessful solitaries to return to the community. For a compulsory return of solitaries to the koinobion see (24) Christodoulos [A24].
- [47] Grant of cells to John the Iberian. For this individual, one of Athanasios’ closest collaborators who would be designated in (14) Ath. Testament [4] as one of Lavra’s administrators, see Lemerle, Lavra, pt. 1, p. 42, with n. 151, and Papachryssanthou, Prôtaton, pp. 83–85. Athanasios’ grant of these cells is discussed in George the Hagiorite’s Georgian Life of John and his son Euthymios, trans. Peeters, “Histoires,” Vie de Jean et d’Euthyme, chap. 8, p. 19.
- [48] No eunuchs, young or old. Cf. the equivalent provision in (12) Tzimiskes [16] and the Studite-derived ban on adolescent disciples in [34] above. In referring to a eunuch son of the emperor, Athanasios may have had in mind the example of Romanos Lekapenos’ son Theophylaktos (933–56), who was the patriarch of Constantinople during the author’s residence as a monk at the Kyminas monastery.
- [49] Disposition of entrance gifts. The concern over the deleterious effects that entrance gifts could have on the discipline of their donors despite their obvious value to the foundations who were their beneficiaries was heightened during the monastic reform; see the discussions in (9) Galesios [192] and (22) Evergetis [37]. The alternative of banning entrance gifts completely appears only very late in (60) Charsianeites [B16]; here Athanasios leaves open the possibility of accepting them under appropriate circumstances.

TENTH CENTURY

- [50] Novitiate of one year. Cf. the equivalent provision in (12) Tzimiskes [3]; Athanasios' exception for the "pious and well-known" would be adopted later by the monastic reform movement via (22) Evergetis [37].
- [51] Relations with dependency of St. Andrew of Peristerai. For this foundation, an imperial monastery granted by Nikephoros Phokas to Athanasios in 964 under ecclesiastical epidosis, see Papachryssanthou, Prôtaton, pp. 35–36.
- [52] Reform of the dependency. The implication is that this monastery, founded as a cenobitic institution by Euthymios the Younger, for whom see L. Petit, "Vie et office de saint Euthyme le Jeune," BHO 5 (1904), 39–46, in 871 and given a rule (now lost) by him, had subsequently abandoned cenobiticism for some alternative form of monastic organization.
- [53] No new cells, cultivated fields, or vineyards; sheep and goats banned. In a Studite-derived provision [31] above, Athanasios bans the use of female animals. Earlier, (12) Tzimiskes [22] had banned the importation of animals to Mount Athos, with an exception [23] for a yoke permitted to Lavra. See [34] and [45] above for additional provisions foreclosing future growth of the Athonite community.
- [54] Superior obliged to preserve Athanasios' commands. Cf. similar provisions in (3) Theodore Studites [24], (5) Euthymios [2], (6) Rila [5], (8) John Xenos [3], (9) Galesios [246], and (10) Eleousa [22].
- [55] Entire community committed to Athanasios' successor. For the traditional notion of the monastery as a mystical body, also employed by Theodore the Studite, see the pseudo-Basilian Constitutiones asceticae, PG 31, cols. 1381B, 1396B, 1417BD, 1421A.
- [56] Valedictory message to brothers. This chapter is a direct, unattributed quotation from (3) Theodore Studites [25], [26], [27].

14. Ath. Testament: Testament of Athanasios the Athonite for the Lavra Monastery

Date: after 993¹

Translator: George Dennis

Edition employed: Ph. Meyer, Die Haupturkunden für die Geschichte der Athosklöster (Leipzig, 1894), pp. 123–30.

Manuscript: Lavra, unnumbered ms. (1814 A.D.); Codex Iveron 754 (16th c.)²

Other translations: None

Institutional History

For the institutional history of the Lavra Monastery, see (11) Ath. Rule, Institutional History.

Analysis

A. Purpose of the Document

Athanasios used his Testament (diatyposis), the third document under his authorship in our collection, to set up a protectorate for his foundation. The last half of the tenth century was an especially unsettled period for Byzantine religious foundations, yet here, as in (13) Ath. Typikon, Athanasios demonstrates his keen ability to assess the dangers to his foundation's autonomy and devise appropriate safeguards utilizing the most current administrative stratagems known to his era. The vehicle for the protectorate chosen here, the ephoreia, would become more common in the eleventh century and provides the unifying theme for the documents assembled below in Chapter Three of our collection.

Not trusting solely in his foundation's status as one of the first independent and autonomous monasteries, Athanasios here designates two administrators (epitropoi) with specific rights of oversight. The local administrator was to be [4] his long-time associate John the Iberian,³ to be succeeded by the latter's son Euthymios, who would in turn designate his successor. Athanasios considered but then rejected [5] naming Emperor Basil II (976–1025) as a second (lay) administrator for the foundation; instead he chose [6] the patrikios Nikephoros,⁴ who held a high position at court as epi tou kanikleiou, an authenticator of documents. Like John, Nikephoros was to choose [7] the first of his successors, with the result that there would be two self-perpetuating lines of protectors for the foundation. In fact, we know that both lines became extinct well before the second half of the eleventh century, and only the lay protectorate was revived in 1052.⁵

B. Rights and Duties of the Local Administrator

Athanasios authorizes the local administrator, John the Iberian, and, by extension, his successors, to take up [4] residence in the monastery, appoint [12] a new superior in consultation with [13] no more than 15 of the “more prudent and spiritual brothers,” participate [14] in the installation ceremony for the superior, act [15] as overseer and corrector for the foundation, remove [16] an unfit superior, and provide [17], [18] for various individual ascetics (some possibly solitaries) who had been associated with the monastery over the years.

C. Duties of the Lay Administrator

The lay administrator Nikephoros was to collaborate [6] with John the Iberian and to assist the community “in obtaining the temporary and perishable things of this life.” He and his successors were also to serve [7] as “protectors and advocates” for the monks “for all situations which may arise there,” surely including using their influence (cf. [8]) to assure [5], cf. [3] that the monastery’s independence as guaranteed by several imperial chrysobulls would be preserved.

D. Other Administrative Provisions

The very considerable responsibilities with which the two administrators are entrusted, especially those of the local administrator on Mount Athos, probably derive from the rights of traditional private patrons. Athanasios’ reaffirmation [16] that the monastery’s superior was to have “absolute authority and dominion” over the foundation in both spiritual and material matters, which is consonant with his claim to this authority for himself in (13) Ath. Typikon [16], is uneasily balanced by his willingness to see an unfit superior deposed. Also, though Lavra’s monks are enjoined [10] to show “love, peace, humility and proper respect” to the Athonite protos, he is given no specific rights over Athanasios’ foundation.

Other noteworthy administrative provisions include the first provisions in the documents in our collection for an electoral college [13] for the selection of the superior, for a ceremony [14] for that official’s installation, and for his removal [16] if he should prove unfit for office. In another new administrative development, the officials chosen to direct the foundation’s dependencies are granted [11] lifetime tenure until “advanced old age.” Provisions similar to all these regulations will figure prominently in documents of the monastic reform era. Also, for the first time we are provided [1] with some information on how written documents like this were preserved: the ecclesiarch was to place this testament in the katechoumeneion where its contents would remain secret until after Athanasios’ death.⁶

The relationship of this document to (13) Ath. Typikon, if not to (11) Ath. Rule (which seems to be explicitly acknowledged in [3]), is problematic. Despite the fact that (14) Ath. Testament has been preserved alongside (13) Ath. Typikon in at least one early manuscript,⁷ Lemerle’s assertion (Lavra, pt. 1, p. 20) that Athanasios did not intend for the former document to supersede the latter is open to question. Leaving aside the novel institution of the protectorate itself, the authority granted here to the local administrator to select and, should circumstances require, depose the superior, surely represents a considerable change from the arrangements for the succession to Lavra’s leadership envisioned by Athanasios in (13) Ath. Typikon [15], [17] or by the founder Nikephoros Phokas in his chrysobull. The authority of the “preeminent monks” has also been more sharply delineated, though in the most important matters it was to be shared with the local administrator. Moreover, the anti-expansionist economic prescriptions of (13) Ath. Typikon were completely outdated by the end of the tenth century, and there is no trace of them in the present document. Therefore, (14) Ath. Testament should indeed be considered as a new typikon for Lavra, effectively superseding (13) Ath. Typikon with a new administrative structure that Athanasios thought appropriate for changed times.

14. ATH. TESTAMENT

Notes on the Introduction

1. Lemerle, Lavra, pt. 1, p. 20, dates this document to “after December 984,” on the very weak argument, pp. 44–45, that it is “inconceivable” that there would be no allusion to its designation [4] of John the Iberian as Lavra’s administrator in the act of donation that Athanasios issued at that time in John’s favor, ed. J. Lefort et al., Actes d’Ivion (Paris, 1985), pt. 1, doc. 6 [= old Dölger, Schatzkammer, no. 108]; but as Noret, Vitae duae antiquae sancti Athanasii Athonitae (Louvain, 1982), p. cxxii, n. 55, rightly reminds us, Athanasios provides [1] that the present document (and presumably its contents also) was to remain secret until his death. Noret proposes that the document be dated after September 993, the date of Lemerle, Lavra, pt. 1, doc. 10, pp. 122–35, through which Lavra acquired the island of Gymnopelagesion, perhaps the monastery’s second insular possession, thus justifying the reference to the administrators of the “islands” (plural) in [11]; this dating is adopted here.
2. See Meyer, Haupturkunden, pp. 270–71, with comments by Lemerle, Lavra, pt. 1, p. 18. Meyer’s edition is based on the same late manuscripts as its counterpart for (13) Ath. Typikon; a new critical edition is needed.
3. For John the Iberian, see Lemerle, Lavra, pt. 1, with n. 151, and Papachryssanthou, Prôtaton, pp. 83–85.
4. For Nikephoros, see the chrysobull of Constantine IX Monomachos (1052), ed. Lemerle, Lavra, pt. 1, doc. 31, pp. 189–92, at 191, line 15, with Lemerle’s comments, 20. The individual here mentioned may well have been the military commander and writer Nikephoros Ouranos, who seems to have held the office in 982. He was formerly Domestic of the Schools of the West, in which office Lemerle supposes he must have been an influential official in the general vicinity of Athos.
5. See above, (11) Ath. Rule, Institutional History, B 1–2.
6. For other examples of secret testaments, see (28) Pantokrator [68], (29) Kosmosoteira [1], [116], and (52) Choumnos [A3].
7. A Lavriote Ms., reputedly of the 10th–11th century, Panteleemon, “Katalogos,” no. 2059, that he claimed, p. 115, was likely an autograph of Athanasios himself; see Lemerle, Lavra, pt. 1, p. 14.

Bibliography

Beck, Hans-Georg, Kirche und theologische Literatur im byzantinischen Reich (Munich, 1959) p. 589.
Lemerle, Paul et al., Actes de Lavra, pts. 1–4 (Paris, 1970–82), pt. 1, pp. 18–21, 43–46.
Meyer, Ph., Die Haupturkunden für die Geschichte der Athosklöster (Leipzig, 1894), pp. 270–71.

See also the bibliography for (11) Ath. Rule.

TENTH CENTURY

Translation

Testamentary Disposition of our holy and blessed father Athanasios

[1.] My beloved and venerable fathers and brothers, my dear spiritual children, since I the lowly monk Athanasios, guilty of every sin, by God's permission superior of our Lavra established here on the mountain and which is called Melana,¹ fear the uncertain moment of death every day and every hour, and am on the lookout for it in every place, especially while voyaging at sea because of the frequent shipwrecks which occur by God's unsearchable judgment, I deemed it right to leave behind in the Lavra the present memorial, written in the form of a testament or, one could say, a secret, written testamentary disposition, executed and signed. I leave it with the monk Michael, the ecclesiarch, to be kept safely in the katechoumeneion. After my death its contents should be made public. As though it were my living voice I want my thoughts made known to everyone and my concerns to be kept in mind forever by means of the present document.

[2.] I have passed all the days of my life in extreme sorrow. I am acutely conscious of the utter inability of my weak soul to assume charge over others, since I can never show proper concern even for my own soul. So I have been praying to God without ceasing to make known to me a man capable, in accord with his divine will, of being put in charge and well able to direct and shepherd the rational sheep of his flock. It was my prayer that this would happen while I was still alive so that I could withdraw by myself and take serious thought for my many sins. But I did not attain this goal either because of my overwhelming stupidity or lack of understanding, seeing that [p. 124] I judged others in the light of my own lowly self, or because God had so disposed matters, rather, permitted them owing to the great abundance of my wickedness.

[3.] For these reasons, then, I wish and I desire to leave behind after my death a superior taken from among those who make up our fellowship in Christ and our community who should be distinguished among the others for his intellect, his way of life, and his deeds. For this is what the chrysobull of the most blessed and revered emperor lord Nikephoros [II Phokas (963–969)] declares. "The superior of the Lavra must not be appointed from anywhere else except from among the brothers persevering in it, and he must be distinguished in intelligence and in virtue." For these reasons I adjure all my fathers, brothers, and my spiritual children and by the love of Christ I exhort all of you and I place you under oath before God and his all-holy Mother² to yield and subject yourself to my successor as superior just as you did to my lowly self. Live together with love for one another, united in spirit. Let the stronger bear the burdens of the weaker brothers. Contending with all their might and purpose, let each one of those who has received grace from God, whether to provide direction for souls by word and deed or to support the brothers with advice, admonition, and teaching, carefully observe the prescriptions, both those recorded in writing as well as those unwritten ones handed down, in the holy church of God, in the refectory, and in all other services. For they are the prescriptions laid down by our holy, God-bearing fathers, and which my unworthy self has received from their writing and in part from tradition. I now hand these on as a canonical rule and standard for our Lavra.

14. ATH. TESTAMENT

[4.] As administrator for these matters I leave lord John, who has toiled for a long time and served with great gentleness and humility. He is genuinely spiritual, prudent, and full of love and faith toward my unworthy self and toward the entire community. He has dwelt here on the mountain, persevered, and grown old in his way of life together with me. After I leave this life I want him to come into the Lavra and, if possible, to take up residence there with the brothers, to direct them and prepare them for recognizing and submitting to their superior. But if this is not feasible [p. 125], at least he should visit the community on a more regular basis and get them organized. When he comes to die let him leave behind in his stead as administrator the lord Euthymios, my spiritual son, and his own son according to the flesh and the spirit. When his turn comes to die, let him leave behind to succeed him as administrator a wise and spiritual man, whether he be found in this Lavra or elsewhere on the mountain. Let those who come after him do likewise.

[5.] It had been my desire, nonetheless, to designate the holy emperor [Basil II (976–1025)] himself as administrator of our revered Lavra, but awe restrained me, and I realized that this was rather bold. He is, after all, the emperor, the ruler and lord, the father and provider not only of myself, who am least of all, and of my fathers and brothers, but of all Christians. In a special manner, though, more than to any other persons, secular or monks, he has displayed his good will to our unworthy, lowly selves and to our Lavra. He has taken steps to increase our resources by means of his revered chrysobulls, in which he also confirmed the chrysobulls of the other emperors, lord Nikephoros [II Phokas (963–969)] and lord John [I Tzimiskes (969–976)]. In addition to these he himself issued others in our favor.

[6.] Since, for the reasons already given, I was not bold enough to designate the good emperor for the position of administrator, I do leave my most devout lord, the true lover of Christ and of monks, Nikephoros, the most glorious patrikos and epi tou kanikleiou, as administrator, protector, and advocate of our assemblage in Christ and our Lavra. In expectation of being rewarded by God and for the sanctification of his own soul, he should associate himself and work together with my lord John the Iberian, my spiritual brother and father, and the entire community in Christ in all the distressing circumstances of their way of life. Let him struggle to assist them in obtaining the temporary and perishable things of this life. But let lord John the Iberian and all the brothers earnestly carry on their struggle to attain the imperishable and eternal goods in the life to come with all eagerness and love, and pray without ceasing on [p. 126] his behalf.

[7.] When his turn comes to depart this life, he should leave behind in his stead an administrator for this revered Lavra, and let each subsequent administrator before his death do the same. In this way, hoping to be rewarded by God and for the sake of their precious souls, there will be protectors and advocates there in the God-guarded city for all situations which may arise there and for the service of the Lavra. But those who are in the ranks of the monks, inasmuch as they are on the mountain and are neighbors, or rather, dwell together with my fathers and brothers, should strive with all their might, because of the reverence and virtue which belongs to them, to take care of our community as if they were different members of one body in every spiritual and corporal respect. May they receive their reward from the great giver, God, in the day of judgment for having maintained faith and love for my lowly, unworthy self, guilty of every sin, not only during my life but also after my death. This is enough concerning the administrators.

TENTH CENTURY

[8.] You, my fathers, brothers, and spiritual children, with complete enthusiasm and with a good disposition strive to maintain peace and unshakable unity of mind with each other. May there not be schisms among you, nor factions or quarrels or divisive friendships or groups of companions. But let there be faith and love, a loving disposition toward one another and toward your superior, and an exact observance of my commandments, even the least, and of the prescriptions and rule which have been handed down to you. I believe that God in his goodness will open up the hearts, not only of the administrators, but also of every other person of high rank so they may show compassion for you, support you, and cooperate with you for the benefit of your souls.

[9.] Pay close attention, my brothers, that if anyone should be found among you, which I pray will not be the case, attempting to divide the body of the community by specious arguments, deceit, or wickedness, none of you should have anything at all to do with such a person. You should, rather, quickly expel him and drive him out of your company as a corrupt influence and as yeast which has gone flat. It is he who ought to be divided from the portion of the saved. For it is appropriate to bring imprecations upon a person who attempts such things [p. 127] so that his memory may be utterly removed from the earth, his name be blotted out of the book of the living and not be recorded among the just (cf. Gen. 17:14; Exod. 32:32). But if anyone be found taking his side, let him also share his portion and his lot. I enjoin upon my administrator lord John and the entire community that they immediately drive such people out of the Lavra.

[10.] I command that the same disposition and spiritual love be observed by you toward the Lavra of lord John and the brothers with him which you saw my lowly and sinful self have and observe, and which I frequently taught to you in common during the instructions and individually to each one. You should act in this way not only to lord John and those with him but also to everyone else, not just to those who love and honor you, but at times to those who hate you, harass you, and confront you with trials and injuries. Rather indeed, it is necessary to love and to show mercy according to God's command (Luke 6: 27, 35) to those who assault and attempt to injure you. Actually those men are only harming themselves and are conferring the greatest benefits on you. I know that you have learnt by experience from the events themselves and that you have been convinced by the many things which have happened to us that those trying to injure us have been of the greatest help to us, both for body and soul. Moreover, toward the protos, the superiors, and the brothers of our holy mountain observe love, peace, humility, and proper respect just as you used to see my lowly self observing.

[11.] Those who serve well, devoutly, and in a spiritual manner for the benefit of their own souls, whether in the Lavra, in the external or internal dependencies, and on the islands, should be without successors until advanced old age, especially those who strive with divine zeal to maintain unswerving obedience to the superior who succeeds my lowly self, and who have a very strong motivation and desire to gather provisions for the ordinary needs of their spiritual brothers at the

14. ATH. TESTAMENT

Lavra and who look upon this sort of service as a means of working out the salvation of their own souls. Let them serve in this capacity for their entire life according to the will of the superior and the administrator, but not on their own authority. [p. 128]

[12.] To my administrator the monk John the Iberian I give this order and command from the Lord God and his all-holy Mother that after my death he conduct himself toward our assemblage in Christ, the Lavra, and to all connected with it both on the mountain and off it, in accordance with the command of God and the teaching of our holy fathers. Let him remain with the brothers in the Lavra for several days and speak with them both in a group and individually. Let them offer prayers and ekteneis without any respect of persons, dispassionately, and in complete freedom, for God sees and knows the hidden thoughts in the hearts of each. He should deliberate together with the prominent more educated and spiritual brothers. They should make a long and careful investigation, laying bare their own thoughts and judgments as well as those of the rest. In this way let them proceed to appoint a superior, one who would be approved by God and with whom the administrator and the preeminent brothers are fully satisfied.

[13.] The brothers whose advice the administrator shall seek for the election of a superior should not exceed fifteen, but should more or less make up that number. We are not excluding the others from this council because they are not spiritual or educated, for by the grace of God all of them are spiritual, competent, and prudent, but because in a large number there are many different particular propensities, and each has a different opinion. Some prefer this man, others that one. For this reason I have determined that it is just and reasonable to have a select group rather than a large one, as explained above, take part, with the advice of the administrator, in voting for the superior.

[14.] The installation of the superior should take place as follows. In the evening let the night office service be held in the main church of the most holy Mother of God. After matins the divine liturgy should be celebrated. Following the distribution of the divine consecrated gifts, the prayer behind the ambo should be recited. The ektenes should begin, and the “Kyrie eleison” should be repeated fifty times. The newly elected superior should make a prostration before the altar. He should then turn to face the assembled monks. The administrator should make a prostration to him first, and then all the others. As mentioned earlier, the administrator should support him and cooperate with him to the best of his ability, and the brothers should [p. 129] offer him pure and genuine submission.

[15.] As time goes on, lord John the Iberian should continue to oversee and to observe the manner in which the superior and the brothers conduct themselves. He shall be sure to note the serious concern, the strong love, and the friendly disposition of soul on the part of the superior toward the brothers, and, on the other hand, the obedience, trust, and love which they shall strive to possess in their souls toward the superior, or even anything contrary to these virtues. Let him strengthen what is conducive to their spiritual condition and let him correct what is not conducive and lead them to the right path. May he receive the reward for his efforts on their behalf from God, the lover of mankind, in the kingdom of heaven.

TENTH CENTURY

[16.] After the superior's promotion and installation I firmly desire that he should have absolute authority and dominion in every respect in both spiritual and corporal matters. He must not be disturbed or impeded by anyone at all, especially as he is carrying out his duties well, in a manner pleasing to God, and in the spirit of God and is shepherding the company in Christ. But if, owing to my sins, the passage of time should make it clear that he is acting in such a way as to bring injury and perversion and utter destruction upon the souls of the community, which we pray may not be the case with the superior, not even in a dream, but if he is found to be such and does not correct himself, then the administrator should consult with the preeminent brothers, relying also on his own judgment and wisdom, and make careful provision for the community by appointing a man capable of bringing stability to the Lavra and all the brothers, and he should be able to do so until the end of his life.

[17.] I also desire and I order the superior and the administrator and all my spiritual brothers that they provide a resting place for my lord Antony until the end of his life and honor him appropriately and look upon him as a spiritual father. In like manner, they shall treat those brothers with him as their own members, likewise the monk John the calligrapher, according to the prescribed order and custom which I established and which those serving him have been observing. After my death the superior, the officials and all the brothers shall continue to observe it, as they did during the lifetime of my lowly self. Rather, let [p. 130] them give evidence by their deeds of even greater honor and love to him.

[18.] In like manner they should deal with the monk George the Iberian, the monk Gregory the magistros, the monk Dorotheos, the monk Antony from Mount Kyminas, and abba Sergios. Honor the priest lord Theophanes, minister to him, and serve him even more kindly than my lowly self did. For he is getting old and has very little strength left in his body. At the same time make a real effort to provide for the regular needs of the other old monks, the lord Sophronios and the rest of them. Do this without grumbling, but eagerly with a spiritual disposition, so that you may receive an abundant reward for your service to them from God in the day of judgment.

[19.] Be extremely attentive to hospitality and do not neglect the rule I gave to you regarding travelers and visitors who come to you either by sea or by land.

[20.] All of you together, young and old, first and last, must strive to observe genuine submission to your superior, yielding to his word in everything, for whoever resists his orders takes a stand against the command of God.

[21.] Finally, remember me, a poor sinner, in all your prayers, so I may obtain mercy and forgiveness for my many sins in the day of judgment.

14. ATH. TESTAMENT

Notes on the Translation

1. An attribute of Lavra recalling Athanasios' original settlement at the future site of the monastery in 960, for which see Vita A, chap. 57, ed. Noret, Vitae duae, p. 28, and Vita B, chap. 21, ed. Noret, p. 146.
2. The dedicatee and patroness of Lavra's katholikon.

Document Notes

- [1] Safekeeping and storage of the document. Cf. later security provisions in (19) Attaleiates [40] and (32) Mamas, Addition, Second Semeioma.
- [2] Athanasios' failure to decide on his successor. His fear that he might die without naming one may account for the regulation in [12], [13] below.
- [3] Citation of Nikephoros Phokas' chrysobull on the succession; admonition of obedience to the next superior; canon and rule for Lavra. Lemerle, Lavra, pt. 1, p. 18, n. 27, considered the citation to be an inexact quotation of the same passage from this source found in (13) Ath. Typikon [18]; he also identifies, p. 19, n. 28, the reference to the canon and rule as an allusion to (11) Ath. Rule. The admonition to obedience is quoted in Vita A, chap. 214, ed. Noret, Vitae duae, p. 105, and in Vita B, chap. 29, ed. Noret, p. 159.
- [4] Designation of John the Iberian as the local administrator. According to the Georgian Life of John and his son Euthymios, John continued to govern his own monastery of Iveron until illness forced him to hand its administration over to Euthymios, who ruled for 14 years until his own accidental death in 1028; see summary in Lemerle, Lavra, pt. 1, p. 42, n. 151.
- [5] Intent to designate Basil II as lay administrator. For Athanasios' relations with this emperor, see Lemerle, Lavra, pt. 1, pp. 46–48. Basil II's confirmation is Dölger, Regesten, no. 758, speculatively dated to 976; only one of the other chrysobulls alluded to here is preserved, Dölger, Regesten, no. 760, ed. Lemerle, Lavra, pt. 1, doc. 7, pp. 111–14, dated to July 978, which increased Lavra's imperial subsidy to ten talents of silver. According to his Georgian Life, John the Iberian actually did designate Basil II and his brother Constantine VIII as the administrators of his Iveron monastery; see Lemerle, Lavra, pt. 1, p. 42, n. 151.
- [6] Designation of Nikephoros epi tou kanikleiou as lay administrator. Athanasios here bestows on Nikephoros the titles of administrator (epitropos), protector (prostates), and advocate (antileptor).
- [7] Nikephoros to choose his own successor. We learn from the chrysobull of Constantine IX Monomachos (1052), ed. Lemerle, Lavra, pt. 1, doc. 31, p. 191, line 22 ff., that this did not happen, and that the lay protectorate expired at his death, to Lavra's considerable detriment.
- [8] Injunction to avoid dissension. The Lavriote monks seem to have ignored Athanasios' advice, quarreling subsequently with the local administrator and, according to the aforementioned chrysobull of Constantine IX (p. 191, lines 26–27) holding their superiors in contempt and behaving in disorderly fashion; see Lemerle, Lavra, pt. 1, pp. 49–50.
- [9] Expulsion prescribed for troublemakers. So also (2) Pantelleria [20], (22) Evergetis [9], and (23) Pakourianos [13].
- [10] Maintenance of good relations with the Iveron monastery. See Lemerle, Lavra, pt. 1, p. 45, for a discussion of these relations.
- [11] Tenure of office for officials. This chapter testifies to Lavra's territorial expansion in spite of the earlier provisions to the contrary found in (13) Ath. Typikon [34], [45], [53]. Noret, Duae vitae, p. cxxii, n. 55 identifies Lavra's island possessions as Neoi and Gymnopelagesion. Later, the monastic reform document (22) Evergetis [32] will adopt the principle of indefinite tenure of office for officials unless they should be guilty of neglect or dishonesty.
- [12] Rights and duties of John the Iberian. See also [15] below. The latter's role in the election of Lavra's superior constitutes an important amendment to the procedures laid down earlier in (13) Ath. Typikon [17]; cf. (17) Nikon Metanoete [13] and the much more circumscribed roles allowed to later admin-

TENTH CENTURY

- istrators with various titles in (27) Kecharitomene [11], (32) Mamas [1], and (33) Heliou Bomon [1].
- [13] Consultation with a small group of brothers for the election. Cf. the electoral role of the “more prominent brothers” in (13) Ath. Typikon [16], [17]; the 15 “notables” are among the signatories of Athanasios’ act of donation to John the Iberian in 984, ed. Lefort et al., Iviron, pt. 1, doc. 6 [= old Dölger, Schatzkammer, no. 108], for which see Lemerle, Lavra, pt. 1, p. 44.
- [14] Installation service for the superior. This, the first prescription for this service in our collection of documents, should be compared to those in such later documents of the monastic reform such as (22) Evergetis [13], (27) Kecharitomene [11], (32) Mamas [1], and (33) Heliou Bomon [1].
- [15] Other responsibilities of the local administrator. Supplements [12] above. Here John the Iberian effectively substitutes for the local bishop for the provision of “spiritual correction.”
- [16] Superior’s absolute authority and lordship; procedure for his removal from office. Cf. Athanasios’ view of his own authority in (13) Ath. Typikon [16]. The procedure for the removal of the superior, another novel but influential usage in our collection of documents, employs here the administrator and “prominent monks,” presumably those who play a role above in [12], [13] in choosing the superior with him. Later, the reform tradition would resolve the paradox of the superior’s absolute authority coexisting with his removability by de-emphasizing the former and preserving the latter, either through the agency of the “prominent monks” alone, as in (22) Evergetis [14], the administrators, as in (27) Kecharitomene [13], cf. (18) Nea Gephyra [3], or both, as in (32) Mamas [2].
- [17] Maintenance for Antony and the calligrapher John. Lemerle, Lavra, pt. 1, p. 48, identifies the former as Athanasios’ successor; in 984 he signed Athanasios’ act of donation to John the Iberian at the head of the list of 15 “leading monks.”
- [18] Maintenance for certain other monks. These monks, the first five of whom may have been the solitaries assigned to the kellia discussed in (13) Ath. Typikon [37], are not otherwise known. Antony, a xenokouros from the Kyminas monastery, may well have been one of those Athanasios had in mind in when he vigorously defended xenokouroi from discrimination in (13) Ath. Typikon [24].
- [19] Provision for hospitality. See (13) Ath. Typikon [35] and discussion of Athanasios’ provisions for pilgrims in Vita A, chaps. 106–8, ed. Noret, Vitae duae, pp. 50–51, and Vita B, chap. 35, ed. Noret, pp. 166–67.
- [20] Necessity of obedience of all to the superior. Cf. Studite-derived parallel treatment in (13) Ath. Typikon [56].
- [21] Founder’s request for prayers. For earlier examples, see (1) Apa Abraham [7], (5) Euthymios [2], and (6) Rila [20]; subject of much more extensive and elaborate provisions in twelfth-century documents such as (27) Kecharitomene [71], (29) Kosmosoteira [89], etc.

15. Constantine IX: Typikon of Emperor Constantine IX Monomachos

Date: September 1045

Translator: Timothy Miller

Edition employed: Denise Papachryssanthou, Prôtaton (= Archives de l'Athos 7) (Paris, 1975), pp. 216–32, with text at 224–32.

Manuscript: Codex Iveron (1096)¹

Other translations: Russian, by Porfirii Uspensky, Vostok kristianskii. Athon. Istoriia Athona, vol. 3, pt. 1 (Kiev, 1877), pp. 169–81.

Analysis

Like the earlier (12) Tzimiskes and the much later (59) Manuel II, this document illustrates an emperor exercising his prerogative to legislate for the Athonite monastic communities under his patronage. The actual author of this document, however, was the monk Kosmas Tzintziloukes,² dispatched by Constantine IX much as his predecessor Euthymios had been some 73 years earlier by John Tzimiskes to settle a series of disciplinary problems among the various monastic communities on Mount Athos. This time the emperor provided general instructions that the settlement should adhere to the provisions of the prior typikon, (12) Tzimiskes, and the relevant imperial chrysobulls. In the same spirit, the emperor ordered that the election of the protos should take place “according to the ancient rule” (confirming (12) Tzimiskes [28]). Yet in fact the Athonite monks persuaded Kosmas Tzintziloukes to endorse a considerable number of changes, which the emperor himself subsequently ratified a year later in a chrysobull that confirms this typikon.³

The immediate cause of the controversy is not identifiable, though as Papachryssanthou (Prôtaton, p. 104) suggests, based no doubt on the concluding injunction of the emperor’s instructions, it may have concerned a disputed election of the protos. In any event, as (9) Galesios, a roughly contemporaneous document, makes clear, the mid-eleventh century was a time of considerable ideological ferment in Byzantine monasticism. On Mount Athos, the older and more experienced ascetics who made the appeal to the emperor that led to Tzintziloukes’ inquest were advocates of fundamentalist reform.⁴ They insisted on a return to the conditions of monastic life in the previous century as regulated by earlier governing documents, especially (12) Tzimiskes, but also a now lost typikon of Emperor Basil II (976–1025) and imperial chrysobulls of unspecified authorship. The reformers contended with others, evidently including most of the superiors, who maintained that the considerably increased size of the monastic communities justified—and indeed could not be sustained without—a more permissive attitude towards a whole range of profitable economic activities.⁵

Prior to this imperial inquiry, the factions had battled out the issues in secular courts, which had not hesitated to depose and install superiors to carry out their judgments. We are told that the outcome was usually contrary to the typika and chrysobulls, implying that the advocates of leniency and economic expansion were getting the better of the fundamentalists. The latter, however, evidently gained a significant advantage by succeeding in framing the terms of the imperial inquiry, namely that it should be based on documentary sources, and with a presumptive mandate of returning the monastic communities to the observances set down in the previous century. These guidelines are contained in a letter from the emperor himself that is quoted near the beginning of the document.

Neither side won a complete victory on the mountain in 1045. Kosmas Tzintziloukes, true to the emperor's orders to permit no innovations, structured the debate around the constitutive documents. Exploiting their tactical advantage, the reformers first got Kosmas to agree to the expulsion [1] of beardless youths and eunuchs who had been tonsured in violation of (12) Tzimiskes [16]. Returning to this topic later in the inquiry, the reformers denounced superiors and monks who ordained teenage boys as priests and deacons [15]. Motivated by kinship ties or "some unsuitable attachment," some superiors even designated such youths as their successors in their wills.

The reformers' hostility to manifestations of aristocratic privilege is clear in their attempt [13] to revive the legislation of (12) Tzimiskes restricting the large number of servants who traditionally accompanied the superiors to the Athonite assemblies and frequently caused disturbances. The reformers failed to get the strict limitations of the earlier typikon revived and had to settle for more lenient restrictions. It is worth noting that even the reformers did not propose that the superiors should give up their servants. The controversy was limited to whether servants should accompany their masters to the assemblies, and what role they should play there.

The reformers generally failed in their attempts to return Mount Athos to the more austere economic regime endorsed by Tzimiskes' typikon. They argued vigorously and convincingly that current economic activities,⁶ many of them straightforwardly oriented towards profitable production for external markets, were clearly in violation of provisions in earlier typika. Yet their opponents who argued for leniency won most of the arguments by demonstrating the impracticality of these provisions, particularly in view of the mountain's greatly increased population.⁷

In a protest against one of the ancient abuses of the traditional Byzantine system of private patronage, the reformers decried [9] the propensity of some patron-superiors to cancel the benefactions they had made to their foundations. Upheld by Kosmas on this point, their protest would in another generation's time harden into an assertion of the absolute inalienability of all donations made to the benefit of ecclesiastical institutions. The reformers who, given their restrictive economic program, tended to come from the smaller foundations, are also found here successfully championing [10], [11] the interests of these lesser institutions against the protos and the heads of the larger monasteries, particularly when the latter authorities sought to infringe on the former's traditional rights in common lands.

A provision [8] of uncertain reference condemns those who dared to introduce and expel superiors as well as to cancel and amend the testaments of departed superiors, e.g., documents analogous to (14) Ath. Testament. These may be either the officers of the courts referred to in the preface or perhaps charistikarioi, the lay beneficiaries of the public program for the management of ecclesiastical institutions that was by this time encompassing an ever greater number of the private religious foundations of the empire. If so, this is another presage of a theme that would be central to the program of a later generation of ecclesiastical reformers.

15. CONSTANTINE IX

It is also significant that the reformers did not limit themselves to citing relatively recent constitutive documents in support of their positions, but also brought [7] to Kosmas' attention the ruling of Basil of Caesarea condemning the reception of wandering monks without the permission of their previous superiors. This foreshadows the time when reformers would prefer patristic precedent to any number of imperial decrees or private typika.

Finally, the provision [14] for deciding "every important issue" concerning the Athonite community in a general assembly under the presidency of the protos, the superiors of Lavra and the other principal monasteries, and also "other most devout elders" would appear to represent a defeat (contra Papachryssanthou, Prôtaton, p. 107) for the Lavra and the great cenobitical monasteries that since Athanasios' time had sought institutional autonomy without accountability to either the protos or their neighbors. Indeed, even the imperial representative Tzintziloukes felt constrained to declare [15] that the provisions of the typikon itself had not been imposed "in an authoritarian or imperious manner, nor without consultation and review," but rather "with the consent and approval of all of the most devout monks of the Mountain and their superiors."

Notes on the Introduction

1. This is an official copy of the lost original, validated by Theodoulos, metropolitan of Thessalonike. For details, see Papachryssanthou, Prôtaton, pp. 216–17, with illustrations of the Iveron ms. in Album, pls. XXI–XXIII.
2. Tzintziloukes, a confidant of and likely spiritual father to the earlier emperor Michael IV the Paphlagonian (1034–1041); he was probably the superior of the Constantinopolitan monastery of the Anargyroi. See Psellos, Chronographia 4.52, ed. E. Renauld, vol. 1 (Paris, 1926–28), pp. 83–84; John Skylitzes, Synopsis historiarum, ed. J. Thurn (Berlin, 1973), p. 415; and Papachryssanthou, Prôtaton, pp. 221–22.
3. Dölger, Regesten, no. 879, ed. Papachryssanthou, Prôtaton, doc. 9, pp. 233–38, dated to June 1046.
4. For the identification of the reform party that led the protest to Constantine IX, see the latter's confirming chrysobull, ed. Papachryssanthou, Prôtaton, doc. 9, p. 236, line 7; cf. (15) Constantine IX [13], [15].
5. For the identification of the opposing party, see (15) Constantine IX [1], [2], [3], [4], [5], [11], [12], [13].
6. (15) Constantine IX [2], [3], [4], [5], [6], [12].
7. (15) Constantine IX [2], [3], [4], [5].

Bibliography

- Lemerle, Paul, et al., Actes de Lavra, pts. 1–4 (Paris, 1970–82), pt. 1, pp. 40–51.
Meyer, Ph., Die Haupturkunden für die Geschichte der Athosklöster (Leipzig, 1894), pp. 36–38.
Papachryssanthou, Denise, Actes du Prôtaton (= Archives de l'Athos 7) (Paris, 1975), pp. 102–7.
Volk, Robert, Gesundheitswesen und Wohltätigkeit im Spiegel der byzantinischen Klostertypika (Munich, 1983), pp. 72–73.

ELEVENTH CENTURY

Translation

The copy of the typikon issued for the Holy Mountain by the monk Kosmas Tzintziloukes by order of the renowned emperor, Lord Constantine [IX] Monomachos.

[Introduction]

The thoughts of a truly lordly and sacred emperor are deeply concerned not only with political matters and plans for the army, with turning back hostile peoples and enslaving enemies, with subjugating populous cities beneath his hand, but also with upholding especially the divine ordinances and the sacred canons. [Such an emperor] takes great care of those dedicated to God, who have fled the world and dwell in the mountains, who hold fast to God alone and strive after virtue, who know nothing more than this. He tries not only to guard them from abuses and every other sort of evil and to reward them with truly imperial and lavish munificence, but also to [p. 225] correct those errors of theirs which have their origin in Satan's envy of men, to stabilize their wavering, to join together the sundered pieces, and to lead the chosen and "peculiar people" of the Lord to peace and harmony (Ex. 19:5).

Now, it is possible to see such actions under our lord, the Christ-loving and pious emperor Constantine Monomachos. For, more than any others, the monks of the celebrated Mount Athos have always waged a hard fight against the one who has been the common enemy and opponent of the human race from the beginning. They did not, however, have an enemy who carelessly neglected to fight back against them in battle. When they had become lazy and sluggish, he secretly sowed the tares of conflict, strife, and division in their good seed of peace, love, and harmony (cf. Matt. 13:24–30). After such evil had advanced far, the monks came to his imperial majesty and sought to find a release from the threatening evils and from the spiritual danger born of these evils through the emperor's agency. They requested that this be done by dispatching some monk from among those who had experience concerning the solitary life, the sacred laws, and the correction and treatment of those scandals which take their origin from the evil one.

The aforementioned Christ-loving ruler received them, saw and heard them kindly, hearing what they had to say; and he approved their request. He promised to send such a monk as they had requested so that he could correct whatever evils had arisen among them, and establish order on the Mountain and true harmony among the monks practicing asceticism there. On account of this, he sent an honorable and august letter of his imperial majesty to us, humble as we are, which detailed clearly the situation in these words:

"The monks of the monastery of the Holy Mountain some time ago came to my imperial majesty to seek aid since they were being dragged before secular courts contrary to their *typikon*¹ and the chrysobulls which were kept on the mountain. By the power of these courts superiors were being chosen and all sorts of other things were taking place so that the force of the typikon and the orders of the chrysobulls remained only in writing. Now since certain questions had sprung up among the monks, both concerning the superior and concerning certain accusations dealing with spiritual matters, my imperial majesty decided that it was necessary to entrust the discernment of these questions to a man who has lived according to God's way and has experience in correcting spiritual ills so that the flock of Christ would not long remain divided against one another. Since there will be no one better suited to take these matters in hand than you [the monk Kosmas], my imperial majesty commands you to submit to this rewarding task and depart thither to study the typikon and the order of the chrysobulls. You are also to examine all the innovations of the monks and are to introduce a fitting remedy. In no case is the action of the judge to prevail against you. You should, however, make known in detail what your piety has established in order that my majesty might have full knowledge and can answer those who hereafter might wish to oppose [these measures]. For my majesty does not wish that anything novel should be undertaken on this Holy Mountain, but rather that the ancient laws and rules be observed and that all be done according to the orders of the emperors of blessed memory. My majesty wishes that, with knowledge and scrutiny, you fairly resolve all the accusations concerning spiritual matters, and moreover, [I wish] the election of the protos to be carried out according to the ancient rule² and that [the results] be dispatched to my majesty.”

15. CONSTANTINE IX

This, then, [p. 226] was the text of the imperial and sacred letter of command. When I, the very least of monks, Kosmas Tzintziloukes, arrived on this holy mountain, following the stipulation of the imperial and sacred decree—a fair and just stipulation pleasing to God—I assembled all the most pious monks and superiors who were on this mountain. They numbered more than one hundred and eighty. [I summoned them] to meet with us in the Lavra of the Karyes as was the custom.³ As soon as this was announced, they were all assembled and gave great thanks to God. They also prayed fervently on behalf of the ruler because indeed he had brought their desire to completion and had fulfilled in deeds what he had promised in words. When we had sat down together with the aforementioned superiors and the Protos of the Mountain⁴ and had listened to what had gone on between the opposing sides, we discovered that what they presented was nothing else than the harassment of demons and senseless strife. As we asked for the gold-sealed typikon and the [other] chrysobulls issued by the blessed emperors, all of these documents were brought forth and read for all to hear. We asked which were the clauses which demanded correction from the imperial majesty.

[1.] Before all else they said that some [of the monks] showed no respect for the provisions laid down in the typikon, namely, that the monks should not accept and tonsure either eunuchs or beardless youths, nor have these in the fields or the monastery. The monks said that such evil demanded correction. Therefore, we together with the monks were immediately roused to condemn this and correct what pertained to it and we found that all [the monks] from the great down to the small were convinced and were ready to offer fervent promises that they would expel all such persons from the Mountain. Their expulsion, then, was carried out by the most devout monks—the superiors, the overseers, and the elders who were dispatched with these men—in accord with the collective will and the wish of the most devout Protos Theophylaktos, of Neophytos the most devout monk and superior of the Great Lavra, of Athanasios the most devout monk and superior of the Vatopedi monastery,⁵ and of George the most devout monk and superior of the Iveron monastery⁶ and [in accord] with our examination and judgment.

[2.] After this, they raised as their second point that some of the monks and superiors had fitted out boats to sell wine and some other products and had gone to the Queen of Cities [Constantinople] and to other cities and had sold these goods commercially. We, therefore, studied this matter—whether it had been specified in some document after the typikon had been drawn up that they could possess boats—and we found a written and signed typikon of the blessed lord, the emperor Basil [II (976–1025)], which had been issued with the common knowledge of the protos at that time and of all the monks resident on Athos. This typikon not only did not allow this, but it even banned such demeaning trade and established expulsion from the Mountain as the punishment for those who dared do such a thing. On the other hand, it allowed the monks to own small boats and permitted them to sell excess wine as far as Thessalonike and the settlements within that region, if in fact no ships from outside were at hand. They should not, however, buy from some and sell to others, for such activity is proper to greed and to disgraceful gain.

We, too, wanted to require that the monks submit to this same canon, but it seemed to everyone that this was too difficult and burdensome. For they demonstrated that, if they [p. 227] owned no boats to supply the very needs of the monastery and to sell its fruits and surplus wine to people, they could not remain a single day on the Mountain. After this had been extensively studied, therefore, all were agreed that the monasteries would own small boats having a capacity of 200 to 300 modioi,⁷ sufficient only to meet their needs and to labor in their service. The monks were to go as far as Thessalonike and Ainos, and offering their excess produce to these people, they would take in exchange whatever they needed.

It would not be possible, however, for any monk to journey forth and leave the Mountain with the boats during the revered days of the holy and great Lent. Rather, they remain in their own monasteries and attend constantly upon God and on one another. Neither from the Mountain nor from outside were they to buy any sort of goods (I mean wheat or barley, wine or olive oil, or any other commodity of whatever kind) nor would they conduct commercial business by going hither and thither as people of the world do. This has been legislated as a compromise solution.

Clearly, those who are going to own such boats are to be certified before the protos and the assembly so that, if they should disregard the present ruling, their boats can be sold by the protos and the community and the price of the boats given to the steward of the Mountain so that it can be spent for the common needs. Moreover, it will not be permitted for someone who has done this to own another boat or to leave the Mountain in order that “the rest may stand in fear” (I Tim. 5:20) in the words of the Apostle.

It was also ordered that the large boats be totally decommissioned, except for the [monasteries] which have been granted the right to have them by gold-sealed sigillia of our emperors of blessed memory and except for the monastery of Vatopedi which a long time ago received the right to own such a boat by the written approval and wish of the man who was protos at the time and of the other superiors on the Mountain.

[3.] Proposing their third point, they said that all the typika and imperial decrees alike ordered that it would not be permitted for any of the monks to own cattle or teams of oxen, nor indeed to introduce them to the Mountain from alien land for grazing, unless of course this had been done with the approval of the monks. Nevertheless, now many of the monasteries own sheep and goats, while the Lavra of lord Athanasios even owns cattle. We agreed with them that it was right and proper to take action concerning this matter, and we ordered that they all rapidly divest themselves of whatever they could not legally own.

15. CONSTANTINE IX

All the rest, indeed, accepted this and were eager to divest themselves of such things. The most devout monk Neophytos, on the other hand, objected that it was impossible to support the large number of monks at his lavra together with the incapacitated old men without these cattle. As a reasonable defense he brought out that indeed these animals had not been introduced by him onto the Mountain, but it was now fifty years since this had been done by those who had been superiors before him and that the superiors of the Mountain had accepted this as an accomplished fact. When we again objected strongly, on the one hand, he accepted by banning the sheep, but on the other hand, he asked that he keep possession of the herd of cattle in a special and separate place for the consolation of the sick and those suffering from wretched old age. Therefore, all the superiors of the Mountain together with their oft-mentioned protos, the most devout monk Theophylaktos, consented to this.

They, then, clearly won us over concerning this matter. Indeed, since we realized ourselves that it was not possible for 700 monks to nourish themselves from [p. 228] fish alone, we compromised by yielding to the request of the superior and to the pleasure of the elders and the [other] superiors. It was then ordered that the aforementioned cattle stay far from all the monasteries (more than twelve miles) and that they be pastured by monks and never approach the monasteries.

[4.] Moreover, since it was stipulated long ago that the Lavra of lord Athanasios could own one team to work at kneading the bread for the brothers and since the number of brothers had increased from 100 to 700, all the monks of the Mountain were content to add three more teams to this one. We, too, agreed with the desire of all and ordered that the monastery could own such teams for kneading [bread] for the monks as has been said. On the other hand, no one at all was to plow or spread seed on the land with these teams. A compromise was made also with the monastery of Vatopedi because it had become so populous. It was acceptable to the protos and to all the other elders that this monastery have one team to knead the brothers' bread.

[5.] All agreed to another compromise which allowed the monastery of the Amalfitans to own a large boat since they were unable to survive by any other means. They were not to make use of this boat for commercial purposes, but they were to travel with it to the Queen of Cities if they wanted to import anything they needed for their monastery or to be supplied from those who love Christ.

[6.] Concerning this matter, however, certain ones raised the issue that some monks were exporting by boat lumber for building, thin planks, firewood, and pitch outside the Mountain and were selling these commodities to men of the world, and moreover, they suggested that such activity had been banned by the ancient typikon. Thereupon, we laid down that hereafter no one ought to do such a thing, but should sell these items to those on the Mountain for the private needs of the monasteries themselves. If, however, anyone is caught in such activity, he shall suffer the loss of the boat itself in a manner we have mentioned above.

[7.] The divine Basil, who reveals heavenly things, decreed in a rather detailed fashion that it was not right for a monk to leave one monastery and be received by others.⁸ So, too, the typikon of the

ELEVENTH CENTURY

Mountain prevented such things, for it states clearly that it is not permitted for another community to receive a brother who has left his monastery without the knowledge and approval of the superiors, except where the head of the monastery hands him over to this community in accordance with [the superior's] own will and the assent of the community under him.

[8.] This matter, too, came to my attention and we have found it to a greater degree in actions themselves. Namely, that some dare to overturn and cancel the decrees of departed superiors and make additions to what these men have determined, that they introduce and expel superiors and do all other things rashly. Acting in harmony with the ancient typikon, therefore, we decree regarding this matter that the ordinances of those departed be preserved secure and unaltered and that everything be done and executed in accordance with the tenor of the testaments of these men. If, however, some try to do anything contrary to this, let everything which those people do remain null and ineffective, and let them submit to the penalties of the canons.

[9.] Our humility has learned as well that some have made gifts of fields and monasteries as well as purchases of these and exchanges. In these, they have inscribed the venerable cross with their own hands. They also summoned many other witnesses to these deeds, witnesses who [p. 229] [signed] by affixing the sign of the cross with their own hands in the same way as [those who summoned them had]. Thereafter, these men change their minds and cancel [the agreements] they made. Alas, rashly and recklessly, they show no respect for such an important matter, and thus they, first, set at naught the trust which belongs to Christians, and, second, they deceive their own consciences. On account of this, with the approval of the most devout protos and all the other superiors, we have legislated that hereafter whoever would dare do such a thing must resign from the office of superior, and another from his monastery will be appointed in his place. Moreover, all his previous agreements will remain valid.

[10.] Concerning cutting wood, some of the monks on the Mountain charged that they were prevented by the more powerful monasteries from cutting wood for the purpose of heating and for their kitchens and bakeries as well as for the needs of those engaged in construction. We, therefore, legislated regarding this that they could take up wood wherever they wished for heating requirements. For construction, on the other hand, they could cut wood freely and unhindered in the common [areas of the] mountain, but in the territories of the monasteries it was necessary that they do this with the knowledge of the monks of each monastery and the permission of its superior. They could cut and take up as much as the monks would permit.

[11.] Many of the monks charged that in former times there was much common land and that it was sufficient to meet their needs. Subsequently, those who served as protoi through the years granted this out to whomever they wished because of certain special friendships with a few, or even many, monks and superiors and other [reasons]. The common land was thereby decreased, and therefore the monasteries were in difficult straits. With the judgment and approval of all, it was ordered that hereafter it would not be possible for anyone of those who were going to be promoted to such an office to give away anything from the common lands to anyone or to sell any part of it.

15. CONSTANTINE IX

[12.] They also said that the Lavra of Karyes had become an emporium instead of a lavra so that even things forbidden to monks are sold in it. With the approval of all, we judged and legislated that the lavra remain in accord with the ancient rule and that if these sorts of forbidden items (for I am ashamed to mention them by name) are found on any of the monks, these monks are to be driven out once and for all from this very lavra.

[13.] Almost all murmured against the superiors of the great lavras, saying that they attended the convocations with many servants and that they caused many difficulties for the meeting of elders and superiors and for their assembly because [bringing these many servants] gave rise, on the one hand, to fears within the assembly and, on the other, to fights outside it. Moreover, this caused no small impediment for those who were to examine and render judgment concerning what should be done for the proper order of the community since each one of the servants would boldly and arrogantly speak out whatever he wished and would argue with those who were to make decisions.

They assigned [the blame] for all this to the superior of the Lavra. This most devout monk, Neophytos, however, the superior of the very Lavra of lord Athanasios, just as he has seemed obedient with regard to all other matters on account of his benign disposition toward our humility, so in this matter as well he appeared more obedient than all the others. Therefore, he said that it was agreeable to him to return to the arrangement of the ancient typikon. He would attend with two servants, the protos with three, and all the rest without any servants. For thus the typikon of the gold seal commanded since the Mountain was so thinly populated at that time. [p. 230]

When the superiors of the remaining monasteries heard this, however, they took it ill and maintained that it was not possible for them to attend the convocations without servants who had to serve their old age and infirmity. On account of this, with the assent of all, we made it the rule that whoever was protos at any time would attend with three servants, the superior of the most pious Lavra of lord Athanasios with six, the superior of the Vatopedi with four, the superior of the Iveron monastery with the same number, while all the others would attend with one. Moreover, these servants were to stay in the cells of their monasteries and not enter the assembly at all nor mingle with the elders who render judgment nor disturb and interrupt them. If, however, the superior of the renowned Lavra of lord Athanasios wants one or two present with him, and if likewise the protos, the superior of the Vatopedi, and the superior of the Iveron each want one with them, let them be present, but let them speak not a word. If one should not wish to remain silent, let him be expelled from the council of the fathers—even by force.

[14.] In addition to these other matters, it pleased all to legislate that every important issue be decided in a general assembly under the presidency of the protos himself together with the most devout monk and superior of the Lavra of lord Athanasios and with the remaining principal superiors, if in fact these are present on the Mountain and are attending the assembly. All the other most devout elders should be present and participate in the decision with the fear of God and with truth, free from all favoritism and bribe-taking, from party feeling, from partiality, and from any other [human] passion: from envy, strife, and vengefulness. Let these examine everything and let them carry out whatever has been initiated. If, on the other hand, some have minor and insignificant issues to present to the protos, let him select as advisors fifteen superiors, and let them go together with the protos and correct whatever has slipped. It should not be possible for the protos always to choose the same superiors, but regarding one issue he should select certain ones, and regarding another issue others so that suspicions and scandals do not crop up in the community.

ELEVENTH CENTURY

[15.] All of the most honorable elders in the assembly at the very end exclaimed that there was something which should have been placed ahead of all the other rules since it was more important than all of these. [They said that], led by stupidity, silliness, or ignorance of the canons, some monks and superiors had ordained boys who had not entered their twentieth year not only to the office of deacon, but also to that of priest. On account of some family relationship or some unsuitable attachment, others leave wills in which they designate young men of such an age as superiors—an unlawful act. Therefore, we, tearing up by the roots this unlawful and unreasonable practice (not to say an outrage, a desolation, and an overturning of the holy and sacred canons), we ordain and decree that, according to the sacred canons,⁹ a person could be ordained a deacon at the age of twenty-five, a priest at the age of thirty, and could be designated as a superior in a will at this same age [of thirty].

These lawful and salutary rules were ordained not in an authoritarian or imperious manner, nor without consultation and review. Rather, they were passed with the consent and approval of all of the most devout monks of the Mountain and their superiors. The signatures below will reveal their names. These laws were drawn up and enacted [p. 231] by me, Kosmas Tzintziloukes, the lowly monk, in accordance with the sacred and imperial order, and they have been signed by the more renowned elders of Mount Athos and have been handed over to the monks with the assistance of our sovereign and holy emperor.

All the monks on this Holy Mountain must observe these regulations and laws set forth by our humility in our capacity as imperial emissary. Whoever shall transgress these rules and fall under the judgment of the sacred canons, he will experience the censure of the ruler. Moreover, they must show the present typikon to our sovereign and holy emperor so that his Christ-loving and pious majesty can confer authority and validity upon it as was done with the typikon issued by Euthymios, the most devout monk and superior of the most pious monastery of Stoudios, who had previously been dispatched by imperial decree to establish order on the Mountain. This typikon was confirmed by Lord John [I Tzimiskes (969–976)], the blessed emperor who had dispatched him. These very rules we ourselves confirm and authenticate with the wish that they be maintained unshaken for ever.

This has been set forth, written, and signed by Theophylaktos the monk and protos of the Mountain, by Neophytos the monk and superior of the famous monastery of lord Athanasios, by Athanasios monk and superior of the Vatopedi monastery, by George monk and superior of the Iveron monastery, by John monk and superior of the Zygos monastery, and by the other preeminent monks and superiors of Mount Athos in the month of September, in the fourteenth indiction, in the year 6554 [= 1045 A.D.].

This document was confirmed by the imperial secretary and sealed with the imperial seal and signed by those who were superiors at the time whose names follow:

Theophylaktos, monk and protos

15. CONSTANTINE IX

Neophytos, monk and superior of the Great Lavra
Athanasios, monk and superior of the Vatopedi monastery
George, monk of Iveron
John, monk, priest, and superior of the Zygou monastery
Hilarion, monk of the monastery of Saint Nikephoros
John, monk and superior of the Kaspakos monastery
Elias, monk and superior of the Xeropotamou monastery
Peter, the humble monk and superior of the monastery of lord Athanasios
Theodoulos, monk and superior of the Docheiariou monastery
Luke, monk and superior of the monastery of the all-holy Mother of God
Athanasios, monk and superior of the monastery of lord Sisoos
Symeon, monk and superior of the Galiagra [monastery] [p. 232]
Jeremiah, monk and priest
Mark, monk and superior
Kyrillos, monk and superior of the Esphigmenou monastery
Antony, monk and superior of the monastery of Saint Eustratios
Nikephoros, monk and superior of the Berroiotou monastery
Leontios, monk and superior of the Phalakrou monastery
Bartholomew, monk and superior of the monastery of the Savior
Iakobos, monk of the monastery of the all-holy Mother of God
John, monk and superior of the Phakenou monastery
Theodore, monk and superior of the Kaletze monastery
Nikephoros, monk of the Xerokastrou monastery
Michael, monk of the monastery of the Archistrategos
Kosmas, monk and superior of the Philadelphou monastery
Gerasimos, monk and superior of the Loutrakiou monastery
Germanos, monk and superior of the monastery of the Anargyroi
Dorotheos, monk and superior of the monastery of Saint Nicholas
Nikephoros, monk and superior of the monastery of Saint Ephraem
Jonah, monk and priest of Saint Onouphrios' [monastery]
Michael, monk and superior of Saint Peter's [monastery]

The present copy was compiled and compared with the original typika of the Holy Mountain by Ioannikios, the devout monk and protos of the Holy Mountain. When it was found to be identical, it was sent to our ruler the Emperor¹⁰ by Niphon the devout monk of the Great Lavra, the solitary, in the month of September, the fifth indiction in the year 6605 [= 1096 A.D.].

Notes on the Translation

1. (12) Tzimiskes.
2. Cf. (12) Tzimiskes [28], with discussion by Papachryssanthou, Prôtaton, p. 124.
3. The reference is to the Prôtaton monastery, for which see Papachryssanthou, Prôtaton, pp. 111–23, and Alexander Kazhdan, "Protos," ODB, pp. 1146–47.

ELEVENTH CENTURY

4. Theophylaktos; see [1] and signatures below, with Papachryssanthou, Prôtaton, p. 131. His tenure in this office is attested in other documents through 1051.
5. For the Vatopedi monastery, founded sometime before 985, see Alexander Kazhdan, Alice-Mary Talbot, and Anthony Cutler, “Vatopedi Monastery,” ODB, pp. 2155–56, and Papachryssanthou, Prôtaton, p. 91.
6. For the Iveron monastery, founded ca. 979/80, see Alice-Mary Talbot and Antony Cutler, “Iveron Monastery,” ODB, pp. 1025–26, and Papachryssanthou, Prôtaton, pp. 83–85, 88.
7. The capacity of these boats is here measured in thalassioi modioi (one thalassios modios equals 17.084 liters). See E. Schilbach and A. Kazhdan, “Modios,” ODB, p. 1388. Boats of 200 to 300 [thalassioi modioi] would hold from 3416.8 to 5125.2 dry liters. [TM]
8. Basil of Caesarea, Regulae fusius tractatae 36 ([LR 36]), PG 31, cols. 1108–9; with discussion by E. Herman, “La ‘Stabilitas loci’ nel monachesimo bizantino,” OCP 21 (1955), 116.
9. Cf. C. Trull., c. 14 (R&P 2.337).
10. Alexios I Komnenos (1081–1118).

Document Notes

- [1] Youths and eunuchs banned. The reference is to (12) Tzimiskes [7], whose ban is herein reinstated; see also (13) Ath. Typikon [48] and [34], quoting (3) Theodore Studites [18]. Papachryssanthou, Prôtaton, p. 84, n. 221, records the frequent transgressions of the ban; see [15] below for a suggestion of some of the consequences. Lavra, Vatopedi, and Iveron were the three great cenobitic monasteries of Athos, all founded in the second half of the tenth century.
- [2] Restriction on the ownership of boats. See discussion by Papachryssanthou, Prôtaton, pp. 105–6. Cf. [5] below. The reference to the typikon of Basil II is to Dölger, Regesten, no. 821, which is not preserved. The control of boats was a key to the control of the commercial activities their ownership made possible; see [6] below. In [5] below, the Amalfitans are excepted from the restriction on sailing beyond Thessaloniki and Ainos, a city in eastern Thrace.
- [3] Ownership of animals discussed. Perhaps the reformers have in mind (12) Tzimiskes [22] as well as (13) Ath. Typikon [31], [53] and other documents no longer preserved (so Papachryssanthou, Prôtaton, p. 223); Lavra’s superior Neophytos alludes to a judgment of the Athonite community ca. 995 that is no longer preserved, but cf. (12) Tzimiskes [23], which permits Lavra to own a yoke of oxen. See also [4] below.
- [4] Increase in Lavra’s allotment of cattle; Vatopedi permitted a yoke; restrictions on use. According to Papachryssanthou, Prôtaton, p. 104, in 1082, Vatopedi was allowed to double its holdings of cattle from the level permitted here.
- [5] Amalfitans permitted to own a large boat. For their monastery, see Paul Lemerle, “Les archives du monastère des Amalfitains au Mont Athos,” EEBS 23 (1953), 548–66, and Papachryssanthou, Prôtaton, p. 86. The Athanasian Vita A, chap. 158, ed. J. Noret, Vitae duae antiquae sancti Athanasii Athonitae (Louvain, 1982), p. 74, and Vita B, chap. 43, ed. Noret, p. 176, credits Athanasios with attracting Amalfitains to Athos.
- [6] Restrictions on the sale of timber and other building supplies. The reformers’ reference is to (12) Tzimiskes [24].
- [7] Previous superior’s permission required to transfer to another monastery. The reference to the typikon is to (12) Tzimiskes [5], cf. [4], [8], [18]. The allusion to a genuine work of Basil is unusual.
- [8] Departed superiors’ decrees may not be overturned. There is no clear support for this position in (12) Tzimiskes, but see the traditional concern of founders on this subject in (3) Theodore Studites [24], (5) Euthymios [2], (6) Rila [5], (8) John Xenos [3], (9) Galesios [246], and (13) Ath. Typikon [54].
- [9] Irrevocability of consecrated offerings. The objection here is not to the transactions per se, clearly permitted by (12) Tzimiskes [6] and very much a part of the traditions of private patronage in Byzantium,

15. CONSTANTINE IX

- but rather their revocation, long condemned as uncanonical, as in C. Const. I et II (861), c. 1 (R&P 2.648–49): see discussion in my Private Religious Foundations in the Byzantine Empire (Washington, D.C., 1987), pp. 134–35, cf. 37–38, 114–15. Later this principle would become well established under the auspices of the monastic reform movement, with a classic formulation in (22) Evergetis [19].
- [10] Regulation of cutting wood for firewood and building construction. Earlier, (12) Tzimiskes [24] had restricted the sale of firewood to laymen; see Papachryssanthou, Prôtaton, p. 104, on the exploitation of the Athonite forests in the interim between the two imperial typika.
- [11] Protos no longer to make grants of common land. This abrogates his implied right to do so in (12) Tzimiskes [2]; note that Athanasios had been a beneficiary of this practice when he first settled at Melana in 960.
- [12] Lavra of Karyes to end sale of forbidden items. There is no hint of what these might be (meat and other animal by-products?), but presumably the Protaton's steward (for whom see also [2] above) was responsible.
- [13] Restriction on the number of servants accompanying superiors. In a clever tactical maneuver, Lavra's superior Neophytos tactfully agrees to return to the standards set in the preface to (12) Tzimiskes, aware, no doubt, that the superiors of other great monasteries would never agree to attend without any servants.
- [14] The assembly's jurisdiction and membership; resolution of minor issues. The two basic principles of (12) Tzimiskes [1], the subordination of the superiors to the protos in matters of disciplinary correction and the obligation of the latter to act in consultation with the former, are implicitly reaffirmed here; the Athonite elders (i.e., the reform element) gain a recognized legislative role.
- [15] Reaffirmation of canonical age requirements for clerical and monastic offices. At issue here are not "beardless" youths (for which see [1] above and (12) Tzimiskes [16]) but, formally speaking, young men below the age requirements for these appointments. Note evidence of continued hereditary transmission of the superiorship in traditional private religious foundations on Athos as in (41) Docheiariou [4] (early 12th c.).

Signatures. For the prosopography of individuals who can be otherwise identified, see Papachryssanthou, Prôtaton, pp. 221–23.

CHAPTER THREE

The Protectorate

“Whatever the emperor, the judge and general do regarding the church, let [their actions] find [favor] with God.” (18) Nea Gephyra [3]

“I do not want my son, the mystographos lord Theodore, to be badly treated or scorned by any of the monks, or annoyed to an unreasonable degree, but I want everyone to love and be in awe of him, to respect and fear him, after God and the Virgin, as the irrevocable heir and lord . . .” (19) Attaleiates [33]

“None of the monks or the superiors should take any of the money, but once the expenses prescribed by the typikon have been paid, one-third of the surplus should be deposited in the treasury, and two-thirds should belong to my true and dearly beloved son, the mystographos lord Theodore . . . who does not have to render an account or submit to an inquiry.” (19) Attaleiates [24]

There are six documents in this third group of Byzantine monastic foundation documents, which date from the last quarter of the tenth century to the first decade of the twelfth century. They are particularly valuable for the light they shed on the historical development of one of the most important institutions of Byzantine monasticism, the protectorate (ephoreia).¹

A. Typology of the Documents

The first three documents, (16) Mount Tmolos, (17) Nikon Metanoeite, and (18) Nea Gephyra, are clustered at the end of the tenth and the beginning of the eleventh century. The remaining three documents, (19) Attaleiates, (20) Black Mountain, and (21) Roidion, date from the last quarter of the eleventh century and the early years of the twelfth century.

Alone among the Byzantine monastic foundation documents, two of the texts discussed in this chapter were preserved as monumental inscriptions, (16) Mount Tmolos and (18) Nea Gephyra, ¹ For ephoreia in this era, see Alexander Kazhdan and Alice-Mary Talbot, “Ephoros,” ODB, pp. 707–8; E. Herman, “Ricerche sulle istituzioni monastiche bizantine. Typika kletorika, caristicari e monasteri ‘liberi,’” OCP 6 (1940), 335–39; Rosemary Morris, “Legal Terminology in Monastic Documents of the Tenth and Eleventh Centuries,” JÖB 32.2 (1982), 281–90, esp. 284–88, 290; Catia Galatariotou, “Byzantine Ktetorika typika: A Comparative Study,” REB 45 (1987), 101–6; and my own Private Religious Foundations in the Byzantine Empire (Washington, D.C., 1987), pp. 218–20.

CHAPTER THREE

although the latter, transcribed by Michel Fourmont in 1730, has now disappeared. Of necessity, these are brief texts, and in the case of (16) Mount Tmolos, also very incomplete. The medium of transmission chosen allowed for the presentation of only the most important information relevant to these respective foundations, the first a monastery with an attached old age home near Philadelphia in Lydia and the second a monastery and church established to protect a bridge over the river Eurotas in the Peloponnesos. The authors of both of these documents evidently followed an epigraphic formula which required the identification of the donor and the foundation, designation of the officials chosen for the protectorate, and a curse on transgressors.

From the last quarter of the tenth century comes (17) Nikon Metanoeite, an example of a monastic foundation document both influenced and preserved by the hagiographic tradition of its author. As such, it is closely related to other tenth-century documents in our collection including (5) Euthymios, (6) Rila, and (7) Latros as well as eleventh-century documents such as (8) John Xenos and (9) Galesios. Like (5) Euthymios and even (13) Ath. Typikon, this text's hagiographic component contains a foundation history that provides especially valuable information on the sources of patronage for the monastery described therein. The foundation history would become a standard part of many later Byzantine monastic foundation documents, long after they had freed themselves from their early hagiographic associations. As all of the texts cited above do to some extent, (17) Nikon Metanoeite distinguishes itself from purely hagiographic works by virtue of its containing an embryonic typikon. In this case, this is really no more than a basic, testamentary statement of how the foundation is to be governed after the founder's death, thus linking it in content to the two inscriptions described above, (16) Mount Tmolos and (18) Nea Gephyra.

There is a striking increase in the sophistication of the group of documents clustered at towards the end of the eleventh century in comparison to those originating nearer its beginning. (19) Attaleiates is actually an old-fashioned testament. Like the authors of (8) John Xenos and (18) Nea Gephyra earlier in this same century, the author's overriding concern was the transmission of his property and the determination of the foundation's future mode of governance. Yet the catastrophic changes (see below, Historical Context) that befell Byzantine religious foundations during the fifty-year interval between the date of the last of the earlier group of documents in this chapter (1027) and that of (19) Attaleiates in 1077 forced the latter's author to address these common objectives with considerably greater trenchancy, gained from bitter experience of like-minded, conscientious patrons in his era. No other testament in this collection is as long or as exhaustive in its provisions for the various problems that might befall a foundation after the death of its founder.

The last two documents, (20) Black Mountain and (21) Roidion, share an author, Nikon of the Black Mountain, but little else. The former is a hybrid typikon, like (4) Stoudios and (11) Ath. Rule, treating chiefly the canonical hours, liturgy, and diet in the manner of purely liturgical typika but with a fair amount of disciplinary legislation appended. Unlike all the other documents in this chapter, the subject of institutional governance is ignored entirely. (21) Roidion is a remarkable document composed of two parts. The first, labeled as a typikon, is in fact a letter of instruction from Nikon to the institution's protector, explaining the author's conception of how the foundation should be governed and what the protector's responsibilities towards it should be. The second part is Nikon's address to the foundation's residents which might be considered a kind of founder's typikon were it not for the author's extraordinarily weak position vis-à-vis the residents. Therefore, the usual authoritative tone of a typikon breaks down in this instance into a series of appeals to and threats against the residents, backed up by contingency plans in the event that their cooperation could not be obtained. As such, it is truly sui generis among the Byzantine monastic foundation documents.

THE PROTECTORATE

B. Terminology of the Protectorate

In attempting to understand institutions like the protectorate, it is to our advantage that the Byzantine use of technical terminology was generally very precise and consistent.² Ephoreia, the concept that ties together the documents in this chapter, can be translated as "protectorate," and the institution it designates was analogous to the "advocacy," a similar kind of protective patronage of religious institutions, especially monasteries, found in the medieval West.³ The Byzantines, with their love of archaisms, could fancifully trace the title protector (ephoros) back to the ephoroi, the powerful senior magistrates who superintended the morals of the citizenry of ancient Sparta.⁴

Judging from the testimony of the documents in this chapter, the institution of the protectorate considerably predated its name. According to the current state of research, the use of the term ephoreia to designate the protectorate of a monastery dates only from 1060, when a chrysobull⁵ of the emperor Constantine X Doukas (1059–1067) uses the title in referring to the protectorate that the incumbent of the office of epi tou kanikleiou exercised over the Lavra monastery on Mount Athos, an authority first conceded by (14) Ath. Testament [6], which itself dates from after 993. As noted above in Chapter Two, on Concerns of the Authors, Athanasios, the author of this last-named document, was a shrewd assessor of the requirements for preserving the autonomy of his foundation, and, faced with worsening threats towards the end of the tenth century, he decided to designate two administrators (epitropoi), one local and one at the court in Constantinople, the incumbent of the office of the epi tou kanikleiou, to serve this function among others. Although this would appear to be the earliest use of the protectorate, Athanasios does not claim credit for its innovation as he comes close to doing in (13) Ath. Typikon [13] for the somewhat earlier and ultimately more influential concept of the "independent and self-governing" monastery.

All of the documents in this chapter except (20) Black Mountain adopt the protectorate as an essential part of the governance of the institutions for which they were written, but only (19) Attaleiates, a late document, actually uses the term ephoreia. (16) Mount Tmolos, for instance, designates curators (kouratores) and, like (14) Ath. Testament [4], [6], administrators (epitropoi) to look after the monastery and old age home for which that document was written. Both (17) Nikon Metanoeite [2] and (18) Nea Gephyra [2] designate the local judge (krites) and military

² Morris, "Terminology," p. 281.

³ For the advocacy in the medieval West, see F. Senn, L'institution des avoueries ecclésiastiques (Paris, 1903), with a general discussion in Friedrich Kempf, "Prelacies and the Secular Powers," in Handbook of Church History, vol. 3: The Church in the Age of Feudalism, trans. Anselm Biggs (Montreal, 1969), pp. 269–79 governor (strategos) as caretakers for the respective foundations, although neither document uses the term ephoreia or assigns any other titles to these officers.

⁴ For the ephors of ancient Sparta, see A. M. Woodward and W. G. Forrest, "Ephors," Oxford Classical Dictionary, ed. N. G. L. Hammond and H. H. Scullard (Oxford, 1970), p. 388.

⁵ P. Lemerle et al., Actes de Lavra, pts. 1–4 (Paris, 1970–82), vol. 1, doc. 33, p. 198.

CHAPTER THREE

In (19) Attaleiates [10], the founder's son and designated successor Theodore is explicitly awarded the protectorate; he was also to bear the specific title of ptochotrophos [12] as director of the foundation's almshouse at Rhaidestos. In (21) Roidion, the author Nikon is more circumspect. He does not provide a title for the anonymous lay benefactor charged with looking out for the physical needs of the foundation, who is the addressee of the first part of this document [A], but Nikon himself, who was responsible [A2] for spiritual guardianship and management, may have borne the title of guardian (phrontistes), so perhaps his lay counterpart bore the same or a similar title. It cannot be determined whether the monastery for which (20) Black Mountain was written had a protectorate since that document is silent about administrative matters, but its author Nikon is known to have been given a special commission by the patriarchate of Antioch to institute a spiritual reform of the monasteries of North Syria, of which this foundation was one.

C. Institutional Development of the Protectorate

1. Reasons for Its Development

Why did founders of the late tenth century think it necessary to create the protectorate? Basically, the institution seems to have grown out of the ever-increasing needs of private religious foundations of that era for protection from predators and for dependable sources of financial assistance. These basic needs, which to all appearances had once been handled reasonably adequately within the confines of traditional private patronage, were by this time considerably more difficult to meet due to the impact (both intentional and otherwise) of imperial agrarian legislation and the development of the charistike (for which see above, Chapter Two, Historical Context) in the tenth century. The former apparently made it more difficult for lay founders to provide traditional means of support to their private religious foundations, while the latter made it more difficult to assure their independence. Even aside from these important considerations, the increasing role of celibate monks in founding monasteries during the tenth and eleventh centuries (seen in all of the documents in this chapter except (19) Attaleiates) as a practical matter meant that some serviceable, self-replenishing substitute for the founder's family bloodline would have to be found to assure these two basic needs of financial support and protection from predators.

2. Benefactors' Hostility towards the Ecclesiastical Hierarchy

What might seem to have been a logical source of the needed support, the ecclesiastical hierarchy, was apparently not even considered. The author of (17) Nikon Metanoieite portrays himself boldly usurping episcopal prerogatives in the dedication of his foundation. Nikodemos, the author of (18) Nea Gephyra [2], states explicitly that the local bishop and his clergy are "not to be allowed to exercise any authority in this church, not even to set foot in it." At the same time, the author of (8) John Xenos [2] curses any patriarch or metropolitan who might hold designs on the properties of his foundation. Relations between Lazarus of (9) Galesios [141] with the metropolitans of Ephesos were frequently strained if not in fact hostile. The author of (19) Attaleiates [7], [8] joins his predecessors in warnings to ecclesiastical officials to leave his foundation unmolested. Only Nikon, author of (20) Black Mountain and (21) Roidion [1], is known to have enjoyed good relations with ecclesiastical officials, the patriarchs of Antioch, but under very different circumstances (see below, Chapter Four, Historical Context) from those prevailing during most of the period under consideration here in Chapter Three.

The traditional hostility and opposed interests of private benefactors and the ecclesiastical hierarchy explain much of this antagonism.⁶ Another possible factor contributing to the distrust benefactors felt towards the ecclesiastical hierarchy was the latter's use of epidosis (see above, Chapter Two, Historical Context), a management program even older than the charistike under which ecclesiastical officials reassigned monasteries—many of them doubtless of private origins—to compensate for differences in the endowments of episcopal, archiepiscopal and metropolitan sees. Indeed, in a crucial court case that took place sometime during the patriarchate of Nicholas II Chrysoberges (980–992), the private owners of the monastery of Piperatos had successfully asserted their private property rights in this foundation to block a patriarchal seizure.⁷

3. Shortcomings in Imperial Patronage

Given this background, imperial patronage seemed like an attractive alternative for well-connected founders such as Athanasios, author of (13) Ath. Typikon [2], who gained support from Nikephoros Phokas, John Tzimiskes, and Basil II in succession, or as even earlier, the author of (5) Euthymios, gained support from Leo VI. Even as late as 993, Athanasios in (14) Ath. Testament [5] considered naming Basil II as the administrator (epitropos) of his foundation, but the emperor was far away and could not be assumed to be always ready to take a particular interest in an individual religious foundation given his other responsibilities. Still later in 1027, Nikodemos, the author of (18) Nea Gephyra [2], placed his foundation under the protection of Emperor Constantine VIII (1025–1028), but like Athanasios, he thought that local protection was essential, so he set up a local protectorate for this purpose.

4. Date of the Protectorate's Development

The turning point can be dated with some precision. At a more optimistic time when he drew up (13) Ath. Typikon [12] circa 973–975, Athanasios had reason to hope that his foundation's status as an independent and self-governing monastery, coupled with guaranteed imperial subventions, would be sufficient for establishing Lavra's autonomy and financial well-being. But before the end of his life and the close of the tenth century, as (14) Ath. Testament illustrates, he and his contemporaries felt differently. Therefore the protectorate came into being just when, naturally enough, the need for it became readily apparent, in the last quarter of the tenth century.

5. Reliance on Officials of the Imperial Government

Seeking external patronage and support, founders like the author of (17) Nikon Metanoeite, the son of a provincial landowner, Nikodemos, author of (18) Nea Gephyra, and probably also the imperial protospatharios Nikephoros Erotikos, author of (16) Mount Tmolos, turned to local officials as the most effective source of patronage when each chose the protectorate as the vehicle for the posthumous administration of his foundation. In all cases, two protectors were appointed.

⁶ See my Private Religious Foundations, pp. 37–44, 112, 119–20, 122, 130–32, 134–38, etc.

⁷ Eustathios Rhomaios, Peira, 15.4 (JGR 1.43 = Zepos, Jus), vol. 4. 49–50.

CHAPTER THREE

Perhaps, as (17) Nikon Metanoeite [4] implies, some individuals subsequently appointed as protectors and honored with liturgical commemorations had previously played important roles in the construction or endowment of a foundation. Only Athanasios in (14) Ath. Testament [4] saw fit to choose someone in religious life, his friend John the Iberian, as one of his administrators. Shrewd as always, Athanasios chose as his other administrator the epi tou kanikleiou at the court in Constantinople, in preference to some presumably less influential local figure. It is from (14) Ath. Testament [7] that we learn that a protector was expected to designate his own successor; this is surely why (17) Nikon Metanoeite [2] and (18) Nea Gephyra [2] thought it necessary to identify only the offices whose incumbents would hold the protectorate rather than naming specific individuals. By attaching the rights to the protectorate to an office rather than to specific individuals, a presumably perpetual line of protectors could be secured that would provide protection and financial support just as the families of traditional benefactors had done in ages past.⁸

6. Consequences of Reliance on Public Authorities

With the benefit of hindsight, we can see that this reliance on public authorities was naive. Contemporary benefactors of the late tenth and early eleventh centuries, however, would have been motivated negatively by their age-old rivalry with the ecclesiastical hierarchy and affirmatively by their traditionally good relations (with a few exceptions) with the emperors as well as with their local representatives—whose interests and social class they themselves frequently shared. As the charistike claimed an ever-increasing share of the private religious foundations of the empire during the course of the eleventh century, later generations saw the light and abandoned their predecessors' reliance on public officials for their protectorates.

7. Subsequent Privatization of the Protectorate

For instance, in 1077, the author of (19) Attaleiates prohibits [8] the establishment of either a charistike or an ephoreia over his foundation, yet later in this same document he titles his son and heir Theodore as protector [10]. Michael Attaleiates then was fundamentally altering the protectorate by rejecting its historical status as a public institution generally attached to a particular office and reclaiming it instead as a hereditary private institution linked to the founder's family. In (19) Attaleiates [10], [37], [46] he announces his willingness to see even a female relative succeed to the protectorate in default of suitable male candidates, though he expected that a husband, son or male servant would actually carry out the functions of the office.

8. Rights of Protectors

The documents collected here in this chapter indicate that very considerable rights were attached to the protectorate. (18) Nea Gephyra [3] concedes to the protectors the right to choose the foundation's superior. Earlier, we have seen how (14) Ath. Testament [12] provides for the local protector to choose Lavra's superior, in consultation with "the more wise and spiritual brothers." In (19) Attaleiates [29], cf. [26], the protector presides over the election of both the superior and ⁸ For a late but still instructive example of how traditional family patronage worked, see (19) Attaleiates, esp. [10] through [13].

THE PROTECTORATE

the steward, and has the authority to grant (and possibly also withhold) recognition to the chosen candidates. Attaleiates' first protector Theodore was granted [26] the special privilege of not appointing a superior and governing the foundation directly instead. (17) Nikon Metanoeite [2], [7], [9] apparently allows the protectors to make all the appointments of priests and monks in the foundation. Some documents also allow the protectors to remove unfit superiors: (14) Ath. Testament [16] (local administrator only); (17) Nikon Metanoeite [9] (can also remove other appointees); (18) Nea Gephyra [3]; and (19) Attaleiates [26]. However, Nikon of the Black Mountain, author of (21) Roidion [A3], [A4], [B20] would have liked to have removed the superior and steward of that foundation, whom he regarded as superfluous and "spiritually destroyed," but apparently neither he nor his lay counterpart had the power to do this.

(16) Mount Tmolos [4] and (19) Attaleiates [23] both speak of the protector's authority to review the financial accounts of their respective foundations. Both (17) Nikon Metanoeite [12] and (21) Roidion [B18], as well as (14) Ath. Testament [15] (local administrator only) earlier, envision the incumbent protectors providing moral supervision for the residents of their respective foundations. According to (19) Attaleiates [29], that foundation's protectors were to preside over community reconciliations and issue binding resolutions from which there would be no appeals. Some protectors received financial compensation for the discharge of their responsibilities. This ranged from the nominal and honorific gifts of wine and fruit accorded the protectors by (17) Nikon Metanoeite [2] to the possibly substantial income accorded Theodore and his successors as protector in (19) Attaleiates [24].

9. Responsibilities of Protectors

Late in the eleventh century, by which time the protectorate had become something of a tainted institution (note the hostility of (19) Attaleiates [8]), the emphasis shifted from an protector's rights to his responsibilities. In (21) Roidion, Nikon of the Black Mountain implies that the protector who is most likely the addressee of the first part of this document should provide financial support [A1], cf. [A5] for the foundation and perhaps even supply a replacement facility [B20] should that prove necessary. But even much earlier, the unusual "off-site" administrator linked to the office of epi tou kanikleiou in (14) Ath. Testament [6] was expected to provide material assistance to Lavra and act as the foundation's protector and advocate at court.

10. The Dual Protectorate

In the early documents, typically two protectors were appointed. In (14) Ath. Testament, only one of these protectors, John the Iberian, was resident locally, but his Constantinopolitan counterpart is instructed [6] to work together with him for the welfare of the monastic community at Lavra. In (18) Nea Gephyra [3], the author Nikodemos instructs the two protectors to govern his foundation either jointly or individually if only one of them happened to be in the area when his services were needed. In the later documents towards the end of the eleventh century, the protectorate is divided between two persons who were responsible for the foundation's physical needs and its spiritual guardianship, respectively, as (apparently) in (21) Roidion [A1], [A2], or else is replaced by a single, powerful family protector as in (19) Attaleiates [10].

CHAPTER THREE

D. Concerns of the Authors

To a considerable extent, the concerns of the authors of these documents anticipate many of the themes of the monastic reform movement that was to invigorate Byzantine monasticism later in the eleventh century (for which see below, Chapter Four).

1. Distrust of Monks Tonsured Outside the Foundation

Although their trust in the protectorate may have ultimately proved imprudent, many of these founders were aware of other threats to the well-being and autonomy of their foundations. Nikodemos, author of (18) Nea Gephyra, orders [3] his protectors to choose a superior for his foundation from among the monks already in the monastery rather than appointing an outsider. Earlier, Athanasios in (13) Ath. Typikon had gotten the Emperor Nikephoros Phokas to endorse [12] his own ban on the choice of an outsider (a xenokourites) which he rightly identified [20] as a considerable threat to institutional autonomy. The author of (17) Nikon Metanoieite shows a particularly keen awareness of potential threats, and accordingly prohibits [5] the forced imposition of outsiders (possibly esomonitai) at his foundation, as well as the simoniacal appointment of priests or monks [9] through gifts (kaniskia) and requests (parakalenseis). Also, while conceding [5], [7] rights of appointment to his protectors, Nikon Metanoieite balances these concessions with security of tenure to those priests and monks currently serving [6], [8] in his foundation and orders [3] that any future bequests should be given directly to them rather than the protectors or other public officials.

2. Continuity with Traditional Private Religious Foundations

Composed as it was for a traditional private religious foundation, (19) Attaleiates shows little in the way of reform sympathies but a great deal of tolerance for patronal privileges, financial prerequisites, and various fund-raising devices. In this foundation the protector enjoyed virtually unchecked authority [29] and was allowed [24] to profit financially from the foundation. He was subject to deposition only for outright theft [37] of the foundation's income, and even then not without having an opportunity to make restitution. The eunuch monks [30] had servants [42] and drew regular incomes [33], [35] akin to monastic benefices from the foundation's assets, as Nikon of the Black Mountain's recalcitrant monks did in (21) Roidion [A2]. Like earlier founders, Attaleiates is hostile [30] to the appointment of outsiders as monks in his foundation, though typically he was quick to make an exception for his own blood relatives or personal favorites. He welcomes [30] donations of landed property in exchange for living allowances (siteresia) from the foundation's treasury and was also glad to accept contributions (prosenexeis) for liturgical commemorations. Some later reform-minded founders would shun these financial entanglements with the lay world. Also, in a telling detail, Attaleiates did not scruple [19] to subordinate a convent and a monastery which he held in charistike to the foundation even though he was unwilling [8] to allow the foundation itself to be subordinated to a charistikarios.

3. Foreshadowing of the Monastic Reform Movement

In a few ways, however, (19) Attaleiates clearly foreshadows the imminent triumph of the reform movement at the close of the eleventh century. Monks seeking tonsure were generally not to be required to pay an entrance gift (apotage) [28], though as usual Attaleiates was willing to suspend the principle if that would be financially advantageous to the foundation. The document has an inventory (brevion) of both movable [INV 1] ff. and landed properties [INV 9] attached, perhaps as a deterrent to theft. A chrysobull of Emperor Nikephoros III Botaneiates (1078–1081) included in the inventory [INV 11] goes so far as to declare that the deconsecration of property used to endow the foundation would be sacrilege (hierosylia). Attaleiates did not himself endorse this view, however (see [10], [37]). Finally, the foundation was provisionally [14] to become independent and autonomous in the event of the cessation of Attaleiates' family line.

4. Participation in the Monastic Reform Movement

The documents authored by Nikon of the Black Mountain, himself an active if idiosyncratic participant in the monastic reform, quite naturally reflect the concerns and approaches of that movement. In (20) Black Mountain, we find endorsements of manual labor [82], simple, practical clothing as recommended by Basil of Caesarea [75], and the traditional features of cenobitic life [24], [70], [71]. Unlike the situation portrayed in (9) Galesios [129], (20) Black Mountain [86] seeks to keep the monks sexually segregated, and therefore, like (3) Theodore Studites [5] and (13) Ath. Typikon [31], bans women and female animals from the vicinity of the foundation. In (21) Roidion [B16], Nikon went so far as to ban all animals of any sort, except for a cat spared to track down mice! Unlike (19) Attaleiates [30], (20) Black Mountain [85] rejects monetary and other donations from outsiders “except as the divine fathers allow.”

Naturally (21) Roidion, a document which Nikon of the Black Mountain utilized to aid in his reform of that foundation, is ideologically firmly in the reformers' camp even if the author seems to have lacked the authority to overcome entrenched private property rights [B20] that were obstructing this reform. In this spirit, Nikon declares [B5] that monks should have no personal possessions at all while simultaneously tolerating the status quo in which kelliotic monks used their private incomes to entertain guests.

5. Sponsorship of Philanthropic Institutions

Several of these documents testify to a renewed interest in philanthropic institutions that had once been more common in Byzantium in late antiquity. Nikephoros Phokas' controversial law of 964 restricting new private religious foundations included philanthropic institutions in its regulatory scope.⁹ Later, presumably after the granting of landed endowments to foundations of this sort became legal again (perhaps in 988), Nikephoros Erotikos composed (16) Mount Tmolos for his old age home Ta Derma. The almshouse at Rhaidestos described in (19) Attaleiates [4] is another outstanding example of this interest. Even the bridge over the river Eurotas in the Peloponnesos which Nikodemos, author of (18) Nea Gephyra, insists [1] was the raison d'être of his foundation could be interpreted, thanks to its public utility, as a kind of philanthropic foundation. There was also already an existing—though perhaps almost entirely secularized—hospice operating on the site when Nikon of the Black Mountain composed (21) Roidion, probably at the very beginning of the twelfth century.

6. Concern for the Welfare of the Dependent Peasantry

Just possibly this increased interest in philanthropy also explains a slight but still noticeable interest in the well-being of peasants, tenants, and other dependents of some of these foundations. In line with this trend, (17) Nikon Metanoeite [13] orders that villagers are to be left “untouched and undisturbed,” while (19) Attaleiates [39] guarantees such dependents freedom from increases in payments and services. Another document of this era, (9) Galesios [246], instructs that peasants should not be oppressed in the event that a foundation’s estates failed to yield a surplus.

⁹ Nikephoros Phokas, Novella de monasteriis (964) (JGR 3.292–96, esp. 295–96 = Zepos, Jus, 1.249–52, esp. 251–52).

CHAPTER THREE

7. Protection against Predators

The founders portrayed in these documents relied chiefly on the protectorate for the protection and financial support of their foundations, but they were also eager to utilize other means of protection and attempted to keep income and expenses in balance. Curses against would-be malefactors would become a standard “boilerplate” feature of Byzantine monastic foundation documents by the mid-eleventh century (see (9) Galesios [246]; cf. (8) John Xenos [2]). They appear in the documents in this chapter in (16) Mount Tmolos [5], (17) Nikon Metanoeite [5], (18) Nea Gephyra [4], and (19) Attaleiates [8], [23], [46].

In an affirmative sense, some of our authors also sought to enlist the support of the patron saint for the sake of heavenly protection. Thus (19) Attaleiates [7], cf. [45] makes an impassioned address to the deity for assistance against the many possible predators who might harm his foundation. The author of (17) Nikon Metanoeite provides a triple dedication for his foundation, while the author of (16) Mount Tmolos [1] seeks to associate the Mother of God with the old age home Ta Derma. Neither goes as far as Nikon of the Black Mountain, who in (21) Roidion [B20] expresses confidence that the Mother of God herself could be relied upon to manage the foundation, even without any “earthly revenues.”

8. Limitations on Numbers of Monks to be Supported

Founders in this era seem generally to have endorsed the “smaller is better” philosophy (see above, Chapter Two, Concerns of the Authors) with respect to the size of their foundations, thereby anticipating or (subsequently) endorsing the views of those monks who in 1045 opposed the ever-expanding economic activities of the larger Athonite monasteries as described in (15) Constantine IX [10], [11], [13]. Thus we see the author of (16) Mount Tmolos limiting the number of monks [1] to twelve (plus the superior) and assistants in the old age home [2] to four. (17) Nikon Metanoeite does not set precise limits for the residents in that foundation, but seems to have envisioned [7] a one-for-one replacement scheme. The author of (19) Attaleiates indicates [27] that his endowment would at present allow the appointment of only five monks although he hoped additional donations would allow up to seven to be supported eventually. Bishop Manuel of Stroumitza, the author of (10) Eleousa [5], a contemporary document, similarly limited the number of monks in his foundation to ten, though he too hoped for an increase, provided circumstances permitted.

Thus most founders in this era wanted to keep the number of residents carefully matched to the available income. Even in (21) Roidion, where the resident kelliotic monks appear to have divided up [A2] the foundation’s income into individual hereditary shares [B11], the author Nikon of the Black Mountain agonizes [A3], [B13] over who was truly entitled to financial support. Unlike Attaleiates and Manuel, however, Nikon was actively opposed [B17] to additional acquisitions of landed property, considering them harmful to souls and displeasing to God.

9. Preservation of Foundation Documents

Finally, the precautions of the founders for the physical preservation of their foundation documents are noteworthy. The length to which the authors of the monumental inscriptions (16) Mount Tmolos and (18) Nea Gephyra went to secure the permanence of their regulations is self-evident. The author of (17) Nikon Metanoeite [Conclusion] instructs two members of the local nobility to seal and preserve his testament. (19) Attaleiates [40] provides the first detailed instructions for the safekeeping, use, and preservation of monastic foundation documents. The mandate to use an authentic copy instead of the original for ordinary purposes seems particularly prudent. Ironically, it is an isotype which is the surviving basis for the text of this document.

E. Historical Context

1. Coincidence with the Era of the Charistike

The era represented by the documents in this chapter happens to coincide with nearly the entire history of the charistike, that controversial public program for the donation of mostly private religious institutions to concessionaires unrelated to the original founders.¹⁰ For the charistike was originated by the imperial government and the ecclesiastical hierarchy probably sometime in the last quarter of the tenth century, grew to encompass most of the empire's religious foundations during the course of the next hundred years, and yet was completely discredited by the beginning of the twelfth century.

2. Immediate Impact on our Early Authors

Of the two clusters of documents in this chapter, the earlier group from the late tenth through the early eleventh centuries coincides with the origins of the charistike, the outbreak of the first opposition to its use, and its relatively rapid degeneration into an abuse-prone program remarkably resistant to reform (see above, Chapter Two, Historical Context). Almost from the beginning our authors recognized the potential peril that the charistike posed for their foundations, and it surely was an important reason why, sometime after 993, Athanasios set aside his earlier commitment to monastic autonomy and self-governance and instead saw fit to embrace the protectorate in (14) Ath. Testament [4] ff. Other founders represented by the authors in our first group of documents did likewise.

3. Resistance of the Charistike to Reform

With the advantage of hindsight, it is easy to be as critical of the fateful decision of Patriarch Alexios Studites to attempt to reform rather than abolish the charistike in 1027–28 as it is to mock the naive disposition of contemporary founders to trust to the protectorate for protection from it. Even if we did not have the rather startling claim of John V the Oxite, Patriarch of Antioch, more commonly known as John of Antioch, that the charistike had been imposed on virtually all of the empire's monasteries by the late eleventh century,¹¹ the extreme difficulty and ultimate futility of Alexios Studites' attempt at reform can be demonstrated by comparing some of his regulations with information from the documents in this chapter.

¹⁰ For the charistike, see the works cited in the General Bibliography, XXIV: Monasticism and the Charistike.

CHAPTER THREE

Particularly useful in this connection is (19) Attaleiates, the only one of the documents in this chapter to mention the charistike specifically. Despite Alexios Studites' requirement that men were not to be granted a charistike over a convent of nuns,¹² (19) Attaleiates [19] records the author's son Theodore's status as second charistikarios of a convent of St. Prokopios at Rhaidestos which had been destroyed in a civil insurrection and rebuilt by the author. Alexios Studites had also instructed bishops to withhold monasteries that served as their own residences (i.e., episkopeia) from concession under the charistike,¹³ yet in (19) Attaleiates [19] we find the author is the owner of a church of the Archangel Michael in which the see of the bishop of Rhaidestos had once been located. In another regulation, the patriarch condemned local magnates who usurped the rights of public churches (katholikai ekklesiai) for their own private foundations,¹⁴ yet virtually simultaneously we find Nikodemos, the author of (18) Nea Gephyra [2], banning the local bishop and his clergy from this Peloponnesian foundation.

In one respect Alexios Studites' legislation appears to have had some success: (19) Attaleiates [19] carefully distinguishes the author's son Theodore's position as secondary beneficiary of the two institutions subordinated to and supported by his foundation. This suggests that a perpetual hereditary charistike had not succeeded in taking root some fifty years after Alexios forbade the original recipients to transfer their rights under the program to parties not named in the original grants of donation.¹⁵

4. Progress of the Charistike Discredits the Protectorate

The evidence suggests then that the fifty-year gap between the first and the second group of documents in this chapter saw not only a great expansion in the comprehensiveness of the charistike coupled with increasing unscrupulousness on the part of its beneficiaries but also a discrediting of the protectorate, as is evident in (24) Christodoulos [A16]. Indeed, the institution's ineffectiveness became manifest, and it has been suggested that the title of protector may have eventually become simply a euphemism for charistikarios.¹⁶ During this nightmarish interval, traditional patrons seeking to shield their foundations from the charistike had few options. As (18) Nea Gephyra [2] anticipates, a founder could appeal to the emperor as a guarantor of institutional independence, a stratagem actually employed by the stylite monk Lazarus in (9) Galesios [223], ¹¹ John of Antioch, De monasteriis, chap. 9, ed. P. Gautier, "Réquisitoire du patriarche Jean d'Antioche contre le charisticariat," REB 33 (1975), 109.

¹² Alexios Studites, Hypomnema A' (R&P 5.22); for another example of this, see Eustathios Rhomaios, Peira 15.16 (JGR 1.48 = Zepos, Jus, 4.54).

¹³ Hypomnema B' (R&P 5.30–31).

¹⁴ Hypomnema B' (R&P 5.31–32).

¹⁵ Hypomnema A' (R&P 5.22).

¹⁶ See Hélène Ahrweiler, "Charisticariat et autres formes d'attribution de fondations pieuses aux Xe–XIe siècles," ZRVI 10 (1967), 1–27, at 3; repr. Études sur les structures administratives et sociales de Byzance (London, 1971), art. VII.

or else the founder might seek to obtain imperial assistance in extricating a foundation from a mass of entangling legal appeals in secular courts as the Athonite monks did in (15) Constantine IX. Yet appeals to the emperors in this period were surely perilous, for they were the co-sponsors of the charistike, and, as time went on, increasingly liable to treat ecclesiastical property cavalierly, as the extensive confiscation of ecclesiastical revenues by Emperor Isaac I Komnenos (1057–1059) demonstrates.¹⁷

5. First Influences of the Monastic Reform Movement

The first document in the second group, (19) Attaleiates, not only shows some of the end results of a half-century of officially sanctioned depredations against the empire's traditional private religious foundations but also reflects some of the ideological ferment that was going on in contemporary reform circles. Although he himself was a traditionalist by instinct rather than a reformist ideologue, Attaleiates had observed and recorded the confiscations by Isaac I Komnenos some twenty years earlier.¹⁸ Like the contemporary authors of more reform-oriented documents such as (22) Evergetis [19], (23) Pakourianos [32], and (10) Eleousa [21], Attaleiates was sufficiently affected to assert [10] the irrevocability of the grants he had made to his foundation. He even uses the phrase “for that which has once been consecrated to God cannot be shared” which would become part of the credo of the monastic reform party: cf. (22) Evergetis [37]’s very similar “for what has once been consecrated to God must not be taken away.”

6. The Affair of Leo of Chalcedon

In 1077 this notion of inalienability was still a very controversial opinion, as the reformer Leo, metropolitan of Chalcedon, would discover some years later in 1086 when he provoked outrage by flatly condemning all alienations of consecrated property (except for those transferred under epidosis) in the course of his trial by Emperor Alexios I Komnenos (1081–1118) that then promptly led to the prelate's temporary deposition from office.¹⁹

The triggering incident that ultimately brought Leo to trial before the emperor was a clumsy expropriation of consecrated ecclesiastical property in Constantinople carried out by Alexios Komnenos' brother the sebastokrator Isaac in 1081.²⁰ In the course of a long struggle to get the imperial government to repudiate this action and perhaps make restitutions, Leo wrote to the emperor during the summer of 1082 urging an investigation based on the inventories (brevia) of ¹⁷ For Isaac Komnenos' requisitions, see Michael Attaleiates, Historia, ed. I. Bekker, CSHB (Bonn, 1853), pp. 60–62; Michael Psellos, Chronographia 7.60, ed. E. Renauld (Paris, 1926–28); and John Zonaras, Epitome historiarum, ed. M. Pinder, CSHB (Bonn, 1897), 18.5, along with the critical discussion of these sources by Ahrweiler, “Charisticariat,” pp. 20–21.

¹⁸ See Alexander Kazhdan and Simon Franklin, Studies on Byzantine Literature of the Eleventh and Twelfth Centuries (Cambridge, 1984), chap. 2: The Social Views of Michael Attaleiates, pp. 23–86, esp. 73–76.

¹⁹ See Semeioma epi te kathairesei tou Chalkedonos, ed. I. Sakkélion, “Décret d'Alexis Comnène portant déposition de Léon, Métropolitain de Chalcédoine,” BCH 2 (1878), 102–28, at 123–24.

²⁰ See especially Apostolos Glavinias, He epi Alexiou Komnenou (1081–1118) peri hieron skeuon, keimelion kai hagion eikonon eris (Thessaloniki, 1972), for a narrative of the controversy.

CHAPTER THREE

the affected institutions.²¹ During the winter of 1083–84, the emperor agreed to this demand and announced plans for making good any losses detected in the course of this inquest. The existence of inventories like that included as part of (19) Attaleiates made such a demand possible; but not all private benefactors were willing to be bound in such an obvious way to the irrevocability of their donations even if, like Bishop Manuel of Stroumitza, the contemporary author of (10) Eleousa, they were willing [18] to endorse the concept in principle.

7. Revival of the Study of Canon Law

A renewed interest in canon law was another feature of the monastic reform towards the end of the eleventh century. Even an opponent of the reform movement like the Komnenian princess and historian Anna Komnene professed to respect canon law, and she for one could not resist criticizing (accurately) Leo of Chalcedon for his insufficient understanding of the canons.²² Therefore it is not entirely surprising to find even Attaleiates, who as a traditionalist private benefactor is hardly notable for his adherence to the letter of canon law, nevertheless appealing to it in (19) Attaleiates [9], wholly inaccurately maintaining that “no canon could be found which would sanction changing or transgressing the commandments of the founders.”

8. Recognition of the Sacral Character of Ecclesiastical Property

At about this same time in the 1070s, the enormously influential reform typikon (22) Evergetis was making bold to assert [37] that alienations of consecrated property were sacrilegious. As noted above, the use of the term “sacrilege” in this connection also turns up, of all places, in the imperial chrysobull of Nikephoros III Botaneiates dated to 1079 and included in (19) Attaleiates [INV 11]. It would appear then that despite the indignant reception that Alexios Komnenos gave Leo of Chalcedon’s assertion at his trial that all alienations of consecrated property to laymen were “impious,” reform ideas had already penetrated into some seemingly unlikely places. This may be one of the factors which helps to explain the relatively rapid triumph of the reform party after the restoration of Leo to official favor in 1094 (see below, Chapter Four, Historical Context).

9. The Reformers’ Campaign against the Charistike

Until the triumph of the reform (which Attaleiates did not himself live to see), the charistike continued to pose a very serious threat to the autonomy of private religious foundations. In the meantime, by the 1070s founders of various ideological stripes had united in condemnation of that beleaguered program, including the traditionalist authors of (19) Attaleiates [8] and (10) Eleousa [18], both of whom gave only a reluctant endorsement to the independent and self-governing form of monastic organization that would dominate during the next century, and of course the reformers like the authors of (22) Evergetis [12] and (23) Pakourianos [3], who embraced it enthusiastically.

Simultaneously, the patriarchate of Constantinople was waging its own long, determined campaign to curtail abuses in the charistike, beginning with a few gestures under Patriarch Eustratios

²¹ Leo of Chalcedon, Epistole pros ton basilea Alexion ton Komnenon, ed. Alexandros Lavriotes, “Historikon zetema ekklesiastikon epi tes basileias Alexiou Komnenou,” EA 20 (1900), 403–4.

²² Anna Komnena, Alexiad 7.4, cf. 5.2, ed. B. Leib (Paris, 1937–76), vol. 2, pp. 101–2, 11–13; Semeioma, ed. Sakkélion, “Décret,” 102–28, at 123, n. 3 and 127, n. 2.

THE PROTECTORATE

Garidas (1081–1084), gathering considerable force under Nicholas III Grammatikos (1184–1111), and continuing under John IX Agapetus (1111–1134), backed by the support of Emperor Alexios Komnenos throughout.²³ A more cautious approach than that desired by ideologically motivated partisans like John of Antioch, it sought at first the reform rather than the overthrow of the charistike, though in the end that notorious program's demise was inevitable.

10. Revival of the Protectorate by the Reformers

The fairly sudden triumph of the reform party left its partisans with a colossal task of reconstituting a huge number of institutions wrecked by the charistike over the course of the previous century or longer. Just as Attaleiates found a use for a very different kind of protectorate to direct his private foundation in the declining years of the charistike, some reformers also began to experiment with a revival of the protectorate for their own purposes.

John of Antioch was one of Nikon of the Black Mountain's superiors as patriarch of Antioch (1089–1100). Perhaps it was under a mandate from him that Nikon served as spiritual corrector for the monastery and hospice represented by (21) Roidion. John had taken up the campaign of Leo of Chalcedon against imperial requisitions of ecclesiastical property, and was the author of the landmark reformist tract De monasteriis, a scathing critique of the charistike.²⁴ A layman, with the role if not also the title of protector, had been appointed by an unnamed local ruler to assist Nikon and provide for the physical needs of the foundation. Despite this assistance, Nikon experienced considerable difficulty in instituting a reform at Roidion, a foundation that he judged to have been practically ruined by "spiritually destroyed" officials, worldly monks, and their lay relatives. The foundation's monks appear to have abandoned cenobiticism for a kelliotic or idiorhythmic lifestyle in which they neither prayed together nor shared meals. They did divide up the foundation's assets into individual, hereditary shares like monastic "fellowships" or benefices, which the Byzantines knew as adelphata.²⁵ How this foundation had come upon this state of affairs cannot be determined from (21) Roidion, but one possibility is that a recently removed charistikarios had joined with the monks and other residents in splitting up the hospice's assets into individual benefices.

As this document indicates, the protectorate, which had had a most unpromising beginning as a generally ineffective defense against the charistike, was to have a second life as a useful adjunct to the independent and self-governing monasteries of the twelfth and later centuries (see below, Chapters Five and Six).

²³ For the patriarchal reform, see the documents assembled by Jean Darrouzès, "Dossier sur le charisticariat," in Polychronion: Festschrift Franz Dölger (Heidelberg, 1966), pp. 150–65, and my own Private Religious Foundations, pp. 199–213.

²⁴ John of Antioch, De monasteriis, ed. Gautier, "Réquisitoire," 77–132.

²⁵ For the adelphata and other analogues to ecclesiastical benefices, see Emil Herman, "Bénéfices dans l'église orientale," DDC, vol. 2, cols. 706–35, and "Zum kirchlichen Benefizialwesen im byzantinischen Reich," SBN 5 (1939), 657–71.

16. Mount Tmolos: Typikon of Nikephoros Erotikos for the Monastery of the Mother of God and the Old Age Home called Ta Derma on Mount Tmolos

Date: 975–1000¹

Translator: John Thomas

Edition employed: Thomas Drew-Bear and Johannes Koder, “Ein byzantinisches Kloster am Berg Tmolos,” JÖB 38 (1988), 197–215 at 203–4, 209–10.

Source: Two original inscriptions found in situ.²

Other translations: German, by Koder, in Drew-Bear and Koder, “Berg Tmolos,” pp. 213–14.

Institutional History

The foundation was located to the west of Lydian Philadelphia (modern Alasehir) on Mount Tmolos (modern Boz Däg), where the ruins are to be found.³ Aside from the testimony of the document itself, nothing else is known about the history of this foundation.

Analysis

Despite its very incomplete state, in most respects this is very much a typical monastic foundation document of its era. Like most of the other documents in this chapter, its author Nikephoros Erotikos resorts to the use of the ephoreia to assure the protection and preservation of the foundation. The officials are titled as curators [4] (kouratores) and administrators (epitropoi), the latter being the same title chosen by Athanasios the Athonite in (14) Ath. Testament. [4], [6], a contemporary document of the late tenth century, to honor his protectors (ephoroi). As in (19) Attaleiates [23], the foundation’s officers are obliged [4] to render financial accounts to the protectors. The context of a reference to an assembly of the monks cannot be determined, though in (14) Ath. Testament [12], [14] the monks were assembled for the determination of a new superior by Lavra’s local administrator and the leading monks. The popularity of the Mother of God as a dedicatee finds parallels in contemporary documents like (7) Latros, (8) John Xenos, and (18) Nea Gephyra and will become very much more common by the end of the next century, e.g., (10) Eleousa, (21) Roidion, (22) Evergetis, (23) Pakourianos, etc. Like some of his contemporaries and many later patrons, Nikephoros thought it prudent to set [2] limits on the number of residents: not more than 12 monks (excluding the superior), 12 elderly patients, and 4 assistants for the old age home. Finally, the document concludes with a curse [5] against transgressors of the regulations, a common feature of documents composed in the late tenth and the early eleventh centuries when the peril posed to religious foundations from the charistike and other public management programs was especially great.

In some respects, however, Nikephoros’ typikon is relatively idiosyncratic. Unlike all of our other documents except for (18) Nea Gephyra, (16) Mount Tmolos has been preserved as a monumental inscription. This practice, possibly a holdover from late antiquity, fades away in the course of the eleventh century when the emphasis changed to assuring the preservation of foundation documents in manuscript through such practices as making both working and reference copies, depositing additional copies at other secure sites, etc.

16. MOUNT TMOLOS

Also, unlike all of its contemporary documents, this text is associated with a philanthropic foundation as well as a monastery, and the first of the Byzantine monastic foundation documents with this claim to fame. As such it deserves to be seen as an early forerunner of (19) Attaleiates, written for a Constantinopolitan foundation that included an almshouse at Rhaidestos in 1077, with (23) Pakourianos that includes provisions for three hostels in 1083, and with (21) Roidion, written for an admittedly unregenerate foundation that included a hospice, also towards the end of the eleventh century. Among our twelfth-century documents will be found provisions for two more old age homes, in (28) Pantokrator [58] ff. and (29) Kosmosoteira [70].

Notes on the Introduction

1. So Drew-Bear and Koder, "Berg Tmolos," p. 207, based on the prosopographical evidence.
2. Drew-Bear and Koder, "Berg Tmolos," p. 214, surmise that the block on which the first inscription was carved served as a lintel for the gate of the katholikon of the monastery's church, while the block on which the second inscription was carved was set to the right. They speculate that there was once also a third inscribed block, perhaps containing the date of the foundation; this would presumably have been located on the left side of the gate.
3. See Drew-Bear and Koder, "Berg Tmolos," p. 197.

Bibliography

No additional bibliography has appeared since the publication of the document in 1988.

Translation

Inscription 1

[1.] + Nikephoros Erotikos, imperial protospatharios epi ton oikeiakon.¹ + In the name of Jesus Christ our Lord I have built this spiritual fold of the all-holy and ever Virgin Mary Mother of God from the foundations out of God-provided gifts and also the old age home in it called thus Ta Derma. I enjoin those of my own time and those (who will come) after me sharing in their protection and authority, that not more than twelve monks will be chosen and tonsured aside from the superior. Not to be exceeded . . .

Inscription 2

[2.] [. . . in the old age home] the number of the [sick]
[and needy] elderly [will be] twelve (?); and the number of those [stationed as assistants] in service of them [will be] four. [This number (will not be exceeded?) except] on account of some necessity having occurred.

THE PROTECTORATE

[3.] [. on the one hand,] the assembly of the monks
[. without] certainly the superior. On the other
[the elderly . . . internally] to rejuvenate [themselves] and at the same time to renew . . .
[p. 204]
[.] you will preserve.

[4.] + To this (end)
[I will impose upon all² the] curators³ and lay ad[ministrators⁴] [in my time and after me] [. . . to take care] of the administration and [
[.] and you will render accounts to the eph[oroi] (?)⁵

[5.] [If anyone should dare] to transgress [the commands] and [hold in contempt the canons of the monastery,] let [this one] be accursed and cut off [from the community of all] the worshippers of the [Father and the] Son and the Holy Spirit [and placed among those who shouted] “Away, away, crucify [him]!” (John 19: 15) +

Notes on the Translation

1. Drew-Bear and Koder, “Berg Tmolos,” pp. 206–7, suggest this individual is identical to an individual of the same name who was the brother-in-law of the eparch Theophilos and a teacher of geometry during the reign of Constantine VII Porphyrogenitos (944–959); in 969, this Nikephoros Erotikos served as an ambassador to Bulgaria for Nikephoros Phokas, for which see Dölger, Regesten, no. 718.
2. Koder translates here: “darüber hinaus [trage] ich allen.”
3. kouratores; cf. Ihor Ševčenko, “Inscription Commemorating Sisinnios, ‘Curator’ of Tzurulon (A.D. 813),” Byzantion 35 (1965), 564–74.
4. epitropoi; cf. (14) Ath. Testament [4]–[7], [10], [12]–[17].
5. Koder translates: “und sie zu betrachten als ihre Aufseher(?)”

Document Notes

- [1] Limitation on the number of monks. Cf. (9) Galesios [246], (13) Ath. Typikon [37], (17) Nikon Metanoieite [6], (19) Attaleiates [27], (27) Kecharitomene [5], (29) Kosmosoteira [48], (30) Phoberos [42], (32) Mamas [5], and (33) Heliou Bomon [5], but cf. (22) Evergetis [23].
- [2] Limitation on the number of patients and their assistants. Cf. (28) Pantokrator [36], [38]; (29) Kosmosoteira [61], [70]; (39) Lips [50], [51].
- [3] Responsibilities of the monastic assembly. Cf. (12) Tzimiskes [Preface], [27]; (14) Ath. Testament [12], [14]; (15) Constantine IX [13], [14], [15].
- [4] Governance of the foundation. In (19) Attaleiates [4], [23] the protector likewise has ultimate authority over the foundation’s financial affairs, but note the superior’s exemption from financial accountability to his monks in (22) Evergetis [18], as well as the denial to lay protectors of the right to demand financial accounts in (27) Kecharitomene [3], (32) Mamas [3], and (33) Heliou Bomon [3] during the monastic reform era.
- [5] Curse on transgressors. Cf. (8) John Xenos [2]; (9) Galesios [246]; (10) Eleousa [19]; (17) Nikon Metanoieite [5]; (18) Nea Gephyra [4]; (19) Attaleiates [8], [23], [46]; (22) Evergetis [12]; and (24) Christodoulos [B14].

17. Nikon Metanoeite: Testament of Nikon the Metanoeite for the Church and Monastery of the Savior, the Mother of God, and St. Kyriake in Lakedaimon

Date: after 997¹

Translator: Anastasius Bandy

Edition employed: Od. Lampsidis, Ho ek Pontou hosios Nikon ho Metanoeite (Athens, 1982) (= Archeion Pontou, Supplement 13), pp. 252–56, with commentary, 452–65.

Manuscript: Lost ms. of uncertain date, once at the Monastery of the Forty Martyrs in Lakedaimon.²

Other translations: None

Institutional History

A Life of Nikon the Metanoeite, “You Should Repent,” is preserved in two somewhat different manuscripts.³ Sullivan (Life, p. 7) concludes that the anonymous author, who claims to have been a later superior of the monastery of Nikon, wrote the Life from which both of these versions are descended in the middle of the eleventh century, possibly in the year 1042, and that he may have known the founder personally. The Life notes Nikon’s place of birth as Pontian Polemoniake, i.e., in the Armeniakon theme; Sullivan (Life, p. 18) reckons that he was born circa 930–935. While still a boy, he became a monk at the monastery of Chryse Petra (between the ancient provinces of Pontus and Paphlagonia), where he lived for twelve years. After Nikephoros Phokas’ reconquest of Crete in 961, he went to that island to assist in the reconversion of its population,⁴ spending seven years there. He arrived in Greece circa 968 (so Sullivan, Life, p. 19). After visiting several cities, including Athens, Thebes, Corinth, Argos, and Naupaktos, he arrived in Lakedaimon (Sparta), “probably about 970,” according to Sullivan.

The account of the construction of Nikon’s foundation at Sparta in the hagiographic Life is somewhat different from that found in (17) Nikon Metanoeite below. The presumed dependency of the former on the latter remains to be demonstrated. The Life mentions one of the anonymous author’s predecessors as superior, a certain Gregory, who is said to have obtained chrysobulls and other documents from an unnamed emperor guaranteeing Nikon’s foundation “total security” and freedom from “evil designs.”⁵ The vague wording nevertheless suggests Gregory obtained an independent and self-governing charter for the foundation along with immunity from taxation. Using money donated by a repentant imperial tax collector who earlier had abused the foundation’s monks, Gregory also purchased sacred vessels for the church and undertook interior and exterior renovations. Later, the imperial official Antiochos is said to have attempted to secularize a dependency of the monastery, converting it into an inn, for which outrage he paid with his life.⁶ Perhaps the official actually wished to put the dependency under the charistike. Finally, the Life records how Nikon posthumously avenged the assault of the local landowner Michael Choirosphaktes on the monastery's embattled dependency, then under the supervision of a certain Zosimos.⁷ These episodes are all thought to have occurred in the first half of the eleventh century during the lifetime of Nikon's anonymous hagiographer.

The holy man became the object of a healing cult at this time too, and there are numerous representations of him in Greek churches, including at Hosios Loukas.⁸ The subsequent history of the foundation is unknown, however. Some seventy years ago, the British School at Athens discovered the ruins of a large church dated to the end of the tenth century and various other structures from the eleventh century on the Spartan acropolis within the Romano-Byzantine retaining wall, but their identification with Nikon's foundation has been contested.⁹

Analysis

This document was composed at a crucial turning point in the history of Byzantine monasticism just as the use of the charistike by the public authorities was becoming widespread. It shows that the founder Nikon had an awareness of potential patronal abuses and that he also showed sympathy with what one might term "pre-reform" sentiments, e.g., his condemnation of resident lay appointees (esomonitai) [5] and gratuities (kaniskia) [9] for clerical appointments. Nevertheless, Nikon was essentially complacent about entrusting his foundation's welfare to public officials in a protectorate.

A. Foundation History

Nikon's Testament begins with an extended foundation history full of hagiographic elements and folklore (cf. (29) Kosmosoteira [75]). This section provides some valuable insights into how a holy man, local benefactors, and imperial officials negotiated their interests in the erection and governance of a private religious foundation towards the end of the tenth century. Here, Nikon, actively solicited by the "leading men" (archontes) of Lakedaimon for his presumed powers of soliciting divine intervention to end a devastating plague, drove a bargain with them that required the expulsion of the local Jewish community and the demolition of slaughterhouses in the vicinity of a local church.¹⁰ After the plague passed, Nikon announced plans to build a church in honor of the Savior, the Mother of God and St. Kyriake in thanksgiving for the divine deliverance. In this Testament, Nikon appears to usurp the role long reserved by both canon and imperial law for the local bishop by leading a procession from the cathedral church (katholikon) to the site of the church where a cross stood.¹¹ In the Life, however, the participation of the local bishop Theopemptos in the inaugural procession and the church's consecration is acknowledged.¹² The erection of the church is presented in both sources as a collaborative enterprise to which villagers, soldiers, local aristocrats and imperial officials contributed. There was also opposition, both serious and trivial.¹³ Spolia were utilized for building materials for the church as well as for other secular dwellings.

B. Lives of the Monks

A short list of regulatory provisions follows the foundation history. Given the need to reward the diverse patronage of this foundation, it is not surprising that the performance of memorial services for all associated in the building of the church assumes [1] first place among Nikon's regulations. Later, Nikon specifically mentions [4] the emperor, the local military governor (strategos) and judge (krites), and lord Basil Apokaukos—perhaps the most important individual benefactor—as deserving liturgical commemoration. The foundation’s superior was responsible [13] for celebrating the dominical feast days and for providing illumination of the church. Nikon limits [13] the number of resident monks to five, of which two [6] were priests, though there were evidently other personnel [11] stationed at the foundation’s dependencies.

17. NIKON METANOEITE

C. Administrative Matters

After Nikon’s death, a protectorate (ephoreia) was to be instituted [2] for the governance of the foundation. The governor and the judge would serve in the capacity of protectors although the term ephoros itself is not used here. This service entitled them to nominal honorary gifts of wine and fruit. Nikon concedes [8] lifetime tenure specifically to two of his colleagues as well as to the resident monks [6] generally; after their deaths, however, the protectors along with unspecified local magistrates were to appoint [6] the resident priests and monks who would likewise serve for life unless they proved [9] to be of bad character. The protectors would also appoint the superior [13]. There is no mention of a role for the local ecclesiastical hierarchy in these matters.

The protectors were responsible [12] for preserving Nikon’s arrangements and for upholding the moral character of the foundation’s residents, a matter of special concern since it was located in the midst of a marketplace. The protectors were also not to make [9] appointments to the foundation for the sake of gratuities (kaniskia and parakaleseis), and outsiders (esomonitai are meant here) were not to be imposed [5] upon the foundation as unwanted lodgers. These provisions demonstrate that Nikon already had some awareness of abuses that would become more troublesome and commonplace during the next century.

Nikon chose to subordinate [10] two earlier churches he had founded along with their revenues to this new foundation, making them dependencies (metochia). The five resident priests and monks were to be responsible [11] for governing and caring for the staff of these dependent institutions.

D. Financial Matters

This was a somewhat atypical foundation, at least within the context of those described in the documents in our collection, in that no one great patron was responsible for its erection and financing its endowment. Future donations [3] were also welcomed. One of the foundation’s protectors, the governor, had probably earned his position by donating [13] the village of Perissos, along with its inhabitants, to the foundation. Despite his generally trusting attitude towards the imperial authorities, Nikon was careful to note [3] that any future bequests should go directly to the resident priests and monks, not through the protectors or other public officials. The implication is that the foundation’s officials are to handle their own financial affairs (cf. [10], [11]).

E. External Relations

Nikon urges [14] that the foundation’s peasant dependents be left “undisturbed.” He entrusts [Conclusion] some local noblemen rather than the protectors with the safekeeping of his Testament. In keeping with contemporary usage, there is a curse [5] on transgressors.

TENTH CENTURY

Notes on the Introduction

1. The document is presumed to date from shortly before Nikon's death, which is itself reckoned to have taken place towards the end of the tenth century (see Vita S. Niconis, chap. 44, ed. Sullivan, Life, p. 150) a "sufficient time" after events that can be dated to 996 and 997; see Sullivan, Life, p. 19.
2. See the discussion in Lampsides, Nikon ho Metanoëite, pp. 246–49.
3. These are Halkin, BHG 1366, based on codex Koutloumousiacus 210 (1630 A.D.) (= K), ed. Lampsides, Nikon ho Metanoëite, pp. 161–240, and BHG 1367, based on Vaticanus Barberini graecus 583 (15th c.) (= B), ed. Lampsides, pp. 14–159, with a reprint of the sixteenth-century Latin translation by J. Sirmond. Summary of Vita B in Costa-Louillet, "Saints de Grèce," pp. 350–65. Sullivan, Life, has produced a text based on a collation of K and B along with an English translation. For the interrelationships of K and B and their use of the Vita Lucae Junioris (Halkin, BHG 994), see Sullivan, Life, pp. 1–23, and "Versions," pp. 161–73.
4. See Voulgarakis, "Rechristianisierung," pp. 192–98.
5. Vita, chap. 58, ed. Sullivan, Life, pp. 184–90.
6. Vita, chap. 59, ed. Sullivan, Life, pp. 190–94.
7. Vita, chaps. 60–61, ed. Sullivan, Life, pp. 194–202.
8. See Drandakes, "Eikonographika," pp. 306–19, and Maguire, "Healing," pp. 8–9.
9. See Bon, Péloponnèse byzantin, p. 70, with references in n. 1, cf. 140.
10. See also Vita, chaps. 33–34, 35, ed. Sullivan, Life, pp. 110–14, 118–24; for the local Jewish community, see Bowman, "Jewish Settlement," pp. 131–46, and Starr, Jews, pp. 167–68.
11. For stauropēgia, see G. Oesterle, "De monasterio stauropēgiaco," Il diritto ecclesiastico 64 (1953), 450–60.
12. Vita, chaps. 35, 38, ed. Sullivan, Life, pp. 116, 132.
13. See also Vita, chap. 39, ed. Sullivan, Life, pp. 134–40.

Bibliography

- Beck, Hans-Georg, Kirche und theologische Literatur im byzantinischen Reich (Munich, 1959), p. 589, cf. 577.
- Bon, Antoine, Le Péloponnèse byzantin jusqu'en 1204 (Paris, 1951), pp. 68–70, 140.
- Bowman, Steven, "The Jewish Settlement in Sparta and Mistra," BNJ 22 (1977), 131–46.
- Costa-Louillet, G., "Saints de Grèce aux VII^e, IX^e et X^e siècles," Byzantion 31 (1961), 309–69, esp. 346–65.
- Drandakes, N., "Eikonographia tou Hosiou Nikonos," Peloponnesiaka 5 (1962), 306–19.
- Galanopoulos, M. E., Bios, politeia, eikonographia, thaumata kai asmatike akolouthia tou hosiou theophorou patros hemon Nikonos tou Metanoëite (Athens, 1933).
- Halkin, François, Bibliotheca hagiographica graeca, 3rd ed. (Brussels, 1957), 1368, cf. 1366, 1367.
- Kazhdan, Alexander, Talbot, Alice-Mary, and Ševčenko, Nancy, "Nikon 'Ho Metanoëite,'" ODB, pp. 1483–84.
- Lampros, Sp., "Ho Barberinos kodix tou biou Nikonos tou Metanoëite," NH 5 (1908), 301–48.
- , "Ho bios Nikonos tou Metanoëite," NH 3 (1906), 129–228.
- Maguire, Henry, "Physical and Spiritual Healing in the Mosaics of Hosios Loukas," BSC 16 (1990), 8–9.
- Starr, Joshua, The Jews in the Byzantine Empire, 641–1204 (Athens, 1939), pp. 167–68.
- Sullivan, Denis, The Life of Saint Nikon (Brookline, Mass., 1987). Edition and English translation of the Vita Niconis.
- , "The Versions of the Vita Niconis," DOP 32 (1978), 157–73.
- Voulgarakis, E. "Nikon Metanoëite und die Rechristianisierung der Kreter vom Islam," ZMR 47 (1963), 192–204, 258–69.

17. NIKON METANOEITE

Translation

In the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Spirit, Amen.

[Foundation History]

As God and the all-holy Mother of God wished, they did bring me to Peloponnesos, where I taught for two years,¹ during the time of lord Nicholas the Judge. When I came to Amykleion, I proclaimed the divine words.² At that time the leading men of Lakedaimon assembled in the church of St. Barbara and told me that such a plague had fallen upon Lakedaimon that “we are unable to bury the dead. Therefore, make every effort to come yourself, [and be] with us, otherwise even we ourselves are going to depart from there.” I answered them that, “since, in fact, the anger is from God, you cannot escape because God, who dwells in the heavens, holds sway over both the East and the West and to whatever place you wish to go he will find you. However, on your part, make an agreement with me written by your own hand to the effect that you will obey me in those things that I am about to do, which is this: I [will] expel the Jews from the area³ so that they [will] depart and tear down the slaughter houses which are in the vicinity of St. Epiphany and that they slaughter on Saturday and observe the feast of Sunday. Then I, too, will make an agreement with you written by my own hand to the effect that no one will die.”

The people heeded me and loved me as incense and I remained at the church of St. Barbara along with the sacristan and the rest of the people for fifteen days and nights. God covered my sins and all were set free from the plague. After this we made a religious procession to the marketplace,⁴ there where the cross was standing. And I set up a small seat on which I ascended and proclaimed the divine words and not my own. I preached words like these: “Since God heeded me and all of you have been set free from the plague, you should know that here a church is going to be built in the name of the Savior, of the Mother of God, and of St. Kyriake.” Again on another day we held a religious procession from the cathedral church, and as I was going out, I took a rock on my back which [p. 252] I carried and placed on the cross.⁵ At that time I preached to all the people who were present at the religious procession to the effect that “let everyone who loves the Savior, the Mother of God, and St. Kyriake do whatever I do in order that this church may be built.” God then rendered his assistance and all, young and old, heeded me and all brought rocks so that I buried the cross up to the middle with light rock. All the able women filled it up to the top.

One man,⁶ however, was found at that time who wanted to hinder the church from being built at that place which I had indicated. God knows that I neither cursed that man nor held anything against him, yet he happened to die. The leading men, however, in order that they might play tzounganion, did not let me build the church.⁷ I implored them, saying to them that “I do not want anything else from you but merely five beams in order that I may build arches and that you may go under [the arches] without being impeded from playing tzounganion and that the church stand above.” These leading men gave me five beams. Just as soon as I went from the cathedral church to the designated place where the church was going to be built, I found twenty-five beams and rocks that were large and suitable.⁸ Some of the leading men, however, attempted to take the stone for their own use and they were unable. It was God’s will and all [stones] found their way into the church, and through a dream almighty God, whenever a stone pleased him, disclosed it to the men and they brought it.

TENTH CENTURY

At the base of the cross there were demons, as many as a bushel, resembling wasps.⁹ These demons struck two men and threw them to the ground, but by God's help they were healed and the demons fled. By the time that the church was built up to the ground floor, the feast day of St. Kyriake had arrived. Then I implored the senior priest to perform the liturgy. He came and performed the liturgy. While he was performing the liturgy, the wasps came and fell in front of the senior priest and me. When, however, the time came for the senior priest to read the gospel, all the wasps fled [p. 253] and went to the bank of the river.

When the builders were ready to build, it was necessary for me to remain close to the building, who, sinner though I am, nevertheless knew beforehand up to where the church was going to extend and thus, taking bricks, I began to build. Some people from the villages were telling me that a star had descended from the sky and was standing over the church, which I did not believe. Consequently, I went to the venerable cross and stopped there and saw the star just as the villagers had been telling me and I became fully convinced. The church was built, and when we had set up the dome, I went to the cathedral church where I stayed for two evenings. It was so dark that no one could see anyone. I saw three stars which came and fell upon the church. From their falling there appeared such a great light that even the villages became visible from the light of the stars. I summoned also the sacristan and he saw the light which had appeared. I too saw the signs which God was making, and I marveled and worked hard with my whole soul for the church.

At Sampson there were two columns, one of which lord Malakenos¹⁰ took so that he might take it to his house. I implored him and he gave it to me. Lord Rhontakios also attempted [to take] the other column with the aid of a hundred men and he was unable, but I took fifteen [men] and went and brought it there where the other one was. All marveled that, whereas one hundred [men] were unable to bring it, fifteen [men] with the help of the Savior were able to take it. Even I often used one beam for construction and the next day I would find two. Again I used two and I would find four.

Lime ran short and a man from Sthlavochorion¹¹ came and promised me four bushels. That night the Savior came down to him who had the lime and said to him, "This night I am taking your soul." The man who had the lime said to the Savior, "Sir, who are you?" He answered and said to him, "I am the Savior, [p. 254] whose divine structure [Nikon, surnamed] 'Repent' is building in the marketplace of Lakedaimon. You promised him only four bushels of lime, but you promised a small amount since you have a house full. If, however, you do what is good for you, bring as much lime as you have and fire up still two more [lime] kilns." That man, just as soon as he woke up, said, "Pity me, Master, and I shall give as much lime as I have and fire up two more kilns." The Savior again came to me and says to me, "Arise, start building because I have taken care of your concern for lime and do not grieve. Arise then and see at daybreak how much lime is coming and clear out a house so that you may put it [there]." I put it in the house and I built. I fired up fifty more kilns.

Believe me that God did not let me procure wood in order to fire up the [lime] kiln, for a man was found and he gave me wood. Then I got workmen and began building with what God had sent and what was given to the church, which I was eager to turn over to the Savior so that I might not have him as an opponent on the Day of Judgment.

17. NIKON METANOEITE

[Testamentary Provisions]

[1.] May God remember all those who associated together with me for the building of the church, and let the priest who performs liturgy in this church, should this priest perhaps not commemorate them, give an account on the Day of Judgment before the fearful Judge.

[2.] Further, it is my wish that after my death the *strategos*¹² and the judge who are going to be appointed exercise authority over this church, getting from it five measures of wine and one basket of apples, because I built this church with the help of the strategoï, the soldiers, and the judges.

[3.] If, however, anyone should perhaps wish to make a bequest to the church or to its houses, let neither the protonotarios nor the tax collector nor any public official nor strategos nor the judge accept this, but let this [bequest] be accepted by those who are in the church, that is, the fathers and priests, in order that they may remain undisturbed and may live in peace and love.

[4.] Let them also commemorate the [p. 255] emperor and the strategos and the judge who have dealings with the church, and much more, lord Basil Apokaukos.

[5.] Whoever should violate this word of mine or this injunction of mine, the sinner, and should lodge at the church or at its houses and should bother the monks who inhabit this church or the priests, let him be anathematized by the Father and the Son and the Holy Spirit.

[6.] Further, it is my wish that there be in the church two priests and that the resident monks and the priests in this church not be bothered but be allowed to bear fruit for their souls just as they were doing during my lifetime.

[7.] Whenever, however, either a monk or a priest should be gone from the church, let them not appoint to it a man who is useless, but let them install one who has moral excellence and piety.

[8.] Further, it is my wish and my order that the priest Gabriel and the monk Hilarion, who are together with me and served me, remain in the church undisturbed and unimpeded by anyone throughout their lifetimes. After their deaths, however, let the strategos and the judge together with the local magistrates appoint any able men, priests and monks they may find.

[9.] Let the aforesaid not install in the church, through gifts and requests, either priests or monks. But should perhaps even those who have been appointed prove to be bad, let others who are good be appointed.

[10.] Let all the revenues of the churches of Sthlavochorion and Parorion, which I built, that is, the dependencies along with their incomes, be stored up and collected in the church of the Savior, not only the yield of the vineyards and small farms and olive trees, but also the yield of fruit-bearing and non-fruit-bearing trees.

TENTH CENTURY

[11.] Let the monks and the priests who are at the Savior do the governing and have the care of those who are settled in the dependencies.

[12.] Let the strategos and the judge at the time be bound by the Father and the Son and the Holy Spirit, and by me, the sinner, to keep all those things such as I have defined and preserve them accurately. I mean that they see to it that the monks and priests be men who are able and unimpeachable, attested by good men, since my church is located [p. 256] in the middle of the market-place.

[13.] Further, I order that the superior who would be appointed by the strategos and judge celebrate all the feast days of the Savior and do the illumination [of the church]. From the surplus, however, of the revenue let only five brothers be nourished, Father Theodore Xylanthropos and four others.

[14.] Those who work in the church, that is, the [inhabitants] of the village of Perissos, which the saintly strategos gave me, I wish to be untouched and undisturbed by anyone.

[Conclusion]

Whatever, however, the strategos and the judge should do after the death of me, the sinner, let God too do to them at the Day of Judgment.

Whoever should ignore these words of mine, the sinner, let the Savior and the all-holy Mother of God repay him for this.

I adjure by God the imperial protospatharios and lord Demetrios, the protospatharios, that these two keep possession of my testament, which they are to seal with a leaden seal and guard it so that God may guide them in order that all these things which I have sketched in the quire may be preserved.

Notes on the Translation

1. Probably 968–70.
2. Cf. account in the Vita, chap. 33, ed. Sullivan, Life, pp. 110–12.
3. See the discussion in Bowman, “Jewish Settlement,” pp. 132–33, and Starr, “Jews,” pp. 167–68; the Vita, chap. 35, ed. Sullivan, Life, pp. 118–24, notes the objection of John Aratos, a member of the local nobility, to the expulsion.
4. Cf. the rather different account in the Vita, chap. 35, ed. Sullivan, Life, pp. 114–18, in which Theopemptos the local bishop takes part.
5. In the parallel account in the Vita, chap. 38, ed. Sullivan, Life, p. 132, the local bishop once again takes part.
6. Perhaps an allusion to John Aratos and his fate, for which see the Vita, chap. 35, ed. Sullivan, Life, pp. 122–24.
7. Cf. the more elaborate and confrontational story in the Vita, chap. 39, ed. Sullivan, Life, pp. 134–40.
8. Cf. the account in the Vita, chap. 36, ed. Sullivan, Life, p. 124.
9. In the Vita, chap. 36, ed. Sullivan, Life, pp. 124–26, the wasps come from underneath a large stone after its removal for use in construction of the church.
10. John Malakenos, said in the Vita, chap. 43, ed. Sullivan, Life, pp. 148–50, to have been denounced for disloyalty to Basil II but encouraged by Nikon to go to accept his summons to Constantinople where Nikon predicted his loyalty would be vindicated.

17. NIKON METANOEITE

11. Location of one of the foundation's two dependencies; see [10] below.
12. Perhaps the strategos Gregory mentioned in the Vita, chaps. 39 and 40, ed. Sullivan, Life, pp. 136, 140, to whom Nikon predicted the fate of Bardas Skleros, probably in 987 (so Sullivan, p. 19).

Document Notes

- [1] Memorial services for builders of church not to be neglected. See also [4] and [7] below. Cf. the modest request in the contemporary (14) Ath. Testament [21]; later documents, e.g., (29) Kosmosoteira [64], [68], [72], echo the urgency seen here as engagements for memorial services became more important as a founder's right and as a funding device.
- [2] Designation of the protectors; their honoraria. For their commemorations and appointment rights, see [4] and [8] below. Nikodemos, author of (18) Nea Gephyra [2], likewise names the incumbents of these offices as the protectors of his foundation.
- [3] Entitlement of resident priests and monks to future bequests. That is to say, the protectors are not to handle the foundation's finances or retain any of the income for themselves, both of which the protector was to do in (19) Attaleiates [24], [33].
- [4] Commemorations of the emperor, the protectors, and lord Apokauchos. See also [1] above. The emperor is Basil II. The last-named individual is presumably the foundation's primary benefactor, a Byzantine governor at Corinth, mentioned in the Vita, chap. 40, ed. Sullivan, Life, pp. 140–42, to whose side Nikon rushed in 996 when he fell ill at the time of a threatened Bulgarian raid on the Peloponnesos.
- [5] Imposition of residents prohibited. The reference is to esomonitai, sometimes also known as katapemptoi or "imposed guests," individuals whom a monastery was obliged to support. These were adamantly rejected in most typika written for reform monasteries such as (27) Kecharitomene [53], (32) Mamas [26], (33) Heliou Bomon [26], and (34) Machairas [11]; but see their toleration in (24) Christodoulos [B15], (28) Pantokrator [28], and (29) Kosmosoteira [107], [117].
- [6] Number of priests; lifetime tenure for all residents. See also [8] and [13] below. For tenure of office for officials in a contemporary document, see (14) Ath. Testament [11].
- [7] Monks and priests to designate replacements during their absences. Perhaps this is intended to keep the performance of commemorative services from lapsing; see [1] above.
- [8] Priest Gabriel and monk Hilarion to have lifetime tenure; protectors' and local magistrates' rights of appointment. See [6] above for general concession of lifetime tenure. Later protectors were disallowed such appointment rights under the influence of the monastic reform: see (27) Kecharitomene [3], (32) Mamas [3], and (33) Heliou Bomon [3].
- [9] Protectors and magistrates not to make simoniacal appointments. Priests and monks are not to be installed in exchange for gifts (kaniskia) or in response to requests (parakaleseis). Later, independent monasteries in the reform tradition would face the difficult question of the acceptability of entrance gifts given directly to the institution: see (22) Evergetis [37] and related documents.
- [10] Revenues of the dependencies to be stored in the main church. Cf. the discussion of the agricultural enterprise supporting one of these dependencies in the Vita, chap. 60, ed. Sullivan, Life, pp. 194–200. The economic subordination of dependencies to the principal monastery is the usual administrative procedure; see (28) Pantokrator [64].
- [11] Officials of the main church to administer the dependencies. That is to say, the administrators should not be laymen; see treatment of this issue in (22) Evergetis [34] and related documents. The Vita, chap. 60, ed. Sullivan, Life, p. 198, mentions the old monk Zosimos, the resident administrator of one of these dependencies.
- [12] Protectors obliged to preserve the founder's arrangements, guard the community's morality. Generally protectors were not allowed to change administrative procedures, but see (32) Mamas [15], cf. [3]. For a similar fear of proximity to a marketplace as is shown here, see (19) Attaleiates [30].

TENTH CENTURY

[13] Use of the foundation's revenues by the superior. For celebration of feasts, see (22) Evergetis [11]; for fixed illumination requirements, see (28) Pantokrator [29], [34]. For the maintenance of a fixed number of brothers, see [6], [7], and [8] above and (16) Mount Tmolos [2]. Note allusion to the protectors' right to appoint the superior; cf. (13) Ath. Testament [12] and (19) Attaleiates [26], [29].

[14] Villagers working for the church to be undisturbed. The implication is that the peasants should not be treated like chattel or have new burdens placed on them; cf. (9) Galesios [246] and, for the most extensive treatment of this issue, (29) Kosmosoteira [71], [76], [103]. See also the considerable sympathy for the sufferings of the peasants at one of the monastery's dependencies in the Vita, chap. 60, ed. Sullivan, Life, pp. 194–200.

18. Nea Gephyra: Testament of Nikodemos for the Monastery of Nea Gephyra near Lakedaimon

Date: May 1, 1027

Translator: Stephen Reinert

Edition employed: D. Feissel and A. Philippidis-Braat, “Inventaires en vue d’un recueil des inscriptions historiques de Byzance. III. Inscriptions du Péloponnèse (à l’exception de Mistra),” T&M 9 (1985), 267–396, at 301–2.

Manuscript: Parisinus, supplément grec 855, fol. 10, a transcription made by Michel Fourmont in 1730 of an inscription on a now lost column found in situ.¹

Other translations: French, by A. Philippidis-Braat, in Feissel and Philippidis-Braat, “Inscriptions,” 302–3.

Institutional History

The foundation was dedicated to Jesus Christ (see [1]), perhaps with the appellation Nea Gephyra or “New Bridge.” (29) Kosmosoteira [67] provides an illustration of other bridges associated with a monastery, including one dedicated to the Mother of God and marked with her image. There is also another example of a Greek monastery in southern Italy acquiring a bridge in 1125.² Aside from the testimony of this document, nothing else is known about the history of this foundation.

Analysis

The author of this unique document, an inscription defining the status of a monastery church established to protect a newly erected bridge built over the Eurotas River, followed contemporary fashion of the early eleventh century in setting up [3] a protectorate (an ephoreia) to govern his foundation, though the term itself is not used. Nikodemos sought to secure [2] imperial protection for his foundation by obtaining for it a recognition of its independence (autexousion). Like the author of (17) Nikon Metanoeite [2] a generation earlier, of whose example he may have been aware, he relied more directly on the good will of the local judge (krites) and the military governor (strategos). These officials were entitled either jointly or acting individually to appoint [3] a superior for the monastery from among the monks and, if necessary, remove him from office as well. Nikodemos required only that an outsider (i.e., a xenokourites)³ not be chosen as superior, which even at this early date was recognized as a potential danger to an institution’s independence. Generally speaking, however, our author was unsophisticated about contemporary perils to private religious foundations, as when he declares [3], with quaint naiveté, that “Whatever the emperor, judge and general do regarding the church, let [their actions] find [favor] with God.” Nikodemos’ confidence placed in the good will of the emperor and his local representatives did not extend to others, however. In defiance (or more likely, ignorance) of canon law, Nikodemos denies [2] the local bishop and his clergy any rights at all in the church. In an attitude typical of private benefactors, they are told “not even to set foot in it.” The document concludes [4] with the traditional curse on anyone who might dare to subvert the founder’s prescriptions.

ELEVENTH CENTURY

Notes on the Introduction

1. See Curtius, CIG, vol. 4, no. 8704, pp. 327–28, and Philippidis-Braat, in Feissel and Philippidis-Braat, “Inscriptions,” p. 302.
2. Francisco Trinchera, Syllabus graecarum membranarum (Naples, 1865), no. 98, p. 126; see discussion in Millet, “Église et pont,” p. 105.
3. See (13) Ath. Typikon [21]–[29] and (19) Attaleiates [30].

Bibliography

- Curtius, Johann Wilhelm, and Kirchhoff, Adolph, Corpus Inscriptionum Graecarum, vol. 4 (Berlin, 1877), pp. 327–28.
- Millet, G., “Église et pont à Byzance,” Byzantina-Metabyzantina 1.2 (1949), 103–11.
- Zakythinos, D. A., “Kastron Lakedaimonos,” Hellenika 15 (1957), 97–111.

Translation

[1.] Through the mercy and abundant compassion of Almighty God, and at his command, a divinely protected edifice—the all-holy new bridge over the river called Iris [Eurotas], near the fort¹ of Lakedaimon—was built by me, the monk Nikodemos. This edifice worthy of God having been completed by my humble self, I resolved at God’s command to raise up from the foundations a holy and beautiful church to our Lord Jesus Christ on the left part of the bridge, so that a church might exist [there] for the safe-keeping of this little bridge. This church was built in the reign of the most pious emperor Constantine [VIII (1025–1028)].

[2.] Bearing in mind the untimely advent of death, I resolved to strengthen this church of God in my own lifetime, above all [by ensuring that it enjoy] independence [through the protection] of the emperor; that it be inspected by and cared for by the judge and strategos, who govern the theme; and that the bishop of this same city, with his clergy, not be allowed to exercise any authority in this church, not even to set foot in it.

[3.] After my death, let the monastery be governed and rightly guided by the aforementioned [officials]. Let either both of them, or only one (the one of them who happens to be in the area), select someone good and useful from among the monks in the monastery and appoint him superior. Let them not appoint someone subject to another [monastery] as superior. Thus the superior should lovingly take care of the church and the bridge and the brothers. Should he be negligent, let him be removed and suffer the penalties of disgrace, and let another of the brothers be appointed [in his stead]. Whatever the emperor, judge and strategos do regarding the church, let [their actions] find [favor] with God.

[4.] Let him who does not obey, but rather subverts, my prescriptions have the anathema of the

18. NEA GEPHYRA

Holy Apostles and the three hundred and eighteen Fathers, and the curse of Judas. Let him be heir to eternal punishment along with those who said “Away with him, away with him, crucify the Son of God” (John 15:19). Let him have no part with the Christians, and let him be excommunicated from the gift of Christ. The present Testament was written at the behest of me, the monk Nikodemos, [p. 302] on the first [day] of the month of May, in the tenth indiction, in the year 6535 [= 1027 A.D.]. Remember, O Lord, those who conform with [this Rule] and absolve them of all [their] debts.

Note on the Translation

1. kastron.

Document Notes

- [1] Foundation history. Cf. (6) Rila [1], (9) Galesios [246], (10) Eleousa [3], (13) Ath. Typikon [2] ff., (17) Nikon Metanoieite, (19) Attaleiates [3] ff., (22) Evergetis [2], [3].
- [2] Definition of the foundation’s status. See discussion in Zakythinos, “Kastron,” pp. 102–4. The text hints at an imperial recognition of the foundation’s independence, perhaps even a formal charter of “independent and self-governing” status; cf. (8) John Xenos, Institutional History; (9) Galesios [247], cf. [223]; (10) Eleousa [18]; (13) Ath. Typikon [12]; (19) Attaleiates [14]. The protectorate set up here is very similar to that found in (17) Nikon Metanoieite [2] and may have been modeled on it. The Vita S. Niconis, chaps. 35, 38, ed. Sullivan, Life, pp. 116, 132, shows Nikon Metanoieite recognizing some episcopal rights denied here; cf. (10) Eleousa [16], [18]. For the exclusion of the bishop from the premises, see also (31) Areia [M12].
- [3] Rights of the protectors; responsibilities of the superior. See discussion in Zakythinos, “Kastron,” pp. 104–8. For the protector’s right to appoint a superior, see (13) Ath. Testament [12], (17) Nikon Metanoieite [13], and (19) Attaleiates [26], [29]. For the distrust of xenokouritai, see the long discussion in (13) Ath. Typikon [17] ff. For the protector’s right to remove a superior, see (14) Ath. Testament [16]. The author of (29) Kosmosoteira [67] likewise enjoins his superior to care for bridges on monastic property.
- [4] Curse on transgressors. See similar curses in (8) John Xenos [2]; (9) Galesios [246]; (10) Eleousa [19]; (16) Mount Tmolos [5], (17) Nikon Metanoieite [5]; (19) Attaleiates [8], [23]; (22) Evergetis [12]; and (24) Christodoulos [B14].

19. Attaleiates: Rule of Michael Attaleiates for his Almshouse in Rhaidestos and for the Monastery of Christ Panoiktirmon in Constantinople

Date: March 1077

Translator: Alice-Mary Talbot

Edition employed: Paul Gautier, “La diataxis de Michel Attaliate,” REB 39 (1981), 5–143, with text at 17–130.

Manuscripts: Codex Constantinopolitanus Metochii Sancti Sepulchri 375, now in the National Library, Athens (March 1077), an isotype of the original document, supplemented by Codex 85, nunc 79, Theological School, Halki, now in the Patriarchal Library, Istanbul (1761).¹

Other translations: French, by Gautier, “Diataxis,” pp. 16–128.

Institutional History

The founder Michael Attaleiates, judging from his name, was a native of Attaleia, where he was born ca. 1020–1030.² A self-made man, he became a senator and a judge. He is best known as the author of a History which covers the years 1034–1079/80.³ According to the Rule below, he acquired various properties at Rhaidestos on the north coast of the Sea of Marmara and at Constantinople, chiefly from the estate of his first wife Sophia and her relatives.⁴ Attaleiates chose to dedicate most [3], [16] but not all [17] of these properties to a unified charitable foundation with facilities in both locations, specifically an almshouse at Rhaidestos [4] and a church of Christ Panoiktirmon, “All-Merciful,” at Constantinople. Originally Attaleiates intended [11] for the church to be staffed by regular clergy, but fearing perhaps that this might lead to its being taken over by the ecclesiastical authorities, he changed his mind and decided to employ monks instead.

Fundamentally, Attaleiates conceived of this as a private foundation, but to arm it against predators he set [10] a protectorate (ephoreia) over it, to commence with his son Theodore and to continue first in the direct and thereafter in the collateral lines of his descendants. It is unclear how long Attaleiates lived after the issuance of his Rule in 1077. He was still alive to receive a chrysobull from Emperor Nikephoros III Botaneiates (1078–1081) in 1079.⁵

Little can be surmised about the foundation’s fate after Attaleiates’ death. The books listed in [INV 14], cf. [INV 17] were acquired after both Attaleiates and Theodore had died, and those in [INV 13] were given to the foundation from their estate. Lemerle (Cinq études, p. 112) assumes the foundation became independent under the provisions of [14], perhaps because the superior Michael appears as a donor of books in his own right in [INV 7] and [INV 12]. This bequest likely took place in 1085. The record of an unnamed superior of “the monastery of Attaleiates” having participated in the Synod of Blachernai at which the reformer Leo of Chalcedon was rehabilitated in late 1094 is the last mention of the foundation in our historical sources.⁶ A donor, Manuel Boutoumites, mentioned in [INV 17] was one of Alexios Komnenos’ generals and later served him on a diplomatic mission to the Crusader Kingdom of Jerusalem in 1111/12. The foundation's fate, however, is unknown, though Lemerle speculates that it may have been absorbed by one of the capital's powerful monasteries or by the patriarchate.

19. ATTALEIATES

Analysis

This document, which is prefaced by an extended autobiographical introduction [1] composed in the rhetorical style, was drawn up by its author, Michael Attaleiates, in 1077, at what was perhaps the time of greatest peril to private foundations from the charistike and other forms of government intervention and confiscation of assets. It is not surprising then that Attaleiates should have been extremely concerned (one might say almost paranoid) about future threats to his foundation (see esp. [38], [43]). He was certainly aware of the relatively new independent form of government for monastic foundations, yet like Manuel of Stroumitza, author of (10) Eleousa, he found it difficult to make the radical break with the traditional patronal customs required for utilizing this type of organization from the beginning for his own foundation. Essentially, Attaleiates was unwilling to put trust in anyone but his son Theodore and his expected descendants to protect the foundation, despite the risks he knew this entailed, that it might fall [25] into the hands of an unworthy descendant or that his entire family line might eventually die out [38]. Therefore, the contemporary overlays of a protectorate [10] and conditional institutional self-governance [14] notwithstanding, Attaleiates' Rule is exceptionally valuable for its illustration of the mores and governance of traditional private religious foundations typical in preceding centuries.

A. Lives of the Monks

Constrained by his old-fashioned patronal preoccupations as well as his choice of a testamentary format, Attaleiates offers [29] very little in the way of legislation on the observances of monastic life and liturgical observances such as are commonly found in contemporary typika. These matters were presumably treated in detail in a now lost typikon that Attaleiates claims [32], to have authored personally. This typikon evidently prescribed a doxology of day and night offices, conducted under the supervision of Attaleiates' personally chosen ecclesiarch Antony, who is said [30] to be "familiar with the monastic rules of the church."

Although Attaleiates himself was not a magnate of the highest social class, this was an aristocratic monastery. The limit on the number of monks was fixed [27] at seven though at the time he drew up the Rule Attaleiates was able to support only five. They were to receive [33], [35] annual allowances (rogai) and were allowed to have [42] servants who were entitled to be pensioned off if they survived their monastic masters. Unlike Athanasios the Athonite, who in (13) Ath. Typikon [48] bans eunuchs from Lavra, Attaleiates actually requires [30] that his monks be eunuchs, though in practice he was willing to allow for such exceptions as his own relatives and donors of real property. Following conservative practice, Attaleiates was unwilling [30] to accept monks tonsured in other institutions (xenokouritai) except, again, for some personal favorites.

B. Administrative Matters

1. Private Administration by the Founder's Heirs

This document is profoundly old-fashioned in the sense of being primarily concerned with the transmission of the foundation as family property. Attaleiates appoints [10] his son Theodore, a layman, as director of the almshouse (ptochotrophos)—as any private founder might—in the capacity of a protector, and sets up a hereditary line of succession to this office. As had been the case since the time of (1) Apa Abraham [5], precautions needed to be taken, therefore, to assure that the foundation was not subsequently secularized by the founder's descendants. Although Byzantine canon law had sought to maintain the irrevocability of endowments for private ecclesiastical foundations since the fifth century, the principle is acknowledged [10] here by a private benefactor for the first time in the documents in our collection.

2. Patronal Privileges

Theodore and his heirs had the right [26], cf. [29] to preside over the election of and grant recognition to the superior and the steward. Theodore could also rule [26] the foundation directly without any obligation to allow the election of a superior. With respect to Theodore, Attaleiates declares [33] “I want everyone to love and be in awe of him, to respect and fear him.” A superior could be removed [26] for showing a haughty attitude towards or causing difficulties for Theodore or another of Attaleiates' heirs. All officials were admonished [12] to show “respect and submission and honor and obedience” to the heirs, and the foundation's property manager was obliged [23] to render an account of receipts and expenditures to them too. Attaleiates' heirs were also to preside [29] over community reconciliations and resolve all disputes; their judgment was to be “binding and irrevocable” with no appeals allowed to external authorities.

So strong was Attaleiates' personal confidence in Theodore that he was willing to allow [33], cf. [10] the monks to hold him accountable only for alienating donated properties, holding back funds for specified pious donations (psychika), and altering the terms of the Rule itself. Yet even under these circumstances Theodore was to merit only a “mild reprimand.”

3. Provisional Institutional Independence

Like Manuel of Stroumitza, author of (10) Eleousa [18], Attaleiates gives [14] a conditional endorsement to the increasingly popular idea of the “independent and self-governing” institution reluctantly, almost as an afterthought to his own elaborate provisions for the governance of his foundation along traditional lines of private management.⁷ He was willing to allow the foundation institutional self-governance only once his entire line of descendants had come to an end. Interestingly, the availability of any suitable collateral relatives [13] or even female descendants [10] would serve to postpone this event.

4. Precautions against External Interference

As the author of (8) John Xenos [2] did earlier in the eleventh century, Attaleiates judged (rightly) that even emperors, patriarchs and other ecclesiastical officials should not be exempt from his admonitions [7], [8] to leave the foundation undisturbed. He specifically forbids [8] the appointment of a charistikarios or an (outside) protector. He also makes [9] a sophisticated (if desperate) appeal to canon and secular law as support for upholding the inviolability of a testator's will. Also, like Manuel of Stroumitza in (10) Eleousa [18], Attaleiates makes an attempt to attribute institutional ownership to a heavenly patron, here the deity himself, which can be seen as another attempt to gain some measure of institutional security from greedy but perhaps God-fearing predators.

19. ATTALEIATES

5. Preservation of the Rule and Other Important Documents

From the late eleventh century onwards, patrons like the author of (23) Pakourianos [33] begin to show an increasing appreciation of the value of preserving typika, property deeds, imperial privileges and other important papers for the well-being and security of their foundations. There are some especially detailed precautions [40] to this end here in this document, ultimately successful, it would seem, given the Rule's preservation to our own day in a contemporary isotype long after the disappearance of the foundation itself. The Rule also contains an inventory (brevion), the earliest one preserved along with a monastic typikon. Attaleiates expectantly announces [44] his reservation of several blank pages in the document for the transcription of another expected imperial chrysobull (that is, [INV 11]) as well as future acquisitions of property.

C. Financial Matters

1. Financial Administration

Attaleiates planned [16] to support the foundation with a combination of revenues from landed properties and rental incomes from urban real estate.⁸ As noted above, he was obliged [27] to limit the number of resident monks to correlate with the expected income from the endowment. Attaleiates claims [22] that he has exploited his connections at court to obtain "total immunity" from imperial taxation for his immovable properties; the exemption supposedly applied [17] also to family properties that he kept out of the bequest to the foundation. The attached imperial chrysobulls, [INV 10] and [INV 11], however, are not as generous as he would have us believe (see below). Salaries and other expenses for the foundation had first claim [24] on the annual income. A third of the balance was to be saved for future needs and two-thirds given to Theodore as a private profit for which he "does not have to render an account or submit to an inquiry." Theodore's heirs were to enjoy the same entitlement. This is the most explicit testimony in any Byzantine source to the entitlement of a founder and his heirs to a share in the "surplus" income of a private religious foundation. The monastery's steward, Attaleiates' appointee Michael [41], and, as noted above, the foundation's property manager [23] were both accountable to Attaleiates' heir.

2. Other Sources of Income

As might be expected from a patron of traditional tastes, Attaleiates was happy to accept [30] outside financial support (prosenexeis) in exchange for liturgical commemoration or a donation of landed property in exchange for payment of a living allowance (a siteresion), both of which would be viewed more critically by future reformers. In [INV 4] he indicates that future donors of immovable or movable property (i.e., sacred vessels, books, etc.) were to receive perpetual commemorations in the daily offices. Subsequent donations of this nature, faithfully recorded in the Rule's inventory (from [INV 5] onwards), demonstrate that the foundation was not disappointed in the fulfillment of Attaleiates' expectation of additional benefactions.

3. Imperial Immunities

Attaleiates had already obtained an imperial chrysobull from Emperor Michael VII Doukas (1075) before he finished work on his Rule, and, as he anticipated in [44], he was able to obtain another chrysobull, from Nikephoros III Botaneiates (1079), subsequently. The two chrysobulls were transcribed into the Rule's inventory, ensuring their preservation along with the document. These chrysobulls make clear [22] that what Attaleiates actually succeeded in obtaining from these emperors was considerably less than the phrase "total immunity" might seem to imply. Michael VII's chrysobull [INV 10] states that Attaleiates' properties are to "pay only that amount exacted from them annually up to this point, whether it is taxes, or some other kind of payment." What the "immunity" consisted of was exemption from any new burdens of taxation or services, particularly those of an arbitrary, unpredictable nature. The chrysobull of confirmation from the ruling emperor Nikephoros III [INV 11] quotes extensively from the earlier chrysobull and seems to extend the immunity already enjoyed by the donor's properties at Rhaidestos to those at Constantinople. Additionally, it implicitly prohibits the establishment of a charistike over the foundation and endorses the doctrine of inalienability espoused by Attaleiates in the Rule, even going a bit further by declaring that the deconsecration of property used to endow a religious foundation was sacrilege (hierosylia). It is most interesting to see what would in just a few short years become a highly controversial tenet of ecclesiastical reformers like Leo of Chalcedon turning up here ahead of time in, of all places, an imperial chrysobull.

D. Relationship to the Monastic Reform Movement

As a patron, Attaleiates was no innovator like his contemporaries Timothy, author of (22) Evergetis, or Gregory Pakourianos. To be sure, he does show [39] a concern for the welfare of the dependent peasantry (paroikoi) and the free tenants whose labors and payments made the foundation possible, a concern that may have been a residual legacy of the imperial agrarian legislation of the tenth century and that would be taken up again by some future founders in the monastic reform tradition. To his credit Attaleiates was also keenly aware of many of the most troublesome problems endemic in the traditional system of private religious foundations, including their vulnerability to outside predators, of course, but also the consequences of the eventual extinction of a founder's family line [13], [14] and of permitting [27] institutional growth to outstrip the resources available from a foundation's endowment. In almost every matter of difficulty, however, his instinct was to rely upon the solutions developed over the centuries by patrons working within the confines of traditional private philanthropy. His use of ephoreia, a newer concept, was more a bow to linguistic fashion than a substantive adaptation of this form of patronage, for in all essentials he assimilated his foundation to the more familiar one of old-fashioned patronal ownership (ktetoreia). It was chiefly in his reluctant acceptance of the eventuality of institutional self-governance that Attaleiates anticipated the future of Byzantine reform monasticism.

As might be expected from a document authored by this kind of patron at a time of revolutionary institutional and ideological change, there are several inconsistencies of note within the Rule. While Attaleiates provides [25] for the punishment of the foundation's officials (even his own heirs) if they were found guilty of theft, he was willing to allow [24] his heirs a "legitimate" share of the foundation's income. Also, while Attaleiates specifically warns against the peril posed to the foundation by the charistike [8], the foundation itself apparently was to inherit Attaleiates' responsibilities as a charistikarios to support a nunnery and a monastery [19]. Lastly, he apparently saw no inconsistency in awarding [12] his heir Theodore the title of protector shortly after having prohibited [8] the establishment of an (external) ephoreia.

E. Revisions and Stages of Composition

Like (29) Kosmosoteira, this is a disorganized, repetitious document. The author's practice of returning to subjects he has treated already in the Rule is a sure sign of multiple stages of composition. In [37], for instance, Attaleiates re-evaluates his provisions in [25] providing for the punishment of dishonest officials, most particularly his own heirs in their capacity as protectors. His revisions, made perhaps after complaints from his family, have the effect of significantly moderating the previous penalties, allowing even dishonest heirs some consolation for deposition from office in terms of a pension or a lifetime claim on half of the foundation's surplus income. Also, after addressing the issue twice before in [10] and [37], Attaleiates thought he needed to re-emphasize in [46], perhaps against the trend of contemporary opinion, the eligibility of his female relatives for the ephoreia. Perhaps to calm concerns, he notes here that he expected that a responsible husband, son or male servant would actually exercise the responsibilities of the office for the female protector. Then, with an eye to the interests of his descendants, Attaleiates rescinds [46] an earlier provision [17] of his Rule which could be interpreted to mean that the property of his childless heirs would automatically be inherited by the foundation.

Attaleiates also had second thoughts about how the foundation would choose a superior once his own family line had become extinct. In [38], he obliges the monks, should the foundation become independent, to present their choice to the superior of the Stoudios monastery for the blessing (sphragis). Attaleiates is at pains to state here that this right of bestowing the blessing should not be seen as excuse for the superior of Stoudios to assert a right to an ephoreia over the foundation. Should he do that anyway, Attaleiates instructs the eparch (urban prefect) to appoint the new superior instead. Nevertheless Attaleiates worried that even the eparch might assert a claim to the ephoreia [34], and sought to buy his good will with a cash donation and a listing for liturgical commemoration in the foundation's diptychs.

All told, Attaleiates revisits at least nineteen topics in the course of the Rule proper, exclusive of the inventory.⁹ A preliminary analysis of these repetitive treatments suggests at least eight stages of composition.¹⁰

Notes on the Introduction

1. See Gautier, "Diataxis," pp. 6–11, and Lemerle, Cinq études, pp. 67–71.
2. See Lemerle, Cinq études, p. 76, n. 8, in preference to Tsolakís, "Aus dem Leben," pp. 5–7.
3. Historia, ed. I. Bekker, CSHB (Bonn, 1853).
4. (19) Attaleiates [1], [4], [5], [6].
5. Dölger, Regesten, no. 1042 = [INV 11] below.
6. See Paul Gautier, "Le synode des Blachernes (fin 1094). Étude prosopographique," REB 29 (1971), 213–84, esp. 220, 280.

ELEVENTH CENTURY

7. Cf. the discussion of the foundation's status in Lemerle, Cinq études, pp. 103–5. esp. 103: “Bref, la fondation est, en ce monde, la propriété personnelle d’Attaliate . . .”
8. See Lemerle, Cinq études, pp. 99–112, for a full discussion of Attaleiates’ personal fortune and the economic basis for his foundation.
9. Note repetitious treatments of: [6] administrative union of the two facilities, cf. [11]; [10] succession to the ephoreia, cf. [13]; [9] prohibition of institutional subordination, cf. [14]; [7] appeal for heavenly protection, cf. [15]; [10] heirs’ obligation to pay compensation, cf. [25], [37]; [10] Theodore’s immunity from expulsion, cf. [33], [37]; [10] eligibility of women for the ephoreia, cf. [37], [46]; [13] succession of collateral relatives, cf. [43]; [14] conditions for self-governance, cf. [38]; [24] Theodore’s optional appointment of a superior, cf. [26]; [24] allocation of surplus income, cf. [37]; [26] desired attributes of the superior, cf. [29]; [28] discussion of entrance gifts, cf. [30]; [21] liturgical typikon, cf. [32]; [31] recitation of the trisagion for the emperor, cf. [43]; [33] monks’ allowances, cf. [35]; [33] reading of the Rule, cf. [41]; [34] possibility of lawsuits, cf. [43]; and [38] Studite superior’s role in the consecration of the superior, cf. [41].
10. I, [1] through [10]; II, [11] through [24]; III, [25] through [27]; IV, [28] and [29]; V, [30] through [34]; VI, [35] through [40]?; VII, [41]? through [45]; and VIII, [46].

Bibliography

- Beck, Hans-Georg, Kirche und theologische Literatur im byzantinischen Reich (Munich, 1959), p. 590.
- Bompaire, Jacques, “Les catalogues de livres-manuscrits d’époque byzantine (XIe–XVe s.),” in Byzance et les Slaves: Études de Civilisation: Mélanges Ivan Dujčev (Paris, 1979), pp. 62–63.
- Constantelos, Demetrios, Byzantine Philanthropy and Social Welfare (New Brunswick, N.J., 1968), pp. 266–68.
- Dölger, Franz, “Antike Zahlenmystik in einer byzantinischen Klosterregel,” Hellenika, supplement 4 (1953), 183–89.
- , Regesten der Kaiserurkunden des oströmischen Reiches von 565–1453, 5 vols. (Munich-Berlin, 1924–65), nos. 1005, 1042.
- Guilland, Rodolphe, “Les eunuques dans l’empire byzantin,” EB 1 (1943), 197–238.
- Janin, La géographie ecclésiastique de l’empire byzantin, vol. 3: Les églises et les monastères [de Constantinople], 2nd ed. (Paris, 1969), pp. 512–13.
- Jeanseime, Edouard, and Oeconomus, Lysimaque, “Les oeuvres d’assistance et les hôpitaux byzantins au siècle des Comnènes,” extract from I^{er} Congrès de l’Histoire de l’Art de Guérir (Anvers, 1921).
- Kazhdan, Alexander, “Attaleiates, Michael,” ODB, p. 229.
- , and Simon Franklin, Studies on Byzantine Literature of the Eleventh and Twelfth Centuries (Cambridge, 1984), chap. 2: The Social Views of Michael Attaleiates, pp. 23–86.
- Lemerle, Paul, “La diataxis de Michel Attaliate (Mars, 1077),” in Cinq études sur le XI^e siècle byzantin (Paris, 1977), pp. 67–112.
- Mercati, Giovanni, “Confessione di fede di Michele categumeno del Monastero fondato da Michele Attaliate,” OCP 21 (1955), 265–73.
- Nissen, Waldemar, Die Diataxis des Michael Attaleiates von 1077. Ein Beitrag zur Geschichte des Klosterwesens im byzantinischen Reich (Jena, 1894).
- Tsolakis, E., “Aus dem Leben des Michael Attaleiates (Seine Heimatstadt, sein Geburts- und Todesjahr),” BZ 58 (1965), 3–10.
- Volk, Otto, “Die byzantinischen Klosterbibliotheken von Konstantinopel, Thessalonike und Kleinasien” (Ph.D. diss., Munich, 1955), pp. 102–6.
- Volk, Robert, Gesundheitswesen und Wohltätigkeit im Spiegel der byzantinischen Kloster typika (Munich, 1983), pp. 85–91.

19. ATTALEIATES

Translation

A rule composed with the help of God by Michael Attaleiates the patrikios, anthypatos, judge of the hippodrome and the velum, for the poorhouse and monastery established by him, [prescribing] the proper management of their affairs in perpetuity, to the glory of the Father, Son and Holy Spirit.

[1. Founder's autobiography]

Thanks be to God who is capable of all things and disposes everything for the better, I mean the consubstantial and indivisible Trinity which is without confusion. For through it men have been deemed worthy of great gifts which transcend human nature, and to it every achievement is referred, and by it were magnified men who thought that no one could admire them on account of the frailty which humbles them. Of this Trinity I am a worshipper and servant, I, [p. 19] Michael Attaleiates, patrikios, anthypatos and judge; for I was taught this reverence from childhood by my most faithful parents,¹ who had as their ancestral [inheritance] an orthodox and right-minded attitude toward God. Therefore I have been delivered from many different misfortunes, even though born in a foreign land,² and I have enjoyed many blessings, and possess some learning through this ineffable and inexhaustible divine source of knowledge. For I did not receive any property whatsoever in the metropolis of culture, the Queen of Cities,³ as an inheritance from one of my ancestors. I did not even own the property which I formerly possessed in the land of my birth, since I had decided to divide it all among my sisters, and had added to my ancestral property much of my own. But while I was in search of culture, I acquired in addition to these the necessities of life and that which men define as earthly prosperity, with God always managing my affairs, as I have already said. On account of his great goodness he showed his divine assistance in my leisured and simple life, and cared for my body with the incomprehensible limits of providence. Therefore, although I seemed to be facing many obstacles, and surrounded by wicked jealousies, especially because of the foreign origins of my family, in the end everything turned out well and fine.

After a period of bachelorhood, I was married for several years. When I lost my wife,⁴ who died in her prime, I received nothing from her final will and testament except for a small house, a pittance, since I approved her desire to give everything to God through distribution to the poor. By virtue of my right as executor I cooperated with her mother, without any hindrance, in carrying out her will, and together with her distributed everything. I acquired all of my property in good faith at my own expense, and I bought her estate at Selokaka for a very high price, the nomophylax having been appointed, by imperial order, curator for the sale in my place and that of my mother-in-law and co-executor, as the bill of sale and the subsequent memorandum most clearly state. In this bill of sale it is mentioned that the entire price of the property of Banitzes was wholly allocated for distribution to the poor.

Therefore since I have received such great blessings from the kind and merciful right hand of the Pantokrator, I the sinner, [p. 21] unworthy of anything, so as to become a member of the senate, in spite of my humble and foreign background, and to be enrolled among the elite of the senators (whom the language of old used to call "aristocrats"), and among the most illustrious of the civic judges, and to pride myself on public honors, I ought surely to offer appropriate and worthy gratitude to God the giver of such blessings. I would necessarily have this obligation, even though I might have had difficulty [fulfilling this obligation] because of human weakness. At least I should not have failed completely to attain what is easy to attain, i.e., to choose and discern the best. On the contrary, throughout my entire life I have continued to provoke his marvelous patience and goodness towards me with my many grievous sins, on account of which I have condemned [myself] to undergo even more terrible punishments which threaten sinners. Not only did I know my “master’s will and not” (Luke 12:47) do it, and returned [to him] “the talent given to me” (cf. Matt. 25:15) without interest or profit, and even decreased its value, but also because I was unmindful of his divine gifts and favors and of my good fortune in life, and refused to turn away from wickedness, I was possessed of wicked habits and obstinacy. But he showed to us sinners the extraordinary depths of his unsurpassable goodness and kindness, and was extremely solicitous about our salvation, just as the Savior of us all, our Lord Jesus Christ, taught with words and showed with actions.

For this reason I look at the great heights and boundless expanse of his kindness and rest upon this divine and salvific word of his alone, that “God so loved the world that he gave his only Son” as a ransom for us sinners, “that whoever believes in him should have eternal life” (John 3:16). Placing all my hope in him, I do not despair of my salvation, since I know for sure that he who despairs experiences greater punishment and sets his own head on fire, since he heaps up this fuel when his mind despairs. For no one at all is able to escape the One in whose “hand is the breath” (Dan. 5:23) of all; and most “fearful” and unfortunate of all is for someone “to fall into the hands of the living God” (Heb. 10:31), because he resists hope in God and the resulting salvation. O consubstantial and sovereign Trinity, [p. 23] may I and everyone who are works of thy hand and faith be preserved forever above all these thoughts which extinguish hope.

[2. Motivation for the foundation]

Therefore, when I considered these things surely and truly, and thought daily about the accounts which would have to be rendered in the world to come, and reflected continuously about ineluctable justice, I became eager to accomplish some good work in order to grant some small pleasure to the One who has abundantly shed his mercy on me. [So I decided] to grant a part, as appropriate, of my property in Rhaidestos to his ineffable mercy, in the conviction that this would be pleasing and acceptable to him, because our compassionate and surpassingly good God seeks to receive from us a small inducement, so that he may show all his goodness and kindness towards us sinners. For he promised us many blessings on behalf of this single and very easy commandment of his, that out of the goods which we have, or rather which are his (for nothing is ours, inasmuch as our very existence is from God), we should give to those who ask of us. For who, except the humane God, would receive and accept such a gift, so as to regard as a favor and offering from somebody else what [in fact] comes from him and is his to use and grant? In truth no one, since we usually judge the attitude of the giver by the weight and measure of his gift, even when the offering belongs to the [donor].⁵ This surpassingly good God of ours, who “has brought us from non-being into being”⁶ and has offered us everything, considers as a sacrificial offering whatever we bring to him through our charity to the poor; and, on the contrary, he measures his reward by the attitude of the giver and not by the value of the present. Even if we are slow and sluggish with regard to the good, and are filled with arrogance, he is still quick to succor us, and so patient and sympathetic that it is impossible for human nature and understanding to conceive, for he always expects our conversion and postpones the violence of his anger to give time for repentance. Who therefore is capable of recounting his boundless kindness and goodness to us? Truly no one, not even among men who have attained perfection in action and contemplation, let alone myself who am vastly inferior in both these [areas]. There is also this: Glory be always to the good [God], because he does not reject the very humble, but finds pleasure in very cheap and contemptible things. Wherefore, even if I am completely self-condemned and totally unworthy of his kindness, made confident [p. 25] by his ineffable mercy, I have ventured to offer this small and wretched contribution to his supremely ineffable majesty and goodness.

19. ATTALEIATES

Christ, be thou my guide.

[3.] Concerning the immovable property which has been consecrated, and that it belongs solely to the heirs, exempt from any imperial or ecclesiastical authority

Therefore with great zeal and fervent affection I consecrate, for charity to the needy, a portion of my immovable property at Rhaidestos and in the Queen of Cities to the great God, our Savior Jesus Christ, who was born of a Virgin in an ineffable and incomprehensible manner, together with the consubstantial Father and Holy Spirit. It is not one of my lesser and inferior properties, but one of the more important and valuable, since it is worthy for men of sincere faith to make offerings and donations to the One who is beyond all price. For even if the Creative Force is self-sufficient and absolutely good, and the unitary and thrice-brilliant Divinity is all-encompassing glory, still one's choice does not go without testing and scrutiny. For this reason, therefore, the sacrifice of Cain (Gen. 4:3–7) was not really considered a sacrifice, but as an object of condemnation because it was made of inferior and discarded [produce]; therefore I consecrate, as has already been stated, these [properties] to the all-merciful and great God, and I appoint him as heir and guardian and master of this offering of mine, and, I might as well say, avenger and adversary against those who should ever wish at any time to harm or violate any of my commandments, and to diminish or impose a burden on any confirmed part of this insignificant inheritance of his.

[4. The Poorhouse at Rhaidestos]

I also ordain that the house inside the town of Rhaidestos should be called and be in reality and be recognized as a poorhouse for the propitiation and remission of many and great and innumerable sins. For many years ago, before my wife's aunt, the nun and protospatharissa lady Euphrosyne, entered a convent (she received the tonsure in the house of her cousin Krasas), I reserved this house, [p. 27] together with her estate of Lips or Baboulou, by means of a promise to purchase and a contract with earnest-money. Later I acquired the house definitely by means of a valid purchase, and acquired the estate by inheritance. However, the aforesaid house which I acquired was completely dilapidated and in ruinous condition and unusable, on the one hand due to normal deterioration over the years, but also on account of the terrible tremor of the recent earthquake.⁷ So I restored it from the foundations, and with great expense and effort I furnished it, out of my savings. For I was not wealthy at that time, since I was still on the threshold of my career and had not assumed any position of command; and, by the grace of God, the situation continued until the end of my career, since I was never entrusted with any command, or fiscal responsibility. I added to this [house] the [property] which I received through exchange and purchase from Psorarios and Narses, and made one [large] house. It is my wish that this entire [complex] be a storehouse for the collection and storage of all the harvest, and for the repose and lodging of poor strangers, and, as has already been stated, that it should be a poorhouse in name and in reality.

ELEVENTH CENTURY

[5. Attaleiates' house in Constantinople]

I also dedicate as a poorhouse my house in the capital, which I bought from my sister-in-law, the protospatharissa and asekretissa lady Anastaso, by imperial order, as a result of the decision and inquiry of the assigned judges, the vestes and quaestor lord Michael Anzas,⁸ and the nomophylax; and I join and unite these buildings so that they will be associated and linked with each other and jointly administered and interconnected through the architectural skill of the [Holy] Spirit. For they ought both to be unified and bound together by the Spirit like parts and limbs, and be subject to the same heir and master, I mean the Heavenly King, through charity and donations to the poor. I institute and dedicate the aforesaid house as a poorhouse, with the exception of the ground floor, the triklinos that is, which is next to and adjoining the church of the Forerunner (since this ground floor also contains the entrance to the courtyard of my other house, which I purchased from my wife's aunt, the protospatharissa and nun lady Euphrosyne), and also with the exception of the narrow and long gallery which overlooks the courtyard of my aforementioned house which I bought from the aforesaid [p. 29] protospatharissa and nun, lady Euphrosyne. For both of these, the ground floor and the gallery which I purchased from the asekretissa lady Anastaso, I joined into one house, together with the three-storied apartment which has a donkey-mill below, so that they would form part of the small house which I purchased from my aunt, the protospatharissa lady Euphrosyne Bobaina.

[6. The church of Christ the All-Merciful]

As for all the rest of the house which I purchased from the protospatharissa and asekretissa lady Anastaso, I dedicate it as a poorhouse, as has already been stated, together with the aforementioned house at Rhaidestos, and they ought to have one name and be considered as a single poorhouse, and to have as a place of prayer the church of the Forerunner which is dedicated to our great God and Savior, Jesus Christ the All-Merciful. To this church and Jesus Christ the All-Merciful Who is venerated therein and to the divine sanctuary in my house at Rhaidestos should be attached this single poorhouse composed of two buildings, as well as the movable and immovable properties which have been donated to them, and they should receive the name of "Poorhouse of the All-Merciful." For even if this chapel at my house in the capital is small and lacking many attractive decorations and earthly wealth, still by the grace of God it has been deemed worthy of great favor, and as a result of divine inspiration many heavenly signs occur therein, and it appears to be a fountain of mercy through charity to the poor, by which alone God is worshipped, and which is the sole purpose of my offering. For God the infinite and suprasubstantial "does not dwell" in churches "made with hands" (Acts 7:48), but in living sanctuaries, that is, those who are pleasing to him and act mercifully with a pure conscience. For this reason, therefore, I have appointed as attendants at the church pious men, with assigned compensation of provisions and wages.

19. ATTALEIATES

I have not made this offering, in which I place my hope, for lack of an heir and legitimate and natural succession; for I have a legitimate son, the mystographos and imperial notary lord Theodore. But I decided that it was necessary to give “a portion even to eight” (Eccl. 11:2) “with a broken and humbled heart” (Ps. [50] 51:17), that is, to the future generation, thanking the all-merciful God who loves the good, because he brought me forth of pious and Christ-loving parents, who taught me the very great wisdom of knowledge of God, and then provided me with sufficient education, first a general curriculum [p. 31], then philosophy and rhetoric, and the holy initiation into laws, and furthermore he deemed me worthy of sufficient wealth, gathering for me a most ample abundance of his earthly blessings.

[7.] A prayer

To thee therefore, O Lord, I make this offering, because it is through thy generosity that I have accumulated all [my property], so that it may be at the service of thy loving precept. For in thy kindness thou hast given to those who wish to be pious the manner of their salvation, by declaring that the wealth of each man can serve as a ransom for his soul. May thy great and all-powerful right hand keep the offerings and preserve them in perpetuity. O Lord of mercy, do not permit that a malicious man ravage and disperse this [property], nor allow that powerful men who crave after property should gaze at the beauty of these estates with greedy and covetous eyes. Do not endure that a curious busybody, who devises the flimsiest of excuses and stirs up unjust things, should join others in villainy and throw their property rights into confusion. Do not permit an evil man, a deviser of wickedness, to insinuate himself from inside into their services, or be imposed from outside to stir up numerous petty disturbances by his cunning ways. Rather, O Lord, protect these [offerings], and defend them with thy mighty hand, and may they be a blessing on thy holy name.

Every emperor and noble and dynast, and all ministers of the holy sanctuary, both bishops and priests, and everyone involved in political and ecclesiastical affairs should keep their distance from this holy property of the poorhouse which was constituted for the pleasure of thy transcendent glory and for the holy flock of monks therein and everything belonging to them. For all this property is dedicated to God, and honored with inviolability. I adjure you all and bind you with a harsh and relentless sentence of condemnation, in the name of the holy and life-giving Trinity, that none of my regulations should be transgressed. You should not encompass with confusion and disorder that which has been piously consecrated and dedicated to God, and transform this [poorhouse] into a refuge for powerful men instead of for the poor, contrary to the regulations for their care and the administration of the pious donations, and what I am going to say. Nor should there be any [p. 33] removal whatsoever of any of the various properties and sacred treasures dedicated there, nor should you impose any expense which is beyond its resources and wealth, lest they thereby suffer deprivation and be reduced to poverty.

[8.] Curse against those who dare to transgress [this Rule]

If anyone, whether emperor or noble, or subject, or bishop or priest, should attempt to do anything contrary to my regulations, or to transgress any of the ordinances which it pleases me to set down, or to institute an ephoros therein, or appoint another charistikarios or guardian (besides those whom I will specify), or the liturgical commemoration or nomination of some authority (for the church of the poorhouse of the All-Merciful ought to commemorate every orthodox bishopric), may such a person be cursed by God the Almighty, and may his memory be eradicated from among mankind, may grief and woe afflict him, and may sorrow go before him, and may the Lord God grant him the terror of Cain, the leprosy of Gehazi, the noose of Judas; and may his lot be with those who said, "Away with him, away with him, crucify" (John 19:15) the Son of God. May the eye [of God], which oversees all things, not look upon him with mercy, but may his memory be erased from the earth, and may he be vanquished by all his enemies, and may he endure eternal torment.

ELEVENTH CENTURY

[9.] A prayer for those who are obedient

But as for the man who abides by my regulations, and transgresses none of my good instructions, but observes all my prescriptions and regulations, may he be blessed by God, and may he achieve all his desires, and may he inherit all the blessings upon earth and in the heavenly kingdom, inasmuch as he has preserved from harm the inheritance of God. This inheritance is not to come under the control of imperial authority, nor of the imperial or patriarchal sakelle, or another lay or ecclesiastical department, or metropolitan or bishop, or any other authority whatsoever; nor is it to be removed by anyone at all, nor made liable for an accounting, nor subjected to an ephoros, because all these [vexations] should be banished far away from it both through the power of laws, which ordain that the wishes of testators be fulfilled completely, and also on account of my wishes and most terrible [p. 35] curses, and the great and very powerful name of the all-powerful God, and the inexorable beating and flogging therefrom; since no canon could be found which would sanction changing or transgressing the commandments of the founders.

[10.] Concerning guardians and successors

Just as ministers of the celestial glory were appointed in heaven in a proportional manner by the Divinity that shines with triple brightness, it is necessary to appoint steadfast ministers and heirs of this humble and earthly inheritance of the great God our Savior, with the strong and sure justification of the privilege of legitimacy. Therefore, after our Lord Jesus Christ and God, I appoint as heir and lord and administrator, who is exempt from rendering an account and in every way immovable from this divine inheritance, my beloved and true son, the mystographos and imperial notary lord Theodore and his direct descendants, sons and grandsons and great-grandsons, and the rest of his succession in perpetuity. But after the death of my son, not all his sons together or grandsons or the rest will assume control of my poorhouse, but only one of them. A man is to be preferred to women, and of men one who is most advanced in years and distinguished for his learning and upright life. But if this man should be found to be wicked and harmful, either by keeping back [the money] of a pious donation or someone's salary or annuity, or [the money] for illumination of the church, or by neglecting the restoration and maintenance and protection of the buildings and properties, and does not mend his ways despite criticism and warnings, then another of his legitimate brothers should be preferred, one who is understanding in virtue and distinguished conduct. If there are no sons, that is male children, then a daughter will assume the succession according to this purpose; for she is not to refrain from administering the property well, either through a spouse, or her children or servants.

19. ATTALEIATES

If there are no [living children], then a grandson or great-grandson should be asked, in this order, and so forth, according to the degrees of primogeniture, [after making sure of] their blameless reputation and distinguished conduct. But let no one have the right to include this holy poorhouse in a marriage contract [p. 37] for the sake of some ownership right or exchange. But it is to be administered in accordance with the text of my typon, and all the pious donations should be performed without fail. As for the properties dedicated to it, no one is to give any of them in inheritance or offer them as surety, or for any other private or public debt; but if someone else does something of this sort, with the intention of making a deed or gift or exchange, the transaction will be considered invalid. For that which has once been consecrated to God cannot be shared, and especially because this [poorhouse] was viewed as an inheritance of God, and was offered to him for charity to the poor and as a most Christian and pious bequest.

The man who dares this will not escape liability for his actions, but will be expelled from his position as ephoros, and his dominion and supervision, unless necessarily he is prepared to make amends. Then another relative, the next of kin, will take up the succession, a man well known for his piety and fear of God, who promises to follow all my instructions. But in the case of my son, lord Theodore, there is not to be any expulsion. Rather he is to make reparations quietly and exactly. These relatives then who are direct descendants of myself and my son, and so on, will assume the right of dominion in perpetuity. But none of my collateral relatives is to have involvement in this poorhouse of mine, or rights as ephoros or any authority at all, unless for the sake of piety he wishes to give reminders that everything should be carried out in accordance with my instructions.

[11. Celebration of the offices]

Since I set great value on piety, I decided to install singers of hymns in the divine sanctuary of the All-Merciful. I intended [at first] that secular priests should celebrate the offices, but [then] I ordained that they should be monks, so that those who have chosen the monastic way of life should also find a haven in this poorhouse. I set aside for them cells inside the aforementioned holy poorhouse in the God-guarded City, and assigned to them provisions so that they might attentively keep watch over the doxology and liturgy in the church, and collaborate with my heir in the administration of pious donations, and be of service in everything which is to the benefit of the poorhouse, and remind him that all my instructions should be followed without fail.

[12. Union of the monastery with the poorhouse in one foundation]

Next I will discuss the number of these monks. For over them I have appointed a steward and ecclesiarch, who are to report everything to my heir. The other monks are to be directed and encouraged in virtue by the steward, [p. 39] while the ecclesiarch supervises in a proper fashion that which pertains to the church, and they should demonstrate all respect and submission and honor and obedience towards my heir. For all the monks alike will be subject to my heir, who should be called the ptochotrophos, and should obey him, as the ephoros and administrator and master of this venerable institution, both the one in Rhaidestos and the one in the capital (for I consider them one, I issue my instructions as if for a single unit) and they should regard him as a kindly and God-loving leader. But since, as I have said, in the poorhouse in the capital I have also established monks who are pious and pleasing to God and to me because of their angelic way of life, I ordain that the establishment in Rhaidestos should particularly bear the name of the poorhouse, including also the establishment in the capital. Since the one in the capital has also become a residence for monks, it should be called the monastery of the poorhouse of the All-Merciful, but both establishments will form one poorhouse, that of Rhaidestos.

ELEVENTH CENTURY

[13. Alternate line of succession]

In case the continuous line of my descendants should come to an end, as I have said above, then the monk who happens to be steward at that time should at once be promoted to the position of superior, and serve as superior in this autonomous poorhouse and monastery of the All-Merciful. One of my collateral relatives, who is distinguished for his virtue and sober lifestyle, and is the closest of kin, and excels in wisdom, should be chosen to succeed to the position of ephoros. He should share totally with the superior and the monks the administration of all the pious donations, not appropriating or taking anything therefrom, except for the stipend of two monks and one hundred and fifty modioi of barley. For if there is any surplus after the distributions and expenditures prescribed by the typikon, half is to be disbursed to the monastery of the poorhouse for necessary purposes; the rest is to be distributed to my needy brethren in Christ. From that time the monastery should be subordinate to my poorhouse. For the poorhouse at Rhaidestos is united with it, as I have already described in these instructions of mine, and the pious donations of both holy establishments, the one outside and the one merged with the monastery, should be managed without fail by the superior and the monks and my kinsman who is deemed worthy of the ephoreia in the manner which I have explained. As long as my son is living, and his direct heirs, and so forth [p. 41] in perpetuity, both he and they will be chiefly responsible for everything, both the pious donations and the holy establishments, and the monks should submit to their wishes, as long as they are pious and in conformity with my instructions. It does not matter that the part of my poorhouse in the capital that is inhabited by monks is now called a monastery; for the total sum of my offering of movable and immovable property has been consecrated to the poorhouse established by me, and this monastery in the poorhouse of the capital is to be subordinate to it, and its monks will receive from my heir, the ptochotrophos, their assigned annuities, and whatever else I shall indicate in the future, as long as they behave in a manner consistent with monastic life.

[14. Provision for independent administration]

In every time and circumstance, and under every regimen and administration, it is my wish that these holy [establishments], the poorhouse and the subordinate monastery, be independent and autonomous. As long as one of my descendants holds the ephoreia they should be administered by him and selected monks, as has been said, and, furthermore, by the superior, when the office of superior is instituted after my entire line of descendants has come to an end, as has already been described.⁹ In the absence of an heir related to me, then by right of the independent and autonomous privilege [of the poorhouse], everything should be administered and arranged and managed without fail by the superior and steward and the other monks in accordance with the text of my typikon, so that the pious donations do not in any way gradually decline. For I do not want this poorhouse and monastery of mine to be granted or made subordinate to any imperial or patriarchal jurisdiction, nor to the imperial or patriarchal sakelle, or to any other secular or ecclesiastical department, or to a metropolitan or bishop or anyone else at all, but I truly want their lord and master and ephoros and supporter and founder to be, as has already been said,¹⁰ our Lord Jesus Christ, who was born of a Virgin, together with the consubstantial Father and the all-holy Spirit.

19. ATTALEIATES

[15. Heavenly protectors and patrons]

It is my wish that, after God, [these institutions] have as their protector and helper and patron our immaculate Lady, the Mother of God, and [St.] Michael, the great commander of the heavenly armies, and [St. John] the honorable Forerunner. For since the very Lord and Creator of all is called by my unworthy self master of this humble offering of mine, it is clear that these and all the other saints are also included in this supervision. [p. 43] Therefore no one is to alter or change any of my instructions, or to harm the pious donations, either in part or totally, unless he is impious, and a manifest enemy of God and hater of mankind and opposed to the kindly and compassionate God. For in the words of Holy Scriptures God is served by mercy more than anything else, and there is also the divine law of the commandments, “thou shalt not add to it nor diminish from it” (Deut. 13:1).

[16. List of consecrated properties]

The following [properties] are granted to my poorhouse for the inheritance of God who is praised and glorified in the Trinity: my estate of Selokaka together with Makron Chorion; my estate of Baboulou or Lips; my estate of St. Myrope, or the Monokellion (single cell); my estate of Symeoniou; and of my estates at Mesokomion the one which I purchased from the niece of the patrikios lord Basil Skribas; the aule of Metaxas; the aule of Arkolykes together with the buildings which came from an exchange with Hagia Sophia; and the aule of Kentarchos together with all the buildings there; and in addition half of my rental property at Selymbria, and half of my other rental properties outside the western gate of the town of Rhaidestos, which I built on the ruinous land which I bought from the fisc, these halves of my rental properties being attached indivisibly. From now on I grant these immovable properties of mine, which I have mentioned, as well as the monastery, to the inheritance of the great God, our Savior Jesus Christ, who was born of a Virgin, that is to my poorhouse. An additional grant is made of the bakery in the capital which is attached to my poorhouse in the God-guarded City, and rents for twenty-four nomismata, and the perfumery, which rents for fourteen nomismata, and the rental properties [p. 45] held by the doctor Theodore which rent for five nomismata. In addition I consecrate half of the revenues from my house which used to belong to the protospatharios Thomas of Nicaea,¹¹ so as to receive eighteen nomismata of the thirty-six charged for rent; of the other eighteen, eight should be spent for the salary of the priests of St. George of Kyparission¹² on behalf of my tomb, which I also bequeath to my heirs, and ten should be spent for my commemoration and that of my two wives, lady Sophia and lady Irene, and for my parents, Eirenikos and Kale.

[17. Hereditary transmission of other personal properties]

Any immovable properties that I bequeath to my son, the mystographos lord Theodore, should not be alienated by him and his descendants and their successors through the generations, as long, that is, as our lineage survives and continues. They should be transferred without any impediment to successive generations, and their revenues should be spent exclusively by them, and they should enjoy the immunity [from taxation] granted by the imperial chrysobull,¹³ since it applies to all my properties in common, wherever they may be, whether holy institutions, or private persons, in part or totally or separately, even if they expand and increase. But if my family lineage should come to an end, [the properties] should not be transferred to a stranger and outsider, but should go to my poorhouse and monastery, especially the small house I purchased from the protospatharissa lady Euphrosyne.

On condition of [continued] procreation, these [properties] should be inherited by my heirs in perpetuity, and therefore not even the fisc will have any claims against them because they have been previously bound by this condition. But if my son should die childless, or his descendants and their successors should offer the [properties] for a dowry or pre-nuptial gift, they should be liable for only forty-five litrai. This [sum in] gold should be provided by my poorhouse and monastery, and these [properties] should be recovered and granted to them in the same manner and fashion as the other immovable properties which have already been consecrated.

If they should make a will with regard to the immovable property which has been left to them for other reasons, legacies, perhaps, or pious donations or an inheritance by virtue of being eldest, their will should be limited to only thirty litrai. If the estates should be divided among several heirs, [p. 47] then the donation should be made by the holy institutions proportionally, and the property will revert to them again. However, their [affairs] will be managed in accordance with my last will and testament. The rest of my estates at Mesokomion, except for [the one I bought from] Skribas, should pass to my son and his heirs and other successors, whether by written document or without a will, so that they may have complete authority over them in perpetuity, as is the wish of my son and his heirs; the same is true for the half of my rental properties at Selymbria and those outside the west gate of the town of Rhaidestos, but these properties should not be alienated to another person in any way whatever, but they should sell them or donate them to my poorhouse and monastery.

[18. Charitable distributions at the monastery in Constantinople]

Now that I have discussed my consecrated property, I should say what should be done with them, and first of all about the distributions to the poor. Therefore, I ordain that at the gate of the holy establishment of the poorhouse in the capital (in which the monastery is also located), each Sunday there should be provided for my needy brethren in Christ a large modios of bread, and that six poor men should eat daily in the refectory, each receiving a piece of bread, and as an accompaniment they should have either meat or fish or cheese, or dried or fresh vegetables which have been boiled, or whatever else God may send; and each one of them should receive four folleis, in short, that they should be cared for just as was done in my day. I ordain that two hundred and sixteen modioi of wheat be distributed to unfortunate people, to widows or pitiful old men, that is twelve annonikoi modioi each, since eighteen people are entitled to receive this wheat.

19. ATTALEIATES

[19. Charitable distributions at the poorhouse in Rhaidestos]

At the poorhouse in Rhaidestos the following should be distributed annually: the monastery of St. Nicholas of Phalkon should receive three nomismata; the monastery of St. George, located outside the west gate of the town of Rhaidestos, which I possess as charistikion in the name of two people (the second charistikarios is my son, the mystographos lord Theodore), should receive three nomismata; the convent of St. Prokopios, located outside the western sea gate (of which the second charistikarios is my son, since [he received it] from the former charistikarios Bardas Xeradas), which was destroyed by the rebels, and which I have reconstructed, two nomismata; the [p. 49] monastery of the very holy Mother of God of Daphne [should receive] two nomismata; for I know that these monasteries need charity because they are completely without resources. I ordain that they should receive these [nomismata] from the revenues of the aulai of my poorhouse, and that the aforesaid annuities should be distributed to the monks of these monasteries without any changes, and that they should inscribe my name in their sacred diptychs, and that I should be commemorated continually in those [monasteries], and that every day they should say a trisagion after the morning office for the sake of myself, the sinner. The church of [St. John] the venerable Forerunner, which is at the west gate of Rhaidestos, should receive one nomisma trachy; and the church of our very holy Mother of God Eleousa should receive one nomisma, and one nomisma should also go to the church of the Archangel, where it is said that the bishopric was once established.¹⁴ The one who will furnish, distribute, provide and control all this, after God, will be my true son, the mystographos lord Theodore, and our direct descendants in succession.

[20. Construction of a hostel for pilgrims; other charitable distributions]

It is my wish and command, that, if I do not manage to build a kyklion on the exterior of my house at Rhaidestos for the repose of pious pilgrims to the holy places, and other poor strangers, then this should be done by the superiors of these holy establishments of mine, at the end of my courtyard on the public road. Sleeping rooms should be constructed so that they may rest there, and each week two annonikoi modioi of bread and one measure of wine should be distributed. Each year on the anniversary of my death one nomisma and six annonikoi modioi of wheat should be given to each of twelve elderly brethren in Christ, who are frail and disabled and in need. I also ordain that at the time of my commemoration there be a parastasimon with chanters and a distribution of six nomismata trachea and six modioi of bread.

[21. Regulation of the life of the monks]

Since, as I have said, it has been ordained that there should be a residence for monks inside the poorhouse, and monastic life should be conducted and regulated for the service of God and the distributions of the prescribed pious donations, I should now discuss the good order of the monks, since I have been initiated into the appropriate behavior by the divine laws. [p. 51] I ordain that the monks of the monastery established in the poorhouse should have a rule and typikon and observe them scrupulously, that [they should live in] peace and love with each other, according to God, and good will, which our Lord Jesus Christ, the Creator and Master of all, particularly ordained.

ELEVENTH CENTURY

[22. Inalienability of consecrated properties]

In the name of our Lord God and his fearful tribunal, I adjure my heirs and kinsmen, or rather those relatives who administer and supervise the inheritance of our Lord God and Savior, Jesus Christ, as I have already stated, both present and future generations, to administer it as I have ordered until the end of the world. [I also adjure] all the guardians never, at any time, to alienate the poorhouse or the monastery, either in part or totally, in any way whatever, or to transfer it elsewhere, contrary to my instructions, or to give away one of its properties, either in perpetuity, or for a period of years, or from first-born to first-born, whether by sale or exchange or gift or emphyteusis or any other method, or to grant it to anyone, whether the emperor or patriarch or member of the clergy or notable or private individual for any pretext or excuse whatever. But it is my wish and command that these [properties] be free and unified and autonomous and inalienable, and be subject to the authority and dominion of my poorhouse and monastery, and benefit from the general and total immunity [from taxation] which was granted to me by an imperial chrysobull. For it decrees and ordains as follows, that wherever I grant or bequeath my estates, whether to holy institutions or monasteries or private individuals, all of them are to enjoy in part or totality the assistance and immunity provided by the divine chrysobull, even if they increase and multiply. The temporary lease of immovable [property] is not normally permitted, except for individual fields which are not suitable for cultivation, and [may be leased] to tenants for a fixed number of years in accordance with local custom.¹⁵ But no arable land at all may be leased for a period of years from the property granted to these holy institutions which are dedicated to God, lest their rental lead to famine and a reduction in the expenditures which have been ordained for pious purposes. [p. 53]

[23.] Concerning the administration of the properties

The administration and management of the properties should be entrusted by my heirs to a just man, who is answerable to them and who conducts his life in a pious manner. He should look after the properties and administer them, in the knowledge that he will have to render an account first to the celestial King, then to the guardians of the inheritance of God, who receive from him the [right of] dominion and authority over these divine and holy establishments, my poorhouse and monastery. For the manager must be questioned by them and render without fail the sum of receipts and expenditures, as was the practice in my day, and should be held responsible for any negligence and fraud. I do not permit the donation of houses, except as rental properties. If anyone should disobey my instructions the tiniest bit, he will be ranked with Judas and those who crucified our Lord Jesus Christ; he will inherit the curse of the 318 holy and divinely inspired fathers [of Nicaea] and of myself the sinner, and the [property] which was donated contrary to my orders will revert to its original owner.

Furthermore, anyone who dares to make any changes or undertake any thing contrary to my instructions, will receive as his lot the eternal fire, inasmuch as he is a transgressor of my commandments, and has tried to invalidate what I have dedicated to God with great effort and sacrifice, or rather with the gifts of God. For I established these holy institutions for reasons of the family succession and administration of the pious donations and carrying out the pious distributions.

19. ATTALEIATES

[24. Use of surplus income from the founder's properties]

All the income from my properties should be recorded in detail and deposited at the holy establishment of my poorhouse at Rhaidestos. After the [expenses] determined by me have been paid, the rest should be brought from there to the capital, and from these [monies] the distribution of the pious donations and the other expenses should be paid by my heirs, with the collaboration of the steward of the monastery, if my heir does not wish to appoint a superior,¹⁶ with the knowledge of the other monks. None of the monks or the superiors should take any of the money, but once the expenses prescribed by the typikon have been paid, one-third of the surplus should be deposited in the treasury, and two-thirds should belong to my true and dearly beloved son, the mystographos lord Theodore whom I leave, after our Lord and God Jesus Christ and his immaculate Mother, as heir and lord of this divine inheritance and [p. 55] as an administrator who does not have to render an account or submit to an inquiry. Subsequently [the surplus should go] to his heirs, when the surplus revenues have been collected and profit has been taken after the aforementioned expenses; and they do not have to render an accounting. But he will not have the authority to reserve or spend [any income] from the properties consecrated to these holy institutions, until the distributions of the pious donations and other [expenses] have taken place, as I specified in the typikon. The same holds true for my successive heirs; and when the family dies out, then everything should go to the poorhouse and monastery and the pious donations which will expand with the help of God.

[25.] Concerning the punishment of transgressors

As for anyone who transgresses my commandments, if he is an outsider and stranger, in addition to the fact that his action will be invalid, he will also be alienated from God and the blameless faith of Christians; he will be considered an outcast and abomination, as a transgressor of divine and holy things and that which is pleasing to God. If it is the steward or the man who becomes superior at the wish of my heir, he is to be deprived of his responsibility; if it is another official, he is to be deprived of his office; and if it is one of my heirs, double the amount of the deficit will be demanded of him. If he does not mend his ways after a second and third warning by the superior and the monks, those who have been designated to receive the pious donations should receive them, as I have explained, from [the revenues of] the properties designated for the distribution of each pious donation, even if it is against his will. Let me add this, too, that my heirs and the monk appointed by them, whether steward or superior, and the rest of the monks who observe my commandments and strive that the pious donations be paid without fail, should be inscribed in the diptychs and commemorated in perpetuity. But whosoever transgress these [commandments] and are perceived to be decreasing or suppressing the pious donations, it is my wish that they not be deemed worthy of commemoration, nor have their names inscribed in the diptychs, but as they have headed of their own accord toward the aforementioned curses, their memory should always be accursed and despised. No less a condemnation will be the fate of those who see the abuse of the pious donations, and could oppose these wicked practices but do nothing. [p. 57]

[26.] Concerning the appointment of the superior

If the office of superior is to be established, it should be at the wish of my heir. For if he is not willing, then the steward should administer the monastic discipline, and be a shepherd and direct in a canonical fashion the spiritual needs of the monks, having my heir to support him against those who are disobedient, since he is master of all the supervision and administration; and the heir should not be forced to name a superior. Preference should be given to the monk who has given evidence of his piety and fear of God and is humble. For this [last] I judge to be the supreme virtue, and he who has not humility, even if he should raise the dead, should be excluded and rejected; for I want this virtue to have first place in the monastery of my poorhouse. He should be presented to my heir, and appointed by him, if indeed he is pleased with the choice of the monks after presiding over their election. If there should be dissension concerning the virtue of two individuals, then their names should be written on two pieces of paper, and placed on the holy altar in the sanctuary of the church, and they should celebrate the liturgy. Then a pure and innocent child should enter and remove one piece of paper and take it away. Whosoever's name is found will be deemed worthy of the office of steward or superior, after the appointment is made by my heir, once he has sworn before God and the monks that he will obey my commandments and instructions until his death. The same will hold true for the [other] officials, and thus this rule of mine will continue to be valid for successive [appointments]. The superior or the steward should not be deprived of his office unless he is caught in some heresy or carnal sin, or is clearly convicted of treachery or outrage or contempt for the divine offices and the church of God and the pious donations, or distresses my heir by his arrogance or scorn or troublemaking. For then he should be vigorously expelled by my heir. But if he is suspected of some minor and involuntary mistakes, and is prepared to make amends after counseling or criticism by my heir and the chief monks, then he should not be expelled, since he is striving ardently to mend his ways. [p. 59]

ELEVENTH CENTURY

[27.] Concerning the number of monks

I ordain that the number of monks in my monastery be limited to seven, even though for the present I have assigned only five because of my straitened circumstances. For this number [seven] is considered virginal and honorable and select. In accordance with it have been ordered the centuries, and the length of weeks, and the path of the stars, by command of almighty God. For this number is held dear and considered mystical by both old and new [generations], inasmuch as it is virginal, as I have already said, because it is the only one of the first ten numerals which neither gives birth nor is born. I believe that it was for this reason that the commander of the heavenly armies Gabriel brought the glad tidings to the holy Virgin and Mother of God, because in contrast to the others he alone has seven letters in his name. I ordain that there should be seven monks, when with the help of God the situation improves, including the steward or superior and the gatekeeper.

If with the aid of our very good God and his immaculate Mother, full of grace, the revenues of the poorhouse and the monastery should increase (for in the name of our Lord Jesus Christ I am confident that this will occur) then the number of the seven monks, as well as the pious donations, should also be increased in proportion to the increase in revenue. For after calculating the value of my donated [properties] and comparing them with the expenses of the poorhouse, and taking into consideration the small size of the church of the Forerunner, which has been dedicated to the monastery first and foremost as a place of communal prayer, I have limited and restricted the monks to this number.

19. ATTALEIATES

[28. Entrance gifts not required]

I want these monks to be tonsured gratis, without the payment of an entrance gift, unless an offering is made for some work of construction or restoration, or the purchase of immovable [property]. They should be men who will either be active in [the service of] the church, or accountants or notaries or secretaries, sober and honorable men, who are not quarrelsome or contentious or treacherous or cruel. For anyone who is found to be of this character should be expelled. The so-called entrance gift destroys obedience¹⁷, and causes much discord; and I do not want even the least of such discords to be mentioned or exist in my monastery. However, at the illuminating [time] of his tonsure, the tonsured monk may spend ten nomismata for incense, food for the monks, and so forth. [p. 61]

[29. Disciplinary regulations]

Not only do I forbid any payment of an entrance gift, but I also do not permit any idle word to be spoken or anyone to sit idly without performing manual labor and service to the monastery of the church. Most important of all I enjoin tranquillity and obedience and humility and continually peaceful relations with one another, and that the monks be reconciled with each other every evening. For the superior or steward who will be appointed by my heir should make it his concern that no monk goes to sleep while angry at or hostile to someone, in accordance with the words [of Paul]: “Do not let the sun go down on your anger” (Eph. 4:26).

They should also remain in their cells, constantly obeying my heir and the one who has been appointed by him as steward or leader of the monks, as I have said. They should serve steadfastly in the duties and responsibilities of the monastery, and in the instruction and offices of the church. When they have leisure time, they should do their handiwork, each one separately in his own cell. They should not be idle, and wander from cell to cell and chat or eat or drink together, to the destruction of their own souls and many others, but each one, with God as witness and guide, should follow the path of virtue. Each day he should examine himself and inquire closely as to what he accomplished that day and what he neglected to do, and thus with the passage of time he will advance on the path of virtue. His body will die, but he will live in God through his holy actions, and his humility and love of God. It is my wish that these [last] two virtues be supreme, and that they be the immutable rule and ideal in the monastery of my poorhouse.

If there is a choice between virtuous persons, when the office of the superior is being decided, it is my wish that preference be given to those who are distinguished for their genuine humility and peaceful temperament. For where these men are shepherds, there truly is God, and where God is, there is everything good and pleasing. Therefore I exhort you that during the offices everyone stand attentively without any talking or whispering, bowing [their heads] “with fear and trembling” (II Cor. 7:15) in the words of the Scriptures: “Serve the Lord with fear, rejoice in him with trembling” (Ps. 2:11). When he takes his midday meal, each monk of necessity will have to share with a poor person whatever he chooses, even if it is very small, either bread or drink, and no [p.

63] day should pass without charity, but they should open the gate and their hearts to each poor person, even if only with a single morsel of bread.

Again I forbid gathering together in cells for parties, unless they should assemble on the anniversary of a saint or for some other good reason. I condemn those who are found guilty of this to the loss and suppression of their private allowances for six months. If they are caught doing this again without a good reason, they should be expelled by my heir. But those who are caught in other minor faults and who transgress my typikon should be publicly reproached, so that as a result of their shame at the reproaches they will not neglect their own salvation; for the Holy Scriptures say, “Thou shalt rebuke thy neighbor, so thou shalt not bear sin on his account” (Lev. 19:17). The superior or steward will also suffer this [rebuke] from my heirs and the monks, if they are suspected of a minor fault.

Everyone should confess their offenses against each other, with my heir presiding, and he will bring about total reconciliation, and love will be established by the grace of God who said: “By this all men will know that you are my disciples, if you have love for one another” (John 13:35). When this happens, the creator of all evil, “the murdering devil” (John 8:44), will be driven away in shame. For the judgment which takes place, with the supervision and decision always of my dearly beloved and true son lord Theodore and my successive heirs who also bring about peaceful relations, will be valid and binding and irrevocable. For the brethren or monks of my poorhouse and monastery should not seek justice elsewhere for a personal injustice or harm inflicted by someone from these [institutions]. But if someone is found to be quarrelsome and contentious, and after a second and third rebuke does not mend his ways, he is to be expelled. For the quarrelsome and conceited man will receive the same treatment as the dishonorable man in this inheritance of Christ [i.e., the pious institutions], and will have no share in it; but no one will be condemned without an inquiry.

[30.] Concerning the entrance gift

As I have already said, I do not wish any entrance gift to be made in this monastery of the poorhouse, unless the monk wishes to do it for the above-mentioned purposes. [p. 65] There are to be absolutely no monks from other monasteries. But if someone donates an immovable property so that he may receive a living allowance, this is permissible, if God so wills. They should provide him, and him alone, with what they have agreed until the end of his life. Also if someone makes a contribution for the purpose of being commemorated in future generations, this is also permitted. But of no account do I wish a monk tonsured elsewhere to be enrolled in this monastery, with two exceptions: the monk Antony whom I myself appointed and named as ecclesiarch, since he is familiar with the monastic rules of the church and abides by them, and also the other monk Antony, who was the first monk installed in my poorhouse. [I also ordain] that the monks established in this [monastery] be eunuchs and men free from passions, on the one hand because the church of St. John the Forerunner, which has been granted to these holy establishments, particularly cherishes freedom from passions, as I have clearly learned and have ascertained from the facts themselves, on the other hand because the monastery is in the middle of the capital and very close to the Agora, and it is risky for bearded [monks] to live there. So no bearded monk is to be installed there, unless he is one of my blood relatives, or is a man who has given evidence by his life-style that he is pious and God-fearing, and gives some real estate to the monastery, and is over fifty years old; for only under these conditions do I permit the tonsuring of bearded monks, but no one else from outside.

19. ATTALEIATES

[31. Required commemorations]

I also enjoin that on Saturdays there be celebrated a special liturgy for my deceased parents Eirenikos and Kale, and for myself the sinner, and that I should also be commemorated in perpetuity, together with Sophia and Irene, and Basil and Leo and Anna and Nicholas and Constantine, and that a trisagion be recited especially for our holy and pious emperors, so that they may be moved to take pity on my poorhouse and monastery, and may protect and defend them, when they need it; and that by command of their mighty and holy majesty they may be kept free from abuse and trouble, so that God may be well pleased and increase and magnify their power. [p. 67]

[32.] Concerning the doxology

It is my wish that all the offices, both at night and during the day, be celebrated according to my typikon, which I have personally drafted, and the other regulations found therein.

[33.] Concerning the allowance and pension of the monks

The allowance of the monks and the other pious donations in cash of the poorhouse and monastery should first be deposited with the typikon on the holy altar, and after a trisagion has been recited in front of the holy altar, and a supplication and prayer has been made for the Christ-loving emperors, a most honorable man should enter and take the money from the holy altar, as if from the hands of our Lord Jesus Christ. Then this Rule of mine should be read first, and the allowances paid out without my heir keeping back or removing anything.

However, I do not want my son, the mystographos lord Theodore, to be badly treated or scorned by any of the monks, or annoyed to an unreasonable degree, but I want everyone to love and be in awe of him, to respect and fear him, and to regard and revere him as they do me, since I bequeath to him the privileges of founder, and leave him, after God and the Virgin, as the irrevocable heir and lord, who is not liable to give an accounting for any reason or cause whatsoever, unless he alienates one of the donated properties or keeps back any of the pious donations which I have established, or alters my Rule. But if by chance he does attempt something contrary [to my rule], he should be mildly reprimanded by the monks, and exhorted to carry out the rules of my typikon. For he, too, should honor the monks, and not maltreat any of them, or deprive him of his due without good reason.

[34.] Concerning justice

If an inquiry or lawsuit should arise concerning a property of the holy poorhouse and the monastery, they should not have the authority to be judged [p. 69] without receiving a document which states that “I, so-and-so, attack the inheritance of the Son of God.” As I know that the eparch of Constantinople¹⁸ at any time is pious and God-loving and a man of God, since he has been appointed father of the city, it is my wish that they be judged with his knowledge and assistance. As a compensation for this service may he be rewarded by God and receive the ineffable and incorruptible crown and may he be inscribed in the holy diptychs and commemorated in perpetuity. He should also receive five nomismata as a reward for his soul and way of life, as a pledge of his spiritual assent¹⁹ and the prosperity of his life and fortune. If any judgment is made without his knowledge, it should be invalid, unless my heir wishes the suit to be tried without the eparch because the case is of minor importance. For then it is permitted for him to act in this fashion. The eparch is to have no other privilege than the right to assist and uphold justice in lawsuits, or the reward from God and the gift of five nomismata. For if he tries to become involved in the ephoreia, or to acquire any other privilege or authority, he should be paid no heed, and should be barred immediately from this treacherous assistance and receipt of pay. The aid of the eparch in these sacred affairs will no longer be requested, since it is dangerous.

ELEVENTH CENTURY

[35. Specifications for the monks' allowances]

The monks ought to receive the following allowances: the superior (when there is one, as I have already said), twelve nomismata; the officials, eight nomismata each; the priests, seven nomismata each; and the others, six nomismata each, half in trachea, half in tetartera. The superior should also receive forty-eight modioi of wheat, the others thirty modioi. In addition to this quantity, I ordain that each monk should receive three extra modioi of wheat for the distribution that I have prescribed for them to make daily at the gate. The superior should receive thirty-six measures of wine, the others twenty-four measures each; for the rest of their food, the superior should receive three nomismata, the others two apiece; and they should each receive three modioi of legumes and one nomisma each for oil; the superior is to get two nomismata. [p. 71]

[36. The expenses for feast days]

The feast days which occur in the course of the year should be celebrated as follows: on the feast of the Transfiguration of our great God and Savior Jesus Christ, six nomismata should be spent for wax and oil and the monks' food, and one nomisma for charity to the poor; on the greatly honored feast day of the venerable Dormition of the all-holy Mother of God, three nomismata; on the feast day of the Incorporeal One, the great commander of the heavenly armies [Michael], which is celebrated on the 8th of November, two nomismata; on the feast day of the honorable [St. John the] Forerunner and Baptist, which is celebrated at the [summer] solstice at the time of his holy birth,²⁰ four nomismata for the illumination, incense and the refectory, but only one nomisma for each of his other feast days. For Christmas and Epiphany three nomismata, and for the salvific and most extraordinary Day of the Resurrection of our Lord God and Savior Jesus Christ, three nomismata also. For wax for the church of the monastery during the whole year twelve nomismata tetartera, and 150 measures of oil, and two nomismata for incense; for eucharistic bread and wine for the whole year eighteen modioi of wheat and eighteen measures of wine should be supplied, so that the monks may partake of a collation, and one nomisma for small glass lamps.²¹

[37. Regarding the possibility of an unworthy descendant]

When I was issuing instructions about my relatives, I did not neglect to bring up the possibility that one of them might demonstrate deceit or great negligence or otherwise misbehave with regard to the property of my monastery and poorhouse. Just as I explained the reasons particularly and at some length in that section,²² this person will be deprived of his ephoreia and dominion and supervision, and another relative, the closest in degree of kinship, will succeed to this [responsibility], a man who has given evidence of his piety and fear of God, and has agreed to do everything in accordance with my Rule. But because it seems somewhat harsh and cruel to condemn sinners to punishment, so that they are deprived even of the means of livelihood, without testimony and incitement to proper behavior, I ordain that three [p. 73] written warnings be issued every three months, in the presence of witnesses, to anyone who does not properly follow my regulations and abuses the affairs of the holy institutions.

19. ATTALEIATES

In the event that he does not then mend his ways, if other members of my family are still living, [I ordain] that preference be given to that one of them who is distinguished for virtue and splendid conduct. In case there are no surviving males, then a woman will serve the purpose. But if by chance there should be no other relative from the lineage which I have already mentioned, and if the sole survivor is the man who holds the [right of] dominion and the ephoreia at that time, he should relinquish the administration and supervision of my monastery and poorhouse. Then the monks should manage their own affairs, and supervise and distribute everything in accordance with this present Rule of mine, but they should hand over to him half of the surplus revenues after paying all the expenses prescribed by the typikon for the improvement of properties and buildings, while the other half should be deposited and saved for the purchase of other real estate and for necessary improvements. But if there is a worthy relative who is appointed to the ephoreia and [right of] dominion in place of the ephoros who was dismissed for malfeasance, out of compassion he should offer to the dismissed [ephoros] the equivalent of one monk's pension each year.

In the case of my dearly beloved son, the mystographos and imperial notary lord Theodore, no expulsion is to be imposed; rather he should be compelled to carry out my instructions, even against his will. But if he is found guilty of malfeasance, the penalty should be imposed on him of paying double the amount fixed in the typikon. For as long as he carries out my instructions piously without keeping anything back for himself, he will surely be blessed in his own [affairs], and will be pleasing to everyone. But let him not try to make a fortune through embezzlement from holy [institutions], because this method [of enrichment] leads rather to poverty and condemnation. If he is eager for more [money], let him do good work and strive hard and acquire additional property in good faith, having his own father as an example. Will not the Lord God leave him everything that is good and prosperous and lovely? For since he is my only son, I love and cherish him exceedingly, and I want him to be healthy in soul and body, and to be unhampered and not bothered by any person or matter.

[38. Administration of the foundation upon the extinction of the family line]

If after a long time my family line should happen to die out, and my monastery and the poorhouse should become independent, at the time of the election of a superior, a man should be chosen by [p. 75] all the monks who demonstrates distinguished manners, and behaves blamelessly in accordance with God, and who cultivates well the furrow of virtue. He should receive the sphragis from the most honorable superior of the monastery of Stoudios; but the superior of Stoudios should not thereby insinuate himself into the ephoreia or any authority over my monastery and poorhouse. He will have only the right to confer the sphragis on the [new] superior, and to resolve any dispute which might perhaps arise in the future over the position of superior, so as to select the better [candidate]. I enjoin and command him in no way to assume any further privilege.

If there should be an argument over the virtue of two monks, and some prefer this one for the pastoral responsibility, that is, the office of superior, and others prefer that one, the choice should be made by divine vote, as I previously described.²³ Then the man who has been chosen by lot at the altar should receive the sphragis as superior by the aforementioned superior [of Stoudios].

The most distinguished eparch [of Constantinople] will render assistance in the legal affairs of my monastery and poorhouse in accordance with the regulations previously declared in an inalienable manner for the sake of his spiritual salvation and service to God. If the most honorable superior [of Stoudios] should attempt to acquire ownership rights or ephoreia over these pious [foundations], the [eparch] should prevent him, and strip him of this privilege. Then the most distinguished eparch should receive [the privilege of] the installation of the superior, but he should have no further [right] beyond this and assistance and support in legal affairs.

This should occur after the right of ephoreia and dominion has passed from my family, as has already been said. For I absolutely forbid and reject any lay or ecclesiastical authority over this monastery and poorhouse, and I entrust them only to God who is glorified in the most sovereign and suprasubstantial Trinity, as I have often indicated in the present document. In order to please God and carry out my present instructions, no one else is to administer them and to have the aforementioned privileges, except for my true son, the mystographos and imperial notary lord Theodore, and my direct descendants through him, in perpetuity, in accordance with the instructions and the limits which I established in the passages concerning the ephoreia and administration of the monastery, so that a male is to be preferred to a female, and a virtuous man to the others. They will simply be as I indicated and instructed more thoroughly in the previous passage. If someone [p. 77] from the imperial court or the Church or any other privileged position or rank or condition should attempt to transgress any of my commandments, in addition to being ignored, may he be cursed by God and men, and be liable to all the aforementioned curses, on account of his attempt alone. May he also be relegated to the ranks of those who are anathematized in the holy churches, inasmuch as he is a transgressor and abomination.

[39.] Concerning the dependent peasants and tenants

My dependent peasants and tenants should not be harassed, and should not be burdened with increases in payments or services, over and above the sums they paid and work they performed in my day; for I forbid the type and form of their service to be changed, unless one of them is found to possess and cultivate more than the land assigned to him, or unless some other unforeseen circumstance would require an additional contribution or services.

[40.] Concerning the property titles

The title deeds for the immovable property attached to my monastery and poorhouse, as well as the original chrysobull, should be deposited in chests placed either in the sacristy of the monastery, or in another safe location. Each chest should have two keys, and my heir should keep one of them, and the steward the other, if there is no superior. Seals should also be affixed by my heir and the monks, and when there is need for a title deed, they should all open [the chest] and remove the document (and the same security measures should apply also to the other [documents]). Then, when the business is finished, the document should be replaced in its original location. The documents should be unrolled and shaken out three times a year, and then returned again to the same secure place. All the title deeds should be copied in a register, so that one can discern quickly the number and kind of title deeds that each property possesses. For, thanks to God, I have acquired all my properties with legal and valid actions and documents, and in good faith, and, as God is my witness, I never cheated the fisc or broke the law. If the heirs to the pious [p. 79] institutions examine any case pertaining to my property, they will always find a document appropriate for the most secure confirmation of the case in question.

19. ATTALEIATES

The original typikon should be secured and sealed at the top. Its authentic copy²⁴ should be used [instead], and read three times a year, at the time of the distribution of the cash allowance to the monks, as has already been said,²⁵ and in the month of September and at Epiphany. But if there should be any doubt about a word in the copy, then the original should be opened, and after a collation has been made, that is a comparison of the texts, the original should be secured again and sealed at the top; and it should be kept in a safe place, and the copy should [normally] be used.

[41. Instructions for the steward]

The pious monk Michael, whom I appointed steward, inasmuch as he is a man who acts virtuously and was the first to be tonsured, should act to please my dearly beloved son and heir in all things. He should also exert himself for the sake of his well-being and prosperity, and carry out everything that is pleasing to him according to God, since he is distinguished among the monks. He should also guide [my son] toward every pious deed, so that the distributions are made by him, together with God, in accordance with my present wishes, so that he may receive again from him the attachment and honor that are his due. Therefore he has now been assigned a larger remuneration than the others, and his pay will be ten nomismata, and his provisions thirty-six modioi of wheat and thirty measures of wine. The rest should remain in accordance with the previous instructions.²⁶ If the superior of Stoudios should happen to appoint a superior for the monastery of the poorhouse of the All-Merciful, in case my family should die out (God forbid), he should receive compensation of three nomismata for his provisions.

[42. Pension for servants of departed monks]

When a monk from this monastery departs to the Lord, his servant may remain forty days in the poorhouse without being dismissed. If he is found to be of worthy character and good reputation, he should be included among the six brethren who are fed each day, making the sixth in number; but if he does not want this, he should be assigned to the eighteen people who are entitled to receive wheat, and should receive twelve annonikoi modioi of wheat annually. [p. 81]

[43. Warning to those who might initiate legal proceedings against the foundation]

Furthermore, I leave this instruction: if anyone ever institutes a judicial inquiry concerning the status of my poorhouse or monastery, or its ephoreia or administration, and impiously attempts to transgress my instructions, he should be sentenced to eternal hell-fire and the most frightful curses. No one else should listen to his idle talk and his pernicious and diabolic intrigues, except for the most holy emperor who, by divine appointment, has piously received the Roman scepter, so that he, who has his heart in the hand of God, and has been chosen by him above all, may vigorously repel this wolf and wicked persecutor and babbler, and may crush his most loathsome savagery, and preserve unimpaired my humble instructions and the prosperity of these venerable establishments in perpetuity, since he is pious and a lover of Christ.

For it is fitting for him to respect the wishes of the founders, and to defend venerable [institutions], and to maintain and preserve from outrage the pious chrysobulls issued for them, since a trisagion is recited daily on behalf of the most holy emperors, as is indicated in my typikon.²⁷ With confidence in their piety and beneficence, that is, their aid and protection, the men of God consecrate their lives to God as a propitiatory offering on behalf of their salvation, and the raising of trophies, and good success, and the victory of the army and the good order of the commonwealth and spiritual benefit and the pleasure of God.

I also make this further commandment: if ever any of my collateral relatives should attempt to harass my dearly beloved and true son, lord Theodore, or should devise a lawsuit or extortion scheme, for any reason or in any manner whatsoever, against him or his sons and grandsons or great-grandsons, and his legitimate descendants, first of all this man should be cursed, then the entire chapter²⁸ concerning my collateral relatives should be invalidated, in which I ordained that any of my collateral relatives who wished should be tonsured. Even if my entire line of descendants should die out ten thousand times, not even one of my collateral relatives should insinuate himself into any ephoreia, or receive any of the revenues from my pious institutions, not even a morsel of bread or anything else; moreover they should not even be permitted to enter the gate, since they are considered plotters and enemies and opponents of my commandments. [p. 83]

[44. Provision for the recording of a future imperial chrysobull]

If, with God's aid, another chrysobull should be issued to confirm my instructions, and the immunity of my property and other affairs, it should be recorded in this typikon of mine. For I have left several different blank pages for this purpose. The same should be true for the inventory which is attached to my typikon whenever property or money is acquired in addition to that already listed.

[45. Conclusion]

The Lord God will preserve these things undamaged and unshaken forever, increasing in extent and in good order, and neither time nor envy will overthrow and damage them; rather may they always be guided towards progress and increase and a more stable condition, and may they be governed by the life-giving and divine hand, under its shelter and protection, to the glory of the Father, Son and Holy Spirit, now forever and to everlasting generations. Amen.

+ I, Michael Attaleiates, patrikios, anthypatos, judge of the hippodrome and the velum, confirming all the above [provisions], with God's help, and wanting them to remain inviolable, have appended my signature and seal, in the month of March, fifteenth indiction, of the year 6585 [= 1077 A.D.].+

19. ATTALEIATES

* * *

[46. Clarification of certain provisions of the typikon]

I also write in this typikon of mine,²⁹ that if there should be no male descendant in my family, then a woman may undertake the succession to the aforementioned pious establishments, and again I confirm it; and the sex [of the heir] will never harm the family, and the instructions and wishes of your humble founder. For, in fact, the supervision of such [institutions] is often entrusted to women through gifts or family inheritance, but is [actually] exercised by men, either their husbands, or sons, or respected servants of good reputation, and thus at the same time are preserved the rightful succession and pious action.

But anyone who tries to transgress any of my instructions, no matter what the age or condition or sex or rank of the individual, appears ridiculous for attempting the impossible, since he does not respect the instructions of founders, and does not honor the rules and privileges of the Queen of Cities, and especially of the provinces, and since he does not understand the meaning of laws and [p. 85] the power of chrysobulls, by means of which this Great Church [Hagia Sophia] was established and is maintained, and lavras and monasteries more numerous than the stars enjoy the benefits of the instructions of their founders, moreover, may such a transgressor be ranked with those who crucified my Lord and God and Savior Jesus Christ.

The condition of restitution which was imposed on my heirs in case of childlessness should immediately be abolished, and both during their lifetime and after their death they should be permitted to transfer to whomever they wish the property which I have left them. In addition, they should have the supervision of and dominion over the aforementioned pious institutions established by me, to preserve them in the future in accordance with my instructions.

+ I, Michael Attaleiates, proedros, judge of the hippodrome and the velum, have now confirmed with my signature that this preceding addition was made by me. +

* * *

[Inventory]

+ Beginning of the inventory of the monastery of the All-Merciful

[INV 1] Blessed be the Lord God who is celebrated and recognized by the faithful as the Trinity, who with his threefold and co-eternal and consubstantial light illuminates and guides all things, whether in the world or above the world or beyond the material, through whom I have been granted a portent for good and marvelous favors. For by divine Providence and his infinitely powerful majesty I was rescued from accursed hands during wars against the Persians [Turks], Arabs, and also the Scyths [Patzinaks], and extraordinary strength and power compensated for my inherent weakness, and warded off total destruction. Moreover, divine succor often rescued me unexpectedly from the depths of the sea, and I was granted salvation from many terrible dangers. For I have always been eager to proclaim his mercy and not to conceal his benefactions, since truly “great is the Lord and greatly to be praised, he is wonderful in high places and alone does wonders” (Ps. 47 [48]:1; 92 [93]:4; 71 [72]:18). For he has revealed before my eyes [p. 87] exceedingly great favors of life and salvation, and has not only saved me, but also guided me towards prosperity and good repute, “and set my feet upon a rock, making my steps secure” (Ps. 40:3) at all times and in all places and in accordance with my expectation.

ELEVENTH CENTURY

[INV 2] Wherefore, borrowing the voice of a witness, I cry out with tears and a contrite soul, so that I may find the All-Merciful Master and Lord my God propitious “in the day of judgment” (Matt. 10:15) to condone and forgive my countless sins. This is my cry of supplication: “O Lord, I magnify thee, because thou hast regarded my humility, and hast not abandoned me in the hands of my enemies, but hast preserved my soul from distress; and now, O Lord, may thy hand protect me and may thy mercy come upon me; give glory to thy holy name, and with thy power lead me toward thy divine tribunal; at the time of my judgment let not the hand of the prince of darkness seize me in order to drag my sinful self down to the depths of Hell, but stand beside me and be my savior and protector. O Lord, have mercy on my soul which has been defiled by the passions of this life,” and receive it purified by repentance, because “Thou art blessed forever.”³⁰

[INV 3] O all-merciful Lord, most compassionate King, this [prayer is made] to thee by “a worthless servant” (Luke 25:30) who is both humble and extremely sinful. Prostrating myself therefore with a contrite heart, I make a prayer and supplication. Do not reject this sacrifice and unworthy offering of thy servant, but accept it in peace in accordance with thy incomparable and ineffable mercy, and look compassionately upon this “little flock” (Luke 12:32), because it is thy heritage in fact and in name. Guard it in peace and concord, preserving my commandments as is pleasing to thee, our great God and Savior, the highest and unitary majesty that shines with a triple light. Since “I am making thee an offering from thine own,”³¹ I beg forgiveness for my daring, in the knowledge that “no human being will be justified in thy sight” (Rom. 3:20), unless he has been blessed first by the incomprehensible and ineffable mercy of thy compassion, through which I trust and pray that these modest offerings will be multiplied, and increased, and that much more abundant blessings will be bestowed than those which were requested of thee, through pious donations for the purpose of perpetual thanksgiving and praise of thy power.

[INV 4] These are the objects listed in the inventory of the monastery and poorhouse that serve thee, to which should be added subsequent acquisitions through [p. 89] thy great assistance and assent, either from me again, or from other God-loving and pious men, whose names ought to be set down in the register of the donated movable or immovable object, so that they may be commemorated in perpetuity in the daily and nocturnal offices of the holy church.

[INV 5] The sacred treasures

A large icon, painted on wood, [representing] Jesus Christ the All-Merciful, standing.

Four silver-gilt crosses for Palm Sunday.

A silver icon, and gilded support, with a bust of the Savior, with two wings; on the interior the wings have the most holy Mother of God and the venerable [St. John the] Forerunner, the holy apostles Peter and Paul, St. Artemios and St. Loukilianos; on the exterior they have the holy martyrs George, Akindynos, St. Nicholas and St. Methodios, St. Kosmas and St. Damian.

19. ATTALEIATES

Another silver-gilt icon has a bust of the Savior, surrounded by nine icons and the Hetoimasia.

Another silver-gilt icon has the most holy Mother of God, holding the infant in her left arm, surrounded by nine icons, and above, as the inscription says, the church of the most holy Mother of God.

Another silver-gilt icon of [St. Michael] the commander of the heavenly armies of silver gilt with eighteen bust icons.

Another painted wood icon of St. Catherine with silver-gilt frame, having six bust icons and two standing icons.

Another painted wood icon of [St. John] the venerable Forerunner, set out for veneration, without frame.

Other icons of the Deesis, painted on wood.

The templon, which also has in the middle the Deesis and the story of [St. John] the venerable and holy Forerunner. [p. 91]

Another painted wood icon of St. Panteleemon with a silver-gilt frame and twenty-five glass jewels,³² with sixteen icons around the frame.

From the offering of the praipositos John, the secretary of the founder, which was made at the beginning of the month of October of the eighth indiction:³³

A silver-gilt icon of St. Theodore.

Another icon of St. John the Forerunner, made of bronze, with silver-gilt frame.

Another bronze icon of St. Nicholas, also with silver-gilt frame; both [icons] small.

[INV 6] The sacred vessels

A silver-gilt chalice and paten with asteriskos, spoon, and ithmos, the paten having . . . on the edge . . . , and on the bottom a cross and a circular inscription: "Lord, help the monk Romanos"; the chalice has four crosses and on the foot an inscription similar to that of the paten, and on the edge: "Drink ye all of this" (Matt. 26:27), both together weighing four litrai, seven ounces.

Two silver-gilt pot-shaped lamps with their suspended chains, one weighing two litrai, the other two litrai less an ounce.

Silver-gilt capitals for the holy doors, one depicting Christ, the other the most holy Mother of God, weighing one litrai.

A silver standing censer without gilding, in the form of a horseback rider, weighing . . .

A silver-gilt Persian casket with enamels, weighing . . .

ELEVENTH CENTURY

From the offering of the aforementioned praipositos John, a plain silver ithmos. [p. 93]

[INV 7] The books

A minuscule gospel lectionary, with all the titles and headings written in gold, with two crosses, four ornaments in the form of a gamma, eight almond-shaped studs, seven clasps, fifty-seven nails, all in silver-gilt.

A book containing the four gospels in uncials, with two crosses and eight gamma-shaped ornaments, all of pure cast gold; and one of the crosses depicts the Crucifixion, the other the most holy Mother of God, and the gamma-shaped ornaments represent the holy apostles and various other saints. This book of the four gospels also has seventy-one small nails and seven silver-gilt clasps, which have in turn sixteen nails and eight studs.

Another old gospel lectionary, written in uncials, with one silver cross and an inscription on the cross as follows:

“Even after my death, I offer a rule of conduct
To God my Master as a propitiatory offering.”

Another book, the Apostolos, in minuscule.

A Prophetes, in minuscule.

An Oktoechos, with two canons.

A Sticherarion.

A Psalter for psalmody.

Menaia for the entire year, and a Triodion in good condition.

Lectionaries.

[St. Gregory Nazianzen] the Theologian.

The first [volume of John Chrysostom's Homiliae] in Johannem.

Four volumes of the Metaphraseis [of Symeon Logothetes].

Four Menaia, for September, October, November, and December.

Another Psalter, with commentary. [p. 95]

Another book, the Pandektes [of the monk Antiochos].

The second volume of the Hexameros of [St. John] Chrysostom, and the Hexameros of St. Basil with the Apocalypse and miscellaneous texts.

Another book, Panegyrikon of different authors, and another book of [St. John] Chrysostom, The Statues, and another book of theology by St. John of Damascus.

Another Prophetes, in minuscule, and another book, the Catecheses of [Theodore] the Studite.

From the donation of the same praipositos John:

19. ATTALEIATES

A parchment book, in minuscule, containing a text of [St. John] Chrysostom, and the Life of St. Artemios, and lives of other saints.

Another parchment book containing the canons of the feast days of our Lord, with commentary, and a book on earthquakes and thunder.

Another book in paper containing the synopsis of the Holy Gospel, and Alexander,³⁴ and other texts.

Another paper [volume containing] a chronicle composed by the founder.

The following [books] were donated to this holy monastery in the month of March of the eighth indiction by the monk Michael, superior of the same monastery:

A book in paper, a Praxapostolos, with commentary, containing also the seven catholic epistles, also with commentary, and in addition the Book of Job, the Proverbs of Solomon, Ecclesiastes, the Song of Songs, the Wisdom of Solomon, and the Wisdom of Jesus, son of Sirach, all with commentary, all in beautiful writing.

Another paper book, containing the Psalter with commentary. [p. 97]

Another book in parchment, in uncials, The Capture of Jerusalem [by Flavius Josephus].

Another parchment book, a Nomocanon, and [the Acts] of the holy apostle Peter by [Ps.-] Clement [of Rome].

Another parchment book, a commentary on [St. John] the Theologian.

Another [volume], a Heirmologion in paper.

Another book, containing a Kontakarion and psalter, as well as the verses preceded by Alleluias.

Another book, a Schematologion.

The books donated by the executors after the death of the founders, as well as the books acquired subsequently for the needs of the monastery, and the books donated by the monk lord John, the spiritual father of our late master and founder, have been recorded at the end of the volume of the typikon because of the limited space in this part of the catalogue of the books in the typikon.

[INV 8] The textiles

One cloth in green silk fabric for the holy altar, with eleven young horses and a two-headed lion-griffin.

Another altar cloth in linen, with painted decoration.

Two curtains, one for the templon, and the other for [St. John] the venerable and holy Forerunner.

Veils for the chalice, one new and one old.

Another cloth for the holy table, made of skaramangion.

A curtain for the templon, similar to the altar cloth, which also covers the columns of the holy doors, both old.

ELEVENTH CENTURY

Another silk cloth, a curtain in two shades³⁵ of purple, depicting a purple peacock in a conch-shaped niche, with borders [and ?] lining (?)³⁶ of pistachio color, and another very long [p. 99] and narrow curtain, of brilliant white, the so-called ambelokladion [with vine-tendrils decoration], with ordinary borders [and?] lining (?). These two liturgical cloths were dedicated with devotion to [St. John] the venerable and holy Forerunner by the praipositos and chamberlain John for the remission of his sins, so that on feast days the narrow [curtain] might be hung above the venerable head [of St. John], the other in front of him like a podea.

[INV 9] [List of] properties

This monastery with its rental properties, the bakery, the perfume shop, and the houses with upper and lower floors which are rented out, except for the ones which I have excluded, that is, the gallery and ground floor [of the buildings] which look out on the courtyard of the small house.

Half of the income from the house which came to me from Thomas of Nicaea.

All of my large house in the town of Rhaidestos, which I designated to be a poorhouse in fact and in name, and joined indissolubly with the monastery.

The estate of Selokaka together with Makron Chorion.

The estate of Baboulou, or Lips.

The estate of St. Myrope, also known as the Monokellion, and the other Monokellion donated to my monastery and poorhouse as his own personal property by the most holy patriarch of Theoupolis, the great Antioch, lord Nikephoros.³⁷ On his behalf an ektenes and memorial rites should be celebrated in perpetuity, and on the anniversary of his death two nomismata should be given to the monks for liturgical [purposes], and three nomismata for distribution to the poor, and in addition there should be celebrated a trisagion and twenty-four liturgies.

The estate of Symeoniou.

The aule of Metaxas. [p. 101]

The aule of Arkolykes together with the houses acquired by exchange with Hagia Sophia.

The aule of Kentarchos, together with all of the houses there.

Of my estates at Mesokomion, I donate one estate which I bought from the nun _____, the niece of Skribas, which he had from Chosbaites.

It should be known that the property of the Monokellion donated by the patriarch of Theoupolis, the great Antioch, which was taken by force from him, belonged to the nun Xene Komnene, the most noble kouropalattissa, and was later given by her to the monastery of the All-Merciful, with the approval of her holy mother, lady Anna; and they should be commemorated both during their lifetime and after their death, together with Constantine, the late husband of the nun, lady Xene, and their memorial rites should be celebrated in perpetuity in accordance with the text of their donation.³⁸

19. ATTALEIATES

[INV 10] [Chrysobull of Emperor Michael VII Doukas]

Copy of the chrysobull of the emperor, lord Michael Doukas, which was registered at the office of the genikos logothetes in the month of March of the thirteenth indiction, at the office of the oikeiaka on March 28 of the thirteenth indiction, at the office of the sakelle in the month of March of the thirteenth indiction, at the oikonomion of pious institutions on March 30 of the thirteenth indiction, and at the office of the stratitikos logothetes on April 14 of the thirteenth indiction.

+In the name of the Father and the Son and the Holy Spirit, Doukas, faithful emperor and orthodox autokrator of the Romans.+

[p. 103]

There is nothing at all which can render the generous soul of a ruler even more generous than the sincere loyalty of a grateful subject whose heart is eager to serve his master. If this man is also adorned with learning of general usefulness and a good disposition and intelligence, this encourages his master to even more generosity. For this man attracts his master to himself³⁹ as a magnet does iron, and he asks, as is reasonable, to enjoy abundant favors from him. Indeed an example has been revealed right before our eyes and very close at hand that this is so and that these words are true, namely the anthypatos and judge, Michael Attaleiates, a man venerated for the dignity of his bearing and his good character, a very serious individual of great learning and admirable experience, and even more admirable in his loyalty to my majesty, a man who is prouder of this [loyalty] with which he is adorned than he is of his other [accomplishments], as a long period of time has clearly revealed. For this man was apprehensive lest his house in Rhaidestos, and his additional properties which he acquired and owned in the themes of Thrace and Macedonia, be subjected daily to plundering and ruin at the hands of all the profiteers, and suffer great and wrongful damage from them. Thus he has presented an urgent petition to my majesty on their behalf, and has entreated earnestly that we issue a chrysobull to spare them harassment.

Therefore, my majesty, who is more eager to grant the petition than Attaleiates was to make the request, has graciously consented, and has royally awarded him the present chrysobull, by means of which he ordains and decrees that this man's house, together with its rental properties and the estates which he has honestly acquired and owns in the aforementioned themes, whatever their nature and number, are to be inviolate and spared any harassment, even if with the passage of time they should happen to increase a great deal.

[He also decrees] that these properties and their inhabitants are not to fear the visitation of judges or fiscal agents or soldiers or orthotai or magistrates or registrars or tax collectors of any sort, nor any of their subordinates. Furthermore [he decrees] that from the present time all [these properties] are to be preserved inviolate in perpetuity, and that they be completely spared all other [problems], and enjoy complete freedom and peace from this day on, whether they belong to private and lay owners, [p. 105] or, as the result of a donation, to ecclesiastics or monks or pious foundations. They should pay only that amount exacted from them annually up to this point, whether it is taxes, or some other kind of payment. [They should pay] those people to whom they have been making payments at stated intervals until now, and in no way be subjected to any new or novel burden of imposition and innovation, whether great or small.

ELEVENTH CENTURY

They are also forthwith to be spared the passage of an army and vestiaritai and mandators and other imperial agents who come to the aforementioned themes on any sort of business, or pass through en route. Neither they nor their animals are to be subjected to any compulsory labor service, or additional labor, by any of these agents, nor to be compelled to supply the provisions which are given to the judges or fiscal agents and those enumerated above. Rather these properties should remain in total peace and security, and should banish far away from themselves and reject any fear and danger of harassment.

For all [the properties] of the aforementioned anthypatos and judge of the velum have anchored in a harbor protected from the waves on all sides, and do not expect any storm or turbulence and damage, and so that the force of my words may be understood in its essentials, [these properties] are protected in perpetuity by this chrysobull, in the manner I have described, as if by a mighty fortress that is impregnable on all sides. They will drive far away anyone who attempts, or even considers, abuse of these [properties], and they will use weapons against any person of this sort, as if from a very high vantage point, and they will be safe and completely free from any harm and damage from these people.

They will also be exempted from the billeting of officers of the tagmata or themes, or of the Russians, Varangians or Koulpingoi⁴⁰ or Franks or Bulgarians or Saracens or any other [mercenaries], from antimitatikia, aplekta, and the provisioning of aplekta, mesaplekta, judges, tax-gatherers and all others, the requisitioning of pack-animals, the payment of kaniskia and antikaniska, both old ones and those which might be imposed subsequently, the provisioning of fortresses, the purchase of mules, half-shares of mules, pack-mules, half-share of pack-mules, horses, [p. 107] horses for use as out-runners, jackasses, she-asses, mares, draft oxen and beef cattle, pigs, sheep, goats, cows, buffalo, hunting dogs and other four-footed animals, the furnishing of produce by forced sale, the obligation of the dromos, the oikomodion, the komodromikion, the prosodia, the aerikon, the synone, the strateia, the hearth tax, the tax for the construction of fortresses and the paving of roads, the building of bridges, the taxation, the matzoukation, the provision of supplies to be given to judges or fiscal agents or other officials, or foreign envoys in transit or an army, the supplying of fodder, the sustenance of protokentarchoi or proeleusimaioi, or imperial agents dispatched on certain missions, the provision of produce or transport of wine, meat and miscellaneous items, the outfitting of marines, lancers, bowmen or mounted archers, the purchase of wheat, barley, oats, oil, legumes and grains of all kinds, the cutting and transport of any sort of wood or the transport of oars, or anything else, the provision of malaratoi, archers, the outfitting of soldiers, cavalry and infantry officers, lodging of top-ranking officers, doukes, katepano, strategoi, judges, and other tax gatherers, the provisioning and lodging of armies going to and returning from war, of vestiaritai, mandators of the dromos who are escorting ambassadors or exiles, or passing through for any other reason, of topoteretai, tourmarchai, merarchai, and anyone else entrusted with making inquiries into affairs of the fisc, compulsory labor service, additional labor, or any other imposition, whether mentioned [above] or omitted, whether existing at this moment or devised at a later time.

Therefore I command and confirm that all officials, at present or in the future, sakellarioi, genikoi logothetai and stratitotikoi logothetai, the [officials in charge of] our sakelle and vestiarion, the stewards of the pious institutions and of [the convent of] Petria, the officials in charge of the oikeiaka, and the ephoroi of the imperial curatories, the eidikoi, the directors of old age homes, the officials in charge of our divine treasury of Phylax, the curators [p. 109] of the house of Eleutheriou and Mangana, the oikistikoi, and their subordinates, the protonotarioi, the logariastai, the chartoularioi, notaries and imperial notaries, as well as the domestikoi ton scholon, doukes, katepano, strategoï and their representatives, taxiarchai, tourmarchai, chartoularioi of the dromos and the themes, counts of the Court, domestikoi of the themes, droungarokometai, protokentarchoi, proeleusimaïoi and other officers of the tagmata and themes; and in addition judges, magistrates, strateutai, orthotai, registrars, protonotarioi, collectors of the synone, horeiarioi, and anyone else entrusted with government business, that no one at all, at any time or in any way, is to annul or invalidate any provision decreed here by my majesty, even if it is only a mere attempt, on account of the guarantee and security of this pious sealed chrysobull of mine issued in the month of March of the 13th indiction in the year 6583 [= 1075 A.D.], to which my pious authority, chosen by God, has appended its signature.+

19. ATTALEIATES

+Michael Doukas, in Christ God the faithful emperor and autokrator of the Romans.+

[INV 11] [Chrysobull of Emperor Nikephoros III Botaneiates]⁴¹

[This document makes extensive use of the preceding Chrysobull of Michael VII [INV 10]. Borrowings are indicated in boldface type.]

Copy of the chrysobull of the emperor lord Nikephoros Botaneiates, registered at the office of the oikeiaka in the month of May of the second indiction, at the office of the sakelle on the ninth of May of the second indiction, at the office of the great sakellarios in the month of May of the second indiction, at the office of the oikonomion of the West in the month of May of the second indiction, at the office of the genikos logothetes on the fourteenth of May of the second indiction, and at the office of the stratitikos logothetes on the seventh of May of the second indiction.

+In the name of the Father and Son and Holy Spirit, Nikephoros Botaneiates, faithful emperor [and] orthodox autokrator of the Romans.+ [p. 111]

It is fitting for a true emperor to be known as one who distributes rewards to the deserving and assigns to each the appropriate honors; and if learning and a reputation for learning have become as it were a distinctive characteristic of the magistros and judge, Michael Attaleiates, it would not be fair for this man not to receive the corresponding favor. For if a man imbued with culture is not revered, then we consider culture to be unimportant. If we do not place importance upon culture, which is the crowning glory of civilization, then we condemn to neglect people with rational natures. [I trust], however, that no one would neglect the good to so great an extent as to fail to honor learning in a reasonable manner. For this reason it would be unfair if a man who has exerted himself on behalf of culture, and achieved greater success than most, should now be deceived in his expectations by my pious majesty, and not have his request granted, especially since he has affixed to his present purpose an extraordinary image of divine piety. But what is the reason for this preamble? The text which immediately follows will indicate this most clearly.

This aforementioned magistros formerly acquired properties in Thrace and Macedonia, and procured from the previous emperor, lord Michael Doukas, a chrysobull granting total immunity to them, and enjoining that they were to be free from any access and visitation by anyone, by judges and fiscal agents and strateutai, orthotai and magistrates, registrars, and tax collectors of any kind, and all their subordinates. [The chrysobull also] forbids any increase or amendment [in the taxes] on his estates, so that he is to pay only the [monies] exacted annually up to this time, whether they be taxes, or any other payments. Moreover, [the chrysobull] excludes and prevents any other sort of imposition, whether billeting or compulsory labor service or extra duty, or other responsibilities enumerated in that [document]. Thereby it had the force [of law], and since the foundation was laid in accordance with the law, the edifice placed on top of it was also secure. But even a solid [edifice] often needs a support, so that it may become stronger. For example, sometimes we surround a trench with walls, and encircle a city with a double circuit wall, and this procedure is not incompatible with [the concern for] perfection. Therefore the magistros has resolved on this circumspect and shrewd [procedure]. He decided to approach our pious majesty for confirmation, since he knew that an imperial decree which confirms a [previous] decree has even greater weight. [p. 113] For this reason he requested a document sealed with a chrysobull confirming the properties which he has acquired legally, and granting him an unassailable title of ownership, as well as confirming the above-described immunity. Since [this] request was not unreasonable, but rather made good sense, it has been granted.

For my serene majesty decrees, by means of this pious chrysobull, that the properties which the magistros acquired in any way in Thrace and Macedonia with proper title deeds are to belong to him without any harassment or contest, and no insolent person with evil designs is to trespass on them. Nor [are they permitted to] harass the magistros himself nor any of his party, his heirs and successors or any others with ownership rights. [They may not] disturb his lawful right of ownership with regard to [properties] which he has acquired by purchase from the fisc or as imperial gifts, or [properties] acquired in good faith by means of private transactions, or trouble him and his party with pretexts of hypertimon, or other new exactions or vexations, nor [may they] damage and maltreat his property. May any imposition of this kind or any other sort be banished far away from him and his properties, and may every unjust and greedy person be driven away from them. For my pious majesty wishes him to have his lawful ownership uncontested and undisputed and with no grounds for argument in any way for any reason or cause. Moreover he should not be subject to any abuse, as provided by the chrysobull previously granted to the magistros, which my serene majesty confirms and ratifies and reinforces with this present decree.

But the magistros did not seek only after culture, nor did he place importance on terrestrial matters alone; rather he devoted considerable and noble forethought to the condition of his soul. For he was well aware that all the things of this world are transitory, and terrestrial [wealth] ends on earth, and only those things are abiding which bring profit to the soul, and therefore he has shared all of his possessions. For he has offered as a dedication to God his house in the capital, which he acquired by purchase from his late sister-in-law, the protospatharissa Anastaso, and made it a monastery for pious men; and he joined with it, as a total gift, the house he owned in the town of Rhaidestos, [p. 115] after transforming it into a poorhouse, so that both of these institutions might be combined and consolidated and united into one through the bond of the [Holy] Spirit.

In order to accomplish this pious objective, the magistros stored up material resources to achieve his goal, and then designated both rural and urban properties as an offering to the monastery and poorhouse that he had established. In addition, he drafted a Rule in which he explained very clearly how and by whom each of these properties should be administered. And since he was on guard against vicissitudes in affairs and the different sorts of changes which occur, he was not easy in his mind, but sometimes the thoughts of his heart were fearful. For this reason he approached my serene majesty and sought a guarantee. Since my pious majesty was desirous to participate in a good [cause], he did not hesitate or delay in acceding to this pious endeavor. As soon as the magistros made his petition, my majesty fulfilled his request in a pious fashion, decreeing and ordaining in the present pious chrysobull that the newly established monastery built by the magistros in the name of our great God and Savior Jesus Christ, the All-Merciful, and the poorhouse in Rhaidestos which is joined with it, as well as their properties, in accordance with his Rule should be reserved for our Lord God alone to whom they were consecrated by the magistros. They are not to be diverted by any imperial authority or official bureau or bishop, nor by the authority of any ruling officials or anyone with a private fortune. Rather these properties should be kept separate from everything else, and, as if they were in inviolable storerooms, should be preserved for and assigned in perpetuity solely to the Word of the Person of God the Father. Everyone else should know that if anyone attempts, as an act of folly, to desecrate properties which have been honestly consecrated and delivered into the hands of God alone, he will be immediately found guilty of sacrilege, and will not escape the just punishment for it. For if we rarely escape the subsequent punishment when we harm our fellow citizens and commit moderate sins, when God himself is the One dishonored and the evil purpose affects him directly, what kind of threatening punishment is it not reasonable to expect? I do not think anyone would ever be so rash, or would come to such an extreme of insanity; but if there should perhaps be certain people whose inner soul teems with evil, I offer in his defense this [p. 117] chrysobull, by which I absolutely prohibit any interference in these affairs, by any imperial authority, or the visitation of an official bureau or patriarchal or episcopal authority, or the power of eminent people, or even the insignificance of very unimportant people. For it is wrong for people who ought to desire nothing but justice (?) to interfere in property that is completely alien to them and dedicated to God alone, and to insinuate themselves wickedly.

19. ATTALEIATES

We award these properties to God alone the All-Merciful, and decree that they belong to his portion, and all the pious provisions made by the magistros with regard to these properties should be observed in perpetuity as he determined and as is described in his Rule. His son, the dishypatos Theodore, the imperial notary, has been entrusted with the supervision and administration of these pious institutions in accordance with the typikon of the aforementioned founder, and his direct descendants and their descendants in turn, as long as his lineage continues. [I also ordain] that when his line runs out, the monastery and poorhouse should be self-governing and independent, and all its supervision and administration should be carried out under [the direction of] God the leader and guardian, and thus all human ephoreia and abuse should be removed from them.

All the real estate belonging to these institutions together with the other properties of the magistros (which will be indicated by name below), are to be exempt from judges, fiscal agents, strateutai, orthotai, magistrates, registrars, tax collectors and all their subordinates, as well as the inhabitants and dependent peasants residing on these estates. They will be preserved from all abuse and additional payment to the fisc, from kaniskion and antikaniskon, so that no one at all is to trespass on these properties.

Furthermore, from the present moment they are all to be preserved unharmed in perpetuity, and will prevail completely over everything else, and will enjoy total freedom and peace, even if they should increase greatly with the passage of time. In no way are they to be subjected to any new or novel burden or imposition and innovation, either great or small, and moreover, they are to be spared the passage of an army and vestiaritai and mandators and other imperial agents who come to the aforementioned themes on any sort of business, or pass through en route; and neither they nor their animals are to be subjected to any compulsory labor or additional labor by any of these agents, nor to be compelled to supply the provisions which are given to the judges or fiscal agents or those enumerated above. Rather these properties should remain in total peace and security, and should banish far away from themselves and reject any fear and [p. 119] danger of harassment, so as to seem to have anchored in a harbor protected from the waves on all sides, and not to expect any storm or turbulence and damage, [or payment of the] hypertimon, and so that the force of my words may be understood in its essentials, that all the properties of the aforementioned magistros and judge of the velum [and of the aforementioned pious institutions] are to be preserved in perpetuity by this chrysobull, in the manner described, as if by a great fortress which is impregnable on all sides. They will drive far away anyone who attempts or even considers abuse of these properties, and they will use weapons against any person of this sort, as if from a very high vantage point, and they will be safe and completely free from any harm and damage from these people.

They will also be exempted from the billeting of officers of the tagmata or themes, of the Russians, Varangians or Koulpingoi, or Franks or Bulgarians or Saracens or any others, from antimitatika, aplekta and the provisioning of aplekta, mesaplekta, judges, tax gatherers, high-ranking military officers and all others, from the requisitioning of pack-animals, the payment of kaniskia and antikaniska, both old ones and those which might be imposed subsequently, the provisioning of fortresses, the purchase of mules, half-shares of mules, pack-mules, half-shares of pack-mules, horses, horses for use as outrunners, jackasses, she-asses, mares, draft oxen and beef cattle, pigs, sheep, goats, cows, buffalo, hunting dogs and other four-footed animals, the furnishing of produce by forced sale or some other cause, the obligation of the dromos, the oikomodion, the komodromikion, the prosodia, the aerikon, the synone, the strateia, the hearth tax, the tax for the construction of fortresses, the paving of roads and the building of bridges, the taxation, the matzoukation, the provision of supplies to be given to judges or fiscal agents or other officials, or foreign envoys in transit, or an army, the supplying of fodder, the sustenance of protokentarchoi or proeუსimaioi, imperial agents dispatched on certain missions, the provision of produce or transport of wine, meat and miscellaneous items, the outfitting of marines, lancers, bowmen or mounted archers, the purchase of wheat, barley, oats, oil, legumes and grains of all kinds, the cutting and transport of any sort of wood or the transport of oars or anything else, [p. 121] the provision of malaratoi, archers, the outfitting of soldiers, cavalry and infantry officers, lodging of top-ranking officers, doukes, katepano, strategoι, judges and other tax gatherers, the provisioning and lodging of armies going to and returning from war, vestiaritai, mandators of the dromos who are escorting ambassadors or exiles, or passing through for any other reason, topoteretai, tourmarchai, merarchai, and anyone else entrusted with making inquiries into affairs of the fisc, compulsory labor and additional work, or any other imposition, whether mentioned [above] or omitted, whether existing at this moment or devised at a later time.

Since the aforesaid magistros petitioned my serenity to confirm as an act of munificence his gift of an endowment for this pious monastery, my pious majesty, agreeing that his request should not be disdained, orders that twelve nomismata be given to this monastery as an endowment at the time of paying the salary of the spatharokandidatoi. It is to receive this payment now and in perpetuity without any diminution or delay, and it is not to suffer either total confiscation or partial diminution at the hands of anyone.

Therefore, I command and confirm that all officials, at present or in the future, sakellarioi, genikoi logothetai and stratitikoï logothetai, the [officials in charge of] our sakelle and vestiarion, the stewards of the pious institutions, the officials in charge of the oikeiaka, and the ephoroi of the imperial curatories, the steward of [the convent of] Petria, the eidikoi, the directors of old age homes, the officials in charge of our divine treasury of Phylax, the curators of the house of Eleutheriou and Mangana, the oikistikoi, and their subordinates, the protonotarioi, the logariastai, the chartoularioi, notaries and imperial notaries, as well as the domestikoi ton scholon, doukes, katapano, strategoï and their representatives, taxiarchai, tourmarchai, merarchai, chartoularioi of the dromos and the themes, counts of the Court, domestikoi of the themes, droungarokometai, protokentarchoi, proleusimaioi and other officers of the tagmata and themes; and in addition judges, magistrates, strateutai, orthotai, registrars, protonotarioi, collectors of the synone, horeiarioi, and anyone else entrusted with government business, [p. 123] that no one at all, at any time or in any way, is to annul or invalidate any provision decreed here by my majesty, even if it is only a mere attempt, or to impose in any way or on any pretext any additional tax or increase or rectification on the aforesaid estates, or to harass and trouble them for the sake of the hypertimon, on account of the guarantee and security of this pious sealed chrysobull of mine issued in the month of April of the second indiction, in the year 6587 [= 1079 A.D.], to which my pious authority, chosen by God, has appended its signature.

The following properties are to be granted immunity: the house in Rhaidestos, the rental properties, that is the aule of Metaxas with . . . the house of Kentarchos [and] Arkolykes, as well as those acquired by exchange with the poet Kamarotes, the coastal properties and the others, the estate of Selokaka together with Makron Chorion and [the estate of] Bandophorus, the estate of Baboulou or Lips, the estate of Monokellion, the estate of Koukou, the estate of Symeoniou, the estate of Hai Tzachnistai, the estate of St. Helen or the village of Ano Siliou together with Thlabioi, the estate of Leuke of the Armenians, the estate of Phletra with its miraculous fountain, the houses at Selymbria with the estate, and the estates at Mesokomion.

[INV 12] [Dedication of additional books by the superior Michael]

The following books were donated or dedicated to the All-Merciful by the most honorable superior:

ELEVENTH CENTURY

The four Evangelists with a commentary [by the archbishop] of Bulgaria,⁴² that is, four books on paper. [p. 125]

Another book in paper containing at the beginning the commentary on this text of Chrysostom, “We do not wish you to be in ignorance concerning the dead” (I Thess. 4:13), and numerous other different commentaries.

Another small book, in parchment, containing the Schematologion.

+ Michael, the most insignificant monk and superior.+

[INV 13] Books from the property of the founders, presented after their death(s) by the executors
The book of the ascetical treatises by St. Basil.

The book of Pearls [by St. John Chrysostom].

A commentary of St. Basil on the prophet Isaiah.

A selection from the ascetical treatises of St. Basil by [Symeon] the Logothete.

The first volume of the Hexaemeros.

A volume in paper, for September and October, of [Symeon] Metaphrastes.

The book of St. Dionysios, in uncials.

The book of St. Dorotheos.

The Nomocanon, in uncials.

The Tetrabasileion, containing two Books of Kings and the Life of St. Andrew the Fool for Christ.

A Kontakarion, containing also the miracle at Pege.

The Antirrhetics of St. Basil against Eunomios.

[INV 14] [Books] acquired after the death of the founders

Two books of [Symeon] Metaphrastes, one with the first part of January, the other containing February, March and April. [p. 127]

Another Tetrabasileion, this one also containing two Books of Kings, Chronicles and Ezra, and another book, a Panegyrikon.

[INV 15] [Books] donated after the death of the founder by the monk, lord John, the spiritual father of our late master and founder:

A great Paterikon.

The first and second volumes of the commentary of [St. John] Chrysostom on the Gospel according to Matthew.

[INV 16] Books acquired later by purchase

19. ATTALEIATES

Lectionaries containing various readings, one containing at the beginning the text, “How do you feel about our situation?”⁴³ and the works of [Ps.-] Clement [of Rome], another bound in cloth, containing at the beginning the Life of St. Symeon.

Another book, donated by the protosynkellos, containing at the beginning a chronicle and Leukippe [and Clitophon by Achilles Tatius].

[INV 17] Other items acquired after the death of the founder Purchased items

Ten books of [Symeon] Metaphrastes, and a gospel lectionary with a wooden cover, purchased from the late magistros, lord Symeon Seth.

The second book of the commentary on John [by John Chrysostom] was also donated by the late lord Constantine Peribleptenos.

From the monk Gregory we received a book containing sticheraria with their notes, like a heirmologion.

Various objects in silver were bequeathed by the late Boutoumites, and a basin was donated by the late lord Niketas, which gifts we received, a gilded chalice and paten containing an image of the Crucifixion, [p. 129] weighing eight litrai, another silver-gilt chalice and paten, containing on the interior a cross and the inscription, “Take, eat,” an ithmos, asteriskos and spoon.

[INV 18] Objects donated by the late monk lord John, notary, mystikos and chamberlain
Silk cloth in three shades of yellow,⁴⁴ of which the background is purple, six spans long and five wide.

Another silk cloth, an altar cloth.

An embroidered cloth, of Saracen manufacture.

A silver reliquary (?)⁴⁵ containing a piece of the precious wood, two enameled angels, and below, the Mother of God, St. John the Theologian and SS. Constantine and Helen, all in cast gold; and the container is entirely of silver.

Another silk cloth in three shades of yellow, with a griffin in the middle and with borders and lining.⁴⁶

The podea of the All-Merciful.

Two other silk cloths, hangings for [St. John] the Holy Forerunner
. the one above of gleaming white in three shades, with borders and lining, the one below long and in three colors with borders in the style of Attaleia. [p. 130]⁴⁷

Two pairs of veils for chalices, one of kastrision (?) cloth and with gold crosses in the middle, the other of Saracen cloth A silver basin with gilded border on the rim, and silver chains, and a handle . . . donated by the late . . . anos, a pectoral of reversible (?) silk cloth⁴⁸

Also a gilded pot-shaped lamp, with an image of our Lady and the Incorporeal [Archangel], was donated for [the icon of] the Holy Forerunner by the late monk, lord Ignatios, or rather [it was donated] by his executors in accordance with his instructions . . . with an image of our Lady and the Incorporeal [Archangel] . . . five, and two silver icons with silver-gilt [and] bronze frame.

ELEVENTH CENTURY

In the eighth indiction of the year 6587 [= 1079 A.D.]⁴⁹ two books were also purchased for four nomismata, one a synaxarion for the entire year, [the other] a book of St. Ephraem.

Notes on the Translation

1. Eirenikos and Kale; see [16] and [31] below.
2. Probably Attaleia, hence his name Attaleiates; see Lemerle, Cinq études, p. 76, n. 8.
3. Constantinople.
4. Sophia; see [16] and [31] below.
5. In other words, God is satisfied with a small offering, even though what we offer him is not ours but his. Unlike God, however, we judge a gift by its size, despite the fact that the person who gives us this gift does a favor to us by offering something that is his, not ours.
6. John Chrysostom, Hom. 18.5 (PG 53–54, col. 156A).
7. September 23, 1063; see Lemerle, Cinq études, p. 77, n. 11.
8. For this individual, see Lemerle, Cinq études, p. 78, n. 17.
9. Defective reference; cf. [13], [17].
10. That is, in [7].
11. For this individual, see Lemerle, Cinq études, p. 82, n. 25; Nissen, Diataxis, p. 109, thought he was the husband of Euphrosyne, the aunt of Attaleiates' first wife Sophia, who is mentioned above in [4], [5].
12. For this foundation, see Janin, Géographie, vol. 3, p. 70.
13. Of Michael VII Doukas, Dölger, Regesten, no. 1005, included in the Rule below as [INV 10].
14. An episkopeion or episcopal see, which sort of foundation Alexios Studites, Hypomnema B' (1028) (R&P 5.25–32) (= Grumel, Regestes, no. 835), had attempted to exclude from participation in the charistike.
15. See C. Nicaen. II, c. 12 (R&P 2.592–93).
16. See [26] below.
17. Entrance gift (apotage) contrasted here with obedience (hypotage).
18. For this official, the urban prefect of Constantinople, see Alexander Kazhdan, "Eparch of the City," ODB, p. 705.
19. "Assent," cf. Gautier, "Diataxis," p. 68, who renders epineusis by "assentiment," and writes in n. 45 that he believes it has to do with the eparch's compensation for agreeing to try the case.
20. June 24.
21. hyper hyelion: As noted by both Lemerle (Cinq études, 107, n. 91) and Gautier ("Diataxis," 70, n. 49), the term hyelion ("a glass object") does not make sense in the present context. However, J. O. Rosenqvist, in a recently published article, argues that hyelion is used here to denote an inexpensive glass lamp, in the form of a small conical cup in which a layer of oil floated on water (cf. "Lamps for St Eugenios: A Note on Byzantine Glass," EranoS 92 [1994], 52–56). This is a plausible interpretation, especially if we choose to change the reading of the manuscript to hyper hyelion and translate "for small glass lamps." We wish to thank Alice-Mary Talbot for bringing this article to our attention just as this volume was going to press.
22. In [10] above; cf. [25], [33].
23. In [26] above.
24. This is a reference to the surviving isotype, now in the National Library, Athens, on which the text of this document is based.

19. ATTALEIATES

25. In [33] above.
26. In [35] above.
27. In [31] above.
28. See [13] above; cf. [30].
29. In [10] and [37] above.
30. Prayer of Ephraem Syrus, ed. J. Assemani, S. Ephraem Syri opera omnia, vol. 3 (Rome, 1746), p. 485.
31. See John Chrysostom, Liturgy, ed., F. E. Brightman, Liturgies Eastern and Western (London, 1896), p. 386.
32. hyelion ké: Rosenqvist (as in note 21 above, p. 55 and n. 28) expressed the view that hyelia also denoted lamps attached to icons, citing as evidence two items from the Inventory of Xylourgou on Mount Athos published in the Acts of the Monastery of Saint Panteleemon, where hyailia (sic) are identified by the editors as lamps (cf. Lemerle, Actes de Saint-Pantéléémôn, no. 7, lines 16 and 22 with commentary on p. 69). However, a careful perusal of the text of this document shows that the hyailia in question were not lamps but paste gems. In the first instance (lines 15–16), 18 hyailia are cited as part of the decoration of the cover of a reliquary together with tiny pearls. While in the second instance (lines 21–22), hyailia are found on the frame of an icon. For other examples of the term hyelia as decorative stones on icons and crosses, see (27) Kecharitomene, Appendix B. It must also be noted that Gautier translates hyelia as “cabochons” (cf. “Diataxis,” 90).
33. For his other benefactions, see [INV 6], [INV 7], [INV 8], [INV 15] and [INV 18] below; the year of this donation is probably 1085.
34. Probably a book entitled On the Cross by Alexander the Monk, for whom, see Alexander Kazhdan, “Alexander the Monk,” ODB, p. 60.
35. diblattion; on the meaning of diblattion and triblattion, see D. Jacoby, “Silk in Western Byzantium before the Fourth Crusade,” BZ 84/85 (1991/92), p. 458, n. 29.
36. meta periphoreion esophoreion: Gautier (“Diataxis,” p. 97) tentatively translates “aux bordures et au fond de couleur pistache”
37. Nikephoros Mauros, nominated for the patriarchate by Nikephoros III Botaneiates between 1078 and 1081; see Gautier, “Diataxis,” p. 98, n. 50.
38. The individuals named are Nikephoros Mauros, Theodora Komnene, her mother Anna Dalassena, and the kouropalates Constantine Diogenes († 1074/75); see Gautier, “Diataxis,” p. 100, n. 52, and Lemerle, Cinq études, p. 91, n. 47.
39. Read heauton for heauten.
40. Mercenaries cited in eleventh century chrysobulls and tentatively identified with Kolbiagi of the Russkaja Pravda. See A. P. Kazhdan and Anne Wharton Epstein, Change in Byzantine Culture in the Eleventh and Twelfth Centuries (Berkeley, 1985), pp. 173, 257.
41. This chrysobull utilizes portions of the text of the preceding chrysobull of Michael VII ([INV 11]); the borrowings are indicated in boldface type.
42. Theophylaktos of Bulgaria, archbishop of Ochrid; see Lemerle, Cinq études, p. 91, nn. 48–49, and p. 97.
43. Gregory Nazianzen, Homilia 42 (PG 36, col. 457).
44. blattion kitrinotriblatton.
45. proseuchadion; for the various meanings of this term, see Gautier, “Diataxis,” p. 88, n. 7.
46. See note 36 above.
47. From this point on, the text is not well established because of the deteriorated condition of the manuscript.
48. blattion diphoton; the latter is not in the dictionaries. It may refer to reversible fabric, usually called diprosopon. See Koukoules, BBP, v. 2.2, p. 33.
49. The indiction and the year do not coincide.

ELEVENTH CENTURY

Document Notes

- [1] Founder's autobiography. For Attaleiates' career, see Gautier, "Diataxis," pp. 11–16, and Lemerle, Cinq études, pp. 76–77.
- [2] Motivation for the foundation. See summary by Lemerle, Cinq études, p. 77.
- [3] Status of the consecrated property. Note that only a portion of Attaleiates' property is being consecrated at this time; see below [17], cf. [16]. See also summary of this section by Lemerle, Cinq études, p. 77.
- [4] The Poorhouse at Rhaidestos. As Lemerle, Cinq études, p. 77, n. 10, notes, it was important for Attaleiates to establish that he had engaged to buy the Rhaidestos property from Euphrosyne before she was tonsured to exclude any claim her convent might have on it. See summary by Lemerle, pp. 77–78.
- [5] Attaleiates' house in Constantinople. Attaleiates obtained this property in the settlement of the estate of his late wife Sophia; see [1] above. Another property is reserved. See summary by Lemerle, Cinq études, pp. 78–79.
- [6] The Church of Christ All-Merciful. For this foundation, see Janin, Géographie, vol. 3, pp. 512–13. This church is united administratively with the Poorhouse at Rhaidestos; see (38) Kellibara I [13] for another example of the administrative unification of two geographically separated ecclesiastical institutions. See also summary by Lemerle, Cinq études, p. 79.
- [7] Appeal for divine protection; warning to transgressors. See also [14], [15] below. (10) Eleousa [18] provides another example of attribution of ownership to a heavenly patron. Attaleiates anticipates and seeks to avert another confiscation of ecclesiastical property like that carried out by Isaac I Komnenos (1057–1059), which he himself describes in his Historia, ed. I. Bekker, CSHB (Bonn, 1853), pp. 60–62. See also summary of this section by Lemerle, Cinq études, p. 79.
- [8] Curse on transgressors. See similar curses in (8) John Xenos [2], (9) Galesios [246], (10) Eleousa [19], (16) Mount Tmolos [5], (17) Nikon Metanoieite [5], (22) Evergetis [12], (24) Christodoulos [B14] as well as in [23] below. Attaleiates, aware of his intent to appoint Theodore as protector below in [12], makes an exception for his own appointees. He is unwilling to permit even a liturgical commemoration (anaphora) of the local prelate for fear that might lead to a later claim of ownership; cf. (10) Eleousa [16], [18]. Lemerle, Cinq études, p. 79, summarizes.
- [9] Blessing for supporters of the Rule; recapitulation of prohibitions. This is Attaleiates' personal restatement of [8] above. The appeal to the legal inviolability of a testator's will is also found much later in (37) Auxentios [15] and (40) Anargyroi [1]. His assertion of canonical support for this premise, however, is naive or disingenuous (see discussion below, Chapter Seven, Historical Context). The list of potential violators will be repeated below in [14]. Lemerle, Cinq études, pp. 79–80, summarizes this section.
- [10] Designation of Theodore as protector; line of succession. Theodore is to enjoy the rights of a traditional patron; he is unaccountable and irremovable. Attaleiates sets grounds for deposition for others. Succession is by primogeniture, provided the candidate possesses the appropriate personal qualifications for the office. Women are eligible for the office in default of male heirs; collateral relatives are excluded here from the succession, but see [13] below. Note precautions against treating the foundation as an ordinary piece of personal property, in line with the reform opinion quoted here that "that which has once been consecrated to God cannot be shared," for which see (22) Evergetis [19]. The mild treatment prescribed for Theodore in the event he is discovered to have been dishonest is repeated in [33] and [37] below. The requirement to repay disputed sums here is doubled below in [25] for other heirs and in [37] for Theodore also. Lemerle, Cinq études, p. 80, summarizes this section.
- [11] Celebration of the offices. Note the change in plan for staffing the church with monks rather than secular clergy which is also reflected in [13] below. For Attaleiates' less than enthusiastic view of monks, see Kazhdan and Franklin, Studies, p. 76. Lemerle, Cinq études, p. 80, summarizes this section.
- [12] Subordination of officials to the protector; union of the monastery with the poorhouse. See also [6] above, and the terms of union in (58) Kellibara I [14]. Lemerle, Cinq études, p. 80 summarizes.
- [13] Alternate line of succession. Here Attaleiates sets conditions and terms for the succession to the ephoreia of the collateral relatives whom he had earlier excluded in [10]; see also [43] below. Lemerle, Cinq études, pp. 80–81, summarizes.

19. ATTALEIATES

- [14] Provision for institutional independence. This section is a later insertion, as the defective reference to the discussion of the extinction of Attaleiates' family line, which is actually mentioned first in [17], demonstrates. Attaleiates envisions a pre-existing privilege of independence and autonomy (cf. the description in [13] above of the poorhouse as "autonomous") that would come into effect only conditionally. As Lemerle, Cinq études, p. 81, n. 24, cf. 103–5, rightly observes, Attaleiates' views on the future status of his foundation were in the process of development during the editing of his Rule. The prohibitions on donation or subordination of the foundation are boilerplate material, which Attaleiates has used previously in [9] above; cf. (27) Kecharitomene [1].
- [15] Heavenly protectors and patrons. This section is an elaboration of [7] above, with more patrons added here.
- [16] List of consecrated properties. These are listed below in the inventory in [INV 9]. This section summarized by Lemerle, Cinq études, pp. 81–82; see also his discussion of Attaleiates' estate, pp. 101–2.
- [17] Hereditary transmission of other personal properties. The rules under which these properties might be utilized for dowries, inheritances, etc. are more liberal than those found in [10] above for the consecrated properties. In [46] below, Attaleiates was to revisit his provision for the inheritance of these properties by the foundation in the event of the extinction of his family line. Summarized by Lemerle, Cinq études, p. 82; cf. 102.
- [18] Charitable distributions at the monastery in Constantinople. See discussion of the benefactions in Lemerle, Cinq études, p. 82, 106–7, 108.
- [19] Charitable distributions at the poorhouse in Rhaidestos. See discussion of the benefactions in Lemerle, Cinq études, pp. 82–83, 106, 108. See [30] below for similar donations for the purpose of liturgical commemoration from which Attaleiates expected his own foundation to benefit. Among the beneficiary institutions here are the monastery of St. George and the convent of St. Prokopios, of which Attaleiates was charistikarios; the foundation was to inherit his financial obligations to these institutions. According to Alexios Studites, Hypomnema A' (1027) (R&P 5.20–24) (= Grumel, Regestes, no. 833), a male charistikarios was not supposed to rule over a convent, as Attaleiates evidently does here.
- [20] Construction of a hostel for pilgrims; other charitable distributions. Summarized in Lemerle, Cinq études, p. 83. See (21) Roidion [B2], (34) Machairas [116], [118], (42) Sabas [8], and (45) Neophytos [10], [20] for provisions for pilgrims elsewhere.
- [21] Regulation of the life of the monks. See also [32] below. There seems to be an allusion to a lost liturgical typikon here; so Lemerle, Cinq études, p. 85.
- [22] Inalienability of consecrated property. Attaleiates reaffirms his earlier prohibitions [7], [14] on the alienation of the entire foundation and here extends the restrictions to cover the foundation's immovable properties; the provisions are based on a literal application of the principles of canon law that were generally being disregarded in the eleventh century.
- [23] Duties of the property administrator. This official is probably not the steward, whose duties are discussed in [41] below, but rather a subordinate, possibly a layman; cf. (22) Evergetis [34], (27) Kecharitomene [31], (29) Kosmosoteira [40], (30) Phoberos [49], and (34) Machairas [109]. Attaleiates reuses the curse employed above in [8] again here.
- [24] Use of surplus income from the founder's properties. The custom of maintaining a reserve fund, though condemned long ago by (3) Theodore Studites [21], returns to favor in this era: see (23) Pakourianos [26], (27) Kecharitomene [24], and (29) Kosmosoteira [94]. Attaleiates explicitly permits Theodore and his heirs to retain two-thirds of the foundation's excess income, doubtless a common practice under the traditional regime of private patronage but one that would not long stand the scrutiny of the monastic reform movement. In [37] below, Attaleiates provides for an amendment of this provision in the event of the deposition of his last heir for dishonesty. See summary of this section in Lemerle, Cinq études, p. 83.

ELEVENTH CENTURY

- [25] Punishment of transgressors. This section is primarily concerned with internal corruption by the monastery's own officials. The earlier requirement in [10] above that Attaleiates' heirs should be obliged to make amends for actions harmful to the foundation's interests is strengthened here to a double repayment of deficits. The entitlement of violators to three warnings is reaffirmed in [37] below. See summary of this section in Lemerle, Cinq études, p. 84.
- [26] Appointment of the superior and other officials. Theodore's option to rule the foundation directly without appointing a superior, alluded to in [24] above, is discussed directly here. The resolution of disputed elections is somewhat like procedures found in (27) Kecharitomene [11], (32) Mamas [1], and (33) Heliou Bomon [1]; see also its endorsement in [38] below. The importance of humility in the choice of a superior is discussed again below in [29].
- [27] Number of monks. (9) Galesios [246], (10) Eleousa [5], (13) Ath. Typikon [37], (16) Mount Tmolos [1], and (17) Nikon Metanoieite [5] also limit the number of monks, but not (22) Evergetis [23]. For an example of an increase subsequent to a monastery's foundation, see (57) Bebaia Elpis [146]. See Dölger, "Zahlenmystik," pp. 183–89, for a discussion of the significance of the number seven. See summary of this section in Lemerle, Cinq études, p. 84.
- [28] Entrance gifts not required. See also [29], [30] below. These had already come under critical scrutiny in (13) Ath. Typikon [49] out of a concern, as here, for their disciplinary impact on the donors. The classic resolution of the reform movement, (22) Evergetis [37], reaches a similar conclusion to that of Attaleiates here, permitting but not requiring postulants to make such gifts.
- [29] Disciplinary regulations. Note the pairing of liturgical service and manual labor, soon to be rare in other institutions in which these responsibilities were performed by different groups of monks, e.g. in (22) Evergetis [7], [33] and (29) Kosmosoteira [3]. The discussion of personal humility as an essential attribute for the foundation's superior seems misplaced. See summary in Lemerle, Cinq études, p. 84.
- [30] Other sanctioned sources of income; requirements for tonsure. Attaleiates' title is not representative of the actual contents of this section. For sales of living allowances (siteresia) by monastic institutions, see H. Monnier and G. Platon, "La Meditatio de nudis pactis," Nouvelle revue historique de droit français et étranger 37 (1913), 334–36. (23) Pakourianos [20], a reform document, prescribes a more selective approach to accepting prosenexeis for liturgical commemorations than Attaleiates adopts here. For other views on the acceptability of a xenokourites, a monk tonsured outside the monastery, see (13) Ath. Typikon [24] ff., (22) Evergetis [37], and (27) Kecharitomene [54]. Attaleiates' requirement that his monks be eunuchs is a remarkable contrast to Athonite tradition that was exceptionally hostile to them: see (12) Tzimiskes [7], (13) Ath. Typikon [48], and (15) Constantine IX [1]. See summary of this section in Lemerle, Cinq études, pp. 84–85.
- [31] Required commemorations. Sophia and Irene were Attaleiates' two wives; see Lemerle, Cinq études, p. 85, n. 30. For namesakes and relatives of Attaleiates, see Kazhdan and Franklin, Studies, p. 58.
- [32] Performance of the offices. This section returns briefly to the subject of [21] above, identifying the liturgical typikon as being of Attaleiates' own composition, perhaps in the sense that (11) Ath. Typikon is vis-à-vis (4) Stoudios. The actual model is unknown.
- [33] Monks' allowance and pension. The actual payments are specified in [35] below. The custom of paying allowances to monks, eclipsed for a time by the militantly cenobitic stance of the monastic reform movement (for which see (22) Evergetis [22]), returns again in the mid-twelfth century in (32) Mamas [28] and (33) Heliou Bomon [28] in the form of allowances for clothing and bathing. The provision for the reading of the Rule (see also [40] below) will become a commonplace in typika of the reform era: see (22) Evergetis [43] and related documents. The provision for mild treatment of Theodore even if he is found to be corrupt reiterates [10] above, and will be confirmed in [37] below. See summary of Lemerle, Cinq études, p. 85.
- [34] Procedure to be followed in responding to lawsuits. See the introduction to (15) Constantine IX and (23) Pakourianos [18] for the debilitating involvement of religious institutions in lawsuits. Attaleiates offers a consideration to the eparch to influence a favorable outcome in the resolution of any future

19. ATTALEIATES

- lawsuit against the foundation. See also [38] below, in which the assistance of the eparch is invoked to prevent the superior of the Stoudios monastery from establishing an unauthorized ephoreia over the foundation, should it chance to become independent, and [43], which appeals for imperial assistance in the event of a lawsuit over the foundation's status.
- [35] Specifications for the monks' allowances. Attaleiates returns here to the subject of [33] above. See discussion in Lemerle, Cinq études, p. 107, 108, cf. 85.
- [36] Expenses for feast days. Cf. similar provisions for festal observances in (10) Eleousa [13], (17) Nikon Metanoëite [13], (22) Evergetis [11], and (23) Pakourianos [11].
- [37] Re-examination of the treatment of dishonest heirs. Likely in response to objections from his relatives, Attaleiates here revisits his earlier treatment of this issue in [10], cf. [25], [33]. In agreement with [25], he extends the benefit of three (here, written) warnings to an heir accused of dishonesty; he indicates that the foundation's conditional self-governance (for which see [14]) should come into effect if the heir being removed from the ephoreia is the sole survivor of the founder's line, but in that event the deposed heir is to receive half the foundation's surplus revenues, thereby amending [24]; and as in [33], cf. [10] he restates Theodore's immunity from expulsion, but now subjects him to the double repayment provision previously imposed [25] on his other heirs. See summary by Lemerle, Cinq études, p. 86.
- [38] Re-examination of issues regarding the foundation's self-governance. Attaleiates deals here with some of the likely consequences should his foundation achieve independent status under the terms discussed above in [14]. The superior of the Stoudios monastery is given the right to bless the newly elected superior of Attaleiates' foundation that rightly should have belonged to the local ordinary, the patriarch of Constantinople; cf. (28) Pantokrator [25] where this right (of sphragis) is in fact conceded by a later founder, Emperor John II Komnenos. Attaleiates provides a compensation for the Studite superior's service in this connection below in [41]. The founder's profound anxiety about the slim prospects for his foundation maintaining its independence as a self-governing institution is quite palpable here. See summary of this section by Lemerle, Cinq études, p. 86.
- [39] Treatment of dependent peasants and tenants. For similar sentiments, see (9) Galesios [246], (17) Nikon Metanoëite [14], (23) Pakourianos [1], (24) Christodoulos [A13], and (29) Kosmosoteira [71], [76], [103].
- [40] Security for title deeds and other documents; reading of the Rule. In the absence of patronal families, independent monasteries in the reform tradition would have even more reason to be concerned about the preservation of foundation documents: see (32) Mamas [Second Semeioma] for the most elaborate precautions taken in the twelfth century. Although the term typikon is used here, this is a reference to the Rule, not the liturgical typikon mentioned above in [21], [32], as the contextual association with the distribution of the monks' salaries, described above in [33], makes clear. The provision for reading this document is an elaboration of the requirement in [33]; cf. (22) Evergetis [43]'s requirement of a monthly reading of its typikon.
- [41] Instructions for the steward. Attaleiates amends [35] above to make a special provision for the foundation's chief financial officer; he also includes here a provision for a gratuity to the Studite superior that he had overlooked in [38] above.
- [42] Pension for servants of departed monks. Personal servants, banned by fervently reformist (22) Evergetis [24], make a reappearance in the aristocratic (27) Kecharitomene [4], [5], (28) Pantokrator [19], [28], and (29) Kosmosoteira [3].
- [43] Warning to those initiating legal proceedings against the foundation. Returning to the discussion of possible lawsuits against the foundation (see above, [34]), Attaleiates here invokes imperial assistance in return for the performance of a daily trisagion (see above, [31]). Attaleiates' reference to a prior chapter concerning his collateral relatives is problematic, since [13] does not provide for their right to be tonsured, but perhaps the author is thinking of [30] here also.
- [44] Provision for recording a future imperial chrysobull. Attaleiates' hope for another chrysobull was realized when he was granted one by Nikephoros III Botaneiates (= Dölger, Regesten, no. 1042) in 1079, two years after the Rule was drawn up; see [INV 11] below.

ELEVENTH CENTURY

- [45] Conclusion. Attaleiates' original signature is affixed to the isotype here and also at the end of [46] below; see Lemerle, Cinq études, p. 70.
- [46] Clarification of certain provisions. Since Attaleiates signs this section separately, it must have been added subsequent to the earlier part of the document, i.e., sometime after May 1077. For the third time (see also [10], [37] above) Attaleiates reaffirms the eligibility of a woman for the ephoreia, suggesting some resistance to the idea, but here he indicates that the responsibilities of the office would actually be carried out by a male relative or servant. No doubt in response to another objection from his relatives (see also [37] above), Attaleiates here revisits his provision in [17] that the non-consecrated family properties should be inherited by the foundation if his heirs should die childless; here he restores ordinary rights of donation or testamentary bequest.
- [INV 4] Instructions for commemoration of donors. See the offerings of the praipositos John [INV 5], [INV 6], [INV 7], [INV 8], [INV 15], [INV 18]; the foundation's superior Michael [INV 7], [INV 12]; Nikephoros, Patriarch of Antioch [INV 9]; the nun Xene Komnene and her mother Anna [INV 9]; an anonymous protosynkellos [INV 16]; and five other benefactors [INV 17]; for commemorations established earlier, see [31] above.
- [INV 5] List of icons. See discussion by Gautier, "Diataxis," pp. 88–90, nn. 6–16.
- [INV 6] The sacred vessels. See discussion by Gautier, "Diataxis," p. 90, nn. 18–20.
- [INV 7] The books. See Gautier, "Diataxis," pp. 92–96, nn. 21–40, for identifications of these works.
- [INV 8] The textiles. See Gautier, "Diataxis," pp. 96–98, nn. 43–45.
- [INV 9] List of properties. Cf. discussion of these properties in [4], [5], and [16] above.
- [INV 10] Chrysobull of Michael VII Doukas = Dölger, Regesten, no. 1005; a detailed commentary on this and the following chrysobull lies outside the scope of our project.
- [INV 11] Chrysobull of Nikephoros III Botaneiates = Dölger, Regesten, no. 1042.
- [INV 12] Dedication of additional books by the superior Michael. For identification of these books, see Gautier, "Diataxis," pp. 122–24, nn. 37–38.
- [INV 13] Books from the estate of the founders. The use of the plural indicates the decease of both Attaleiates and his son Theodore at the time this record was made. See Gautier, "Diataxis," p. 124, nn. 39–47, for the identification of these books.
- [INV 14] Books acquired after the deaths of the founders. The distinction from [INV 13] perhaps implies that these were donated by other benefactors.
- [INV 15] Books donated by the founder's spiritual father John. For his other bequests, see [INV 5], [INV 6], [INV 7], and [INV 8] above and [INV 18] below. According to the note at the end of [INV 7], the record of this bequest was moved here because there was insufficient room there.
- [INV 16] Books acquired later by purchase. See also [INV 17] below, and note confusion in both between donations and purchases. The record is said to have been placed here for lack of space in [INV 7].
- [INV 17] Other items acquired after the death of the founder. The record of a donation by (Manuel) Boutoumites, known to have been sent on a diplomatic mission in 1111/12, suggests that this section is considerably later than the core document; see Gautier, "Diataxis," p. 126, n. 53.
- [INV 18] Objects donated by the monk John. See Lemerle, Cinq études, p. 90, n. 42, for the identification of this individual with John the praipositos mentioned above as a donor in [INV 5], [INV 6], [INV 7], [INV 8], and [15]; these perhaps are his testamentary bequests.

20. Black Mountain: Regulations of Nikon of the Black Mountain

Date: ca. 1055–1060¹

Translator: Robert Allison

Edition employed: Vladimir Benešević, Taktikon Nikona Chernogortsa (Petrograd, 1917), pp. 22–67.

Manuscript: Codex Sinaiticus graecus 441 (St. Catherine’s Monastery)

Other translations: Arabic, Slavonic²

Biography of the Author

A. His Career

Nikon’s life is known solely through autobiographical allusions found in his works.³ He was born in Constantinople to a noble family, circa 1025. Military service was his first career. He advanced to the leadership of an army under Constantine IX Monomachos (1042–1055). Subsequently he embraced a monastic career which he pursued for the remaining fifty years of his life. He was tonsured by Luke, a former metropolitan of Anazarbos and founder of a monastery of 150 monks on the Black Mountain adjacent to the Amanos River north of Antioch. Although Luke intended for Nikon to be his successor, Nikon’s attempt to tighten monastic discipline led to his expulsion from the monastery by its monks after Luke’s death. He had received ordination from Theodosios III, patriarch of Antioch (1057–1059), who assigned him the responsibility of instituting a reform of the monks of North Syria and subordinating them to the local bishops. Nikon refused, however, Theodosios III’s offer of the title of archimandrite of the Antiochean monasteries. Sometime during the long patriarchal interregnum (1059–1089), Nikon had his mission confirmed by the exarchs (proexarchontes) of the Antiochene patriarchate.

Nikon attempted to found his own monastery for which he composed a typikon, but this attempt was unsuccessful and the community dispersed. Nikon then joined the monastery of St. Symeon the Younger, but when the Seljuks under Suleiman took Antioch in 1084, he sought refuge in the monastery of the Mother of God tou Roidiou, “of the Pomegranate,” located in territory inhabited by the Tzatoi, Chalcedonian Armenians. Nikon lived to see the conquest of Antioch by the Crusaders in 1098, and knew Patriarch John V the Oxite. He died in the first decade of the twelfth century, either at the monastery of St. Symeon (so Nasrallah, “Auteur antiochien,” p. 152) or at Roidion (Solignac, “Nicon,” col. 319).

B. His Works

Nikon authored three surviving works, the Interpretations of the Commands of the Lord (also known as the Pandektes), the Small Book, and the Taktikon.⁴ The first work was a florilegium of quotations from Scripture, patristic literature, and canon law in 63 chapters, composed as a “work of youth” as Nikon himself describes it, during the reign of Constantine X Doukas (1059–1067).⁵ Nikon refers to this work frequently in (20) Black Mountain below, but the only earlier monastic foundation document he cites in the Pandektes is (3) Theodore Studites.⁶ Carlo de Clercq studied the Pandektes extensively, but there has never been a complete edition based on the surviving manuscripts, which are mostly in the Bibliothèque Nationale in Paris.⁷ Nikon cites as the model for this work the Pandektes of Antiochos, a seventh-century monk of the Sabas monastery in Jerusalem. Nikon’s own Pandektes were translated into Arabic, perhaps during the lifetime of the author, and enjoyed a wide circulation in this format. In the thirteenth or fourteenth century, they were translated into Slavonic (along with the Taktikon), and in 1582 an Ethiopic version was prepared as well. Nikon himself prepared an abridgement⁸ of this substantial work as well as a list of the titles of its 63 chapters.⁹

Nikon’s second work was his Taktikon,¹⁰ a collection of forty chapters the first two of which are monastic typika, our (20) Black Mountain and (21) Roidion. There is also an Arabic version, but neither it nor the original Greek text preserved in a manuscript in the St. Catherine’s monastery on Mount Sinai has been completely edited. Judging from the testimony of (20) Black Mountain [70], Nikon composed the first of the two typika for a monastery on Black Mountain, either his mentor Luke’s monastery or, more likely, his own unsuccessful foundation in the same general location. The third chapter of Nikon’s Taktikon is actually a long extract from the last chapter of his Pandektes, while the remaining thirty-seven chapters are composed of Nikon’s correspondence on monastic subjects to the superiors of various Antiochene monasteries. The Taktikon bears no date, but the collection was probably assembled from earlier materials at the end of the eleventh or the beginning of the twelfth century (so Nasrallah, “Auteur antiochien,” p. 156), since it mentions Patriarch John the Oxite (1089–1100), the First Crusade, and the restoration of the monastery of St. Symeon, which had been sacked by the Seljuks in 1085 and rebuilt only after the Crusader conquest of Antioch in 1098. The Arabic version of Nikon’s Taktikon must have been prepared before the capture of Antioch and the destruction of its monasteries by the Mamluk Sultan Baybars in 1268. Like the Pandektes, the Taktikon was translated into Slavonic and eventually edited with them by Pochaev in 1795 and by Edinovercy in 1889.¹¹

Nikon’s third work, his Small Book, was composed in 1088. It is a treatise on six different subjects of ecclesiastical discipline, with a special emphasis on the proper subordination of monasteries to local bishops. It is preserved, unedited, in the same Greek manuscript from Mount Sinai that contains the Taktikon and in the two Arabic manuscripts that preserve the Arabic version of the Taktikon.¹²

As H.-G. Beck noted more than thirty years ago, “An exacting study of [Nikon’s] collected works appears to be one of the most important desiderata of Byzantine canonical studies.”¹³ Such a study can be expected to make possible a much more detailed and nuanced appreciation of the context and significance of Nikon’s two monastic foundation documents presented here in our collection.

Analysis

In this document, Nikon’s concerns are primarily those of the author of a liturgical typikon, namely the regulation of the institution’s religious services and the diet of the monks. Yet like (4) Stoudios, one of Nikon's acknowledged models [23], this is a composite text containing important elements of disciplinary legislation as well.

A. A Unique Approach to Monastic Legislation

To a greater extent than any other author in our collection of Byzantine monastic foundation documents, Nikon lacked that characteristic self-confidence that inspired many other founders to legislate for their foundations virtually unrestrained by canon or imperial law, by patristic tradition, or even (to a large extent) by the customary observances of other prestigious monasteries of their own times. This is not to say that other founders did not use some or all of these authorities to implement, express or justify their own very personal visions of how monastic life should be conducted. Insofar as they embraced any external observances, however, these were generally voluntary in nature. Moreover, no monastic document was immune from extensive adaptation to fit its borrower's needs, not even (4) Stoudios, a lengthy, ritualized, primarily liturgical typikon, a version of which Athanasios the Athonite employed—with significant changes—in his composition of (11) Ath. Rule.

With Nikon of the Black Mountain, however, we have a very different type of founder. The extent of his citation of prior authorities is truly extraordinary. His typikon is the first of our documents to cite (and not merely allude to) canon law, and Nikon demonstrates a fairly broad knowledge of the patristic tradition, far beyond the superficial acquaintance with Basilian and perhaps a few other sources shown earlier by the authors of (3) Theodore Studites and (13) Ath. Typikon.

1. Research Orientation

Nikon had laid the groundwork for the approach taken in this typikon by his authorship of his Pandektes or—as he prefers to refer to them here—the Interpretations of the Commands of the Lord. Taking full advantage of his background, Nikon approached the task of writing a typikon like none other before him, committed to shaping an institution to fit precedent rather than his own idiosyncratic wishes. One might almost say that his approach is a scholarly one. For instance, careful comparison made him aware of differences between the Studite liturgical typikon, (4) Stoudios, and that of the Sabas monastery near Jerusalem.¹⁴ Although he indicates [22] his preference for the latter, he asserts [23], cf. [29] the necessity of keeping both typika on hand, in order “to keep the tradition of the holy fathers firmly in all respects.” He is also the first of our founders to prescribe [29] a specific reading list for his monks, including the above-mentioned typika, Basil of Caesarea's Ascetic Treatises, conciliar decrees, the Life of Pachomios, and naturally also his own Interpretations of the Commands of the Lord. Nikon particularly recommends [51] his own earlier work for the regulation of diet, a topic about which he was almost obsessively concerned.

2. Textual Approach to Resolving Controversies

In Nikon's textual approach to determining appropriate monastic observances, he attempts first to find scriptural, then patristic support for practices to endorse; in default of these, he falls back on the rules of various prestigious monasteries, especially Jerusalem (i.e., Sabas), Stoudios, and Athos (by which he means (11) Ath. Rule). Remarkably, he is even willing to see his own instructions set aside [88], [92] should anyone come up with another observance founded on better authority. This document then presumes that its authority derives not from the arbitrary will of the author, based ultimately on private property rights in the foundation, but from his well-researched presentation and reconciliation of holy scripture, the ascetic tradition, and other sources.

3. Openness to New Discoveries

Because Nikon recognized the inconclusiveness of his research, he was willing to allow the pronouncements of his typikon to remain tentative rather than definitive. For instance, in a discussion of the number of times the blessing of the water should take place at the feast of the Holy Epiphany, Nikon observes [92] a difference between the prescriptions of older typika (including those of Stoudios and Jerusalem) and monastic practice in his own day. Nikon's instinct was to resolve the difference by seeking an authoritative scriptural precedent, but he found nothing useful. Yet, illustrating the tentative nature of his work, Nikon announces his willingness to be corrected "if any among those who are painstaking finds scriptural witness concerning this . . . because to imitate a practice in divergence from divine scripture brings great danger."

On the topic of required feast days Nikon admits [53] that the rules of contemporary monasteries do not agree with the "sacred rules of the holy fathers" or "other teachers in the holy scriptures" or "any other canonical writing." Faced with a lack of authoritative guidance, Nikon was willing to declare, "let what is pleasing to God be done." In [63], Nikon discusses another conflict among various sources including canon law, the patristic tradition, and medieval Byzantine typika on the diet for Holy Thursday. In this instance Nikon does not even attempt a reconciliation of the divergent tradition but contents himself with recording it "so that our conscience may not be sullied at all in either case."

Perhaps most revealing is how Nikon chose [87] to deal with a controversy over the legitimacy of a fast of the Mother of God before the feast of the Dormition which he had defended in his Interpretations. In his resolution, Nikon shows [88] an open-mindedness not found among other monastic legislators, declaring that if any patristic testimony should be adduced forbidding the observance of this fast, he was willing to see it abandoned, since "it is wrong and inappropriate and moreover dangerous to disregard what has been written down and ordained by the holy fathers, and without scriptural testimony to obey men and to wander hither and thither each according to his own desires."

4. Identification of Local with Comprehensive Precedents

Despite his respect for precedent in laying down monastic legislation, Nikon's approach did not completely eliminate his personal preferences. In [84], for instance, he grants special status to the teachings and traditions of Symeon the Wonderworker (in whose monastery he would later live for a time) "since we have our dwelling in his country and place." Continuing this local particularism, his monks are told "not to introduce other fathers and teachers from any other country over him." By contrast, of the teachings of Gelasios in the Paterikon, Nikon declares "if they are appropriate at all, they are appropriate not to us but to others." His justification here and elsewhere is based on a careful distinction between what he calls "comprehensive" as opposed to the merely "particular" precedents which he asserts he has observed also in his Interpretations. He claims to have taken similar pains to exclude from this typikon "sources that are particular and special," in preference for “such as are harmonious with the commands of the Lord, like the above-mentioned book (i.e., the Pandektes).”

20. BLACK MOUNTAIN

5. Significance of Nikon’s Approach

Nikon then was a pioneer in the use of what he chose to regard as authoritative precedents to govern the life of his monastic foundation. Since these sources did not in fact constitute a coherent and consistent body of monastic legislation and many dated from the very different world of late antiquity, Nikon not surprisingly faced considerable difficulty attempting to reconcile them with one another and with the practices of his own times. He approached this difficulty with a tentativeness and a degree of open-mindedness. In the following centuries other founders would broaden the range of sources that they drew upon as precedents and increase the frequency of their use, but, unlike Nikon, they would employ them in a more traditional fashion in a subordinate, supportive role. Moreover, none of these later founders would be so willing to set aside a personal patronal vision as readily as Nikon did in the composition of this document.

B. Lives of the Monks

1. Liturgical Duties

The regulation of liturgical duties was the most important concern of this document. As noted above, he prefers the usages of the liturgical typikon of the Sabas monastery to those in the Studite typikon, (4) Stoudios. Alone among the documents in this collection, this typikon offers a liturgical calendar (following [89]) which lists feasts of great, medium and minor rank. Nikon also provides a more thorough treatment of the canonical hours [8]–[20] than is found in earlier documents such as (4) Stoudios or (11) Ath. Rule.¹⁵

2. Manual Labor

Nikon obliges [82] all his monks to work at some skilled craft or else at heavy manual labor. This is a very strong endorsement of the practice of manual labor in the context of contemporary documents in which generally only certain monks were so engaged on a regular basis. Those monks assigned here to heavy labors were limited [79] to fewer hours of work than those working at less physically demanding tasks. The superior was to set aside [80] a cell for pursuit of crafts where the monks were to work under a supervisor. Nikon also endorses [83] the pursuit of individual crafts. In an acknowledged imitation of ancient patristic practice, the superior was to rotate [78] work assignments in the kitchen on a monthly basis.

3. Sacramental Life

Regular celebrations of the holy liturgy were to take place [30] on Saturdays and Sundays, but Nikon also provides for liturgies for all the great, medium, and minor feasts in his liturgical calendar. It was evidently not expected [73] that everyone would partake of communion at each of these liturgies, but Nikon provides no guidelines for reception.

4. Cenobitic Lifestyle

This was a cenobitical institution in which recitation of psalms and partaking of meals was to occur in common rather than in individual cells.¹⁶ Nikon encourages [28] private devotional observances, however. Monastic poverty is exalted [84] as an ideal, based on Nikon's findings in his Pandektes.

5. Diet

The dietary regulation is the most extensive found in any of the Byzantine monastic foundation documents. The usages are conservative and partial to more ascetic interpretations, like those of (30) Phoberos, though less so than those of (43) Kasoulon. Only (30) Phoberos and the present document endorse [87] the fast of the Mother of God in early August before the feast of the Dormition. Generally speaking, the typika of the later reform monasteries, starting with (22) Evergetis, permit their monks more lenient diets than that endorsed [58], [59], [60] by Nikon here. Unlike the author of (23) Pakourianos [15], Nikon encourages [72] his monks here to undertake fasting more rigorous than that required by the monastery's rules.

6. Clothing

As in (4) Stoudios [A37], [B38], there are specific provisions for articles of clothing. Generally the principle to be followed [75] was that of Basil of Caesarea: "The least fancy and poorest and sufficient for the purpose of the need." There is also a description, unique in these documents, of the procedure [76], [77] for defrocking a monk before expulsion from the monastery.

C. Administrative Matters

There is no discussion of the constitutional status of the foundation. Aside from the superior, the only officials mentioned are the work supervisor [80] and the precentor [81] who served as the reader in the refectory.

D. Financial Matters

There is no direct discussion of the foundation's finances. Nikon forthrightly rejects [85] offerings of cash or "anything else" from outsiders, "except as the divine fathers in the divine scriptures allow." The implication is that Nikon intended that the monastery should be self-supporting on the basis of the labor of its monks.

E. External Relations

There is no evidence at this relatively early stage of Nikon's career that he was concerned with assuring the proper subordination of this monastery to the local ecclesiastical authorities, as they are ignored in this document. Nikon's ban on granting access to the monastery to women is even stricter [86] than the comparable ban in (3) Theodore Studites [16], a document known to him when he composed his Pandektes; his ban on female animals is in accord with both the Studite and Lavriote traditions.

F. Relationship to the Monastic Reform Movement

Perhaps because of its likely relatively early date in the 1050s, this document shows comparatively little acquaintance with the controversial issues of the late eleventh-century monastic reform that its author would himself be confronting later in (21) Roidion. Nikon's prohibition [86] of women from the monastery or its vicinity is consonant with and even exceeds monastic reform regulation in (22) Evergetis [38], [39] but the conjunction here with a ban on female animals suggests rather dependence on the Studite observance. Interestingly, though Nikon agreed with some reformers in considering women to be the “bitter lure,” he drew the line at misogyny, declaring “it is absolutely demonic to hate and reject the creation of God.” A possible trace of influence of reform ideas appears [85] in Nikon’s categorical rejection of outside donations, which exceeds the skepticism to be displayed later in (23) Pakourianos [20].

Finally, one of the fundamental products of the early monastic reform, Paul Evergetinos’ massive ascetic anthology, the Synagoge or Evergetinon, must have been produced before the author’s death in 1054, and thus was theoretically available to Nikon as an example for his own differently organized anthology as he composed it in the 1060s.¹⁷ However, this potentially very significant influence on Nikon’s methodology in the present document cannot yet be demonstrated. Overall, then, it seems prudent to view (20) Black Mountain as an independent exemplar of the author’s own vision of a reform monastery, based on universal manual labor, ascetic dietary observances, and strict adherence to authoritative disciplinary precedents.

Notes on the Introduction

1. This preliminary dating is based on the assumption that the document was written for either Luke of Anazarbos’ monastery on Black Mountain after the latter’s death or for Nikon’s own unsuccessful monastery in the same general location founded shortly thereafter. Neither event can be dated accurately at present but they probably took place about the time that Theodosios III, patriarch of Antioch (1057–1059), assigned Nikon the task of reforming Antiochene monasteries.
2. For details, see discussion below in Biography of the Author, B. His Works.
3. For this autobiographical information, see Doens, “Nicon,” pp. 132–35, followed closely by Nasrallah, “Auteur antiochien,” pp. 151–52, and Kazhdan, “Nikon,” p. 1484. All accounts seem based at least in part on the notices of Mai, Scriptorum veterum nova collectio, vol. 4, pp. 155–68, on Vaticanus arabicus 76, an Arabic manuscript preserving some of Nikon’s works.
4. Nasrallah, “Auteur antiochien,” pp. 153–61, provides the best discussion of Nikon’s works; see also Beck, KTL, p. 600, Doens, “Nicon,” pp. 134–38, and Solignac, “Nicon,” cols. 319–20.
5. Hermeneiai ton theion entolon tou Kyriou or Pandektes; see Clercq, Textes juridiques, pp. 10–20; Doens, “Nicon,” pp. 134–37; Nasrallah, “Auteur antiochien,” pp. 153–55.
6. (20) Black Mountain [29], [46], [51], [84]; for the Studite quotations see Clercq, Textes juridiques, pp. 18, 25, 31, 50. These quotations are found in the Pandektes, chaps. 4, 12, 37, and apparently include (3) Theodore Studites [5], [15], [16], [17].
7. PG 127, cols. 513–16, reprints an old edition of the preface by B. de Montfaucon, Bibliotheca Coisliniana (Paris, 1715), pp. 189–90; Clercq, “Pandectes,” pp. 187–203, offers an edition and French translation of the first chapter; J. B. Cotelier, Ecclesiae graecae monumenta, vol. 3 (Paris, 1686), pp. 439–44, 420–23, provides an edition of chaps. 57 and 63; see Clercq, Textes juridiques, p. 11.
8. Kanones kai horoi kai merika diegemata prosekonta monachois; see Doens, “Nicon,” p. 137, and Nasrallah, “Auteur antiochien,” p. 155.
9. Ed. A. M. Bandini, Catalogus codicum manuscriptorum Bibliothecae Mediceae, vol. 1 (Florence, 1764), pp. 92–98; reprinted in PG 106, cols. 1360–81; see Nasrallah, “Auteur antiochien,” p. 155.
10. Benešević, Taktikon, published only the first four chapters; earlier in his Catalogus, pp. 561–601, he published the text of chaps. 4, 31, 35–37. Mai, Scriptorum veterum nova collectio, vol. 4, pp. 155–58, summarized the entire work briefly on the basis of the Arabic manuscript Codex Vaticanus arabicus 76, fols. 1–402r.

ELEVENTH CENTURY

11. See Nasrallah, "Auteur antiochien," p. 157, and Doens, "Nicon," p. 132, with neither providing full citations of these Russian editions; according to Doens, the editions are very rare and less accessible than the many Slavonic manuscripts of the works.
12. These Mss. are Sinaiticus graecus 441, Vaticanus arabicus 76, fols. 402–80v (incomplete), and Shuwaïr 165, pp. 644–82, for which see Nasrallah, "Auteur antiochien," p. 158.
13. Beck, KTL, p. 600.
14. (20) Black Mountain [21], [22], [74].
15. (20) Black Mountain [8] through [20].
16. (20) Black Mountain [24], [69], [70], [71], [72].
17. See discussion of this work below in (22) Evergetis, Institutional History.

Bibliography

- Beck, Hans-Georg, Kirche und theologische Literatur im byzantinischen Reich (Munich, 1959), p. 600.
- Benešević, Vladimir, Catalogus codicum manuseriptorum qui in monasterio Sanctae Catharinae in Monte Sina asservantur, vol. 1 (St. Petersburg, 1911), pp. 237–46. Includes also an edition of five chapters of Nikon's Taktikon, pp. 561–601.
- Brock, S., "Syriac Manuscripts Copied on the Black Mountain, near Antioch," Lingua Restituta Orientalis: Festgabe für Julius Assfalg (Wiesbaden, 1990), pp. 59–67.
- Clercq, Carlo de, "Les Pandectes de Nicon de la Montagne Noire," AHDO 4 (1949), 187–203. Includes an edition and translation of the first chapter of Nikon's Pandektes.
- , Les textes juridiques dans les Pandectes de Nicon de la Montagne Noire (Venice, 1942). Includes a resume of the contents of Nikon's Pandektes, pp. 23–74.
- Doens, Irénée, "Nicon de la Montagne Noire," Byzantion 24 (1954), 131–40.
- Grumel, Venance, "Nicon de la Montagne Noire et Jean IV (V) l'Oxite. Remarques chronologiques," REB 21 (1963), 270–72.
- Kazhdan, Alexander, "Nikon of the Black Mountain," ODB, p. 1484.
- Mai, Angelo, Scriptorum veterum nova collectio e vaticanis codicibus edita, vol. 4 (Rome, 1831), pp. 155–70. A summary of the contents of the Arabic version of Nikon's Taktikon.
- Nasrallah, J., "Un auteur antiochien du XIe siècle: Nicon de la Montagne Noire (vers 1025–début du XIIe s.)," POC 19 (1969), 150–61.
- Richard, M., "Florilèges spirituels," DS, vol. 5. (Paris, 1962), cols. 435–511, esp. 503–4.
- Solignac, Aimé, "Nicon de la Montagne-Noire," DS, vol. 11 (Paris, 1982), cols. 319–20.
- Yiankou, Th. X., Nikon ho Mauroreites. Bios—Syngraphiko Ergo—Kanonike Didaskalia (Thessalonike, 1991) (= Aristoteleio Panepistemio Thessalonikes, Epistemonike Epeterida Theologikes Scholes, Tmema Poimantikes, Parartema Arith. 2). Known but not available to the editors and the translator of this document.

20. BLACK MOUNTAIN

Translation

With the help of God a book of rules or typikon delivered in writing to our brothers and containing what has been selected from the sacred writings with regard to the observance of rules handed down to us by the holy fathers for the salvation of [our] souls.

[General Rules for the Canonical Hours and the Liturgy]

1. It should be known that the “God is the Lord” (Ps. 117 [118]:27) should always be sung standing, as [the reading from] the Apostolos.

2. It should be known that the stichera of the menaion should always be sung to the “O Lord, I have cried to thee” (Ps. 140 [141]), the three of them twice, and those of the Oktoechos at the verse. [p. 23]

3. It should be known that when the “God is the Lord” (Ps. 117 [118]:27) is sung,¹ one should not say “Holy is God” at the beginning of vespers, but “Come let us worship,” and likewise at matins [one should not say] “Glory to God in the highest,” for they are not to be sung with prostrations. It is necessary to observe these things on the days when the “God is the Lord” (Ps. 117 [118]:27) is sung, just as it says in the typika of the great monasteries of Stoudios and Jerusalem and of the other ancient monasteries.²

4. It should be known that when a feast occurs that has lections for the [office of] lamplighting in the evening, “Blessed is the man” is recited (Ps. 31 [32]) and the lections are read after the entrance and the “O cheerful light.”

5. It should be known that always, whether it is a feast or an ordinary daily service, the thurifer censes at the “O Lord I have cried to thee” (Ps. 140 [141]) at vespers, or else as it conforms to the will of God; but at matins [he censes] at the beginning and at the ninth [ode].

6. It should be known that whether it is a feast or an ordinary daily service, the priest always ought to perform without fail the synapte and the ektenes.

7. It should be known that always, whether it is a feast or an ordinary daily service, it is necessary to sing the canonical hours complete with their mesoria; sometimes one trisagion for each psalm of the mesorion, at other times a trisagion to every three psalms. Likewise it is also necessary that compline and the midnight office and simply the whole office of vespers be sung [by all the assembled brothers] together as the cenobitic constitutions decree.

Concerning the canonical hours at Easter

8. Concerning the canonical hours of Easter week, at every single hour the “Christ is risen” is sung three times, and the “Having beheld the resurrection of Christ” three times and a trisagion, and the “Although you descended into the grave” and the Kyrie eleison thirty times. Thus the canonical hours of Easter week are sung according to the rule of the monks of Stoudios and Jerusalem.³

ELEVENTH CENTURY

Concerning the canonical hours of the rest of the year

[General Rules]

9. Concerning the canonical hours of the rest of the year, it is necessary for all to assemble together, first striking the wood [semantron], [p. 24] and together to sing each hour at its respective time, with their mesoria, and likewise the ninth hour and in short, always, unless the brothers are scattered afar for their duties. But when the brothers are away, they must sing what is ordained for each hour where they are and at its proper time. Those remaining in the monastery must do the same in the church for each assembly, first striking the wood [semantron]. In short, the service of the cenobitic rules must be observed in this way, just as Basil the Great ordered in his Ascetical Treatises.

10. It should be known that on ordinary days as well as at the middle feasts and at the minor ones the trisagion must be sung for every individual psalm in the mesoria at each canonical hour. Each single hour must be sung individually and at its proper time. One must not recite the canonical hours, except in Lent only. On Saturday and Sunday, however, at the appointed meal hour one must sing the two hours together, that is, the third and the sixth, one after the other with mesoria and one trisagion for three psalms on account of singing the two hours together one after the other.

11. The ninth hour must be sung at its proper time after dinner and the trisagion for each psalm of the mesorion [must be sung] because of [the ninth hour] being sung alone as a distinct office. [The ninth hour] should be [sung] on the great feasts of the Lord also, just as on Sundays, as well as [on the feasts] of the two apostles Peter and Paul, and [on those] of the birth and beheading of [St. John] the Forerunner.⁴ Whenever there is a liturgy on a Saturday or a Sunday or on a [movable] feast, the hours are sung in the way we have said, with the mesoria.

12. At vespers the semantron must be struck at the beginning of the eleventh hour if they are going to eat the evening meal. But if they eat at the ninth hour, and it is convenient to signal later, this should be done. [For] just as also among us [the office] is called vespers but the holy scripture calls it lamplighting, the completion of the whole day. Nevertheless, someone else will know what pleases God and whether there is any difference at all.

Concerning compline

13. At compline after the sun has completely set and darkness has arrived, just as the fathers handed down, [p. 25] the set of six psalms begins to be sung, and the “God be with you,” then “The incorporeal nature,” and the creed and the “All-holy Lady, Mother of God,” and the rest according to the rule of the authoritative monasteries down to “[The vigilance] of my invisible enemies,” nothing else. Then comes the “Have mercy upon me, O God” and the canon of the Mother of God and the dismissal. Thus is compline sung. But on Sunday at compline, that is on Saturday evening, it is necessary to sing two canons, one a trinitarian canon and the other a canon of the Mother of God, after the aforesaid service of compline.

20. BLACK MOUNTAIN

14. During Lent and at the fasts of the holy apostles and Saint Philip it is necessary to add, according to the rule of Jerusalem, Psalm 101 and the “Almighty Lord,” then a trisagion; and after the “Our Father,” the troparion “Have mercy upon us, O Lord, have mercy,” the Gloria, the “Lord have mercy upon us,” the “And now,” the [troparion] “[The gates] of compassion,” forty Kyrie eleisons, then the “[Draw nigh], O God, to my help” (Ps. 69 [70]), and the canon of the Mother of God. Then in this order, the “Glory to God in the highest” and a trisagion, forty Kyrie eleisons and the prostrations, twelve Kyrie eleisons and dismissal.

15. At the midnight service it is necessary to sound the wood semantron and for the assembled brothers to sing together from the beginning the psalm, “[Blessed are] the blameless” (Ps. 118 [119]), and after one Gloria [to sing] the Alleluia three times according to the rule, and after the three Glorias [to sing] the “Have mercy upon me, O God” and the Alleluia three times, a trisagion and the troparion of the day, and at the Gloria again the troparion of the saint, whoever it is according to custom. At the “And now” [sing] the “Behold the bridegroom,” the “Lord have mercy upon us” and then the “praise becomes thee, O God” (Ps. 64 [65]) and to recite the entire kathisma because the psalm, “Let God arise” (Ps. 67 [68]), and likewise also the remaining psalms herald in advance the incarnation of the Lord and his passion.

Concerning the psalm “Let God arise” (Ps. 67 [68]), it is said in the Gerontikon that the demons fear no other psalm so much as the “Let God arise,” as even the demons themselves confess.⁵ Then [to recite] the Creed and then the trisagion. Also to recite the troparion, “O God of our fathers” and following at the Gloria [to recite] again [the troparion], if there is one, of a saint according to custom, and at the “And now” the “Suddenly will the judge come.” These are at the same time trinitarian hymns, midnight hymns [p. 26] and hymns to the Mother of God. It is necessary for these to be sung and forty Kyrie Eleisons, and to disperse. The midnight service must be sung in this way also in the remaining days of the entire year.

16. On the Saturdays, however, the “Apostles, prophets and martyrs” should be sung following the psalm, “[Blessed are] the blameless” (Ps. 118 [119]) and the “Remember, O Lord” following the Gloria, the “Behold the bridegroom” following the “And now,” and [the troparion] of the saints [whose commemoration is] customary, as already said [should also be sung] following the kathisma. “Suddenly the judge will come” [is to be sung] following the “And now.”

On Sundays following the psalm, “[Blessed are] the blameless” (Ps. 118 [119]), the resurrection troparia which follow that psalm are said. They are not, however, to be sung, but recited plainly and with contrition, just as also the psalms are and the entire midnight service. But if it is also fitting to sing the troparia following the psalm “[Blessed are] the blameless” in full voice and in a melodic mode for the purpose of wakefulness, let it be so to the glory of God. Following the kathisma, the troparion [is to be sung] to the appropriate mode, then the hymn to the Mother of God and dismissal.

17. Then it is necessary in this order to strike the semantron for matins and to light the lamps and cense, and for the brothers to be seated and if appropriate to read until the prescribed time when the Gloria is given, and for matins to be begun. Since we commented above in the present [section of the] midnight office about the kathisma “Praise becomes thee, O God,” (Ps. 64 [65]) that the psalm proclaims in advance the passion of the Lord, accordingly since whoever is so inclined may fall into grief and gloominess and moreover into fear and whatever other [emotions] contained there [in that psalm], for this reason [this kathisma] seems [appropriate] for other [ordinary] days, or for whenever one is alone, if suitable.

But on Sunday and especially in churches for large gatherings of the congregation and on feasts of the Lord it seems inappropriate, just as the Constitutions of the Holy Apostles maintain. For it says there as follows: “Anyone who fasts on Sunday is guilty of sin, since it is a day of resurrection, or [anyone] who grieves on Pentecost or in general on a holiday of the Lord.”⁶ These are the statements found there. Moreover, the sixth council, in the 75th canon, says that “neither [is it lawful] to say anything in addition which is not fitting and proper in church.”⁷

18. Nevertheless, let the previously written order of service for the Sunday midnight office as well as the one set down [in this chapter] be observed as is most fitting. It is as follows. It is necessary, as [it is] every evening, just as [p. 27] we wrote above concerning compline for the whole year, to conduct [the Sunday midnight service] in this order and as follows: to sing one trinitarian canon and to be dismissed and each depart. But at the midnight service [it is necessary] to signal with a slow beating [of the semantron] that [the brothers] may know and assemble in the church, when the Gloria has been given, to say the “Have mercy upon us, O God” and the “[Draw nigh], O God, to my help” (Ps. 69 [70]) and the “Glory to God in the highest,” and to sing two canons, one of the Mother of God and of the saint, whoever it is according to custom, and after the third ode a kontakion of the Mother of God, “Protection of the Christians,” in the second plagal mode, and the oikos similarly.

After the sixth [ode of the canon] of the aforementioned saint, the kontakion and the oikos [are to be sung], and at the conclusion of the canons the resurrection kathismata, then the psalm, “[Blessed are] the blameless” (Ps. 118 [119]). Afterwards the Alleluia and at the end the “Blessed art thou, O Lord, teach me [thine ordinances]” (Ps. 118 [119]:12–13) is sung, and the resurrection troparia [which follow] the psalm, “[Blessed are] the blameless” (Ps. 118 [119]) [sung] in [appropriate] mode, then the “Alleluia, Alleluia, Glory to thee, O God” three times.

Then you must begin to sing the idiomela stichera in the second plagal mode aloud as before, with melody neither in the forbidden full voice nor again hushed, but in medium voice, as they sing these in the [monastery of] the holy wonderworker Symeon: [the troparion], “The [life of all that was hung] on the wood of the cross” (look for this in the Triodion on Thursday of the third week); the verse, “O Lord, rebuke me not in thy wrath” (Ps. 6:1); the troparion, “Thou art terrible, O Lord”; [the verse], “Have mercy upon me, O God, according to thy great mercy” (Ps. 50 [51]: 1); the troparion, “I possess no repentance”; [the verse], “The righteous shall flourish as a palm tree” (Ps. 91 [92]:12); [the troparion], “O admirable father of the desert”; the verse, “Light is sprung up for the righteous” (Ps. 96 [97]: 11); [the troparion], “Divine grace hovered”; the verse, “Blessed is the man that fears [the Lord]” (Ps. 111 [112]: 1); [the troparion] “Holy father”; [the verse], “[Their voice is gone out] into all the earth” (Ps. 18 [19]: 4); the Gloria; the “And now”; [and the troparion] “The undefiled and wholly blameless.” Look for these in the sticheraria and elsewhere.

20. BLACK MOUNTAIN

Then [you must sing] a trisagion and then in this manner a troparion, “Have mercy upon us, O Lord, have mercy upon us,” in the same voice and melody as before, and again the Gloria [and the troparion], “Lord have mercy upon us, for we have trusted in thee”; the “And now”; [and the troparion], “[The gates] of compassion”; and the priest does the ektenes and the rest [do] twenty Kyrie Eleisons; then the dismissal and they are seated.

The reader reads until they light the lamps. Then [it is necessary] to announce matins, as we wrote before. But when it is not a feast, or Sunday or Saturday, it is necessary to do prostrations [p. 28] at the beginning, middle and end of the six-psalm set just as in the other assemblies according to the rule of the monks of Stoudios, except not for the whole six-psalm set, but at the beginning, middle and end three [prostrations] each.

19. It is necessary always to observe the verses, in vespers [to intercalate] six verses and to sing [after them] the stichera of the menaion, all three of them twice, and after the prokeimenon [to sing] the stichera of the oktoechos, and at matins [to intercalate] twelve verses and to sing three canons. It is necessary always to sing the first hour combined with matins; likewise the mesorion [must] also be combined with matins always as the day begins.

If it should happen that [you] make a mistake about the hour and dismiss [the assembly] earlier, it is necessary to waive the first hour with its mesorion and rest until morning; or again, if for some reason it is advantageous to do [the first hour], then [it should be done] in this way: while the brothers are assembled, to sing the first hour with its mesorion, sometimes with prostrations, sometimes without prostrations, in accord with what is acceptable for the day according to the rule of the monks of Stoudios.⁸

When the first hour is sung separately at the end of matins, it is necessary to make the three single genuflections full ones and to disperse, but to make the rest of the genuflections at the dismissal of the first hour. But to begin with, the genuflections are, according to the Jerusalem rule, to be done in common during every service, since the typikon there says that “After the completion [of the office] three full separated genuflections [should be made], then twelve slow ones, so that the brothers can perform them at an equal pace, then when they have rested a little and said a mental prayer, [they should do] three prostrations and twelve Kyrie Eleisons.”⁹ This is the Jerusalem order.

After this, according to the order of the Black Mountain, a “Glory be to the Father” is necessary and three full separated genuflections, on behalf of those who have mercy on us, and serve us, and have served us. Then a “Glory to thee, O God, my hope” and the priest [says] the prayer and dismisses [the service].

As a general practice, the genuflections should all be done in meticulous accord with the rule as it specifies in the typikon of the Jerusalemites¹⁰—both those genuflections in the midst of the services, that is at the “Holy is God” and at the “Come let us worship,” and those at the remaining places must be done meticulously according to the rule without fail whenever the day permits it.

Also, in the same manner three genuflections on behalf of those who have mercy on us, and serve us and have served us. It is necessary to make all the genuflections to the ground in these cases, according to the rule of the holy fathers. [p. 29]

20. It should be known that in the present typikon there is no all-night vigil at all, neither on a feast nor on Sunday, but [it has only] the order of the offices for the year, for compline, the midnight service, and matins, according to the order of the monks of Stoudios and the Holy Mountain¹¹ and in general according to the legislation of the cenobitic constitutions. I do not say this to disparage the churches' vigils that are in accord with God's will and from God (Heaven forbid!), but intending to establish the present typikon as a good witness in accord with the tradition of the cenobitic rules from the Ascetical Treatises of Basil the Great¹² and from the Life of Saint Pachomios¹³ and [the tradition] of the monastery of the monks of Stoudios and the other ancient cenobitic monasteries.

Concerning the reading of the psalms

21. It should be known that on the Saturday of Renovation [Easter week] there should be no reciting of psalms, nor, according to the rule of the monks of Stoudios, on Resurrection Sunday, but on the same Sunday at vespers the "Blessed is the man" (Ps. 31 [32]) begins. On Monday following Low Sunday¹⁴ at matins the "I will give thanks to thee, O Lord" (Ps. 110 [111]) [is to be sung] in the first mode. In the evening at lamplighting, the "To thee, O Lord" (Ps. 24 [25]) is begun. On Tuesday at matins one kathisma is sung. In this manner the psalmody is sung throughout all of Pentecost. Two readings are read, from All Saints to¹⁵ the twenty-sixth of September it is necessary to sing at vespers "To the Lord when of the sorrowful" [and] at matins two kathismata and two readings according to the Jerusalem rule, and until Great Lent [to sing] two kathismata and three readings at matins, and at vespers "To the Lord when of the sorrowful" according to the rule of the Studites and [that of] the Holy Mountain.¹⁶

During Great Lent on Monday of the first [two] weeks two kathismata are sung and three readings at matins. One should read through a single kathisma each hour according to the rule of the saints. From the third week [of Great Lent] three kathismata are sung at matins and also three readings and at vespers "To the Lord when of the sorrowful" even up to Holy Wednesday.

On Saturdays and Sundays, two kathismata each day are sung: on Saturday "The Lord said to my Lord" (Ps. 109 [110]) and "The sinless ones," on Sunday "I will give thanks to you, O Lord" and "I love you very much, O Lord" and this is always sung on Saturday and Sunday.

On each Saturday at vespers and on Easter Sunday "Blessed is the man" [p. 30] is sung according to the order of the holy fathers. From Holy Wednesday on the Psalter is left out, and in this holy week there is no singing. At no other time of the year do we celebrate in this way.

22. It is necessary to know that in the Studite typikon there is no great doxology, neither on Sunday nor on a great holiday, but on those days are said stichera on the "Of the praised." Similarly on the stichophon. On the minor holidays only the stichera are said on the stichophon, as on other [simple] days. But in the Jerusalem typikon it is different. For on every Sunday there is a great doxology as well as for the whole of Pentecost, from Christmas to St. Basil's day, and from Epiphany to the end of the holiday.

20. BLACK MOUNTAIN

On the other great holidays that are only one day and on Saturdays and on middle holidays are said the stichera on the "Of the praised" as well as on the stichophon. On the other minor holidays and also on other [simple] days the "Of the praised" is not said for the stichera, but only on the stichophon. Here and in all that follows it is necessary to proceed according to the Jerusalem rule in the order for the entire year. No other order is written in the present typikon.

23. It is necessary to have written typika, I mean both Studite and Jerusalem, and from them to keep the tradition of the holy fathers firmly in all respects.

Of particular psalmody

24. It is necessary to know that brothers are not permitted to eat alone in the cell [except] for the one in particular who has the permission of the superior [to eat] outside of the refectory. In the same manner, according to tradition, neither prayer nor singing properly should be done alone, but everyone together. In the cells singing is only fitting when it is expressed for comfort, prayer or the raising of conscience. In addition to the common singing at [p. 31] vespers, each one must sing "Blessed is the man" and the kathisma "God have mercy on us" in his own cell from the Monday [after the Sunday] of the blessing of the breads¹⁷ through to the fifteenth of August, and forego genuflections as much as possible due to the decreasing length of the nights, and must nevertheless still appear at the tasks. Except for Saturdays, Sundays, and Pentecost and the said holidays [it is necessary] to perform genuflections or some other devotions. From the fifteenth of August until the end of September, it is fitting to add the hymn, "We pray to you, O Lord" as well as genuflections. From the beginning of October until St. Philip's day,¹⁸ it is good to add "I love you, O Lord," that is, a third kathisma, or "Kyrie eleison." [It is fitting] also not to forego genuflections.¹⁹

Starting from St. Philip's, he who is able to keep vigil longer on account of the long nights must go to the workshop and light the lamp or anything else that is appropriate, and each one must either read or work, as he prefers to do, depending on his capability, and when he wishes, having completed [his task], depart unhindered to rest. But when he departs for rest, if there is no one else left there, he must extinguish the lamp. Thus each must do, lest the lamp burn on unnoticed and the oil be wasted. This must be done because the brothers are not allowed each to light a lamp in their cells.

25. On Monday of the first week of Lent it is necessary to perform fifty prostrations in the cells, as we also said before, and as many others as each is able, but first these fifty in private as an offering to God with the three kathismata and the "Have mercy upon me, O God," until the evening of Holy Friday.

26. But on Holy Saturday until vespers is signaled, [it is necessary to perform] as many prostrations privately as each is able to do. [It is necessary] to forego these until All Saints²⁰ in accordance with the legislation of the holy synods. But this Saturday also has prostrations, just as it has severe fasting.

ELEVENTH CENTURY

27. On the week of Renovation [Easter Week], the psalmody described above is suspended, and the “Christ is risen,” just as the rule specifies, is sung with the psalmody appointed for Easter week in the church, just as they are also in the other churches, but [they are sung] in the cells with the “Christ is risen” and the rest, that is, the “Having beheld the resurrection of Christ,” just as the hours are sung, each in this way then being free [to do] as he prefers. [p. 32]

28. Afterwards, throughout the entire [remainder] of the year, as we have already said, this is how [you] must sing in the cells, [following] only the above written rule in accordance with tradition. But if a brother because of work or otherwise because of a reasonable excuse or necessity [is unable to attend the services], it is necessary to do what is appropriate.²¹ But in all other [cases] it is necessary to sing together in common in the midst of [the rest of the brotherhood], as was written before.

During the long [winter] nights, just as we also said before, or even during the other [nights] if one wishes again to spend more of the night awake in any way, and has no desire either for reading or again for work, but only for singing psalms, there is nothing to hinder personal psalmody in this manner which we stated above, if it is conducive to the salvation of the soul, either in the cell or outside of the cell, all year long, whenever each desires, according to what the preference of each person is.

In the great feasts likewise and in Pentecost and in general there is nothing to hinder psalmody, either in the cell or outside of the cell, if it also contributes, in accord with what we said before, to the salvation of the soul, for many are the devices of the devil. Nevertheless, everything must also be in accord with the will of the one who presides [in the monastery] by God’s will, just as we also said before. For the angel of God in the writings according to the great Pachomios, after ordaining the common prayers [to be conducted] in the midst of the congregation, spoke as follows: “For those who are perfect have no need of legislation in their cells; let them devote themselves in their cells wholly to living by the legislation of God.”²² Nevertheless our blessed and holy ancient fathers set aside half of the night for rest and half for keeping vigil, and therefore it is necessary for each one to do what also benefits [him] from vespers on.

29. One should know that, just as we also wrote before concerning ecclesiastical order and psalmody,²³ it is necessary for the typikon to contain in writing the remaining [regulations] of the monks of Stoudios and of Jerusalem, and from them to observe the traditions of the holy fathers as is fitting and the traditions of the cenobitic canons pertaining to practice for all aspects of the monastic life.

It is necessary to have the entire Life of our holy father Pachomios in writing, as also the Constitutions of Cenobitic Monasteries by Saint Cassian the Roman,²⁴ [p. 33] as well as the Ascetical Treatises of our holy father Basil, since they contain canons and rules for regulation of cenobitic monasteries. For the divine fathers do not accept the monastic life in any other way, but only if it is in accord with the legislation in the Ascetical Treatises of Basil the Great and the other holy fathers, as well as [with] the law of our holy father Pachomios, as the founder and protector of cenobitic administration.

It is necessary to have these in writing and to practice their ordinances as much as possible.

20. BLACK MOUNTAIN

Nevertheless it is also necessary to have in writing all the rest of the Christian traditions, both of monks and clerics, likewise of laity and generally every Christian body, from the traditions of the holy and inspired fathers. Concerning dogma [it is necessary], to begin with, [to have in writing] the decrees of the holy councils and the rest of the holy fathers regarding [doctrines] contrary to the faith, but first of all in every respect [to have] the commands of the Lord and their interpretations. For the latter are set forth in the book which is compiled out of the providence of God and called The Interpretations of the Commands of the Lord.²⁵ For in no other way is it possible for me in my zeal to say more than this, that it contains the commands of the Lord and I know for sure that it possesses their appellation. It is necessary to have this [book] for every sort of teaching, as well as the other books, as many as possess sound teachings. Outside of these we do not receive from our holy and inspired fathers that any other strange or alien writing has authority besides the teachings of the holy and inspired fathers.

Concerning the Divine Liturgy

30. It should be known also concerning the holy liturgy of God that on Saturday the liturgy must begin at the start of the fourth hour in order that the refectory may be set at the beginning of the fifth hour. On Sunday the liturgy must begin at the beginning of the third hour, so that the refectory may be set at the beginning of the fourth hour. Similarly also on the great feasts of the Lord, such as those of the Mother of God and of Christ, as well as for the two for the birth and beheading of [St. John] the Forerunner and that of the two holy apostles Peter and Paul. All of these must be performed as on Sunday.

On the medium feasts²⁶ it is necessary [p. 34] that the liturgy begin at the beginning of the fifth hour, so that the refectory may be set at the beginning of the sixth hour. On the minor feasts²⁷ and other days the liturgy ought to begin at the beginning of the fifth hour and be concluded in its own proper time. But the refectory must be set at its own proper time each day, whether a fast day or an ordinary day. That is, everyone [must] depart after the liturgy and reassemble again when it is time for the refectory. This is the necessary procedure when they are going to eat at the ninth hour or at night. It is necessary to do the liturgy and meals this way also for the short fasts²⁸ as distinct from Lent, for Lent has a different rule, that is valid everywhere.

31. This order of the holy liturgy we are taught partly from the typikon of the monks of Stoudios, as well as [from that] of Jerusalem and the Holy Mountain, in accordance with what is ordained for the fast of the Holy Apostles, and partly from the Life of St. Thalassios, in accord with what it says there about how it was revealed to the saint that “until the sixth hour the liturgies of the Christians are carried up into heaven but if a liturgy is celebrated thereafter, it is not carried up until the morrow.”²⁹ These are the testimonies concerning the divine liturgy; but we also consider this chapter [included] herein to be a written testimony just as we were taught. Let him who knows best consider [it].

32. Concerning the minor feasts, as we said before,³⁰ we were taught from the typikon of the Holy Mountain to sing the “God is the Lord” (Ps. 117 [118]: 27) [on those feasts], as it says there. Concerning eating and drinking, as on other feast days, they do not break fast, nor again on the fast days. These things are appropriate when it happens that a fast day and a minor feast coincide. But the feasts of the Lord, that is Holy Thursday, Holy Saturday, Christmas and Epiphany, have a different rule for the liturgy.

Concerning quantities and kinds of food and drink

33. It should be known that he who is serving the brothers [in the refectory] must strike the wood semantron and that all must assemble and depart to the refectory, reciting the psalm, “I will exalt thee, my God, my king” (Ps. 145 [146]:1) and be seated, with piety of conduct and word, and [p. 35] with the rest of the ritual in accordance with the rule. The reader must begin the proper antiphon, then pronounce the verse of the blessing for the food set on the tables, and for each serving he must say the “Glory to thee, Christ, [our] God, our hope, glory to thee” and so on, and similarly the verse. The reader must read until he who is serving should raise a Panagia. Then the reader offers up a prayer and blessing. The same person ought to wash the dishes and the other utensils according to the rule of the Holy Mountain, for it is his duty.

There ought to be great scrupulousness, just as was handed down to us from the holy fathers,³¹ that in the refectory no word whatsoever be spoken except for the verses and the reading, but for any absolute necessity whatsoever the superior [may speak] with discretion or anyone else who has good reason, as necessary. For the divine fathers also say this, that in such matters equal attention and honor must be paid to the holy altar and to the refectory of the brothers.

34. It should be known that from Easter until All Saints, [and] the whole week of Easter, they must eat at the same hour as they eat on Easter Sunday. We do not mean [that they must eat] the [same] amount, however, but the [same] quality, if they have it. But if they do not have it, it is not necessary to be concerned according to the word of the Lord. (cf. Matt. 6:25)

35. Starting with Monday of the Blessing of the breads³² after singing the third hour in its order, then the sixth hour in its order and its proper time, it is necessary to sing also the select verses from psalms. Blessed bread³³ must be handed out and this alone may be eaten. The blessed bread of Pentecost must weigh twelve exagia and this alone must be eaten so that Pentecost might not be called a fast. After singing the ninth hour at its proper time, then it is necessary to eat a full meal according to the tradition of the holy fathers. But if there is liturgy, it must be at the third hour, as on Sunday, and [it is necessary] to give the blessed bread similarly.

After singing the service of the sixth hour at its proper time and then the ninth in its proper time, it is necessary to eat a full meal, as also we said before. But if it is beneficial to take the blessed bread and eat it at the sixth hour, let it be so. This ordinance must be observed throughout the entirety of Holy Pentecost except for [the feast of] Mid-Pentecost and [the feast of the] Ascension or any other occasion with good reason. [p. 36]

36. Let us examine whether this distinction in the case of Pentecost and the feasts as well is acceptable. We shall find the canon of Theophilus of Alexandria where it says, “Whenever the fast of Christmas vigil or the vigil of the Epiphany falls on a Saturday or Sunday, let them eat a small snack of dried food at the time that the liturgy takes place during the day, but at night let them eat a full meal so that it might not be called a fast. Thus we refute, they say, the heresies which exist in such matters and do not hinder our abstinence as long as we are fully zealous for it and do it.”³⁴ But nevertheless, in spite of the weight that we stated before, let the blessed bread that is distributed [during Pentecost] be given out in a small portion only, if appropriate, so that it might not be called a fast.

20. BLACK MOUNTAIN

Just as we also said before, we refute the errors that are in such things, just as the above-quoted canon says to taste of some small snack. We do this if it is allowed, but if not, let us be taught what is best, accepting the testimony again from the divine scriptures.

37. According to monastic rule, we ought to say again that on Tuesday and Thursday it is necessary to eat two dishes, one a soup [of legumes] cooked with olive oil, and the other boiled [vegetables] without oil. But if a little cheese or egg or fish should happen to be available on these days, it should be eaten without worry, but the portion of cheese per person ought to be weighed out at eight exagia, the exagion that is of a standard holokotimon and the [portion of] oil at one and a half an exagion per person at each setting.

This rule ought to be valid at all times, even when both are eaten, unless there is some special refreshment from some Christ-loving guest, and in order not to offend the one offering it, it is necessarily appropriate to waive the standard and again in such a way as not to act heedlessly or carelessly, but [to do] what is appropriate to the glory of God and not for blasphemy. But if it should not in fact happen thus, always on the days appointed it is necessary to abide by these same standards and measures for cheese and oil and of the other foods, and frequently, if it is also acceptable, to reduce these [quotas] and not to increase them, as Basil the Great in his Ascetical Treatises ordained, saying that “One must partake of everything on occasion, just enough to show to those who are watching . . .”³⁵ So much for that [subject].

[p. 37]

Concerning those doing penances

38. On Monday, Wednesday and Friday it is necessary to eat one course, that is, boiled [vegetables], without olive oil, and another course of dry food. On those Mondays, Wednesdays and Fridays of Pentecost, as we also said before, it is necessary on the occasion of a refreshment [provided by] a friend, to break fast, just as [is done] on other days, with respect to both the time [of eating] and the food, except for those doing penance and not partaking of communion. Those doing penances do not [ordinarily] break fast with respect to cheese and egg, but break fast in all foods on Wednesdays and Fridays of Pentecost.

On Sundays and the feasts of the Lord [it is necessary] to eat the two dishes with olive oil. But if as frequently happens Christ should send also something else and it is not appropriate to the two dishes, it is necessary to eat three. It is not lawful for this to be in effect perennially on the basis of this rule, but if it should happen as a matter of necessity, just as we have said, this rule must be observed on Saturdays and Sundays and the other feast days all year long in addition to Pentecost.

If there should happen to be wine, it should not, according to the rule, be given on any day except Sunday, a feast of the Lord, or of necessity as a refreshment [offered] by a friend. Wine is to be served, then, all year on these days, at one measure [per person], or frequently two or at most three, no more. For we said two or three measures not for a rule, but when it happens as a matter of necessity, just as we also said above concerning three dishes on Sunday or a great feast. Since just as with regard to food the two servings were to be valid, but frequently only one, so also with wine. The two measures of wine and frequently the single measure are always to be valid, if it falls on the appointed days, just as we always said.

ELEVENTH CENTURY

As St. Symeon the Wonderworker says, “A monk’s boast is abstinence from wine. But if he does drink wine, let him imbibe [only a] little on account of bodily illness.”³⁶ Likewise another of the saints, Poemen himself, great in word and in deed, says that “Drinking wine is absolutely not for monks.”³⁷ Therefore, on any other day of the week, according to the pronouncement of the saint [only] a little is to be drunk, on account of some unavoidable illness, on any day whatsoever, if there is any and it is given to us, for the sake of therapy.³⁸ [p. 38]

Also the divine canons order that it is fitting to measure undiluted wine [in the amount of] a one cup’s measure into twenty separate cup-measures in dilution.

[The following six chapters, missing from the Greek manuscript, were supplied by Benešević from a Slavonic translation [R] that has a different chapter numeration.]

[37R]. Likewise it is fitting throughout the whole year to keep this regulation about cheese and oil and wine and all both by measure and by law in the same way that our holy fathers have advised, saying, “Everything by measure and by law.” Likewise, St. Ephraem says, “Great is the unhappiness where the legislated laws do not prevail.”³⁹ We say this according to order.

[38R]. At the end of Holy Pentecost, from All Saints through to [the feast of the] Holy Apostles,⁴⁰ on Tuesday and Thursday it is fitting to eat only boiled [vegetables] without oil and other dry foodstuff at the ninth hour. On Monday, Wednesday and Friday dry foodstuff is fitting—bread and water and the like. It is fitting to eat two portions, more if they are available. When they eat boiled [vegetables], it is fitting to eat with them different servings, so that thereby there are two dishes.

[39R]. About small and great holidays, it should be added below in its [appropriate] place. From the [feast of the] Holy Apostles through to St. Philip’s, on Tuesday and Thursday one should eat two [meals of] boiled [vegetables] if available, juice without sweetening, and boiled [vegetables] both without oil. However, one should eat at the ninth hour according to the tradition of the holy fathers, as St. Symeon the Wonderworker expresses, saying “Let the monk fast no less than [until] the ninth hour.”⁴¹ Similarly in the Life of our most blessed father Pachomios, the angel says according to the cenobitic tradition that “At the ninth hour when many want to eat, make three prayers.”⁴² Also all the holy fathers preached this, [namely], that at the ninth hour the monks always eat.

[40R]. For these simple days, if some refreshment comes from some Christ-loving person and if the person who brought it is still there or is bringing it, [it is] to be eaten for the glory of God, so as not to offend the bringer, as was said above. If the bringer is not present, then it is fitting to keep it for Saturday or Sunday or a holiday because one should not break or violate the traditional fast of the holy fathers.

20. BLACK MOUNTAIN

If it is a fast day, it is not fitting to give the refreshment to the bringer when he comes except on a simple day or if some blessing is nevertheless necessary. If a holiday falls on a fast day it is fitting to permit it for the other's sake, in witness of the holiday that happens to fall then, whether it is a minor or a great [holiday], when it agrees with the love of the other according to the tradition of the holy fathers.

[41R]. If the bringer [of the refreshment] is not present and the holiday falls on a fast day, it is still more fitting and likewise it is pleasing to God in his glory and not to God's detriment. For it is not fitting and again unfortunate simply to permit this and to commit a great offense against our Lord's holy fast, which was laid down to Christians from the holy apostles and divine fathers and the holy councils by the Holy Spirit, and likewise all the more against our own traditions when we wish to permit these things without divine truth or some blessed reason.

As it has been stated above, on Tuesday and Thursday if it is useful to eat without oil, so be it. If it is not useful, then one should eat with oil, even though such is outside the tradition of the fathers, if it is to the glory of God and salvation of the soul and for the sustenance of the body.

[42R]. Thus it is fitting to accept this rule, except clearly for Lent and the other fasts as well. For it is read in the Ascetic Treatises of Basil the Great, and it is said there how the small typikon requires that food be served to the brothers for their sustenance during a fast, and also to keep [the fast] in praise and not in disdain.⁴³ If you want, turn to read [it for yourself].

So be it, and even on those days when it is not so, still the monks observe a complete abstinence from meat, and from this it is known as by the true word that for the sake of sustenance [it is permitted]⁴⁴ to partake of olive oil also on such days. Likewise in the Life of our father among the saints, Pachomios,⁴⁵ [p. 40] the founder and standard of cenobitic monasteries, you will find word for word that when accused, the cooks said in their defense that every day except for fast days they served sixty pints of olive oil for the food for the brothers. That was the multitude of the people.

Therefore, as we said before, it is reasonable so to eat, if it is also beneficial. For thus some in the manner of the oil-abstainers⁴⁶ think up other things to eat better than condiments, just as Basil the Great also noted in his Ascetical Treatises, and forbade this.⁴⁷ So much for that [subject].

43. On Monday, Wednesday and Friday after vespers, it is necessary to eat and to set the refectory in accordance with the tradition of certain holy fathers. It is necessary to eat dry foods—bread and water and anything of the sort, if it is available, and to eat in accordance with the tradition and legislation of the holy councils. Let this also be scrupulously observed, and if it is convenient to eat after vespers on fast days, as we said also before, let it be so. But if it is not convenient, [then] in accord with the rule of the other days let the meal be at the ninth hour as the divine fathers ordained in keeping with the sacred canons.

44. Concerning vegetables and fruit it is necessary that practice be in accord with the rule of the great monasteries in the following fashion. Lentils, beans and chickpeas, when they are [simply] boiled, one heaping wine measure per brother, and one level wine measure⁴⁸ of rice for each one. But when they are cooked in a soup,⁴⁹ it is to be half of all these. The same must be done also for the other legumes similar to these, as appropriate.

As with clothing, however, so too with legumes and fruits. Some are easily procured, while others are more scarce, as Basil the Great also says concerning all these things.⁵⁰ The things easily procured and the things that fill essential need must be selected according to the season. As for dry food, raisins and olives, [let there be] some of each for each person: one heaping wine measure per person of olives, but a level one of raisins. Similarly also six whole nuts per person, and dry medium figs per person but [portions of] the small and large ones differ. It should be the same also for the other fruits like these, and similarly for the rest, [p. 41] as we also said above concerning cooked legumes.

All these [regulations about portions] for things both cooked and raw, when they are dry, are fitting. But when the season has fresh [vegetables and fruits], both the food and the amount differ. Fresh vegetables, both cooked and raw, as well as almaia and likewise other foods similar to these, that are suitable for fast days and are properly prepared and meet the essential needs, [must be apportioned] as is appropriate.

For thus governed by the grace of God we are delivered from greed, in accordance with what one of the saints says, namely, "That which exceeds what is needed is greed." Hence also the apostle includes this passion when he enumerates the things that separate us from the kingdom of God, saying that "The greedy shall not inherit the kingdom of God" (I Cor. 6:10). To be "greedy" is applicable to every matter. All these things the cenobitic rules have transmitted, regarding both non-dry and dry foods, and they appointed the amount of all these [foods] with accuracy, both for recognition of consistency and on account of the scandals and other temptations that sprang up against those who desire to live harmoniously in company with many persons.

45. The person who lives the solitary life follows a different tradition and regulation, obviously in accordance with the strength of his body and his soul's guidance. All these [cenobitic regulations] are not scrupulously observed among the [hermit] monks. For every day the great Chariton of Jerusalem in the account of his life gives only bread and salt and water for food to the monks and says that this is the royal road.⁵¹ Likewise, St. Ephraem says that "When you practice abstinence, you will not be concerned about much provisioning, being satisfied with what is at hand; you fulfill your essential need with biscuits and a few lentils or other legumes or fresh vegetables."⁵²

Basil the Great, writing to St. Gregory the Theologian concerning monks, says that "In general, just as with regard to clothing, necessity was the primary consideration, likewise with regard to food, bread will fill the need and water will cure thirst for a healthy man, and any food that grows from seeds [p. 42] can sustain bodily strength for practical necessities."⁵³

St. Neilos says that "Living in accord with nature both for us and for animals is itself decreed by the creator; 'for behold I have given you,' says God to humankind, 'every grass of the field; it will be for food for you and for the beasts.' If, having received a common mode of life with the beasts, we turn this in our thoughts into a more profligate life, how would we not with good reason be judged more unreasonable than those [beasts], if indeed the beasts live by the law of nature, not disturbing any of the things ordained by God, but we, who are honored with reason, in every way live outside of the ancient legislation? Since, accordingly, every fault follows from greed, let us annihilate this temptation and let us discipline ourselves in poverty.”⁵⁴

20. BLACK MOUNTAIN

46. Consider this saying and law of the saint, for it is not for monks only, but also for those who live in the world and how much more fully is it fitting for monks. The divine apostle, nullifying the perverse greed of the body that is in accord with its very nature, says, “Make no provision for the flesh, to gratify its desires” (Rom. 13:14). But many other such [rules] of the divine fathers are united in the Lord in the Book of the Interpretations of the Commands of the Lord in chapters 60 and 61 and 62 and in other chapters.⁵⁵ The saints observed these things. For these reasons, if there does not happen to be olive oil, one must use for that purpose whatever else is at hand. But if not even this is possible, one should not be concerned, [since it is a matter] of necessity.

47. On Saturday at the completion of the fourth hour and the beginning of the fifth, it is necessary to set the refectory and eat two dishes with olive oil, both the legume soup and the boiled vegetables, just as we said above. If Christ should send a little cheese or egg or fish, it is to be eaten to the glory of God. One must not be preoccupied [with the subject of food], just as the divine fathers handed down and the Lord himself says, “Do not be anxious about what you eat” (Matt. 6:25; Luke 12:22) and so on. Similarly also the apostle restrains excessive preoccupation saying that “If we have food [p. 43] and clothing, with these we shall be content” (I Tim. 6:8).

Likewise, on Sunday at the completion of the third hour, it is necessary to set the refectory and eat two dishes. But if Christ should send something else that does not fit with two dishes, three are to be eaten of necessity, just as we said before. It is not necessary to have this [determined] in a rule, but simply by coincidence, when it happens. They must also have an evening meal on Saturday and Sunday and on the feast days, as appropriate, on each of which the quick collation is somewhat restricted.⁵⁶ The same holds also with wine, as we said before.

48. On the great feast days like the great feasts of the Mother of God and Christ and the birth and the beheading of [St. John] the Forerunner, as well as that of the two apostles Peter and Paul, on whatever day [the feast] falls, whether a Monday, Wednesday or Friday, it is necessary to do as follows. On the feasts of Christ and the Mother of God as well as the two feasts of [St. John] the Forerunner and that of the two holy apostles Peter and Paul, the rule for Sunday should be observed, except during Great Lent.

49. On the medium feasts [it is necessary] to set the refectory at the sixth hour and at night. As for the food, it is necessary to eat in the same fashion as on the other days, only to set the refectory at the sixth hour on account of the feast. But if it should fall on a fast day, it is necessary to eat dry food twice, that is, at midday and in the evening. If it is fitting, let it be vegetable soup with nothing else, if it will please God; or even with something else, if it is not suspect as a risk to the soul.

50. On the minor feasts it is necessary to eat at the ninth hour, as on the other days, once a day. But if it should fall on a fast day, [it is necessary] to eat dry foods as on the ordinary day, one meal for the day on the ninth [hour]. This holds if they eat in the evening, but if they eat at the ninth hour, let it be as is fitting. For on account of the feast, mealtime is scheduled earlier, so that in accord with what is fitting for each feast, by cutting down on each feast the customary time [that the monks have to wait before] eating, relaxation may take place, lest on the pretext of a feast, indeed of feasts, abuse be introduced and the abstinence be broken that is the fruit of the Holy Spirit according to the apostle (Gal. 5:22), or conversely [the celebration of] feasts be dishonored on the pretext of abstinence. But if it is fitting, let there also be cooked food without olive oil at the minor feasts, [p. 44] if God be pleased, or even with olive oil, when it is not suspect as a risk to the soul.

51. The precise specification for this interpretation of [rules regarding] food at the feasts is the purpose of the holy fathers who passed these things down, which indeed the treatise has set forth and which has been conformed to the Book of the Interpretations of the Commands of the Lord, fifty-eighth chapter.⁵⁷ For there it has all knowledge of the feasts set side by side with the words of the divine fathers.

52. Men in my position have the custom of naming of their own will certain days as feasts of the saints, [days] which are not reckoned by divine scripture as feasts, which is dangerous, whenever it would work out to the dissolution of the canonical fast, that is, Wednesday or Friday and Lent. For Monday has little danger, except for those doing penances and not taking communion, but for others [this custom] is observed without danger.

53. It is necessary to follow the feasts appointed by the fathers scrupulously and with fear and the knowledge of God in matters of food, both in the ordinary days, [and] all the more on fast days. For nowhere in the canonical scriptures are found changes of diet prescribed for the feasts, but just as it says in the Gerontikon, “Do not consider celebrating the feasts by drinking wine, but as a rebirth of the mind and cleansing of the soul. By gorging yourselves with food and wine you rather provoke the saint for whom the feast was founded.”⁵⁸ Again, someone else says, “If your mind tells you to make different foods for a feast, do not heed it, since [if you do], you feast in the Jewish way. For those people prepare these things and all such foods and set their mind on distinguishing and knowing.”⁵⁹

Taking our selections concerning the feasts from the divine scriptures we fitted them together in the above-mentioned divine treatise, the Interpretations of the Commands of the Lord, a book for edification. But also in the Divine Ladder it says, “There is no feast on earth for true monks.”⁶⁰ Other [sayings] concerning these matters [are found] in the discourse concerning the gladdening grief⁶¹ and in the treatise concerning fasting, as well as in Gregory the Theologian on “Christ is Born.”⁶² [St. John] Chrysostom in his [discourse] *On the [Epistle] to the Corinthians*⁶³ and all the fathers define and teach how the feasts of the Christians are conducted. The [writings] of [p. 45] John the Faster⁶⁴ and the rules of the monasteries do not agree exactly either with the sacred rules of the holy fathers themselves or [with those] of the other teachers in the holy scriptures or with any other canonical writing. But let the reader consider and let what is pleasing to God be done. So much on this topic.

54. In the fast season of St. Philip it is necessary to do as on the fast of the Holy Apostles, except to eat at night during this time because of the shortness of the days. Nevertheless, if this meal is inappropriate, let it be at the ninth hour as always. Christmas and Epiphany must be in accord with the rule, but if the vigils fall on a Saturday or Sunday, since there must not be a fast, it is necessary during the day at the time of the liturgy to eat only the blessed bread that is customarily given in the church, nothing else, and at night to eat a full meal, as the canon of Theophilus of Alexandria declares.⁶⁵ For the latter says there regarding this subject to take a full snack after the dismissal of the liturgy, and thus to await the evening assembly and [then] to eat a full meal. For thus we refute some of the heresies.

20. BLACK MOUNTAIN

55. We mentioned the twelve days of Christmas and the days of Pentecost. But if Christ should send a little cheese or egg, it is necessary to keep [some] of these and to taste a little bit of these every day on account of certain heresies, even if it is a Monday, Wednesday or Friday. Likewise, it is necessary to do the same thing during the week before the [week] of Meatfare during which the Armenians fast [in honor] of Artzibourios.⁶⁶ For it is the tradition among some to break the fast [during this week] in refutation of the heresy of the Armenians.

After the ninth hour on Wednesday and Friday [it is necessary] to taste a little cheese if it is appropriate. But if it is not, let us be taught what is best. Likewise on Wednesday and Friday of Cheesefare week. For on these two days of Cheesefare week, just as we said, it is necessary to eat cheese at the time of the common meal according to the custom of the fathers. For the canon of St. Nikephoros of Constantinople says the following: “That it is necessary for monks to fast on Wednesday of Cheesefare week and on Friday and to eat cheese after the dismissal [of the liturgy] of the Presanctified [Gifts], wherever they happen to be.”⁶⁷ This canon also refutes the dogma of [p. 46] Jacob and the heresy of the Tetraditai.⁶⁸ Thus says the canon of the saint.

56. On the first day of Lent one must not eat at all according to the rule of the Holy Mountain,⁶⁹ but on Tuesday, Wednesday, and Thursday one piece of bread is to be eaten and water, nothing else, except salt with the bread if it is beneficial. For St. Theodore the Studite in his Catechesis of the Great Friday of the first week [of Lent]⁷⁰ approves of eating every day on the appointed hour, even on these days, and cites as witnesses all the God-bearing fathers and God himself.

We do likewise from Tuesday of the first week on, but on Friday evening [on the vigil] of the [feast] of St. Theodore,⁷¹ it is necessary to eat a [legume] soup without olive oil, some other dry food, plus bread and water, nothing else. On Saturday and Sunday, just as we also said above, it is necessary to manage always without cheese and egg and fish. For these things belong to the rest of the Saturdays and Sundays of the year outside of Lent. But within [Lent] olive oil is to be eaten on Saturday and Sunday, and on Sunday it is the rule that wine, if it is available to us, is to be drunk to the glory of God.

On the Monday of the second week and from then on through the entirety of Lent outside of Saturdays and Sundays it is fitting to eat dry food according to the regulation of the sacred canons, as the council of Laodicea specifies in the fiftieth canon regarding eating dry food in Lent.⁷² Fruits, olives, and vegetables may be eaten if they are available, all uncooked.

These [regulations] are not in disagreement with the cenobitic rules. Nevertheless, one who reads the Life of our holy father Pachomios, the founder of monasteries, will find there as he studies that when those who had kitchen duty stopped working and were not cooking anything, the saint accused them and rebuked them, not about any other day, but about Saturday and Sunday, speaking as follows to the one in charge of this duty: “Why do you do this when the commands of the holy fathers order vegetables to [p. 47] be cooked for the brothers on Saturday and Sunday?”⁷³ So much for that [subject].

57. All year long it is not permitted to fast on Saturday and Sunday, but it is dangerous, and all the more [dangerous] to fast on Saturday and Sunday in Lent, on account of the dogma of the so-called *Eustathianoï*⁷⁴ and Markianistai and Lapetianoï and Messalianoi. For the Saturdays and Sundays are in a separate category. Likewise, the sacred canons ordain for Lent eating dry foods, and for Saturday and Sunday again [they ordain] the appropriate breaking of fast.⁷⁵ So much for that [subject].

Concerning mid-Lent week

58. On Wednesday of Mid-Lent Week, fast is not to be broken, for [this] is found in the typikon of Stoudios.⁷⁶ It specifies eating dry foods for this whole week, beyond what is the rule for other weeks. Likewise on [the day of] the Great Canon it is not permitted to break fast, because it is rather a day of grief and not a feast. Likewise also on both days—that is, Mid-Lent [Wednesday] and the day of the Great Canon—the Alleluia is sung and not the “God is the Lord” (Ps. 117 [118]: 27).

59. [On the feast] of the Forty Holy Martyrs⁷⁷ and [that of] [St. John] the Forerunner,⁷⁸ one course without olive oil is to be eaten—the [legume] soup, that is, and fruits if there happen to be any, one [meal] per day after vespers. But if these feasts fall in the first week, it is necessary not to break fast, but to observe [these feasts] during the week of Cheesefare, just as they do on the Holy Mountain and elsewhere. For when the feast of the Presentation of Christ in the Temple⁷⁹ falls in the first week, they do not break fast, but celebrate it in advance during the week of Cheesefare. All the more is it necessary [to celebrate] these [feasts] also [in advance], just as the sacred canons specify that it is necessary to celebrate on Saturday and Sunday.

For the holy council of Laodicea says in the fifty-first canon as follows: “That it is not necessary in Lent to celebrate [the actual day of] the birth of the martyrs, but to commemorate the holy martyrs on Saturdays and Sundays.” So says the holy council. But if they fall after the first week, they are celebrated on whatever day they fall, in every era and every place.⁸⁰

60. On the feast of the Annunciation,⁸¹ the two dishes must be eaten with olive oil, and likewise, fish, if there happens to be any, [p. 48] must be eaten on whatever day [the feast] falls. But on any other day of Lent, fish is not to be eaten, just as the sacred canons state. If there happens to be wine on that day, it is necessary to drink it according to the rule, which we also cited before;⁸² but it is necessary to eat [only] once a day, after vespers.

61. On Friday on the vigil [of the feast] of [St.] Lazarus, it is necessary to eat one dish, the [legume] soup, that is, without olive oil, and fruits if there are any, and bread and water.

20. BLACK MOUNTAIN

62. On Monday, Tuesday and Wednesday of Holy Week [it is necessary to eat] bread and water and raw vegetables or salt, one of the two, at evening just as the sacred canons specify.

Concerning Holy Thursday

63. On Holy Thursday, it is necessary to eat the [legume] soup without olive oil and [to eat] other dry food, [for on this day] the “Alleluia” is sung and not the [psalm], “God is the Lord” (Ps. 117 [118]: 27). The difference [in the regulations] regarding the food on Holy Thursday is as follows. The sacred canons specify dry foods, as on the preceding days of Lent. For the council of Laodicea says concerning Holy Thursday in the fiftieth canon as follows: “That it is necessary on Thursday of the last week of Lent not to break fast, thereby dishonoring all of Lent, but to fast with dry foods on every day of Lent.”⁸³ Thus says the holy council.

Nevertheless, the divine [St. John] Chrysostom in one of his discourses says as follows: “If you break fast on the preceding days, break fast also on this one; but if it is not permitted to break fast on those days, do not break fast on this one either, but rather tighten your fast.”⁸⁴ So says Chrysostom.

But the typika of the great monasteries, that is, of Stoudios and Jerusalem, as well as those of the Holy Mountain (I know not where they got the tradition from), say to eat [legume] soup and boiled [beans] with olive oil and to drink wine according to the rule.⁸⁵ We have compared this difference in diet of the former and latter [regulations] and have set it down here, so that [our] conscience may not be sullied at all in either case.

64. On Good Friday, if it is possible, one ought not eat, just as the fathers specify. Nevertheless, we do not have this command [p. 49] not to eat then according to any canon, nor as an absolute, but the fathers established it [to be done] to the extent of the ability of each. For this reason if it is possible to sustain a fast for the two days, Friday and Saturday, it is good and acceptable. But if not, at least on Saturday, then on Friday bread and raw vegetables are to be eaten with water. Nevertheless, each one [should do] as he is able and as he wishes.

65. On Holy Saturday, it is necessary to eat at the completion of the third hour of the night, in accord with the tradition of the fathers. It is necessary, however, to sound the semantron simultaneously with the sunset and to dismiss [the service] when it is concluded. It is necessary to bake the common bread [for Holy Saturday] on Holy Thursday—[which must not], however, be of fine quality—so that [on Holy Saturday] the necessary fast and [church] service will not be cut short.

It is necessary to eat this common bread with fruit in the refectory on Holy Saturday according to the rule of the Holy Mountain.⁸⁶ But if there happens to be wine also, it is necessary to drink it according to the rule. But the oblation bread for the church must be baked separately on Holy Thursday.

66. It should be known that in the *Constitutions of the Holy Apostles*⁸⁷ and elsewhere as well the fathers specify that the faithful must fast until the cock crow. But the holy Sixth council specifies until midnight.⁸⁸ The typika of the great monasteries, that is, of Stoudios and Jerusalem and the Holy Mountain,⁸⁹ say to complete the order of offices until the end of the third hour of the night and to eat as follows: to eat nothing else except bread and fruit and a little wine, I suppose for the sake of not subverting the apostolic and canonical hours. But others of the fathers said to sound the semantron at dusk, and by the time the order of the offices is completed, the fourth hour will have come.

ELEVENTH CENTURY

67. After comparing all these [traditions regarding Holy Saturday], we pronounced to our own brothers just as we set it down above. Nevertheless, according to the word of the fathers it is necessary to sound the semantron simultaneously with the setting of the sun, and dismiss [the service] when it is concluded.

68. It should be known that in Lent or whenever a fast day falls, it is necessary to eat raw vegetables, if they are available, instead of fruit, sometimes one, sometimes the other. As for the amount of the servings of dry food, [i.e.,] both of [raw] vegetables and fruits and [p. 50] other kinds [of food], what we said above concerning non-dry foods applies also to these two servings [of raw vegetables].⁹⁰ Similarly, when days occur that call for two kinds of food, one non-dry, and one dry [the same rule applies].

69. It should be known that all year long, both on the part of the one who is in charge of the refectory and on the part of the brothers, there must be scrupulous observance of the following: that no one will touch anything at an inappropriate hour and time before the refectory is set, neither any food whatsoever nor water, until the blessing be given in the church and they take their seats in the refectory, just as also St. Cassian says in the Cenobitic Constitutions,⁹¹ and Basil the Great in his Ascetical Treatises and [just as] the other fathers have passed down.⁹²

70. It is necessary that blessed bread be given in the church each day, just as it declares in the Ascetical Treatises of Basil the Great⁹³ and as they do here on the Black Mountain, whether they conduct the liturgy or not, after the dismissal, when the brothers are about to eat. But it must not be according to the rule for Pentecost regarding size, but an extremely small piece, so that they partake of it from faith and not take it for granted and scorn it. For he who scorns the things that are considered small (which they are not) because he feels superior to the small, will also scorn those that are considered great, and moreover, even God himself. Then he will be left by him [God] to fall into the hands of his enemies. But it is necessary to eat the blessing in the refectory at the beginning, before you partake of anything else.

Outside of the refectory, it is not permitted to eat food at all, except those taking communion [who are permitted to drink] a small sip from the water or, if it is fitting, a little from the wine. Likewise he who conducts the liturgy [may partake] up to the same amount, nothing more whatsoever. But when the brothers arise from the table, with respect to water alone they are not restricted, and each ought to take as much as he can, but with respect to other [food] it is not permitted [to take] anything.

71. It is also necessary to know that, just as we said before concerning psalmody, that according to tradition there must be no regulation in the cenobitic monasteries except the singing of psalms in common, not even for a single service, but all [singing of psalms] must be communal, unless somehow [it were], with reasonable justification, for the benefit and salvation of a soul and in the manner that we already prescribed⁹⁴ and with the consent of the superior. [p. 51]

20. BLACK MOUNTAIN

72. In the same way also for food. According to tradition, it is not permitted to eat anything in private, unless for the sake of extraordinary self-discipline and struggle or for some other good reason at the exhortation of the spiritual president for the salvation of souls, and not through the maleficent activity of demons.

This is neither inappropriate nor unattested, but we even have abundant scriptural testimony in the Ascetical Treatises of Basil the Great, as when he says that “Food must be in accord with one’s labor and contribution.”⁹⁵ Again in the writings about St. Pachomios a varied diet was permitted by the holy angel.⁹⁶ In general, many others of the saints, among both men’s and women’s cenobitic monasteries, practiced extraordinary fasting and vigil. There is no hindrance, only let it be for the sake of [ascetic] exertion, if indeed it is conducive to the glory of God and not for blasphemy and for injury of the soul.

Concerning the collation of the priest and the others

73. It should be known that with respect to collation in church only those who take communion may partake of the collation privately at the sacristy, consisting of a little of the water only or of the wine if it is fitting, and a small piece of blessed bread—but the others not at all—just as the divine [St. John] Chrysostom permitted those partaking of the communion to taste a little something for the sake of a rinse.

As for the [phrase] “privately at the sacristy,” in this rule [it means] just as they also do [at the Monastery of St. Antony]⁹⁷ on the mountain of St. Auxentios in the rule about eucharistic wine. The priest must do likewise whenever he conducts the liturgy. But if it is a day when the liturgy is not at meal time, and someone happens to receive communion, he must because of the communion have water alone as collation, water from that which they mix in the divine cup [of the eucharist], and only a very little for the sake of blessing, just enough to rinse the mouth, or again wine, if it is fitting, in the same amount.

The priest who acted as the celebrant must do the same. But it is necessary to eat the blessed bread at meal time, just as we have said above, and let no pretense find place. This should be done whenever the liturgy takes place [at hours] different from the hours when the brothers eat.

74. To do this is appropriate on fast days, just as [p. 52] it also says in the typika concerning the fast of the Holy Apostles, that the liturgy is on the sixth hour, but the typikon of the monks of Studios says that “every Wednesday and Friday we celebrate the ninth hour.”⁹⁸ Nevertheless, the sacred canons penalize those who break fast because they do not take it seriously and not those who practice the will of God with greater virtue, and especially regarding the divine liturgy and communion, since it is a command of the holy apostles to celebrate the liturgy on Wednesday and Friday,⁹⁹ and since it is the command of the same apostles to fast on Wednesday and Friday.¹⁰⁰

On account of this the rule regarding collation was established for both purposes. It is necessary to do well by the ill and aged and weak as appropriate, just as Basil the Great ordained in his Ascetical Treatises.¹⁰¹

Concerning clothing and shoes and every bodily need

75. It should be known that, just as the divine fathers specify regarding the food of the monks to pursue the plain and simple, so also [the rule] must apply with respect to clothing, as Basil the Great, in his Ascetical Treatises, decrees in detail every appropriate need of monks.¹⁰² It is necessary also for us to observe this rule as much as possible.

Each of the brothers ought to have two tunics, one old patched one, and another one in good condition for dress occasions, whatever kind of *rasa*¹⁰³ are made locally and are cheapest on the domestic market, as the divine fathers handed down. If on the local market foreign ones are found more cheaply, they are to use these. In general, it is necessary to pursue in every matter that which is most free from distractions and fancy work and [is] very simple.

Likewise, [each of the brothers] ought [to have] a heavy cloak, again the cheapest possible, as well as a pair of boots that serve both inside and out on the road. But there is need for such things most of all on the road, likewise in the winter for warmth, but in summer they are not very necessary, just as the fathers specify. Moreover, the divine [St. John] Chrysostom speaks specifically concerning this in his [discourse On] [p. 53] the Epistle to the Philippians.¹⁰⁴

Likewise, one pair of sandals, such as are available extremely cheaply, and a small cloak like the [two] tunics, poor both in quality and price. Also another garment for use in winter, and in general anything else necessary to one's proper monastic rank, one of each to each monk, that suffice well both inside and outside, just as the divine fathers handed down, especially Basil the Great in his Ascetical Treatises concerning all that pertains to both clothing and shoes, that "the least fancy and poorest and sufficient for the purpose of need—this is to be chosen in each season."¹⁰⁵ This is the regulation of Basil the Great for everything.

Each one is to have a monk's cap, with a cloth cover like the garment, and this he must keep. When some brother is about to abandon the brotherhood, and receives also every possible medicine, as the Lord handed down, and still is not eager to be cured, then, in accord with the word of the Lord, "Let him be to you as a gentile and a tax collector" (Matt. 18:17). The following is to demonstrate clearly the habit of such men: the superior must tear off the cloth of the monk's cap, and seize it for himself, or take back to himself the whole cap, recalling unto himself, as it were, the grace and blessing that he had granted, just as the Lord says, "And if [the house] is not worthy of peace" (Matt. 10:13) and so on.

St. Cassian in the regulations of the Cenobitic Constitutions says that those at the point of renouncing [the monastic life] and not making progress be stripped completely of the clothes of the monastery and dressed again in the clothing of the world which [each one] was wearing when he came, and thus be dismissed.¹⁰⁶

76. We know even now a similar small rule that is said to be in the holy monastery of lord Antony on the mountain of St. Auxentios, opposite Constantinople. For during the night and day vigil during the reading when all the monks are seated, they weave each with his own hands what among us are called raso braids, on the one hand in order to stay awake and listen to the lectures, and on the other to have these as a blessing, since they were made at the time of the common [p. 54] assembly in the church. These they attach to the outer garments of the brethren, as is the custom among monks.

20. BLACK MOUNTAIN

If one of the brothers is about to leave the monastery and be severed from the brotherhood, they offer every appropriate remedy to him, and if he heeds and abandons the [intended] departure, well and good. But if not, they take back nothing else except this: they tear off the braids from all of his outer garments and seize them, as if to seize the blessing given by them, and they dismiss the brother without this blessing.

77. In keeping with this rule of the ancient fathers, such as the writings of St. Cassian, which we mentioned, as well as recent practices and the knowledge that we also mentioned above from the Gospel passages, it is necessary for us to keep some small part [of the defector's habit]. If appropriate, the superior may even take away [the defector's] cloak, and clothe [the defector] with an outsider's [lay person's] [cloak] if [the defector] is an abbas; but if not, to take only the monk's cap and [for him] to wear another [of the kind worn by] outsiders; or at least [to take] the cloth which serves as a cover and thus to dismiss him. In the case of a novice take this [the cloth of the monk's cap] as appropriate and dismiss them in the manner which we have stated.

It is necessary to do this not simply, like the superior in the *Paterikon*¹⁰⁷ who took the entire habit of the brethren, but with the full knowledge of God and with spiritual discernment to take these things and thus to relegate [the defector] to worldly existence. He must, however, be dressed like those outside the monastic community. For it is inappropriate to wear the habit of the rule when living outside doing foreign work, and to bear the name [of monk] only in appearance. Nevertheless, if it also is beneficial for the salvation of the soul and God is pleased at this, let it be. But if not, whatever is good and pleasing to God, let this be to his glory and not blasphemy.

Concerning the monastic officials and other occupations of the brethren

78. It should be known that those who serve in the holy monastery must observe the rule just as we have received it from the holy fathers, both from the Ascetical Treatises of Basil the Great and the Life of our holy father Pachomios, and from the Cenobitic Constitutions of St. Cassian the Roman and the [p. 55] other holy fathers. They must, that is, take a turn of service. In [the Life] of St. Pachomios¹⁰⁸ the holy angel decreed that they should change [duties] every three weeks, but in [the writings] of St. Cassian,¹⁰⁹ every week. Likewise in the Ascetical Treatises of Basil the Great.¹¹⁰ But because of the difference [in these writings] regarding the [number of] weeks [for from one Holy Spirit is the rule, and there is nothing to prevent for some good reason changing the time limits], it is necessary for each of the brothers to do kitchen duty and serve the rest [of the brethren] for a month at a time, and then for another to receive the duty and serve the brethren in turn, just as the Lord says and exhorts to serve and love one another. But if the superior understands that someone is serving well and is worthy of the duty, and that he is both benefiting personally from it and benefiting [the brotherhood] in his performance of the duty, he ought to leave him in that duty. For indeed this is not inappropriate, but according to the tradition of the holy fathers, just as St. Cassian says in the Cenobitic Constitutions.¹¹¹

ELEVENTH CENTURY

79. It should be known that if a community service is strenuous, it is necessary to work at it up to the third hour, but until the sixth hour for much lighter duties that do not involve toil and labor, if indeed [such duties] are to be found. But if they are not found, it is necessary to be occupied within the monastery in handiwork or anything else that is acceptable. But if they happen to be outside of the monastery, as we also said before, it is necessary to work until the sixth hour, but from the sixth hour they do not go outside for such tasks, but must be occupied inside the monastery in handiwork and study of the divine scriptures and in lessons.

In general, each must strive for salvation in whatever way he chooses. Self-control and the rest of his discipline may not be broken on the pretext of his work, nor again on the pretext of self-discipline may his work be granted a reduction, but it is necessary to do here as is appropriate and as we have ordained in writing. But if the duty is necessary, he who is able ought to work the appropriate amount and more, to get through as much as he can of the excessive labor without injury. In this way again it is necessary, whenever he is not outside at heavy work, to occupy himself in handiwork and study of the divine scriptures and anything else that might be appropriate.

80. A house, that is, a cell, ought to be dedicated for the sake of [p. 56] handiwork, and those engaged in the appropriate handiwork ought to be assembled there and work under [. . .] in accord with the rule of the Cenobitic Constitutions.¹¹² But one of the brothers, attested for his virtue, ought to preside and supervise, sometimes reading to the working brothers, sometimes paying attention and silencing them due to idle talking, sometimes leading in a psalm with the rest repeating it after him, and sometimes working with them. In general, both outside in heavy work and inside in handiwork he ought to be observing and taking charge, as well as teaching the unlettered the divine scriptures.

Likewise, whenever the superior is not present, he must attend to the spiritual duties in place [of the superior]—if he is capable—and simply to spiritual matters alone, not physical ones also. But if he is competent for both, he must in both capacities serve and follow the divine purpose of the superior and his conduct which is lawful and in accord with the divine scriptures, until the superior perceives that he is worthy of these duties. If the superior perceives accurately and truly, with fear of God, that this person is not capable of working in this capacity, and if God so pleases, he must replace him and put another in his place, if he has [another]. But if there is not someone capable of this, forego this service until the time when a person worthy of this duty be found.

81. The precentor must read in the refectory, if he is able, or whoever is good at it, or someone else who knows how [to read]. The reader must wash the dishes and so on as well, in keeping with the rule of the Holy Mountain.¹¹³

82. It should be known that all the brothers must work, as was said above, each at whatever craft he is skilled at. Those who are able must work the earth for the appointed time and after this [must] work at handiwork. But those who are not able to work the earth must each work at different tasks as appropriate in accordance with the saying of the apostle: “He who does not work,” he says, “let him not eat” (II Thess. 3:10). For the administration and the requirements of the brothers ought to be provided by themselves. But if some handiwork does not cause a brother to rejoice, or again if he fails to learn something due to deviltry or [p. 57] wickedness, it is necessary to assign him to heavier working of the earth, if his body and constitution are sound. [If] he is weak in body and constitution, let him be assigned to other duties as appropriate, just as the divine fathers ordain, so that he may not be unproductive among the other brothers and an occasion for scandal, as the Lord says, “O wicked and slothful servant” (Matt. 25:26) and so on.

20. BLACK MOUNTAIN

83. Just as we said before concerning psalmody and nourishment,¹¹⁴ that when there is good reason they may be done individually in private, and we demonstrated from the divine scriptures that this was reasonable, so also in the same way with respect to working, let each one, in accord with the lawful command and urging of the superior, work individually in private at what is appropriate to him, if it is to his own good and not for an unreasonable motive. For if you look up the Life of our holy father Pachomios, you will find this there frequently, in particular in the case of that person who worked two mats of rushes a day privately in his cell with corrupt reasoning and vainglorious zeal.¹¹⁵ Likewise again many others of the saints practiced and taught this virtuously with right rationale. The holy fathers very specifically taught us this: that as far as we are concerned the Lord and his blameless mother provide our daily fare and the rest of the necessary requirements of the body on the basis of our just labors and personal work.

84. It is not to our interest to accept in the monastery any possession whatsoever that introduces tasks foreign to the purpose of cenobitic life—especially since [we are] susceptible to passions and spiritually weak—but we should indeed avoid it and shun it like deadly venom, just as we corroborated in compiling very many chapters about such things from the divine scriptures in another work, the Interpretations of the Divine Commands of the Lord, in chapters 44 and 46 concerning poverty,¹¹⁶ and in various other treatises [in that work] in agreement with the purpose that we loved, and sanctioning those who keep this divine purpose.

The chapters [in that work] are legally valid and comprehensive and do not [apply to] particular or special [circumstances]. For those things that were done or spoken particularly or specially in some way should not [p. 58] be taken as comprehensive or legally valid testimonies. Therefore we did not integrate in these [rules] the sources that are particular and special, but compiled those that are comprehensive and legally binding into a whole composition in the Lord, and in particular, we compiled such as are harmonious with the commands of the Lord, like the above-mentioned book containing the commands of the Lord.

Nevertheless, the monastic life professes to a greater degree what the world professes. The worldly life professes the commands of the Lord, but the monastic life both professes death from the world and pledges to God life crucified in its submission and tonsuring. This is the comprehensive command and tradition of the monks. We take care first of all to confess these things here, and not only here, but also every place where it is appropriate, but especially here.

We ought to follow those teachings and traditions of St. Symeon the Wonderworker, the great illuminator of the whole world, which during his life he committed to his disciples, since we have our dwelling in his country and place, and not introduce other fathers and teachers from any other country over him, especially within [the country] of such an illuminator, nor indeed any teachings that seem contradictory and opposed to the teachings and traditions of the saint.

For the teachings of Gelasios in the Paterikon and the like are particular and special. If they are appropriate at all, they are appropriate not to us but to others, those similar to him first of all and to those to whose ways they are appropriate, as God alone knows and as is acceptable to his goodness. Nevertheless, let us consider also the following about father Gelasios, what freedom from passion he must have attained in such matters for that old fellow ascetic of his to have said, “Your thoughts are devoted to the embroidery needle more than the thoughts of Gelasios to the land.”¹¹⁷ So much for that [subject of possessions] here. Elsewhere he demonstrated in many matters the freedom from passion that was at work in him. For what law courts and other worldly occupations did this man not enter maintaining freedom from passion in these situations? For this reason I said before that for us who are susceptible to passions, these [teachings of Gelasios] are inappropriate.

In these regulations we did not collect together special teachings in these [rules] on the grounds that [such teachings] are partial and not comprehensive. For where [p. 59] in these special and particular chapters can be realized the Lord’s comprehensive command—I do not mean to the monks but also to the men of the world—which says, “To him that takes away your goods do not demand them back, and to him that would sue you and take your coat, give your cloak as well” (cf. Luke 6:30; Matt. 5:40, 42) and the like? Nevertheless, let the person who is capable and who supposes that he speaks the truth and thinks that he will defend himself against the rejection of the commands of the Lord and the other divine scriptures ponder this issue. For myself, I am negligent and careless and guilty of many sins, and would that I might defend myself against them, but I suppose not. Let this suffice concerning these things.

85. We were taught that whenever possible, money or anything else offered from outsiders either directly or indirectly by chance should not be accepted, except as the divine fathers in the divine scriptures allow.

86. One must not receive any of the female sex in the monastery at all. For we did not receive this [practice] from the divine fathers at all, and our own nature teaches us not to accept it at all. We do not allow them to be in the area subordinate to or surrounding the monastery at all, whether to be inside of the monastery or outside, nor to come inside at all for the sake of service or any other cause whatsoever, nor again outside [may one] tend them or be served by them, whether grazing animals or work animals, whether birds or quadrupeds.

If not outside, all the more [do we reject] entrance inside of the monastery, whether beast or human female; but in particular the race of women is the “bitter lure” just as the divine fathers handed down. We are not so disposed [towards them] because we hate our race (God forbid!), since it is absolutely demonic to hate and reject the creation of God; for we have been born from them. But just as the divine fathers say, “Salt by nature is born from water; but when salt is mixed with water, it is dissolved; thus also is the male mixed with the female.”¹¹⁸

Concerning the fast of the Mother of God

87. It should be known that the fast of the supremely glorious Mother of God is not [p. 60] put in the right written order in the present typonikon, but at the end, because there was still a question

20. BLACK MOUNTAIN

when this was published, and a controversy over some matters was involved. But we must keep this [fast] in accordance with what we have received, since we have the testimonies from the holy scriptures. These written testimonies concerning this fast we have set forth more fully elsewhere, in another essay in the Book of the Interpretation of the Commands of the Lord.¹¹⁹

For this [fast] is proclaimed in the tome of the Synod of Union as well as in the address of John, metropolitan of Nicaea to the katholikos of Armenia.¹²⁰ But it is necessary for those who are in the monastery to keep this [fast] from the beginning of the month of August, that is, from the feast of the Holy Maccabees.¹²¹ For it is inappropriate [to start the fast] without a feast day. But if it is even possible [to start] from the preceding Sunday, let it be so, but [it must start] at least on an ordinary day and not on a fast day—that is Wednesday or Friday—so that our divinely inclined conscience might not be sullied.

Subsequently [fasting] must be observed until the feast of the Mother of God¹²² in accordance with the rule for the other feasts. With respect to food and drink, it is necessary for us to do just as [we do] on the fast of the Holy Apostles and Christmas, as far as the kind of food is concerned.

On the feast [of the Transfiguration] of the Savior,¹²³ just as they recommend celebrating the feast of the Holy of Holies [Presentation of the Mother of God]¹²⁴ for two days, that is, the feast and the afterfeast, on account of the fast, so also must we do here.

On the day of the feast [of the Transfiguration] of the Savior, it is necessary to break fast for everything, if it is possible. Otherwise, let it be like the feast of the Holy of Holies [Presentation of the Mother of God], but let the afterfeast be as appropriate. But if for some good reason afterfeast [hymns] are sung for several days, nothing hinders both keeping the fast and singing the afterfeast hymns, just as we often find in the other afterfeast celebrations of the great feasts, except for the first day after the feast.

88. Accordingly, if we find any lawful written testimonies from the holy fathers forbidding this [fast], we, too, urge that it be abandoned. But if not, it is wrong and inappropriate and moreover dangerous [to disregard] what has been written down and ordained by the holy fathers, and without scriptural testimony [p. 61] to obey men and to wander hither and thither each according to his own desires.

Concerning the feasts at which “God is the Lord” (Ps. 117 [118]:27) is sung

89. It should be known that the feasts herein comprise three orders: great, medium and minor. This is not without witness, but [comes] from the divine scriptures, just as we also noted above in the sections concerning food and drink and liturgy. For those which have general assemblies of the people and evening lections, and again in the morning the hymn, “Let everything that has breath [praise the Lord]” (Ps. 150 [151]:6) and a Gospel reading are classified as great feasts of the Lord.

Regarding the medium and minor orders, we are taught from the typikon of the monks of Studios and the Holy Mountain how they differ concerning [the celebration of] the hours and the prostrations and labor. Whoever knows better with [the help of] God, let him consider it.

We say here at least that the great feasts of Christ and the Mother of God, and the two of [St. John] the Forerunner, that is, the birth and the beheading, and that of the two holy and illustrious apostles Peter and Paul, are marked by the sign of the cross surrounded by a halo; the medium feasts only with the sign [of the cross]; and again the minor ones have only triple-point signs [kentemata].

ELEVENTH CENTURY

On the minor feasts there are no genuflections in church nor any common fasts, but both may be done privately. On the medium feasts they may not be done in the church at all, but privately when it is approved; for this is more accommodating with respect to both genuflections and to fasting. But on the great feasts there are no genuflections nor fasting at all, neither in the church nor in the cell at all. Likewise there are no genuflections in the entirety of Pentecost at all, neither in the church nor in the cell privately, according to the rule which they keep. The rest of the Sundays of the year [are observed] as the sacred canons decree.

The Month of September has 30 Days

Beginning of the Indiction and [Minor Feast] of St. Symeon the Ancient

- [Minor Feast] 2. St. Mamas
- [Minor Feast] 3. St. Anthimos [p. 62]
- [Minor Feast] 5. The holy prophet Zachariah
- [Minor Feast] 6. The archangel Michael
- [Minor Feast] 7. Forefeast [of the birth] of the Mother of God
- [Great Feast] 8. Birth of the Mother of God
- [Minor Feast] 9. Sts. Joachim and Anne
- [Minor Feast] 13. [Commemoration of] the consecration [of the church] of the Holy Resurrection [in Jerusalem]
- [Great Feast] 14. The Holy Cross

Scholion: Note this—the fast of the cross is comprehensive, as some pass the tradition down, regarding kinds of food, but not regarding the hours.

- [Minor Feast] 15. St. Nikitas
- [Minor Feast] 16. St. Euphemia
- [Minor Feast] 20. St. Eustathios
- [Minor Feast] 23. [Commemoration of the] silence of Zachariah¹²⁵
- [Minor Feast] 24. St. Thekla
- [Medium Feast] 26. The holy apostle John the Theologian
- [Minor Feast] 28. St. Chariton
- [Minor Feast] 30. St. Gregory of Great Armenia

The Month of October has 31 Days

- [Minor Feast] 1. St. Ananias
- [Minor Feast] 2. St. Cyprian
- [Minor Feast] 3. St. Dionysios
- [Minor Feast] 6. The holy apostle Thomas
- [Minor Feast] 7. Sts. Sergios and Bakchos
- [Minor Feast] 9. St. James the son of Alphaios

20. BLACK MOUNTAIN

- [Minor Feast] 18. The holy apostle Luke
- [Minor Feast] 21. The blessed Hilarion
- [Medium Feast] 23. The holy apostle James the brother of God
- [Minor Feast] 24. St. Arethas
- [Medium Feast] 26. St. Demetrios the Great Martyr

The Month of November has 30 Days

- [Minor Feast] 1. The holy Anargyroi [Sts. Kosmas and Damian]
- [Minor Feast] 7. St. Paul the Confessor
- [Medium Feast] 8. [The feast of] the incorporeal [archangels] [p. 63]
- [Minor Feast] 11. St. Menas
- [Minor Feast] 12. St. John the Merciful
- [Medium Feast] 13. The revered [St. John] Chrysostom
- [Medium Feast] 14. St. Philip the Apostle
- [Medium Feast] 16. St. Matthew the Apostle
- [Great Feast] 21. The Mother of God's [Entrance into] the Holy of Holies [Presentation in the Temple]
- [Minor Feast] 22. Afterfeast
- [Minor Feast] 25. St. Clement of Rome and [St.] Peter
- [Medium Feast] 30. St. Andrew the Apostle

The Month of December has 31 Days

- [Minor Feast] 4. St. Barbara
- [Minor Feast] 5. Our blessed father Sabas
- [Medium Feast] 6. Our blessed father Nicholas
- [Medium Feast] 9. The conception of St. Anne
- [Minor Feast] 13. St. Eustratios
- [Minor Feast] 17. The holy prophet Daniel and the three youths
- [Medium Feast] 20. St. Ignatios
- [Minor Feast] 21. Christmas forefeast

It is a fast, but from Christmas to Epiphany there are no genuflections in church, but there are in private.

It should be known that some are in the habit—I know not how—of breaking fast and other related rites not on the day when the office of the feast [of Christmas] begins, but [in advance] during the forefeast of Christmas.¹²⁶ The traditions of the fathers do not so ordain, but rather they prescribe that exertions be intensified during these days. For indeed the divine [St. John] Chrysostom says so in one of his discourses, [that] on the blessed Philogonios which was delivered¹²⁷ and is still read five days before Christmas. For he says the following: “The appointed period of these five days is enough, if you fast and are watchful and keep vigil, for most sins to be prevented.”¹²⁸ He who comes upon the rest that follows, moreover, in the rules of the great monasteries—especially in the ancient [rule] of Jerusalem that was handed down by the fathers—they do not ordain that [p.

ELEVENTH CENTURY

64] [the psalm] “God is the Lord” (Ps. 117 [118]: 27) be sung but the Alleluia, even after the forefeast. These written witnesses as well as the rules that have been handed down to us and are still customary we wrote down just as we found them. But let one who happens upon these things consider, and if something is good and pleasing to God, let it be done.

The Month of January has 31 Days

- [Great Feast] 6. Holy Epiphany
- [Medium Feast] 7. The commemoration of [St. John] the Forerunner, until the closure of the feast
- [Minor Feast] 14. The holy fathers [of Raithou]
- [Minor Feast] 16. [Adoration of] the venerable chain of the apostle Peter
- [Minor Feast] 17. St. Antony
- [Minor Feast] 18. Sts. Athanasios and Cyril
- [Minor Feast] 20. St. Euthymios
- [Minor Feast] 22. The holy apostle Timothy
- [Minor Feast] 23. St. Clement of Ankyra
- [Medium Feast] 25. St. Gregory the Theologian
- [Minor Feast] 27. The deposition of [the relics of] [St. John] Chrysostom
- [Minor Feast] 28. St. Ephraem
- [Minor Feast] 29. The deposition of [the relics of] St. Ignatios
- [Minor Feast] 31. Sts. Cyrus and John

The Month of February has 28 Days

- [Minor Feast] 1. St. Trypho
- [Great Feast] 2. The presentation of Christ in the Temple
- [Medium Feast] 3. St. Symeon the Receiver of God
- [Minor Feast] 24. Finding of the Head of [St. John] the Forerunner

The Month of March has 31 Days

- [Minor Feast] 9. The Forty Holy Martyrs [of Sebasteia]
- [Great Feast] 25. The Annunciation of the Mother of God

The Month of April has 30 Days

- [Medium Feast] 23. St. George the Great Martyr
- [Medium Feast] 25. The holy apostle Mark
- [Medium Feast] 30. St. James the son of Zebedee

The Month of May has 31 Days [p. 65]

- [Minor Feast] 2. St. Athanasios
- [Medium Feast] 8. The holy apostle John the Theologian
- [Medium Feast] 10. The holy apostle Simon the Zealot
- [Minor Feast] 15. Our holy father Pachomios

20. BLACK MOUNTAIN

- [Minor Feast] 21. Sts. Constantine and Helen
- [Minor Feast] 24. St. Symeon the Wonderworker

The Month of June has 30 Days

- [Minor Feast] 8. St. Theodore the Commander
- [Medium Feast] 11. The holy apostle[s] Bartholomew and Barnabas
- [Minor Feast] 14. The holy prophet Elisha
- [Medium Feast] 19. The holy apostle Jude
- [Great Feast] 24. The birth of [St. John] the Forerunner
- [Great Feast] 29. The holy apostles Peter and Paul
- [Medium Feast] 30. The Holy Twelve Apostles

The Month of July has 31 Days

- [Minor Feast] 1. The holy Anargyroi [Sts. Kosmas and Damian]
- [Minor Feast] 2. [Deposition of] the venerable robe of the Mother of God [in Blachernai]
- [Minor Feast] 8. St. Prokopios
- [Minor Feast] 11. St. Euphemia
- [Minor Feast] 13. The archangel Gabriel
- [Minor Feast] 15. Sts. Kyrikos and Iulitta
- [Medium Feast] 20. The prophet Elijah
- [Medium Feast] 22. St. Mary Magdalene
- [Minor Feast] 25. The dormition of St. Anne
- [Medium Feast] 27. St. Panteleemon

The Month of August has 31 Days

- [Minor Feast] 1. The Holy Maccabees
- [Minor Feast] 2. The deposition of the relics of the protomartyr Stephen
- [Minor Feast] 5. Forefeast of the Transfiguration
- [Great Feast] 6. The Transfiguration of the Savior
- [Minor Feast] 7. Afterfeast [p. 66]
- [Major Feast] 9. The holy apostle Matthew
- [Minor Feast] 14. Forefeast of [the Dormition of] the Mother of God
- [Great Feast] 15. Dormition of the Mother of God
- [Minor Feast] 17. Afterfeast
- [Minor Feast] 24. Finding of the relics of the holy apostle Bartholomew
- [Great Feast] 29. Beheading of the venerable [St. John the] Forerunner
- [Minor Feast] 31. [Adoration of] the venerable girdle of the Mother of God

90. In the week before Meatfare week, which the Armenians observe also as a fast [in honor of] Artzibourios, there is no fasting at all by some, either on Wednesday or Friday, neither for cheese nor for anything else, refuting the heresy of the Armenians. But among us, if this is permitted, let there be just a little cheese after the ninth hour on Wednesday and Friday, according to the regulation for Cheesefare week, eating on these two days a little cheese for the refuting of the heresy. But if it is not [permitted], let us be taught what is better.

Similarly during Cheesefare week, on Wednesday and Friday according to the tradition of the holy fathers there is partaking of cheese and egg after the dismissal of the [liturgy of] presanctified [gifts]. This similarity is on account of the dogma of Jacob and the heresy of the Tetraditai. For the canon of St. Nikephoros of Constantinople says as follows, “that it is necessary for the monks to fast on Wednesday of Cheesefare week and on Friday and to eat cheese after the dismissal of the presanctified, wherever they may be.” This canon refutes the dogma of Jacob and the heresy of the Tetraditai, and thus let it be the rule.

91. Abstinence is observed throughout the whole of Pentecost. But as the sacred canons prescribe, there are no fasts nor complete genuflections—neither in church nor privately in the cell—according to the regulation that the rest of the Sundays of the year have. Abstinence, since it is necessary, is always appropriate, but fasting is inappropriate at certain seasons and days, as are also genuflections and praying while standing up. For [p. 67] fasting is one thing, and abstinence is another. Fasting is not touching anything at all, but abstinence is touching a small [amount] and again holding [oneself] back.

[Concerning the Feast of Holy Epiphany]

92. It is necessary for us to know this concerning [the feast of] Holy Epiphany that the typikon of the Great Catholic and Apostolic Church handed down by the holy fathers prescribes blessing of the water¹²⁹ once, and only at vespers. Likewise also the synaxaria and the divine Gospels themselves and the Apostolos and the readings of the prophetologion handed down in common usage and likewise among monks the typika both of the monks of the famous monastery of Stoudios and of Jerusalem enjoin it for vespers only and nothing more.¹³⁰ But today we see some [doing it] at vespers and matins.

In this [matter] I have not met with any scriptural testimony. But if any among those who are painstaking finds scriptural witness concerning this, let him illumine us, because to imitate [a practice] in divergence from divine scripture brings great danger, and even more by [the fact that] on account of not following the divine scriptures we were handed over to the nations. But if there is inspired knowledge that Christ was baptized once and not a second time, I do not know. Let him who has divine knowledge illumine us.

Notes on the Translation

Editors' note: The assistance of our translator, Robert Allison [RA], is gratefully acknowledged for the notes to this document.

1. That is, on feast days; see [89] below.
2. (4) Stoudios [3], [4]; typikon leitourgikon of the Sabas monastery, ed. Dmitrievsky, Opisanie, vol. 3 (Petrograd, 1917), p. 362.
3. (4) Stoudios [2]; Sabas typikon, ed. Dmitrievsky, Opisanie, vol. 3, p. 370.
4. Feast of St. Peter and Paul, June 29; feast of the birth of the Forerunner, June 24; feast of the beheading of

20. BLACK MOUNTAIN

- the Forerunner, August 29.
5. See Ioannes Moschos, Pratum Spirituale, PG 87.3, cols. 320AB.
 6. Constitutiones apostolorum 5.20.19, ed. F. X. Funk, Didascalia et Constitutiones Apostolorum, vol. 1 (Paderborn, 1905), p. 301.
 7. C. Trull. (692), c. 75 (R&P 2.478–79).
 8. Cf. (4) Stoudios [A10].
 9. Sabas Typikon, ed. Dmitrievsky, Opisanie, vol. 3, p. 371.
 10. Sabas Typikon, ed. Dmitrievsky, vol. 3, p. 371.
 11. (4) Stoudios [2], [4], [10], [11], [12], [13], [18], [19], [20], [21], [22], [A36]; (11) Ath. Rule [2], [3], [4], [9], [29].
 12. Basil of Caesarea, Regulae fusius tractatae 37 (LR 37), PG 31, cols. 1009–16.
 13. Nikon is actually referring here to Palladius, Historia Lausiaca, chap. 32, ed. Cuthbert Butler, The Lausiaca History of Palladius, vol. 2 (Cambridge, 1898–1904), p. 92.
 14. Antipascha. [RA]
 15. Greek text breaks off at this point; Benešević supplements with a Russian text, presumably based on the medieval Slavonic recension for which see Biography of the Author, B. His Works, above.
 16. Cf. (4) Stoudios [4]; (11) Ath. Rule [3].
 17. The first Sunday after Easter, for which a special office for the blessing of the breads is prescribed; see J. Phountoulis, “Artoklasia” TEE, vol. 3 (Athens, 1963), col. 288.
 18. November 14, a medium feast in [89] below.
 19. The Greek text resumes here.
 20. Sunday after Pentecost.
 21. The implication is that the monk should sing the psalms in his cell or at work.
 22. Palladius, Historia Lausiaca, chap. 32, ed. Butler, p. 93.
 23. In [24] above.
 24. John Cassian, De institutis coenobiorum, ed. J. C. Guy, Institutions cénobitiques (Paris, 1965); the Greek translation is in Pseudo-Athanasios, Epistolae I et II ad Castorem, PG 28, cols. 849C–906B.
 25. Nikon, Hermeneiai ton theion entolon tou Kyriou (Pandektes), for which see the discussion above in Biography of the Author, B. His Works.
 26. The feasts marked with a simple cross in the liturgical calendar in [89] below. [RA]
 27. The feasts marked with a triple point (kentema) in the liturgical calendar in [89] below. [RA]
 28. The mikrai tessarakostai, the fast of St. Philip (Christmas fast), and the fast of the Holy Apostles (Sunday after Pentecost to June 29). [RA]
 29. Halkin, BHG 1702 = Theodoret, Historia religiosa, PG 82, cols. 1452–56.
 30. In [3] above.
 31. Cf. Basil of Caesarea, Regulae brevius tractatae 180 ([SR 180]), PG 31, col. 1204B.
 32. Ton artoklasion: Monday of the second week after Easter. See fn. 17 above.
 33. Eulogia: bread blessed separately and distributed in church.
 34. Theophilus of Alexandria, Prosphonesis, c. 1 (R&P 4.342).
 35. Basil of Caesarea, Regulae fusius tractatae 18 ([LR 18]), PG 31, col. 965; cf. (27) Kecharitomene [51].
 36. P. van den Ven, ed., La vie nouvelle de S. Syméon Stylite le jeune, vol. 1 (Brussels, 1962), p. 26, lines 102–3.
 37. Poemen, Apophthegmata patrum, Apophth. 19, PG 65, col. 325D.
 38. Another gap in the Greek text is filled by Benešević from the Russian version; the latter’s [37] through [42] do not correspond with the numeration of the chapters in the Greek text and so have been labelled here as [37R], [38R], etc.
 39. Unidentified quotation.
 40. That is, during the fast of the Holy Apostles.
 41. Van den Ven, Vie nouvelle, vol. 1, p. 28, lines 131–32.

ELEVENTH CENTURY

42. Palladius, Historia Lausiaca, chap. 32, ed. Butler, p. 92.
43. Pseudo-Basil, Constitutiones asceticae 25, PG 31, cols. 1413–16.
44. The Greek text resumes here.
45. Vita S. Pachomii, ed. F. Halkin, Sancti Pachomii vitae graecae (= Subsidia Hagiographica 19) (Brussels, 1932), p. 138.
46. Apparently a reference to an otherwise unknown ascetical sect.
47. Pseudo-Basil, Constitutiones asceticae 25, PG 31, col. 1413C.
48. A [krasobolin] riglon (“level cup”), as opposed to a krasobolin gomaton (“full cup”; for the meaning of gomatos, see Kriaras, Lexiko, s.v.). The word riglon is not in the dictionaries, but it probably stands here for regla, a wooden bar used to level the surface of a dry measure. See E. Schilbach, Byzantinische Metrologische Quellen (Thessalonike, 1982), p. 162.
49. mageiria; the same word is used in (29) Kosmosoteira [63] to describe a soup, the so-called holy broth. In this chapter, Nikon distinguishes between xerophagia (“dry food”), i.e., uncooked food, or food without any condiments or relish added (see Demetrakos, Lexikon, s.vv., xerophagia, xerophageo) and hygrophagia (lit. “moist food”). The latter is not in the dictionaries, but it obviously means food prepared with olive oil and other condiments.
50. Basil of Caesarea, Regulae fusius tractatae 19 ([LR 19]), PG 31, cols. 268–69.
51. Symeon Metaphrastes, Vita S. Charitonis, PG 115, col. 909C.
52. Unidentified quotation.
53. Basil, Ep. 2, ed. Y. Courtonne, Saint Basile: Lettres, vol. 1 (Paris, 1957), p. 12, lines 20–24.
54. Nilus of Ankyra, Liber de monastica exercitatione, PG 79, cols. 804CD, 805A.
55. See summary in Clercq, Textes juridiques, p. 65.
56. A reference to the distribution of the “blessed bread,” the amount of which was reduced on Sundays and holidays because the third and the sixth hours were combined; therefore an additional meal (a collation or “light snack” of bread and water) is prescribed in the evening. [RA]
57. See summary in Clercq, Textes juridiques, pp. 64–65.
58. John Klimakos, Scala paradisi 14, scholion 5, PG 88, col. 873C.
59. Unidentified quotation.
60. John Klimakos, Scala paradisi, 7, scholium 13, PG 88, col. 824A.
61. John Klimakos, De luctu qui gaudiam creat, PG 88, cols. 801D–816D.
62. Gregory of Nyssa, In diem natalem Christi, PG 46, col. 1129B.
63. John Chrysostom, Homilia in I Cor. “Nolo vos ignorare,” PG 51, cols. 241–42.
64. John IV, patriarch of Constantinople (582–595), Peri metanoias kai enkrateias kai parthenias, PG 88, cols. 1337–78.
65. Theophilus of Alexandria, Prosphonesis, c. 1 (R&P 4.342).
66. Monophysite Armenians fasted on Wednesday and Friday of the first week of the Triodion (the three-week period preceding the Great Lent). Byzantine polemicists derided this practice, claiming that it commemorated the death of Artzibourion (or Artzibourios), the favorite dog of the Armenian teacher and holy man, St. Sergios. See J. Phountoulis, “Artzibourion,” TEE, vol. 3, cols. 269–71.
67. Nikephoros I, patriarch of Constantinople (806–815), Kanon 79, ed. J. B. Pitra, Analecta sacra et classica spicilegio Solesmensi parata, vol. 4 (Paris, 1858), p. 398.
68. Jacob Baradaeus (d. 578), the Monophysite bishop of Edessa and founder of the Jacobite church. See T. E. Gregory, “Jacob Baradaeus,” ODB, p. 1029. The Tetraditai were an early Christian sect better known as Tessareskaidekatitai (Quartodecimans). They celebrated Easter on the same day as Passover, on the 14th day of the Jewish month Nisan, and if Easter happened to fall on a Wednesday (Tetarte), they refused to break the fast prescribed by the canons for Wednesdays. See Matthaios Blastares, Syntagma (R&P 6.61).
69. Not so in (11) Ath. Rule [25], but cf. (22) Evergetis 10].
70. Cf. (4) Stoudios [33].

20. BLACK MOUNTAIN

71. The first Saturday of Lent is dedicated to the memory of St. Theodore and his miracle of the kollyba. [RA]
72. C. Laod., c. 50 (R&P 3.217).
73. Vita S. Pachomii, ed. Halkin, Sancti Pachomii (above, fn. 45), p. 138.
74. The Eustathianoï were followers of Eustathios, bishop of Armenian Sebasteia, who was condemned by the council of Gangra (ca. 341). One of the reasons for his excommunication was that he advocated fasting on non-fast days. See R&P 3.96. On the Messalianoi, an ascetic movement who emphasized prayer as the most effective instrument of purification, see T. E. Gregory, "Messalianism," ODB, pp. 1349–50. The Markianistai and Lapetianoï were Messalian sects named after their leaders. See K. I. Dyobouniotes, "Mesalianoi e Masalianoi," Megale Hellenike Enkyklopaideia (Athens, 1931), 16, p. 932, col. 2.
75. Scholion of John Zonaras on C. Laod., c. 50 (R&P 3.217).
76. (4) Stoudios [30].
77. March 9, a minor feast in [89] below.
78. February 24, a minor feast in [89] below.
79. February 2, a great feast in [89] below.
80. C. Laod., c. 51 (R&P 3.218).
81. March 25, a great feast in [89] below.
82. See [30] above.
83. C. Laod., c. 50 (R&P 3.217).
84. Quotation not found in the works of John Chrysostom.
85. For the Holy Thursday diet, see (4) Stoudios [30]; (11) Ath. Rule [26].
86. Cf. (11) Ath. Rule [26].
87. Constitutiones apostolorum 5.18, ed. Funk, vol. 1, p. 289.
88. C. Trull. (692), c. 89 (R&P 2.512–13).
89. (4) Stoudios [A30], [B30]; (11) Ath. Rule [26].
90. See chapter [44].
91. Pseudo-Athanasios, Epist. ad Castorem I, PG 28, col. 857D.
92. Pseudo-Basil, Poenae 21 (?), PG 31, col. 1309A, and the quotation attributed to Basil of Caesarea in John Klimakos, Scala paradisi 14, scholium 20, PG 88, col. 877B.
93. Unidentified quotation.
94. In [24] above.
95. Cf. Basil of Caesarea, Regulae fusius tractatae 20.3 [LR 20.3], PG 31, col. 973C; Pseudo-Basil, Constitutiones asceticae 4.1, PG 31, cols. 1348A–49A.
96. Palladius, Historia Lausiaca, chap. 32, ed. Butler, p. 88.
97. For this foundation, originally known as the Monastery of St. Stephen, see Janin, Géographie, vol. 2, p. 47.
98. (4) Stoudios [29].
99. Not in Constitutiones apostolorum, ed. Funk, Didascalia et Constitutiones Apostolorum, vol. 1 (Paderborn, 1905), nor in Canones apostolorum (R&P2).
100. Canones apostolorum, c. 69 (R&P 2.88).
101. Cf. Basil of Caesarea, Regulae fusius tractatae 20.3 [LR 20.3], PG 31, col. 973C.
102. Pseudo-Basil, Constitutiones asceticae 30, PG 31, col. 1420C.
103. raso, the black outer garment or robe of the monk's habit.
104. Cf. John Chrysostom, In Epist. ad Philippenses 2, PG 62, cols. 253–54.
105. Basil of Caesarea, Regulae brevius tractatae 210 ([SR 210]), PG 31, cols. 1221–24.
106. Pseudo-Athanasios, Epist. ad Castorem I, PG 28, col. 855C.
107. Unidentified quotation.
108. Vita S. Pachomii, ed. Halkin, p. 18.

ELEVENTH CENTURY

109. Pseudo-Athanasios, Epist. ad Castorem I, PG 28, col. 860D.
110. Basil's Regulae brevius tractatae 156 [SR 156], PG 31, col. 1184CD indicates the opposite; officials are to retain their positions if their performance is satisfactory.
111. Pseudo-Athanasios, Epist. ad Castorem I, PG 28, col. 860D.
112. Not in Pseudo-Athanasios' Greek version of Cassian.
113. Not in our text of (11) Ath. Rule, but cf. [21].
114. In [71] and above.
115. Vita S. Pachomii, ed. F. Halkin, Sancti Pachomii (as in note 45 above), p. 159.
116. See summary in Clercq, Textes juridiques, pp. 54, 55.
117. Apophthegmata patrum, PG 65, col. 152C.
118. Unidentified quotation.
119. See Nikon, Pandektes, chap. 57, as summarized in Clercq, Textes juridiques, pp. 61–63.
120. Tome of the Council of Constantinople (920) = Grumel, Regestes, no. 669, ed. L. G. Westerink, Nicholas I Patriarch of Constantinople: Miscellaneous Writings (Washington, D.C., 1981), p. 66, lines 114–16; Euthymios of Peribleptos, Oratio seu invectivus contra Armenios I, PG 132, col. 1200; for the attribution of the latter work, see Beck, KTL, pp. 533, 598, with V. Grumel, “Les invectives contre les Arméniens du ‘Catholicos Isaac,’” REB 14 (1956), 174–94.
121. August 1, a minor feast in [89] below.
122. August 15, a great feast in [89] below.
123. August 6, a great feast in [89] below.
124. Nov. 21, a great feast in [89] below.
125. Cf. Luke 1:5–23, 57–65.
126. Starting on December 21 instead of December 25.
127. ei tis kai errethe: the text is corrupt here.
128. John Chrysostom, De sancto Philogonio, PG 48, col. 754.
129. photizein, “to illumine,” apparently refers to the ceremony of blessing the water which constitutes the main event of the feast of the Epiphany, and which developed from the early practice of baptizing catechumens on the feasts of Epiphany and Easter. Known as the mezas hagiastos, it takes place both on the vigil of Epiphany and on the following morning. Controversy over the repetition of the ceremony is attested as early as the mid-fifth-century decree of Peter Gnapheus, patriarch of Jerusalem, which held that the blessing of the waters should be celebrated only at vespers. It is to this controversy that Nikon undoubtedly alludes in this chapter; he makes reference to readings from the prophets which are part of the office of hagiastos. See G. Bekatoros, “Megas hagiastos,” TEE, vol. 6 (Athens, 1962), cols. 227–29.
130. (4) Stoudios [B37], [A38].

Document Notes

- [8] Performance of the office at Easter. See also [27] below; cf. treatment of the Easter office in (4) Stoudios [2] and (11) Ath. Rule [2].
- [9] Obligatory performance of the office. Cf. (10) Eleousa [6], [8] and (22) Evergetis [4].
- [10] Performance of the first, third and sixth hours. See [19] below and the treatment of these offices in (4) Stoudios [A10], [B14], [33], [A36], cf. [27]; (10) Eleousa [7]; (11) Ath. Rule [7], [8]; (22) Evergetis [4]; (27) Kecharitomene [32], [33]; (29) Kosmosoteira [13]; (30) Phoberos [9]; (32) Mamas [47]; (33) Heliou Bomon [46]; and (34) Machairas [31], [36].
- [11] Performance of the ninth hour. See the treatment of this office in (4) Stoudios [A10], [B14], [27], [29], [32], [33]; (10) Eleousa [7]; (11) Ath. Rule [7], [8]; (22) Evergetis [6]; (27) Kecharitomene [35]; (29) Kosmosoteira [15]; (30) Phoberos [12]; (32) Mamas [47]; (33) Heliou Bomon [46]; and (34) Machairas [42].
- [12] Timing of vespers. See treatment of this office in (4) Stoudios [2], [A3], [13], [26], [30], [31], [33],

20. BLACK MOUNTAIN

- [A37], [B38]; (11) Ath. Rule [3], [8], [9], [10], [26], [27]; (22) Evergetis [6], [35]; (27) Kecharitomene [35]; (29) Kosmosoteira [15]; (30) Phoberos [12]; (32) Mamas [47]; (33) Heliou Bomon [46]; and (34) Machairas [43].
- [13], [14] Performance of compline. See the treatment of this office in (4) Stoudios [2], [10], [18], [19], [20], [21]; (11) Ath. Rule [2], [3], [4], [9], [29]; (22) Evergetis [6], [7]; (27) Kecharitomene [36]; (29) Kosmosoteira [15]; (30) Phoberos [12]; (32) Mamas [47]; (33) Heliou Bomon [46]; and (34) Machairas [44].
- [15], [16] Performance of the midnight office. See the treatment of this office in (22) Evergetis [6]; (27) Kecharitomene [38]; (29) Kosmosoteira [15]; (30) Phoberos [12]; (32) Mamas [47]; (33) Heliou Bomon [46]; (34) Machairas [45], [46]; and (44) Karyes [9]. There is a regulation of the Sunday midnight office in [18] below.
- [17] Performance of matins. See [19] below and the treatment of this office in (4) Stoudios [2], [B3], [A4], [10], [11], [12], [13], [18], [22], [A36]; (22) Evergetis [4], [6], [7], [10], [13], [35]; (27) Kecharitomene [39]; (29) Kosmosoteira [15]; (30) Phoberos [13]; (32) Mamas [47]; (33) Heliou Bomon [46]; and (34) Machairas [48].
- [18] Sunday midnight office. See [15], [16] above with cross-references, and (44) Karyes [10].
- [19] Additional regulations for matins and the first hour. See (22) Evergetis [4] for a similar provision for genuflections at the end of matins.
- [20] No provision for all-night vigils. For the contrary provision, see (22) Evergetis [8], (29) Kosmosoteira [19], and (30) Phoberos [16].
- [21] Easter and Lenten psalmody. The prescriptions here are idiosyncratic except for the Easter Sunday psalm, for which see (4) Stoudios [3].
- [22] Authoritativeness of the Jerusalem typikon.
- [23] Endorsement of the Stoudite and Jerusalem typika. (26) Luke of Messina [10] has a similar endorsement; see also [29] below.
- [24] Ban on private psalmody and eating alone in cells; evening activities. See [69], [71], and [72] below, with (22) Evergetis [9], [22] and related documents. Note that in (4) Stoudios [26] reading took place before the vespers service.
- [25], [26] Performance of prostrations in cells. See (11) Ath. Rule [4] for another Lenten provision of this sort; cf. (4) Stoudios [A6], [B7], (11) Ath. Rule [6], [20], and (22) Evergetis [4].
- [27] Special psalmody for Easter week. See [8] above with cross-references.
- [28] Encouragement of private devotional observances. See similar provision in (22) Evergetis [4] and related documents.
- [29] Endorsement of the Stoudite and Jerusalem typika. See also [23] above.
- [30], [31] Timing of the liturgy. See the treatment of this issue in (4) Stoudios [27], (11) Ath. Rule [8], and (22) Evergetis [10].
- [32] Coincidence of fast days and minor feasts. For the rule for minor feasts, see [50] below. Dietary concessions for great feasts are discussed below in [48].
- [33] Refectory procedures. Cf. (4) Stoudios [28], (11) Ath. Rule [21], (22) Evergetis [9], (27) Kecharitomene [40], (29) Kosmosoteira [21], (30) Phoberos [21], (34) Machairas [62], (43) Kasoulon [15], and (58) Menoikeion [8].
- [34] Diet from Easter to the feast of All Saints. Cf. (4) Stoudios [A29], [B29], (11) Ath. Rule [22], (30) Phoberos [28], (34) Machairas [74], and (43) Kasoulon [10].
- [37] Diet on non-fast days. For the diet on Tuesdays and Thursdays, see also (4) Stoudios [29], (11) Ath. Rule [22], (23) Pakourianos [8], (27) Kecharitomene [46], (28) Pantokrator [12], (32) Mamas [17], (33) Heliou Bomon [17], (39) Lips [32], (43) Kasoulon [2], [5], and (58) Menoikeion [8].
- [38] Diet on fast days; on Sundays and feasts of the Lord; abstinence from wine. For the diet on regular fast days, see [43] below and also (11) Ath. Rule [30], (7) Latros [8], (27) Kecharitomene [46], (28) Pantokrator [12], (30) Phoberos [16], [17], [19], (32) Mamas [17], (33) Heliou Bomon [17], (34)

ELEVENTH CENTURY

- Macharias* [77], (36) Blemmydes [11], (39) Lips [32], (43) Kasoulon [5], (45) Neophytos [C4], (55) Athanasios I [5], and (58) Menoikeion [8]. For the Sunday and festal diet, see discussions in [47], [52], [53], and [57] below.
- [37R] Preservation of the regulation of cheese, oil and wine. The reference is to the regulation of these commodities in [38] above.
- [38R] Fast of the Holy Apostles. Cf. treatments in (4) Stoudios [29], (11) Ath. Rule [23], (22) Evergetis [10], (23) Pakourianos [10], (27) Kecharitomene [48], (28) Pantokrator [12], (29) Kosmosoteira [63], (30) Phoberos [29], (31) Areia [T5], (32) Mamas [18], (33) Heliou Bomon [18], (34) Machairas [76], (43) Kasoulon, (58) Menoikeion [8], and (60) Charsianeites [17].
- [39R] Diet from the feast of the Holy Apostles to fast of St. Philip. Cf. treatments in (4) Stoudios [A29], [B29] and in (11) Ath. Rule [24].
- [43] Diet for the meal on regular fast days. See [36] above, with cross-references.
- [47] Diet on Saturdays and Sundays. Cf. discussion of weekend meals in (23) Pakourianos [8], (28) Pantokrator [12], and (43) Kasoulon [2], [4]. See also [38] above and [57] below.
- [48], [49], [50] Diet on great, medium, and minor feasts. Nikon's prescription of the Sunday diet for great feasts means that regular weekly fast days will not be observed. The distinctions drawn here between feasts of different magnitude are not found elsewhere in the monastic foundation documents. See [51] below for justification.
- [51] Reference to Nikon's Interpretations. See resume of Pandektes, chap. 58, in Clercq, Textes juridiques, pp. 64–65.
- [52] Patronal designation of feasts criticized. Cf. discussion in (55) Athanasios I [5].
- [53] Discussion of patristic authorities on observance of fasts. Nikon advances a conservative argument against contemporary practice, which was strongly inclined to suspend fasts for the celebration of feasts; see, for example, (27) Kecharitomene [48].
- [54] Fast of St. Philip. (4) Stoudios [A29], (11) Ath. Rule [24], (22) Evergetis [10], (23) Pakourianos [10], (27) Kecharitomene [48], (28) Pantokrator [12], (29) Kosmosoteira [28], (30) Phoberos [30], (32) Mamas [18], and (33) Heliou Bomon [18] all make similar provisions; cf. (43) Kasoulon [3].
- [55] Use of cheese and eggs during the week before Meatfare and Cheesefare week. See also [90] below and (30) Phoberos [19], (32) Mamas [19], (33) Heliou Bomon [19], (34) Machairas [78], and (36) Blemmydes [11] for this observance and its motivation.
- [56] Lenten dietary observances. Cf. treatments in (4) Stoudios [30], (11) Ath. Rule [25], (22) Evergetis [10], (27) Kecharitomene [47], (28) Pantokrator [12], (29) Kosmosoteira [25], (30) Phoberos [28], (32) Mamas [18], (33) Heliou Bomon [18], (34) Machairas [67], [69], (43) Kasoulon [9], [23], and (58) Menoikeion [8].
- [57] No fasting on Saturdays and Sundays. See also [47] above, with cross-references.
- [58] Fasts not to be broken on Wednesday of mid-Lent week or for the Day of the Great Canon. Cf. the divergent traditions in (4) Stoudios [A30], (22) Evergetis [10], (27) Kecharitomene [47], (34) Machairas, and (43) Kasoulon [22].
- [59] Diet for the feasts of St. John the Forerunner and the Forty Martyrs. (4) Stoudios [A30] provides for the regular celebration of these feasts regardless of when they occur, as do (22) Evergetis [10], (29) Kosmosoteira [26], and (34) Machairas [70], while (30) Phoberos [28], (27) Kecharitomene [47], (28) Pantokrator [12], (32) Mamas [18], and (33) Heliou Bomon [18] all restrict celebration in various ways.
- [60] Diet for the feast of the Annunciation. The celebration of this feast was generally considered a legitimate reason to suspend Lenten dietary restrictions; see (4) Stoudios [31], (7) Latros [5], (22) Evergetis [10], (27) Kecharitomene [47], (28) Pantokrator [12], (29) Kosmosoteira [26], [27], (30) Phoberos [28], (32) Mamas [18], (33) Heliou Bomon [18], (34) Machairas [71], and (43) Kasoulon [24].
- [61] Diet for the Friday before the feast of St. Lazarus. Cf. (43) Kasoulon [16], [23], which allows the superior to grant a concession of wine on this day.

20. BLACK MOUNTAIN

- [62] Diet for first days of Holy Week. (30) Phoberos [28], (43) Kasoulon [9], and (58) Menoikeion [8] all make a similar provision.
- [63] Diet for Holy Thursday. Nikon contrasts the stricter provisions of the earlier canonical authorities with (4) Stoudios [30] and (11) Ath. Rule [26], but sides with the latter.
- [64] Diet for Good Friday. The relatively strict (30) Phoberos [28] follows the same approach of a recommendation of total abstinence with a limitation of bread and water and raw greens. (22) Evergetis [10] indicates that the exertions of the Easter vigil service obliged the monks to take some food on this day.
- [65], [66], [67] Diet for Holy Saturday. As Nikon indicates, there was no uniform dietary observance for this day; see discussions in (4) Stoudios [30], (11) Ath. Rule [26], [27], (22) Evergetis [10], and (30) Phoberos [28].
- [69] Prohibition on eating between meals. See also [24] above and [70], [72] below.
- [70] Regulation of the size of the blessing; no other food to be consumed outside the refectory. For the blessed bread, see also [73] below and the treatments in (4) Stoudios [27], [B37], [A38], and (43) Kasoulon [8]; for the restriction of eating to the refectory, see [24], [69] above and [72] below.
- [71] All psalmody to be communal. Cf. [24] above; the exception is for commemorative services for the dead.
- [72] No private eating. Cf. discussions in [24], [69], and [70] above. The implication is that fasters will be supplied with minimal provisions (i.e., bread and water) in their cells at the superior's discretion.
- [73], [74] Collation restricted to partakers in communion. Cf. [70] above.
- [75] The monks' clothing. Cf. similar provisions in (4) Stoudios [A37], [B38]; (11) Ath. Rule [35]; (22) Evergetis [25]; (27) Kecharitomene [52]; (29) Kosmosoteira [52], [62]; (30) Phoberos [44]; (32) Mamas [28]; (33) Heliou Bomon [28]; and (34) Machairas [102], [103].
- [76], [77] Procedure for defrocking a monk. Cf. the provision in (2) Pantelleria [20].
- [78] Rotation of work assignments. Prescribed for novices in (22) Evergetis [37], (27) Kecharitomene [30], (29) Kosmosoteira [55], (30) Phoberos [51], (32) Mamas [22], (33) Heliou Bomon [22], and (34) Machairas [56]; for all monks in (37) Auxentios [7] and (39) Lips [17].
- [79] Hours for manual labor. Cf. provisions in (4) Stoudios [33] and (11) Ath. Rule [29].
- [80] The work supervisor. Cf. (27) Kecharitomene [27], (34) Machairas [86], [104] and (37) Auxentios [7] for officials with similar responsibilities. As here, a specific place for manual labor is set aside in (45) Neophytos [18].
- [81] The prompter and his duties. Contrary to the implication here, (11) Ath. Rule [21] assigns the refectory reading to the ecclesiarch; cf. (4) Stoudios [28].
- [82] Necessity of manual labor for all. This strong endorsement fails to find an endorsement in contemporary documents, but see (45) Neophytos [C6].
- [83] Pursuit of individual crafts endorsed. (34) Machairas [120] provides for confiscation of unauthorized crafts. (45) Neophytos [C13] prohibits private profit-making occupations.
- [84] Importance of monastic poverty. Cf. hostility to individual property in (3) Theodore Studites [2], (11) Ath. Rule [34], and (22) Evergetis [22].
- [85] Rejection of outsiders' donations. (23) Pakourianos [20] is also skeptical; (19) Attaleiates [30], however, is less critical.
- [86] Ban on women and female animals. See (3) Theodore Studites [5], [16], (13) Ath. Typikon [31], and (22) Evergetis [38], [39] for similar sentiments.
- [87], [88] Fast of the Mother of God, August 1–14. Among the other Byzantine monastic foundation documents, only (30) Phoberos [31] and (60) Charsianeites [C17] recognize this fast. For this fast, see V. Grumel, "Le jeûne de l'Assomption dans l'Église grecque. Étude historique," EO 32 (1933), 162–93.
- [89] Festal calendar. Designed to correlate with dietary regulations for great [48], medium [49], and minor [50], cf. [32] feasts as established above.
- [90] Diet during Meatfare and Cheesefare week. See [55] above with cross-references for these observances.
- [91] No fasts or genuflections during Pentecost. Cf. earlier discussions above of the ban on fasting: [17],

ELEVENTH CENTURY

[36], [38], [55], [70] and on genuflections: [24], [89].

[92] Feast of the Holy Epiphany. Cf. (4) Stoudios [B37], [A38], and (27) Kecharitomene [72].

21. Roidion: Typikon of Nikon of the Black Mountain for the Monastery and Hospice of the Mother of God tou Roidiou

Date: first decade of the 12th c.¹

Translator: Robert Allison

Edition employed: Vladimir Benešević, Taktikon Nikona Chernogortsa (Petrograd, 1917), pp. 68–80.

Manuscript: Codex Sinaiticus graecus 441 (St. Catherine’s Monastery)

Other translations: Arabic, Slavonic²

Institutional History

In the current state of research, the history of this foundation, dedicated to the Mother of God tou Roidiou, “of the Pomegranate,” is poorly understood.³ Nikon’s charge of its spiritual care perhaps was part of his assignment to reform the monks of North Syria that had originally been entrusted to him by the patriarch of Antioch Theodosios III (1057–1059), subsequently confirmed by the exarchs of the patriarchate during the long interregnum of 1059–1089. Nikon is known to have taken refuge in this monastery after the Seljuk conquest of Antioch in 1084. It was located in Armenian territory ruled by the Tzatoi who were Chalcedonian in their faith.⁴ Nikon is known to have been active during the patriarchate of the militantly reformist John V the Oxite (1089–1100), better known as John of Antioch; the particular reform program Nikon pursued at this foundation fits in well with what is known about the latter’s own program from his tract against the charistike, De monasteriis laicis non tradendis.⁵ The references to Franks in [B3] and to the foundation’s role [B2] in facilitating the travel of pilgrims to Jerusalem, however, suggest that the document dates from after the Crusader conquest of the Holy City in 1099. Solignac (“Nicon,” col. 319) maintains that Nikon died here; this was sometime in the first decade of the twelfth century.

Analysis

This remarkable document is not an idealized portrayal of a foundation at the time of its creation, like (19) Attaleiates, nor a proud summation of an institution’s way of life by a leader of a later generation, like (4) Stoudios or (22) Evergetis. Rather, like (12) Tzimiskes and (15) Constantine IX, it portrays a monastic community at a point of crisis. In the last-named Athonite texts, representatives of the emperor mediated a program of reforms with the active support of at least some of the resident monks. Here, Nikon, representative of the patriarch of Antioch, possibly the fervent monastic reformer John V the Oxite, imposes a reform against the wishes of the foundation’s monks. The document enables us to observe the foundation at an awkward point, as Nikon’s reform program—including the revival of cenobitical life, the easing out of officials termed “spiritually destroyed,” and the redirection of the foundation’s income to “correct” purposes—has been determined but has not yet been implemented. Instead, certain circumstances, perhaps including the monks' active opposition, have forced Nikon to make the best of what was from his perspective a bad situation. By examining the compromises he announces in this document, we gain valuable insight into how some recalcitrant institutions in the process of being reformed operated at the beginning of the twelfth century.

The document is divided into two sections, a brief typikon [A] and a longer Treatise [B] addressed to the foundation's residents.

A. The Typikon

The addressee of the typikon was an unnamed individual [A1], cf. [A5] who had been appointed by the secular ruler (also unnamed) to look after the physical needs of the monastery. This addressee was probably a protector (cf. Nikon's own title in [A2]); a charistikarios seems unlikely, particularly if John V, the most notable contemporary opponent of the charistike, was the patriarch responsible for the appointment. Nikon had also been appointed [A1] by the patriarch, specifically to look after the spiritual affairs of the foundation. The abandonment of common meals in the refectory and other aspects of the cenobitic life, glimpsed elsewhere in (9) Galesios [147], [189] a half-century earlier, had been completed [A1] long ago here. After condemning [A1] previous superiors as "spiritually destroyed," Nikon declares [A4] the office (and its presumably irremovable incumbent) to be superfluous. Other reputable officials (who were not Nikon's own appointees—cf. [B1]) were to minister [A1] to guests in the refectory and to attend to the church. The foundation had originally been endowed [A2] with landed properties intended to support the church and hospice, much like (16) Mount Tmolos [1]. Nikon anticipated [A2], [A5] additional (and unencumbered) gifts for this purpose from the addressee. This was necessary because the current residents, kelliotai and "others" (possibly the imposed guests known as katapemptoi), had established [A2] entitlements to some of the revenues of the earlier endowed properties.

Nikon charges [A2] a steward with handling the distributions to the foundation's residents (cf. the arrangements for the payment of salaries and other gratuities in (19) Attaleiates [33]), but he was unwilling to allow [A3] this official any authority over the hospice or the church "for the sake of freedom from offense and scandal." Citing a regulation (typos) of the monastery of Symeon the Wonderworker (cf. (20) Black Mountain [84]), Nikon also rejects [A4], cf. [B19] the superior's right to any authority over these units of the foundation. Instead he prefers to rely [A3] on the administrator of the church and the head of the hospice (the xenodochos) to administer these parts of the foundation. Citing a regulation of another institution, the Jerusalemite monastery of St. Sabas, as precedent, Nikon hoped to establish [A3] the entitlement of the attendants in the hospice and the administrator of the church to support from the foundation's land holdings. He vaguely indicates [A3] his preference that those so supported should live and eat communally. Lacking an equivalent precedent, Nikon was uncertain about the right of others, e.g., those attendants who took care of the church, to a similar entitlement.

After payment of all these claimants, there may have been very little left over from the foundation's income to support [A1] its avowed purpose of providing hospitality to visitors; Nikon makes [A5] this a special responsibility of the protector along with support for the monks (perhaps those without specific incomes) "if it is appropriate and God is pleased." With his characteristic humility and tentativeness, Nikon closes [A6] this first portion of the document with the declaration “If someone else knows the greater and pleasing and perfect will of God, let it prevail, and not these things.”

B. The Treatise Addressed to the Foundation’s Residents

In the second part [B] of this document, Nikon undertakes to address the very monks of whose leadership and lifestyle he was so critical in the typikon proper. This part starts with a discussion of appropriate hospitality to be extended to pilgrim monks and laymen [B2], Franks [B3], and dignitaries [B7], even unbelievers. The head of the hospice was to eat with or serve guests personally [B4], cf. [B8], except for Franks of “unsound thinking.” Nikon maintains [B5] that monks who wished to entertain guests privately in their cells must do so from their private resources.⁶

Refusing to acknowledge the validity of the kelliotic lifestyle for monks, Nikon declares [B6] that ordinarily “it is not permitted for a brother privately to possess anything at all, however small or large, neither for (entertaining) a friend nor for any other reason whatsoever.” Apparently powerless to institute a moral reform of the foundation’s current residents, Nikon evidently determined to recover the foundation’s assets from them by attrition. In [B11] we see Nikon pressuring the residents to get them to agree to donate these assets back to the foundation. Failing that, Nikon was prepared to authorize [B11] seizures of residents’ assets when they died. Through these confiscations, Nikon hoped to forestall claims by any of the other brothers or a lay relative to a deceased monk’s properties. Borrowing contemporary reform terminology, Nikon maintains [B11] that any such attempt to claim ecclesiastical property was sacrilegious (cf. (19) Attaleiates [INV 11]). In the meantime, Nikon attempted to limit what were in effect “beneficed” monks to a “self-sufficiency” of income, specifically “what befits monks.” The implication is that any additional revenue was to be confiscated for the benefit of the foundation.

Nikon seeks [B12], cf. [B11] to trade off pledges of memorial commemorations for residents who cooperated with his plans to reconsolidate the foundation’s original assets under its own management. He also encourages [B15] residents to make voluntary donations to the foundation before they died in the name of helping the “poor,” loosely interpreted to mean any visitor passing through who was in need of food and shelter. Nikon discourages [B17] the residents from acquiring additional private properties. After all this firmness of purpose, however, Nikon lapses into his typical ambivalence (or is it just pragmatism?) when he declares [B19]: “Ignore these things and others that I may say if they do not lead to the salvation of souls.”

Finally, Nikon provides [B20] contingency plans to be put into effect if it should prove to be impossible to eliminate or abolish the authority of the superior. Alluding perhaps to a court suit over the rights to manage the foundation’s endowed properties, Nikon urges that they be abandoned to the claimants (the superior’s relatives?) so that the foundation will be free to be managed by the Mother of God herself (see (19) Attaleiates [3] for the legal fiction of heavenly administration). The expectation that the foundation will be able to operate somehow without “any earthly revenues” is rationalized by reference to a bygone era when Sabas, the author of the regulation cited here and elsewhere [A4] in this document, was said to have managed without “receiving revenues or donations from the emperor or anywhere else.” This statement likely stems more from the reformer’s understandable sense of frustration at the entangling complications of financial patronage than from any realistic recollection of the past. Yet as if to underline his determination to break free from these entanglements, Nikon concludes with a declaration of his willingness to forfeit even the hospice itself “if [it] is sought after in the manner of the lands.” The hospice is in that event to be replaced with another, presumably relying on the generosity of the protector for patronal support.

C. Relationship to the Monastic Reform Movement

In this, a later document than (20) Black Mountain, Nikon’s reform program and its indebtedness to the contemporary concerns of the reform movement is much more evident than in his earlier typikon. The hostility to non-cenobitic monasticism [B6], the denunciation of the alienation of ecclesiastical property [B11] as sacrilege, the reluctance to accept ownership of private property [B17] by monks, and the promotion of memorial services [B12] as an acceptable form of patronal privilege are some of the salient links to the reform program of Nikon’s Evergetian contemporaries (see discussions in Chapters Four and Five below). This document indicates how difficult of realization this reform program must have been, at least in pre-existing institutions affected by the powerful secularizing influences of the eleventh century. On the whole we see Nikon adopting a tough but still very pragmatic policy well matched to the difficult situation he faced in attempting to reform this foundation.

Notes on the Introduction

1. See discussion below in Institutional History.
2. For details, see (20) Black Mountain, Biography of the Author, B. His Works.
3. Nikon’s unpublished works appear to be the source for what little is known currently about this foundation: see Doens, “Nicon,” pp. 132–35; Kazhdan, “Nikon,” p. 1484; Mai, Scriptorum veterum nova collectio, vol. 4, pp. 155–68; Nasrallah, “Auteur antiochien,” pp. 151–52; and Solignac, “Nicon,” cols. 319–20. The foundation’s correct name of Roidiou, not Raithou, was first read by V. Grumel, “Le jeûne de l’Assomption dans l’Église grecque. Étude historique,” EO 32 (1933,) 174 (see above, (20) Black Mountain, Document Notes [87] [88]).
4. For general information on the Kingdom of Lesser Armenia in Cilicia and northern Syria, see C. Toumanoff, “Armenia and Georgia,” in Cambridge Medieval History, vol. 4, pt. 1, 2nd ed. (Cambridge, 1966), pp. 628–37.
5. See Grumel, “Nicon,” pp. 270–72; for an analysis of John of Antioch’s De monasteriis, see my Private Religious Foundations in the Byzantine Empire (Washington, D.C., 1987), pp. 186–92.
6. Cf. the contrary regulation, drawing on a common source, in (23) Pakourianos [8], in the context of a cenobitic monastery.

Bibliography

- Beck, Hans-Georg, Kirche und theologische Literatur im byzantinischen Reich (Munich, 1959), p. 600.
- Benešević, Vladimir, Catalogus codicum manuscriptorum qui in monasterio Sanctae Catharinae in Monte Sina asservantur, vol. 1 (St. Petersburg, 1911), pp. 237–46. Includes also an edition of five chapters of Nikon’s Taktikon, pp. 561–601.
- Brock, S., “Syriac Manuscripts Copied on the Black Mountain, near Antioch,” Lingua Restituta Orientalis: Festgabe für Julius Assfalg (Wiesbaden, 1990), pp. 59–67.
- Clercq, Carlo de, “Les Pandectes de Nicon de la Montagne Noire,” AHDO 4 (1949), 187–203. Includes an edition and translation of the first chapter of Nikon’s Pandects.

21. ROIDION

- , Les textes juridiques dans les Pandectes de Nikon de la Montagne Noire (Venice, 1942). Includes a resume of the contents of Nikon's Pandects, pp. 23–74.
- Doens, Irénée, "Nicon de la Montagne Noire," Byzantion 24 (1954), 131–40.
- Grumel, Venance, "Nicon de la Montagne Noire et Jean IV (V) l'Oxite. Remarques chronologiques," REB 21 (1963), 270–72.
- Kazhdan, Alexander, "Nikon of the Black Mountain," ODB, p. 1484.
- Mai, Angelo, Scriptorum veterum nova collectio e vaticanis codicibus edita, vol. 4 (Rome, 1831), pp. 155–70. A summary of the contents of the Arabic version of Nikon's Taktikon.
- Nasrallah, J., "Un auteur antiochien du XI^e siècle: Nicon de la Montagne Noire (vers 1025–début du XII^e s.)," POC 19 (1969), 150–61.
- Richard, M., "Florilèges spirituels," DS, vol. 5. (Paris, 1962), cols. 435–511, esp. 503–4.
- Solignac, Aimé, "Nicon de la Montagne-Noire," DS, vol. 11 (Paris, 1982), cols. 319–20.
- Yiankou, Th. X., Nikon ho Mauroreites. Bios—Syngraphiko Ergo—Kanonike Didaskalia (Thessalonike, 1991) (= Aristoteleio Panepistemio Thessalonikes, Epistemonike Epeterida Theologikes Scholes, Tmema Poimantikes, Parartema Arith. 2). Known but not available to the editors and the translator of this document.

Translation

[A] Another typikon by the same author well documented from the divine scriptures in the holy monastery of the supremely glorious Mother of God, concerning hospitality and the church and other necessary subjects conducive to the salvation of souls. Lord Jesus Christ our God, have mercy on us through the intercessions of her who gave birth to thee, the blameless Mother of God. By her [intercessions] we dwell [here] in thy name and [in the name of] thy blameless mother. If these things are in keeping with thy pleasure, establish them.

For the one charged by him who currently has secular authority to preside over the physical needs of the holy monastery of our blameless Mistress the Mother of God called locally tou Roidiou.

[A] 1. My spiritual brother. Behold, by the grace of God, just as at first, in spite of my unworthiness, God nevertheless entrusted [me] with spiritual affairs through the patriarchal see of the Catholic Church.¹ Recently again the ruler, he who rules and has authority [by the will of] God over secular affairs, entrusted to me, the unworthy, the whole spiritual administration [by the will of] God. What he did is worthy of his godly understanding and piety, as I often wrote to him. May God protect him and all of you under his rule from every evil thing. But although I also wrote to him before concerning the poor and strangers and friends and enemies who come to the monastery and likewise about the church and similar matters, I did not write to him concerning the refectory and cenobitic order, because just as we find in the sacred writings, this way of life disintegrated many years ago, and where they observe it still, they observe it for their own personal will and not as the cenobitic law and the will of God require. But the divine scripture [p. 69] decrees that "he saves who saves his own soul"² (Gen. 19:17).

Since I follow this injunction of the Holy Scripture and the rest of God's laws, and since, unworthy though I am, I was entrusted with spiritual matters, as I said before, for these reasons, with the help of God and our holy Virgin the Mother of God, there is no need any longer for a superior. For just as we already said before concerning the cenobitic order, its inner dynamic was destroyed spiritually, and so [those holding positions as] superiors were spiritually destroyed, and are moved by carnal and illegal motives.

For this reason there is no need for a superior, but there is need for [monastic] officials to minister properly for God's satisfaction under the protection of our blameless and holy Lady, the Mother of God. They are to minister at the refectory to the visiting poor and strangers, both friends and enemies, and generally in all such circumstances as well as in the church, just as the law of God holds with the "You shall love the Lord your God and your neighbor as yourself" (Matt. 22:37).

[A] 2. Behold, the church and the house of hospitality: the one for the worship and correctness of right faith and praise of the love of God and so on, the other for the love of neighbor (and "neighbor" means all humankind) and for the "I was a stranger and you welcomed me" (Matt. 25:35) and other similar commandments of the Lord. As the Lord himself says, "On these two commandments depend the whole law and the prophets" (Matt. 22:40), [that is] on the love of God and neighbor. For these things the church was provided and the hospice; and for them were dedicated all the lands which were around the monastery, and whatever there was of any sort for the use of the church and the hospice, and also whatever you may offer.

This was provided by [the help of] God and the blameless Mother of God, and spiritual guardianship and management was entrusted to me, unworthy as I am, with the help of God, and [there is] no refectory or anything else central, because, as I said before, [the cenobitic order] is now destroyed and is not working for the salvation of the soul, but for harm. But if you provide the brethren individually each in his own cell anything [p. 70] that is fitting, let it be to please God, and may it be, as it pleases God, for your own salvation and theirs.

Since [some] brethren live in the place as kelliotic brothers, each taking care of himself, and also some other [persons], and [since], accordingly, something different is appropriate—namely, there is need for a steward [to be in charge of] this task and responsibility—let this be enacted to the pleasure of God, for everything that is autonomous and follows its own will is dangerous and disorderly, and is counted as wickedness, just as also the apostle, when enumerating the offshoots of evil, also numbers this one with the words, "disorderly and slanderers" (cf. Tim. 3:3), and so on.

[A] 3. The steward should have no authority at all over any matter whatsoever either internally or externally in the hospice, nor [any authority] in the church, for the sake of freedom from offense and scandal. But it is fitting for the one in charge of the church and the one in charge of the hospice each to take care of his respective duties.

Just as it is fitting according to the regulation of the monastery of our holy father Sabas,³ those serving in the hospice ought to be provided with their food and clothing and other necessities from there. Likewise, he who is in charge of the church—he alone since [only] he shares this service and occupation together with the host of the hospice—[ought to be provided] in like fashion with all his bodily requirements. As for [their] dwelling and eating together, let what is acceptable for the salvation of the soul [be done].

21. ROIDION

On the other hand, with regard to whether it is appropriate to provide from the dedicated land holdings for the nourishment of the attendants and those who take care of the church and so on, whatever [rules] are extant in writing in the divine regulations and laws, let them be [carried out] to the pleasure of God.

[A] 4. Just as was also written before⁴ concerning the superior that there is no need [of one], and seeking what is pleasing to God we established in writing the cause, here in turn, [we stated] what happens in reverse to those who seek their own will and not that of God, and to these are here added in writing with [the help of] God and the blameless Mother of God that, just as written concerning the steward before,⁵ so [be it] also concerning the superior, [namely] that in the church and in the hospice let him have no authority over the church and hospice in accordance with the regulation of the monastery [p. 71] of our holy father and wonderworker Symeon.⁶ From now on let no one harass my humility on account of these things.

[A] 5. Behold, my spiritual brother, this I contributed to the spiritual [life of the brotherhood] and the salvation of the soul, and this was appropriate for me. To the extent that I was able I did it with [the help of] God and our blameless Lady the Mother of God. But since you were entrusted to minister to physical needs, be not careless, but carry out whatever you were commanded and above all what is conducive to God's satisfaction with respect to the need for administration of the poor and the strangers and sojourners as well as the brothers individually, if it is appropriate and God is pleased.

The Lord himself protect you and all those with you and him who rules with [the consent of] God. Yes, yes, we exhort the one who rules by divine [authority] and his divine piety and all of you who are under him, and even if we are unworthy, still we advise you not to be careless regarding salvation of the soul, and through the intercessions of the supremely glorious Mother of God by which we dwell as sojourners [we pray], let God shield and protect all for the salvation of soul and body. Amen.

[A] 6. All these things, whatever I knew, I wrote. But if some one else knows the greater and pleasing and perfect will of God, let it prevail, and not these things. But if also God is pleased with these, then let them prevail. Behold, by the grace of God I am innocent of every impending danger from every side.

[B] Treatise by the same author to those dwelling in this holy monastery

[B] 1. My spiritual fathers and brothers, since I dwell here in your midst and for this reason you asked me, both you and others, what is conducive to the salvation of souls; I, as you see me, am careful to expound to the best of my ability the holy scriptures if anyone asks me. Moreover, because it is my duty from the patriarchal see of the Catholic Church, [to expound the scriptures] comprehensively to all, how much more is it fitting for me [to expound them] to you who are close to me, since I dwell here in your midst? But now since you also selected and [appointed] the one who will administer the hospice, it is fitting to remind you, my beloved [brethren] in the Lord [p. 72] of what is appropriate with [the help of] God and our blameless Lady the Mother of God by whose help we dwell as sojourners. It is as follows:

TWELFTH CENTURY

[B] 2. There is a regulation from the holy fathers, if a foreign monk or layman from another place passes through toward Jerusalem or departing to some other place, to keep him and host him for three days of rest, and after this to give him a blessing of bread and dismiss him. But if he is ill, keep him until he recovers, but if he wants to depart promptly, to provision him and feed him and give him blessing and dismiss him. It is necessary for foreigners to eat with the host of the hospice what is appropriate for each day, whether a fast day or an ordinary one, and whenever the meal-time happens to be. Unless it should happen that the foreigner recovers and is eager to depart, and [then] it is necessary to provision him and dismiss [him] on whatever day it falls, as I also said above.

[B] 3. But if he is a Frank, host him one day and give him blessing and dismiss him. But if he is ill, keep him until he recovers. But nevertheless, if it is also appropriate for the Franks to rest for the three days and it is necessary for the salvation of soul and body, let it be so. But to all persons let whatever is pleasing to God be; but at least let nothing unpleasing to God prevail.

[B] 4. The host of the hospice should not eat separately apart from the foreign monks or lay persons, unless those being offered hospitality are many and he wishes to serve them, except for the Franks due to the unsoundness of [their] thinking. Nevertheless [he should eat] even with these, if [their] thinking is sound.

[B] 5. If one of the brothers should invite a guest, it is fitting [for that brother] to serve him from [the contents of] his own cell. But if, on the other hand, it is a friend [of the brotherhood], the host of the hospice ought to invite him and, if there is need, he ought to host him three days. But if a brother brings another [guest], it is necessary for that [brother] to serve him.

[B] 6. This regulation regarding a brother's bringing [someone] to his cell is on account of its not being a cenobitic community, but each brother separately takes care of his own [cell], and the need of a hospice is administered separately. [p. 73] It has nothing at all in common with the brothers, nor again do the brothers have any authority over the hospice whatsoever, not anything in common with the hospice, except for what is conducive to the salvation of the soul in accord with the love and command of Christ. But the cenobitic law and canon has another tradition. It is not permitted for a brother privately to possess anything at all, however small or large, neither for [entertaining] a friend nor for any other reason whatsoever. Let this suffice on this topic.

[B] 7. It is necessary to give all persons blessing, whenever they depart, just bread only. But if the visitor is from among the dignitaries of the world, it is necessary to attend to him and serve him whatever he might be, whether a believer or an unbeliever, as the Apostle says: "Give all men what is owed, honor to whom honor is due, respect to whom respect is due, tax to whom tax is due"(cf. Rom. 13:7).

21. ROIDION

[B] 8. As for the hospice host's eating with the guests, as we said above,⁷ if it is appropriate, let it be so, but if it is not beneficial for any good reason, let what is beneficial and fitting be done, only let all things be done to the pleasure of God. I, unworthy as I am, am agreeable to things that are pleasing to God. But if the hospice host is striving for greater fasting and abstinence, let him extend to the guests the appropriate hospitality, but let [him] himself do as Abraham, the archetype of hosts, did in the Old [Testament], who served as host, but did not eat together with them, and so on, as is written (Deut. 18:8) and as some of the fathers in the New [Testament] did.

Nevertheless it is necessary that the hospice host be watchful and exacting, lest, owing to carelessness, the occasion of the command of hospitality lead to injury to the soul, as it also says in the divine Ladder, that "Gluttony follows upon hospitality, and fornication upon love."⁸

[B] 9. It is necessary also [that the hospice host be watchful and exacting] concerning the feast that it is the custom to celebrate herein on the Dormition of the supremely glorious Mother of God, that it not be celebrated in disregard or ignorance of its purpose, as indeed has become the custom among carnal persons, and indeed is for blasphemy and not to the glory of God. But as the great Gregory the Theologian [p. 74] decrees in the *Discourse on Christmas*⁹ how the feasts of Christians ought to be, [that is] not with revelry and inebriation and the rest, but with psalms and hymns and what he says there. Every divine scripture thus defines this rule for feasts.

[B] 10. The things appropriate and necessary to the nourishment of the flesh are what is available, as also the Lord permitted the arriving crowds to eat barley bread that was on hand. Indeed, as Basil the Great says, "Being able through miracle to welcome the multitudes with abundance of foods, but giving to us a prototype and model in such things."¹⁰ Basil the Great himself in his Ascetical Treatises prescribes in compliance with these things, and so does every other divine scripture.

So it is necessary for us to follow and emulate the holy scriptures and [the prescription of] "only what is available"—bread and a single course of boiled legumes with olive oil in the evening on whatever day [the feast of the Dormition] falls because of the assembly of the congregation, and on the next day two courses of mashed legumes and vegetables boiled or [served] in whatever manner is acceptable.

Holy scripture does not urge us to be concerned with a side dish and wine. But if it is given by someone and God bestows it, again even in this case it is still necessary to [eat] these things to the glory of God, in accordance with what is appropriate and pleasing to God—not in the evening, but on the morrow, on the very day of the feast, as also the regulation and tradition holds regarding the remaining feasts of the Lord that have anticipatory fasts. But if God does not bestow it from someone else, as we said before, nothing else [is to be eaten]. But if some lover of Christ offers something for sustenance, let these not be received in the evening, but let the donor hold these until the next day and then let him give these things free from offense.

The following was left out, and it must be added because it is necessary:

[B] 11. If one of the brothers is dying, in this case it is necessary to cooperate with him for the salvation of his soul, and if he so chooses, if he possesses anything, he who is in charge of the service of the church and the hospice must lock the cell of the dying man and offer everything [p. 75] to the hospice and to the church. [He must] lock the cell lest any of the brothers or even the heirs from ignorance or boorishness or even from jealousy fall into the sin of sacrilege and offend against God, because such things are dedicated to God and are put aside for the sustenance of the needy and for the church for the redemption of the soul of the deceased, as the Lord pronounced in all the divine scriptures.

TWELFTH CENTURY

We are not speaking of persons who have excessive [possessions] such that through these means harm takes place, but of persons who possess self-sufficiency and what befits monks, nothing more, and if it is fitting, [let this be done] at the time. Only let all these [procedures] be to the glory of God for the salvation of the soul, and not for blasphemy of God and for injury to the soul. But if also it leads to injury for the soul, let such things not be.

If, however, a fellow brother also cohabits with [the dying man], he has authority over whatever belongs to [the dying monk's] lot. But if his [spiritual] father cohabits with him, let what is fitting and pleasing to God prevail. If the dying man chooses to act in accordance with all that was written above, he must also [express his] cooperation and consent in a written document and in whatever other way God is pleased. But if the dying brother does not so choose, we do not set forth these things according to any commandment or tradition, but in accord with personal will and preference . . .¹¹ we stave off harm to those who serve God.

Let there be no concurrence or advice in any other way on such matters, because the laws of God do not permit monks to administer such matters on account of the evils that lie ahead. Nevertheless, just as above [we spoke] about those who have excessive possessions, [so here] in order not to shut the door to their salvation, [we say let them do] as we said above to the rest, or [let them do] as they choose. But we say that they must avoid harming the soul, and to all those who are so inclined [we say] to do precisely what we said.

[B] 12. If there is a priest in the monastery, let there be liturgies for the deceased on the third, the ninth, and the fortieth days and on the anniversary, in accord with tradition among orthodox Christians. But if there is no priest in the monastery, it is necessary to send out eucharistic offerings [p. 76] where there is a priest and to offer them on behalf of the deceased. But within the holy monastery let what is appropriate prevail, as we also said above.

[B] 13. These things were issued with [the help of] God in keeping with the intent of the divine scriptures. For your information, then, we cite explicitly the divine scripture as well as tradition. It says in the Constitutions of the Holy Apostles, "let the third and ninth and fortieth days and the anniversary be celebrated on behalf of the deceased; and let donation be given to the poor from [the deceased's] possessions for their [the deceased's] redemption."¹² It says here only "to the poor," nothing more. But in the regulations of the holy apostles Peter and Paul concerning the invitations [extended] by lay people to lay people for commemorations on behalf of the deceased, it says to clergy, "When you are invited to commemorations of [lay people], eat in an orderly fashion and with fear of God, so that you can intercede on behalf of the departed; for being elders and deacons of Christ you ought always to observe moderation both for the sake of yourselves and for others, so that you may be able to admonish the disorderly."¹³

21. ROIDION

So with respect to this subject in divine scripture, in the former passage it speaks about the poor only, nothing else, and thus to a public where there is no permanent hospice; but in the latter [it speaks] about priests and clergy and not about the common people and conducting memorial feasts. Hence it appears that [the divine writings] permit only priests and deacons who celebrate [the memorial service] to eat and the rest to be given to the poor. So, as we said also above, [it is addressed] to laymen and to a community, at that, where there is no permanent hospice. For the things dedicated to hospices are in perpetuity for the nourishment of the poor. But if it is fitting [to adopt] some particular [procedure] in this case also, let it be so, as long as it is pleasing to God.

[B] 14. Let us speak also about things which exist from common custom among the fathers without attestation in the divine writings, just as also in the Gerontikon it tells how, when they were at such a feast, the Abba John Kolobos was there too, and as they were seated one of the brothers laughed and the Abba John said to him, “Are you laughing, [p. 77] brother? Don’t you know that you are eating the memorial repast and you ought rather to be weeping because you ate the memorial repast?”¹⁴ Here also we cited things without attestation of divine scriptures. Since in eating the memorial repast he was to weep, it seems that such [customs] have no legal sanction and justification.

For all these reasons let him who is able with [the help of] God to know what is the perfect will of God and what is to God’s satisfaction consider what is best. For without the divine scriptures I can neither do nor teach anything; but by interpreting the divine writings in which the will of God is revealed, by the grace of God I do not defile my ministry. Yet if a practice is observed, whether by believers or unbelievers, if harm is suspected, it is necessary for all the writings to declare it. If they permit these things to be, behold, all is well; but if they do not, it is necessary to abandon them on account of injury to the soul, just as also the Lord said that “to the one that seizes your goods, do not demand them back, and to the one wishing to sue you and possess your coat, give your cloak as well” (cf. Luke 6:30; Matt. 5:40, 42) and so on similarly. For one ought not to endure pretexts for sin to the point of injury to the soul.

[B] 15. If someone who is healthy chooses to make a charitable donation to the poor, we say—as advice, not as a decree—to make this donation to the hospice for the sake of freedom from care, because often a monk falls into harm in such cases. I mean, into [the habit of] making his virtue manifest and seeking to have a name prominent among men, [and thus] conceit and other vices of the soul [follow] especially among the [spiritually] weak. Then [is fulfilled] the saying of the Lord stating that “You do not have reward from your father who is in heaven” (Matt. 6:1) because of snatching and seeking the glory of men and not of God, because he who desires to escape such dangers needs great spiritual power. But let the reader consider correctly the rest.

Again frequently he who gives charity does not know with certainty who are truly poor from those who are pretending, and falls, just as Basil the Great says: “Associating with the greedy and increasing their vice.”¹⁵ The Lord did not say, “I had and you gave to me” [p. 78] and so on, and he did not say “when I was full you nourished [me],” but “you saw me hungry and you fed [me],” and so on.

For these reasons at the hospice whoever passes through there, whoever he may be, whether poor or rich, he is certainly at that time still in urgent need of food and shelter, and the command of the Lord is completely fulfilled that says, “For I was hungry and you gave me food, a stranger and you welcomed me” (Matt. 25:35) and the like. Besides, the donation is given in secret and is not just temporary, but it also abides for the future.

TWELFTH CENTURY

We say this as advice for those who are still living and healthy and choose early [in life] to make charitable donations. But if it is not beneficial thus [to make charitable donations], let what the Apostle says be, “Test all things, hold fast what is good, abstain from every form of evil” (I Thess. 5:21).

[B] 16. One should not keep any kind of animal whatsoever, neither birds nor quadrupeds, except those that hunt the loathsome [mice]¹⁶ [which should be] male for the sake of freedom from care. Indeed, it is necessary to place one’s hope in God and in the blameless Mother of God, and not in animals and lands. As God himself and the blameless Mother of God provide whenever there is need, at any time, let it be.

[B] 17. Nor again is it necessary to acquire possession of additional lands besides those already in existence now, since they do not contribute to the benefit of souls, but rather to [their] harm, and God is not pleased. It is necessary to give up these [possessions], all of them, just as we said above.¹⁷ When the above-written rule applies, let a donation to the hospice be given either after death or while in good health, if this happens to be appropriate and they choose [to make the donation]. But if the regulation does not apply, again in this case let the best thing be done so long as God is pleased.

[B] 18. Whatever else I left out, I will be living here in your midst, and indeed even if I am unworthy, still as one whose service is to the word, if you command something and ask me about what is conducive to salvation of souls, to the extent of my ability, as long as [p. 79] my soul is unharmed, I will not neglect to speak the word of God from the divine scriptures.

[B] 19. But you and all others, ignore these things and others that I may say if they do not lead to the salvation of souls, just as also the Apostle says, “If we or an angel from heaven evangelize you beyond what you have received, let it be anathema” (cf. Gal. 1:8). But if they are conducive to the affairs of God, heed them, you and all persons, just as the Lord says, “Whoever hears you, hears me” (Luke 10:16). All of the above were established with good reason for the glory of God and his blameless mother, the Mother of God, in whom we dwell.

Since, just as it was also written above concerning the office of the superior that it lacks legal authority, as the truth showed, and the cause [for its lack] in the present time was written above, therefore here at the end this is written again for assurance and confirmation as well as for completing everything written above and for our exoneration. Because just as the office of superior is no longer legally valid nor in accord with the order that is grounded in the divine scriptures, for this reason [we declare that] it should not be permitted to exist at all in violation of the divine scripture. But if it should be established in a wholly tyrannical manner by those who do not fear God, just as also was written before, let it not have absolute authority either in the church or in the hospice, just as was also written above,¹⁸ but rather let the person in charge of the church and [the one in charge of] the hospice, [administer them] in accord with the rule of the church and the hospice of the monastery of our holy father Symeon the Wonderworker, except not separate and [not] provided for separately as there. But just as from the beginning it was written and decreed in the rule of the two divine commands,—that is [love for] God and [for] neighbor—so let them be provided for together and just as was written before. Let those serving in the hospice and the person who controls the church—the latter alone because he shares this duty and occupation with the hospice host—be provided with every bodily need. As for their dwelling and eating together, what is acceptable for the salvation of the soul should be done.¹⁹ [p. 80]

21. ROIDION

[B] 20. It is necessary for the sake of assurance to append such stipulations even a second and a third time²⁰ for refutation and condemnation of those who rule tyrannously, [namely, the stipulation] as was written above, that [the superior] have no authority at all in the church and over the hospice. But if those who seek a pretext [to seize] the surrounding consecrated lands should offer in support of their claim that in earlier times those places were under the authority of the incumbent, let sin not find in this way an occasion for an attack in the person of those who control the church and the hospice. Rather, it is necessary to cede these [lands].

Nevertheless, just as God is pleased, so also let all things now be just as [when] the church and the hospice took their start in such matters from our blameless Mistress for her virtue and glory and that of her Son, and let them abide in this way, and not in sin and blasphemy.

Let the Mother of God herself, if she wishes it, manage in this fashion and without any earthly revenues, just as was written above, according to the rule of our holy father Sabas—when conditions were not those of today, but those when he was still living. For he himself did not receive revenues or donations from the emperor or anywhere else, as his biography records.²¹ But if the hospice building is sought after in the manner of the lands, it is necessary to cede it, too, and establish another. Therefore, let there be nothing in common between the [hospice] building and anything else whatsoever for the sake of freedom from scandal. By the intercession of the supremely glorious Mother of God, and all the saints. Amen.

Notes on the Translation

1. The patriarchate of Antioch; see also [B1] below.
2. sozei ho sozon ten heautou psychen. This is a misquotation of Gen. 19:17: sozon soze ten seautou psychen: “Save thine own life by all means.”
3. Reference is obscure, but cf. Cyril of Skythopolis, Vita Sabae, chap. 32, ed. E. Schwartz (Berlin, 1938), p. 117, and (42) Sabas [8].
4. In [A1] above.
5. In [A3] above.
6. Not extant; see references to it in (20) Black Mountain [39R], [84], cf. [18], [38].
7. In [B4] above.
8. John Klimakos, Scala paradisi, PG 88, col. 1095.
9. Gregory of Nyssa, Oratio in diem natalem Christi, PG 46, cols. 1127–50 at 1129B.
10. Cf. Basil of Caesarea, Regulae fusius tractatae 19 ([LR 19]), PG 31, col. 969A.
11. Lacuna consists of part of a single word.
12. Epitome Const. Apost. 25, ed. F. X. Funk, Didascalia et Constitutiones Apostolorum, vol. 2 (Paderborn, 1905), p. 90.

TWELFTH CENTURY

13. Epitome Const. Apost. 26, ed. Funk, Didascalia, vol. 2, p. 90.
14. Ioannes Kolobos, Apophthegmata Patrum, Ap. 9, PG 65, cols. 205D–208A.
15. Unidentifiable reference.
16. In other words, the only animals allowed are male cats which would protect the monastery from the miara; for the use of miaros (“loathsome,” “unclean”) in reference to mice, see Kriaras, Lexiko, s.v.
17. In [B15] above.
18. In [A4] above.
19. Hos kai paradechetai pros soterian psyches.
20. Cf. [A1], [A4] above.
21. Cyril of Skythopolis, Vita Sabae chap. 73, ed. Schwartz, p. 177, indicates the opposite.

Document Notes

- [A1] Description of new administrative arrangements. The circumlocution here and in the preface for the secular ruler suggests some awkwardness. Perhaps he was some local Armenian feudal lord. The declaration of the superfluity of the superiorship is repeated below in [A4] and [B20]; yet as [A4] indicates, he was evidently irremovable. The monastic officials mentioned here are probably the hospice host (xenodochos, for whom see [A3], [B2], [B4], [B5], [B8], [B9] and [B19] below) and the ecclesiarch (but not the steward; see [A3], [A4] below).
- [A2] Description of the existing kelliotic constitution. For earlier testimony to the kelliotic lifestyle, see (12) Tzimiskes [10], [18], [19], [20] and (13) Ath. Typikon [37], [41], [43] ff. Kelliotic monks were generally looked upon with indifference or hostility by monastic reformers; see (28) Pantokrator [28], (32) Mamas [26], and (33) Heliou Bomon [26].
- [A3] Restriction of the steward’s authority; entitlements to financial support. Cross-referenced in [A4] below. For the support of attendants in a philanthropic foundation, see (16) Mount Tmolos [2], (28) Pantokrator [38], (29) Kosmosoteira [70], and (39) Lips [51].
- [A4] Restriction of the superior’s authority. Cross-references [A1] above; see also [B20] below. The restriction is unique in the monastic foundation documents. Nikon cites the lost regulation (typos) of the monastery of Symeon the Wonderworker here and in [B19] below for the independent administration of a hospice by a hospice host (xenodochos).
- [A5] Responsibilities of the lay protector. See (14) Ath. Testament [6], [7], (17) Nikon Metanoieite [12], [14], and (18) Nea Gephyra [2], [3] for analogous provisions.
- [A6] Acceptability of alternative arrangements. For Nikon’s characteristic willingness to stand correction, see (20) Black Mountain [88], [92].
- [B1] Source of Nikon’s authority. Nikon refers to his patriarchal commission; cf. [A1] above and [B18] below.
- [B2] Limitations on hospitality to guests. See (42) Sabas [8], perhaps an influence on Nikon here; cf. (34) Machairas [117].
- [B3] Lesser hospitality to Franks. Catholic Franks are treated with some prejudice here and in [B4] below; so also in (42) Sabas [2].
- [B4] Host of the hospice to eat with his guests. See exceptions noted in [B8] below.
- [B5] Monks to entertain guests in their own cells. This, of course, is the converse of the usual cenobitic legislation forbidding “secret eating” in cells, for which see (20) Black Mountain [24], [69], [70], and [72] along with (22) Evergetis [9], [22] and related documents. (60) Charsianeites [C4] is also opposed to entertainment of visitors in cells.
- [B6] Separate financing of the hospice and individual cells. Depending on the circumstances of their foundation, dependencies might have their own endowments, as in (28) Pantokrator [27], (31) Areia [M10]; but they could also be supported by the principal foundation, as in (13) Ath. Typikon [37], (24) Christodoulos [A24], (48) Prodromos [11].

21. ROIDION

- [B7] Special hospitality for dignitaries. This is an implicit rejection of (3) Theodore Studites [23]. See also (26) Luke of Messina [3], [8]; (27) Kecharitomene [17]; (34) Machairas [117]; and (54) Neilos Damilas [20].
- [B8] Permission for the hospice host to practice fasting and abstinence. This is in spite of his general obligation to eat with his guests as described in [B4] above; see also the treatment of this issue in (44) Karyes [12].
- [B9] Regulation of the feast of the Dormition. See also [B10] below, (22) Evergetis [11], which instructs its monks to celebrate this feast in a “splendid and sumptuous manner,” and (29) Kosmosoteira [10].
- [B10] Specific provisions for the festal diet. Cf. the dietary prescriptions for feasts in (28) Pantokrator [12].
- [B11] Foundation to inherit property of deceased monks. Nikon indicates that this and the following chapters are later additions to [B]. (59) Manuel II [2] makes the same provision. (14) Ath. Typikon [44] and (42) Sabas [4] both reject any notion of their monks having proprietary rights over cells, but (12) Tzimiskes [18] provides for compensation to monks for their improvements upon changing superiors.
- [B12] Obligation to perform commemorative liturgies for the departed. Cf. provisions for these observances in (22) Evergetis [36], (23) Pakourianos [30], (27) Kecharitomene [70], (30) Phoberos [50], (32) Mamas [39], (33) Heliou Bomon [39], and (34) Machairas [157].
- [B13] Canonical support for charitable donations to the poor. For charitable donations in conjunction with commemorative services for the dead, see (22) Evergetis [36], (23) Pakourianos [21], [30], (27) Kecharitomene [70], (28) Pantokrator [8], (32) Mamas [39], and (33) Heliou Bomon [39].
- [B14] Patristic testimony for charitable donations to the poor. Here Nikon insists on an authoritative precedent for each contemporary observance; cf. (20) Black Mountain, Analysis.
- [B15] Benefits of making charitable donations to the hospice. Nikon is making a convoluted argument here for the advantages of donations to the hospice rather than directly to the poor; see also [B17] below.
- [B16] Ban on animals, male or female. Cf. Nikon’s ban on female animals in (20) Black Mountain [86]; see also (3) Theodore Studites [5], (12) Tzimiskes [22], [23], (13) Ath. Typikon [31], [53], (15) Constantine IX [3], (45) Neophytos [19], (59) Manuel II [14], and (60) Charsianeites [C2].
- [B17] Exhortation to renunciation of property in favor of the hospice. Nikon returns here to the theme of [B15] above; for the sentiment against additional acquisitions of property, see also (13) Ath. Typikon [34], [45], [53].
- [B18] Nikon’s service as spiritual teacher. See also [A1], [B1], and [B14] for the nature of his responsibilities towards the foundation.
- [B19] Recapitulation of administrative arrangements. The administrative provisions of the typikon, [A1], [A3], [A4], are incorporated into the Treatise here.
- [B20] Contingent provisions. Like the author of (1) Apa Abraham [5], Nikon anticipates lawsuits from the lay relatives of the residents of this foundation; see also the treatment of this problem in (19) Attaleiates [34], [43] and (23) Pakourianos [18].

CHAPTER FOUR

Early Reform Monasteries of the Eleventh Century

“We instruct all in the name of our Lord God the Ruler of All that this holy monastery is to be independent, free of everyone’s control, and self-governing, and not subject to any rights, be they imperial or ecclesiastic or of a private person . . .” (22) Evergetis [12]

“I dare to say that [the monastery] was not completed with any other money belonging to someone else or as a result of any wrongdoing or even with forced labor, additional requisitions, and the service of my dependent peasants . . . but from my own rights and personal labors and zealous efforts.” (23) Pakourianos [1]

“No man in the world shall have power either to abolish and overthrow the aforesaid godly cenobitic rule of life in our monastery, or to attempt, for any cause or reason whatsoever, to enslave this monastery or any of its dependencies and set a debased stamp on its liberty.” (24) Christodoulos [A16]

There are three lengthy documents in this fourth group of Byzantine monastic foundation documents, all of which date from the turbulent last half of the eleventh century. These documents illustrate the early stages of the Byzantine monastic reform movement.

A. Typology of the Documents

Two of the documents in this chapter, (22) Evergetis and (23) Pakourianos, initiate the series of lengthy, complex founders’ typika that will continue throughout the rest of Byzantine history. They are by far the longest documents considered hitherto in our corpus, displaying a sophisticated treatment of the problems of Byzantine monasticism with considerable stylistic polish. Of the two, (23) Pakourianos, authored by the Komnenian military commander of the same name, is the better organized document, perhaps a benefit of close modeling on a now lost typikon of the Constantinopolitan monastery of Panagios. Also, unlike (22) Evergetis, it was probably composed nearly all at the same time, while the latter document was likely subject to continual re-editing throughout the last half of the eleventh century.

While (22) Evergetis was the more lastingly influential document, (23) Pakourianos ironically is a more modern one in terms of its organization. The latter’s use of a table of contents (a first among our documents), its division into chapters with summary headings, and its overall content and pattern of organization anticipate some of the features of twelfth-century typika like (30) Phoberos, (32) Mamas, (27) Kecharitomene, (28) Pantokrator and (29) Kosmosoteira even though all of these documents are textually related to (22) Evergetis. (23) Pakourianos is also exclusively a founder's typikon, while (22) Evergetis still shows a certain resemblance to hybrid typika like (4) Stoudios or (11) Ath. Rule with their inclusion of prescriptions for the performance of the canonical hours.

CHAPTER FOUR

The third document in this chapter, (24) Christodoulos, is actually a collection of three shorter texts composed within two years of one another in 1091–93. The first of these, Christodoulos' Rule [A], is a highly autobiographical document like (13) Ath. Typikon with a relatively brief series of regulations recalling (10) Eleousa. Like his predecessor Athanasios the Athonite, Christodoulos had second thoughts about how to arrange for the governance of his foundation, which gave rise to his Testament [B] and his Codicil [C]. These last-named texts can be interpreted within the genre of the monastic testament as primarily transmissive documents, like (8) John Xenos, (14) Ath. Testament.

Despite these disparities, the three typika considered in this chapter have some important commonalities. All of their authors eagerly provide foundation histories and considerable autobiographical detail. Regardless of whether they relied on a model typikon or not, all of these authors speak in their own typika with distinctly personalized voices, full of commitment, emotion, and quirky idiosyncrasies. Much more so than their predecessors, then, these texts are literary documents, setting the stage for similar typika to come in succeeding centuries. Finally, the authors of these three typika all shared a commitment of varying degree to the principles of the monastic reform movement that was then sweeping the empire.

B. Principles of the Early Monastic Reform Movement

No Byzantine source speaks explicitly of an organized monastic reform movement. Instead, we have a number of key documents authored by contemporary reformers like John V the Oxite, Patriarch of Antioch, Leo, Metropolitan of Chalcedon, Nicholas Grammatikos, Patriarch of Constantinople, and others which address specific reformist objectives. Both these objectives and the careers of their promoters interlock in important ways towards the end of the eleventh century. Since many (if not most) of the reformers came from monastic backgrounds, it should not be surprising to find that the majority of the monastic typika from this era also reflect their concerns.

1. Institutional Independence and Self-Governance

First among these principles in importance was the assertion of the institutional independence and self-governing status of the monasteries represented by these three typika. The precise terminology can be traced back to (13) Ath. Typikon [12] in the mid-tenth century (see above, Chapter Two), and quite possibly preserved, however precariously, during the era of the charistike, by the monastery of Panagios, the superior of which at the beginning of the eleventh century seems to have been a disciple of Athanasios the Athonite.¹ In any event, (23) Pakourianos [3], modeled on the lost typikon of Panagios, asserts institutional independence in 1083, as (24) Christodoulos [A16] does a few years later in 1091. The authors of these two documents were anticipated if not actually influenced by (22) Evergetis [12], which claims independence and asserts that this status dated back to the monastery's foundation in 1048/49.

¹ For the likely link between Lavra and Panagios, see above, (11) Ath. Rule Institutional History, B.1.

2. Opposition to the Charistike

All of our authors were hostile to the basic premise of the charistike and other concessionary programs, namely that the management of ecclesiastical foundations for private profit was not incompatible with and perhaps even beneficial for the religious missions of these institutions. This hostility was characteristic of reformers and like-minded authors of this era. Yet since the charistike was both employed and defended by the emperors and the patriarchs until the very end of the century, our authors, unlike their twelfth-century successors or contemporary firebrand reformist agitators like John of Antioch, felt constrained to be discreet. Our authors were more concerned with keeping their own institutions out of future participation in concessionary programs rather than in leading the fight against them throughout the empire. Therefore, the author of (22) Evergetis, the core of which at least is earlier than the other two documents in this chapter, warns [12] against any attempt to subordinate the monastery to anyone while diplomatically omitting to mention the charistike specifically. The author of (23) Pakourianos [3] is similarly circumspect, though his intent is no less clear. The authors of two contemporary documents discussed earlier, (19) Attaleiates [8] and (10) Eleousa [18], however, are more specific in their condemnation of the charistike. On first examination, the author of (24) Christodoulos appears to be exceptional in actually appointing a charistikarios over his foundation in the Testament [B5], but the restrictions he imposes on this official's authority make it clear that a more benign form of internal protectorate (ephoreia) was his actual intent.

3. The Exercise of Self-Governance

At this early stage of the monastic reform, it was easier for founders to condemn external attempts to seize control of their foundations than to decide how to provide for the effective exercise of self-governance. Over a century before, Athanasios the Athonite stated his belief in (13) Ath. Typikon [20] that a superior chosen internally from among a monastery's own monks was an important safeguard against subordination of his foundation to an outside authority. Later, monastic reformers came to realize that upholding the authority of the superior was essential for reviving monasteries ruined by unscrupulous charistikarioi. Yet founders, with some justification, feared that this might lead in time to re-privatization under the auspices of an ambitious superior inclined to put the interests of his own family ahead of his responsibilities to the monastery.

Our authors appreciated the need to provide a means to make their declarations of institutional independence effective. They differed among themselves, however, over the extent to which they were willing to trust the superiors of their foundations. (22) Evergetis [14] in effect makes the superior, in consultation with the preeminent monks, the effective ruler of the foundation without precisely saying so. The author of (23) Pakourianos, fearing that unscrupulous superiors might attempt to privatize the foundation, orders [5] that the monastery's highest officials should "have no power to regulate anything on their own." Instead the typikon itself was to be authoritative and unchangeable. The author of (24) Christodoulos originally intended to use [A20] the "more prominent brothers," as a check on the superior's authority, but when later it appeared that his foundation was on the brink of failure, he decided to subordinate [C2] the superior as well as all the other officials of his monastery to the authority of his charistikarios.

CHAPTER FOUR

4. Reassertion of Control over Admissions

Sobered by a century of imposed candidates, both lay and religious, installed in monasteries by emperors and patriarchs as well as charistikarioi, monastic reformers of the eleventh century sought to reassert control over admissions to monasteries under their direction. One practical way to do this, endorsed by (22) Evergetis [37] and (24) Christodoulos [A26], was to insist on a probationary novitiate and careful examination of applicants who had been tonsured in another monastery.² Another approach, proposed by (22) Evergetis [23], was to decline to set a fixed number of positions for monks in the monastery for fear of having to take in candidates who were not sufficiently pious.

5. The Campaign against Administrative Corruption

The ruinous financial depredations of the charistikarioi formed an important part of the reformers' case against the charistike. Later on in the eleventh century, a series of bitterly controversial government expropriations of ecclesiastical property (see below, E. Historical Context, 2, 6, 11) added to the urgency of developing procedures to protect religious institutions from theft, both internal and external. All three of our authors shared this concern. In (22) Evergetis, corrupt or careless administration of financial affairs was prominent among the grounds for removal of the superior [18] as well as the steward [14] and other financial officials [22]. (23) Pakourianos [26] also sets strict standards of accountability for officials. (24) Christodoulos [A20] cites misappropriation and theft as justifications for the superior's deposition. (22) Evergetis [29] requires officials to reverence icons upon bestowal of their keys of office in an attempt to invoke heavenly sanctions against thievery. Assuming their landed endowments to be sacrosanct, both (22) Evergetis [19] and (23) Pakourianos [33] condemn improper alienations of movable properties as well, the former more vehemently than the latter, however. (24) Christodoulos [A21] provides for a system of receipts and audits of accounts to keep officials honest. Such precautions would become more widespread in the twelfth century.

6. Advocacy of Cenobitic Monasticism

Even though historically Byzantium had been home to several coexisting forms of monasticism, the reformers' critique of the charistike shows a strong bias towards cenobitic monasticism.³ Perhaps this was because where charistikarioi did not destroy monastic life entirely in those institutions under their control, they may have encouraged kelliotic or idiorhythmic arrangements in which they and the remaining monks divided up the assets of foundations into individual shares (cf. (21) Roidion [A2]). Be that as it may, our authors in this chapter share the reformers' cenobitic bias, especially the author of (22) Evergetis, who goes beyond communal living and eating arrangements to ban [22] servants and personal possessions and even correspondence with family members. On all these matters the legislation of (23) Pakourianos [4], [5], [8], [9] was more moderate, though (24) Christodoulos [A28] is closer to Evergetis in its requirements.

² See also, however, the preferential admissions policy for fellow Georgians adopted by the author of (23) Pakourianos [25], in which a novitiate is not mentioned.

³ For the pluralistic character of earlier Byzantine monasticism, see Alexander Kazhdan, "Hermitic, Cenobitic, and Secular Ideals in Byzantine Hagiography of the Ninth through the Twelfth Centuries," GOTR 30 (1985), 473–87.

EARLY REFORM MONASTERIES

At this early stage in the reform movement, however, there was still some tolerance for alternative forms of monasticism. (24) Christodoulos [A23] permits solitaries subordinated to the cenobitic community, while (22) Evergetis was willing to allow [13] the superior (optionally) to live as a solitary. The hostility towards alternative forms of monasticism would intensify, however, in the twelfth century.⁴

7. Restriction of Patronal Privileges

Another important part of the reformers' critique of the charistike was the flagrant abuse of patronal privileges by the charistikarioi. By the late eleventh century, the unrestrained patronal privilege claimed by Athanasios the Athonite in (13) Ath. Typikon [16], viz, "I have absolute dominion, so that not even one person can gainsay my command," seemed incompatible with a foundation claiming to be independent and self-governing. Accordingly, our authors generally make restrained claims to patronal privileges. In (22) Evergetis the only trace of these is to be found in the provisions for posthumous commemorative services for the founders. The author of (23) Pakourianos claims a lifetime right [5] to appoint superiors and preferential admissions [25] for certain of his relatives in addition to the usual memorial services and charitable donations [21]. In (24) Christodoulos, however, the charistikarios is forbidden [B5] to introduce his relatives into that foundation, and the founder's nephews are excluded [B8] from any inheritance of patronal privilege. This author's scruples did not prevent him from requiring [B15] the foundation to accept his spiritual son and the latter's children as beneficiaries, foreshadowing similar exemptions from the usual reform principles by high-born benefactors in the twelfth century.

C. Varieties of Reform

1. The Radical Reform Outlook of (22) Evergetis

Despite their common indebtedness to the reform movement, our three authors clearly varied in the intensity of their commitment to it. Among them, Timothy Evergetinos, the primary author of (22) Evergetis, was certainly the most radical. In (22) Evergetis [17] he displays a hostility to aristocratic privileges and a hard-line approach to equality in food, drink and dress [26], even for officials, that are absent from or even contradicted by (23) Pakourianos and (24) Christodoulos. Our authors also part ways on other, difficult reform issues. The consensus breaker is often (22) Evergetis, whose author's fervent reformism leads him to provide [14] that a bad steward should be allowed to become superior if an amicable agreement cannot be reached on an alternative candidate. In this document's discussion of entrance gifts [37], a little of the same fanatic spirit shows through as the author asserts his willingness to give up entrance gifts from applicants in order to preserve monastic equality and thereby prevent claims for special privileges that might otherwise be made by generous donors. Yet the distinction between compulsory gifts (banned) and unconditional, voluntary donations (permitted) made here was to provide a decisive and lasting precedent for later reform institutions.

2. The "Middle and Royal Road" of (23) Pakourianos

In his introduction, the author of (23) Pakourianos explicitly states that his model rule of the ⁴ For this phenomenon, see (28) Pantokrator [27] and (33) Heliou Bomon [26].

CHAPTER FOUR

Panagios monastery appealed to him as a “middle and most royal road,” an evident euphemism for a lenient disciplinary regime confirmed by his own institution’s prescriptions [10] for the monks’ far-from-rigorous diet. Perhaps Panagios, probably an older document than even the earliest recension of (22) Evergetis, also took a more tentative, moderate approach to key reform issues, although the presence of a certain substratum of reform sentiments in (23) Pakourianos cannot be denied.

3. Reform under a Protector’s Direction in (24) Christodoulos

Of our three authors, that of (24) Christodoulos seems at first to have the least commitment to the principles of the reform movement, but primarily because of his decision in his Testament [B5] to impose a charistikarios on his foundation. Even if the restrictions attached to this office make this decision appear to be a less monstrous repudiation of reform principles than the odious title might otherwise imply, it must be admitted that Christodoulos’ emphatic subordination of the superior to the authority of this official further diminishes his reform credentials. Still, considered by itself as it was meant to be in 1091, Christodoulos’ Rule [A] is an undoubtedly reform-oriented document. It sides with (22) Evergetis, for instance, in ordering [A22] that monks should have no personal possessions except for necessary clothing. The subsequent deterioration in his foundation’s fortunes surely played an important part in motivating Christodoulos to devise a strong leadership for it in the Testament, though some reform principles had to be sacrificed. Even in that event, the independent status of the foundation is reaffirmed [B13] in the Testament. Ironically, it was the Christodoulouan model, a constitutionally independent foundation with a powerful protector (minus the ideologically negative title of charistikarios), which would provide the most popular model for institutional leadership in the twelfth century (see below, Chapters Five and Six).

4. Reform by Precedent in (20) Black Mountain

Though Nikon of the Black Mountain was discussed earlier (see Chapter Three), his typikon (20) Black Mountain deserves mention here as yet a fourth approach to the monastic reform of the late eleventh century. His work illustrates to an exceptional degree a willingness to allow authoritative precedents, be they from scripture, patristic literature, canon law, or even earlier typika, to shape his monastic legislation. Though none of our authors were willing to adopt such an extreme approach, all three show this characteristically reform-minded respect for precedents to some degree. (22) Evergetis, reflecting perhaps the interests of the founder Paul Evergetinos, author of an immense patristic florilegium, relies chiefly on patristic citations—including the Basilian Ascetic Treatises—for its guiding precedents. The author of (23) Pakourianos, as noted above, forthrightly admits the earlier typikon of the Panagios monastery as his model, while the author of (24) Christodoulos cites [A18] hagiographic literature of the patristic era, the imperial legislation of Justinian, [A26] the Basilian Ascetic Treatises, and canon law.

The reliance on precedent did not exclude another feature of these documents, namely the exaltation of the institution’s own typikon as the authoritative guide for the lives of these foundations. The much-copied provision in (22) Evergetis [43] for a monthly reading of the typikon and the repeated insistence of (23) Pakourianos [5], [18], [30] that even the superior cannot change the terms of the typikon serve to illustrate the point. The discussion of how to handle a situation in which a founder's typikon actually contradicted canon law was left for another generation of reformers.

D. Other Concerns of the Authors

1. Preference for Liturgical Duties over Manual Labor

Following a long-standing trend that can be dated back as early as ninth-century Studite monasticism, these authors placed an emphasis on the performance of liturgical duties over manual labor. This can be seen in (22) Evergetis even though more monks were assigned [33] to various crafts and administrative functions than were consecrated for service in the church. In (23) Pakourianos [6], slightly more than half of the monks were assigned to liturgical functions, not including various officials who must have been responsible for directing them. Only the author of (24) Christodoulos attempted [A10] at first to operate his foundation without relying on the labor of married laymen and their families, a position which he was later compelled [A13] to abandon. Even so, he declares [A15] that “uninterrupted hymn singing” was a monk’s raison d’être, and though he allows [A22] monks to practice crafts, he was unwilling to permit a commercial trade in their handicrafts.

2. The Evergetian Formulation of Cenobitic Monasticism

As the most radical of our three documents, (22) Evergetis strikes its own, ultimately very influential path on many issues, emphasizing a sacramental life with daily liturgy and confession [7] and relatively frequent reception of communion [5]. It alone obliges [14] its superior to rule consultatively rather than in the traditional authoritarian style (cf. (23) Pakourianos [15]). It is also the only one of the three documents considered here to permit bathing [28] under certain circumstances, though other institutions would follow (22) Evergetis’ example in this regard in the twelfth century. (22) Evergetis’ unwillingness to allow [24] monks to have personal servants was much less popular in the next century, particularly among aristocratic founders who took the more indulgent view espoused here by (23) Pakourianos [4], which permits them to exalted personages.

3. Safeguarding Moral Purity

All three authors shared a concern to safeguard the moral purity of their monks by keeping them from sexual temptation, but they disagreed in identifying the most obvious threat. The author of (22) Evergetis feared women most of all, excluding them from participation in daily charitable distributions [38] and from visiting the foundation on other occasions [39] except for those who simply could not be excluded because of their eminence and nobility. (23) Pakourianos [23] does not allow women access to the foundation either, except on the feast of the Dormition. This author worried most about eunuchs and young boys, however, whom he bans [17] from his monastery even though he also sets up [31] a separate school for some of the latter where they could be trained to become priests. Both authors drew from the Studite and subsequent Athonite traditions for these prohibitions, but drew different conclusions as to which sex posed the greater problem. Taking a more extreme position, Christodoulos, as we have seen, tried to ban all married men, their wives, and their children from the island of Patmos where his foundation was located.

CHAPTER FOUR

4. Practice of Institutional Philanthropy

All of these authors shared at least an ideological commitment to institutional philanthropy. Both (22) Evergetis [38] and (23) Pakourianos [10], [21] provide for charitable distributions at the gates of their respective foundations, though since memorial donations were important fund-raising devices, it is important to remember that these were driven chiefly by financial considerations. More strictly altruistic were the infirmary for the sick in (22) Evergetis [41] and three similar facilities mentioned in (23) Pakourianos [29]. The author of (24) Christodoulos [A25] regretfully notes the insufficiency of resources which restrained him from prescribing specific charitable donations or obligations of hospitality.

5. Concern for the Welfare of the Dependent Peasantry

Of the works of the three authors, only (23) Pakourianos [1] displays the concern for the well-being of the dependent peasantry that was common to several other founders of this era, e.g., (9) Galesios [246] and (19) Attaleiates [39]. This concern pre-dated the monastic reform and was championed even by some traditional private benefactors like Lazarus of Galesios and Michael Attaleiates. Its notable absence in (22) Evergetis indicates, however, that it had not become a common principle of the reform movement itself.

E. Historical Context

The era during which these three documents were composed was relatively short, yet it was also one of the more tumultuous in the history of the Byzantine church, analogous to the last quarter of the tenth century (for which see above, Chapter Two).⁵

1. Imperial Support for Evergetis

(22) Evergetis [12] asserts that the famous reform monastery's independent and self-governing status dated from the time of its foundation by Paul Evergetinos in 1048/49, and that it had been confirmed by several emperors. This would indicate that Emperor Constantine IX Monomachos (1042–55) and one or more of his successors had been supportive of Evergetis in the first perilous decades of its existence. Paul Evergetinos predeceased the emperor in 1054 and was succeeded as superior by Timothy, to whom (22) Evergetis is formally attributed.

2. Isaac I Komnenos' Confiscation of Ecclesiastical Incomes

Michael Keroullarios (1043–58),⁶ probably the most powerful patriarch of Constantinople in Byzantine times, played an important role in recognizing the insurgency that led to the accession of Emperor Isaac I Komnenos (1057–59) and was rewarded with a promise of non-interference in ecclesiastical affairs. This did not stop that emperor from carrying out an extensive confiscation of ecclesiastical incomes despite substantial opposition.⁷ This experience may well have had an impact on early monastic reformers like Timothy Evergetinos, who also was then leading Evergetis as its superior. Soon thereafter, the emperor turned against Michael Keroullarios and was preparing his condemnation by a synod when the patriarch died suddenly in 1059. Isaac Komnenos was unable to ride out the ensuing popular resentment, and on the advice of the influential courtier Michael Psellos (a notable charistikarios), sought retirement as a monk in the Studios monastery in Constantinople.

⁵ For ecclesiastical politics under the Komnenoi, see Konstantinos Polyzoides, Ho Vasileus kai hoi laikoi eis to en genei dioiketikon ergon tes ekklesias epi Alexiou Komnenou (1081–1118) (Thessaloniki, 1979), and V. Tiftixoglu, "Gruppenbildungen innerhalb des konstantinopolitanischen Klerus während der Komnenenzeit," BZ 62 (1969), 25–72. The pre-Komnenian period discussed briefly here still lacks a thorough treatment.

⁶ For this patriarch, see A. Michel, Humbert und Kerullarios, 2 vols. (Paderborn, 1925, 1930).

EARLY REFORM MONASTERIES

3. Evergetis' Preservation from the Charistike

Timothy Evergetinos probably completed his work on (22) Evergetis during the reign of Emperor Constantine X Doukas (1059–67). Since he claims [3] that he greatly increased the size of the foundation during his tenure as superior, keeping Evergetis out of the charistike must be counted as one of his great achievements, seeing that influential courtiers like Michael Psellos and apparently even Michael Attaleiates, author of (19) Attaleiates, were at this time avidly seeking out grants under that program.⁸

4. Patrons' Pursuit of Immunities from Taxation

The calamitous defeat of the next emperor, Romanos IV Diogenes (1068–71), by the Seljuk Turks at Mantzikert in 1071 had a devastating impact on the fortunes of the Byzantine Empire. During the course of the next decade, the Turks overran most of the empire's Anatolian dominions. This was also a decade of dynastic instability that prevented the re-establishment of firm imperial rule. Michael Psellos' pupil Michael VII Doukas (1071–78) and Michael Attaleiates' patron Nikephoros III Botaneiates (1078–81) were the ineffective rulers during this troubled decade. Pressed for revenues from a severely geographically diminished tax base, the imperial government increasingly resorted to a huge number of arbitrary exactions in cash, specie, commodities, and labor services. These posed potential threats to all landowners, and made it especially difficult for patrons to calculate adequate support for religious foundations. Therefore, Attaleiates made sure to obtain imperial chrysobulls from these emperors, establishing or confirming tax immunities for his foundation, that are preserved in (19) Attaleiates [INV 10], [INV 11].

5. Dissemination of Reform Ideology

Despite (or perhaps because of?) the political instability of the 1070s, certain reform ideas began to stir Byzantium's patronal classes and even the imperial bureaucracy. As we have seen (19) Attaleiates [14], dated to 1077, provides provisionally for the Rhaidestos foundation to become independent and self-governing (like Evergetis) in the event of the decease of the founder's family line. Also, the chrysobull of Nikephoros III, dated to 1079, condemns the theft of property used to endow a religious foundation as “sacrilege” [INV 11], implicitly rejecting the legitimacy of Isaac Komnenos’ confiscations twenty years earlier. The same key word appears in (22) Evergetis [19] in a discussion of the inalienability of immovable properties.

⁷ For these, see Michael Attaleiates, Historia, ed. I. Bekker, CSHB (Bonn, 1853), pp. 60–62; Michael Psellos, Chronographia 7.60, ed. Émile Renauld (Paris, 1926–28); and John Zonaras, Epitome historiarum 18.5, ed. L. Dindorf (Leipzig, 1868–75), along with the critical discussion of these sources by H. Ahrweiler, "Charisticariat et autres formes d'attribution de fondations pieuses aux X^e–XI^e siècles," ZRVI 10 (1967), pp. 20–21.

⁸ For Psellos' role as a charistikarios, see P. Lemerle, "Un aspect du rôle des monastères à Byzance: les monastères donnés à des laïcs, les charistikaies," CRAI (1967), 22; for Attaleiates, see (19) Attaleiates [19].

CHAPTER FOUR

6. Alexios I Komnenos’ Ecclesiastical Requisitions

The ascent of Isaac’s nephew Alexios I Komnenos (1081–1118) as emperor re-established his family’s claim to the imperial throne on a more permanent basis. Pressed to raise money to pay for the hiring of mercenaries to turn back an attack on the Empire’s western frontier by the Norman prince Robert Guiscard, Alexios’ mother Anna Dalassena and his brother the sebastokrator Isaac asked Patriarch Eustratios Garidas (1081–84) to convene a synod to authorize the confiscation of consecrated vessels and works of art in certain patriarchal (i.e., public) churches in Constantinople.⁹ Typically for the period, both supporters and opponents of the proposal used citations from canon law to justify their positions on the requisitions.

7. Birth of the Chalcedonian Reform Party

The opposition of Leo, metropolitan of Chalcedon, to these requisitions touched off a bitter and ultimately decisive controversy on the consecrated status of ecclesiastical property.¹⁰ Leo’s “Chalcedonian” party of reformers included influential supporters from among the ranks of both the ecclesiastical hierarchy and the military leadership. During 1082–84, Leo and his supporters skillfully kept the emperor on the defensive, obliging him to issue a chrysobull (1082) forswearing future requisitions of this sort and to announce plans to make repayments to the foundations concerned on the basis of losses documented from examination of their inventories.

8. The Beginning of Patriarchal Reform Activity

Even the Patriarch Eustratios, whose deposition the Chalcedonians demanded, tried to show his reform sympathies in a different way by seeking in 1084 the repeal of certain grants of patriarchal monasteries under the charistike. Thus were linked two of the most emotionally charged elements of the reform program, the establishment of the inalienability of ecclesiastical property and the abolition of the charistike.

9. Context of (23) Pakourianos’ Composition

It was in the midst of the expropriation controversy that Gregory Pakourianos, one of Alexios Komnenos’ generals, composed (23) Pakourianos in 1083 for his monastery at Bačkovo on his Balkan estates. Although, as noted above, this document is modeled on the older, now lost typikon of the Panagios monastery, it was written for an independent and self-governing foundation

⁹ For the requisitions, see Anna Komnena, Alexiad 4–6, ed. Bernard Leib (Paris, 1967); A. Glavinias, He epi Alexiou Komnenou (1081–1118) peri hieron skeuon kai keimelion kai hagian eikonon eris (1081–1095) (Thessaloniki, 1972), provides a full discussion of the controversy.

¹⁰ For Leo of Chalcedon, see V. Grumel, “L’affaire de Léon de Chalcedoine. Le chrysobulle d’Alexis I^{er} sur les objets sacrés,” EB 2 (1944), 126–33, “L’affaire de Léon de Chalcedoine. Le décret ou ‘semeioma’ d’Alexis I^{er} Comnène (1086),” EO 39 (1941–42), 333–41, and “Documents athonites concernant l’affaire de Léon le Chalcedonien,” in Miscellanea Giovanni Mercati, vol. 3, ST (Vatican City, 1946), pp. 116–35; Pelopidas Stephanou, “Le procès de Léon de Chalcedoine,” OCP (1943), 5–64; and my own Private Religious Foundations in the Byzantine Empire (Washington, D.C., 1987), pp. 192–99.

[3] and reflects many moderate reform sentiments, e.g., the warning [33] against alienation of the foundation's movable properties.

10. Trial and Condemnation of Leo of Chalcedon

The abdication of Patriarch Eustratios in 1084 under pressure from the reformers led to the elevation of Nicholas III Grammatikos (1084–1111), in the course of whose long tenure of office the patriarchate was to join forces with the reform party. But at first Leo of Chalcedon refused to be reconciled unless the former patriarch Eustratios was formally condemned. The emperor had Leo put on trial before the patriarchal synod late in 1085.¹¹ On the day of the final session in January 1086, Leo made his fateful statement that he considered all alienations of ecclesiastical property, regardless of circumstances, to be cases of impiety, except for those transferred from one sacred employment to another (thereby permitting the continued use of epidosis but not the charistike). The emperor immediately objected to this “novel” doctrine as implicitly condemning all those who had approved of or benefited from alienations of ecclesiastical property in the past. Leo was condemned for insubordination and, in February or March 1086, deposed.

11. New Requisitions of Ecclesiastical Property

A new catastrophe, the Patzinak invasions of the empire's Balkan territories in 1086, took the life of the author of (23) Pakourianos. Alexios Komnenos resorted to a new requisition of ecclesiastical property including not only precious objects this time but also landed property. The deposed metropolitan Leo objected, but the emperor got the patriarchal synod to banish him to Sozopolis, where he remained in exile for the next eight years.

12. Reform Activities of Patriarch Nicholas Grammatikos

Meanwhile, Patriarch Nicholas Grammatikos began his own campaign to reform the charistike, starting with a requirement in 1086 that no more grants be accepted for registry without the attachment of a written inventory of the landed properties of the foundations being awarded to the charistikarioi.¹² This requirement was made retroactive in 1087, but enforcement proved difficult. In 1089, the patriarch's synod ruled in favor of Niketas, metropolitan of Athens, when that reform-minded prelate sought support for reversing grants made to charistikarioi who had abused the foundations turned over to their care.¹³

13. Imperial and Patriarchal Patronage of Christodoulos

Like Nicholas Grammatikos, Alexios Komnenos was anxious to show his sympathies for ¹¹ A record of the trial is preserved in the Semeioma, ed. I. Sakkélion, “Décret d'Alexis Comnène portant déposition de Léon, Métropolitain de Chalcédoine,” BCH 2 (1878), 102–28. See especially pp. 123–24.

¹² For the patriarchal reform program, see Jean Darrouzès, “Dossier sur le charisticariat,” in Polychronion: Festschrift Franz Dölger (Heidelberg, 1966), 150–65, and my own Private Religious Foundations, pp. 199–207.

¹³ Venance Grumel, Les registres des actes du Patriarcat de Constantinople, vol. 1: Les registres de 381 à 715 (Chalcedon, 1932); 2nd ed. (Paris, 1972), no. 952; ed. Th. Uspensky, “Mneniya i postanovleniya konstantinopolskikh pomestnikh soborov XI i XII vv. o razdache tserkovnikh imuschchestv (charistikarii),” IRAİK 5 (1900), 1–48, doc. 2, pp. 30–37.

CHAPTER FOUR

monastic reform even while rejecting the far-reaching demands of the Chalcedonian reform party. The monk Christodoulos, appointed as protos of the confederation of monasteries at Latros by Patriarch Kosmas I (1075–81) in 1076, abandoned his post three years later as the Seljuk Turks threatened the area. Nicholas Grammatikos finally accepted Christodoulos' resignation in 1087. A few years earlier in 1085, Alexios Komnenos had recognized the independent and self-governing status of Christodoulos' new monastic foundation on Kos. Later, when Christodoulos became disenchanted with this location, according to (24) Christodoulos [A9] the emperor tried to persuade him to attempt the reform of another monastery. When Christodoulos rejected this assignment, Alexios nevertheless granted him the island of Patmos in 1088 for the establishment of yet another monastic foundation. The emperor recognized the Patmos foundation's independent status too in his chrysobull of donation. The Rule [A] portion of (24) Christodoulos was drawn up to regulate the life of this foundation in May 1091.

14. John of Antioch's Alliance with the Reform Party

In the early months of 1091, however, the Patzinaks made common cause with Tzachas, the Seljuk emir of Smyrna, and for a third time Alexios Komnenos was forced to consider another requisition of ecclesiastical property. This time, John the Oxite, patriarch of Antioch, registered his objection in a tract and a memorandum to the emperor.¹⁴ John, who had been raised to the patriarchate circa 1089, also composed his famous tract De monasteriis about this time. This document, the most scathing indictment of the charistike to survive, is our principal source of (admittedly hostile) information on that embattled institution which so shaped Byzantine ecclesiastical history from the late tenth century through John's own times in the late eleventh century.¹⁵

15. Influence of Evergetis on the Reform Movement

The role, if any, of Evergetis in the bitter ecclesiastical reform controversies of the 1080s cannot be determined with certainty. John of Antioch's De monasteriis shows an indebtedness to the Evergetis' library of ascetic literature, however, which suggests that the institution played at least a useful supportive role. The possibility of a return influence of the ongoing reform upon Evergetis itself is also intriguing. The possibility exists that many of the most ideologically charged passages in (22) Evergetis, e.g., the terminology of "sacrilege" in the discussion [19] of the inalienability of the foundation's properties, were introduced into that document during a re-edition at this time. Also, both De monasteriis and (22) Evergetis [19], refer (the former actually, the latter hypothetically) to an earthquake, which might be the noteworthy one that occurred on December 6, perhaps in the year 1090.¹⁶ If so, this may confirm that (22) Evergetis was being revised at this

¹⁴ John of Antioch, Logos eis ton basilea kyr Alexion ton Komnenon and Symboule pros ton basilea, ed. Paul Gautier, "Diatribes de Jean l'Oxite contre Alexis I^{er} Comnène," REB 28 (1970), 5–55; cf. commentary by Grumel, "Documents athonites," pp. 132–34.

¹⁵ John of Antioch, Oratio de monasteriis laicis non tradendis, ed. Paul Gautier, "Réquisitoire du patriarche Jean d'Antioche contre le charisticariat," REB 33 (1975), 77–132. For this reformer, see V. Grumel, "Les patriarches grecs d'Antioche du nom de Jean (XI^e et XII^e siècles)," EO 32 (1933), 279–99, esp. 286–98, and Paul Gautier, "Jean V l'Oxite patriarche d'Antioche, notice biographique," REB 22 (1964), 128–57.

¹⁶ See John of Antioch, De monasteriis, 18, lines 588–90, with V. Grumel, La chronologie (Paris, 1958), p. 480 (for dating to 1090), and Gautier, "Réquisitoire," REB 33 (1975), pp. 80–86 (full discussion of dating).

EARLY REFORM MONASTERIES

critical time and updated to reflect contemporary concerns like the alienation of ecclesiastical property.

16. Context of (24) Christodoulos' Composition

As noted above, the Rule [A] portion of (24) Christodoulos dates from the middle of this ideologically and politically troubled period. The pressure on Byzantium eased considerably when Alexios Komnenos, assisted by Cuman allies, crushed the Patzinaks at the battle of Levunion in April 1091. After Tzachas of Smyrna attacked Patmos, however, Christodoulos got discouraged and abandoned the island for Euboea around May 1092. The emperor's success in inciting a rivalry between Abul Kasim, the Seljuk emir of Nicaea, against Tzachas eventually relieved some pressure on Byzantium's remaining possessions in Asia Minor, though as the Testament [B] and Codicil [C] of (24) Christodoulos indicate, the security of Aegean islands like Patmos remained precarious as these texts were being composed in 1093.

22. Evergetis: Typikon of Timothy for the Monastery of the Mother of God Evergetis

Date: First edition, 1054–70; periodically revised later; put in final form, 1098–1118¹

Translator: Robert Jordan

Edition employed: Paul Gautier, “Le typikon de la Théotokos Évergétis,” REB 40 (1982), 5–101, with text at 15–95.

Manuscript: Codex Atheniensis, National Library 788 (12th c.)²

Other translations: French, by Gautier, REB 40 (1982), 14–94.

Institutional History

A. The First Founder, Paul Evergetinos, and His Works

According to the document translated below, the monastery of the Mother of God Evergetis, “Benefactress,” was founded [2] by a certain Paul, a wealthy Constantinopolitan, on an estate (proasteion) that he had acquired through a family inheritance. The foundation occurred in either 1048 or 1049, on this suburban property outside the walls of Constantinople. According to our document, the foundation was very modest [3] during Paul’s five-year tenure as superior, consisting of some small cells inhabited by a few disciples, including Paul’s eventual successor Timothy, who joined [2] Evergetis in 1049.

As it transpired, Paul Evergetinos’ legacy to Byzantine monasticism was primarily literary. He was the author of a massive ascetic florilegium, the Evergetinon, which enjoyed a wide circulation in the Byzantine world, surviving in no less than forty manuscripts today.³ The work is divided into four volumes, each of which is subdivided into fifty hypotheses. The first volume concerns itself with the general principles of monastic asceticism, the second with monastic usages and the requirements of cenobitic life, the third with personal morality, and the fourth with progress in the spiritual life. The author’s emphasis is on the practical aspects of monastic life. He relies on a fairly short list of sources, using the Apophthegmata Patrum most of all, for which the Evergetinon is one of the most important textual witnesses. There is hardly any use of Basil of Caesarea. According to Richard (“Florilèges,” col. 503), Paul does not hesitate to adapt some of his texts to suit his own purposes, but generally he cites them literally. The Evergetinon may have inspired two later ascetic florilegia by Nikon of the Black Mountain, author of (20) Black Mountain and (21) Roidion, and by John of Antioch, both of whom were important monastic reformers in their own right.⁴ As Solignac notes (“Paul Évergétinos,” col. 563), the work is so large that it is difficult to see how Paul could have completed it during the relatively short term of his superiorship at Evergetis, yet he also assembled a collection of monastic catecheses, utilizing works of Maximos the Confessor, Pseudo-Makarios, Evagrius Pontikos, Mark the Hermit, and the Great Catecheses of Theodore the Studite.⁵

22. EVERGETIS

B. The Second Founder, Timothy Evergetinos, and His Works

Paul Evergetinos died in 1054, having transmitted [3] his foundation by a testament (now lost) to his disciple Timothy. Timothy was eventually recognized as Evergetis' second founder (deuteros ktetor), a well-deserved honor, for according to our document translated below he was responsible [3] for the erection of the foundation's church, the construction of new cells, the furnishing of the facility with sacred vessels, books, and icons, and the endowment of landed property. He was at least the first author of the present document, Evergetis' founder's typikon, as well as of the foundation's liturgical typikon, to which the former document served as a prologue.⁶ In this latter work, not translated here, Timothy utilized (4) Stoudios, the liturgical typikon of the cathedral church of Hagia Sophia, certain now lost typika of monasteries on Mount Olympos, and a tract of Patriarch Antony III the Studite (974–79) on the office of the Annunciation.⁷ Timothy mentions another typikon of the Constantinopolitan monastery of Manuel, but only to reject one of its prescriptions.⁸ Both the liturgical typikon and the founder's typikon translated below are preserved today in a single medieval manuscript, Codex Atheniensis 788. Timothy was also almost certainly responsible for securing some of the imperial chrysobulls mentioned below in [12] that recognized the foundation's independence. According to dated notices preserved in the manuscripts of three works from the scriptorium of Evergetis, Timothy was still governing as the foundation's superior in 1064, 1065 and 1067.⁹

C. Timothy's Successors as Superiors of Evergetis

According to the present document, Timothy lived [13] as a recluse in a hermitage associated with the principal monastery. He originally envisioned the choice of a second "unconfined" superior, presumably to handle the ordinary administrative affairs of the foundation, who would then go into confinement on the death of the enclosed superior. Even before he drew up his edition of the founder's typikon Timothy had decided to eliminate the requirement of confinement and be content with one superior. Timothy had evidently not determined whom his successor would be when he completed his work on the founder's typikon, and his actual successor's identity remains unknown. A very brief collection of poems dedicated to Symeon the (New) Theologian is attributed to a certain Basil, protasekretis and founder (ktetor) of the monastery of the Evergetis.¹⁰ Gautier ("Évergétis," p. 10) identified him as the protasekretis and judge of the hippodrome Basil Kekaumenos, who was active circa 1070. His relationship to the foundation for which the document translated below was written, if any, is problematic. It seems unlikely, as Gautier suggested, that he would have been appointed charistikarios over Evergetis without leaving a trace of this discordant event in the founder's typikon which was not put into final form until the end of the eleventh century at the earliest. Only the ordained monk Athanasios can be identified with certainty as one of Timothy's proximate successors, based on a note in an Evergetian manuscript dated to 1103.¹¹

D. Evergetis in the Era of the Monastic Reform

The history of the foundation in the late eleventh and early twelfth centuries during the height of the monastic reform is unfortunately obscure, but its impact, traceable in the adoption of its founder's typikon in the foundation documents of other patrons, is indisputable.¹² In the twelfth century, the authors of (29) Kosmosoteira and (30) Phoberos borrow from the Evergetian founder's typikon directly, the former with attribution and the latter without, in a recension with different chapter numbers but the same order as found in the model typikon. Probably through one or two intermediaries, (27) Kecharitomene likewise borrows a substantial amount of Evergetian institutions and usages as well. Towards mid-century, even documents like (28) Pantokrator and (31) Areia that are not themselves linked textually to the Evergetian founder's typikon nevertheless incorporate Evergetian customs. Later still, (32) Mamas and (33) Heliou Bomon display the unmistakable impact of another generation's recension of the Evergetian customary tradition.

The direct historical record is more meager. Evergetis was not among those monasteries specifically recorded as being represented by their superiors at the synod of Blachernai in 1094 that rehabilitated Leo of Chalcedon, that important turning point in the history of the reform movement. After this reconciliation of the Komnenian dynasty with the reformers, it was not at all inappropriate for Alexios Komnenos' brother-in-law John Doukas to enter Evergetis as the monk Antony, as is recorded in the Appendix to the founder's typikon, either at the very end of the eleventh or at the beginning of the twelfth century. In the final form that it has come down to us, the founder's typikon cannot be any earlier than this time. Pargoire ("Évergétis," p. 159) not implausibly suggested that the existing manuscript of this document and its companion liturgical typikon, which he believed dated from the mid-twelfth century, is the original copy of the revised edition.

In 1153, at perhaps the height of the monastic reform movement, an eremitic Evergetian monk was elected patriarch of Constantinople as Neophytos I (1153).¹³ His election was bitterly opposed, however, and his opponents succeeded in persuading him to give up his office even before his consecration by recalling his temporary abandonment of his appointment as an ecclesiastical lector many years before. Around 1180, a delegation of Evergetian monks appeared before Patriarch Theodosios Boradiotes (1178–83) to resolve how they could obey the command in (22) Evergetis [15] that they should make their confessions exclusively to their superior if, as happened at the time to be the case, their spiritual director was not ordained.¹⁴

Towards the end of the twelfth century, Evergetis began a long, fruitful association with St. Sava (Sabbas) the Serbian, author of (44) Karyes.¹⁵ This relationship began with Sava's second visit to Constantinople during the reign of Alexios III Angelos (1195–1203). According to his biographer Domitien, Sava visited the monastery at this time, where a pious woman predicted that he would be gaining two treasures to assist him in his work. Sometime after Sava's return to his own monastery of Hilandar on Mount Athos, the bequests materialized upon the death of his father, the Serbian king Stephen (c. 1166–1196), and he shared a part with Evergetis.

E. Evergetis under Latin Rule

Unlike the Stoudios monastery and many other less fortunate foundations, Evergetis evidently remained in existence during the Latin occupation of Constantinople (1204–61).¹⁶ In 1206 the Cardinal-legate Benedict of Santa Susanna granted Evergetis along with its properties and dependencies to Stephen, abbot of the famous Benedictine monastery of Monte Cassino, on the condition that the Greek monks resident there not be expelled.¹⁷ The document locates the monastery two miles beyond the walls of Constantinople. Later, Pope Honorius III (1212–27) confirmed and then reconfirmed this grant in two letters dated to 1217.¹⁸ Pargoire (“Évergétis,” p. 166) supposes that Monte Cassino may never have been able to establish its control over Evergetis, judging from two additional letters Honorius III was obliged to issue restating the Benedictine monastery’s rights in 1222, one addressed to the monks of Monte Cassino and the other to the superior and monks of Evergetis, reminding the latter to receive the former with honor and to submit to their orders.¹⁹ These instructions were repeated in another papal letter dispatched at the same time to “the vassals of the church of St. Mary of Virgotis.”²⁰

22. EVERGETIS

The monks of Evergetis remained in contact with Orthodox supporters from outside the Latin Empire of Constantinople. In 1207, they received a letter from Nicholas Mesarites, who had recently assisted at Nicaea in the installation of Michael IV Autoreianos (1206–12), the Orthodox claimant to the patriarchal see of Constantinople.²¹ Evergetis’ Serbian patron Sava of Hilandar also returned for a visit in 1235 on his way home from a pilgrimage to the Holy Land.²² He also visited the monastery’s dependency in the city of Constantinople dedicated to St. Andrew. The first mention of this institution in our sources is due to Antony of Novgorod, who visited the city shortly before the Latin Conquest in 1204; he also makes a note of Sava’s residence there.²³ In 1210 Neilos of Tamasia drew up the final version of (34) Machairas for his monastery of the Mother of God on Cyprus; this document is textually linked not only to the more proximate (32) Mamas but also an independent recension of Evergetis’ founder’s typikon, which demonstrates the continued relevance of at least the administrative provisions of the Evergetian document. Not surprisingly, Sava the Serbian’s own early thirteenth-century Slavic typikon for the Hilandar monastery demonstrates a much stronger influence of the Evergetian founder’s typikon, however.²⁴ In fact, Pargoire (“Évergétis,” p. 262) considered the former to be little more than a Slavic translation of the latter.

F. The Fate of Evergetis

While Evergetis cannot unquestionably be shown to have existed past the thirteenth century, it is likely that it remained active down to the end of the fourteenth century, when in 1399 the monks of a monastery of the Mother of God Evergetis are mentioned in a case heard before the patriarchal synod of Matthew I (1397–1410) as the previous, neglectful owners of a half share in a church on the island of Lemnos that had nearly fallen into ruins sometime before.²⁵ A Palaiologan nobleman, George Synadenos Astras, is mentioned in the court record as the (honorary) founder (ktetor) of Evergetis. While Pargoire (“Évergétis,” p. 166) was right to caution against an automatic identification of this Evergetis with the venerable foundation under examination here, suggesting the alternative possibility that there was a monastery of that name on Lemnos itself, the context of the reference fits better with an absentee landlord institution as the Evergetis in suburban Constantinople would have been vis-à-vis the church on Lemnos.

As will be seen, the continued influence of Evergetian usages and institutions in the late thirteenth, the fourteenth, and even the early fifteenth century amounts to a virtual neo-Evergetian revival sponsored by patrons of the Palaiologan era eager to bolster cenobitic monasticism.²⁶ This revival is not conclusive evidence in and of itself of the institutional survival of Evergetis during Palaiologan times, for Evergetis’ influence could have spread simply on a textual and customary basis, but it is certainly easier to explain by the continued presence of the institution itself. Moreover, judging from Gautier’s proposed dating of the handwriting of the note at the very end of the document, our manuscript copy of the founder's typikon was not turned over to another institution until the sixteenth century.²⁷ Therefore it seems entirely possible that Evergetis, like the revived Stoudios monastery, survived down to the fall of the empire in 1453.

No trace of the foundation remains on its presumed site near Tchirpedji-Dere or Hasnadar-Dere in an industrial district outside the old city walls in Istanbul.²⁸ Majeska (Russian Travelers, p. 316) suggests, however, that the existing Greek church of the Mother of God Gorgoepikoos may have been built in Ottoman times on the site of Evergetis' Constantinopolitan dependency.

Analysis

This monastery was the leader of an enormously influential reform movement in Byzantine monasticism,²⁹ which, building on both Basilian and Studite precedents, succeeded in revolutionizing contemporary attitudes on such important matters as the institutions of monastic governance, the abolition of privilege, strict financial management, and the desirability of the cenobitic life. The founder's typikon is the fundamental text needed for understanding the nature of this reform.

A. Lives of the Monks

1. Number of Monks

Unlike some earlier and contemporary documents,³⁰ the author of (22) Evergetis [23] declines to set a fixed number of positions for the monks in Evergetis, preferring to let the monastery's resources determine the number who could be supported. A smaller number was acceptable too if it was not possible to recruit a full complement of pious monks. This too may have been a reform idea. The old notion of setting a fixed number of positions had the good intent of helping to assure that a foundation's expenses did not exceed its available income (see above, Chapter Three, Concerns of the Authors), but in the era of the charistike must inevitably have led to situations like (21) Roidion in which unsuitable monks and even laymen were imposed on an institution simply because there were sufficient livings available to support them. To all appearances, however, the author anticipated that Evergetis would be a large foundation, judging from the need he saw [7] for the superior to appoint assistants to help him hear daily confessions and his expectation [36] that one day there would be too many deceased monks for them to be commemorated individually (see C.5 below).

The monastic community at Evergetis was divided [7] into monks who lived continuously in the monastery (engaged in liturgical and other services) and an apparently larger number, including "the more uneducated majority," who were assigned to various ministries both within and outside of the monastery. This division of the monastic community recalls the arrangements seen in (9) Galesios [182], which describes a foundation in which there were both choir monks and other mostly illiterate brothers.

2. Liturgical Duties

As in other documents that are part of the Studite liturgical tradition such as (4) Stoudios and (11) Ath. Rule, the celebration of the canonical hours [4], [5], [6] was an important part of the lives of the monks. Though the description of the hours is fuller than in the earlier documents, the author clearly relied upon the liturgical typikon to regulate such matters as the fixed liturgical calendar and the movable feasts.

22. EVERGETIS

3. Manual Labor

The non-liturgical group of monks included [33] both literate brothers who served as administrators of the monastery's dependencies or other properties and unlettered monks who held various offices as cellarers, bakers, cooks, and muleteers. The role of manual labor for at least some monks is quietly assumed, therefore, as in (4) Stoudios [26], [33], rather than defended at length as in the Basilian rules.

4. Length of the Novitiate

Except for distinguished, well known individuals, applicants were obliged to serve [37] a six-month novitiate. An applicant who had been tonsured in another monastery (i.e., a xenokourites) could also be admitted at the discretion of the superior. Although the reception, not to mention the promotion, of outsider monks was controversial (see (13) Ath. Typikon [21] ff.), the Evergetians must have realized that the dismal state of Byzantine monasticism in the eleventh century meant that there were many good reasons why a monk might want to leave his original foundation for a reform monastery like their own.

5. Sacramental Life

Evergetis placed an increased emphasis on sacramental life, including communion [5] and confession [7]. The liturgy was celebrated daily, but the frequency with which the monks could receive communion [5] would depend on their moral state: the pure could receive three times a week; the weak once a week or not at all. In all cases the superior would decide on the appropriate frequency. No monk was allowed to abstain indefinitely from communion. Great importance was also attached to "life-preserving" confession, justified by reference to patristic authorities and enforced by the threat of expulsion from the community. The superior was to hear the confessions [7] of the literate brothers himself daily after matins and of the others after compline, assisted by designated priests, deacons, and even other monks because of their great numbers. The superior alone was to provide the "Great Confession" offered to monks on the occasion of their tonsure.

6. Cenobitic Lifestyle

The requirements of the cenobitic lifestyle were given a strict interpretation at Evergetis. Monks could not have any personal possessions [22], not even a small coin or piece of fruit, without the permission of the superior. To enforce this regulation, the superior is instructed [27] to visit the monks' cells and confiscate unauthorized possessions. They were not allowed to engage [22] in correspondence with family or friends. Both the prohibition of personal possessions and the ban on correspondence are derived from a Basilian penal code.³¹

Monks were to be placed [24] two to a cell, apparently with some attempt being made to pair older and younger monks, the more educated with the unlearned, etc. Unlike (21) Roidion [B5], the monks were to follow the cenobitic practice of taking their meals in common in the refectory. Everyone, including the monastery's officials and other notables, was to receive [26] the same food and drink. The same principle of equality was to apply with respect to clothing, seemingly wiping out the distinctions of rank observed in (9) Galesios [130] and endorsing (3) Theodore Studites [12].

7. Servants Not Permitted

In accord with (3) Theodore Studites [4] but unlike (19) Attaleiates [42], Evergetian monks were not allowed [24] to have servants.

8. Diet

Fasts and vigils were to be regulated [8] principally by the synaxarion, that is, the liturgical typikon. The second part of that document contains detailed prescriptions for the dietary regime for the Lent and the other fasts of the ecclesiastical year. However, there is a considerable amount of dietary regulation [10] for fasts in the founder's typikon as well. Generally, (22) Evergetis prescribes more leniently than the somewhat earlier (20) Black Mountain and certainly the later (43) Kasoulon. Overall, reform monasteries of the twelfth century followed Evergetis' example of relative leniency, especially the imperial foundations represented by (27) Kecharitomene and (28) Pantokrator, though (30) Phoberos, usually a close copier of (22) Evergetis in most matters, is stricter in many dietary provisions.

9. Bathing

Perhaps as a bow to an increasing concern with providing for the needs of sick and elderly monks, a bath is provided [28] in the monastery. As originally written, the relevant passage of the typikon allowed only the sick to use it, but it appears that this was changed later to permit healthy monks to bathe three times a year and at the discretion of the superior. This is the first bathing facility to be attested in the monastic foundation documents.

10. Care of Sick Monks

A cell provided with eight beds and staffed by two orderlies was to be set aside [41] as an infirmary for monks who might fall sick. If a doctor was available, he was to call on the brothers daily.

11. Burial

Unlike some later documents, e.g., (27) Kecharitomene [70], there are no elaborate provisions for the burial of the foundation's monks, but a priest is assigned [36] to take care of burials, and the departed were to be commemorated liturgically.

B. Constitutional Matters

1. Independent and Self-Governing Status

The typikon revives [12] (without attribution) the concept of the free (eleuthera), independent (autodespotos), and self-governing (idiodespotos) monastery first seen in (13) Ath. Typikon [12], thereby establishing a model and new standard of institutional autonomy for generations of founders to come.³² This status is said to have dated from the period of Evergetis' foundation, guaranteed by chrysobulls of "emperors of everlasting memory," presumably including Constantine IX Monomachos, otherwise known as a protector of certain monasteries.³³ Evergetis' independent status was held to make it exempt from subordination to any individual, public or private, and, by implication, from participation in the charistike.

2. Leadership

As noted above, in the first version of the typikon, the author Timothy had planned [13] that Evergetis would be ruled by two superiors, one a recluse and the other “unconfined,” who would presumably handle the day-to-day administration of the foundation. On the death of the former, the latter was to take his place. Later, Timothy thought better of this arrangement and decided to have only one superior, who would not be required to adopt the eremitic lifestyle but would be, as in (3) Theodore Studites [10], discouraged from travel outside the monastery and its properties except for the most pressing of reasons. Timothy announces [13] his expectation of designating his successor himself, and after the author’s death this superior would consult with a few preeminent monks to choose a steward. In due course of time, provided he remained virtuous, the steward in turn would become [14] superior himself.

3. Role of the Preeminent Monks

Timothy provides a very important role for the above-mentioned preeminent monks. In addition to choosing [13], cf. [17] the steward in consultation with the superior, they could also, upon the sudden death of the superior, block [14] a bad steward’s elevation to the superiorship. Perhaps (3) Theodore Studites (22), in which the Studite superior is told to make assignments and assess the performances of the monastery’s officers in consultation with the “foremost brothers,” provided a model. In Evergetis, the superior is told [14] to use the preeminent monks as his advisors; they were also required to be present [19] at any emergency alienations of consecrated property. Overall, their role would seem to be a bow to the contemporary dislike of privileged, arbitrary rule visible in (15) Constantine IX [13], but far from a concession of consensus rule by the community as a whole.

4. Stress on Unanimity

Timothy’s stress on achieving unanimity in the election of the superior [14] probably is attributable once again to fears that malcontents will resort to courts of law to prevail, as apparently in (15) Constantine IX [8]. This attitude leads to the author’s extraordinary statement [14] that even a bad steward should be allowed to become superior if the preeminent monks cannot agree on a suitable replacement: “For it is better for you to be exposed to a little danger during the stewardship of this worthless man than to be rendered completely useless by resorting to discord or quarreling or even the remembering of injuries.”³⁴ In the same spirit, Timothy instructs [14] the superior to choose his own successor arbitrarily if the preeminent monks are unable to make a unanimous choice in consultation with him. Fear of litigation may also explain why the author was willing [14] to allowed a deposed superior to remain in the community and continue to hold an honored rank.

5. Reading of the Typikon

To remind the monks of their responsibilities, the foundation’s typikon was to be read [43] at the beginning of the month during mealtime. This follows a developing trend, seen earlier in (11) Ath. Rule [37] and in the contemporary (19) Attaleiates [33], [40], to invest constitutive documents with the prestige and authority once accorded only to the personal pronouncements of founders and patrons.

C. Financial Matters

True to the spirit of the times, this typikon exhibits a great deal of concern about financial misconduct. Unlike earlier authors who, if they worried at all about the loss of institutional assets, focused on external threats, Timothy was keenly aware of the peril the monastery's own officials could pose to the foundation's well-being if they were dishonest.

1. Financial Officials

The key official was the steward, who handled the financial affairs of the monastery and in the ordinary course of events at Evergetis could look forward [13] to being promoted to the superiorship. However, careless administration, doing favors for relatives, and appropriating or alienating the monastery's property are among the justifications provided [14] for his deposition.

There were also three treasurers [30] among the monastery's financial officials: a sacristan (skeuophylax) charged with caring for the sacred vessels and altar cloths; a treasurer for linen (docheiarios ton panion) responsible for storing clothing and footwear; and a treasurer for money (docheiarios ton nomismaton) in the monastery whose responsibility it was to keep [20] detailed records of the monastery's income (when and where it came from) and expenditure (the reason for it and on what project). Property managers were to be selected [34] from among the monastery's pious monks, preferably old enough to resist the devil's temptations. High standards of rectitude were expected of all these officials; the sanction [22] for thieves who did not make amends was expulsion from the community.

2. Endowment of the Foundation

Evergetis evidently had a conventional endowment of landed property, though it is said [34] to have amounted to only "some small piece of immovable property." Perhaps these were donated by the benefactors Promotenos and Kataphloron whose commemoration through charitable donations at the gate is enjoined in [36]. The foundation also possessed [33] some ecclesiastical dependencies at an early date, though none is known specifically until the thirteenth century (see above, Institutional History, 5).

3. Inalienability of the Foundation's Properties

The typikon assumes that the immovable properties that made up the foundation's base of financial support were untouchable. It also declares [19] that movable consecrated property (sacred vessels, cloths, icons, and books) were likewise to be regarded as inalienable. The assertion that transgressors would be liable to a charge of sacrilege (hierosylia) recalls the language of the chrysobull of Nikephoros III Botaneiates (1079) attached to (19) Attaleiates [INV 11]. There is, however, a short list of emergency situations in which alienations might take place, but even in these cases the monastery's officials were to follow very specific procedures, including making a record of the transactions in the monastery's inventory.

4. Provisions against Misconduct

To maximize the impact of the expected heavenly sanctions, the typikon incorporates [29] patronal icons of Christ and the Mother of God and the keys of the various offices into the installation ceremonies of the monastery's officials. Officials were to conclude that they had received their offices (symbolized by the keys) directly from these heavenly patrons. Subsequent dishonesty would make them accountable [32] to Christ and his Mother as well. The typikon was to substitute for the icons and keys in a similar installation ceremony [13] for the superior.

Monks are also warned [42] to avoid the temptation to pilfer possessions of the monastery or claim them as personal property, since “We did not abandon the world for luxury and indulgence.” In this case, even small violations of the cenobitic regime are associated with to more serious theft by officials.

Despite his hostility towards the use of consecrated property by officials for private gain (i.e., for the benefit of their friends and relatives), the author faced a difficult problem in dealing with possible misconduct by the superior. In [18] he refuses to allow the monks to hold their superior accountable for “the things for which they take in and pay out money” because he thought that that would breed mistrust and produce discord.

Essentially, the author faced a dilemma: the monks, who had the most to lose from such speculations, were the most obvious group to rely upon to denounce a bad superior for uncanonical alienations. However, Timothy was probably aware of how internal disputes could easily get the foundation bogged down in litigation in secular courts (cf. (15) Constantine IX [8]). So Timothy limits himself to declaring [18] that “they [the bad superiors] will not escape the fearful judgment of God.” The frequency of such appeals and the accompanying curses [32] in the troubled eleventh century should be seen as an indication of the increasing desperation of founders, who were no longer confident in relying on the good will of local governors (as the authors of (17) Nikon Metanoieite and (18) Nea Gephyra did) or even that of the emperor himself, who was not exempt from mistrust (see [12]).

5. No Mandatory Entrance Gifts

In what would become a classic formulation for reform monasteries, the typikon forswears [37] mandatory entrance gifts from those who wished to become monks at Evergetis. Formally, the traditional renunciation (apotage) or the entrance offering (prosenexis) are rejected because “one must not traffic in the grace of God or sell it for money.” Free-will gifts on entrance were welcomed, however, provided that they were unconditional, with no expectation of special privileges to follow.³⁵ In (9) Galesios [192], the stylite superior Lazarus also made entrance donations strictly voluntary, but was unsuccessful in persuading all his monks to give up their money and rely upon the foundation for support. At Evergetis, entrance donations, once made, could not be withdrawn [37] by their donors—again on pain of sacrilege—even if they should later choose to leave the monastery. The justification offered here, “For what has once been consecrated to God must not be taken away,” became the ideological credo of a generation of ecclesiastical reformers. Incidentally, the willingness of the foundation to forego entrance gifts must have strengthened the hand of its officials in determining whom to admit to the monastery (see above, A.4).

6. Commemorative Observances

The increased attention paid [36] to commemorative observances in reform monasteries like Evergetis may have been one way that founders compensated themselves and others for their financial sacrifices. In view of the new standards of financial probity, it would have been hypocritical for a founder like Timothy to reserve for his own use the bulk of the surplus from the foundation’s revenues as Attaleiates did for his son Theodore in (19) Attaleiates [24]. A posthu-mous appendix to the typikon sets the memorial observance for Timothy, honored as the “second founder,” on the same day as the “first founder” Paul. Deceased superiors and monks were also entitled [36] to commemorations, with observances for the latter to be consolidated when it became necessary, while a priest charged with burials made charitable distributions at the gate in commemoration of the monastery’s benefactors. This may indicate an important source of income for the monastery considerably less problematic than the sale of lifetime annuities permitted in (19) Attaleiates [30].

D. General Philosophy

1. Hostility to Privileges

Although the institution’s founder Paul Evergetinos had been [1] a wealthy man, the predominant ethos of his monastery was hostile to privileges. His successor Timothy, in a section of the typikon that proved to be unappealing to successor institutions in the Evergetian tradition, condemns [17] a possibly traditional style of authoritarian leadership in which an “unworthy” man might usurp the office of superior or steward by “making a display perhaps of his seniority or his achievements or his noble birth or reputation or his offering of property or money.” Timothy orders that the choice of the preeminent monks is to prevail over “those who glory in their own wisdom and power and glory and nobility,” even if the candidate chosen is “recently tonsured or is unlearned and without experience in worldly things.”

2. Egalitarian Aspects

Egalitarian sentiments certainly influenced [37] the author’s wary attitude towards traditional entrance gifts, as discussed above. Timothy’s unwillingness to exempt [26] officials from the requirement of uniformity in food, drink and dress is another manifestation of his hostility to privilege. The truly violent language condemning [9] petty disputes over precedence in seating at meals, backed up by the threat of expulsion, is another, even though it appears [14] that certain seats were in fact assigned to officials on the basis of their rank in the monastery. Evergetis’ hostility to privilege was rooted in Timothy’s identification of it as the source of insubordination and discord.

3. Not Anti-Aristocratic

Though the assertion of privilege condemned in this document came most naturally to aristocrats, the foundation itself was not anti-aristocratic. “Distinguished people” were to be tonsured [37] after an unspecified shorter novitiate. The author also thought [39] that he could not ban noble women from visiting the monastery, perhaps out of fear of alienating potential benefactors (compare to (3) Theodore Studites [16]). Also, as we have seen, though Evergetis may have been governed more consultatively than other foundations, the typikon makes [14] no endorsement of radical egalitarianism in either elections or its structure of governance.

This shows that Evergetis (and the reform in general) was not hostile to the upper classes, but its leaders insisted that aristocrats’ expectations of privileges be left at the gate. As a result, it proved somewhat easier for the aristocracy and even the imperial family to embrace the overall objectives of the reform while toning down its attack on privileges in their own foundations (see below, Chapter Five). Indeed, the admission of John Doukas, Alexios Komnenos' brother-in-law, as a monk here, is noted in an appendix to the typikon, and he induced the community to grant the concession of drinking wine during the Lenten fast by donating a vineyard to the foundation.

E. External Relations

1. Institutional Philanthropy

The Evergetian reform endorsed philanthropy, providing for daily distributions [38] at the gate of the monastery as well as for the care [41] of the sick in an infirmary. Those who died there were to be interred [38] in a special burial place (xenotaphion). Thus Evergetis claims its place in a general trend in Byzantine monasticism since at least the last quarter of the tenth century, starting with (16) Mount Tmolos, to erect philanthropic institutions in conjunction with monasteries (see above, Chapter Three, D.5). Women are specifically excluded [38] from the daily distributions at the gate, apparently because of the sexual temptation they might pose, though they remained eligible for general distributions. Strict sexual segregation, which was generally not a compelling concern for certain pre-reform monasteries (see (9) Galesios [129]), was taken up again by Evergetis in accord with the Studite tradition;³⁶ (13) Ath. Typikon [34] may also have been influential. In any event, this is the beginning of a noticeable misogynist tendency in the Evergetian reform movement.

F. Composition of the Typikon

Since (22) Evergetis is the key document of the Byzantine monastic reform movement, close attention to its composition promises valuable insights into both the ideological development of the reform and the administrative innovations devised to institutionalize it during the latter half of the eleventh century.

1. Internal Evidence for Incremental Composition

Internal evidence strongly suggests that the typikon was repeatedly reworked until it reached the essential form in which the manuscript is found today sometime in the twelfth century. Pargoire (“Évergétis,” p. 158) considered the headings to chapters [1], [3], [14], [32], [40], and [42] to be evidence of a re-edition, indisputably in those cases where the primary author Timothy is spoken of in the third person. Their placement is frequently awkward or simply wrong, sometimes dividing up coherent topical subjects between two new chapters in a way that the original author himself is most unlikely to have done.³⁷ That twelfth-century founders using (22) Evergetis as late as 11 appear to have “undone” some of these awkward divisions in their own reutilizations of this typikon may actually indicate that they were using an earlier version of this text before the chapter headings were introduced.³⁸

The idea of dividing a founder's typikon into numerated chapters was becoming increasingly popular in the later eleventh century—see (20) Black Mountain and especially the contemporary (23) Pakourianos. This convention, with its quasi-judicial overtones, probably appealed to contemporaries such as the author of (19) Attaleiates, himself a jurist, who was, however, incapable of utilizing it consistently in his Rule. In the twelfth century, all of (22) Evergetis's later users systematically divided their own works into topically consistent chapters. Earlier, in (4) Stoudios

[B] we can see how a scheme of chapter division and numeration was imposed on a prior version [A] of the same document without these features. The same thing is likely to have happened here.

During his lifetime, which extended to at least until 1067, Timothy also introduced some changes of his own into the typikon. As noted above, he changed his mind on the mandatory seclusion of the foundation's superior [13] and the prohibition on bathing [28], leading him to revise or rewrite the relevant chapters. As in other documents such as (13) Ath. Typikon, (20) Black Mountain, and the later (29) Kosmosoteira, repetitive treatments of certain topics are helpful indicators of the stages of their composition.³⁹ The interpretation of this evidence is complicated here, however, since we cannot be sure that the repetitions are the responsibility of a single author. In any event, certain of these repetitive treatments lend further support to the premise that administrative structures and disciplinary procedures continued to develop while the typikon was being composed. For instance, a single treasurer envisioned in [20] is joined by two colleagues later in [30]. Also, the ban on personal possessions announced in [22] is backed up by a provision for the superior's inspection of cells in [27], while the exhortation to preserve the typikon in [40] is strengthened by the provision for a monthly reading of the document in [43].

2. External Evidence for Incremental Composition

External evidence also lends support to the idea of a gradual development of the typikon throughout the last half of the eleventh century. Gautier ("Évergétis," p. 70, n. 53) proposed that the failure to provide a description of the duties of the librarian, an office known from a note in another manuscript to have been occupied by the monk George in 1064, indicated that the portion of the typikon around [31] must have dated from before that year. Although this is an argument ex silentio, it gains support from [39], which anticipates but does not actually institute the creation of other monastic offices.

The hypersensitivity to "theft" of movable (as opposed to immovable) property seen in various parts of the *typikon*⁴⁰ really fits in, historically speaking, no sooner than the confiscations of Isaac I Komnenos (1057–59) but more likely after those of Alexios Komnenos' government in 1081 (for which see above, Chapter Three, E. Historical Context, 6). The key, ideologically charged word "sacrilege" in Evergetis' discussion [19] of the inalienability of consecrated immovable property fails to appear in (30) Phoberos [38], an early twelfth-century document that is generally a close copy of (22) Evergetis, though again perhaps of an earlier version. Therefore this may be another place where the typikon was brought up to date in a re-edition, for the charge of sacrilege is backed up by reference to penalties established by a law which may be a chrysobull of Alexios Komnenos dated to 1082.⁴¹ Likewise, the list of exceptions to the general rule against alienations, including destruction of the facility thanks to an enemy raid or an earthquake, accords well with the tumultuous early years of the reign of Alexios Komnenos, including a major earthquake, perhaps in the year 1090.⁴²

3. Proposed Reconstruction of Compositional History

At this early point in the examination of the document, any reconstruction of its compositional history must necessarily be speculative, but the following general outline is offered for consideration. The original document as composed by Timothy may have consisted only of: the introduction [1]; the foundation history [2], [3]; the liturgical, sacramental, and dietary regulations [4] through [10]; and the provision [11] for the patronal feast. There were probably no chapter headings at this time, and both [8] and the other cross-references to the synaxarion now found in this first section of the document may be later interpolations.

22. EVERGETIS

Judging from the author's transitional statement, there seems to have been a compositional break just before the present heading to [12]. The declaration of the monastery's independence, at least in its present form, must date from after the "chrysobulls of the emperors now dead" mentioned in it, minimally to the 1060s but perhaps much later still. Subsequent chapters, all landmarks of reform legislation, may have been added as the institutions and customs on which they were based were developed. As noted above, [13], which starts out with a cancellation of the requirement of seclusion for the superior, is self-consciously a revision of an earlier arrangement for the succession. Another compositional break is posited just before [18], again on the evidence of the author's transitional statement. Chapter [18] which follows appears to be a self-contained addition to the typikon. The statement of the inalienability of the monastery's immovable property [19] is later still; it may have been re-edited, moreover, late in the century. An author's transition occurs before [20]; the contents of that chapter and of [22] and [23] may have been written in one sitting. A new compositional section begins with [23] and continues down for quite some time, perhaps as far as the end of [33]. That there was a re-edition of [28], however, is self-evident from its internal inconsistency (cf. the shorter version in (30) Phoberos [46], likely based on the Evergetian original).

The transitional statement just before [34] indicates another place where work was resumed on the document, perhaps down to the end of [37]. Chapters [38] through [41], the latter chapter incorrectly announced in [40] as being the document's last, form the next section. Chapter [42] is self-professedly an addition, which summarizes much earlier disciplinary regulation. Chapter [43] is yet another addition, the last that Timothy can conceivably have made to the typikon, though it (like some other late chapters) may in fact be by another hand.

Timothy himself was dead by the time the appendix was added to the document which provides for his joint commemoration with the first founder Paul Evergetinos. But Alexios Komnenos' brother-in-law John Doukas, then known as the Evergetian monk Antony, is also mentioned in this appendix as still being alive. Since Doukas was still actively engaged in his military career in 1097, he could not have entered the monastery until near the end of the century at the earliest.⁴³ He is also mentioned as being alive in (23) Kecharitomene [71], a document which copies (22) Evergetis or—more likely—another document related to it, and can be dated to 1110–16.⁴⁴ Since Gautier ("Évergétis," p. 90, n. 68) noted that the appendix is in the same hand as that of the rest of the typikon, we are forced to the conclusion that it in its final version (22) Evergetis must date from no earlier than the first decades of the twelfth century.⁴⁵

4. Summary of Conclusions

Timothy's contribution to this manuscript tradition of (22) Evergetis could have occurred at any time during his superiorship, which began at the founder Paul's death in 1054 and continued up through 1067 and possibly beyond. An incrementally progressive first edition of the typikon under Timothy's authorship is proposed for the period 1054–70 (roughly the presumed term of his superiorship). Thereafter, other authors must have introduced the present division of the work into 43 chapters, re-edited certain ideologically and politically sensitive chapters like [12] and [19], and perhaps added a few final chapters of their own. The exact balance between the contributions of Timothy and his successors may not be determinable, unless some of the innovations contained in chapters [12] through the end of the document can be precisely dated from external evidence. The completion of the typikon as we have it is proposed for 1098–1118, an approximation of John Doukas' tenure as an Evergetian monk.

G. Subsequent Utilization by Later Authors

(22) Evergetis was undoubtedly the most influential Byzantine founder's typikon ever written. As noted above in Evergetis' Institutional History, many subsequent founders utilized it either directly or indirectly, down to the middle of the fourteenth century. Later authors utilized the whole or significant parts of all of the components of (22) Evergetis except for these obviously particular sections: the introduction [1], the foundation history [2], the founder's commemoration [35], and the appendix. Our own Appendix C: Topical Interrelationships of the Evergetian Family of Monastic Typika provides an overview of this usage.

It was through the borrowing of its typikon rather than through the development of any kind of monastic order that Evergetis saw its institutions and customs introduced into many of the most influential monasteries of later Byzantium. Detailed discussions of the impact of Evergetian institutions and customs on the successor institutions for which these founders wrote their own typika will be found below under the respective textually linked foundation documents in our collection.⁴⁶ To provide even a brief summary here would be tantamount to writing a concise history of Byzantine monasticism over the next two hundred years. Some general observations about the nature of subsequent utilization are in order, however.

First, the seamless way later authors integrated large portions of (22) Evergetis into their own works, admitting hardly any incongruities or internal inconsistencies, speaks to their superior editorial skills. Second, many later authors were so respectful of the text of (22) Evergetis that they utilized even its most disorganized chapters, like [13] and [14], to fashion new, better organized regulations of their own, and on occasion even used parts of (22) Evergetis to shape regulations opposed to the model's own provisions. Third, even foundation documents textually independent of (22) Evergetis nevertheless are indebted to many of its institutions and customs. This is true even in the twelfth century, but the phenomenon becomes more noticeable in the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries at the very time that direct borrowing from (22) Evergetis becomes less common.⁴⁷ Fourth, the massive indebtedness of successor institutions to Evergetis is rarely acknowledged. Only Isaac Komnenos, author of (29) Kosmosoteira [8] in 1152, comes close to admitting the essentially derivative character of much of his own work. Finally, the borrowing from (22) Evergetis soon became dependent on intermediary typika, some, like (32) Mamas that are fortunately still preserved, and others that can be only conjecturally reconstructed. This was because the dynamic of the ongoing monastic reform, particularly in the twelfth century, tended to make (22) Evergetis seem outdated in the version in which we have it. Even (22) Evergetis' close copiers, the authors of (30) Phoberos, (29) Kosmosoteira, and to a lesser extent also (34) Machairas, seem to have used a different version, a vulgate, as it were, of the Evergetian typikon.

22. EVERGETIS

Notes on the Introduction

1. See the discussion below in Analysis, F. Composition of the Typikon.
2. See discussion and description of the manuscript in Gautier, “Évergétis,” pp. 11–13.
3. Paul Evergetinos, Evergetinos etoi Synagoge ton theophthongon rhematon kai didaskalion ton theophoron kai hagion pateron, ed. Makarios of Corinth and Nikodemos Hagiorites (Venice, 1783), 7th ed. in 4 vols. (Athens, 1983); see analyses by Richard, “Florilèges,” cols. 502–3 (with lists of works utilized and surviving manuscripts); Sauget, “Paul Évergétinos,” pp. 227–35, and Solignac, “Paul Évergétinos,” cols. 563–64. An English translation is being prepared by the Evergetis project at Queens College, Belfast.
4. See descriptions in Richard, “Florilèges,” cols. 503–5, and (for Nikon) the discussion above in (20) Black Mountain, Biography of the Author, B. His Works.
5. See Leroy, “Nouveau témoin,” pp. 76–88; Solignac, “Paul Évergétinos,” col. 564. An edition and English translation is being prepared by the Evergetis project at Queens College, Belfast.
6. Synaxarion, ed. Dmitrievsky, Opisanie, vol. 1, pt. 1, pp. 256–614; see discussion by Pargoire, “Évergétis,” pp. 158–59; an English translation of the Synaxarion has been prepared by Robert Jordan as part of the Evergetis project at Queens College, Belfast.
7. Gautier, “Évergétis,” p. 8.
8. Pargoire, “Évergétis,” p. 158; for this foundation, see Janin, Géographie, vol. 3, p. 322.
9. Gautier, “Évergétis,” pp. 8–9, with nn. 16–18.
10. Ed. A. Kambylis, Symeon Neos Theologos, Hymnen (Berlin, 1976), pp. 29–30; for discussion of this individual’s relationship to Evergetis, see Gautier, “Évergétis,” pp. 9–10, and Pargoire, “Évergétis,” pp. 369–70.
11. Gautier, “Évergétis,” p. 9, with note 19.
12. For the impact of (22) Evergetis on typika of the twelfth-century monastic reform, see the discussions under the individual documents in Chapters Five and Six below.
13. See the notices in Ch. Du Cange, Constantinopolis christiana, vol. 4, pt. 2 (Venice, 1729), no. 18, p. 59, and in A. Banduri, Imperium orientale, pt. 3 (Venice, 1729), pp. 176–89; with Pargoire, “Évergétis,” pp. 161–62.
14. Theodore Balsamon, Comm. ad C. Carth. (419), c. 6 (R&P 3.311–12).
15. Domitien’s Slavic Life of Sabbas the Serbian, with French trans. and ed., A. Chodzko, Légendes slaves du moyen âge (Paris, 1858), pp. 36, 38; see discussion in Pargoire, “Évergétis,” pp. 162–63, 372.
16. See Janin, “Sanctuaires,” pp. 177–78.
17. Ed. A. Belin, Histoire de la Latinité de Constantinople (Paris, 1894), pp. 60–61.
18. A. Potthast, Regesta pontificum romanorum inde ab a. post Christum natum MCXCVIII ad a. MCCCIV, vol. 1 (Berlin, 1874), nos. 5541 and 5552; the first letter ed. Belin, Histoire, pp. 61–62.
19. Potthast, Regesta, nos. 6887 and 6892.
20. Potthast, Regesta, no. 6893.
21. See Pargoire, “Évergétis,” p. 162.
22. See Pargoire, “Évergétis,” p. 163.
23. See G. Majeska, Russian Travelers to Constantinople in the Fourteenth and Fifteenth Centuries (Washington, D.C., 1984), pp. 315–16.
24. Jordan, “Theotokos Evergetis,” pp. 243–44, commenting on Pargoire, “Évergétis,” p. 262.
25. MM 2.322–23; see the full discussion of this document below in Chapter Nine, Historical Context.
26. See the analyses below of (37) Auxentios, (39) Lips, (40) Philanthropos, (55) Athanasios I, (56) Kellibara II, (57) Bebaia Elpis, (58) Menoikeion, and (60) Charsianeites along with the discussion in Chapter Nine.
27. Gautier, “Évergétis,” p. 94, n. 77.
28. For the siting, see Janin, Géographie, vol. 3, p. 182, and Pargoire, “Évergétis,” pp. 372–73, with cautions by Gautier, “Évergétis,” p. 7.

ELEVENTH CENTURY

29. See my “Documentary Evidence” and “Evergetis Monastery.”
30. For limits on numbers elsewhere in earlier and contemporary documents, see (9) Galesios [246], (10) Eleousa [5], (13) Ath. Typikon, (16) Mount Tmolos [1], [2], (17) Nikon Metanoete [5], and (19) Attaleiates [27].
31. Pseudo-Basil, Poenae 13, 59, PG 31, cols. 1308C, 1313C.
32. See below, Chapters Five and Six.
33. See (9) Galesios [223] and (15) Constantine IX.
34. Not surprisingly, this radical idea is not picked up by any of the successor institutions in the Evergetian tradition except for (30) Phoberos [35].
35. For examples, see (35) Skoteine [33], [38], [39].
36. See (4) Theodore Studites [9], [15], [16], [17].
37. Note, for example, the placement of the heading to [4], which consigns the author’s introduction to the discussion of the hours to [3], a discussion of his role in the development of the foundation; the heading to [18], which isolates the author’s own introduction to [18] with [17]; the heading to [35], which likewise isolates the author’s own transition to the subject of discussion in [35] in [34]; the especially awkward placement of the heading for [39], which divides the author’s discussion of the exclusion of women into two chapters; and the heading to [39], which fails to describe both of the two very different topics included in this chapter.
38. E.g., (32) Mamas [47] and (33) Heliou Bomon [46], which both appear to “remedy” the awkward division between (22) Evergetis [3] and [4]; (27) Kecharitomene [13], which “ignores” the division between (22) Evergetis [13] and [14]; (30) Phoberos [36], which does the same for the divisions among (22) Evergetis [15], [16], and [17]; (30) Phoberos [48], which appears to “consolidate” (22) Evergetis [31], [32], and [33], or (30) Phoberos [55], which “remedies” the awkward division between (22) Evergetis [38] and [39]. There are many other possible illustrations of this editorial phenomenon.
39. Note repetitive treatments of: [7] confession to the superior, cf. [15]; [9] no secret eating, cf. [22]; [9] duties of the refectorian and disciplinary official, cf. [31]; [9] condemnation of quarrels over precedence, cf. [42]; [13] investiture ceremony for officials, cf. [29]; [20] duties of the treasurer, cf. [30]; [22] no personal possessions, cf. [27], [42]; and [32] warning against careless administration of the monastery’s property, cf. [42].
40. (22) Evergetis [14], [18], [19], [20], [32], [42].
41. Alexios Komnenos, Novella de sacris vasibus in publicum usum non convertendis (1082) (JGR 3.355–58) = Dölger, Regesten, no. 1085.
42. See John of Antioch, De monasteriis, chap. 18, ed. P. Gautier, REB 33 (1975), 129, cf. 80–86, with V. Grumel, La Chronologie (Paris, 1958), p. 480.
43. Basile Skoulatos, Les personnages byzantins de l’Alexiade (Louvain, 1980), p. 148.
44. Skoulatos, Personnages, p. 149.
45. Gautier, “Évergétis,” p. 11.
46. In Chapter Five, (27) Kecharitomene, (29) Kosmosoteira, cf. (28) Pantokrator; in Chapter Six, (30) Phoberos, (32) Mamas, and (33) Heliou Bomon, cf. (31) Areia; in Chapter Seven, (34) Machairas and (47) Philanthropos, cf. (37) Auxentios and (39) Lips; in Chapter Nine, (58) Menoikeion, cf. (55) Athanasios I, (56) Kellibara II, (57) Bebaia Elpis, and (60) Charsianeites.
47. See (28) Pantokrator, (31) Areia, (37) Auxentios, (39) Lips, (53) Meteora, (55) Athanasios I, (56) Kellibara II, (57) Bebaia Elpis, and (60) Charsianeites.

Bibliography

- Beck, Hans-Georg, Kirche und theologische Literatur im byzantinischen Reich (Munich, 1959), p. 590.
- Dmitrievsky, Aleksei, Opisanie liturgicheskikh rykopiesi, 3 vols. (Kiev, 1895–1901; Petrograd, 1917), vol. 1, pt. 1, pp. xxxiii–liii.
- , “Maloizbstnii konstantinopolskii monastir XI stoltiya bogomateri Evergetidskoi i ego ktitorskii

22. EVERGETIS

- Tipik, khraryashchiisya v rykopisi athinskago natsyunalnago universiteta," TKDA (July 1895), 421–43.
- Harvey, Alan, "Land, Taxation and Trade in the Eleventh-Century Monastic Economy: The Case of Evergetis," in Theotokos Evergetis and Eleventh-Century Monasticism, ed. M. Mullett and A. Kirby (Belfast, 1994), pp. 124–36.
- Janin, Raymond, La géographie ecclésiastique de l'empire byzantin, vol. 3: Les églises et les monastères [de Constantinople], 2nd ed. (Paris, 1969), pp. 178–83.
- , "Les sanctuaires de Byzance sous la domination latine," REB 2 (1944), 134–84.
- Jordan, Robert, "The Monastery of the Theotokos Evergetis, Its Children and Grandchildren," in Theotokos Evergetis and Eleventh-Century Monasticism, ed. M. Mullett and A. Kirby (Belfast, 1994), pp. 215–45.
- Kaplan, Michel, "The Evergetis Hypotyposis and the Management of Monastic Estates in the Eleventh Century," in Theotokos Evergetis and Eleventh-Century Monasticism, ed. M. Mullett and A. Kirby (Belfast, 1994), pp. 215–45.
- Leroy, Julien, "Un nouveau témoin de la Grande Catéchèse de Saint Théodore Studite," REB 15 (1957), 73–88.
- Morris, Rosemary, "Text and Context: Some Reflections on the Evergetis Colloquium," in Theotokos Evergetis and Eleventh-Century Monasticism, ed. M. Mullett and A. Kirby (Belfast, 1994), pp. 348–61.
- Mullett, Margaret, "The Monastery of the Theotokos Evergetis," in Theotokos Evergetis and Eleventh-Century Monasticism, ed. M. Mullett and A. Kirby (Belfast, 1994), pp. 1–16.
- Mullett, Margaret, and Kirby, Anthony, eds., The Theotokos Evergetis and Eleventh-Century Monasticism (Belfast, 1994).
- Pargoire, Jules, "Constantinople: Le couvent de l'Évergèteis," EO 9 (1906), 366–73.
- , "Constantinople: Le monastère de l'Évergèteis," EO 10 (1907), 155–67, 259–63.
- Richard, Marcel, "Florilèges spirituels," DS, vol. 5 (Paris, 1962), cols. 435–511, esp. III. Florilèges grecs, 3. Florilèges monastiques, cols. 499–510.
- Rodley, Lyn, "The Monastery of the Theotokos Evergetis, Constantinople: Where it Was and What it Looked Like," in Theotokos Evergetis and Eleventh-Century Monasticism, ed. M. Mullett and A. Kirby (Belfast, 1994), pp. 17–29.
- Sauget, Joseph-Marie, "Paul Évergétinos et la Collection alphabético-anonyme des Apophthegmata Patrum. A propos d'un livre récent," OCP 37 (1971), 223–35.
- Solignac, Aimé, "Paul Évergétinos (de l'Évergèteis)," DS, vol. 12, pt. 1 (Paris, 1984), cols. 562–64.
- Taft, Robert, "The Synaxarion of Evergetis in the History of Byzantine Liturgy," in Theotokos Evergetis and Eleventh-Century Monasticism, ed. M. Mullett and A. Kirby (Belfast, 1994), pp. 274–93.
- Talbot, Alice-Mary, and Cutler, Anthony, "Euergetis Monastery," ODB, pp. 740–41.
- Thiermeyer, Andreas, "Der Codex Ath. 788 sein literarhistorischer Kontext und das Theotokos-Evergetis-Kloster zu Konstantinopel" (diss., Pontifical Oriental Institute, Rome, 1990)
- Thomas, John Philip, "Documentary Evidence from the Byzantine Monastic Typika for the History of the Evergetine Reform Movement," in Theotokos Evergetis and Eleventh-Century Monasticism, ed. M. Mullett and A. Kirby (Belfast, 1994), pp. 246–73.
- , "The Evergetis Monastery at Constantinople as a Center of Ecclesiastical Reform," BSC 11 (1985), 17–18.
- Volk, Otto, "Die byzantinischen Klosterbibliotheken von Konstantinopel, Thessalonike und Kleinasien" (Ph.D. diss., Munich, 1955), pp. 38–42.
- Volk, Robert, Gesundheitswesen und Wohltätigkeit im Spiegel der byzantinischen Klostertypika (Munich, 1983), pp. 73–84.
- Ware, Kallistos, "Prayer and Sacraments in the Synagoge," in Theotokos Evergetis and Eleventh-Century Monasticism, ed. M. Mullett and A. Kirby (Belfast, 1994), pp. 325–47.
- Wortley, John, "The Genre and Sources of the Synagoge," in Theotokos Evergetis and Eleventh-Century Monasticism, ed. M. Mullett and A. Kirby (Belfast, 1994), pp. 306–24.

ELEVENTH CENTURY

Translation

Explanation and rule for the life of the monks in the monastery of the most holy Mother of God Evergetis handed down by Timothy the monk and priest who became superior after the founder of the same monastery.

1. The introduction to the rule.

It is very good because it is both pleasing to God and contributes in no small way to your benefit, my brothers in the Lord and spiritual children, to set down in writing the nature and extent of all your holy liturgical procedure, and when and how you must carry it out, and to leave behind as it were a rule and model not only for you but also those coming after you, and not just that but to describe all the rest of your way of life—that is, that which concerns both the soul itself and the body—so that by referring to this you may be able with God’s help to guide and live your lives without error, not missing the true object by straying this way and that, but remain immovable in goodness, not being carried to and fro as Solomon says “Either to the right or to the left” (Prov. 4:27). You yourselves are well aware of the reason for which I have made this decision. It is also necessary to say these things for the sake of our successors.

2. Concerning the site of this holy monastery, that is the estate of our holy father and first founder lord Paul, the one that was set aside by him for a monastery.

This most holy monastery of ours, as everyone knows, was once an estate of our late thrice-blessed father and founder, I mean the monk lord Paul. It had come to him by family inheritance and had been preferred by him to simply every other piece of property he had in the world clearly because of his desire for virtue and the contemplative life which he sought after most earnestly and preferred to everything else. Pierced by a burning love for this and moved by the Spirit of God, he immediately left this imperial capital, his own birthplace, also his parents and the rest of his relations, his friends and associates and his wealth, and all the other things in the world that enslave a soul that loves this world [p. 17] and he reached this estate in the month of June of the second indiction and the six thousand five hundred and fifty-sixth year.¹ After him and as it were following him I also came at the beginning of September of the third indiction and the six thousand five hundred and fifty-seventh year [1049 A.D.]

3. Concerning the date of the death of our holy father the first founder, and that in his will he left the monastery in a meager form to our holy father lord Timothy its second founder, and that he established it in its present magnificent form; also concerning his acquisitions.

So then, as we have said, the blessed man came here and set aside the place for a monastery, building small cells and tonsuring a few men including me. After he had completed those great and marvelous struggles, he lived for only five years, and was taken away to everlasting bliss on the 16th of April in the year six thousand five hundred and sixty-two [1054 A.D.], leaving to me in his will the monastery in that small and simple form in which he had established it. You yourselves know and the truth demonstrates how it changed after it was left to me in such a small and very insignificant form through the intercessions of My Lady the Evergetis and his holy prayers, how it grew from being unimportant and incomplete into this imposing and most magnificent form, furthermore how a church was built from the very foundations to the Mother of God Our Lady the Evergetis, and how cells were constructed much better than the previous ones, the number and kinds of books that were acquired, similarly the sacred vessels and holy icons, also the holy veils and liturgical cloths, in short all the remaining adornment of the most holy church, and in addition the landed property acquired to support and maintain the monastery. It is not necessary for us to talk of these matters and anyone wishing to find out can be instructed more clearly by studying the inventory.² [p. 19] But keeping to our purpose we must turn in our discourse to the canonical procedure.

22. EVERGETIS

But O God and Lord of all, O ever-praised Mother of Our Lord God and Savior Jesus Christ, I pray these instructions may be effective and productive for both us and those after us until the end of the present age through the valuable prayers of your servant, our father and founder.

So now we must turn our attention to the subjects of our discourse and since we wish to begin from a preferable place, it is preferable to begin with the hour that brings us the light, that is the first hour of the day, and I think it absolutely necessary that those who are going to give a description of the works of light should begin following the light.

4. Concerning the psalm singing of the first hour and concerning the prayers and that after the worship of matins and the first hour have been completed the brothers should go away to their cells and sing the obligatory office.

So after the worship of matins, the office of the first hour should be sung by you following on immediately, as is customary, and at the end of this the following prayer should next be recited, "Thou who at all times and all hours" and what follows. After the prayer the customary genuflections should be performed, by the able-bodied on the bare floor but the weak should have some low supports. Three of them should be completed in a more leisurely manner inasmuch as while you are standing you should say three times to yourselves with hands stretched out "God, be merciful to me the sinner" (Luke 18:13), then when you are kneeling down with your heads resting on the ground, you should say three times in the same way "I have sinned against Thee, Lord, forgive me." But the remaining twelve should be carried out more quickly so as to utter the aforementioned supplicatory phrases once at each genuflection and each time you stand, but yet in unison and with fitting good order, not with some getting ahead and others falling behind, but all following the lead of the ecclesiarch or the priest on duty that day as he stands near the holy screen and indicates the successive movements.

That should take place when "God is the Lord" (Ps. 117 [118]: 27) is not sung during matins;³ but if it is, the performing of these genuflections in the church should be omitted but three deep bows should be performed while at each of them, as has been mentioned, the aforesaid supplicatory phrases should be said to yourselves three times. Then after these genuflections or bows all should repeat the following prayer aloud with hands raised, "O [p. 21] eternal God, everlasting Light without beginning, the Maker of all creation." Immediately after the prayer the short catechesis from the words of the Fathers⁴ should take place, read by the superior, just as we received it from our most blessed father, and this should never be omitted unless set aside by the synaxarion. At this point after the reading, the trisagion which is prescribed for us should take place and to it the following prayer should be joined, "Thou who sendest out the light and it proceeds."⁵ That is to take place when the catechesis is read as has been made clear; otherwise the trisagion should be omitted and the prayer should be recited to follow the other prayer before the catechesis.

All the prayers should be said with hands held up in accordance with the following, “Lift up your hands in the sanctuaries, and bless the Lord” (Ps. 133 [134]:2), and “The lifting of my hands as an evening sacrifice” (Ps. 140 [141]:2), and “In every place lifting holy hands without anger or quarreling” (I Tim. 2:8). When the aforementioned prayer has been said and the priest has spoken his customary one also, all of you should immediately fall on your faces and hearing the superior asking for your prayers like this, “Brothers, pray for me in the Lord that I may be delivered from passions and the snares of the Evil One,” you should answer, “May God save you, honored father, and you, pray for us, holy father, that we may be delivered from passions and the snares of the Evil One.” Then again the superior praying should say, “May God through the prayers of our fathers save you all.”

Then you should stand up and depart to your cells, avoiding all meeting together and foolish distraction, idle chatter, and disorderly laughter. For what comes of such things? Clearly, the lapsing into disgraceful talk, abuse, and condemnations because your mind is relaxed by this and you forget what is really good, and reaching your cells in a dilatory and lazy frame of mind you sink at once into a sleep of akedia and pass almost all the day in idleness without engaging in any beneficial activity whatever, as the great Basil also says, “To lapse from a fitting spiritual state is easy when the soul indulges in unrestrained laughter, and it is easier for a concern for goodness to be dissipated and lapse into disgraceful talk.”⁶

May this not be the case with my fathers and brothers, but let each go away to his cell in a sober frame of mind most vigilant, always doing what is pleasing to God. But if perhaps some are discovered to be at fault in this matter, whether they are young or old, advanced in the monastic life or novices, they are to be admonished with the laws of love by the disciplinary official, [p. 23] and if they do not mend their ways they are to be punished. For it is not fitting that novices who behave carelessly should be punished, but rather those who have spent many years in the monastic way of life but are careless and lazy, as [John Klimakos] the author of The Ladder says somewhere concerning this.⁷ Going away to your cells you should carry out the whole obligatory canonical procedure, with the customary prayers and genuflections in the manner mentioned above, I mean the six psalms, the third hour and the sixth according to custom when the semantra are struck. For genuflections should not be carried out in the church only when “God is the Lord” (Ps. 117 [118]:27) is sung, as we have said. So when you pray in your cells you should always kneel down, but we will avoid⁸ this also in our cells whenever there is a vigil because of the weariness that comes from that, also during the twelve days of Christmas, during Easter week, and further, during the nine days after the feast for the Dormition of our most holy Lady, the Mother of God Evergetis.⁹ So the ritual of the third, sixth, and first hours should be like that on the days of the year that are free from fasting.

5. Concerning the holy liturgy, and that no one is to receive communion without an instruction from the superior, nor should anyone think himself unworthy of communion without informing him.

It is necessary now also to speak about the divine mystery, which must of necessity be celibrated in the church each day, but you yourselves must be sure to take care in this, my brothers, because what is performed there is divine and fearful, and because there more than in anything else the fearful and very great mystery of our orthodox faith is accomplished, I mean the most divine and most precious sacrifice of the completely undefiled body and blood of our Lord God and Savior Jesus Christ. So during it, as has been said, you must pay strict attention, and as far as possible chase from you every thought that is impure, sown by the devil, and unworthy of that fearful celebration, and purify yourselves in every way. Then as many as have been allowed by the superior to partake of communion should partake of the divine elements. For it will not be possible for any of you to partake freely and in a thoughtless manner, nor yet each day. This we would indeed wish, [p. 25] for to partake often of the divine elements is often to share in life, as Christ himself says, “He who eats my flesh and drinks my blood abides in me, and I in him” (John 6:56), and again, “Unless you eat my flesh and drink my blood, you have no life in you” (John 6:53), and as the divine apostle says “He who is united to the Lord becomes one spirit” (I Cor. 6:17), and as the most gentle David says conversely “They that remove themselves far from thee shall perish” (Ps. 72 [73]:27).

22. EVERGETIS

Therefore we would indeed wish this, as has been said, but because of human weakness and the danger of the action we do not allow it, for “Whoever eats the body and drinks the blood of the Lord unworthily is guilty of his body and blood” (I Cor. 11:27) says Paul, the divine and inspired speaker and leader of the apostles. This statement is frightening, my brothers, and causes not only sinners like me but also those who are very confident in themselves to fear partaking. So then as many as are sure that they are pure and free from disgraceful thoughts and submission to them, from anger and grumbling, grief and denigration, deceit and disorderly laughter, furthermore and more especially the bearing of a grudge and irritation, disgraceful talk and such things, should partake of communion three times a week. But those who fall prey to the aforementioned passions and hasten to a renunciation of them through confession and repentance should partake of communion once a week or not at all at the discretion of the superior of course, for he should be in charge of such matters. But for someone to consider himself unworthy of communion without his knowledge cannot be approved. For he who does this will be condemned as someone fulfilling his own wish. However it is permitted that those who should partake of communion sing the office laid down for the partaking, make a common genuflection together to one another to grant forgiveness and thus gratefully partake of the life-giving elements. So let these things be carried out in this way.

6. A regulation concerning the ninth hour, vespers, and the night office, then next concerning the midnight office and matins.

The ninth hour should be sung in the same way as the preceding hours, with the striking of the semantron calling you to it as is usual. The regulation in the synaxarion sets out very clearly how the office of vespers should be carried out, with the night office immediately next, as well as [p. 27] compline after the supper.¹⁰ During these you should genuflect whenever you are not to celebrate a feast, and by feast we mean a day that includes “God is the Lord” (Ps. 117 [118]: 27) at matins. When compline has been sung and the priest has said his customary prayer also, you should fall on your knees just as at the end of the first hour and incline your ear well to the superior as he says, “Forgive me in the Lord, brothers, for I have sinned in word, deed, and in thought,” and you should grant him forgiveness saying, “May God forgive you, father.” But you also should immediately beg this from him by adding, “Forgive us also yourself, honored father, for we have sinned in deed, word, and in thought,” then again he should pray for you and say, “May God through the prayers of our fathers forgive you all.”

ELEVENTH CENTURY

Then standing up and according him the required obeisance, you should go away to your cells and carry out your night office in accordance with the regulation, and then full of gratitude and spiritual joy you should turn to sleep until the one who is in charge of the clock¹¹ learns from it the appropriate hour and goes to the superior, and receiving from him the required blessing then shouts out with a loud voice in a rhythmic fashion, “Bless, O saints.” Then when he has struck the semantron in the customary way and distributed lights to all, he will rouse you for the celebration of the midnight office which he himself will also sing all the time as he carries out the prescribed lighting of the church, and then when he has sounded the great semantron and the bronze one also, he will call you all for the dawn worship, the preliminary part of which you must carry out as follows.

For after the striking of the bronze semantron praise should be ascribed to God by the priest who has the duty for the day, and as he praises God he should at once with the censer make the sign of the venerable cross¹² in front of the holy table; and you replying “Amen,” should immediately sing a trisagion together with the nineteenth and twentieth psalms and the usual troparia and the Kyrie eleison, taking care to keep together as far as is reasonable while these are being sung.

The priest himself should go round all the divine church and cense everyone, and then, standing before the holy screen, when he has once more made the sign of the venerable cross with the censer, with the censuring he should offer up praise to the all-holy Trinity, speaking audibly as follows, “Glory to the holy and consubstantial and life-giving Trinity always, now and always and for ever and ever, amen.” After replying “Amen” the ecclesiarch should at once begin the six psalms, saying the words of the psalms in a low voice slowly, quietly, and carefully so that all may then be able to recite them without error or stumbling. Then after the completion of the six psalms, the whole office of matins [p. 29] should next be celebrated as the synaxarion describes.¹³ That constitutes the pattern of your daily office.

7. Concerning life-preserving confession.

We must also speak about life-preserving confession and the discourse about the table must wait for a while. Well then, the superior must sit in a private place twice a day, and leaving aside all other work whatsoever and all the trouble of managing and directing, must take most diligent care to hear those who wish to make confession and set for each one the appropriate healing. We specify that after the reciting of the psalms at matins has begun there should be one time when he will bring healing to those who live continuously in the monastery and are not employed in any ministries; and after compline he will bring healing to those ministering inside or outside who are present. He is to be allowed, if perhaps he cannot act in person since the brotherhood is numerous, to authorize whichever priests and deacons he wishes, and even some of the more reverent brothers, to hear the thoughts of the more uneducated majority, the thoughts that trouble us day by day and hour by hour which must always be easy to absolve and not have caused more deep-seated trouble, and to remit them and grant forgiveness. But the thoughts that require some healing and care must be referred to the superior by those who hear them, and he is to bring about the appropriate healing. So then, those who confess will conceal nothing, though perhaps hesitant if they know their thoughts need care, but they will uncover everything completely to their confessor; also it is right that we should tell them what is expected of them.

22. EVERGETIS

So then you, my brothers, seeing the superior hurrying off to this good ministry which is very beneficial to your souls, you should run, and running reach with eagerness this very calm harbor that is safe for your souls, and reveal completely without any covering up every stirring of your mind and every thought that harms your soul, as though you are making your confession in the presence of God and not a man. But the one who sets out to lie to God will always get his punishment. For the psalmist says "Thou wilt destroy all that speak falsehood" (Ps. 5:6). So then, by confessing without deceit and ridding your minds of all wrangling, all impurity, all confusion and trouble, you may be happy and rejoice, having gained this good hope, namely that you will not fail to gain salvation. But make your confession without [p. 31] accusing each other when perhaps a violent dispute or some other argument occurs. Do not make your confession if you consider yourselves blameless and you are looking really for condemnations, nor should you speak about the bodily needs which afflict you. For there is always a time for them, but this is a time for making confession and obtaining healing for spiritual passions. If you must speak of some violent dispute, be keen to ascribe and assign to yourselves all the blame and reason for the fault, whatever it is. But if you speak about some other passions, reveal these completely so that you can gain double benefit from this, by both attaining sound health of soul and clothing yourself in exalting humility, for possessing this we will actually be like God who says, "Learn from me that I am gentle and lowly in heart" (Matt. 11:29). What else would be a clearer proof of gentleness and humility in heart than clearly to bear all affliction nobly and blame oneself in everything? The true confession without which I do not think anyone gains salvation is the cause of so many good things.

Then we order that a person who does not make confession should be excommunicated from the Lord God Ruler of All until, coming to his senses and thinking of higher things, he confesses all his faulty and harmful thoughts. Thus it would be necessary also to expel such a person from the monastery and cut him off like a rotten limb, and as a wound that is hard to heal or completely incurable to remove him and cast him away, but the uncertainty of the future and the expectation that perhaps one day he may come to his senses held us back from this purpose. However, for him to be liable to the penalty of excommunication is very useful since it is very effective. Indeed, what benefit does he obtain from remaining at the monastery? What benefit comes from not making confession, or rather does not harm and ruin follow and a continued practice of evil and everything whatsoever that brings destruction to the soul? So then, as it is difficult for someone who is sick or has wounds to return to health when he hides these from the doctor, so it is much more difficult for the person who does not make confession ever to gain health of soul. The divine Basil is witness of this when he speaks as follows: "If a monk is going to show proper progress and come into a state of life in accordance with the command of the Lord, he must keep no stirring of his soul hidden, but offer to his superior all the secrets of his heart stripped bare."¹⁴ So then, by acting in this way, my brothers, we will not only be rescued from our own faults but we will possess later on something that is more sure; for [John Klimakos] the author of The Ladder says “Stripes that are exposed will not become worse,” [p. 33] and again, “A soul that thinks about confession is held back by it from sinning as if by a rein.”¹⁵ So the revelation of one’s own faults is very useful. In future let us all run eagerly to it.

ELEVENTH CENTURY

Therefore we prescribe that confession should be held like this every day, by the superior himself clearly and by as many as seem to him to be suitable people to hear thoughts; but the first and great confession which we should make when casting off the hair of this world must be offered to the superior alone and not to anyone else so that he can know everyone himself and mix the medicine suitable for each one. These things should be so.

8. Concerning vigils and when they must take place.

Concerning the procedure for the holy fasts the synaxarion will inform you most precisely, and you should carry them out always in accordance with it.¹⁶ Vigils should also take place following the prescribed rule every Sunday, at a feast of the Lord, and at commemorations of other saints which we will find out from the synaxarion.

9. Concerning the table and diet.

It should be the right time now to mention the table and food and the other things that supply nourishment to the body. For as we are made up of two parts, I mean soul and body, so also are the activities of the monastery. The whole daily divine office expressed in the singing of psalms could reasonably be thought of as the soul of the monastery, whereas the monastery itself and all the things that benefit our bodies could be considered its body. So then, since with God’s help we have said enough already about its soul, it is right that we should also speak about matters which concern its body, by prescribing the diet and setting out for you more precisely all the other things that secure a more lasting continuance of the monastery, as it is necessary for the one who wishes to increase his monastery to be no less concerned about these things. So then, these things also should be said and should of course be imparted to my dear fathers and brothers.

After the customary collation has taken place in the narthex, when the divine liturgy has already been completed, all the monks should gather and sit there waiting for the summons to the table which is given by the striking of the refectory semantron. When the semantron has been struck, going out at once with the priest who officiated at the liturgy, you should make obeisance to the superior and then beginning to recite audibly the customary psalm¹⁷ walk to the refectory, [p. 35] that is the superior and all those without exception who have been instructed to sit down at the table during the first sitting. Then entering the refectory and completing the aforementioned psalm and the short prayer that accompanies it, you should sit down in the order laid down by the superior and gratefully partake of what has been set before you. Then anyone who was late for the psalm and the thanksgiving should be reported by the refectorian to the superior, and he should enquire the reason for his lateness and grant him pardon if it seems reasonable, but if not, he is to perform as many genuflections as the superior wishes.

Moreover, the traditional reading¹⁸ must take place during the sittings in the customary way, with no one making a noise or causing a disturbance or destroying the benefit which comes from that with worldly conversations and idle chatter. The superior only may speak sparingly if he wishes and perhaps the one asked by him may answer similarly in a few brief phrases, if possible. But if someone causes a disturbance or is disturbed, is noisy or causes a noise, and ruins the reading by untimely and improper conversation, he is to be silenced by the refectorian. But if, something I hope does not happen, when he silences him the noisy person pays no attention, he is to be removed from the refectory even if he is unwilling and subjected to the penalty of going without his food or made to learn self-control in another way as the superior wishes.

22. EVERGETIS

So we completely refuse to speak about seating. For how could this be acceptable, that men who are living according to God's will should quarrel at all about seating, like those who are keen to show themselves in a worldly way superior to everyone else in this, as those who are excited by glory that is vain and hated by God? For "Everyone that is proud in heart is an abomination to the Lord" (Prov. 16:5), says Holy Scripture, "The Lord resists the proud, but he gives grace to the humble" (Prov. 3:34). So this will not happen among you, it will not. For if you are in your right minds, you would never choose to be an abomination to the Lord rather than to receive favor from him and have him near you, as those who are of a contrite heart (Ps. 33 [34]:18), or, to speak truly, to be his dwelling and beloved of him. But if any of you is found, alas, causing annoyance in this matter, putting forward as an excuse perhaps age or sphere of work, and does not abide by the command of the superior nor is satisfied with the place allocated to him, I command in the Lord that he be allocated the last place and be taught to leave to the world the habits of the world. But if, something that is in every way detestable and disorderly, he still disagrees [p. 37] and objects, persisting after the second and third admonition in being totally incorrigible and completely incurable, he is to be driven out of the monastery, and like some cancer be thrown out somewhere far away from you, so that he may not also infect the rest of you with his filth. For, as some wise man said, "taking part in evil is much easier than in virtue."¹⁹

When you are eating a meal you must not share with each other any food or drink, even as much as a small drop to cool the wine [mixed with water], but the person who at the time is in need of any of these things should raise himself a little very respectfully and ask the superior reverently, speaking as follows, "Bless me, father, I need this." So if the superior gives permission, he is to receive what he needs, but if not, he is to restrain himself and sit down again thankfully in silence.

We do this not through any meanness and stinginess, as some people think—for we will not be so wrapped up in things that are transient as to prefer them to the comfort of our brothers. For why should we, my brothers, be keen to possess these things if they do not contribute to your service, as has been said? But we do this securing for you reverence and orderliness in this also, that the laxity of the majority may not find an opportunity from this to ruin the whole orderliness of the table, and we become no better than those who are undisciplined and irreligious, who are indulgent and entertain each other by drinking toasts and replying to toasts. Not only are we curbing the inclination of the will, but furthermore we are rooting out the lack of self-control of the majority and teaching them to be satisfied with a few necessities and thereby at the same time plaiting for you crowns for self-restraint. Also we are keeping you away from committing unintentionally a secret deed of darkness, not to say one of stealth.

Well then, is not something done in secret a deed of darkness? This is of course very obvious and the divine gospel of John makes it clear as follows, "Everyone who does evil does not come to the light, lest his evil deeds should be exposed by the light" (John 3:20). The apostle also says,

ELEVENTH CENTURY

“Anything that is exposed is light” (Eph. 5:13), the statement showing that what is not exposed is complete darkness. So for what purpose do you reject the deed of light and do the deed of darkness, my brother? “I am ashamed to ask,” he says. So while you do the opposite and something which God hates you are not ashamed and you hesitate about what is good. Do not, I beg you. However I know that many do this trampling their consciences underfoot, and think that they are not noticed, which touches me to the depths of my heart, and I do not cease from weeping over them because they neither realize that they are in that evil plight, alas, nor [p. 39] acknowledge their passion. May the Lord have pity on them and guide them for their good as he manages all things for our good. We must now return to the point from which we digressed.

So after you have eaten and said the customary grace and risen, you should sing the specified office with the prayer and then go away to your own cells. At supper also, if someone who wishes to have supper arrives after grace, he will incur the same penalty as he who was late at the midday meal, if of course he does not have a reasonable excuse when he is asked. The one, however, who because of abstinence does not come to the supper incurs no blame. Then when you are at supper, only bread will be set before you and that in small quantities; but if some small fruits are set out by the decision of the superior, you should gratefully partake of these also. Drink will be distributed to you with the larger wine measure as is prescribed. But if in fact a feast happens to be celebrated by one of the brothers with the knowledge of the superior, this regulation should not be observed at supper but you should act in whatever way the one celebrating the feast wishes.

The disciplinary official should go in during the second sitting and, if there are some who should have eaten at the first but missed it, he should enquire the reason for their absence. If their excuse is reasonable, they are excused, but if it is unreasonable, we instruct him not to allow them to eat. For to be late for meals for no reasonable cause is not something to be approved of, and this practice must always be punished and discouraged as much as possible. So this is the procedure on the ordinary days of the year.

10. Concerning the holy fasts.

But that is not the procedure during the holy fast days and especially during the first and greatest fast, on the first day of which, that is Monday of the first week, the liturgy should not be celebrated nor should care be taken with the table or food. However on the subsequent days of the same week attention should be paid to the table, and whoever chooses should partake of food. This will be composed of legumes soaked in water and perhaps some raw vegetables and fruits, and the drink will be hot water flavored with cumin. That is apart from Friday. On this day you should eat two dishes of food cooked without olive oil, and drink a better wine distributed in the larger measure because of the feast of the great martyr St. Theodore,²⁰ which the superior must celebrate as a duty and give you a refreshment. But if someone else of you wishes to celebrate this feast, we give him permission to feed the brotherhood with some shellfish on the Saturday, but we will not eat fish. [p. 41] You should carry out the first week of the great and holy Lent in that way.

On all Saturdays and Sundays of the same holy fast two cooked dishes containing olive oil should be set out for you and for your drink the customary large measure of wine should be distributed. The same thing should take place also on Wednesday in the middle of Lent and on the

22. EVERGETIS

Thursday of the great canon. But on Tuesdays and on the other Thursdays two cooked dishes will be set out for you, but only one, not both, of them will have olive oil; and wine will be measured out with the smaller measure, that is half of the larger one. Then on the rest of the days, I mean Mondays, Wednesdays, and Fridays, you should not partake of anything cooked nor wine but only boiled beans and some small fruits, if there are any, and hot water flavored with cumin. But if the commemoration of the discovery of the precious head of [St. John] the Forerunner or the remembrance of the Forty Saints should happen to fall on one of these days,²¹ then the fast should be broken and you should eat two dishes with olive oil and take wine measured out with the larger measure.

Concerning the eating of fish during the great Lent and the feast of the Annunciation.

You are to eat fish if some are sent by devout people as a refreshment, however it is not to be procured by the monastery deliberately, and you should take care to celebrate one of these afore-said feasts when it falls on one of the days of the first week, and you should have as refreshment not that of the aforementioned days, but only wine of the larger measure and gruel.²² But then, on all the other days of this holy Lent you will not be allowed to eat fish at all, not even if perhaps some refreshment is sent you by someone. If however the person who is providing you with the refreshment should come himself to eat with you, then the fast should be broken on this occasion because of this special treat lest we be seen by men to fast (Matt. 6:16).

Concerning the Annunciation and its feast.

When the feast of the Annunciation falls,²³ you should celebrate it as splendidly as possible, partaking of fish provided by the monastery and drinking wine of the larger measure. Furthermore on the next day you should eat anything left from the table of the previous day, and in the same way drink the wine. If no fish has been left, then you will have two dishes with olive oil. The [p. 43] procedure of the feast should be carried out as for days free from fasting. We will eat fish during this holy feast, as has been said, if it does not fall during the great holy week. For at that time we will use only shellfish, rather, we will receive a refreshment because of the feast since for three days of that week—that is Monday, Tuesday, and Wednesday—as on the days of the first week, it is right that we should live content with some legumes soaked in water, raw vegetables, fruits that happen to be at hand, and hot water flavored with cumin. If the aforementioned holy feast should fall on those days, we shall not partake of fish but of shell-fish, as we said, and we shall drink wine of the larger measure, and we will do everything appropriate for the feast even if it should fall on Holy Thursday, or Good Friday, or even Holy Saturday itself.

On Holy Thursday your eating will be as on the days of Lent that are free from fasting in the matter of both dishes and wine; but on Holy Friday no cooking is to be done at all, but you are to partake of some raw vegetables and fruits, and wine distributed with the larger measure because of your weariness from the vigil. On Holy Saturday all anxiety that produces distraction must be avoided and there should only be a collation, as is customary. In this manner your diet for the great and holy period of Lent must be kept, though care should be shown to the sick at the discretion of the superior.

ELEVENTH CENTURY

Concerning the two short fasts, that of the Holy Apostles and that of Christmas.²⁴

The procedure for the fast of the Holy Apostles will be laid down immediately next. After the completion of the whole canonical office of the hours and the divine liturgy as the synaxarion prescribes in detail,²⁵ you should be summoned to the refectory at the seventh hour in accordance with the rule laid down above, and there you should eat two dishes cooked with olive oil and drink wine of the larger measure. Also supper should be set out for you consisting of a small piece of bread and the same amount of wine, namely a larger measure, because of the heat and dryness of the season. However we will not eat fish provided by the monastery; but if some were to come as a refreshment, then we should partake of it gratefully, for it is not right to forbid this during these two lesser fasts.

The fast of the Holy Nativity will be similar to that of the Holy Apostles in both food and drink, after the completion [p. 45] of course of the whole canonical office according to the synaxarion.²⁶ It will differ from it in these two points only—in not performing the divine liturgy each day during the period of the fast, for the day being short does not provide enough time, and in eating once. For your food should be set out for you at the ninth hour during the period of a fast, as has been said; and it will always be a fast when “God is the Lord” (Ps. 117 [118]: 27) is not sung at matins but “Alleluia.” So these rules should be kept in this way.

11. Concerning the way that the feasts of Our Lord and those of the most holy Mother of God must be celebrated.

All the divine feasts of Our Lord and those of our Lady and benefactress, the most holy Mother of God, should be celebrated by you differently from the rest, in the singing of psalms I mean, in the lighting of lamps, and in your own meals. The feast of her holy Metastasis, which we in fact call her Dormition, should be celebrated by you in a splendid and sumptuous manner, for it will be the feast of feasts and the festival of festivals. During this feast we order a distribution to be made at the gate of as much as we are able, and may your hand be generous. Now that we have discussed these matters sufficiently, we will, as is necessary, mention the others.

12. Concerning the fact that the monastery is to be independent and under its own control.

We instruct all in the name of our Lord God the Ruler of All that this holy monastery is to be independent, free of everyone’s control, and self-governing, and not subject to any rights, be they imperial or ecclesiastic or of a private person, but it should be watched over, steered, governed, and directed only by the Mother of God Evergetis who is worthy of all praise, by the prayer of our most blessed and holy father, and by the one acting as superior in it, and furthermore in accordance with the chrysobulls of the emperors now dead,²⁷ by which its independence and freedom from all control is most strongly confirmed for you, and through which you will have an independence undisturbed, completely steadfast, and unshaken.

If anyone ever at any time and in any way wishes to gain control over this monastery or put it in subjection or place it under someone’s power, whether he be an emperor or a patriarch or some other member of the clergy or of the senate or even the superior of this monastery himself or its steward or simply one of its brothers prompted by an attack of the devil, not only will he be held responsible for the divine body and blood of Our Lord God and Savior Jesus Christ and to the Mother of God [p. 47] our Lady Evergetis, but also “Let him be accursed” (Gal. 1:8), as the holy apostle says, and let him inherit the curse of the three hundred and eighteen Holy Fathers and become joint-heir with the traitor Judas and be counted with those who shouted “away with him, away with him, crucify him” (John 19:15), and “his blood be on us and on our children” (Matt. 27:25), because this wretched person has treated wretchedly something which was once a farm and was turned into a monastery with much sweat and toil and set up to be free by those very people who established it, placing it with malicious and deceitful intent, perhaps under the power of corrupt and wicked men who look to nothing else but pernicious gain.

22. EVERGETIS

Not only this but that thrice-wretched, thrice-accursed one, whoever he might be, has trampled underfoot and counted as nothing the crosses of the emperors of everlasting memory which they with pious intent inscribed upon their chrysobulls when granting independence to the monastery. Will he not be called to account, no matter what his subsequent conduct may be? So then those should be the principles established in this way.

13. Concerning the installation of the superior and the steward, and the fact that the superior is not allowed to go to the city or anywhere else far away so as to sleep outside the monastery except for the three reasons listed here.

It will be useful now to mention the installation of officials, of which the most important will always be the most important, I mean that of the superior, but on this matter I must make a small plea for your charity. In the name of My Lord, brothers, I decided previously that there should be two superiors, one a recluse, the other unconfined, and that when the recluse one dies, the unconfined one should enter the hermitage and another person should be appointed by you as the unconfined one in place of him who is now the recluse one, and in order to bring this about I myself made a start as indeed you yourselves also know. But knowing that good depends on the choice made by each one, I thought that force should not be brought to bear on my successors, for it is an obvious use of force that the unconfined superior should go by command into the hermitage against his will after the death of the recluse one, and it is a very harsh yoke to bear. Furthermore, when the matter is considered, it has been found that it is not beneficial to the community in general. For these reasons, therefore, though envisaging something better, as I think, I have decided that there should be one superior after my death.

So there should be one superior, a recluse, if he wishes to be so, for that should not be totally set aside, but if he does not wish it, unconfined, [p. 49] living the whole time with you without any separation. For he will not be allowed to go to the city or a great distance anywhere else, neither to visit a relative, nor a friend, nor any of his relations, nor an official, nor any other person whatsoever whether sick or dying or for any other reason, whether reasonable, unreasonable or even the most pressing, but his excursions will be both in the area surrounding the monastery and in our estates close to it, returning from these quickly lest he should be caught sleeping somewhere outside the monastery. He will leave it if an emperor or patriarch happens to summon him or if some enemies make a raid, when all of us are forced to leave. For these reasons only will he be free to go to the city, since visits to the aforementioned estates act as a relief from akedia. For our instruction to him in the name of the Lord God Ruler of All will be laid upon him as an indissoluble bond and be thought of as an unscalable wall (cf. Ps. 18:29), as the divine David says, and as a door that will be barred against him to prevent him going from here to the city and sleeping anywhere else. If he should ever transgress this instruction, treating it as of no account, he will be excommunicated. These provisions are so that the superior should never go out of the monastery, and now I must set down in writing how he should be appointed.

ELEVENTH CENTURY

After I have completed this mortal life, the one who is left by me as superior should consult with a few of you, those, that is, who always surpass the others in their conduct, manners, intellect, character, discipline, and their spiritual state and way of life, and he should choose the one who surpasses everyone in all these points and install him as steward; and he should install him in the following way.

After the dismissal from matins and the customary prayer said by the priest, a trisagion should be said by all and the one chosen should make three full genuflections in front of and near the holy sanctuary; then he should reverently kiss the holy, divine, and revered icons of our Lord Jesus Christ and of the most holy Mother of God and universal Benefactress. After that he should perform the proper obeisance to the superior and then offer him his head bowed and uncovered and he, making over it the sign of the venerable cross, should reverently say as follows: “The intercession of my most holy Mother of God through the prayers of the Holy Fathers is installing you steward of the monastery.” Then when he has given him the kiss in the name of the Lord, he is to set him in his appropriate place. Next all without exception are to kiss him, and after the kiss glory should be given to God and the dismissal should follow the usual prayer of the priest. [p. 51]

If this steward carries out his office faultlessly, proving to be reliable in the sight of God and you, and being judged by you as fitting for the office of superior, should the superior know in advance of his own departure from here to the Lord, he should appoint him to leadership over you, since his faultless actions as steward have already been enough to act as a test and selection and, as has been mentioned before, his mode of life has been spiritual in every way. But if the superior should die without knowing in advance, then you, that is those who are preeminent and the most devout, should place this typikon on the holy table and rest also the staff against it and when the one selected has entered the holy sanctuary, after the prescribed trisagion and these troparia: “Have mercy on us, have mercy, O Lord,” “Lord, Lord, turn to us from heaven and behold and visit” (Ps. 79 [80]:14), “Glory both,” “Thou, the only begotten Son, of the same substance with Thy Father and the Spirit,” and thirty repetitions of “Kyrie eleison” and, after he has made three full genuflections before the holy table, you should invite him to take from it the typikon and the staff while all repeat “He is worthy.” You should invite him to go out and stand in his appropriate place and be kissed by everyone and become your next superior appointed by God. Then again he and you should select the one who surpasses you all in virtue, and install him as steward in accordance with the regulation stated above. So much for those matters.

What follows I did not wish to commit to writing. For it should not be necessary to remove from his position and rank someone who has previously been selected for it. This would be a pleasing and agreeable state of affairs if in fact we remained unchanged and completely unmoved in our adherence to what is good, but that is impossible, for we often change and alter, such is human nature, and when we are thought worthy of honor we grow weaker with regard to the performance of good deeds, whether it is through giving way to laziness, as in most cases, since authority has a habit of weakening those who have been elevated to it whereas they ought to demonstrate a greater struggle and diligence, or because we feign virtue at the start through the desire for authority and the success it brings, and then when we have gained it we are immediately found to be still exactly what we were, like octopuses which when pursued by bigger fish take a tight hold of the rocks nearby and simply pretend that they are a rock, but whenever they escape the danger, they are recognizable as octopuses again, which in fact they were. For these reasons the matter must be committed to writing and punishment given as strongly as possible. [p. 53]

22. EVERGETIS

14. Concerning the reasons laid down by the founder for the steward to be removed and another worthy person installed.

So if the steward should continue unchanged, properly maintaining his virtue through which he was thought worthy of that rank, he will not be removed from his office but remain firm. Furthermore he will rise to the office of superior since he is worthy of it. But if time proves him to be unqualified and unsuitable, either because he has carried out his office in a careless and indifferent manner or because he has been doing favors for his relatives or has been appropriating some of the monastery's property or has shown himself to be a troublemaker and a dissident contradicting the reasonable regulations of the superior, or has been betraying or subjecting the monastery's property to anyone's control, or has been totally disregarding any of the [instructions] in the rule and following his own wishes or clearly been involved in bodily passions or has become unreasonably attached to someone in preference to the rest of the community and therefore has been proved as unsuitable for the guiding of souls, then another person should be found, someone who abounds in all goodness and is superior to him in virtue and is unimpeachable. He will be preferred to the other in every way and will be promoted to the office of steward and even that of superior. The other will be removed and made subordinate again.

That applies then while the superior is alive and is peacefully guiding your devotion. But should the superior suddenly die and has not removed this bad steward, if there is someone who surpasses him in good qualities and is pleasing to you preeminent ones, whom we have told the superior to use as advisers, and if you agree on him and are all unanimous, then he should be selected by you and immediately raised to the office of superior, and with him you should take thought about another, better steward.

But if, something I pray God does not allow, you yourselves resort to strife and discord, the bad steward himself will become your superior to avoid uproar and dissension. For when two evils lie before us then the less bad one is preferable, and it is better for you to be exposed to a little danger during the leadership of this worthless man, than to be rendered completely useless by resorting to discord and quarreling or even the remembering of injuries. For if you are living in peace and preserving good order, it is impossible that even a little harm should come to you from the leadership of this worthless man. But if you indulge in discord and quarreling, every evil will follow.

But so that he too, when he has satisfied his wish by seizing authority, may not become careless and remain completely incorrigible and totally incurable, we must not overlook the following either. If he should ever take stock of himself and give up his evil ways that were clear to all, [p. 55] and embark on the road that leads to higher things and salvation, let him stay and be your superior even if he is not completely satisfactory. But should this same man still not give up his evil ways but in fact indulge in them more widely, if you were unanimously agreed on one man, someone clearly better, then we instruct you to remove that worthless man from leadership over you and raise the one you have selected to the position of superior.

ELEVENTH CENTURY

The one removed from office may, if he wishes, reside in a cell of the monastery and be accorded the rank and seat of second to the superior, in the refectory I mean, and at the other gatherings, being content with the food and drink and all the rest of the community's way of life. However we do not allow him to leave the monastery and following his own inclinations go where he wishes, but this matter will be for the superior to consider.

Well then, I entreat you, my beloved children in the Lord, I entreat you or rather I instruct you and I call on God as witness of my instruction and overseer of its carrying out, that when you are examining and selecting the superiors and stewards, for my instruction again is addressed to you who are chosen for this task, there should be no strife, there should be no jealousy, there should be no pointless partiality and irrational favoritism, but correct judgment, an accurate aim, and the strict yardstick of justice and truth should come together as if he was observing you, he the eye "that beholdeth all things" (Sir. 15:19) and "searcheth hearts and reins" (Ps. 7:9). Your selecting and examining should take place in that way. For if suffering from some human failing you were to produce a faulty judgment, consider how far the evil would spread and calculate how many harmful effects would follow; and if "the righteous" (II Tim. 4:8) and unerring judge were to require from you a just account for them, I do not know what defense you would make to secure your escape from condemnation, you who have, alas, with evil and ruinous judgment selected the unworthy person and brought such great harm not only on him but also on yourselves and all the others who are with you, seeing that you have secured perdition for him, yourselves, and the others. So then you will not resort to quarreling and dissension in your selection, but you should choose the selected person with unanimity and agreement. Of course if you intend to select the chosen person while the superior is still alive and you come to a single agreed wish, the superior will not oppose you, but rather will follow your agreed decision and joint wish and appoint the man selected by you. But if, something I pray does not happen, on the contrary your opinions are split and [p. 57] you are divided, he will propose whichever person he chooses taking no account of you.

15. Concerning the brothers making their confession to the superior and that none of them should have another spiritual father, and that they should confide their own thoughts to him.

I plainly instruct you all, my brothers, that as soon as your superior has been appointed you hurry to confide to him all the stirrings of your souls and confess the thoughts that harm your souls, so that he may form an idea of the quality of your attitude and relationship with him. By thoughts we mean not those that have been confessed to preceding superiors but those that trouble you day by day and hour by hour. For it is not possible, no, it is not possible that you being human should not think something wicked at some time. Do not put off something that is good, a thing you should not do, but run to it with all eagerness and speed, so that you all may be "one" (John 17:21), "being of the same mind" (Phil. 2:2), thinking the same thing, shepherded and guided by one and the same shepherd, attached and bound to one another like a chain of gold, and "fitted together into one body" (Eph. 4:16) under one head, as the holy apostle says, with the Spirit as the master builder.

22. EVERGETIS

But if there should be someone who is obdurate and implacable, stubborn and obstinate, who follows his own will and does not wish to make confession to his superior but would acknowledge someone else and not this man as his spiritual father and would endeavor to confide his thoughts to him, he should be put out far away from our flock. He should be chased out at once, receiving neither mercy nor pity but as someone who removes himself by his own evil—O eyes of “God that behold all things” (Sir. 15:19)—evil and very dangerous decisions, he should be utterly rejected from the monastery and removed and counted a stranger to our group and community, our way of life and fellowship, as being the cause of dissension and discord and all other kinds of instability, disorder, and serious harm. That man should be treated thus.

16. An exhortation to the brothers concerning honor, reverence, and obedience for the superior.

You, that I may turn my attention on you again, should reserve, I beg you, for your superior all honor, all affection, all reverence, all [p. 59] unwavering submission, and all obedience as has been said by one of the Divine Fathers. For he says, “For if those caring for you are going to render account on your behalf, how will we not be submissive to them in everything, obey them, and serve them as the other parts of the body do the head.”²⁸ The divine and great apostle Paul speaks as follows in his letter to the Hebrews: “Obey your leaders and submit to them; for they are keeping watch over your souls, as men who will have to give account” (Heb. 13:17).

Also for my sake maintain love, peace, and harmony in your dealings with one another, burn with a tender affection for one another, supporting one another, “instructing, comforting, and forbearing one another, stirring up one another to love and good works”²⁹ and, to put it simply, exerting yourselves strongly to achieve whatever is good, praiseworthy, virtuous or brings salvation. For Our Lord Jesus Christ says, “This is my commandment, that you love one another as I have loved you” (John 15:12), and again, “By this all men will know that you are my disciples, if you have love for one another” (John 13:35). Do you see whose disciples we will be by keeping these words? Do you see what glory and blessedness and exultation we are going to get by being disciples of the Master who loves mankind? So then, let us take his commands to heart with all zeal and power and enthusiasm.

17. An exhortation to the superior.

You, spiritual father and guide of this holy flock, be moderate with the brothers, and in your concern maintain in everything a fatherly affection for them. Yes, I entreat you, care for them all, have concern for them all, forbear with them all, support them, instructing, advising, teaching, comforting, healing the sick, supporting the weak, encouraging the faint-hearted, restoring those who sin, forgiving “seventy times seven” (Matt. 18:22) in accordance with the word of Our Lord. For it is better that we, who are imitating the Lord himself, be judged considerate [even though] a little remiss in what we ought to do, than by maintaining utmost righteousness we be condemned as heartless and haters of our brothers. Also, to omit the rest, St. Basil says “And the superior himself, as a father caring for true children, will watch over the needs of each one and will bring them suitable healing and care as far as he can, and will support with love and fatherly affection the member who is truly weak whether [p. 61] spiritually or physically.”³⁰

If you always live like that, there will be no one who will usurp unworthily the office of superior or steward, making a display perhaps of his seniority or his sphere of work or his noble birth or rank or his offering of property or money, but that man should be preferred in these offices who has been selected by all of you who have been chosen to consider and advise the superior, and by the superior himself, even if he has been recently tonsured, or is unlearned and without experience in worldly things. For not one bit of harm will come to the monastery through this. For “God is able from these stones to raise up children to Abraham” (Matt. 3:9) and to give wisdom to the blind and to supply reason to those without reason, he who takes more pleasure in these people than in those who glory in their own wisdom and power and wealth and nobility. As a witness of this the truly divine and great apostle St. Paul clearly expresses it in the following words, “God chose what is foolish in the world and weak and despised to shame the wise and strong and lofty, and things which are not to bring to nothing things that are” (I Cor. 1:27–28).

Those are the instructions concerning the appointment of superiors and stewards, but I will add to what has been said another small bit which is both very useful and very necessary.

18. Concerning the fact that the brothers will not question their superiors for what purposes they receive and pay out money, but the superiors themselves will not spend the wealth of the monastery in doing favors for their relations and friends.

The brothers will not question their superiors, nor yet will they ever demand from them an account of the things for which they take in and pay out money. For this is unworthy and harmful, breeding a great deal of mistrust and producing discord, instability, and every other cause for sin. But neither will the superiors themselves spend the wealth of the monastery in doing favors for their own relations and friends. For by acting in that way they will not be taking part in the divine mysteries “in the Holy Spirit” (Rom. 9:1). For if we have judged that they should not be subject to the brothers in an examination of their actions, yet they will not really escape the unerring judge and the reproof of their conscience. Therefore they should take care not “to fall into the hands of the living God” (Heb. 10:31). For even though we are not capable of imposing on them a penalty appropriate for making unjustifiable and [p. 63] unnecessary payments and bringing about changes in the affairs and property of the monastery, yet they will not escape the fearful judgment of God, which we confer upon them in writing this. But if they are seen to be so fearless and utterly shameless that they do not even fear the condemnation of God, but spend the wealth of the monastery improperly, they will be excommunicated until they refrain from such action. It is most necessary that these things be added to what has already been said.

19. Concerning the inalienability of the sacred objects, holy icons, and immovable property, except for the reasons listed here.

We wish the sacred vessels and liturgical cloths, the holy icons and books acquired by us to be inalienable—for it is unnecessary to speak about the immovable property—and not only inalienable but also completely safe from removal and theft by anyone at all, because they were acquired with much toil and labor and were dedicated as offerings to our Lady and Mistress the most holy Mother of God Evergetis, and the man who hands over any of these or removes them for any reason whatsoever will be liable to the charge of sacrilege and will be subject to the penalties laid down by law for this. For neither we nor any other sensible person could define any reasonable excuse for removing these objects or handing them over, except a calamity resulting from a chance occurrence, perhaps one arising from a fire or a raid by some enemies who have perhaps burnt down the monastery or destroyed it to the foundations or even a destruction caused by an earthquake, and then because a great deal of expense is needed to save it or even to rebuild it. For then they will be removed or handed over with good reason. They will be removed if perhaps there is not sufficient money to save what should be saved. This is not all, but it should not be done secretly or by one man and without reference to anyone, but openly and publicly when the superior, the steward, the ecclesiarch, and the other preeminent officials have gathered together for this purpose, and the removal of what is necessary should be done in the presence of all these people, with the inventory set in the middle of them and each of the removals signed by the superior. Furthermore we instruct that there should be a detailed list to indicate the things that have been removed, signed by all those who gathered together and clearly setting out both the types of things removed and the reason for which they were removed; this should be deposited in the sacristy to inform posterity. What more?

22. EVERGETIS

20. Concerning the need for the treasurer to record accurately the income and expenditure of nomismata for the information of all.

We instruct the person who looks after the income and expenditure of the monastery [p. 65] to record everything in detail, in the case of the income from where it came and when, and in the case of the expenditure the reason for it and on what project, if he intends to avoid reproach to himself and to inform everyone. This matter has been mentioned in as fitting a manner as was possible; now our document should move on to other matters and we should speak about them also as well as we can.

21. Concerning those who chatter and talk idly that they be admonished by the superior.

If any of your number should gather on some manual task or other service and amuse themselves with idle conversations—for this is usual at gatherings—and then turn to vain chattering—for “by a multitude of words,” he says, “thou shalt not escape sin” (Prov. 10:19)—they should not reject the admonition of the superior. For we instruct him to do this in love and persuade them to give up topics which harm the soul, and either discuss matters from Holy Scripture that help the soul or be silent. “For,” the author of the Book of Proverbs says, “if thou refrain thy lips, thou wilt be prudent” (Prov. 10:19) and discreet.

Also those who happen to be on a journey and are afflicted in the same way should be cured by the same method; for these people especially must take care to guard their mind at that time, knowing how easy it is of course for the adversary [the devil] to attack them and make them fall, which I pray may not happen, seeing that they are separated from their sheepfold, flock, and shepherd. Furthermore they are not to resort to mutual rebuking or verbal sparring. For he who does such a thing will be liable to excommunication, and if he does not repent and beg for forgiveness “with a contrite heart” (Ps. 50 [51]:17) he will be punished—for we prefer that you should always be loving and peaceful towards one another and, instead of something that provokes quarrels, learn to say “Bless and forgive me, brother”—and those who form idle gatherings and visit one another with no good reason, without any pressing cause, or the knowledge of the superior, when they are admonished and do not desist from their evil behavior, they will be punished.

ELEVENTH CENTURY

22. Concerning the fact that they should not have any possessions in contravention of the rule of the monastery, and should not eat or drink in secret, etc.

Those who acquire some possessions contrary to the rule of the monastery, even so much as an obol or a piece of fruit, without the knowledge of the superior, will be liable to punishment. Similar to them is the person who eats and drinks in secret, unless he confesses, and the person who receives messages from friends and relatives, and [p. 67] replies to them. But the person who purloins something from the monastery and does not make amends will be expelled completely.

23. Concerning the fact that there should not be a fixed number of brothers but a sufficient number for the food, and that those in the monastery should be reverent and not undisciplined and disobedient.

This also should be added to what has been said. We do not wish there to be a fixed number of you, but you will be as many as will have enough food, and as many as surpass all the rest in reverence, love, and concord, and obey their superiors “in all patience” (II Cor. 12:12) and lowliness of heart, and are keen to carry out their instructions devoutly are to be preferred. The rest should be sent away even if you have to be reduced to small numbers. For “one person doing the will of the Lord is better than ten thousand transgressors” (cf. Sir. 16:3).

24. Concerning the fact that the brothers are not allowed to have servants.

It will not be possible for you to have servants, but it is very good that there should be two of you in your cells united by the law of spiritual love, being of the same mind and really living together as brothers in harmony, bearing the same yoke of Our Lord wholeheartedly, being subservient to one another in peace, proper care and reverence so that you will have the opportunity to fulfill the word of David, “See now! what is so good, or what so pleasant, as for brethren to dwell together?” (Ps. 132 [133]:1). But in this matter also, it is necessary to make specific distinctions, namely, that the novice should defer to the one who is more advanced, the more unlearned to the more educated, the more uncouth to the more sophisticated, and the younger to the older. But if the superior should decide that some should be alone in their cells, he himself may sanction the arrangement.

25. Concerning the fact that garments should be bought in advance and deposited in the storehouse.

We prescribe that garments be bought and deposited in the storehouse so that when you need them you may receive them; and it is good to take care of your old garments as much as you can and use them. For only a use that is necessary should be sought, and a surplus should be hated as being of the devil. We give the same instruction also in the case of cloaks and [p. 69] vests and shoes, and in short, all necessities. So whenever anyone has a pressing need to receive a new item of these articles, he must bring the old one of course to the storehouse and hand this over and receive another one with the knowledge of the superior. For otherwise, if you do not bring the old garments, we order that you be not given any.

26. Concerning the fact that everyone should have the same food and drink and clothing, apart from those who are clearly ill.

22. EVERGETIS

In addition to these we give you this instruction before God and our Lady herself Mother of God Evergetis, that you should all have the same food and drink, clothing and footwear, and that there should never be any difference in these things among you. But you will all use the same—I mean the superior, the steward, the ecclesiarch, those who are distinguished in age and virtue and in their exalted station in life, and those who are inferior to them in these matters. For you should only help and take care in every way of those who are clearly afflicted with illness, and for this reason perhaps need better food and drink to sustain their unfortunate bodies. For I think that this shows discernment and preserves the conscience of everyone else free of offense.

27. Concerning the fact that the superior should visit the cells of the brothers each month, and if he finds anything more than is necessary for them, he is to take it.

The superior must do this also, that is he should enter your cells once a month whenever he wishes, and if any have extra items, he should take them away and deposit them in the storehouse or give them to those in need.

28. Concerning the fact that there should be a bath for the sick and it should be heated, but it should only be heated three times a year for the brothers who are healthy.

You should live completely without bathing. For although we have built a bath in the monastery, yet it was not that you should live in an effeminate way, bathing and being in good physical condition, but that the sick could be comforted, if necessary. However we give permission for those who are healthy to have a bath three times during the year, at the feast of the Holy Nativity, at Holy Easter, and thirdly at the feast of the bodily Metastasis from this world of our most holy Lady Mother of God; but extra bathing, if necessary, should be permitted at the discretion of the superior. [p. 71] So these instructions are enough for your virtue, but lest you wrangle about the other matters, I must deal with them also.

29. Concerning the installation of officials, that it should take place in the manner of the steward's installation.³¹

The installation of officials must take place in the manner of the steward's installation,³² that is, the keys should be placed before Christ or the Mother of God, and after a trisagion, the one who is being installed after the three required genuflections should take the keys from there with his own hands, then bow his head to the superior, and receive from him the blessing mentioned above. However for the installations which do not involve keys, the kissing of the divine icon and the sphragis of the superior will be sufficient for the installation.

30. Concerning the fact that there should be a sacristan in the monastery and a treasurer for money and a treasurer for linen.

It is fitting therefore that there should be three treasurers, of whom one should look after the sacred vessels and cloths and in short anything that is important, and he should be called the sacristan, the second should keep the money of the monastery, and the other one should distribute to the brothers necessities from the storehouse, I mean clothing and footwear and so forth, and see to the comfort of visiting brothers in their bedrooms as far as he is able. The common table of course will minister to their need for food to meet the occasion and the person.

ELEVENTH CENTURY

31. Concerning the fact that there should be a disciplinary official and a refectorian.

It is necessary that there should be a disciplinary official observing the brothers both as they enter the church for the singing of psalms and as they gather for meals, and in the same way at every hour advising and correcting in a brotherly way any who sit down together without good reason or chatter idly or do nothing or do something improper and foolish, persuading them to go to their cells and devote themselves to prayer and handiwork.

Furthermore there should also be a refectorian, attending to whatever the cellarer supplies him with, and going round the refectory at meal times reminding those brothers who are noisy perhaps or are whispering of the need for silence and that each of them should be reciting the fiftieth psalm in his mind. Also he should question visitors and sit them down at the table in a fitting position, and he should observe the entry of the brothers into the refectory and note which of them [p. 73] was absent during grace and which during the meal and report these to the superior. For if he does not do this, he will be punished as one who is not carrying out his office wholeheartedly.

32. Concerning the fact that those who carry out their offices devoutly and with care should be left unchanged, but those who perform them in a deceitful and careless manner should be removed and others appointed, and the founder's curse rests on those who appropriate anything as a result of their offices.

Naturally it is just to leave unchanged those who have been appointed to each of the offices while they are performing them in a careful and devout manner, but those who neglect or despise them and perhaps even behave deceitfully in them should be removed and others appointed. If one of these people were to appropriate something, anything at all, he will be answerable to our Lord Jesus Christ and his all-pure Mother, everyone's benefactress, from whom in fact he received his keys, promising to carry out his office eagerly and without deceit.

33. An exhortation to all those with offices both inside and outside the monastery.

So I entreat the cellarers, the bakers, the cooks, those who look after the mules, those responsible for the dependencies, those acting as stewards in the monastery's properties, those sent to the City [of Constantinople], those going away elsewhere on the instruction of the superiors, and in short all those carrying out offices, to apply themselves to their offices wholeheartedly since they expect no small recompense from them. As regards those among them who are unlettered, the diligence and care they show in their office will be totally sufficient as their defense before God and us, but we exhort those who are educated but are perhaps prevented by the busy nature of their office from carrying out the daily cycle of prayers and from meeting with the brothers in the services not to be neglectful or despairing, as if they had lost the benefit to themselves, but be more cheerful and joyful because the Lord has given them the strength to serve their brothers in imitation of him, who says, "I came not to be served but to serve and to give my life as a ransom for many" (Matt. 20:28).

You see, my brothers, what work you perform, you see whom you imitate. You see that you are putting into practice the greatest of all good, love. Why then [p. 75] do you grieve and are sorrowful when you miss the service? Do you not think that "you are laying down your lives" for many (cf. John 10:11; 15), like my Master, Christ, so that of course you may bring comfort to your brothers? So, you should be happy and rejoice because you yourselves are accomplishing each day by your work what could scarcely be achieved by those who devote themselves to prayer. You are blessed in that occupation and to be envied. For prayer is indeed a fine thing, a very fine thing, bringing us into contact with God and raising us from earth to heaven, but love is of course greater and much more important. For the former is a part of virtue and an element and section of the whole body of sanctification that brings perfection, but love is its crown and consummation. For joined to itself it displays humility that exalts (cf. Matt. 23:12), mercy, and love of mankind, because of which God indeed became man and is called God, and through which man is revealed as God and like “the Heavenly Father” (Matt. 5:48).

22. EVERGETIS

So why do you give up the treasure-house and culmination of all these good things and run to what is inferior and to the possession of one thing, when thus having reached the summit easily you should hold on to it securely and do everything so as not to be thrown down from it? “We are afraid,” they say, “because of our failure to carry out the rule”; but do not be afraid, for sincere confession will make up to you failure in this, justly granting you pardon. Only let it not be a failure caused by indolence. Fear this, be on your guard against this; but if this is not the case, then rejoice, I beg you, attending to your offices eagerly. Those with offices who have been sufficiently advised by this will be devoted to their office and will carry it out well. But I will add to my discourse that matter which has almost slipped by me.

34. Concerning the sort of people that should be sent out as superintendents in the properties.

Since then as a consequence of our weakness we have gained possession of some small pieces of immovable property, the superior must have concern for them also, and he should be as careful as he can as to what sort of people are sent to have the oversight of them, that is, they should always be reverent and discreet, and elderly if possible, unaffected by passions because of the attacks of Belial (II Cor. 6:15). Since we have now dealt in a fitting manner and at sufficient length about matters that concern the monastery, we will discuss therefore our fathers and brothers who have died. [p. 77]

35. Concerning the holy remembrance of our holy father lord Paul, the first founder.

It is fitting that you should celebrate with a feast the remembrance of our thrice-blessed and glorious father and founder lord Paul in a splendid manner and with the chanting of psalms all night; this falls on the sixteenth of April. When, as often, it occurs within Holy Week and on the days of Easter Week, the celebration will always take place on a non-feast day during the week after Easter Week. But if it should fall on an ordinary day outside these days, then it will of course be celebrated without delay on that very day on which it falls, unless it is a Sunday.

36. Concerning the commemorations for the fathers and brothers who have died and for those who have done something worthy of remembrance for the monastery, and concerning the distribution on their behalf at the gate.

Furthermore, commemorations should take place every year for all those who have accomplished for the monastery something worthy of remembrance and have specified that they should be remembered by us, and equally for those brothers whose names were and will be inscribed on the diptychs. In addition, whenever someone has recently died, he should be remembered every day during each service, and I mean during matins and the liturgy and vespers, in ekteneis until his commemoration on the fortieth day, during which also every day an offering will be made on his behalf. In addition to this the ecclesiarch must note down the commemorations of each of those who die so that you may not forget them and may perform them without fail.

ELEVENTH CENTURY

Yet on this matter I must prescribe something more practical: for as the numbers of brothers dying increases, it is possible that sometimes the commemorations for three or four or even more will fall in the same week and those who are going to carry out the commemoration for each brother during the night office are forced always to leave out the canons prescribed for the night offices which are an obligatory duty for you each day, and chant the canon for the deceased. So that this may not happen, we command that, if some of the brothers should prefer to go away and chant the funeral canon, while the rest carry out that laid down for the night office of intercession, that should be carried out and is acceptable to us and, I think, to God. But if perhaps because of winter or even illness, that I may not mention laziness, you would not want to do this, then you must observe all the commemorations that you know occur together in one and the same week, and carry them all out for [p. 79] all of the people at the same time during one night office, unless there is a commemoration for one of your former superiors. For his commemoration must be carried out on its own, since he will be rendering account on behalf of you all. In that way you are satisfying your obligation to commemorate your brothers and you are not failing in the canon. So in both the night offices and in the liturgies on their behalf it is fine that commemorations should take place for them all at the same time during one service as long as offerings are made for each one.

Since a priest specifically to look after burials has been established, let him act as he wishes or rather as he is able. As regards the distributions at the gate on behalf of certain people, for example let me say Promotenos, Kataphloron,³³ and in short everyone at all who has left or will leave something worthy of remembrance to the monastery, and people who have agreed or will agree that something be distributed for their commemoration, as has been said, we urge that these be carried out generously.

However, as regards the diptychs we command in the Lord both the priests themselves and the deacons to consult them at every liturgy in order to commemorate those who are listed on them, so that they themselves may not bear the accusation of having forgotten and neglected them. Enough has now been said also about these matters.

37. Concerning those who are tonsured.

I must speak also about those who are tonsured. If they are distinguished people or of people known to you for a long time and have a close knowledge of our way of life, they should be tonsured within the customary period of time, if perhaps they themselves ask for this and are accepted. But if they are common and unknown, after an interval of seven days after their arrival here they should assume the [novice's] rags and put on the monastic headdress, and they should be appointed to tasks according to their abilities and observed to see if they carry out these with perseverance and humility. If they persevere in this attitude for six whole months, then they should be enrolled among the brothers by being tonsured and should receive the pledge of the divine and angelic habit. But if they perhaps appear to have grown tired, grumbling and being negligent about instructions, it will be the responsibility of the superior whether they should be accepted or not. Furthermore he should consider carefully the monks who come from a different monastery.

22. EVERGETIS

Then those who have been judged worthy to be accepted should not be put under any compulsion concerning a renunciation and an entrance offering. For one must not traffic in the grace of God [p. 81] or sell it for money, lest anyone causes shame thereby and inflicts a reproach on those among us who have been tonsured without payment, and lest that evil and accursed expression is introduced, that is, “mine and yours” and greater and smaller, and that the one who has made an offering is thought to be more important than the one who has not.³⁴ May it not happen, may that not happen among us ever. But if the one who is to be tonsured himself willingly chooses to offer something, it should be accepted. For that is freely chosen and not forced, being the action of a pious mind in the category of almsgiving and doing good, and in exchange for God’s recompense is to atone for his sins, and moreover that we might speak the truth, is brought as an offering to God and his all-pure Mother the Evergetis. For a renunciation and an entrance offering are one thing and a gift another, whether an act of almsgiving or an offering; for the former has within it the repayment of expectation and, like some necessity that has to be bought, is paid in advance for some agreements and exchanges perhaps stated, but the other is offered freely with heavenly hopes and recompenses.

Therefore the person who offers must not suppose that he has any preference over the rest of the brothers because of this, but should be treated in the same way as everyone and according to the rule of the monastery then in force. If someone who has made an offering is ever tempted by demons—there are many such examples of fickleness—and tries to leave the monastery and would like to take his offering away with him, that should not be given him, whatever it happens to be. For what has once been consecrated to God must not be taken away, and he who takes it away is sacrilegious and everyone knows the sort of punishment that committing sacrilege brings, even if we do not say it. That deals with that matter.

38. Concerning the daily distribution at the gate and the reception of strangers and sick people in the hospice.

You must observe closely what we will say since it will bestow on you much benefit and salvation. What is this? It is the distribution at the gate and the comforting and visiting of strangers and the sick for whom we built the hospice, begging the site from some devout Christian on the understanding that we would guarantee to comfort stranger brothers and provide whatever care we could to those among them that are sick and confined to bed, to clothe and give footwear to those who are naked and unshod using your old tunics and footwear, distributed not by you yourselves—for we do not permit that—but by the superior, to feed the hungry and refresh them, as we said, with the bread and wine already specified and some legumes, those that [p. 83] are excess to your needs—for these should have come from your lack, but since this is not possible, let them come from your excess, for what a person can do is dear to God—and to bury those who die in the strangers’ burial-place built for them, lest gaining the less important things from you they should unwittingly be neglected in something greater and more important, and not to bury them simply nor in any haphazard fashion, but first the burial chants are to be sung by you and they should receive the other care, to put it simply, to show our stranger brothers complete joyfulness so that we may receive from God joyful and abundant mercy on their behalf.

ELEVENTH CENTURY

For we do not wish anyone to return from our gate empty-handed, except a woman. For they should not receive a share, “not that we hate our fellow human beings, certainly not,”³⁵ but we fear harm from that quarter, in case if a habit was generally accepted they would visit the gate more frequently and would be found to be the cause of evil rather than good to those ministering. If however there is a general distribution, as at the feast of the Dormition of our most-holy Lady the Mother of God and at different commemorations of the dead, giving also to women should not be prevented. For this occurs rarely and does not cause us any harm.

39. Concerning the fact that the monastery is not to be entered by women except eminent and noble ones.

We wished and desired the monastery not to be entered and to be completely impassable to women, but the nobility of many and the fact that it was not possible to send them away easily prevented us giving this order. Therefore, as many as are well-known for their way of life and virtue, their nobility and eminence, may come in but very rarely and carefully and, if possible, unexpectedly, so that in that way we may be able to preserve our respect for them and maintain freedom from harm for ourselves.

Regarding other offices, which the other monasteries usually have, I wish people to be appointed to them in the monastery as the occasion demands and if there is urgent need; for then they [the offices] will be beneficial and be connected to the maintenance of the monastery.³⁶

40. An exhortation from the founder to everyone, namely the superior, the steward and the brothers, to keep unbroken all the regulations in this his typikon.

I beseech you all, my brothers and beloved children in the Lord, [p. 85] to keep unbroken and unchanged my wishes couched in all the regulations set down for you above by me your sinful father, and my desire, advice, and instruction which is for your benefit, the salvation of your souls, the safety and comfort of all, and, to mention it, an adornment and cause for boasting (cf. Phil. 2:16) for my soul in the presence of the Lord. For it is for this reason that we set out clearly and openly and were careful in this typikon to remove also every source of scandal as far as is possible for us, lest after our death Satan, the enemy of our souls, might find a chance, which I pray does not happen, O my Mistress and Lady Evergetis worthy of all praise, to dislodge you from the correct attitude and set up his own siege engine and overthrow what has been well established with much sweat and toil and with God’s help and built up into this beauty which is now visible.

For, after so much steadfastness and as close a conformity as is possible on our part, I know that one day a source of evil will arise to bring evil and pretexts and suggestions for crooked and perverse dealings on the part of the wicked and perverse wild beast, but you, almost all of you, being illuminated by the grace of Christ and from your constant reading of the divine scriptures and instruction being well aware of his craftiness and how you ought to repel it, as a result of experience itself and the things by which you yourselves have been tested and proved, resist evil firmly, having the great and unbreakable assistance of God through the fervent intercessions of our most pure and holy Mistress and Lady the Mother of God and through the prayers of our holy father of blessed memory and, I will add, the prayer of my sinful self.

22. EVERGETIS

The one who does not know his obligations should be taught and instructed in a brotherly way by the one who has a good knowledge of this, and again he who is uneducated and lacking in understanding should be rebuked by the person with more understanding, and thus you, being supported the one by the other in the Holy Spirit and love (cf. Rom. 9:1; Eph. 4:16), united as if in a military company and taught what is good and spiritual and brings salvation, as has been explained, I know well and have confidence in Christ our “true God” (I John 5:20) and his most holy mother the Mother of God, our protectress and defender, that you will always be kept free from harm. The enemy thus finding you armed and fortified will be put to shame and convicted of gaping in vain and to no purpose, and unsuccessful will be cast away far from you. But you will be kept safe, and be glorified, and will live in peace, and for your beneficence and devout way of life you will become the envy of all throughout all [p. 87] the days of your life. When I have mentioned one more matter, I will finish my discourse.

41. Concerning the infirmary and the sick.

Seeing that I have already spoken a few things before about our sick brothers, assigning all their care to the discretion of the superior, I must discuss them at greater length. Therefore we order that a cell be set aside for the sick as an infirmary, and eight beds for their rest and comfort, and two orderlies to minister to them in every way, and a large stove on which their food should be cooked and the other things for their comfort should be heated, and their care should not be carried out in a perfunctory manner but as well as possible with regard to food and drink and other necessities.

The doctor, if there is one, should call at the infirmary neither rarely nor as an extra, but should visit the brothers every day and in a wholehearted manner and bring the things that each one needs. But our sick brothers emboldened by this should not cast off self-restraint by seeking for extra things and things which perhaps they have never even heard of, much less seen and eaten, but they should restrain and control themselves, being satisfied only with those things which the circumstance of the season and the resources of the monastery provide for them. For if we command that they be cared for because of the [divine] commandment, yet we do not allow them to give themselves airs, but live in a more restrained manner, and as monks ought, so that they may receive from God the reward of their endurance, which the deprivation of their desires and the unpleasantness of their sickness is going to secure for them.

42. A further exhortation from the founder.

So then these are our wishes and are acceptable to God and the Evergetis, and they are greatly beneficial for your help; in the future it will be your concern to maintain them unbroken and unchanged always. By this I mean, to carry out completely in all the services the canonical procedure handed on to you, to preserve loyalty and honor which is due to your superiors, to love one another, to be keen each of you to surpass each other in humility, to labor with one another in everything as the limbs of one body and “to complete what is lacking” (Col. 1:24) in one another, not to stir up quarrels nor form improper friendships or cause schisms and breakaway services, [p. 89] to refrain from claiming the seat of honor and worldly preferments, but look to one thing only, that is to live and conduct yourselves virtuously and breathe in nothing else, if possible, than the word of salvation and everything that is for the edification and benefit of your soul, furthermore to banish from you the source of all evils, I mean the love of money and the love of power, and the filching and secret acquisition of the monastery's possessions or in any other way at all to set aside and store up anything whatsoever which the superior has not approved nor the rule given to you has allowed, not only that but as a result of carelessness or some other act of disregard to allow something belonging to the monastery to disappear. For that is the same as the former case, even if it seems to be somewhat different, and brings the same liability in the presence of God. You must root out familiarity as much as possible and, that I may be brief, banish everything that does not lead to salvation.

ELEVENTH CENTURY

So, my children and brothers, let us in no way prefer the things that harm, and pass by those that bring salvation; for nothing of what has been handed on to you is impossible or hard to accomplish. But if one of these [instructions] were to be thought of as such, perhaps by some of those who are weaker, yet let us strive, let us persevere, let us endure, let us bear it nobly, let us force ourselves a little. For we did not abandon the world for indulgence and luxury, but for exertion and to strive as much as we could to gain the good things that were promised. Therefore let us force ourselves, let us force ourselves, as has been said; "for the kingdom of heaven has suffered violence, and men of violence take it by force" (Matt. 11:12).³⁷ No one has ever gained a triumph by being careless, no one has triumphed over his enemy by sleeping and dreaming. Crowns and triumphs belong to those who run well, toil, strive, persevere in the labors of battles. "Through many tribulations," the Lord says, "we must enter the kingdom of heaven" (Acts 14:22). So then I beseech you all to "lead a life worthy of your calling" (Eph. 4:1), "present your bodies holy to the Lord" (cf. Rom. 12:1), "love one another" (John 15:12), "run well the race that is set before you" (cf. Heb. 12:1). Whatsoever is good, whatsoever is beloved of God, consider these things (cf. Phil. 4:8). Do not fail to do the things "you have heard and learned" (Phil. 4:9). My brothers, "the appointed time has grown very short" (I Cor. 7:29). Remember your souls and our insignificance, do not forget us in your prayers. [p. 91]

43. Concerning the reading of the typikon at the beginning of each month.

I instruct you to read the present typikon at the beginning of each month during your meal-times, to remind you of your instructions and for the benefit of your souls. For in that way you will be convinced about your own salvation, if you have kept well what you received from your fathers and are paying back to me in the Lord my wages for rearing you with this spiritual upbringing and instruction. "The God of peace who called us to his eternal glory" (Heb. 13:20–21), through his great and unspeakable goodness confirm and strengthen you in his holy will through his only-begotten Son Our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ and the All-holy Life-giving Spirit, to whom belong all glory, honor, worship, and majesty now and always and for ever and ever, Amen. Glory to Thee, our God, glory to Thee.

[Appendix]

Since then the Lord, who always “fulfills the desire of those who fear him” (Ps. 144 [145]:19) by his ineffable decrees, brought it about that the commemoration for our most holy father and first founder lord Paul should coincide with the death of our sanctified father and second founder lord Timothy, who passed away on that very same day that the former went to the Lord, we thought that the commemorations for both of them ought to be carried out jointly on one and the same day, as indeed the latter of them told and commanded us while he was still alive, and that is the sixteenth of April. The synaxarion makes clear how it must be celebrated.³⁸ Therefore we instruct in the Holy Spirit (cf. Rom. 9:1) all who come after us never to separate their annual commemoration for any reason or circumstance whatever, but always to celebrate it jointly in the way that has been prescribed and handed down by us, for as long as this world exists.

In connection with this you must know and observe this also, that our holy father of blessed memory, the monk lord Timothy, with the other things which he compiled in the present typikon also gave this instruction,³⁹ that we are not to use wine at all during the first week of the great and holy fast until the vigil of the holy and great martyr Theodore and to do the same on all the remaining Mondays, Wednesdays, and Fridays of the same holy fast. But since the sick were suffering from the [p. 93] hot drink flavored with cumin, or to put it more clearly, even those who were well were falling sick from it, when the pansebastos sebastos and megas doux, the monk lord Antony,⁴⁰ noticed this, feeling pity for the brothers because of the standing throughout the night and the prolonged chanting and sleeplessness and furthermore the harm that came to them from the cumin-flavored drink, he begged us most fervently “with a contrite heart” (Ps. 50 [51]:17) that the brothers should receive some wine from the Wednesday of the first week and thereafter, I mean on all the remaining Mondays, Wednesdays, and Fridays.

Therefore not wishing to grieve the aforementioned man beloved of God, we have yielded to his entreaty both out of reverence for his virtue and out of pious regard for his action, and on account of the fact that this man has made many other contributions to the monastery and built a vineyard at his own expense outside and yet near to the monastery for this purpose that the brothers could drink wine during the holy great fast, furthermore because he granted us an exemption for twelve of our dependent peasants⁴¹ on our property situated in Boleron and called the property of Theophanes, and similarly for sixteen other dependent peasants also of the class of zeugaratoi on our property situated in Chortokopion and called the property of Epiphanius. For this reason we instruct you to partake of the wine gratefully and to pray unceasingly for the aforementioned man beloved of God, and [not] to consider yourselves guilty⁴² since most people, showing extreme asceticism, abstain even from water; and we order that none of those after us henceforth has the power for whatever reason to curtail this benefit which takes place in memory of the aforementioned person and for the comfort of the whole brotherhood.

“The God of peace who has called us to his eternal glory” (Heb. 13:20–21; I Pet. 5:10) through his great and ineffable goodness confirm and strengthen you in his holy will through his only-begotten Son, Our Lord God and Savior Jesus Christ and the All-holy and life-giving Spirit, to whom belong all glory, honor, worship, and majesty both now and always and for ever and ever. Amen.

ELEVENTH CENTURY

Pleasant is the harbor to those who sail and the end of the book again to those who write; for both bring [them] rest from [their] labors.

This book of the typikon was dedicated to the divine and imperial church honored with the name of my all-holy Lady Petritziotissa by the lord [p. 95] Nikephoros in memory of his parents, and of Constantine, Helen, and Nikephoros; and anyone who removes this from the monastery will be liable to the anathema of the three hundred and eighteen inspired fathers who gathered at Nicaea.⁴³

Notes on the Translation

1. The indiction and the year do not agree; Gautier, “Évergétis,” p. 6, suggested that either the second indiction be corrected here to the first, or the date of 6556 be corrected to 6557; at p. 16, 4, he indicated his preference for the latter, yielding 1049 as the year of Evergetis’ foundation.
2. The inventory has been lost; see Gautier, “Évergétis,” p. 12, for its possible former location in our manuscript.
3. See [10] below.
4. According to the Synaxarion, ed. Dmitrievsky, Opisanie, vol. 1, pp. 512, 516–17, the Catecheses of Theodore the Studite were read during Lent on Sundays, Wednesdays, and Fridays, while on the other days of the week there were readings from John Klimakos and Ephraem Syrus; see Gautier, “Évergétis,” p. 20, n. 12. Outside Lent, however, the catechesis read by the superior must have come from the Catecheticon of Paul Evergetinos. See Synaxarion, ed. Dmitrievsky, Opisanie, vol. 1, p. 602 where the catechesis is supposed to be from the paterikon (i.e., Paul’s Catecheticon). We are indebted to our translator for this information. A critical edition and translation of Paul’s Catecheticon is currently being prepared by Barbara Crostini of Oxford University for the Belfast Texts and Translations Series.
5. Prayer attributed to Basil of Caesarea; cf. Horologion to Mega, ed. M. Saliveros (Athens, n.d.), p. 118.
6. Cf. Pseudo-Basil of Caesarea, Constitutiones Asceticae 12, PG 31, col. 1376AB.
7. Unidentified quotation.
8. For this meaning of phylattomai (“to refrain from”/“to avoid”) cf. P. Karlin-Hayter, “Lexicographical Notes,” Byzantion 55 (1985), p. 591.
9. August 15.
10. Synaxarion, ed. Dmitrievsky, Opisanie, vol. 1, pp. 314, 458, 609.
11. The water clock is also mentioned in the Synaxarion, ed. Dmitrievsky, Opisanie, vol. 1, pp. 441, 556; cf. (4) Stoudios [2] and (11) Ath. Rule [1].
12. Ton typon tou timiou staurou . . . meta tou thymiateriou episphragizontos; on typos (“sign”), cf. Lampe, PGL, s.v. typos, C. 1. On episphragizo (“to make the sign of the cross in an act of consecration”), see ibid., s.v. episphragizo, 3, and especially s.v. sphragizo, B. On the censuring of the sanctuary, see (28) Pantokrator [2].
13. Synaxarion, ed. Dmitrievsky, Opisanie, vol. 1, pp. 271–72, 344–45, 356–57, 364–65, 406–7, 430–31, 480–81.
14. Basil of Caesarea, Regulae fusius tractatae 26 ([LR 26]), PG 31, col. 985CD.
15. John Klimakos, Scala Paradisi 4, PG 88, cols. 681B, 705C.
16. Synaxarion, ed. Dmitrievsky, Opisanie, vol. 1, pp. 499–601, 601–7.
17. Ps. 144 [145]; cf. (27) Kecharitomene [40], (28) Pantokrator [9].
18. See Synaxarion, ed. Dmitrievsky, Opisanie, vol. 1, p. 517, with Gautier, “Évergétis,” p. 34, n. 28
19. Unidentified quotation.
20. Saturday of the first week in Lent.

22. EVERGETIS

21. Feast of the Discovery of the Head of St. John the Forerunner, February 24; feast of the Forty Martyrs, March 9.
22. groute: gruel consisting of plain or roasted flour mixed with hot water. See Koukoules, BBP, vol. 5, p. 38.
23. Feast of the Annunciation, March 25.
24. Fast of the Holy Apostles, from Monday after the feast of All Saints (Sunday after Pentecost) through the vigil of the feast of Sts. Peter and Paul, June 28; Christmas fast (= fast of St. Philip), from November 15 until Christmas.
25. Synaxarion, ed. Dmitrievsky, Opisanie, vol. 1, pp. 601–7.
26. Synaxarion, ed. Dmitrievsky, Opisanie, vol. 1, p. 314.
27. Probably including Constantine IX Monomachos (1042–1054) and perhaps also Michael VI (1056–1057) and Constantine X Doukas (1059–1067).
28. Unidentified quotation.
29. Rom. 15:14; I Thess. 4:18; Eph. 4:2; Heb. 10:24.
30. Pseudo-Basil of Caesarea, Constitutiones asceticae 28, PG 31, col. 1417C.
31. Peri tou tous diakonetas cheirotonein kata ten tou oikonomou procheirisin. The terms cheirotonia (“ordination”) and cheirotonein (“to ordain”) are used in the sense of procheirisis (“installation”/“appointment”) and procheirizein (“to install”/“to appoint”) throughout the Typika. On the Byzantines’ ambiguous usage of cheirotonia, see Darrouzès, Οφφίκια, 147–57.
32. That is, as in [13] above.
33. According to Gautier, “Évergétis,” p. 78, n. 60, these benefactors are not otherwise known.
34. Cf. the discussion in Vita S. Athanasii Athonitae Vita Prima (Vita A), chap. 88, ed. Noret, Vitae duae antiquae sancti Athanasii Athonitae (Louvain, 1982), p. 41, and Vita Secunda (Vita B), chap. 29, ed. Noret, p. 158: see (11) Ath. Rule, introduction, n. 3. On the phrase “mine and yours” as the source of all evils, see John Chrysostom, De sancto Philogonio, PG 48, col. 749.
35. See Pseudo-Basil of Caesarea, Constitutiones asceticae, 3, PG 31, col. 1345C.
36. Presumably in view of this passage, Gautier, “Évergétis,” p. 70, n. 53, viewed the omission in [31] of the office of librarian, which the monk George is known from a note in a manuscript to have held in 1064, to be an indication of the prior date of this section of the typikon.
37. Quoted from the Basilian Sermo de renunciatione saeculi, PG 31, col. 645D.
38. Synaxarion, ed. Dmitrievsky, Opisanie, vol. 1, pp. 446–48.
39. In [10] above.
40. For this individual, see Skoulatos, Personnages, p. 148.
41. Paroikoi.
42. Reading me katakrinein for katakrinein.
43. According to Gautier, “Évergétis,” p. 94, n. 77, this note is in a hand of the 16th century; the donor and beneficiary institution are otherwise unattested unless the latter is a reference to the monastery of Petritzonitissa for which (23) Pakourianos was written.

Document Notes

- [1] Introduction to the rule. Note the emergence of a distinction between the the disciplinary regulation of the present founder’s typikon and the liturgical typikon that was originally to be found at the end of our manuscript; see Gautier, “Évergétis,” p. 12.
- [2] Biographical excursus on the first founder. For Paul Evergetinos, see Solignac, “Paul Évergétinos,” cols. 562–64.
- [3] Succession of Timothy, the second founder; his contributions. The chapter heading was added in the re-edition after Timothy’s death. The list of benefactors appears also in (30) Phoberos [8]; the introduction to the discussion of the canonical hours found here also appears in (34) Machairas [30].
- [4] Offices of the first, third and sixth hours. Copied later in whole or part, directly or indirectly, by (27)

ELEVENTH CENTURY

- Kecharitomene* [32], [33]; (29) Kosmosoteira [13], [14]; (30) Phoberos [9], [10], [11]; (32) Mamas [47]; (33) Heliou Bomon [46], and (34) Machairas [31], [32], [33], [34], [36]. See also other treatments of these offices in (4) Stoudios [A10], [33], [A36]; (10) Eleousa [7]; (11) Ath. Rule [7], [8], [9]; and (20) Black Mountain [10], cf. [25], [26].
- [5] Guidelines for reception of communion. Copied later in whole or part, directly or indirectly, by (27) Kecharitomene [33]; (29) Kosmosoteira [14]; (30) Phoberos [11]; (32) Mamas [32]; (33) Heliou Bomon [32]; (34) Machairas [36], [37], [38], [39]; and (58) Menoikeion [16].
- [6] Prescriptions for the ninth hour, vespers, compline, night office, midnight office and matins. Copied later in whole or part, directly or indirectly, by (27) Kecharitomene [35], [36], [37], [38], [39]; (29) Kosmosoteira [15]; (30) Phoberos [12], [13]; (32) Mamas [47]; (33) Heliou Bomon [46]; and (34) Machairas [48]. See also other treatments of these offices in (4) Stoudios [2], [A3], [4], [10], [11], [12], [13], [18], [19], [20], [21], [22], [26], [27], [29], [30], [31], [32], [31], [33], [A36], [A37], [B38]; (10) Eleousa [7]; (11) Ath. Rule [2], [3], [4], [7], [8], [9], [26], [27], [29]; and (20) Black Mountain [11], [12], [13], [14], [15], [16], [17], [18], [19].
- [7] Confession. Exagoreusis was not always sacramental in nature; it was offered twice daily after matins and compline. Copied later in whole or part, directly or indirectly, by (29) Kosmosoteira [16], [17], [18]; (30) Phoberos [14], [15]; (32) Mamas [30]; (33) Heliou Bomon [30]; and (34) Machairas [50], [51], [52], [53]. See also the contemporary treatment in (23) Pakourianos [13], which also provides for daily confession, exclusively to the superior. The requirement of exclusive confession is repeated in [15] below.
- [8] Use of the synaxarion for fasts and vigils. Copied later in whole or part, directly or indirectly, by (29) Kosmosoteira [19] and (30) Phoberos [16]. Cf. the contrary provision of (20) Black Mountain [20].
- [9] Refectory procedures. Copied later in whole or part, directly or indirectly, by (27) Kecharitomene [40], [41], [42], [43]; (29) Kosmosoteira [20], [21], [22], [23], [24]; (30) Phoberos [20], [21], [22], [23], [24], [26]; (32) Mamas [17], [36]; (33) Heliou Bomon [17], [35]; (34) Machairas [61], [62], [63], [64], [66]; and (58) Menoikeion [8]. As can be seen, later authors preferred to subdivide this long chapter in their own works. See also other discussions in (4) Stoudios [28], [29]; (10) Eleousa [4]; (11) Ath. Rule [21]; (20) Black Mountain [33]; (23) Pakourianos [8]; and (31) Areia [T3]. The injunction against secret eating is repeated below again in [22].
- [10] Dietary regulations for fasts. Copied later in whole or part, directly or indirectly, by (27) Kecharitomene [47], [48]; (29) Kosmosoteira [25], [26], [27], [28]; (30) Phoberos [27], [28], [29], [30]; (32) Mamas [18]; (33) Heliou Bomon [18]; and (34) Machairas [67], [68], [69], [70], [71], [72], [73], [76]. As with [9] above, later authors preferred to subdivide this long chapter in their own works. See also earlier regulations for fasts in (4) Stoudios [30], [31]; (11) Ath. Rule [23], [24], [25], [26]; (20) Black Mountain [38], [38R], [53], [54], [56], [57], [58], [59], [60], [61], [62], [63], [64], [65], [66], [67]; as well as the contemporary treatment in (23) Pakourianos [10].
- [11] Celebration of the feasts of the Lord and feasts of the Mother of God. Copied later in whole or part, directly or indirectly, by (29) Kosmosoteira [29] and (30) Phoberos [32]. See also the earlier treatment in (17) Nikon Metanoieite [8], the contemporary treatments in (10) Eleousa [13], (23) Pakourianos [11], and the critical discussion in (20) Black Mountain [48], [52], [53].
- [12] Free and self-governing status. Copied later in whole or part, directly or indirectly, by (27) Kecharitomene [1]; (29) Kosmosoteira [31]; (30) Phoberos [33]; (32) Mamas [4]; (33) Heliou Bomon [4]; and (34) Machairas [21]. See also the earlier provisions in (9) Galesios [247] and (13) Ath. Typikon [18] ff.; as well as the contemporary provisions in (10) Eleousa [18]; (19) Attaleiates [14]; (23) Pakourianos [18]; and (24) Christodoulos [A16]. The curse is similar to that in (8) John Xenos [2].
- [13] Choice of the superior and the steward. This, along with [14] below, was one of Evergetis' more problematic chapters for later users of this document; the provision for the routine elevation of the steward to the superiorship did not find favor among them, but they were anxious to utilize parts of this chapter nevertheless; see later copyings, in whole or part, directly or indirectly, by (27) Kecharitomene [11],

22. EVERGETIS

- [13]; (29) Kosmosoteira [31], [33], [34]; (30) Phoberos [33], [34], [35]; (32) Mamas [1], [2], [7]; (33) Heliou Bomon [1], [2], [7]; and (34) Machairas [80], [81], [88]. See also other treatments in (10) Eleousa [15], [16]; (13) Ath. Typikon [15], [16], [17], [19]; (14) Ath. Testament [13], [14]; (17) Nikon Metanoieite [13]; (18) Nea Gephyra [3]; (19) Attaleiates [26], [29]; (23) Pakourianos [5]; (24) Christodoulos [A18].
- [14] Justifications for removal of the steward. Another problematic chapter; the provision for retaining a bad steward was particularly distasteful to most of Evergetis' later users. Obviously the chapter heading here must postdate Timothy's editorship of the document. Copied later in whole or part, directly or indirectly, by (27) Kecharitomene [12], [13]; (29) Kosmosoteira [41], [42]; (30) Phoberos [35]; (32) Mamas [2], [45]; (33) Heliou Bomon [2], [45]; (34) Machairas [89], [90]; and (58) Menoikeion [18]. See also other treatments of the deposition of a foundation's leaders in (10) Eleousa [16]; (14) Ath. Testament [16]; (17) Nikon Metanoieite [9]; (18) Nea Gephyra [3]; (19) Attaleiates [26]; (21) Roidion [A1], [A3], [A4], [B20]; (23) Pakourianos [19]; and (24) Christodoulos [A20].
- [15] Exclusive confession to the superior. This is a reiteration of [7] above. Copied later in whole or part, directly or indirectly, by (30) Phoberos [35] and (34) Machairas [141], but rejected by (32) Mamas [29] and (33) Heliou Bomon [29]. See also the provisions in (4) Stoudios [22]; (11) Ath. Rule [33]; and (23) Pakourianos [13].
- [16] Monks to show obedience to the superior, affection for one another. Copied later in whole or part, directly or indirectly, by (27) Kecharitomene [12]; (29) Kosmosoteira [43]; (30) Phoberos [36]; and (34) Machairas [142], [143]. See also other treatments in (3) Theodore Studites [25]; (7) Latros [11]; (13) Ath. Typikon [56]; (14) Ath. Testament [20]; and (24) Christodoulos [A28].
- [17] Exhortation to the superior. Copied later in whole or part, directly or indirectly, by (27) Kecharitomene [12]; (29) Kosmosoteira [42], [44]; (30) Phoberos [36]; (32) Mamas [42], [45]; (33) Heliou Bomon [41], [44]; (34) Machairas [144], [148]; and (58) Menoikeion [18], [19]. See also other treatments in (3) Theodore Studites, Concerning the Superior; (10) Eleousa [12]; (13) Ath. Typikon [55]; and (24) Christodoulos [A19]. Many later users thought the statement here rejecting claims of entitlement to the superiority based on rank or privilege ought better to be included with a discussion of qualifications for the office; therefore this statement is frequently joined to quotations from [14] above in later treatments of this subject.
- [18] Superior not accountable to the monks; not to do favors for friends and relatives. Copied later in whole or part, directly or indirectly, by (30) Phoberos [36], [37]; (32) Mamas [44]; (33) Heliou Bomon [43]; and (34) Machairas [145], [146], but cf. (29) Kosmosoteira [81]. See also other treatments of corruption in favor of relatives in (3) Theodore Studites [3]; (13) Ath. Typikon [30]; (15) Constantine IX [15]; (21) Roidion [B20]; and (23) Pakourianos [5].
- [19] Inalienability of sacred objects; exception for fiscal emergencies. For a similar assertion that a violation of this rule is sacrilegious, see (19) Attaleiates [INV 11]. Copied later in whole or part, directly or indirectly, by (27) Kecharitomene [10]; (29) Kosmosoteira [45]; and (30) Phoberos [38]. (32) Mamas [37], (33) Heliou Bomon [37], and (34) Machairas [94] endorse the principle of inalienability, but do not make provision for emergency alienations. See also the earlier discussion in (15) Constantine IX [9] and the contemporary treatments in (10) Eleousa [18]; (19) Attaleiates [7], [22]; and (23) Pakourianos [19], [32].
- [20] Bookkeeping requirements. See also the discussion of the second treasurer in [30] below. Copied only by (29) Kosmosoteira [46].
- [21] Discipline of idle talkers. Copied later in whole or part, directly or indirectly, by (29) Kosmosoteira [47]; (30) Phoberos [39], [40]; (32) Mamas [35]; (33) Heliou Bomon [34]; (34) Machairas [113]; and (58) Menoikeion [17]. See also other treatments in (4) Stoudios [18]; (11) Ath. Rule [17]; (19) Attaleiates [29]; and (20) Black Mountain [80].
- [22] No secret eating or private possessions. The prohibition on secret eating is a reiteration of a provision in [9] above; it was copied later in whole or part, directly or indirectly, by (29) Kosmosoteira [47] and

ELEVENTH CENTURY

- (30) Phoberos [41]. (27) Kecharitomene [49], (32) Mamas [20], and (33) Heliou Bomon [20] endorse the principle with their own provisions. See also the extensive treatment in (20) Black Mountain [24], [69], [72] and the restrictions in (23) Pakourianos [4] and (28) Pantokrator [9]. The ban on personal possessions, for which an enforcement is provided in [27] below, was copied later in whole or part, directly or indirectly, by (29) Kosmosoteira [47]; (30) Phoberos [41]; (32) Mamas [35]; (33) Heliou Bomon [34]; and (34) Machairas [87]. (27) Kecharitomene [50] endorses the principle with its own provision. See also other treatments in (3) Theodore Studites [2]; (6) Rila [6]; (9) Galesios [138], [191], [192]; (10) Eleousa [5]; (11) Ath. Rule [34]; (13) Ath. Typikon [30]; (23) Pakourianos [4]; and (24) Christodoulos [A22].
- [23] No fixed number of monks. No later author endorses this Evergetian position, but (29) Kosmosoteira [48] and (30) Phoberos [42] nevertheless utilize the text here to make a contrary provision. The parallel provisions in (27) Kecharitomene [5], (32) Mamas [5], and (33) Heliou Bomon [5] are textually independent of this Evergetian chapter.
- [24] Servants not permitted. Copied later in whole or part, directly or indirectly, by (29) Kosmosoteira [51]; (30) Phoberos [43]; (32) Mamas [34]; (33) Heliou Bomon [33]; and (34) Machairas [87]. See also the discussions of servants in (3) Theodore Studites [4]; (12) Tzimiskes, Introduction; (13) Ath. Typikon [31]; (15) Constantine IX [13]; (19) Attaleiates [42]; (23) Pakourianos [4]; and (27) Kecharitomene [4].
- [25] Communal wardrobe. Copied later in whole or part, directly or indirectly, by (29) Kosmosoteira [52], (30) Phoberos [44], and (34) Machairas [102], [103]. (32) Mamas [28], (33) Heliou Bomon [28], and (58) Menoikeion [12] make contrary provisions. See also the provisions made in (3) Theodore Studites [19]; (4) Stoudios [A37], [B38]; (10) Eleousa [5]; (11) Ath. Rule [35]; (20) Black Mountain [75]; (23) Pakourianos [9]; (28) Pantokrator [22]; and (31) Areia [T4].
- [26] Equality of food, drink, and clothing; additional food allowed for sick monks. Copied later in whole or part, directly or indirectly, by (27) Kecharitomene [56]; (29) Kosmosoteira [53]; (30) Phoberos [45]; (32) Mamas [34]; (33) Heliou Bomon [33]; and (34) Machairas [106], [107]. See also the treatments in (9) Galesios [187]; (10) Eleousa [4], [13]; (11) Ath. Rule [31]; and (23) Pakourianos [4].
- [27] Monthly visitation of cells by the superior. This provision enforces the ban on personal possessions in [22] above. Copied later in whole or part by (29) Kosmosoteira [53] and (30) Phoberos [45]. See also treatments in (27) Kecharitomene [50], (32) Mamas [20], and (33) Heliou Bomon [20].
- [28] Bathing allowed three times a year. (30) Phoberos [46] rejects the concession, but makes use of this chapter's text in so doing. (27) Kecharitomene [58]; (28) Pantokrator [15]; (29) Kosmosoteira [97], [113]; (31) Areia [T3]; (32) Mamas [28]; (33) Heliou Bomon [28]; and (58) Menoikeion [15] all permit bathing, but are textually independent of (22) Evergetis.
- [29] Installation of officials. Copied later in whole or part, directly or indirectly, by (27) Kecharitomene [18]; (29) Kosmosoteira [35]; (30) Phoberos [47]; (32) Mamas [6]; (33) Heliou Bomon [6]; and (34) Machairas [92].
- [30] Duties of the three treasurers. See also [20] above. Copied later by (29) Kosmosoteira [36] and (30) Phoberos [47]. (24) Christodoulos [A21]; (27) Kecharitomene [24]; (32) Mamas [10]; (33) Heliou Bomon [10]; (34) Machairas [100]; and (58) Menoikeion [6] all make different provisions.
- [31] Duties of the refectorian and disciplinary official. Copied later by (29) Kosmosoteira [37] and (30) Phoberos [48]. (27) Kecharitomene [25] makes use only of the duties of the refectorian, then provides [26] its own description of duties for its disciplinary official. (34) Machairas [114] has a textually independent description for the disciplinary official, while (58) Menoikeion [6] has one for the refectorian. See also the discussion of comparable officials in (4) Stoudios [18], [28]; (11) Ath. Rule [17], [21]; (21) Roidion [B4], [B8]; and (24) Christodoulos [A21].
- [32] Tenure of office for officials. Copied later in whole or part, directly or indirectly, by (29) Kosmosoteira [38]; (30) Phoberos [48]; and (34) Machairas [92]. See also earlier treatments in (14) Ath. Testament [11] and (17) Nikon Metanoite [6], [8]. The warning against careless administration is repeated in [42] below.

22. EVERGETIS

- [33] Exhortation of all officials. This chapter testifies to the prestige of the choral monks in reform monasteries; evidently even officials outside of the liturgical group needed the encouragement provided here. Copied later in whole or part, directly or indirectly, by (27) Kecharitomene [25]; (29) Kosmosoteira [39]; (30) Phoberos [48]; (32) Mamas [23]; (33) Heliou Bomon [23]; and (58) Menoikeion [10].
- [34] Qualifications of property administrators. Copied later in whole or part, directly or indirectly, by (29) Kosmosoteira [40]; (30) Phoberos [49]; and (34) Machairas [109]. (27) Kecharitomene [31] has its own textually independent provision. See also the mention of these officials in (9) Galesios [221], [244].
- [35] Founder's commemoration. Cf. textually independent parallel provisions in (27) Kecharitomene [71]; (29) Kosmosoteira [7], [11], [64], [72], [91]; (30) Phoberos [50]; (32) Mamas [40]; (33) Heliou Bomon [50]; and (34) Machairas [154]. See also the earlier treatment in (17) Nikon Metanoieite [1] and the contemporary treatments in (23) Pakourianos [21] and (24) Christodoulos [B5]. There is an additional note on this commemoration in the [Appendix] below.
- [36] Commemoration of departed brothers and benefactors. Copied later in whole or part, directly or indirectly, by (27) Kecharitomene [70]; (30) Phoberos [50]; (32) Mamas [39], [40]; (33) Heliou Bomon [39]; and (34) Machairas [156], [157]. (29) Kosmosoteira [54] makes a textually independent provision for commemoration of departed monks only. See also the earlier treatment in (17) Nikon Metanoieite [1], [4] and the contemporary treatments in (19) Attaleiates [31]; (21) Roidion [B12]; and (23) Pakourianos [20], [22].
- [37] Conditions for tonsure; treatment of entrance gifts; acceptability of monks tonsured elsewhere. This was an enormously influential chapter, a classic statement of the positions of the reform movement on these issues. Copied later in whole or part, directly or indirectly, by (27) Kecharitomene [7]; (29) Kosmosoteira [55]; (30) Phoberos [51], [52], [53A]; (32) Mamas [5], [22]; (33) Heliou Bomon [5], [22]; and (34) Machairas [55], [56], [57], [58], [59], [60]. (27) Kecharitomene [30] legislates independently for the length of the novitiate. Later authors invariably rearranged the provisions in this chapter in their own treatments. See also the treatments of the novitiate in (4) Stoudios [24], (10) Tzimiskes [3], (11) Ath. Rule [18], (23) Pakourianos [25], (24) Christodoulos [A26], and (25) Fragala [A8], [B8]. See treatment of entrance gifts in (9) Galesios [192], (13) Ath. Typikon [49], (15) Constantine IX [9]; (19) Attaleiates [28], and (28) Pantokrator [17]; cf. (21) Roidion [B17]. Finally, see treatment of monks tonsured elsewhere in (10) Tzimiskes [4], [5], [8], [18]; (13) Ath. Typikon [20] ff.; (15) Constantine IX [7]; (18) Nea Gephyra [3]; (19) Attaleiates [30]; and (23) Pakourianos [25].
- [38] Daily charitable distributions; hospitality in the hospice; exclusion of women. The charitable provision is copied later by (27) Kecharitomene [64] and (30) Phoberos [54]. (29) Kosmosoteira [6]; (32) Mamas [13]; (33) Heliou Bomon [13]; (34) Machairas [118]; and (58) Menoikeion [22] all make their own textually independent provisions. See also contemporary provisions for charity and hospitality in (19) Attaleiates [18], [19], [20]; (21) Roidion [B2], [B3], [B4], [B7], [B8], [B13], [B14], [B15]; (23) Pakourianos [10], [21], [29]; (24) Christodoulos [A25]. The exclusion of women and the accompanying rationale is copied later, directly or indirectly, by (29) Kosmosoteira [56]; (30) Phoberos [55]; and (34) Machairas [118], [119].
- [39] Entry to most women prohibited; provision for creation of additional offices. Only (30) Phoberos [55] copies the text of this chapter's ban on the opposite sex, but (27) Kecharitomene [17]; (29) Kosmosoteira [84]; (32) Mamas [27]; (33) Heliou Bomon [27]; (34) Machairas [115]; and (58) Menoikeion [14] all have analogous textually independent provisions to the same effect. See also similar prescriptions in (23) Pakourianos [23], (24) Christodoulos [A10], and (28) Pantokrator [18]. Only (32) Mamas [14] and (33) Heliou Bomon [14] utilize the provision here for creation of additional offices.
- [40] Exhortation to preserve the typikon. Backed up by provision in [43] below for monthly reading of the typikon. Not copied by any later authors, but (32) Mamas [15], (33) Heliou Bomon [15], and (34) Machairas [158] have analogous provisions. See also earlier treatments in (3) Theodore Studites [24]; (5) Euthymios [2]; (8) John Xenos [3]; and (9) Galesios [246]; as well as contemporary treatments in (10) Eleousa [22]; (19) Attaleiates [7], [8], [9]; (23) Pakourianos [33]; and (24) Christodoulos [A27].

ELEVENTH CENTURY

- [41] Care of sick monks. Copied later in whole or part, directly or indirectly, by (27) Kecharitomene [57]; (30) Phoberos [55], [56]; (32) Mamas [34]; (33) Heliou Bomon [33]; and (34) Machairas [108]. (29) Kosmosoteira [61] makes its own provision. See also the contemporary treatment in (23) Pakourianos [28].
- [42] Founder's additional exhortation. This is both an appendix to and a recapitulation of earlier legislation. In the later category are the admonitions not to quarrel over precedence, cf. [9] above, the warning against careless administration of the monastery's property, cf. [32] above, and the reminder not to acquire personal possessions, cf. [22], [27] above. Copied later in whole or part, directly or indirectly, by (27) Kecharitomene [78]; (29) Kosmosoteira [57]; (30) Phoberos [59]; (32) Mamas [46]; (33) Heliou Bomon [45]; (34) Machairas [163], [166]; and (58) Menoikeion [20].
- [43] Reading of the typikon. Supports provision in [40] above for maintenance of the typikon. Copied later in whole or part, directly or indirectly, by (27) Kecharitomene [65]; (29) Kosmosoteira [59]; (30) Phoberos [59]; and (34) Machairas [167]. (32) Mamas [16] and (33) Heliou Bomon [16] have analogous provisions. See also the earlier provision in (11) Ath. Rule [37] for a reading in assembly. There is a concluding scriptural blessing that is recopied at the end of the [Appendix]; it was also copied later, directly or indirectly, by (27) Kecharitomene [78]; (30) Phoberos [59]; (32) Mamas [45]; (33) Heliou Bomon [46]; and (34) Machairas [168], but frequently separated from the other materials in this chapter.
- [Appendix] Joint commemoration of the founders Paul and Timothy; provision for the consumption of wine on Lenten fast days. Cf. [35] above, which makes the original provision for Paul's commemoration, and [10] which makes the original provision for drinking hot water seasoned with cumin. The result of the amended Evergetian Lenten provision is that its monks could consume wine on every day of the week. The contemporary (23) Pakourianos [10] matches the earlier Evergetian observance, permitting the use of wine on Tuesdays, Thursdays, Saturdays and Sundays. Earlier documents are even stricter, with (11) Black Mountain [26] permitting wine only on Saturdays and Sundays, (4) Stoudios [30] only on Saturdays, and (20) Black Mountain [56] only on Sundays. The alteration of the typikon at the request of an influential benefactor recalls Leo VI's grant of a vineyard to the monks of the monastery of Euthymios so that they could improve the quality of wine served, for which see (5) Euthymios, Institutional History, above.

23. Pakourianos: Typikon of Gregory Pakourianos for the Monastery of the Mother of God Petriztonitissa in Bačkovo

Date: December 1083

Translator: Robert Jordan

Edition employed: Paul Gautier, “Le typikon du sébaste Grégoire Pakourianos,” REB 42 (1984), 5–145, at 19–133.

Manuscript: Chios Koraes 1598 (13th c.)¹

Other translations: French, by Gautier, “Pakourianos,” 18–132; Russian, by V. A. Arutyunova-Fidanyan, Typik Gregoriya Pakuriana (Yerevan, 1978), pp. 68–121, with commentary, pp. 122–235; modern Georgian, by Simon Kaouchtschischvili, Typikon Gregorii Pacuriani (= Georgica. Scriptorum byzantinorum excerpta ad Georgiam pertinentia 5) (Tbilisi, 1963).²

Institutional History

This foundation, which still survives, is located in Bulgaria near modern Bačkovo in the Chaya River valley surrounded by the Rhodope Mountains, south of Plovdiv (Byzantine Philippoupolis). The epithet *Petriztonitissa*³ is derived from the neighboring fortification of Petritzos mentioned [2] in the typikon below.

A. Career of the Founder

The founder Gregory Pakourianos has been claimed by both Georgians and Armenians, leading to a lively scholarly debate over his ancestry.⁴ Prior to drawing up his typikon for Petriztonitissa in 1083, he had been engaged in a military career for at least twenty years, starting with his participation in the unsuccessful defense of Ani against the Seljuk leader Alp Arslan in 1064. He served later under emperors Michael VII Doukas (1071–78), Nikephoros III Botaneiates (1078–81), and Alexios I Komnenos (1081–1118) in various responsible positions on both the eastern and the western frontiers of the empire. He was a monastic patron even before the foundation of Petriztonitissa, joining his brother Apasios in 1074 in making a donation to the famous Georgian monastery of Iveron on Mount Athos.⁵ Later, Nikephoros III granted him estates in the vicinity of Philippoupolis, possibly including the land on which Petriztonitissa was built. Alexios Komnenos appointed him mezas domestikos of the West and gave him many more properties in the Balkans.⁶

There is a possibility that there was already a Georgian monastery at Petritzos.⁷ Anna Komnene mentions a monastery of this name that belonged to Empress Maria, daughter of the Georgian king Bagrat IV (1027–72) and spouse of Michael VII Doukas and later also Nikephoros III Botaneiates. Also, a Georgian manuscript is attributed to two monks “from Petritzos” in the year 1030. In any event, the construction of Pakourianos’ monastery took place under the supervision of the monk Gregory Vankos.⁸ Pakourianos may well not have been present at the site, unlike the case documented later in (29) Kosmosoteira [75] in which the founder Isaac Komnenos personally supervised the construction of the church for which that document was written. According to the historian Anna Komnene, who says he was of a noble Armenian lineage, Gregory Pakourianos fell in battle against the Patzinaks, apparently at the village of Belyakovo, north of Philippoupolis, in 1086.⁹

B. Later History of the Foundation¹⁰

1. Era of Georgian Administration

For a long time the monastery remained under Georgian control, as Pakourianos had intended, certainly throughout the twelfth century. There are two mostly unpublished bead rolls preserved in the library of the modern monastery, one dating from around 1600 and another from the mid-seventeenth century, that contain lists of the foundation's donors and superiors.¹¹ Although the monastery may have come at least temporarily under the control of the Bulgarian Tsar Kalojan (1197–1207) in 1206 when he conquered the region of the Rhodope Mountains, Georgian monks were still present in the thirteenth century. Judging from a silver icon mount of the Mother of God associated with this monastery that bears a Georgian inscription dated to 1311, Petritziotissa had become a pilgrimage site for other Georgian monks.¹² The monastery lost its Georgian character, however, by the fourteenth century.

2. Era of Bulgarian Administration

In 1344, Tsar Ivan Alexander (1331–71) established Bulgarian control more firmly, and Bulgarian monks were established in the monastery at this time. The Bulgarian tsar restored the monastery and endowed it richly. The immediate area of the Rhodope Mountains came under Ottoman control in 1363. After the conquest of Bulgaria by the Turks under Murad I in 1393, the Bulgarian Patriarch, Evtimij of Turnovo, went into exile at this monastery. In the early fifteenth century, Constantine Kostenechki came to study there under Evtimij's students Andrew and Andronikos. The monastery was reportedly destroyed by the Ottomans in the second half of the fifteenth or the early part of the sixteenth century and was left deserted for nearly a century. The foundation, by then known by the Bulgarian name Petritsoni, was rebuilt towards the end of the sixteenth century by the Bulgarian nobleman Georgi and his son Constantine. A new refectory was built in 1601, and a new church in 1604, both still in existence. Life-size donor portraits of the new founders appear on the eastern wall of the narthex of the seventeenth-century church.

3. Fate of the Typikon and the Foundation

Lemerle (Cinq études, p. 122) believed that the original Greek version of the typikon was preserved at Petritsoni until at least 1628 (but see Gautier, "Pakourianos," p. 12, n. 19). It had long since disappeared by the time Bulgaria recovered its independence from the Ottoman Empire in 1878. Greek monks were in residence at the monastery then, but the Bulgarian and Greek ecclesiastical authorities soon engaged in a dispute over control of the foundation, which was richly endowed.¹³ During the course of this conflict, apparently in 1888, the bilingual Greek-Georgian manuscript on which the best current editions of the two surviving versions of the typikon are based had been taken away to the library of Koraes on Chios, then still an Ottoman possession. Georgios Mousaios, a Greek of Stenimachos who deserves the credit for bringing the typikon to the attention of the modern scholarly world in his Jena dissertation in 1888, had had to use an inferior manuscript of 1792, itself a modern Greek translation, for his first edition of the work. Previously, he had failed to gain the cooperation of the monastery's monks or of Gregory, the metropolitan of Philippoupolis, to gain access to what he mistakenly believed to be the "original" manuscript of the typikon. Later, Mousaios was to bring a complaint before the patriarch of Constantinople that Gregory had instigated its removal from the monastery. Meanwhile, the quarrel over the ownership of the monastery was not resolved until 1894, when it was definitively awarded to the Bulgarian exarchate.

C. Architectural Evidence

1. The Bačkovo Kostnitsa (Ossuary)¹⁴

The ossuary, built as a tomb for Gregory and his brother Apasios between 1074 and 1083 (so Grishin, "Evidence," p. 93), is the only structure at Bačkovo dating back to Byzantine times. It is located a short distance to the east of the present monastery on a steep mountain ridge. There are fourteen tombs in the stone floor of the first story (the crypt). The upper story served as a chapel and contains two wall tombs. There are five niche images in the chapel: donor portraits of Gregory and Apasios Pakourianos, who are shown holding a model of the original katholikon, a domed church with two side chapels; George and Gabriel, two founders (ktetores) of an uncertain date; Sts. Constantine and Helena; St. John the Theologian; and Ivan Alexander, all identified by Greek inscriptions. Grishin ("Evidence," p. 96) dates these to 1344–63.

2. Plan of the Original Katholikon

Although the typikon refers [1] to three churches dedicated to the Dormition [of the Mother of God, John the Forerunner, and St. George, excavations conducted at the site in 1955 indicate that there was one katholikon dedicated to the Virgin with side chapels dedicated to each of the saints (Grishin, "Evidence," p. 91). This confirms the evidence offered by the fourteenth-century donor portrait of Gregory and Apasios Pakourianos, executed at a time when the original church was still standing.

Analysis

This is a moderately progressive document in the reform tradition. The author Pakourianos, who may have already served as the patron of a traditional private foundation [31], demonstrates [18] a keen perception of the problems of that form of organization which led him to choose the now popular independent and self-governing constitution then being promoted by contemporary monastic reformers. While the author's reform sympathies may seem lukewarm, especially in comparison to the fervent (22) Evergetis, the fairer comparison is with the contemporary (19) Attaleiates and its considerably less imaginative, tradition-bound author.

Passing over (22) Evergetis, if indeed it was known to him, Pakourianos chose a more indulgent and less rigorously separatist disciplinary regime for his monks by adopting the typikon of the Constantinopolitan Panagios as a model (see below). Perhaps the need to enforce isolation from the lay world was less severe for an institution located in the countryside and made up of monks (former soldiers among them) who could not speak Greek, and thus would have fewer outside ties anyway.

To meet official requirements as well as the needs of his own community, Pakourianos had his typikon drawn up [33] in three languages: Greek, Georgian and Armenian. Manuscript versions of the typikon in the first two languages survive today. The Greek version, though not understood by his monks, was to be authoritative and never to leave the monastery. A copy of it was to be placed in the monastery of Panagios for safekeeping, in case there should be “some need of it on the part of some outside quarreling about something in the typikon stored in our monastery.”

A. Model for the Typikon

In an unusual acknowledgement of his model, the author states forthrightly in the introduction that he has adopted the rule (typos) of the monastery of Panagios, with whose monks he had been closely associated, to govern his own foundation.¹⁵ Although he has surely customized his model considerably, as in [9] for instance, Pakourianos declares that he has incorporated “the whole ecclesiastic procedure and the manner of the monks’ living and eating” from the founder’s rule of Panagios, said to represent the “middle and most royal road” [to salvation]. Pakourianos had enjoyed a close association with the monks of this foundation, whom he terms in his introduction “those very civilized men, accustomed to good living and brought up within that prosperous and populous city.” This suggests that the “middle road” espoused by Panagios is a euphemism for a lenient disciplinary regime. The identity of the author of Panagios’ typikon, who is titled as its “founder” (ktetor), cannot be determined. We know independently that during the beginning of the eleventh century Antony, likely the disciple and first successor of Athanasios, founder of the Lavra monastery on Mount Athos, was serving as its superior.¹⁶ If this Antony was in fact the Panagios’ founder and the author of its typikon, that would help to explain the presence of some progressive elements in Pakourianos’ typikon (e.g., its independent constitution [18]) that could be traced back to an Athonite source like (13) Ath. Typikon [12].

B. Lives of the Monks

1. Number of Monks

Pakourianos apparently did not share the misgivings of (22) Evergetis [23] about setting a fixed number of positions for the monks in his foundation. He decrees [6] that there should be fifty, not including the superior, the number of which “should never fall short” [25]. His own relatives who were monks had first preference [25], followed by other tonsured Georgians. He did not want [24] any Greeks admitted to the monastery, however, “lest anyone cause harm to the monastery or appoint someone opposed to the place and eager to gain control over it or gain for himself the leadership or appropriate the monastery on some other abominable pretext.”

2. Liturgical Duties

Pakourianos instructs [6] that twenty-seven of the fifty monks established in the foundation were to “spend their time in singing the hymns of the holy church.” Those responsible presumably included the ecclesiarch, the six priests, two deacons, and two subdeacons. Therefore the purpose of the foundation, judging from the assignment of personnel, was predominantly liturgical.

Unlike (22) Evergetis, this typikon, a more purely administrative document than any of its predecessors, contains no detailed instructions for the performance of services. A liturgical typikon, most likely patterned after that employed at Panagios, must have filled [12] the deficiency. The priests were to celebrate [7] liturgies on four days of the week and on feast days. Pakourianos obliges [12] the monks to carry out all the required services “continuously without fail like some inescapable debt.” On the remaining three days of ordinary weeks, the priests were free to celebrate for whomever they chose.

23. PAKOURIANOS

As in (10) Eleousa [13] and (22) Evergetis [11], two other eleventh-century foundations dedicated to the Mother of God, the patronal feast, here (and in (22) Evergetis [11]) the Dormition, called for [11] a celebration in “as splendid and zealous manner,” rivaling the festivities in “the most famous and greatest churches.” Even women, who were usually banned from the foundation, were allowed [23] access to the church on this feast day.

3. Other Offices

Two property administrators (epitropoi), a sacristan/treasurer (skeuophylax kai docheiarios), a wine steward (oinochoos), a refectorian (trapezarios), a guestmaster (xenodochos), an infirmarian (gerotrophos kai nosokomos), and an overseer (epiteretes) are listed [6] among the officers of the monastery engaged in services aside from the liturgy.

4. Manual Labor

The monks engaged [6] in the performance of manual labors were the lamplighter (lychnaptes), the baker (artopoiios), the cook (mageiros), the wine steward (oinochoos), and the gatekeeper (pyleonarios). Pakourianos cites [14] Basil of Caesarea for the idea that psalm singing and the performance of manual labor are not incompatible, and asks [18] each monk, whatever his assigned task, to pray for the emperors, the army “devoted to Christ,” and his own soul. The implication of further discussion, however, is that manual labor has acquired [6] connotations of punishment, an assignment for “people whose characters are not reliable nor hearts repentant” (cf. the discussion in (9) Galesios [182], [185]).

5. Sacramental Life

Aside from obliging [13] the monks to make daily confession exclusively to their superior (cf. (22) Evergetis [7], [15]), there is no further discussion of sacramental life, e.g., regulation of the reception of communion, etc.

6. Cenobitic Lifestyle

Pakourianos provides [4] a stern endorsement of the fundamentals of cenobitic life, including a common dining table, no distinctions in food (different kinds of bread) or in drink (better and lesser vintages of wine), no private pursuits (perhaps crafts or trades are meant here) of any kind, no possession of animals, and no storing up or consumption of edibles in cells.

7. Personal Possessions

Since the superior was expected [5] to be an example to the monks by having no private possessions, we must assume that this discipline was generally expected of the monks also even though the typikon does not provide for the rigorous enforcement of monastic poverty seen in (22) Evergetis [22]. Since the monks were granted [9] a monetary allowance to purchase clothing and perhaps other “necessities,” the implication is that certain personal possessions were in fact permitted that would not have been allowed at Evergetis.

8. Relations with Family

This typikon is also more indulgent in permitting the monks to continue ties with their families than is the case in (22) Evergetis [22], where even correspondence is banned without permission of the superior. Here at Petritzonitissa, Pakourianos makes [8] provision for entertaining friends and family of the superior or one of the brothers. Monks were not allowed to entertain guests in their cells, however, as they did under very different conditions in (21) Roidion [B5].

9. Servants

In an important accommodation to privilege, the typikon allows [4] a monk who is “one of the very exalted or someone used to luxurious living” to have a personal servant and be excused from certain cenobitic requirements such as eating meals in the refectory, for “in the case of such people attendants must be appointed, and a weak nature must be consoled by giving the necessary help.” This is in accord with the practice in (19) Attaleiates [42], written for a contemporary, unreformed institution, but in flagrant opposition to (22) Evergetis [24].

Pakourianos was unwilling to allow [5] the superior to have his servant (or a relative) serving in any office either within the monastery or without, perhaps because he feared this would facilitate the privatization of the foundation.

10. Cohabitation of Older and Younger Monks

Citing patristic precedent and canon law, Pakourianos strongly condemns [17] the introduction of eunuchs and young boys into the monastery. This was in accordance with an older tradition exemplified by (13) Ath. Typikon [34], [48] and, in part, (3) Theodore Studites [18]. While not addressing this issue directly, the contemporary authors of (22) Evergetis [24] and (10) Eleousa [5] provide for pairing older and younger monks in cells. The author of (19) Attaleiates [30], however, actually requires that his monks be eunuchs. Earlier in the eleventh century, our documents note the disruptive presence of homoerotically attractive youths in (9) Galesios [196] and on Mount Athos in (15) Constantine IX [1], [15]. For some reason this was not a concern of the Evergetian reform movement.

11. Diet

Pakourianos expects [8] that the monks at Petritzonitissa should be well fed, with three dishes a day the usual standard and four courses on certain feast days. The monks were also to receive four measures of wine. The superior is instructed not to curtail the diet, and was in fact encouraged to make additions to it “to blunt the impulses of those who favor indulgence.”

Unlike Nikon, author of (20) Black Mountain [72], Pakourianos was unwilling to tolerate [15] monks who imposed upon themselves rigorist dietary observances beyond those practiced by the community as a whole. Pakourianos considers such monks wilful and vain, and refers to a condemnation of them in the typikon of Panagios. This suggests that the founder anticipated some difficulty from monks who might not find the latter’s “middle road” sufficiently challenging.

12. Clothing

In his regulation of clothing, Pakourianos announces [9] a break with the practice at Panagios, where clothing was communally distributed to the monks, presumably from the monastery’s store-rooms. Here Pakourianos orders that the monks be paid an allowance (roga) on Easter Sunday so that they could buy their necessities at a fair held adjacent to the monastery. For this purpose, Pakourianos divides the community into three orders of 15, 15, and 20 monks respectively. The superior receives the largest allowance, and progressively lesser allowances are set for the monks in the three ranks. Thus, in sharp distinction to (22) Evergetis [26], inequality in dress was a fundamental fact of life at Petritzonitissa.

C. Constitutional Matters

1. Independent and Self-Governing Status

In one indubitably important and progressive provision, Pakourianos deliberately rejects [3] the traditional private form of organization and establishes instead a free (eleuthera) and self-governing (autexousia) constitution for his foundation, making it exempt from interference either by his own relatives (see also [18]) or by public authorities of the emperor or the ecclesiastical hierarchy. Pakourianos singles out the metropolitan of Philippoupolis for mention in this connection. So that the foundation might be safe from harassment at his “harmful hands,” Pakourianos was unwilling to allow the local prelate to receive even the customary commemoration (anaphora) in the liturgies conducted at the monastery (cf. Manuel of Stroumitza’s suspicion of his own successors in (10) Eleousa [16]).

In choosing the independent form of government also endorsed by his contemporaries the authors of (22) Evergetis [12] and (with more reluctance) (10) Eleousa [18], Pakourianos consciously rejects [18] the traditional private form of organization in which “some who set up monasteries . . . put [them] under the authority of their relatives in succession after the death of the founder.” Pakourianos claims from his own experience to have seen quarreling heirs dispute these foundations in courts, which often awarded them to unjust and unworthy claimants. Thus, choosing between the traditional and the newly popular form of organization for his foundation, Pakourianos came to the opposite decision of the author of (19) Attaleiates [14], who was willing to let his foundation become independent only after his family line died out.

Not content with simply asserting the foundation’s independence, Pakourianos also warns off [18] his own relatives and associates, damning anyone seeking to make a “despicable profit” from the foundation or its assets with the traditional curse of the 318 fathers of the Council of Nicaea. This stern attitude should be compared to the forthright acceptance of profit-taking seen in (19) Attaleiates [24]. Whereas the author of the latter document thought it unfair to deprive his relatives of some of the financial benefits of a foundation that formed the greater part of his estate, Pakourianos designates his foundation as his “appointed and substitute heir” on which his relatives were to have no claim. Like his contemporaries the authors of (10) Eleousa [18] and (19) Attaleiates [INV 10], [INV 11], he also took [33E] the precaution of obtaining an imperial chrysobull to bolster his foundation’s autonomy and immunities.

2. Leadership

Pakourianos asserts [5] his prerogative to appoint superiors for the foundation as long as he should live: “Whomsoever I install as superior shall be so.” He intended that his appointee should have lifetime tenure, provided he lived righteously. The superior was allowed to choose his own successor in turn, not out of consideration for kinship or blood relationship (lest the foundation become privatized again), but “by the choice and testimony of the brotherhood.” Should he die beforehand, the “better and virtuous and more learned brothers” (cf. (22) Evergetis [13]) would make the choice, perhaps with the endorsement of the brotherhood as a whole.

Pakourianos' first choice [30] as superior was the monk Gregory, whom he had entrusted with the construction of the monastery. The pattern of a monk erecting a foundation on commission from a lay patron is an old one—cf. (13) Ath. Typikon [2], [8]—and useful, since in this way a religious leader who was not himself a wealthy man, could still gain access to the resources necessary to build and maintain a monastery.

Pakourianos was anxious, however, that the necessarily strong position of the superior in an independent foundation should not tempt him to consider it his own. Therefore he orders [5] that superiors “have no power to regulate anything on their own” (see also [18]), and he limits [30] posthumous liturgical commemoration to superiors who preserve the typikon.

3. Senior Monks

As in (22) Evergetis, there was a group of senior monks at Petrizonitissa, who had certain responsibilities of leadership. At this foundation, they were to select [5] the new superior if the old one died suddenly “as is usually the way” without designating his own successor. Pakourianos also appeals [19] to these monks to take it upon themselves to expel the superior or other official if such a person is found who “disposes of the property of the monastery and its sacred possessions wrongly and recklessly.” However, Pakourianos does not seem to have envisioned a role for these monks as advisors to the superior like that found in (22) Evergetis [14].

As usual, membership in the group is not defined, perhaps because Pakourianos wished to allow some flexibility in the determination of its composition. It may, however, have been similar or identical to those who were [9] in the first order of monks (up to 15) for distribution of clothing allowances, namely the two property administrators, the ecclesiarch, the sacristan, the older priests, and “as many as are notable among the brothers” and of similar character to the superior.

4. Endorsement of Authoritarian Rule

Pakourianos chooses to endorse [15] an old-fashioned authoritarian model for his foundation: “All that is laid down by the superior is law, and those subordinate to him must not . . . contradict him or oppose him in any way.” Like (22) Evergetis [14], he values [6] unanimity of mind and spirit, expressed in unquestioning obedience of the monks to the superior. He declares [13] that “there is no worse calamity than this, when someone is insubordinate to the superior himself and speaks improperly in his presence.” Such backtalkers were to be expelled from the community.

5. Patronal Privileges

As noted above, Pakourianos considers [5] it his right, like any patron of a traditional foundation, to appoint the superior during his lifetime. Otherwise, the founder had rather modest expectations of patronal privilege, in keeping with the foundation's status as an independent and self-governing monastery. He orders [12] three lamps to burn continuously at his tomb. There were also to be commemorative donations [21] twice yearly after memorial services for Pakourianos and his late brother Apasios, who had offered [2] a property to the institution in which he was buried. The founder personalizes [21] the monks' responsibility for the performance of these services by declaring, “In our commemoration you should remind yourselves, brothers, as you look at this delightful house of God which is our church, of the annual income and the other revenues, bearing in mind that after God we have been responsible for these.” The founder also insists [25] that his relatives who were already monks should have first preference for admission to the monastery, though relatives who were not of “a virtuous way of life” were to have no special claim on admission—a necessary safeguard to prevent Petrizonitissa from privatization as a family concern.

D. Financial Matters

1. Financial Administration

After a century or more of widespread abuses, reform sentiment favored very strict standards of financial probity. Pakourianos requires that the financial officers of his foundation be accountable on a regular basis to their superiors. He himself had been held to a similar standard of accountability during his career, as references [33] to chrysobulls of exoneration for various tenures of administration make clear. That should make it less surprising that he holds [26] the superior himself (who as a kind of bursar had a more active role in financial administration than in other institutions that followed the Studite tradition of (4) Theodore Studites [22]), responsible for providing accounts to the stewards (oikonomoi), the treasurer and the brotherhood each Easter. Officials convicted of improper or “foolish” expenditures were required to make up the losses and had to relinquish their posts.

Pakourianos also makes [26] an interesting provision for setting aside a reserve fund for unanticipated needs; any additional savings were to be invested in acquisitions of real estate.

2. Inalienability of Property

Pakourianos speaks [2] proudly of his donations of icons, relics, lamps and ecclesiastical vestments and also provides [33] an inventory of them. Listed in this inventory are copies of the Moralia of Basil of Caesarea and the Heavenly Ladder of John Klimakos, both favorite sources for monastic reformers in this era, as well as an unidentified book of Theodore the Studite. There is also a list of imperial chrysobulls and other official documents kept (presumably for better safekeeping) in the church of Hagia Sophia in Constantinople. Among the chrysobulls kept at the monastery was one (now lost) confirming the foundation’s independent constitution. All of this documentation reflects the contemporary preoccupation with curbing corruption both in public and private affairs.

Pakourianos’ warning [33] against the alienation of the foundation’s movable properties, while backed up with an appeal to heavenly vengeance, does not show the obsessive concern or use the ideologically charged language of (22) Evergetis [19]. This suggests that Pakourianos’ typikon was written too soon to reflect the full impact of the bitter controversy in the 1080s over Alexios Komnenos’ requisitions of ecclesiastical furnishings (keimelia). Citing a “rule (typos) of the monasteries of the East and the West” (reference uncertain), Pakourianos does forbid [32] the sale or even leasing of immovable property. Properties were also not to be assigned to one of the monks (i.e., as an adelphaton, as in (21) Roidion [A2]), but could of necessity be leased to the peasants (paroikoi) for cultivation.

3. Commemorative Observances

Aside from the required observances for the founder [12], his brother Apasios [21], the superior [30], and departed monks [27], Pakourianos also permits [20], cf. [27] the acceptance of gifts (prosenexeis) from lay benefactors for daily or joint commemorations, provided that “there is no occasion for harm to the monastery nor likelihood of innovation.” Even the scrupulous (22) Evergetis [36] did not worry about accepting outside donations from this source, though (20) Black Mountain [85] was more sceptical, and much later, (46) Akropolites [8] illustrates how they might have a burdensome impact on a foundation. A priest was to be stationed [27] in a funerary chapel of St. John the Forerunner to “carry out there the commemoration of the dead always and unflinchingly.”

E. Overall Philosophy

The general philosophy of Petrizonitissa, borrowed presumably from Panagios, was more old-fashioned and accepting of privileges than the fervently reformist (22) Evergetis. While the author of the latter denounced quarrels over seating at meals in the strongest language [9], Pakourianos simply provides [8] that the superior should organize seating so that “no confusion or disorder should arise.” Pakourianos’ rationale for permitting [4] servants to the sick, old and “very exalted” is also revealing: “For arising from this there will not be any irregularity nor a change in the community law nor yet any great harm nor innovation either in the spiritual principles or even in the activities of the place.” In other words, Pakourianos expected that his monks would understand that the high-born would be entitled to privileges, even in apparent violation of the cenobitic lifestyle. Indeed, regulations motivated by egalitarian sentiment are few and far between in the typikon, but include the provisions for diet [8], and the exhortation [5] to the superior that he show love equally for all the monks in the community.

F. External Relations

1. Institutional Philanthropy

Pakourianos’ typikon shows a more contemporary attitude with its numerous provisions for institutional philanthropy. This was hardly a unique characteristic of reform monasteries, seeing that philanthropic foundations had been joined to monasteries in our documents since (16) Mount Tmolos in the late tenth century. Pakourianos’ contribution to philanthropy includes support [29] for three hospices (xenodocheia) intended to serve travellers and the poor and furnished with beds and stoves. The founder intended that the level of hospitality should be upgraded “to become the finest and of a superior kind” if future increases in the monastery’s revenue should permit.

Pakourianos’ foundation also features [31] a school at the dependency of St. Nicholas where the training in holy scriptures of six boys intended to become priests was to take place under the tutelage of an old priest. Since the priest was also obliged to perform memorial liturgies for Pakourianos’ father, uncle and cousin, St. Nicholas may have been a traditional family church or chapel, now subordinated to the independent foundation of Petrizonitissa.¹⁷ If they proved themselves worthy, the boys were guaranteed positions at the monastery on reaching adulthood.

In addition to these philanthropic foundations, Pakourianos’s typikon provides [10] for distribution of food and money on fast days to “brothers in Christ” (i.e., the poor) at the monastery’s gate. In another place in the typikon, there is a provision [21] for charitable donations of cash to the “brothers in Christ” in conjunction with the commemorative services for Pakourianos and his brother Apasios. In apparent contradiction of his provision in [26] that surplus income be used to build up a reserve fund and to purchase additional landed property, Pakourianos here urges that this money be given away to the “brothers in Christ,” for this purpose defined as not only the poor but also the hired laborers and the dependent peasants who served the monastery.

23. PAKOURIANOS

2. Fairness to the Peasantry

Regardless of how his foundation’s surplus income was actually employed, Pakourianos was anxious, in the spirit of his times, to vindicate his reputation for fairness to the dependent peasantry who worked on the monastery’s lands. He asserts [1] that he erected the various components of the foundation with his own money, not as “the result of any wrongdoing or even forced labor (angareia), additional requisitions (parolke), or the exceedingly abusive imposition (hyperepereia) on my peasants, with them being forced to suffer for the building of holy churches or for the building of the monastery around them . . .”

Notes on the Introduction

1. For details, see Gautier, “Pakourianos,” pp. 6–19. Ms. Chios Koraes 1598 also contains a medieval Georgian version of the typikon, which Gautier (p. 17) considered to be “more polished, less faulty [than the Greek version], and nearly always comprehensible.”
2. There are also two translations of the Georgian version: Latin, by Tarchnischvili, Typicon Gregorii Pacuriani, and Russian, by Chanidzé, Gruzinskii monastyr v Bolgarii i ego tipik.
3. For the form, see Petit, “Typikon,” p. xxi, endorsed by Gautier, “Pakourianos,” p. 18.
4. See the partisan summary in Chanidzé, “Bakurianis-Dzé,” pp. 135–66; cf. Garsoïan, “Pakourianos,” p. 1553.
5. Based on a necrological note in an Iveron ms. of that date, trans. Chanidzé, “Bakurianis-Dzé,” p. 164.
6. See Lemerle, “Le typikon de Grégoire Pakourianos (Décembre 1083),” Cinq études, pp. 164–83, for a full discussion of Pakourianos’ military career and his landed properties.
7. Anna Komnena, Alexiad 9.5, ed. Bernard Leib (Paris, 1967); see discussion in Grishin, “Evidence,” p. 93, n. 42.
8. (23) Pakourianos [30], with Grishin, “Evidence,” p. 93, n. 51.
9. Anna Komnena, Alexiad 6.14, ed. Leib.
10. For the later history of the foundation, see Chavrukov, Bulgarian Monasteries, pp. 15, 334–41; Grishin, “Evidence,” pp. 93–96; and Talbot and Cutler, “Petritzos Monastery,” p. 1644.
11. Bačkovo monastery library Ms. graecus 50, 143; see Grishin, “Evidence,” pp. 93–94 for details.
12. Chanidzé, Gruzinskii monastyr, pp. 354–62; cf. earlier defective edition by Petit, “Typikon,” pp. xix–xx; see discussion by Grishin, “Evidence,” p. 96.
13. See the differing accounts in Lemerle, Cinq études, pp. 115–16, and Chanidzé, “Bakurianis-Dzé,” pp. 134–35.
14. For the ossuary, see Bakalova, Kostmitsa, esp. pp. 27–28; Stamov and Angelova, Heritage, pp. 113–15; and Grishin, “Evidence.”
15. For this foundation, see Janin, Géographie, vol. 3, pp. 385–86.
16. Sancti Athanasi Athonitae Vita Secunda (Vita B), chap. 78, ed. Noret, Vitae duae antiquae sancti Athanasii Athonitae (Louvain, 1982), p. 211.
17. See also the family burial church of St. Barbara’s in the Testament (Diatyposis) of Eustathios Boilas, ed. Lemerle, Cinq études, p. 27.

Bibliography

- Amantos, K., “Cheirographa tes mones tou Gregoriou Pakourianou para ten Stenimachon,” Thrakika 10 (1938), 234–52.
- , “Mikra Thrakika meletemata, B’, Cheirographa tes mones tou Gregoriou Pakourianou para ten Stenimachon,” Thrakika 10 (1938), 234–52.

ELEVENTH CENTURY

- Arutyunova [-Fidanyan], V. A., “K voprosu ob anthropoi v ‘Tipike’ Grigoriya Pakuriana,” VV 29 (1969), 63–76.
- Bakalova, Elka, Bačkovskata Kostnitsa (Sofia, 1977).
- Beck, Hans-Georg, Kirche und theologische Literatur im byzantinischen Reich (Munich, 1959), p. 646.
- Bobchev, Sava N., Bachkovskata Kostnitsa (Sofia, 1960).
- Bompaire, Jacques, “Les catalogues de livres-manuscrits d’époque byzantine (XIe–XVe s.),” in Byzance et les Slaves, Études de Civilisation: Mélanges Ivan Dujčev (Paris, 1979), p. 63.
- Chanidzé, Akaki, “Le grand domestique de l’occident, Gregorii Bakurianis-Dzé, et le monastère géorgien fondé par lui en Bulgarie,” Bedi Kartlisa 28 (1971), 133–66.
- , Gruzinskii monastyr v Bolgarii i ego tipik (Tbilisi, 1971). Edition of the Georgian version based on Ms. Chios Koraes 1598, with a Russian translation at pp. 279–329.
- Chavrukov, G. I., Bulgarian Monasteries (Sofia, 1974), pp. 334–41.
- Garsoïan, Nina, “Pakourianos,” ODB, p. 1553.
- Grishin, Sasha, “Literary Evidence for the Dating of the Bačkovo Ossuary Frescoes,” Byzantina Australiensia 1 (1978), 90–100.
- Kalavrezou-Maxeiner, Ioli, Byzantine Icons in Steatite (Vienna, 1985), pp. 74–77.
- Katicic, Radoslav, “Hai pros Pakourianous epistolai tou Theophylaktou archiepiskopou Achridos,” EEBS 30 (1960–61), 386–97.
- Kaouchschischvili, Simon, Typikon Gregorii Pacuriani (= Georganica. Scriptorum byzantinorum excerpta ad Georganiam pertinentia 5) (Tbilisi, 1963). First edition of the Greek version based on Ms. Chios Koraes 1598, with Georgian translation.
- Kolev, K.A., “Purvoto uciliste otkrito ot Grigoriya Bakuriani,” Duchovna kultura 65.6 (1976), 10–21.
- Konidares, Ioannes M., “To typikon tou Pakourianou kai he ‘hieratike schole’ tes mones Petritzou,” in Antidoron pneumatikon timetikos tomos Gerasimou Io. Konidare (Athens, 1981), pp. 156–69.
- Lemerle, Paul, “Le typikon de Grégoire Pakourianos (Décembre 1083),” Cinq études sur le XI^e siècle byzantin (Paris, 1977), pp. 115–91. Includes a summary of the document, pp. 131–57.
- Lomouri, N., Kistorii Gruzinskogo Petriconskogo Monastyria (Tbilisi, 1981).
- Mamone, Kyriake, “Paratereseis epi tou typikou tes mones Petritzou (Mpatskobou),” EEBS 43 (1977–78), 329–44.
- Mousaios (Stenimachites), Georgios, Gregorios Pakourianos megas domestikos tes Dyseos kai to hyp’ autou typikon tes mones tes Theotokou tes Petritzonitisses (Leipzig, 1888). The editio princeps, but based on a modern Greek version of 1792 (= Ms. Chios Koraes 1599).
- Oeconomus, Lysimaque, La vie religieuse dans l’empire byzantin au temps des Comnènes et des Anges (Paris, 1918), pp. 193–94.
- Petit, Louis, “Typikon de Grégoire Pacourianos pour le monastère de Petritzos (Bačkovo) en Bulgarie,” VV prilozhenie 11, no. 1 (1904). Edition based on Codex Bucharest, Library of the Romanian Academy, 694 (18th c.).
- Skoulatos, Basile, Les personnages byzantins de l’Alexiade (Louvain, 1980), pp. 112–15.
- Stamov, S., Angelova, R., et al., The Architectural Heritage of Bulgaria (Sofia, 1972), pp. 306–9.
- Talbot, Alice-Mary, and Cutler, Anthony, “Petritzos Monastery,” ODB, p. 1644.
- Tarnichschvili, M. Typicon Gregorii Pacuriani (CSCO 143, Scriptores iberici 4) (Louvain, 1954). Editio princeps of the Georgian version based on Ms. 581, National Library, Sofia (1702 A.D.). CSCO vol. 144 is the accompanying Latin translation.
- Volk, Robert, Gesundheitswesen und Wohltätigkeit im Spiegel der byzantinischen Klostertypika (Munich, 1983), pp. 93–104.

23. PAKOURIANOS

Translation

The typikon issued by the megas domestikos of the West, lord Gregory Pakourianos, for the monastery of the very holy Mother of God Petritziotissa founded by him.

[Prologue]

By the help and goodness of the revered and life-giving Trinity that has fashioned everything and sustains it, the Father without beginning and his word the Son without beginning and his life-giving Spirit of the same substance, the one divinity and power, into which we have been baptized and which we worship as our ancestors did, confident through our hope and sure trust in this we will begin to speak and write about the task which was prescribed for us [p. 21] and was the object of our desire and prayer, that is, the formation of our newly established monastery, as will be revealed in what follows next concerning the limit and number of the monks in it and concerning the ordinance and rule by which they will live together to the honor and glory of our all-immaculate mistress the Mother of God.

In the locality of the fort called Petritzos all the monks knowing the Georgian script and language have been gathered and organized into the monastery recently built through the providence and with the help of the God of all by me, Gregory, by the goodwill of God the sebastos and megas domestikos of all the West, the true son of Pakourianos now at blessed rest,¹ the preeminent Prince of Princes, by birth from among those of the East from the most brilliant race of the Georgians. I add that I am the founder of this monastery and place of my burial established by God and newly built, which has been named for the honor and glory of the Mother of Christ our God, and of its far-famed and most beautiful holy church and in it the most beautiful tabernacle of God, built for my help, redemption, and salvation and in addition that of my own brother, the magistros Apasios, of happy memory.

As I was connected in brotherhood, close friendship, and in spiritual attitude with the monks in the most holy monastery of Panagios which is situated in the great city of the most mighty and holy Constantine also called New Rome, and as their whole monastic rule² and organization seemed to be and was very much “in accordance with the will” (Eph. 1:5) of God and “those who truly love him” (II John 1), I also decided in this monastery newly founded by me with God’s help and in the said holy church to organize and establish the whole ecclesiastical procedure and the manner of the monks’ living and eating following in every way their rules and regulations, so that these men too will live together by the providence of God imitating them, both the one who heads the monastery and those belonging to the most holy office of the priesthood with all the rest of the brotherhood, as their rules will be revealed in order below.

Since those very civilized men, accustomed to good living and brought up within that prosperous and populous city, being thus disciplined by their most blessed and angelic founder, keep unshaken the rule laid down for them steadfastly and securely, [p. 23] how much more should not we, my fathers and brothers, whose lot it is to be set by God in this recently founded holy monastery, we being Georgians, having had a varied military career and a very hard experience of life, now that we happen to have settled in a suitable place far removed from any cause of harm to monks since we have no way to get to towns nor are we troubled by anything else improper, and since there is the clearest water and all kinds of fruit and vegetables highly valued by us since childhood or from the times of our ancestors, how should we too not gladly be subject to their rules, observing the regulation of those who follow closely the pattern of their orders? But if—something I pray may not happen—contrary to the rules laid down now by us someone goes against the rule of the aforesaid most holy monastery of Panagios desiring a life of luxury or rest, let this man go out in peace wherever he wishes and find his own place of rest. For the founder and superior of Panagios,³ mentioned before and now in his glorious inheritance, being very wise in the things of God and having given up the excesses and defects of everyday life, decreed that those under his instruction should walk along the middle and most “royal road.”⁴ For side-turnings are always perilous and very dangerous.

ELEVENTH CENTURY

So the contents of the sacred volume which truly glorifies the monastic life and which was compiled by us from the rule of the often-mentioned most holy monastery of Panagios, in short, set down in chapters the things which should be contemplated and carried out by the monks and the principles by which in all points they should live. They are as follows and to them we have added few things we thought were right. [p. 25]

Synopsis or table of the chapters⁵ in the present typikon clearly laid out for finding at a glance.

Chapter One: Concerning the way this most holy monastery of the Georgians was founded.

Chapter Two: Concerning how and what dedications were made to this holy church both from my possessions and those of my own brother of blessed memory—of movable, immovable, and animate property.

Chapter Three: Concerning the fact that this monastery should be free from every kind of imposition and annoyance from emperor and patriarch and the removal of any of the things in it.

Chapter Four: Concerning the fact that the monks, that is all the brotherhood, should be completely prevented from living privately each of them in his own cell or acting independently or possessing food or anything else at all.

Chapter Five: Concerning how the superior should be chosen for the leadership of the monks and how his successor should be raised to this office and ministry in this monastery.

Chapter Six: Concerning the quantity, that is, the number of the monks, because the number of them laid down by us must not fail, and concerning the fact that an offering should not be taken from them, and concerning how, and how many of them should be appointed to the offices and services of the monastery.

Chapter Seven: Concerning the priests carrying out priestly duties, how they ought to choose and appoint them, and how they should carry out the divine service each week or on how many and which days in each week they should carry out the divine service and remember us and those who are remembered by us.

Chapter Eight: Concerning the preparation of the table and concerning the silence and quietness of those serving.

Chapter Nine: Concerning clothes or the payment for them, when and how the superior ought to distribute this to the monks.

23. PAKOURIANOS

Chapter Ten: Concerning abstinence during the three holy fasts, how we ought to carry them out with abstinence and show beneficence and charity to our brothers in Christ.

Chapter Eleven: Concerning the feast of our holy church and the other famous and glorious feasts of our Lord, [p. 27] also those of the victorious and holy martyrs and all the other saints, how they ought to celebrate them in a splendid and holy manner.

Chapter Twelve: Concerning the lighting that should be in the holy church and concerning the prayer and singing of hymns, how they should pray quietly and without disturbance.

Chapter Thirteen: Concerning the fact that every day all the brothers must confess their sins to the superior and all their intentions in deed and word and thought.

Chapter Fourteen: Concerning the manual labor and toil of the monks and the fact that during their labor they must sing hymns diligently.

Chapter Fifteen: Concerning the rule that the brothers should not travel about outside the monastery without the instruction of the superiors and concerning those who pray hypocritically in the middle of the congregation.

Chapter Sixteen: Concerning the administrators of the monastery appointed according to the rule and so named that they truly carry out the care of souls.

Chapter Seventeen: Concerning the fact that the superior should be strict and give his orders so as to provide security and prevent eunuchs entering the monastery and young boys too.

Chapter Eighteen: Concerning the fact that the monastery should exist free from the power and injury of our relations and from exaction on all other commodities of every sort in it.

Chapter Nineteen: Concerning the position if the superior of the monastery errs in some way or someone else of those dealing with its ministries or spending its money recklessly, that they should not only be prevented from doing so but also be banished and driven away completely.

Chapter Twenty: Advice on deciding from which lay people offerings ought to be accepted for the salvation of souls and on the offering of divine liturgies for them.

Chapter Twenty-One: Instruction to the brothers concerning my commemoration and that of our family and about the brothers having a memorial repast and distributing coins on the day of our remembrance, and in addition showing abundant beneficence to the poor.

Chapter Twenty-Two: Concerning dead superiors and other brothers, how they ought to bury them and remember them continually with prayers and supplications. [p. 29]

Chapter Twenty-Three: Concerning the fact that a woman should not be permitted to enter our holy church nor a monastery for women be built within its boundaries.

Chapter Twenty-Four: Concerning the fact that no Greek monk or priest should be appointed in this monastery and for what reason.

Chapter Twenty-Five: Concerning our relatives and my men of Georgian origin who have chosen to be monks in this monastery, how those in the monastery ought to receive them, and how the men themselves ought to have the right attitude and live in this monastery in a good and becoming way.

ELEVENTH CENTURY

Chapter Twenty-Six: Concerning the steward and the other officers being called to account by the superior and the superior by the community of the brothers.

Chapter Twenty-Seven: Concerning the continuous commemoration of the dead and the unceasing appeasing of God for their souls with divine liturgies.

Chapter Twenty-Eight: Concerning the presence inside the monastery of a home for the old, and how they ought to give the old men in the monastery a fitting rest and comfort them.

Chapter Twenty-Nine: Concerning the three hospices built by us in Stenimachos, beside Marmaron, and at Prilonkos, and how they were established by us.

Chapter Thirty: Concerning the first superior Gregory Baninos appointed by us, how after his death he ought to be remembered and on what day.

Chapter Thirty-One: Concerning the youths, where they ought to live and how they ought to be instructed and whether they should enter into the great monastery, and about the priest officiating in the church of Saint Nicholas.

Chapter Thirty-Two: Concerning the fact that the superior should not hand over the day-to-day running and the established order to one of the brothers or someone outside them or transfer any of the monastery's possessions.

Chapter Thirty-Three: Concerning the safekeeping of the document of this typikon and the observing of what is contained in it unchanged and intact.

Chapter One

Concerning the way this most holy monastery of the Georgians was founded.

Since it is profitable and the duty of every faithful orthodox Christian who has been baptized into the holy and awful name of the revered [p. 31] Trinity, the Father and the Son and the Holy Spirit, always to expect the end that is common to all, to take thought for the day of his death, to expect the resurrection of everyone and himself from the dead, and to meditate on that fearful and awful examination in the just judgment of Christ our God and Savior and the just requital for each of his deeds; and since it is our duty to take thought for these things with all our power while we go about in this life and to strive in every way to live wisely, to gain salvation from that fearful and “eternal punishment” and the threat of “hell fire” (Matt. 25:46; 5:22) according to that holy voice in the gospel concerning that [threat], and hence each one “to give” to God “the ransom” (Matt. 20:28) for his own soul and as it were to provide some opportunity for the unimaginable goodness and mercy of God and as a result achieve these things and to do good, each one according to his own power, and by struggling in this way to be rid of the vain snares of “Mammon” (Luke 16:9), being accepted with affection as spiritual friends in the ages to come—for by doing this we will be reckoned worthy to become joint heirs with those who have gained their everlasting inheritances, to Christ, and to gain release from our sins—for all these reasons, I the often-mentioned sebastos Gregory, and mezas domestikos, the very sinful and unworthy servant of Christ from my earliest youth up to the present time of my old age, being foolish and devoid of every good work and having as a relic of life only the true and orthodox faith of the Christians, of which I was reckoned worthy, following the tradition of this Georgian race, agreeing and corresponding in all doctrinal tradition with the most orthodox and pious race of the Romans and the great church of God among them, though I desired this from the beginning when I was still in the East, I reached the West affected with the same desire and until now I longed to build a very beautiful church and round it a dwelling for monks and in it a burial place for the repose of my sinful bones, but because of the great number of the terrible sins that I had committed and because of the turbulence and change in the world and my movement from place to place and my self-indulgent way of life I was not thought worthy to bring to pass the wish of my heart; but now at the time of my old age, not through my intelligence or knowledge but through the unutterable mercy and goodness of our God and his immeasurable pity towards me, unworthy, [p. 33] worthless in every way, and the least servant of his power, he thought it right that I should rise from the very deep sleep and relaxing indulgence of this life and meditate on the day of my death and the fear that lay before me of my most wicked deeds and reflect and see myself with my inward eyes as empty and bereft of any action pleasing to God.

23. PAKOURIANOS

Wherefore I had recourse to my sure hope and that of all those who have sinned like me, the help and succor of all Christians after God, the very blessed mother of Christ our God, the ever-virgin Mary, immaculate Mother of God, and in addition, to the most glorious and greatest forerunner and baptizer of Christ who surpassed all those “born of women” (Matt. 11:11), Saint John, and likewise to the most splendid great martyr and foremost champion of Christ, the most divine George.⁶ So having made these my guides and intercessors with Christ our God on the fearful day of judgment along with all the other saints beloved of Christ, with all my heart and desire and with great toil and enormous expense “I have built” a site for “a church” (Hosea 8:14) and “a house for the glory of God” (Is. 6:1), and at the same time to the honor and glory of those three most glorious ones I mentioned above, a beautiful and most majestic one, to the best of my power and in accordance with the course of events over the years and among the unsettled people living in the theme of Philippoupolis in its more northerly parts, situated in a strongly protected ravine and on the outskirts of a village called by the local inhabitants Petritzos, and entitled Basilikis which was given to us through an august and honored chrysobull of our mighty and holy rulers in recognition of my many great and bloody struggles and my zealous efforts which I performed from my youth until this time of my old age, never sparing my own blood nor my own relatives who were with me nor also the great multitude of those serving under me for the well-being of the power of his Majesty among wherever I was appointed both in the East and the West to help Roman power, with the result that I came to be held in terrible imprisonments with a number of my relatives and my loyal and most dear people, and all of these were oppressed along with me at the hands of infidels. So, if I say that seldom did any of my relations and of those who served me with pious devotion die a natural death [p. 35] in his own bed, I will in no way be lying. For all of them shed their own blood by the sword and at the hands of the enemies of the divine cross and the Roman Empire.

So now since God has deemed me worthy to accomplish the longing of my heart, the holy churches have been completed with the fortified monastery round them and the cells in it out of my own very great and varied expenditure. For I dare to say that it was not completed with any other money belonging to someone else or as a result of any wrongdoing or even with forced labor, additional requisitions, and exceedingly abusive impositions on my dependent peasants, with them being forced to suffer for the building of holy churches or for the building of the said monastery around them, but from my own rights and personal labors and zealous efforts.

ELEVENTH CENTURY

Chapter Two

Concerning the gifts and dedications dedicated by us in our holy church, about which the document is.

We have given and established property⁷ from the possessions bestowed on us by revered chrysobulls with an inalienable right of family possession, complete ownership and true authority, properties were established as free of tax by the terms of the revered chrysobulls; of these places, first and to begin with, is the fort situated in the same theme of Philippoupolis, that is, the village named Petritzos (generally called Basilikis by the common people) together with the hamlets below it—the field called Iannoba which has now been turned into a monastery, the field Batzakoba, the field Dobrolonkos, the field Dobrostanos, the field Bourseos, the field Lalkouba with that called Abroba—all these fields with the aforementioned fort together with all their territory, established tenure, ancient rights of possession and privilege of every kind and all revenue according to the summary of them in the previous delimitation.

In addition to these I have given the village situated next to these called Stenimachos along with the two forts built by me in it, also their hamlets, i.e. the field of Lipitzos and the field [p. 37] called St. Barbara situated near to Prinezes together with its hermitages of St. Nicholas and St. Elias and St. George situated above and likewise the one situated below near the village, these places similarly complete with all their ancient territory and tenure and according to the delimitation made by me of the places between them and my fort of Bodena. In addition to these I have also given the fort called Baniska with Brysis and all the rest of its villages and hamlets, and further, the pastures with all their territory and ancient tenure. Similarly I have also given in Topolinitza the village of Gelloba [known as] Praitorion with all its territory and tenure.

I have also given to our aforesaid monastery and the holy churches in it the estate called the estate of Zaoutzes with all its territory and ancient tenure in the theme of Boleron in the locality of the military district of Mosynopolis, and inside the fort of Mosynopolis the building sites bought by me and the houses built on them at my own expense, also the buildings bought by our man and agent Vardanes out of our money and similarly the ones inside the fort of Mosynopolis, together with the monastery outside it, the one set up in the name and to the honor of St. George on the mountain called Pappikion, with its vineyards and all fields and gardens and all the rest of its rightful landed property and its dependency inside the fort of Mosynopolis.

Likewise in the same theme I have given the estate situated near the military district called Peritheorion called the estate of Menas and the fields attached to it and all kinds of fields following the very clear description of them in the article of transfer; and inside the fort of Peritheorion the aule situated there, once possessed by Apasios the brother of Achsartanes of blessed memory, the governor there and my brother-in-law, with all its buildings and its varied tenure.

23. PAKOURIANOS

All these places then, the names of which have been written above, I presented to the church of the very holy Mother of God Petritzonitissa in my Georgian monastery from henceforth with all their ancient territory and tenure and all the rightful landed property, also the pairs of plow oxen in them and all the crops sown in them, [p. 39] all the remaining property of movable and animate types, in simple terms all revenue and privilege belonging to them.

My blessed and most true brother who has passed away, magistros Apasios, stated in his written testament, “Wherever my own brother Gregory wishes to build his church and monastery and also a tomb in which he will be put, there also my body should be buried.” In addition to this in many of his other writings, he declared that his village called Prilonkion was a portion for his soul. Prilonkion is situated in the theme of Thessalonike near the archontia called Stephaniana, which was given to him by a revered chrysobull as recompense for his property which he abandoned in great Antioch,⁸ and he decreed in his aforesaid written testament as follows: “If my own brother does not find the chance to build a church and monastery, this village of mine, Prilonkion, should be offered to the place wherever my body is buried.” But since, under the guidance of God, the said revered church and monastery has been built by me, we have acted in accordance with his instruction and command, bringing the coffin with his corpse to this our church in the monastery and we have laid him in our family grave, burying him fittingly because of the intense anguish and grief which afflicts me for his departure from this life.

We did everything that was reasonable on his behalf honorably and lavishly, showing all reverence and all the affection which we had for him, having taken care of everything for the benefit of his soul strictly and truly, and distributing all that was distributed for his soul’s salvation with my own hands from my own treasures and money, accomplishing it well while still in Theodosioupolis. Now that we are in the West, we have given his aforesaid estate of Prilonkion in accordance with his command to our often-mentioned church and to the burial place in it in which his body, very dear to me, has been buried and we have decreed that there should be continuous and fervent prayers for him and divine liturgies carried out daily as has been written below. This village of Prilonkion was given with its ancient forts and the hamlets under it and hospices and all its territory and ancient tenure with all its rights.

In addition to this my blessed brother added the following in his written testament giving me in the form of a legacy out of the places bestowed [p. 41] on him by revered chrysobull, the village which is called Srabikion together with Kaisaropolis which is situated in the theme of Serres in the military district of Zabalta with its lake and the fishing places and the hamlet called Glaunon under it. He made me owner, heir, and established commander of this fort and village. But because of my unbearable longing for him and because I do not need any worldly goods (for by the grace of God and the favor of his goodness, by the help and joy of our mighty and holy emperors and because of my excessive zeal I needed nothing, as has been said), the aforesaid fort and village which he left me as a legacy I have assigned therefore to our aforesaid monastery and the holy church in it and to the family grave in which he was buried, for the salvation of his soul. All the names of the aforementioned forts, villages, and estates, all of which have been given to our holy church and the Georgian monastery called Petritzos, are all listed in the revered and honored chrysobull which has been issued for the monastery.

My aforesaid blessed brother stated and decreed that many other articles from his possessions and wealth should be distributed by my hands for the salvation of his soul, both of money and wealth of every kind, of silver, clothes, and other articles of every sort, and also of animals (for by the favor of God he was rich in every way and not wanting for articles of any kind). Nor did I take back any of my wealth or money which he had in trust, some of which he received openly from my hands, the rest at the time of my appointment as doux of Theodosioupolis and when I went away to the East when he was persuaded by me to carry out the care and administration of all my possessions. He collected the revenues from these and kept them in his possession during all the years that I was on duty in the East; for I had no one more loyal than he or more dear or who cared for my soul, nor did he hold anyone above me. All that was in his keeping as a deposit and the revenues of my possessions were in the old coinage of Romanos [III Argyros], the trachy of [Constantine IX] Monomachos, the coins of [Constantine X] Doukas and the scepter coins; there were also coins minted by Michael [VII Doukas].⁹ After the death of my brother, on my return here from the East I found absolutely nothing left of it all, as I found none of his possessions, that were decreed by him to be distributed on behalf of his soul. [p. 43]

Such properties as have been listed above in this rule were handed over by us to the aforesaid monastery with absolutely all the things in them, i.e., the owners' plow animals, the dependent peasants and all kinds of animals belonging to them, all kinds of land both hill and plain, mountain pastures, land for pasture and for plowing, vineyards, all kinds of plants fruiting and not fruiting, milling establishments worked by water or animals, lakes and the fallow land around them, forts and all kinds of buildings in them and all articles and revenues from the immovable, movable, and animate property both inside and outside them.

In addition to these there are valuable icons, representations of Christ the Savior and all the saints, also valuable crosses with valuable relics of the divine life-giving cross, also holy gospel lectionaries both in the Greek language and script and in that of the Georgians, which were made at very great expense with various stones and pearls and enameling, and sacred vessels for the holy church, patens, chalices, and various silver chandeliers and lamps of every kind, very precious imperial garments laid up in the church, also the garments given to me by our mighty and holy emperor lord Alexios [I Komnenos] from among those which he put on his all-noble and most honored body on the occasion when with the great help and power of his divine right arm and with the good fortune of our holy emperor I crushed and destroyed his most terrible and most arrogant enemies (cf. Ps. 34 [35]:3; 73 [74]:13) who set themselves not only against the Roman Empire but also every race of Christians—I mean the Patzinaks¹⁰ whose defeat and complete destruction is altogether one of the most difficult things to set down in writing. For I am convinced that even for many years after my death the miraculous act of Almighty God which happened then will in no way be forgotten.

Together with these are the very valuable imperial clothes which our almighty and noble emperor gave me when I returned from the capture by the Cumans¹¹ and those which his most fortunate brother [Isaac] the Sebastokrator gave me at that time. Also there are other very valuable pieces of unsewn cloth and certain other different vessels of all kinds connected with the adornment and embellishment of the church which we donated in considerable numbers, wooden icons bearing very large numbers of most pleasing figures of various saints, bronze chandeliers and large numbers of candlesticks, all of which are listed carefully according to their type in this book, [p. 45]

23. PAKOURIANOS

also all kinds of property of movable and animate types, and the number of these things given by us to our church will be easy to see because of this very detailed list registered here.¹²

Chapter Three

Concerning the fact that the holy monastery founded by us should continue free from exactions of every kind.

After all this we declare the holy churches and their most sacred precincts and the solitary places which the bands of celibates frequent in an orderly and reverent manner to be free of all constraints and disputes together with all the places written above. Further, we declare also concerning the bequests to the often-mentioned monastery consisting of immovable, movable, and animate property that they should be free and not liable to constraints in any way like the monastery itself being under its own authority, self-governing, with control over itself and not liable to exactions of any kind whatever; nor sufferings any harassment at harmful hands, whether imperial or patriarchal, or of any of the metropolitans most beloved of God, or of archbishops, or of any other persons of any kind whether ecclesiastic or governmental, or of any of our close or distant relatives, and in particular not suffering any harassment [at the hands] of the metropolitan of Philippoupolis and not being controlled by him in anything so that he should not be mentioned by name in the synapte of this holy church but he will be mentioned jointly with the rest of the archbishops in the phrase “on behalf of every episcopate of the orthodox who correctly expound the word of your truth,”¹³ and likewise at the hands of all sorts of lay persons in authority and religious leaders from the greatest to the least, all as they are listed in the revered word of the chrysobull.¹⁴

Chapter Four

Concerning the monks living completely in common and all brothers being prevented from living on their own in their own cells.

With the approval of our good God and following the tradition of the holy fathers who have gone before us, I, the insignificant and unworthy Gregory, [p. 47] decided to follow them in matters beneficial to our holy monastery and to all the brothers living here that they live as a community wisely and with understanding, the superior and all his followers settling matters among themselves, being completely of one voice and one mind in all divine and human matters, having adapted themselves to a peaceful and quiet life.

There will be one common dining table for them all. I am completely opposed to two sorts of bread or of any other food being brought to the table or two varieties of wine being drunk at it; for since they live as a community one of them ought not to eat better than another or drink better wine, not even their superior himself who should take it particularly upon himself to have humility and a solemn bearing so that he can excel the rest in his observance of the rule.

Further, I forbid all the brothers, any one of them, to make any private decision or arrangement, to follow a pursuit of any kind or possess any animals or hide anything edible in his cell. For these things we utterly deprecate, especially eating and drinking in secret or with shameless wrangling contrary to the habits of moderation and the promises which we made in the presence of God and his angels and not before men, a strict account of which we must give before the terrible judgment-seat of Christ. Nor must they have a vessel for heating water nor prepare cooked food privately and either eat this privately or serve it up openly and cause offense to the brotherhood so there would be, instead of the holy upper room and apostolic table, a trading place of abominations (Acts 1:13; John 2:16).

ELEVENTH CENTURY

But if someone truly desires these things perhaps through weakness of body or very advanced old age this should be considered a necessity and be provided for this reason, and more so if it happens to be one of the very exalted or someone used to luxurious living. For in the case of such people attendants must be appointed, and a weak nature must be consoled by being given the necessary [p. 49] help. For arising from this there will not be any irregularity nor a change in the community law nor yet any very great harm or innovation either in the spiritual principles or even in the activities of the place. But if one of the disobedient or someone through obtuseness and idleness aims at something like this, in this case such a person should not get permission even if he is one of the officials lest instead of benefit and help very great harm is done to the attendants, and those meddling ones who take the wrong view will—to put it this way—of necessity have an involuntary excuse for indiscipline to the destruction of their obedience. The attendant ought to serve for the rest in a manner both wise and pleasing to God and encourage them by his own example of industry.

Individuals keeping food and drink in their own cells and wishing to eat it in secret or openly, this we completely repudiate. For we do not wish any of the brothers privately to possess any thing either great or small, or to receive anything from another person or to give something to another even if he is one of the poorest. For no one should be unaware that there will be no praise for such things; this is a work of the devil and outside the law and it destroys obedience to the rule.

For whenever someone does not have the power to be master of himself how will he control anything else as if it were his own? How does the man who has become subservient to all of his own interests care for those which are not his own? For the man who has denied himself and his own will (cf. Luke 9:23) once and has fallen under the service of righteousness then acts in accordance with his own wishes, what else is it except that he has been freed from righteousness and become a slave to sin? What help will this man be to Christ when he concocts a private righteousness and is not subject to the righteousness of God? How can he be regarded as a charitable and hospitable man whenever he does not put up with the lack of even the smallest things but instead of the article which he will give the poor he will ask for some other new one from the superior to replace the old one which he gave to the poor, wickedly exchanging the useless and the useful? Is there not that you acted not out of generosity and love for the poor but through love of gain and covetousness whenever you yourself, the new and compassionate lover of the poor, loved their need and accepted to be cold and go naked through love for your neighbor? And so in the end would you escape condemnation?

A person should follow rather the direction of the superior and consider this alone to be the law and command and divine injunction, and think that praise is not a thing to be praised and be aware that hospitality [p. 51] is a shared quality and that gifts are given jointly on behalf of all. So the person who does not abide by this but attempts rather more, reckoning on disturbing the heavenly obedience, will be reckoned as no true son and an alien to the brotherhood and if he does not mend his ways he will be thrust out from the holy dwelling.

Chapter Five

Concerning how the superior should be chosen and appointed and after the first superior, concerning how the second should be called to the same ministry and service of the monastery.

More truly and indeed more forcefully than all and before all [must be considered the matter] of all who in turn are going to act as superiors—I speak of what is fitting for the orderly existence of the brotherhood of the monastery about matters which concern me very much. Because of this, exercising all my thought and examining everything and after discussion, I found this to be right and a way rid of all disorder, that while I the founder of the aforesaid monastery am alive, whomsoever I install as superior of the monastery shall be so, and if he lives in righteousness according to the command drawn up by us, he shall remain in leadership until the end of his life. For whenever the superior in office at the time draws near to death, he himself installs the one to be superior after him who is going to shepherd the brotherhood. He appoints this man not because of kinship or any physical attachment but by the choice and testimony of the brotherhood. At the time of [the superior's] death [the superior-elect], [being a man] of ability and intelligence, will have to be most discerning and impartial and thus he will be entrusted with the office of superior through which he is going to lead the brotherhood, having come to this calling not of his own will but by the observance and regulation that I have mentioned above. For I wish them to carry out such an installation in this way but not contrary to the wish of the superior who is about to die.

After the resignation and the departure from this life of the first superior, the second one will have his authority with the advice of all the rest of the brothers of this monastery—and this I repeat, after the death of the superior—in the way that the office of the superior has been clearly explained by us and decreed. But if perhaps it ever happens that the shepherd of the flock is suddenly snatched away as is usually the way and did not have the chance to carry out what has been laid down, then they should appoint the superior by the judgment and with the approval [p. 53] of the better and virtuous and more learned brothers from the brotherhood.

Once again we turn to the superior-elect, that is the new superior, who should live and abide by the leadership of the dead one. Once he has been proposed and appointed with the consent of the superior, this is the way he establishes his leadership. When the superior dies, that is goes away to the Lord, and all the brotherhood has been gathered in the presence of the one about to die and the one who is going to be honored after him, the previous superior hands over to him his leadership in accordance with the rule laid down by us, so that they may all live together according to it and have no power to regulate anything on their own.

On the third day after the burial of the former superior, the recently appointed superior must do the following things: he must complete a night vigil and on the next day after the completion of the divine mystery the recently consecrated superior must stand in front of the holy altar, the whole brotherhood in the order of their rank kneeling to him and embracing him in turn. Then when those who have been called and have attached themselves to the Lord are thus happy, a bountiful table will be set before them. Binding them with an oath I say the same things, that the one who has gained the leadership must preside over the flock with kindness, showing the sincerest kind of righteousness towards the brotherhood in Christ Jesus our Lord “who searcheth hearts and reins” (Ps. 7:9), sharper than any sword “piercing to the division of soul and body” (Heb.

ELEVENTH CENTURY

4:12) and “rendering to every man according to his works” (Rom. 2:6). He should introduce nothing unworthy and unseemly into his flock entrusted to him by Christ, that is the brotherhood for whom he did not labor nor yet suffer hardship not even with personal “toil” (II Cor. 11:27) so as to say like the great apostle Paul, “the lazy man should not eat” (II Thess. 3:10) but he must do everything as if the Son of God himself were watching.

In this way he should carry out all the administration and abstain from all innovation and righteously do what is right. It is enough for them [the superiors] that they have pleasure in things they have not toiled for and in the sweat and labors of others, and where others have suffered hardship with the greatest zeal and the greatest labors, the fruits of which those who have tried know them for certain by, they themselves have now been thought worthy to share in all these without toil and without innovations. [p. 55] Therefore they should give thanks to God worthily and remember us unceasingly as being responsible for these their good things.

They will behave worthily and they will be grateful throughout their lives and thus they should give thanks to the Savior of all that they did not weary themselves traveling about searching for a most beautiful and fertile place. We however underwent this hardship, rushing up and down and traveling to every place among our possessions. While examining all these places and seeking a restful place for a dwelling of brothers, we did not find a more suitable or pleasing one than this. So divine providence working with us thought us entirely worthy of these good things in the first place to find this very pleasing and beautiful retreat. In every way it is most agreeable and furthermore it is very rich in all useful things. It contains in one place all necessities and season by season readily offers each person their use, readily supplying, I assert, the use of spiritual and bodily benefits and, to speak boldly, it is a place like that divine paradise where the most delightful life that was lived by the first man was straightforward, without hardship, and without care there.

This is especially so whenever anyone looks on the beauty of this wonderful and famous church, its decoration and hangings, the emanating sweet fragrance and delight of spiritual grace, the sweet-sounding and harmonious singing of the chants, the traditions that help the soul, guiding it along the most royal of roads, the journey that leads to tranquility and eternal life, and the variety and excellence of the fine things of all kinds which accompany these through which those who stand at the right side of the impartial Judge in the universal theater form an idea of the permanent blessings which they are to enjoy.

Since this is so and all these benefits have become your possession in this way without toil, how should you not thus live a life without sorrow and disorder, and with the most sincere mind sail the very turbulent sea of life with the sweetest wafting from the lightest breezes? Should you not live like the prophets of God who gaze on the divine throne or even the apostles, “scorning,” as Job says, “the crowded cities” (Job 39:7) and despising the voices of the tax-collectors?

More important than all this is that whoever is the superior should in everything be an example by his way of life especially in the matter of having no private possessions. For everything [p. 57] in the monastery is his so he can devote himself to prayers and supplications, adhere to the teaching contained in scripture, and apply himself to watching over the brothers, considering these things more valuable and loftier, as the holy apostle says, “with the weapons of righteousness for right hand and left, in honor and dishonor, in ill repute and good repute, treated as impostors and yet true” (II Cor. 6:7–8). So by “keeping the commands” (I Cor. 7:19) he will be kept safe for the promised life of righteousness and blessedness.

23. PAKOURIANOS

He should show love equally to all, both the old and the young, with the “love of Christ” (II Cor. 5:14) bearing with the faint-hearted and the lazy and, I must add, with the grumblers who are the most annoying and unbearable. For those who bear with them will gain a great reward and become “imitators of God” (Eph. 5:1). After all this, again I give this instruction that any man who has a large number of relatives should not become superior in this my monastery. We forbid this also, that any relative or servant of the superior should be performing any function either in the monastery or in places outside, whether villages, monasteries, or any other places.

Chapter Six

Concerning the amount and number of the monks which has been laid down by us to be unailing and how many of them should work and serve.

So it is our duty to legislate about the number of the monks as follows. Since God the maker of good things, who has formed the nature of men and created the material for all that exists from what formerly did not, has settled the order and rank for each of these with all wisdom and no one supposes that anything is more pleasing or more fitting than their creation, I wish the number of the monks to be up to fifty and the superior to be in addition to them as long as they are adorned with every virtue and shining with divine grace. I do not wish them to be less than fifty in number. I wish the superior to be over and above the fifty, as has been said. I bind by oath the successive superiors in this monastery never to disregard their aforesaid number, but if a [p. 59] decrease in their number should occur through death or some other reasonable chance cause, they should fill up their specified number so that the praise of God and the most earnest prayer to him should never be seen to be feeble. The form of hymn-singing will be very harmonious and unceasing, adorned with godly fear and accompanied with fitting attention and observance.

Out of this number of fifty-one, one is the superior who must be filled with all knowledge and understanding, virtue, fear, and love of God. Two others of them should be administrators, one within the boundaries of Philippoupolis, the other in the districts of Mosynopolis and the areas situated close to this.¹⁵ Another of them should be an ecclesiarch filled with knowledge and having a thorough experience of divine ecclesiastic practices, not lacking in knowledge of the established ritual laid down at the beginning. Six of them should be priests carrying out the divine liturgy, and two should be deacons usually celebrating the liturgy with them, and two others to be sub-deacons active in reading and leading the choir.

Another of them, equally adorned with understanding, experience, fear of God, and love, should be sacristan and treasurer, having the care and keeping of all the sacred treasures of the holy church, also controlling the receiving and paying out of money gathered from everywhere from all kinds of revenues, as if he was going to render account not only to those prominent in the holy monastery but also to Christ our God himself.

Another should be a lamplighter, under the ecclesiarch, dispensing the incense, the oil, the candles, the wine of the offering, and the flour from which the offering of bread is usually made, and he will issue all these things in the fear of God at the proper time. But in the great and distinguished feasts of our Lord at which the service and ministry of the holy church will be increased, it is the duty of the superior to command certain others from the same brotherhood to help and give the necessary assistance to the one continually carrying out the lighting of the lamps.

ELEVENTH CENTURY

Another should be a cellarer, called tanouteres by the Georgians,¹⁶ who according to the regulation of the monks and monasteries must without deceit and offense keep in his possession the bread and all the food supplies and the seasoning, olive oil, wine, and honey, and things like these and must himself issue these carefully at the proper time in the fear of God. Another should be a [p. 61] wine-steward carrying out this service prudently in the fear of God. Another should be a refectorian fulfilling the position of this person in the customary way.

Another should be guest-master and another to tend the old and be infirmarian taking good and wise care of them. Another should be an overseer, being chosen for his virtue and fear of God, whose duty it is to go round the cells of the brothers, and those who were absent from the holy service and did not arrive at the beginning of matins, while the six psalms were still being sung, he should take to the superior and the body of the brotherhood so that each of them may pay the appointed penalty according to custom and the rule. Another should be a baker and another a cook and another a gatekeeper, each of these carrying out his service prudently, carefully and with pious diligence.

All the rest of the brotherhood should spend their time in singing the hymns of the holy church with eagerness, care, and delight both at night and during the day. All these should be “of the same mind and spirit” (Phil. 2:2; I Pet. 3:8), unanimous, always grounded in godly fear and adorned with “love for one another” (I Thess. 3:12) and obedience to their superior for the help and maintenance of the most holy monastery often mentioned by us. So let no one dare to oppose their superior in any way or speak against him when he is giving instruction in divine mysteries in imitation of Christ and like a teacher giving advice for the benefit of the holy church, for the maintenance of the monastery, and for the edification of the souls of the holy brotherhood.

Chapter Seven

Concerning those who officiate as priests, how they should be chosen or carry out the divine priesthood.

The brothers and their superior should with a search make a selection very carefully and they should ordain those who are saintly and virtuous and who fear the Lord completely in every way for the rites of the divine mysteries so that through them our bountiful God and Savior Jesus Christ may grant salvation to our souls. But if one of those acting as priests is rude and arrogant and has fallen short in a serious and shameless manner, he should be debarred from the priesthood and another appointed in his place carrying out the divine priestly office with dignity, but the other should be appointed in another place outside the monastery and after he has shown [p. 63] repentance he should gain compassion and mercy and be put in the same category as the brothers who are not priests. On this point I adjure you and admonish you before God in no way to allow anyone to act as priest in our holy church unworthily—and this should be guarded against strictly by you, fathers and brothers—and in addition to this I urge you to carry out your examinations strictly lest through jealousy or hatred or any other of the passions that destroy the soul one of the priests should be falsely slandered and undergo abominations unjustly. It is a special transgression if a man worthy of honor undergoes dishonor because of envy. So the enquiry into these matters should take place with a strict examination and the one who is clearly convicted and of a shameless character should be driven from the divine priesthood and likewise from the holy monastery.

23. PAKOURIANOS

It was right that the priest who receives all his necessities from the holy church and is supported by it should perform the divine mystery for us and for those for whom we sanction it; yet for the greater benefit of those officiating as priests we make a distinction in this way, as has been set out below, that on the distinguished and famous holy feasts they should carry out the holy liturgies on our behalf and that of our people in all the churches as we have instructed, and similarly on three days of the week—Wednesday, Friday, and Saturday. For much earlier it was specified that a celebration of the eucharist should take place for us on Sunday. If anyone has received anything from someone for a liturgy for people of whom the superior and ecclesiarch will approve, let the divine celebrations take place. But the remaining three days of the week belong to the priests and they should carry out the divine celebration for those they wish.

Chapter Eight

Concerning the preparation of the table and the good behavior and silence of those serving.

The activity around the table and the work of those serving should be carried out with decorum. As we have laid down a limit for food and drink, by that and what is settled here, we make everything quite clear as the explanation advances concerning those being served and those serving, concerning those sitting down to the meal and those standing by serving and furthermore concerning the overseers and administrators and concerning the appointment and the orderliness of these people. Thus those who stand and walk around the table should step about without noise and those who sit down at the meal should eat their food in silence with the result that everything will be to the glory of God [p. 65] and “seasoned with good salt” (Col. 4:6).

As for the seating—which is a matter for us to speak of—the superior should organize this, making it his aim that no confusion or disorder should arise nor that they, regarding someone as a stranger, should ignore him to the harm of each other and their own souls, as the holy apostle says “let no one seek his own interest but each that of his neighbor” (I Cor. 10:24), so that he may be saved, being exalted by such an attitude, and more so because of the command of the Lord which says “he who humbles himself will be exalted” (Luke 18:14). Further they should maintain securely the reading which usually takes place at the table and the pleasant and restrained silence and they should show their scrupulous conformity not only in these matters but always in everything, both in houses and outside, and they should live virtuously like this in the whole of their lives.

The bread and wine and the customary daily foods should not be changed, whether those in charge are remiss through niggardliness or they plead as an excuse the arrival of some monks, nor should they alter what has been prescribed by us, but the food which we have prescribed will be set forth without fail, that is, cheese will be set out on four days of the week as we prescribed, and it should not be withheld except only during the three fasts. Neither do we wish any of the four measures of wine to be withheld from each brother. We prescribe that three dishes should be provided for the brothers each day of whatever the providence of God supplies. But on Easter Sunday we prescribe that the table should be more lavish, for they will be tired and hungry having completed a vigil the previous night. Furthermore, during the days of the Holy Pentecost and after the saving birth of our Lord Jesus Christ until Epiphany, called the twelve days, there should be four courses set out for the brothers during these days. For supper on the twelve days we mentioned and the fifty leading up to Pentecost cheese should be set out for the brothers and whatever else divine providence supplies and two measures of wine for each of them. But if the superior of the time having the oversight and discretion considers it necessary to add something else to the food of the brothers, he should have this power with a view to blunting the impulses of those who favor indulgence.

ELEVENTH CENTURY

If any item of food is brought into the monastery from the produce of an estate, or from flocks, or from some other pious people whether given by relatives of the superior or of the brothers, or from important friends as a refreshment, [p. 67] this item should be handed over to the cellarer and should be eaten at the table by the community of brothers, or he who received this gift of food could bring it to the table himself and offer it to the brotherhood.

It is right that this should not go unmentioned, namely that those who are visiting in this holy monastery either the superior or one of the brotherhood through friendship or family connection, such a person should not be sent away hungry, but if such a person is present at the time of a meal, the brother to whom he has come should take such a person with him. But if the time of eating for the brothers has passed or the visitor being eager to depart does not wish to wait until the time of the meal, there should be the customary provision of refreshment from the cellarer for this person as is appropriate. For a brother is not allowed to entertain his friend in his cell and offer such a person a meal. If the friend is a monk it is appropriate that this person should stay for three days and on the fourth day they should provide him with supplies as is appropriate and thus send him on his way.¹⁷ If some sickness should happen to strike the friend, they should keep him and look after him until he is completely rid of his illness. But if he should die in the monastery they should bury this person with psalms, hymns, and prayers and gain the reward for him from the God of all things.

Chapter Nine

Concerning the clothes of the brotherhood and the payment for them and how they should be distributed to the brotherhood by the superior, also concerning shoes.

After this we have taken pains to be concerned also about payment for clothes, and not only that but also about shoes and all other necessities. For this will come from the giving of allowances even if perhaps the expenditure turns out to be rather more. Therefore it seemed a pleasing idea to us to make provision for each member each year according to his own rank so that the brothers should have no excuse for going out of the monastery for such necessities, whether to buy something or to procure sandals, and be at the doors of leather-workers or other people and with this excuse incur harm, but rather they will be constantly at their prayers, hymns, and the rest of their services to the holy church carrying out the whole of their obligation.

So if it were possible that there should be a distribution of clothes following the custom of the most holy monastery of [p. 69] Panagios as prescribed above, nothing else could be better than this or more fitting. But because of the passage and instability of time we have prescribed that it should happen as we will now go on to say. There should be three orders of brothers and they should receive allowances. The superior of the monastery should receive 36 nomismata. The older priests along with the two administrators, the ecclesiarch, the sacristan, and as many as are notable among the brothers and of similar status to him—up to the number of 15—will be called the first order and each of them should get 20 nomismata. The second order too should likewise be 15 men and each of these should get 15 nomismata. The third order should be made up of 20 souls and each of these should get 10 nomismata. The full amount of their allowance should be in standard trachy coinage.

23. PAKOURIANOS

Since all the revenues of every kind are gathered during the month of September and the demands are dealt with then, the brothers could have received the cost of their clothes then too. But for this reason, namely so that the brothers, on the pretext of buying clothes and doing business, should not be compelled to travel too far, depart from the monastery, and neglect their service to it and their praying, we have ruled that they should receive these declared allowances, i.e., the cost of their clothes, at the time of the glorious resurrection of our Lord Jesus Christ on Easter Sunday, when it has also been fixed that a fair be held beside the most holy monastery so that all of them may purchase their necessities. For everything that is necessary will readily be found at this fair.

Chapter Ten

Concerning the three holy periods of fasting and that all should fast in purity and perform acts of mercy to all each day.

During the three holy fasts they must fast without wine and olive oil except on Saturdays and Sundays on which they will all drink one cupful each for refreshment. In the gateway of the monastery each day sustenance must be distributed to their brothers in Christ, that is [p. 71] the poor. For they are the means of our salvation and secure the good things which are to come. But on Saturdays and Sundays during the great [Lenten] fast the food and the things that have been decreed should be provided and they should receive the measures of wine without fail. However they should not eat fish and for the five days of the week they should not have the seasoning of olive oil. On Tuesday and Thursday they should drink wine, one measure each. During the fast for the holy birth of Christ our God they will dine once in the day and then at the ninth hour, except on the days when we sing “God is the Lord” (Ps. 117 [118]:27) and so forth, then let us drink two measures of wine each. In each week we should abstain from olive oil for three days. During the fast of the Holy Apostles in the same way let us spend three days without olive oil and let all of us dine together once in the day and then at the seventh hour and let us drink two measures of wine each and one in the evening.

Chapter Eleven

Concerning the feast of our holy church and the other famous and glorious feasts of our Lord and the special saints that they should celebrate them splendidly.

It has been decreed by us that the feast of the very holy Mother of God—her sacred and honored Dormition—should be celebrated in our church on the fifteenth of August as follows. We wish them joyfully to celebrate this world-wide festival of the Dormition of the Mother of God in reverence and splendor as is done in the famous and greatest churches. Also the anniversaries of holy martyrs along with all the rest of the saints should fail in no way and likewise the distribution to the poor, as we have prescribed among the festivals and the established anniversaries of the dead.¹⁸ But the feast of the revered Dormition of the very holy Mother of God should be honored even more, and in this connection I bind with an oath those who will succeed me not to fail in anything that is fitting but if possible in their devotion to the festival to make it even more splendid. For those who celebrate festivals in a splendid and zealous manner will gain great benefits and will be reckoned worthy of eternal gifts and will come to share divine grace.¹⁹ They should also celebrate the remaining festivals.

ELEVENTH CENTURY

Chapter Twelve

Concerning the lighting of our holy churches, how it should be carried out, and concerning prayer, that it should be offered without distraction.

It is our duty to maintain continuously throughout each day and night three lamps in front of the icon of the very holy Mother of God [p. 73] and one lamp in the great sanctuary and before the holy sanctuary on the screen,²⁰ one lamp before the crucifix of the Savior and one lamp before the holy icon of the forerunner John the Baptist and one lamp before the icon of St. George and three lamps at our tomb.²¹ Also at each time of psalm-singing during the whole year, that is at matins, in the divine liturgy, and during vespers, along with all the lamps I have mentioned candles should be lit to burn continuously until the dismissal. After that, the candles should be extinguished but the lamps should remain burning continuously right through. Furthermore, before the [icons of the] twelve feasts of our Lord on each day at the time of hymn-singing twelve lamps should be lit until the dismissal. But in the famous and great feasts all the lamps in the holy church should be lit and all the candlesticks should be full of lit candles. During the holy festival of our holy church there should be a great abundance of lighting, and the festival and assembly should be great and very renowned with hymns and fragrances and a splendid table adorned with all the good things which the goodness of our God has given us.

Therefore whatever traditions are customary and have been prescribed for the glory of God, they must carry them out and fulfill them continuously without fail like some inescapable debt, and they should always heed the commands of God without faltering so that as they are mutually observed and passed on from one to another they will maintain securely, more than all that has been laid down, the divine glorifying of God in accordance with the rule handed down to us and the ordinance which the most pious brothers of the holy monastery of Panagios observe both at matins, in the daily singing of hymns, and furthermore, following their customary tradition, in the peaceful prayers during compline, and in all the night hymn-singing and reciting of psalms. The order for carrying out the divine sacraments should also be observed in the same way, except that the choirs should not snatch up the verses hastily from each other in reciting the psalms, but one choir should wait until the one that has begun its verse finishes it and stops at the end of it, then it should begin its own verse, and so the singing should take place in a pious and reverent manner.

Henceforth the one who transgresses the command should know that he falls under the patristic curse as one who has despised not only our command but also the threat of God and that he has been excluded from the covenants of God. We write these things not to those who are negligent on an occasion by reason of some infirmity or those who are engaged in the comfort and service of the brotherhood, either receiving guests who have come [p. 75] or having a responsibility for the poor, but we are trying to drive away deliberate neglect considering this to be a clear transgression of the monastic law. In accordance with this monastic law [we urge] the monks to live always in harmonious silence and more so at the time of the divine service during which of necessity silence should be observed and no one should continue speaking to other people, whether it is convenient or inconvenient, or laughing even with the merest smile, or addressing anyone and in this way hindering or disturbing the holy singing and assisting the evil spirits whose job it is to do this and support those doing it. They should not be distracted at all nor be continually changing their feet through indolence or foolishness, but should offer their praises to God in reverence and in a holy and calm attitude of body and soul. But if some are seen deliberately disregarding what has been said, let them be subject to the penalties laid down by the holy fathers. They must also perform an all-night vigil till matins on Sunday.

23. PAKOURIANOS

Chapter Thirteen

Concerning the duty of the brotherhood to confess each day to the superior the thoughts that have occurred to them, their words and their deeds if they have done anything.

It is the duty of the superior to examine the thoughts of everyone and in no way to despise those who are disturbed and distressed by their thoughts but he should examine them, if it is possible, through the whole day, correct their failings and cleanse them from every defilement of flesh and spirit. Also the brothers should reveal to the superior everything that concerns them in faith and with a contrite heart in simplicity of soul, and they should not go away somewhere else and confess to someone else like bastards and not true sons and with worthlessness and wickedness debase their confession.²² For the superior ought to know the thoughts of all, and not just this but also their steadfast actions, and they must not reveal these to anyone else but the superior alone, as has been said. Nor should any of the brothers turn away and do something following his own wish without the decision and choosing of the superior, and of his own will take on a task and become the agent of his own death. He will become an example [p. 77] of insubordination for the others through the superior not knowing the thinking behind his decisions and he himself not being able to correct himself without his help. For each person has his own faculty to choose though not knowing how to choose the good with discernment. For one must serve with different people at different times, yet in all this there is need for wisdom and the finest guiding discretion of the one who knows how to administer scrupulously.

So whenever the brothers become insubordinate and choose the way of their own desires, how will they be called most loyal sons of their father, that is the superior? For they have deliberately alienated themselves from him and have been deprived of their father's inheritance and will put themselves far from the divine confession; and "he who is not faithful in something little" (Luke 16:10) will also fail in the great commands and it is likely that in these people the saying of the apostle will be fulfilled which says, "if the unbeliever desires to separate, let it be so" (I Cor. 7:15), and like the parable of the fig tree which says, "why should you use up the ground" (Luke 13:7) and cause pointless toil to the farmer? I say there is no worse calamity than this, when someone is found insubordinate to the superior himself and speaks improperly in his presence. So such a person should be removed from the community so that he will not become an evil example to his fellow-brothers and those of his own age and a teacher of “disobedience” (Heb. 4:11), since he does not act in accordance with “the will of the Lord” (Eph. 5:17) but always follows his own will.

ELEVENTH CENTURY

Chapter Fourteen

Concerning manual labor and toil and that we ought to sing psalms during work.

Those doing some physical work should not be prevented from singing hymns but while they are at work with their hands they should offer up psalms with their mouth. For this is a mystical incense-offering and acceptable according to the divine teaching of Basil the great bishop of Caesarea and a very swift summoner of angelic [p. 79] help.²³ For in the houses of the rich there are many “vessels, some of gold and others of earthenware” (II Tim. 2:20). For this reason the superior needs much wisdom to show [the brothers] the “way of righteousness” (II Pet. 2:21). For our “entrance into the kingdom” (II Pet. 1:11) of heaven is by one of various roads. For one person is successful in this, another in that and yet another in everything. Some the superior must rebuke, others he must admonish, and from yet others he must cut away the scars with the piercing sword of examination. But he must do all this with moderation and at the right time, and assign others to work and physical toil—people whose characters are not reliable nor hearts repentant. So willingly or not he must bring such people close to God through labors; for a soul that is fond of work is near to God and will find a cure early (cf. Is. 58:8).

Chapter Fifteen

Concerning the rule that the brothers should not go outside the monastery or leave it without the command of the superiors.

Those of the brotherhood who do not live quietly should not be allowed to go about wherever they wish in the vanity of their mind, but those who are bold with such a habit should be persuaded to remain at home appropriately in accordance with the command of the divine and holy rule. I urge that they be trained not only for this reason but also because of every other action which contains an element of lawlessness and disobedience, that as is fitting they will live together scrupulously. For a necessity is imposed on all shepherds not to cross the appointed boundaries and it is necessary that [the superior] should tend his spiritual flock in this way and discipline those who have slipped with a view to repentance and care about them from the depth of his heart and spirit, suffering along with them as if they were his own limbs so that they may not be liable to the just judgment of God. All that has been laid down by the superior is law, and those subordinate to him must pay attention to all his utterances as to the divine laws themselves and consider none unimportant or make distinctions in his utterances or contradict him or oppose him in any other way. For all these things are proof of disobedience and independence and furthermore of indiscipline which is the confusion and destruction of obedience and discernment, and just judgment for these actions will come on those who practice such things. [p. 81]

Therefore it is with the approval of God that I must say these things. For I do not wish anyone else to rule them nor yet that the law of submission be destroyed. For a monk is not allowed to utter anything in the presence of the superior other than “I have sinned, Father, pardon me.” “Peace and mercy” (Gal. 6:16) to those who live as monks in this way and observe this rule. But if any of the brothers is proved to be unwilling to live according to the terms of the rule but opposes it and considers the reproof of the superior harsh and unhelpful and does not consider his rebuke to be for his own help and benefit, fighting against his shepherd and doctor and not accepting his reproof, and therefore fights against him either in secret or openly—this is the very thing I do not want, for such a person will be possessed by the devil, intoxicating his neighbor with his foul drink, which often brings about a rift and separation in “the body of the church” (Col. 1:18). If such a person remains without improvement, then it is better that after the first and second and third piece of advice and rebuke he be cut off like a rotten limb and be far away from the divine flock.

23. PAKOURIANOS

In addition to this it is necessary for the steward of souls, that is the superior, to know how to care for them with watchfulness and forbearance and thus, as Paul says, “to test everything” and pick out what is better and “abstain from every form of evil” (I Thess. 5:21–22) “trespass” (Gal. 6:1) and not disregard anyone with some small sin in order to prevent “the small piece of leaven leavening the whole lump” (I Cor. 5:6). Again, suppose that someone attempts great acts of abstinence, choosing by himself and showing contempt for the standard laid down by the holy fathers, which they first handed on to us by choice and with careful examination according to their divine traditions—the true, unerring, and moderate path—that is the cutting out of one’s own will, for the self-willed person is always in error lacking experience and is unreliable. Now the rules of submission have been tested, by reason and time, by everyone and will remain unchanged.

The superior, therefore, must not tolerate men who are so disposed. As for those who make a show of themselves and hypocritically parade themselves in public and those who practice abstinence without the consent of their brethren and [p. 83] without the approval of their superior and who make a show of themselves in public with a view to persuading those who see them with the pretense of their prayer and of being different from others before them (?)—[those who see these men] will be beguiled and deceived and in this way they will admire those against whom we must “contend”. . . will be beguiled and deceived in this way to their consternation. Against these men “we contend” (Eph. 6:12) and fight as the holy apostle says. For such a man is darkness and pretends to be light. This is enough of a warning for us. For concerning these matters we have been clearly instructed by the holy and revered monastery of Panagios, and from there we should learn, we who wish to do so.

Again I say [the superior] must deliberate with regard to all without distinction and counsel them all and guide them towards goodness and raise their minds from earthly sins so that everything may take place according to his decision and suggestion and through their close relationship with God. For everything that does not bring them near to him is useless. I say this too, that they must keep their minds above all wicked thoughts and that from here the road of wickedness and goodness begins. They should keep themselves away from wickedness and always advance in goodness from which so great a harvest of goodness and righteousness is produced, as the great trumpet [St. Paul] of Tarsus proclaims. What then is this? “Love, joy, peace, patience, goodness” (Gal. 5:22) and the rest. For self-willed people who practice abstinence for show, who in appearances have the semblance of dignity, on those people madness comes and flourishes strongly in them and will be displayed to those outside who follow in empty fancy. “Their end” (Phil. 3:19) comes through laxity, and such a man seems to have a great opinion of himself, and this is more harmful than the whole business.

ELEVENTH CENTURY

For what is really not virtue persuades those who only see it that it is virtue, as some of the fathers declared and as also the prophet says, “If anyone bends down his neck as a ring and spreads under him sackcloth and ashes, I have not chosen such a fast [saith the Lord]. But break thy bread to the hungry and lead the unsheltered poor to thy house, clothe the naked and do not disregard the relations of thine own seed” (Is. 58:5–7). For as much as “anyone humbles himself, so much will he be exalted” (cf. Matt. 23:12), in amount just like the abundance of irresistible seawater quietly increasing the cultivation of righteousness. As much as anyone calls himself to account so much will he be exalted, for humility teaches a person all the more to examine his faults, look only at himself and condemn himself. For this is the law of our fathers [p. 85] and the means of entry into the kingdom of heaven. For this will send us to “the place” of rest (Rev. 12:6) that has been made ready so as to “give a portion not only to seven but even to eight” (Eccl. 11:2), according to the word of Solomon. For the word of the Lord refers to this which says, “learn from me that I am gentle and lowly in heart and you will find rest for your souls. Take my yoke upon you and learn that my yoke is easy and my burden light” (Matt. 11:29–30). So that God will not only bestow on us the good things in the afterlife but he also gives us our present blessings and guides our way for the one who does his will. We must reckon up all the guidance of God and commit to him all our life and set God in our mind so that “our place will be in peace and our dwelling place in Sion and there the Lord will break the power of the bows” (Ps. 75 [76]:5). Faith, hope, love, and the desire for divine love are there. A light is there because “Thou doest shine forth from everlasting mountains” (Ps. 75 [76]:5).

So concerning the table in the house and the good conduct of those ministering and the common orderliness and arrangement and all the rest of the management, let this much be said with God’s blessing as has been laid down by us.²⁴ On the matter of the regulations for the church and its offices it is clear to all and I will speak briefly.²⁵ For it is necessary to perform the ministry of the priesthood with love and watchfulness day and night continuously according to the grace of God and the gift given by the Savior to each tongue according to its own sound in Christ Jesus our Lord, to whom be the glory for ever and ever, Amen.

Chapter Sixteen

Advice about the administrators of the monastery.

Again, following on what has already been said, I give this instruction too urging it with an oath and I prescribe this to my brothers in love, the ones in our monastery, that they do not allow this holy monastery to be without administrators. But it is our particular wish that selected and experienced men should have the administration. After the death of these, others must be chosen from the brotherhood, reverent ones with the fear of God, whether they be from the clergy or from the lay people. Those who receive this power should be from among those who love God, [p. 87] being people whom the monks will appoint to the control both of the monastery and of their own souls. But I do not want the monks to be without administrators (nor yet without a superior) so that they may not only maintain without alteration the spiritual order as laid down by us, but they will also take care of material things to keep them securely, and of those who serve in the monastery, that they will not lack anything that is necessary.

Chapter Seventeen

It is necessary to give an aim and an instruction concerning eunuchs and young boys.

Concerning eunuchs, that is those called thladii, and young boys, since many of the holy fathers kept them from the sacrament of the church to prevent offense and in the beginning laid it down to remain so for ever, such a person should not be received in the monastery on the pretext of some service or ministry. For irreverent disobedience will be seen in this. For I speak fittingly since often the fathers in the sketis proclaimed clearly, “Do not bring young boys here, for how many churches have been defiled through them?”²⁶ But we neither leave these as an object of offense to those after us, both superiors and subordinates, nor do we allow them to receive any such on any pretext whatsoever since they have a blameworthy reputation. Let us not grant wickedness an entry. Though, prior to this regulating ordinance of ours,²⁷ we legislated particularly on the impropriety of this matter, our ordinance has maintained the same (principle) and seems to be right in taking as its target a pressing and serious error. So what has been rejected once from sacred regulations we ought in no way to take back. Therefore enjoin these people, that is the superiors and administrators in this holy monastery after us, and bind by oath the whole brotherhood too by Christ our God himself, and his immaculate [p. 89] Mother, never to accept anything else that lies outside this regulation of ours and the tradition of the fathers for the management of this matter on whatever pretext, not only to the ruin of their souls and to share the greatest condemnation of the fathers, but also to become liable to the most just sentence of divine judgment itself.

Chapter Eighteen

That our monastery should be free from all official and violent force or exaction of any other kind.

I wish our present most holy monastery to be free from all those who wish to seize it by force, all strangers and our relatives, those alive now and those who will come after us, also the legatees and executors of our bequests and all other people of any kind, as none of them has the right individually or together to bring disturbance of any kind on it, nor yet to take away any of the possessions decreed to our holy church or any of the people living in them in any way, even down to the least important object. If any of our relations is discovered to be without a legacy through an oversight or some other such reason and is very insistent that he get a share, we rid this person in every way of this wicked notion and decree that he should receive twelve folleis only as a bequest from our administrators and should cease from this shameless insistence. For I have this holy church and the most holy monastery around it as my appointed and substitute heir, as I have explained clearly and in detail above and in what follows.

For I have offered this most holy monastery with all in it as a gift to God, the maker and sustainer of all things, for my life and my very sinful soul, to be self-governing and free from all force of every kind both from our relatives and from strangers, quite simply from any sort of person. Nor should even the smallest of the things placed as the property of this holy monastery be transferred or taken away either by the decision of its superiors or through the deceit and treachery of any of its monks. Nor should the monks in this monastery be subject to some other person, whether a servant or relative of ours or a stranger, or give him an opportunity to have authority over anything whatsoever in it. For I wish the superior and the rest of the brothers only to rule and have authority in it, [p. 91] as has been said above and as the words of the chrysobulls make clear, and each of them to spend his time at his own task, as the present typikon specifies, and to pray for our pious, mighty, and holy emperors, the army devoted to Christ, and for my sinful soul and its salvation.

So, may no one have the power to lay a destructive hand on the property in the holy monastery nor may the monks be subject to anyone. For I am setting up this holy monastery as a dwelling and for the maintenance and peace of the monks and I wish it to be for ever independent and self-governing on the basis of what has been said above, with the superiors maintaining for their periods of office the suitable care, management, and regulating of it. For we have acted and prescribed in this manner, not like some who set up monasteries or some other kind of hallowed place and put it under the authority of their relatives in succession after the death of the founder. May it not happen that we should act like this or have such an intention at all and provide an excuse for opposition and strife among them, introducing hatred and an excuse for lawsuits, with each of those who have been renounced calling himself the lord and master of those in the monastery, as we have often seen such people contesting in the law-courts; and such things progressively get worse, for often the unworthy among such people are preferred to the worthy in a legal decision and unjust men are selected in preference to just ones. Wherefore I do not wish this place which is consecrated to God to be conferred on my relations or anyone else.

If anyone will be seen, whether of our genuine relatives or of those called such or of our men, wishing to set himself up against my church or monastery or the villages in its control or the forts and hamlets in any way whatsoever or wishing to build a house or what is called a stalion, that is a refuge, in the forts and to live in them or is seen plundering the money collected from those places in any way whatever, or making a despicable profit by some important or trifling means or is causing trouble there by just a mere word or intention, first he should have the curse of the 318 inspired holy fathers who met at Nicaea and be anathematized and expelled from the Christian faith and counted with Judas Iscariot. Also whatever will have been given him by me, whether movable, immovable, or animate property, this holy church of mine and the monastery around it has the power to take it away from this person and set it up as its own.

If anyone of those holding the position of superior in this our monastery, or any of the monks in it, [p. 93] is discovered transgressing anything from this typikon or being in possession of any of the things consecrated in this our monastery with deceitful intention or assisting one of our relatives or strangers to steal something or to establish his authority [in the monastery] or to gain access to it altogether, then drawing the same curse upon himself he will be driven out of it, condemned as a traitor and a transgressor of what is recorded in our present typikon.

I pray that none of my relatives will be so ungrateful. For I treated all of them well, bringing them up and raising them to the prime of life, not because of any obligation or because any of them had a justifiable claim but only through God's command and the physical relationship I had with them. For our father of happy memory died suddenly a long time ago and left us very small and young, and our mother through her womanly nature put all his possessions into necessities for her children and into dowries for our sisters and left us destitute with our hands empty of all our father's money and, what is more, of her own, that is of our mother's money. Our sisters went off with their dowries to their husbands in different places and I spent a very long time traveling in Armenia and Georgia and Syria and visiting the Roman Empire too, seeking to provide for my own life. I gained all these things, namely possessions and money and honors, with the help of God and through the holy prayers of my parents, and they came about through the circumstances and misfortunes which I faced, by labors and my blood which I spilt, and not by the help or mediation of anyone else.

23. PAKOURIANOS

Furthermore all my relatives and my people have gained glory and benefits because of my own toil and service and the favor of our revered emperors towards me and my position of honor, and I have given a legacy to certain of my relations or will still do so. But the things decreed to my holy church and those that will be decreed are alike my own property and I have given all my personal possessions to whomsoever I have given them. Besides, whatever favor I did for my relatives dead or alive I did for the salvation of my soul, not using other men's property or gifts.

So for all these reasons I wished that my holy monastery should exist, now and in the future, in every way free from everyone, from my relatives or strangers and other people of all kinds, even from the imperial and patriarchal classes, as was decreed in advance by the revered and venerable chrysobulls. So it was not necessary for me to receive another revered chrysobull [p. 95] about my personal possessions since the previous ones pronounce rightly and suitably about them; but for this reason I made an ardent and earnest request of our most powerful emperor that my decrees and regulations concerning this my holy monastery be kept unaltered, secure, and firmly fixed and valid to the end.²⁸

Chapter Nineteen

Concerning the position if the superior of the monastery commits some error or someone else of those in charge of the people entrusted with its services, and concerning those who spend the money belonging to it unsuitably and recklessly, that these people must be driven out of the monastery.

If those in charge of the monastery despise the rules laid down by us—which I pray does not happen—and, instead of helping, cause harm to the brethren, we instruct the subordinate brethren themselves, both those in charge and the old members and especially those given preferment for their virtue and knowledge and those monks of the monastery carrying out its ministry at the time, to rise up in a body to take revenge on them and most zealously set right these outrages so that the dwelling of these very good men should not be destroyed by these people and become deserted and useless. But if anyone is content while such things are going on and allows them to happen, he places himself under no small condemnation from Christ the Savior through the prayers of his immaculate Mother as has been declared before. For if someone openly does wrong for some reason and does not exercise a pure judgment, but is seen as a wolf instead of a shepherd to his flock and disposes of the property of the monastery and its sacred possessions wrongly and recklessly so that he accomplishes the act of a savage to his own perdition, first, in kindness and encouragement, you ought to counsel such people in holy fear, then if he does not correct himself, despite meeting with such proper care, he will be removed from the holy monastery with the agreement and by the witnessed decision of the community and afterwards in place of this man they should bring forward a deserving person and appoint him by a joint decision.

ELEVENTH CENTURY

Chapter Twenty

Concerning lay people who give money in the holy church for liturgies to be held for the dead, and advice from what sort of people they ought to receive it.

They should accept and receive from people who offer gifts only those from which there is no occasion for harm to the monastery nor likelihood of any innovation, [p. 97] but which contribute instead to the strengthening of its established aim and reason—the obedience that leads to faith, although without oppression—and which serve both to encourage the prescribed task and to benefit the souls for whom they are brought as well as those who offer them. For this is well-pleasing to God, namely to bear genuine fruit and to obtain the great reward and not to disguise his true motive for such an action and harm the soul. It is necessary to introduce this matter in accordance with my wish for salvation. All my utterances and writings are for its sake, and I must speak of it and set it as the culminating point at the end of my firm Rule,²⁹ so that it may be firmly established among us and may be a most evident token and very clear reminder for the united brothers at the time of their own death.

Chapter Twenty-One

Instruction from us to the brothers concerning my commemoration and that of my relations and concerning the memorial repast and feasting they should have on the day when we are remembered and concerning the distribution of gold coins to the brothers in Christ and concerning the showing of every mercy towards them.

So now we give instructions about the commemoration of my late brother the magistros Apasios now at glorious rest to be carried out on the day of his death, that is the 20th of September, on which the most honored festival of the great martyr St. Eustathios and his companions is also held. A splendid banquet should be prepared and a table filled with all kinds of good food supplied to us from God, and, over and above the things received by the brothers in accordance with the decree, two more measures of wine should be added for each of them; and those who are priests of the brothers in the monastery and of those brothers in the hermitages and priests of the people in the villages, estates, forts, and the complete holding of our holy monastery should on that day offer gifts³⁰ to God on his behalf. There should also be on that same day a distribution of 72 nomismata to the brothers in Christ and after the dismissal from matins and the holy liturgy 24 nomismata should be distributed in his memory to the brothers in Christ and to the other strangers who are there.

In this context I wish to speak about myself also. For as it has been written, “each shall receive his wages according to his work and the labor” (I Cor. 3:8). [p. 99] But to boast will be of no benefit except to do so in the Lord. As he says, “he who boasts, let him boast in the Lord” (I Cor. 1:31). For you yourselves, who have known me closely from the beginning, know of my hardship and “labor, my toil” (I Thess. 2:9) and sweat and the gift of God which was active in me and not I myself. I know well your love toward me, that without our reminding and instruction you do not forget nor neglect to do in my memory all that is due and fitting. Nevertheless, act with honor, always making mention of us and also those to come after us with zeal and faith.

23. PAKOURIANOS

I ask you as fathers and brothers that you in no way forget us. In our commemoration you should remind yourselves, brothers, as you look at this our delightful house of God which is the holy church, of the annual income and the other revenues, bearing in mind that after God we have been responsible for these. On whatever day, with the approval of God, death comes to me, Gregory, on that day perform my commemoration and distribute to the brothers in Christ 72 nomismata and the brothers should be refreshed with a very abundant table laden with food and drink and after the dismissal from matins and the sacred liturgy, 24 gold nomismata should be distributed to all those who have come to our aforesaid commemoration. If any of the decreed nomismata be left over or any other of the requirements, then these should be distributed to the poor on another occasion. Furthermore, if anything is left over from all the income of this holy monastery, half of all this should be distributed in the same way on the day of our commemoration, for the salvation of my soul, to the pious brothers in Christ, both the poor and those who serve this monastery as hired laborers and dependent peasants, everything being distributed by the superiors and stewards in the fear of God, with a pure conscience and impartial mind, knowing that “the one who held the money box and carried what was put into it” (John 12:6; 13:28) suffered condemnation as he was revealed as a thief and traitor by his stealing, and how in olden times Gehazi was condemned as a leper through his love of money (cf. II Kings 5:27). I wish all these things to be maintained without change steadfastly and securely and that none of these things that I have said should be omitted for any reason. But if money should mount up from the produce of the brothers or any others, the surplus of this should not be distributed to the poor [p. 101] for our sake but should be kept for those who produce it, and they should provide the money on our behalf from the revenue of the holy monastery.

Each year on each day the offerings of the divine mysteries should be made for the salvation of my soul and the bread baked in the bakery, i.e., the three offerings, should be given out—two of them outside the monastery to the sick and other poor people, one will be for my soul and the other for that of my brother. The other offering should be given to the brothers. If perhaps both were offered on my behalf, I give this instruction to all the brotherhood with a word of reproof that, if it were to happen, two liturgies should be celebrated and the three offerings should be made for the salvation of our souls, that is our father’s, mine, and my brother’s. Also in all the churches offerings should be made expressly in my memory and for the salvation of my soul and you “will find mercy” (II Tim. 1:18).

On the day of the feast of our holy church all the priests must perform the holy liturgies on our behalf—mine, my brother’s, and our relatives now dead. Furthermore, holy offerings should be made on our behalf on the day of the resurrection of Christ our God for the whole world, which we are accustomed to call Easter, on the day of the Ascension of Christ our God into heaven, on the holy day of Pentecost on which the Holy Spirit came to stay with us, in the same way on the day of the Annunciation, similarly on the day of the holy birth, and at the divine baptism of the Savior Christ our God, and on all the other feasts of our Lord. In addition to these, offerings should always be made on Saturday alternately, on one Saturday for me and on the next for my brother. Also, on every day that the priest performs the liturgy, after the completion of the mysteries and the distribution of the holy gift, turning to the holy altar he should remember me and my brother begging forgiveness for our many sins while the rest of the brethren bear him witness; and at the dismissal from matins and at the end of the evening hymn the brethren should again remember me and my brother by name, saying "May God pardon the transgressions of our founders."

ELEVENTH CENTURY

On the revered and holy day of Holy Thursday a commemoration should be held for our blessed and glorious father Pakourianos, Prince of Princes, in sacred liturgies and splendid tables; and on the same day 24 nomismata should be distributed to the poor. [p. 103] Remember the hardship of my excessive toil which I put up with for love of you, for which may we find our reward from God by remembering and being remembered in Christ Jesus our Lord.

Chapter Twenty-Two

Concerning a superior of this holy monastery who has died and the other brethren and how they should remember them with holy liturgies and prayers.

When the superior of this monastery dies all the brothers must honor him splendidly with incense and candles, in psalms and hymns completing for him the customary rite—that of a priest if he be a priest, but if he is a monk, completing a simple rite that is appropriate to him. They should also make a distribution of twelve nomismata in his memory and on that day they should provide for the brothers a refreshment with extra food and drink and the liturgies of all the priests should be celebrated on his behalf. On the third day a night office should be held and again the liturgies should be celebrated on his behalf, also on the fortieth day and on the day that completes a year. But if the dead person is a brother, they should bury him in the same way with hymns and prayers and on the third day the liturgies should be celebrated on his behalf and also on the day that completes a year [from his death].

Chapter Twenty-Three

Concerning the fact that a woman should not enter my holy church and a women's monastery be built within the boundaries of our monastery.

I do not wish a married woman to enter my church or monastery for any reason whatsoever, nor a married couple to reside within those boundaries, nor even any young children, lest there should ever be any scandal, but they should live away somewhere in the villages and the fields. I forbid also a monastery for women to be built within the boundaries of our monastery at the instigation of either the mother of Jovane or of the sister of Ephraim, but instead they must remove these two women away from there. [p. 105] For I order and advise you that our holy monastery should be and remain for ever untrodden by any woman as we prescribed about this before. A woman who wishes to be present for prayer should not be prevented but only on the feast day of this holy church until the time of the holy liturgy; then she should quickly depart. Making prohibitions for this reason we condemn the presence of any in this monastery at any other time except on the aforesaid day.

23. PAKOURIANOS

Chapter Twenty-Four

Concerning the ban on appointing a Greek³¹ as priest or monk in my monastery for any reason at all.

I command all those in the monastery and impress it upon them with a most strict ordinance, that a Greek should never be appointed a priest or a monk in this holy monastery of mine, except only as a notary, knowing how to write and send the opinion of the superior to the rulers of the time and, when sent to the same people by him, he could go and deal with the needs of the monastery. I give this instruction and insist upon it for the following reason, lest [the Greeks], being violent, devious, or grasping, should create some deficiency or cause harm to the monastery or lest they appoint someone opposed to the place and eager to gain control over it or gain for himself the office of superior or appropriate the monastery on some other abominable pretext. These sort of things we have often seen happen among our people, caused by simplicity and a gentle disposition. Otherwise we follow these men in the faith as our teachers and we obey their doctrines.

Chapter Twenty-Five

Concerning our Georgian relatives and our men who have entered and will enter the monastic order—how they should receive them.

If then there are some of our relatives, preferred because of their degree of kinship with us, living by the monastic order, men endowed with experience and understanding and suited to promote the interests of the holy monastery and very influential, then we think it necessary and beneficial that these men be preferred to strangers and foreigners. But if they are outside the ranks of the clergy and a virtuous way of life, and not only do they not have the ability for this but are in every way without the aptitude for orderliness, and will be known not to serve wholeheartedly [p. 107] these divine rules, it should not come about that power is handed over to them. For I wish to decree that this dwelling of monks, as has often been stated, be in every way free both from strangers and our close relatives; we also forbid them to make it subject to any other person, but it should continue always forever independent and self-governing. If apart from our aforementioned relatives or men some other Georgian has been tonsured and the decreed number of the monks is deficient, then they must choose such men in preference to others and introduce them to the monastery and enroll them in place of those that are missing to fill up the decreed number, while they are under an obligation to live in accordance with the decreed rule of this monastery and be in harmony with the brothers in the community and be subject to the superior. The decreed number of the monks should never fall short.

Chapter Twenty-Six

Concerning the stewards and the other officials being called to account by the superior and the superior being called to account by the community of the brethren.

It is necessary and right that in the course of a complete year the chief steward of our aforementioned monastery should call his assistant stewards to account and the different people who have been entrusted with positions of service once in the month of September and again at holy Easter in the fear of God. If they are discovered to have something left over, taking it from them he will make out a receipt for them. The chief steward should be called to account by the superior and being examined by him should receive a receipt from him. The superior, in the fear of God and with the knowledge of the rest of the brothers, should make payment for the needs of the church and the monastery, and should give what is left unspent to the treasurer for the good and benefit of the monastery and they should receive a receipt from him. At each Easter the superior should be called to account by the stewards and the treasurer and the brotherhood. Similarly the treasurer should be called to account twice a year by the superior and the brotherhood. If any of these has defrauded or spent the church's money improperly or foolishly, he must make up again and restore what is missing and spent and they should dismiss him from the service which is in his care. [p. 109]

ELEVENTH CENTURY

If anything remains left over from the church's revenue in excess of the expenses decreed by us and other just bequests, whatever there may be of this money should be kept for the benefit of the church and for its good, so that at a suitable time it will be found and spent for the good of the church, as I have said. We also give this order, that the monastery should never be without a sum of up to ten litrai [of gold], so that at a time of need it could meet the requirements of the monastery and they should give any money in excess of the ten litrai [of gold] to purchase property and they should assign the property to the monastery.

Chapter Twenty-Seven

Concerning the commemoration of the dead in the holy liturgies and the sacraments to make mention of their souls in continual prayers.

This instruction I give you also, my fathers and brothers, with all assurance and certainty and, furthermore, we write it urgently with a word of warning that you celebrate the mystery of the divine liturgy always without fail, continually making mention of the souls of the dead in the customary way, as we have received it from the beginning from those before us and have preserved it up to the present by the grace of God in all the holy churches; so you also guard it well by the favor of God. For all the faithful must keep the present command unshaken and monks even more so. For by this means all the strength of the "adversary" Satan (I Tim. 5:14) is destroyed. In the chapel of St. John the Baptist³² a priest shall be appointed to carry out there the commemoration of the dead always and unfailingly. A commemoration of all the brothers should be celebrated with a vigil and the singing of psalms all night and a divine liturgy, and not only this but if someone from outside offers a gift in faith, doing a service to this monastery with the donation of money, for a daily commemoration or for a joint commemoration from time to time, they should pray in common for these people zealously and, following our tradition, remember them with the mystery of the divine sacrament. All those who come after us should maintain all these things according to our instruction unfailingly until the end of time. [p. 111]

Chapter Twenty-Eight

Concerning the old and those in danger from infirmity, how they must look after them and provide them with a good rest.

23. PAKOURIANOS

So those of the brothers who are completely worn out and are in distress, suffering from old age or infirmity or some other misfortune, must be especially cared for and looked after and provided with consolation. They themselves must bear up in their affliction and not be faint-hearted or grumble, for they and those doing this service will get their reward together from the just judge, Christ our God. For this is the will of God, to show consideration and love and goodness towards fellow servants. But it is right that the superior should not only show this and act to care for the body but should also care for their souls by means of teaching and in fact like a doctor heal their souls with words; for this is the thing in which we rejoice, about which our whole work and meaning is. For nothing else pleases God more than to bring the intemperate to their senses, to turn drunkards into people with self-control, and to make the violent mild and long-suffering and the arrogant humble. For this is the first wisdom and this the “image” and likeness “of God” (Gen. 1:27) (as far as is possible for a man) who “took our infirmities and bore our diseases” (Matt. 8:17), and what else will such a man be than the mouthpiece of God? As the prophet says, “He who brings forth the precious from the worthless shall be called my mouth” (Jer. 15:19) and will raise his likeness in likeness to the image of its original.

Chapter Twenty-Nine

Concerning the three klimakes established by me and called hospices by us and how we set them up.

Below the village called Stenimachos one hospice was established above the two roads. So I lay down and prescribe that from the revenues of the aforesaid village of Stenimachos they should give to it for travelers and the poor on each day that God has made, two modioi of grain and two measures of wine and for other food or cooking whatever God’s goodness provides, for example some legumes and vegetables. From the private mills which are in Stenimachos, I have also set aside a water mill to grind [the hospice’s] meal and I have designated one dependent peasant from this village to be free from all requisitions and service, to which this whole village is subject, [p. 113] and to be subject only to the service of this hospice—that is, to carry wood and water in it and carry out all suitable work for the hospices [lacuna in the text]. . . . Through him this provision is made for the poor and for travelers. So he should be a man of a pure mind and with the fear of God and he should make this provision of necessities honestly and he should receive, along with the other brothers from the monastery, the allowance which falls to him as a brother of the third rank. Many beds should be put in this hospice and there should be a built-in stove and a portable stove there, both hot, so that whenever a stranger comes on winter days, he may warm himself, find shelter, and rest in this hospice. If one of the travelers and friends who are there is in a serious condition with some disease, it is right that he should rest for three days. After these three days they should send him on his way. But if someone reaches a state of great weakness and cannot travel, they must keep such a person and give him rest until he is completely well. They must build a tower on the mountain near the hospice and, if some cause for fear should arise there, they must provide protection for the provisions in the tower so that if any violent person should come, his hand may not reach them.

Also in the hospice called Marmarion, which is near the bridge, and in the other hospice which is near the sea and our monastery of St. Nicholas³³ (we built and established these two

ELEVENTH CENTURY

