hospices for the salvation of my blessed brother's soul) some picked men who are monks should be similarly placed to minister to travelers and poor people, one in one and the other in the other, and they too should receive allowances just as the one in Stenimachos. To the hospice of Marmarion there should be given each day from the revenue of the village Srabikion one modios of grain and one measure of wine and a dependent peasant should be freed to grind the meal, carry the wood, and fulfill all the other necessary service for this hospice. Similarly to the hospice of St. Nicholas there should be given each day from the revenue of the village Prilongos one modios of grain and one measure of wine and for cooking whatever there happens to be and divine providence supplies, whether legumes or vegetables; and there too a dependent peasant should be freed to grind meal, carry wood, fetch water, and carry out the remaining services for the hospice.

I bind on oath the superiors of this holy monastery after us never to allow these hospices to suffer a deprivation in whole or in part of the necessities laid down for them. [p. 115] I trust in the goodness of God and the intercession of his saints that, if for no other reason then for these hospices alone, all that has been established and decreed might always be kept safely for ever always without harm and disturbance. If by divine providence the revenue of our monastery becomes greater and more abundant, then the manner of the hospitality should be similarly increased to become the finest and of a superior kind. If not, these services laid down by us in these hospices should remain uninterrupted and untouched, or rather unshaken and firmly fixed; and if any of our successors wishes to check or trim this hospitality established by us, this action will be counted against him as a great sin and he will be liable for our sins.

Chapter Thirty

Concerning the first superior of our monastery appointed by me, the monk Gregory, and the commemoration of him after his death.

This monk, loved by us from the beginning because of his loyalty to us and his zealous service and his earnest prayer for us, but more especially because he was entrusted by us with the careful building and construction with God's help of this often-mentioned very holy monastery of ours and has gained our special love and affection, for this reason in compassion for him we have decreed that after his death the day of his commemoration should be that of the glorious feast of St. Gregory the Theologian.³⁴ I instruct the priests and brothers to carry this out and to console the brothers with all food and drink and to distribute to the brothers in Christ on each commemoration of him six nomismata. They should carry out these instructions on the day of his death and on the third day after that and, furthermore, on the fortieth day and the day that marks a year, as has been described above concerning the superior, if the superior already mentioned keeps safely and steadfastly all that is written in this my typikon and is not found to be the cause of ruin to our monastery in a great or small way. For if he be found to be such either in his lifetime or after his death, instead of being remembered he will share in a curse and will have no part in this our holy monastery and the brotherhood in it.

Chapter Thirty-One

Concerning young boys, where they ought to live and be brought up and be taught reading and writing [from the holy scriptures].

23. PAKOURIANOS

It was decreed by us that these boys should stay in the monastery of St. Nicholas,³⁵ the one near the fort, and be brought up [p. 117] and instructed there, and an old man, one of the priests,³⁶ full of virtue and knowledge, should be in charge of them and teach them the holy scriptures, also he should act as priest in the most holy church of St. Nicholas. This man should receive his allowance and all that he needs unfailingly just as the brothers of his rank in the great monastery. This man should celebrate the divine mystery on three days each week, on the first of which our blessed father Pakourianos should be remembered in the holy liturgy, on the second his brother Chosrienes, and on the third his son and my cousin Pakourianos.³⁷ It has been decreed by us that incense, oil, and candles, also offerings and elements, sufficient for the aforesaid sacraments, should be provided without fail for St. Nicholas from the great monastery.

Six of the boys mentioned above should be instructed by the old priest already described, receiving from the great monastery their food and all their clothes as is fitting, and they should remain there until they have completed their learning and attained the proper age for the rank of the priesthood. Then, when they grow their beards, those who are suitable to enter the order of the priesthood should according to the law be appointed to celebrate the sacraments with the other priests in the monastery, even if the prescribed group of priests is not deficient in number. They should also receive without fail all the things that the first priests receive. Those who are not worthy of the priesthood should be completely expelled as being responsible for this to themselves, but the number of six boys under instruction in the church of St. Nicholas should in no way fall short.

Chapter Thirty-Two

Concerning the letting or selling of fields or property to persons in the name of the monastery.

We are against this and we lay it down that, in accordance with the rule of the monasteries of the East and the West,³⁸ the superior of our monastery has in no way at all the power to give to any brother any of the possessions of our monastery, neither a dependent peasant's holding nor other land nor a garden nor a vineyard nor any such thing belonging to the aforementioned monastery, so that the very fine harmony and concord of the brotherhood should not be destroyed. Similarly, he should not sell or let to any persons. For I firmly instruct and earnestly beg that he should not only [p. 119]—God forbid—not do this but not even consider making over in any way to any person any of all the property of the holy monastery except only to the dependent peasants who customarily work for it.

Chapter Thirty-Three

[A] Concerning the safekeeping of the present document³⁹ of the monastery with the regulating order for the often-mentioned most holy monastery recently built by us with God's help, and to prevent the removal of any of the items contained in it as has been decreed by us, or their alteration, or the accepting of any relaxation.

Those superiors and other brothers of this monastery who have the care of it after me and those with them and under them I bind by oath before the Lord God and secure them with penalties, that they do not dare to alter anything of what has been laid down by me for our monastery or cause the pilfering or diminution of its properties and possessions in any way or misinterpret what has been laid down by us or alter the present typikon in any way or change it, take away so much as a syllable of it or even destroy it completely or try to steal it and take it away from this monastery and deprive the monastery of things bequeathed by us. Such a person will be under the condemnation of the Lord God Almighty and banished from all his saints, subject to our anger and sin and accountable for our transgressions before Christ on the fearful day of judgment when I pray that we all be not liable to condemnation and punishment but share in everlasting blessings and have eternal enjoyment in Christ Jesus our Lord, to whom be the glory for ever and ever, Amen.

ELEVENTH CENTURY

[B] Concerning the sacred treasures and revered holy icons and the rest of the offerings of all kinds assigned, consecrated, and handed over to our aforesaid holy monastery, and further about the grazing animals in its control and other animals.

Two icons of enameled gold having precious wood in them.

A large enameled icon of the Transfiguration. [p. 121]

A large octagonal enameled icon with precious stones.

A small enameled icon of the Mother of God, with wings.

A large enameled cross with precious stones for the holy table.

A silver military cross with red precious stones.

A wooden cross covered with gold and precious stones, namely five bluish-purple hyacinths.⁴⁰

An icon of the Crucifixion made of stone, with wings.

An icon of St. George painted on wood⁴¹ with a silver frame.

Icons painted on wood with gold nimbuses (?),⁴² 27 in number, and one templon⁴³ depicting the twelve feasts.

An icon of St. George and St. Theodore of bronze,⁴⁴ with a silver frame.

One set of silver-gilt paten and chalice with precious stones of which twelve are missing.

A jasper paten with gold and enameling.

Three sets of silver paten and chalice.

A silver spoon.

Three silver censers and one silver casket.⁴⁵

A reliquary, that is a silver box⁴⁶ of holy relics.

Two silver chandeliers⁴⁷ with their chains, one of which is inlaid with gold.

A Greek Gospel lectionary with precious stones and gold and enamel [decoration on its cover].

A copy of the four Gospels in Georgian with silver gilt [cover].

Another small copy of the four Gospels with small silver studs [on its cover].

23. PAKOURIANOS

Another copy of the four Gospels with silver studs [on its cover].

A Gospel lectionary for daily use with silver gilt [cover].

Another Gospel lectionary for daily use without decoration.

A book containing a commentary on St. John's Gospel.

A book of [St. Gregory] the Theologian.

A book containing the Moralia of St. Basil.

A book [containing] a collection of the miracles of St. Symeon. [p. 123]

Two books by St. Maximos [the Confessor].

Two copies of The Heavenly Ladder by John Klimakos.

Two other books about the Mother of God.

A book by Theodore the Studite.

Three Menaia.

One copy of the Oktoechos.

One copy of the Synaxarion.

One copy of the Euchologion.

Two copies of the Apostolos.

One copy of the Psalter.

Another copy of the Euchologion with silver studs.

A copy of the Parakletike in four modes.

One copy of the Parakletike.

A book by St. Isaac.

Another copy of the Menaion: a collection.

Four violet-purple imperial over-tunics,⁴⁸ one of which is woven with gold.

Four belted outer garments,⁴⁹ with gold letters.

Two garments of violet purple silk.⁵⁰

Five heavy skaramangia.

One garment of Maurianites silk.

One tricolored silk garment.⁵¹

Another skaramangion.

An altar cloth made of Maurianites silk with all its fittings.

ELEVENTH CENTURY

Two similar altar cloths for the two other churches—complete.

Another altar cloth of white samite⁵² having an icon of the Mother of God with pearls.

Changes of vestments for a priest.

Three maphoria, one of which has an icon with pearls.

Another maphorion with trimming⁵³ and three other maphoria of silk.

Twelve large bronze candlestands,⁵⁴ and two other small ones.

One complete candlestand⁵⁵ for the *templon*⁵⁶ with its spikes, and two other small ones with their handles.

Two arched candlestands.⁵⁷ [p. 125]

Nine dragon-shaped⁵⁸ brackets with their chains.

Ten other dragon-shaped brackets without chains.

Seventeen chandeliers⁵⁹ with their chains.

One small basin for the feast of the Epiphany.

One small lamp in the shape of a basket.⁶⁰

A basin and ewer⁶¹ for washing and one stool.

Seventeen conical glasses.⁶²

Also one pitcher.

Also one bowl.

Another pitcher made of rock crystal.⁶³

Another green pitcher called a mena, and other glass cups and various lamps.

[C] Concerning the animals.

Stallions and mares with their foals, all together 110.

Male donkeys and females with their foals, 15.

Milk-producing buffaloes,⁶⁴ 4.

Calves, 2, and plowing oxen, including those in all the properties of the monastery, 47 yoke.

Heifers and bullocks, 72.

Milk-producing sheep, 238.

Rams, 94, and goats, 52.

23. PAKOURIANOS

[D] Concerning the chrysobulls kept in Constantinople in the great church of God.⁶⁵

Three chrysobulls concerning our possessions in the East, that is, one about the district of Anion, the second about the district of Tais, and the third about the district of Tzourmere.

Two chrysobulls concerning my possessions in the theme Armeniakoi, one about those in Labaka and the other about those in Arnasakion and Martisapao. [p. 127]

One chrysobull concerning the monastery of lady Euphrosyne in the village Libadion.

Three chrysobulls of the Emperor Michael [VII Doukas] concerning my possessions in Mosynopolis.

Four chrysobulls concerning my possessions in Philippoupolis.

A chrysobull of exoneration for my administration at Kars.

Two chrysobulls of exoneration for my administration at Theodosiopolis.

Another chrysobull of exemption concerning my possessions in Philippoupolis and Mosynopolis.

A chrysobull concerning the village of Xantheia.

A chrysobull for Margon on papyrus⁶⁶ which I have as a guarantee.

Two libelloi, the one concerning the village of Eudokimou and the other concerning the village of Kotresi.

The semeiosis of the Emperor Michael [VII Doukas] concerning the matter of the Patzinak which had arisen then.

Similarly another semeiosis of the same person concerning the metropolitan of Philippoupolis.

Another semeiosis of [Nikephoros III] Botaneiates concerning my possessions at Philippoupolis.

Imperial pittakia published in different departments and other ordinances on different matters, sixty-five in number.

There are also copies of the three chrysobulls concerning my possessions in the East.

[E] Concerning the chrysobulls stored and preserved in our monastery.

Two chrysobulls of exoneration for my administration as the mezas domestikos.

One chrysobull concerning the fort of Baniska and the village Tzerbena.

A chrysobull concerning improvements on my properties, the building of fortresses, villages, and monasteries.

Another chrysobull on the same subject and stating that, if the revenue of our possessions should become exceedingly great, I and my successors should have untroubled possession of it.

A chrysobull about our monastery of Petritzos concerning the [right of] dominion, independence, and complete freedom of the same monastery and concerning my properties assigned to it.

ELEVENTH CENTURY

A chrysobull concerning Spasma and Pankalitze. [p. 129]

Two chrysobulls maintaining my non-liability and freedom from having to account for the imperial money I paid to summon the Cumans.

A chrysobull of exoneration (for my administration) in the theme of Smolenoi.

Two chrysobulls concerning my possessions in Achrido, concerning the village Sikonion and the village Charpetikion.

A chrysobull on the matter of the sacred objects of the most holy monastery of Chachou.

A chrysobull which gives me permission to transfer my possessions to whomsoever I wish, both to my relatives and my people, even if they happen to be of the Armenian faith.

A copy of a chrysobull about my possessions in Boleron and Mosynopolis.

Another copy of a chrysobull concerning my possessions in Philippoupolis.

Three other copies of a chrysobull concerning my possessions in Philippoupolis.

A copy of a chrysobull concerning my administration in Theodosiupolis.

An imperial pittakion concerning the taxation of all my possessions.

Three other pittakia concerning exemption from seizure.⁶⁷

Another pittakion concerning the theme of Smolenoi.

The receipt for the gift of three kentenaria [of gold] which the Franks received and the ordinance concerning these matters and various other receipts.

A semeiosis of the archivist and a pittakion addressed to the judge of a theme. List and receipt of our chrysobulls and other titles of ownership deposited in the church of Hagia Sophia.

The copy of the cadastral survey⁶⁸ for Srabikion and the guarantees for the inhabitants of the same village.

The copy of the cadastral survey for the village Prilonkos.

The documents of purchase of Vardanes concerning the aule in Mosynopolis and the monastery of St. George in Pappikion.

Receipts for the amount brought in for the tax-requirements from the theme of Smolenoi.

The praktikon and delimitation of my possessions in Philippoupolis.

The praktikon and delimitation of my possessions in Mosynopolis, similarly the receipts of the steward concerning the libellikon tax. [p. 131]

The pittakion [establishing] the taxation for my possessions in Mosynopolis.

The praktikon and the articles of transfer for Labaka.

The guarantees and the receipts of those conducting the fair of Stenimachos.

23. PAKOURIANOS

The report made by Mesopotamites under imperial command concerning Bodena and the village of Zachariou.

[F] The present typikon was written in Greek,⁶⁹ Georgian, and Armenian for our very sacred monastery of the most holy Mother of God Petriztonitissa in the month of December of the seventh indiction, year 6592, and was signed in Armenian by me myself, Gregory Pakourianos, the sebastos and mezas domestikos of the West and by the most holy Patriarch of Jerusalem, lord Euthymios,⁷⁰ to guarantee and confirm all that has been written in the same, since he happened to be here by order of our mighty and holy Emperor requiring him to be in Thessalonike for peace with the hateful Frank and on his return again arrived here with us at my estates at Philippoupolis. It was written in Greek, Georgian, and Armenian because the monks of this monastery happen to be Georgians and do not understand Greek writing and so it is necessary for them to read this typikon in Georgian and Armenian. But we decree that the complete Greek version here has supreme authority because it received the signature at the end of its text. A copy of this also was made and was also signed in the same way and was deposited in the most holy monastery of Panagios which is in the city protected by God, to be stored and guarded in this monastery for ever. If—something I pray may not happen—any of the superiors in this aforesaid holy monastery of ours, or any of the monks in it, to the ruin of the monastery and its property rises up and tries to set aside what has been written in the present typikon and is prompted to bring about its downfall and destruction, the typikon stored in the aforesaid monastery of Panagios will be produced and will convict the one who has dared to commit this outrage and he will be called to account as is right and restitution will be demanded for whatever sin he commits and he will be expelled from the monastery. Then this [p. 133] typikon should be deposited once again in the aforementioned monastery of Panagios. For in no way do we wish it to be sent for or kept outside this monastery or the city; for this reason we put on oath the superiors in this monastery and the other brothers by our immaculate Mother of God herself that this present wish of ours should remain in force and the typikon of our monastery should be kept safe in it. Furthermore, if there is some need of it on the part of some outside quarreling about something in the typikon stored in our monastery, a copy must be made and authentication obtained from the superior and the brothers and this sent to them, but the original, as has been made clear, should never be moved from the monastery.⁷¹

I, Euthymios, by the mercy of God Patriarch of Jerusalem, the city of the Holy Resurrection of Christ our God, have signed with my own hand the present typikon of the Georgian monastery of the most holy Mother of God Petriztonitissa of the sebastos and mezas domestikos of the West, the lord Gregory Pakourianos.

Notes on the Translation

1. For Pakourianos' family, see Lemerle, Cinq études, pp. 158–61.
2. For the problematic relationship of Panagios' typikon with the present document, see Lemerle, Cinq études, p. 132, n. 44; Lavra, pt. 1, pp. 29–30; and “La vie ancienne de saint Athanase l’Athonite

ELEVENTH CENTURY

- composée au debut du XI^e siècle par Athanase de Lavra,” in Le millénaire du Mont Athos, 963–1963, vol. 1 (Chevetogne, 1963), p. 85, n. 72.
3. The founder is impossible to identify with certainty. He may have been Athanasios the Athonite’s successor Antony, who, according to Noret, Vitae duae, pp. cxviii–cxxxiv, following Leroy, “Les deux vies de S. Athanase l’Athonite,” AB 82 (1964), left Lavra to assume the superiority of Panagios, at that time a Lavriote dependency. Lemerle, Cinq études, p. 132, n. 44, suggested that the founder referred to here was a monk Panagios, who makes an appearance in the sources in 1078 as an opponent of the projected marriage of Nikephoros Botaneiates to Eudoxia, daughter of Constantine X Doukas.
 4. See Pseudo-Basil, Constitutiones asceticae 4.2, PG 31, col. 1349B.
 5. The table of contents is an occasional feature of the more formal organization of monastic typika noticeable from the late eleventh century onwards; see also later indices for (34) Machairas, (45) Neophytos, (57) Bebaia Elpis, and (58) Menoikeon.
 6. St. John’s and St. George’s were subsidiary chapels rather than separate churches in their own right; see [12] and [27] below; according to [27], St. John’s was a funerary chapel.
 7. For a full discussion of Pakourianos’ landed properties, see Lemerle (with Catherine Asdracha), Cinq études, pp. 175–81.
 8. Presumably as a result of the loss of Byzantine control over the city to the Armenians under Philaretos Brachamios in 1078, six years before the Seljuk conquest in 1084.
 9. See the discussion of these coinages in Lemerle, Cinq études, p. 137, n. 54.
 10. Pakourianos’ announcement of the defeat of the Patzinaks (Petchenegs) is premature, of course, for he died at their hands in a battle near Philippoupolis in 1086.
 11. The Cumans, like the Patzinaks a nomadic people of the eastern European steppe, were originally allied to them; plundered Thrace in 1087, then were employed by Alexios Komnenos against the Patzinaks in 1091.
 12. See the inventory, [33B] and [33C] below.
 13. Cf. Liturgy of St. Chrysostom, ed. F. E. Brightman, Liturgies Eastern and Western (London, 1896), p. 388.
 14. A reference to the sixth chrysobull listed in the inventory, [33E] below: “A chrysobull about our monastery of Petritzos . . .”
 15. Philippoupolis and Mosynopolis were the locations of two of the largest clusters of Pakourianos’ landed properties; see the map in Lemerle, Cinq études, after p. 191.
 16. In fact, the word is Armenian, which has fed the already intense debate about Pakourianos’ origins; see Chanidzé, “Bakurianis-Dzé,” pp. 159–63; Lemerle, Cinq études, p. 141, n. 64, thought it might be a marginal annotation that has been introduced into the text of the typikon.
 17. There are similarities between the wording used here and that found in the somewhat later (21) Roidion [B2] and [B5]; the respective contexts of these documents make borrowing unlikely, but the passages may derive from a common source.
 18. See [21] below.
 19. (20) Black Mountain [52] is critical of this sort of patronal designation of feasts that might interfere with the observance of fast days.
 20. kankela.
 21. This is an apparent reference to the Bačkovo ossuary; for the two subsidiary chapels, see also [1] above.
 22. Yet this is permitted later in (32) Mamas [29] and (33) Heliou Bomon.
 23. Basil of Caesarea, Regulae fusius tractatae 37 ([LR 37]), PG 31, col. 1012C.
 24. See [5], [6], [8], [10] above.
 25. See [21] below.
 26. Cf. Cyril of Scythopolis, Vita Sabae, chap. 29, ed. E. Schwartz (Berlin, 1938), p. 114.

23. PAKOURIANOS

27. The reference to another regulatory document is obscure, but note the possible reference to a liturgical typikon with detailed dietary prescriptions in [8] above.
28. Perhaps the fifth chrysobull listed in the inventory, [33E] below; cf. (19) Attaleiates [INV 11], a chrysobull the author of that document had obtained from Nikephoros III Botaneiates to confirm [INV 10], an earlier chrysobull of Michael VIII Doukas.
29. This suggests that Pakourianos originally intended to conclude his typikon at the end of [22] below.
30. The “gifts” are the eucharistic oblation.
31. Romaïos.
32. For this chapel, see also [1] and [12] above.
33. For this dependency, see also [31] below.
34. Gregory Nazianzen’s feast day is January 25.
35. See also [29] above.
36. See [7] above.
37. See the family tree in Lemerle, Cinq études, p. 159.
38. The reference is obscure, but cf. C. Nicaen. II, c. 12 (R&P 2.592–93), which forbids bishops and superiors to lease out even profitless tracts of land to state officials.
39. Addressed below in [37F].
40. meta hyakinthinon menepson.
41. hylographia.
42. meta petalon: Gautier translated ‘lamelles’ and observed that these were of gold according to the Georgian version of the typikon; see “Pakourianos,” 120, n. 1686. For the view that petalon denotes a metal nimbus around the face of a saint, see Lemerle, Actes de Saint-Pantéléémôn, 71, commentary on lines 22 and 23
43. Sanctuary barrier.
44. saroutin.
45. kamptrion.
46. sirtarion.
47. polykandela; the translation of names for Byzantine lighting devices follows Laskarina Bouras, “Byzantine Lighting Devices,” JÖB 32.3 (1982), 479–91.
48. epilorika oxykastora; for the imperial garments mentioned here, see [2] above.
49. sphinktouria. See Koukoules (BBP, vol. 6, pp. 293–94), who argues convincingly that sphinktourion was an outer garment worn with a belt.
50. blattia oxykastora. For kastorion denoting a purple murex dye, see Koukoules, BBP, v. 2.2, p. 25, n.6.
51. blattion triblattion. For the meaning of the terms diblattion or triblattion, see (19) Attaleiates, n. 35 on the translation.
52. hexamiton.
53. simenton (Lat. “segmentum”): trimming made with decorative fabric. See Koukoules, BBP, vol. 2, p. 47.
54. manoualia.
55. manoualion meta keropegion. According to Bouras (“Lighting Devices,” p. 481) the reference may be to a lamna, for which see Glossary below.
56. Sanctuary barrier.
57. kamarai manoualia.
58. dracontaria.
59. polykandela.
60. kaniskion.
61. cherniboxeston.
62. mouchroutia poteria. Bouras, “Lighting Devices,” p. 481, suggested that these were probably “conical glasses related to the seventeen polycandela” included in the inventory.

ELEVENTH CENTURY

63. kryon.
64. boubalia amelgadia.
65. See the discussion in Lemerle, Cinq études, pp. 162–63.
66. xylochartion.
67. The translation of apochideumos follows Lemerle, Cinq études, p. 155, n. 87.
68. isokodikon; for the meaning of this term, see Lemerle, Cinq études, p. 156, n. 88.
69. romaikon.
70. Apparently not otherwise known; see V. Grumel, La Chronologie (Paris, 1958), p. 452.
71. Pakourianos' signature is not found in the Greek manuscript on which Gautier's edition is based, but Petit, "Typikon," p. 57, supplied a Greek text for the Armenian signature he found in his manuscript, Codex Bucharest 694 (18th c.), which translates as follows: "I, Gregory Pakourianos, the sebastos and mezas domestikos of the West, have signed the present typikon of my sacred monastery of the most holy Mother of God Petriztonitissa with my own hand."

Document Notes

- [1] Foundation history. Cf. other examples in (6) Rila [1]; (9) Galesios [246]; (10) Eleousa [3]; (13) Ath. Rule [2] ff.; (17) Nikon Metanoieite; (22) Evergetis [2], [3]; and (24) Christodoulos [A2] ff. For the sensitivity towards the peasantry expressed herein, see also (9) Galesios [246], (17) Nikon Metanoieite [14], (19) Attaleiates [39], (24) Christodoulos [A13], (29) Kosmosoteira [71], [76], [103] as well as the philanthropic provision in [21] below.
- [2] Dedications of landed property and sacred artifacts by Gregory and Apasios. Many of these dedications are also listed in the inventory in [33] below. (19) Attaleiates [3], [4], [5] also provides a detailed accounting of consecrated offerings.
- [3] Free and self-governing status. The choice of this status is justified in [18] below. See also earlier provisions in (9) Galesios [247] and (13) Ath. Typikon as well as contemporary provisions in (19) Attaleiates [14], (22) Evergetis [12], and (24) Christodoulos [A16]. Lemerle, Cinq études, p. 138, n. 58, thought that this chapter, less the mention of the metropolitan of Philippoupolis, was borrowed from the lost typikon of Panagios.
- [4] Requirements of communal life. Note the intense hostility to kelliotic and other alternative forms of monasticism evident here. (10) Eleousa [4], (11) Ath. Rule [31], and (22) Evergetis [26] also provide for equality of food, while (9) Galesios [187] advocates it. (20) Black Mountain [24], [69], [71], [72] and (22) Evergetis [22] with its related documents likewise condemn secret eating. Private possessions are prohibited or severely restricted in (3) Theodore Studites [2]; (6) Rila [6]; (10) Eleousa; (11) Ath. Rule [34]; (13) Ath. Typikon [30]; and (24) Christodoulos [A22]; cf. the discussion in (9) Galesios [138], [191], [192]. (12) Tzimiskes, Introduction; (15) Constantine IX [13]; (19) Attaleiates [42]; and (27) Kecharitomene [4] all assume the existence of or explicitly permit servants; (22) Evergetis [24], however, along with many related documents, forbids servants.
- [5] Selection of the superior. See other procedures in (10) Eleousa [15], [16]; (13) Ath. Typikon [15], [16], [17], [19]; (14) Ath. Testament [13], [14]; (17) Nikon Metanoieite [13]; (18) Nea Gephyra [3]; (19) Attaleiates [26], [29]; (22) Evergetis [13] and related documents; and (24) Christodoulos [A18]. (3) Theodore Studites [3]; (13) Ath. Typikon [30]; and (22) Evergetis [18] and related documents also forbid the superior to show favoritism to his relatives. Gautier, "Pakourianos," p. 50, n. on line 521, thought this chapter and the preceding one were borrowed from the lost typikon of Panagios.
- [6] Number of monks; the monastery's officials. The set number of positions is reiterated in [25] below. For the fixing of a specific number of monks to be supported in a foundation, see also (9) Galesios [246]; (13) Ath. Typikon [37]; (17) Nikon Metanoieite [6]; (19) Attaleiates [27]; (27) Kecharitomene [5]; (29) Kosmosoteira [48]; (30) Phoberos [42]; (32) Mamas [5]; and (33) Heliou Bomon [5]. (22) Evergetis [23], however, rejects the idea of a fixed number of monks. There is a complete list of the monastery's 26 officials in Chanidzé, "Bakurianis-Dzé," p. 158. In [9] below, the monastery's monks are divided into three orders of differing privilege.

- [7] Qualifications and responsibilities of the priests. According to [6], there were to be six priests for the celebration of the liturgy. Note the ambivalent attitude expressed here towards priests. In [31] below, one of the priests is assigned to the dependency of St. Nicholas, where he was to educate youths with a view to becoming priests themselves. (27) Kecharitomene [15] discusses the qualifications of priests to be recruited for the convent for which it was written. (22) Evergetis [5] also provides for a daily celebration of the liturgy.
- [8] Refectory procedures; hospitality for visitors. This chapter presumes acquaintance with a more detailed dietary regulation evidently once contained in a separate document (a liturgical typikon?) that is no longer preserved. See comparable treatments of refectory procedures in (4) Stoudios [28], [29]; (10) Eleousa [4]; (11) Ath. Rule [21]; (20) Black Mountain [33]; and (22) Evergetis [9], with related documents. Cf. provisions for hospitality here with those for visitors at the foundation's lodging houses in [29] below. Lemerle, Cinq études, p. 141, n. 66, and Gautier, "Pakourianos," p. 62, n. on line 731, thought this chapter was borrowed from the lost typikon of Panagios.
- [9] Clothing allowances. The implication is that Panagios, the model typikon, had a communal provision of clothing, which is here rejected. Allowances are similar to those found later in (32) Mamas [28], (33) Heliou Bomon [28], and (58) Menoikeion [12]; cf. the communal provision of clothes in (22) Evergetis [25] and related documents.
- [10] Dietary regulations for fasts. The diet prescribed is somewhat stricter than (22) Evergetis [10] and [Appendix], which is more liberal in permitting the use of olive oil and the consumption of wine during fasts.
- [11] Celebration of the feast of the Dormition. See similar provisions in (22) Evergetis [11]; (27) Kecharitomene [59]; (29) Kosmosoteira [10], [29], [65]; and (57) Bebaia Elpis [112].
- [12] Liturgical prescriptions. For the illumination of churches, see (17) Nikon Metanoieite [13] and (28) Pantokrator [29], [34].
- [13] Requirement of confession to the superior; expulsion of the insubordinate. See contemporary treatment of confession in (22) Evergetis [7], [15] and related documents. For expulsion, see also [15] below. (2) Pantelleria [21], (14) Ath. Testament [9], and even (22) Evergetis [9] and related documents provide for expulsion under certain circumstances, but generally the emphasis is on retention—see (20) Black Mountain [76]—perhaps for fear of losing the reprobate monk's entrance gift.
- [14] Manual labor and prayer not incompatible. (32) Mamas [21] and (33) Heliou Bomon [21] imply the same; but cf. the exhortation of officials in (22) Evergetis [33] and related documents. Note penal connotation of manual labor here, for those "whose characters are not reliable nor hearts repentant."
- [15] No unauthorized departures or self-imposed ascetic observances; disciplinary guidance. See the injunction of monastic stability in (12) Tzimiskes [8] and the more sympathetic treatment of voluntary asceticism in (20) Black Mountain [72]. Penalty of expulsion also appears in [13] above.
- [16] Property administrators. See similar provisions in (22) Evergetis [34] and related documents.
- [17] Eunuchs and young boys banned. (12) Tzimiskes [16], (13) Ath. Rule [48], and (15) Constantine IX [1] ban youths and eunuchs; (29) Kosmosoteira [49] and (30) Phoberos [58] ban youths; (3) Theodore Studites [18] and (13) Ath. Typikon [34] ban adolescent disciples.
- [18] Rationale for independent and self-governing status. See also [3] above, with cross-references. For lawsuits over legal rights in private religious foundations, see (15) Constantine IX, Introduction, [8], and (19) Attaleiates [34], [43].
- [19] Expulsion of the superior or other officials wrongfully disposing of property. See also the ban on sale or rental of monastic property in [32] and the curse on violators in [33] below. For removal of the superior elsewhere, see (14) Ath. Testament [16]; (18) Nea Gephyra [3]; (19) Attaleiates [26]; and (22) Evergetis [14] and related documents. For removal of other officials guilty of deceitful or careless administration, see (22) Evergetis [32], cf. [42] and related documents. Gautier, "Pakourianos," p. 94, n. on line 1248, regarded this chapter and [20] below as likely borrowings from the Panagios typikon.

ELEVENTH CENTURY

- [20] Selective acceptance of donations for memorial services. See also [27] below. (19) Attaleiates [30] is much less critical, while (22) Evergetis [36] implies acceptability of such donations. Note premature announcement of the impending conclusion of the typikon, presumably after [21] and [22] below.
- [21] Commemorations for the founder, his father and brother. See the earlier provision for patronal commemoration in (17) Nikon Metanoieite [1] and the contemporary provisions in (19) Attaleiates [31], (22) Evergetis [35], and (24) Christodoulos [B5]. (20) Black Mountain [52] is critical of patronal designation of feasts that might override canonical days of fasting.
- [22] Funeral rites and commemorations for departed superiors and monks. See also [27], [30] below. See similar provisions in (21) Roidion [B12], (22) Evergetis [36] and related documents, and in (29) Kosmosoteira [54].
- [23] Exclusion of women from the premises; no nunnery to be established. See similar earlier provisions in (3) Theodore Studites [15], [16]. (22) Evergetis [39] and related documents, (24) Christodoulos [A10], and (28) Pantokrator [18] also ban women. Like this document, many others make an exception from the general principle of exclusion on the patronal feast. Judging from the declaration in [20] above and the repetitive treatment of the number of monks in [25], cf. [6] below, this and the following chapters are probably later editions to the typikon.
- [24] No Greek priests or monks, except for a secretary. Quite likely Pakourianos was aware of the conflicts between Georgian and Greek monks at another foundation to which he had extended his patronage, the Iveron monastery on Mount Athos; see the discussion in Chanidzé, “Bakurianis-Dzé,” pp. 143–44, and Lemerle, Lavra, pt. 1, pp. 42–45.
- [25] Preferential admissions for Georgian monks; maintenance of the set number of positions for monks. Later, both (27) Kecharitomene [4] and (29) Kosmosoteira [50] will provide for preferential admissions for the founders’ relatives. The requirement to maintain the number of monks revisits the requirement first set down in [6] above.
- [26] Accountability of financial officials; cash reserve fund. (22) Evergetis [30], along with various related documents, holds financial officials—but not the superior [18]—accountable, as does (19) Attaleiates [23], [41]. Cash reserve funds are found also in (27) Kecharitomene [24] and (29) Kosmosoteira [94].
- [27] Prescriptions for liturgical commemorations of the dead. See also [20], [22] above. There is an earlier provision of this sort in (17) Nikon Metanoieite [1], [4] and contemporary ones in (19) Attaleiates [31], (21) Roidion [B12], (22) Evergetis [36], and (24) Christodoulos [A7].
- [28] Care for old and sick monks. See the provisions in (22) Evergetis [41] and related documents as well as in the later (28) Pantokrator [10] and (29) Kosmosoteira [61].
- [29] Funding and staffing for the three hospices. Cf. provisions for hospitality for visitors to the monastery in [8] above. The contemporary (19) Attaleiates [20], (21) Roidion [B2], [B3], [B4], [B7], [B8], and (22) Evergetis [38] also provide for hospitality in their hospices.
- [30] Liturgical commemoration for the first superior, Gregory. See (13) Ath. Typikon [5] ff. for an earlier example of a relationship of this sort between a patron and his monastic director.
- [31] Training of boys for priesthood. See discussion in Konidares, “Hieratike Schole.” The number of students was to match the number of priests set in [6] above; perhaps the intent was to provide a dependable source of clerics socialized to the mores of the foundation, thereby freeing the monastery from the necessity of the external recruitment contemplated in [7] above. (34) Machairas [115] also makes a provision for a boys’ school.
- [32] Ban on sale or rental of monastic properties. Functionally equivalent to the declarations of the inalienability of same found in (15) Constantine IX [9], (10) Eleousa [18], (19) Attaleiates [7], [22], (22) Evergetis and related documents.
- [33] Maintenance of the typikon; curse on alienators of monastic property; inventory of movable property; provisions for security of the typikon. For preservation of the typikon’s provisions, see (8) John Xenos [3]; (9) Galesios [246]; (10) Eleousa [22]; (19) Attaleiates [7], [8], [9]; (22) Evergetis [40]; (24) Christodoulos [A27]; (32) Mamas [15]; (33) Heliou Bomon [15]; and (34) Machairas [158]. The inventory mentioned in (22) Evergetis [3] is now missing in that document, but (19) Attaleiates [INV 4] ff. provides a comparable contemporary example. The idea of keeping a copy of the typikon on deposit at a friendly institution would be adopted later in (32) Mamas, Addition, Second Semeioma; see also (19) Attaleiates [40] for using a copy rather than the original of the typikon for ordinary purposes.

23. PAKOURIANOS

24. Christodoulos: Rule, Testament and Codicil of Christodoulos for the Monastery of St. John the Theologian on Patmos

Date: Rule: May 1091

Translator: Patricia Karlin-Hayter

Testament: March 10, 1093

Codicil: March 15, 1093

Edition employed: F. Miklosich and F. Müller, Acta et diplomata graeca medii aevi sacra et profana, vol. 6 (Vienna, 1890), pp. 59–90.

Manuscripts: Codex Patmou 267 (12th c.) for the Rule; autograph manuscripts in the Patmos archives for the Testament and Codicil

Other translations: Modern Greek translation of the Rule by Theophilos Georgousakes, Akolouthia hiera tou hosiou kai theophorou patros hemon Christodoulou (Chania, 1913), pp. 32–41.

Institutional History

*A. Sources for Christodoulos' Life*¹

The present document, especially the Rule [A], is an important source for Christodoulos' life because it contains many autobiographical details. The hagiographic tradition, though later, is also useful.² John, metropolitan of Rhodes, wrote the first hagiographic Life of the founder, circa 1140.³ The Eulogy by the Patmian monk Athanasios, who later became patriarch of Antioch (1156–70), is a derivative work based on John's Life.⁴ A part of Christodoulos' correspondence with various patriarchs of Constantinople is preserved,⁵ as are many imperial chrysobulls and other official acts concerning his famous Patmian monastery and his earlier foundations at Strobilos and Kos.⁶ From this rich stock of documentary evidence, only the most important pieces are discussed below.

*B. Christodoulos' Earlier Monastic Career*⁷

Christodoulos' monastic career began as a monk on Mount Olympus in Bithynia, cf. [A2] below. He undertook pilgrimages to Rome and the Holy Land [A3] after the death of his spiritual father. He fled Palestine after the Seljuk conquest, perhaps after Atsiz captured Jerusalem in 1070. Christodoulos then settled at Paul the Younger's venerable Stylos monastery at Latros, (see (7) Latros, Institutional History, and [A3], [A4] below). Later, Patriarch Kosmas I (1075–81) appointed him protos (1076–79) of the confederation of neighboring monasteries there. The advance of the Seljuk Turks motivated him to abandon his post, though not before appointing the monk Sabbas as successor to his position as superior of Stylos.⁸ Christodoulos and a few of his monks fled [A6] first to Strobilos on the Aegean coast, where the monk Arsenios Skenourios sought unsuccessfully to persuade him to take over the direction of his own patrimonial monastery. As noted below in [A6], [A7] Christodoulos settled for a time in a new monastery at Pelion on the island of Kos. He secured a chrysobull for the foundation, located on land donated by Skenourios, from Emperor Nikephoros III Botaneiates (1078–81), but when he quarreled [A8] with his neighbors, he and his monks decided [A9] to move to the deserted island of Patmos instead.

24. CHRISTODOULOS

*C. Original Foundation of the Monastery on Patmos*⁹

Christodoulos gained an audience with Emperor Alexios I Komnenos (1081–1118) to request an exchange of his properties at Strobelos and on Kos for Patmos. Christodoulos claims [A9] that the emperor's mother Anna Dalassena was influential in getting her son to accede to his request. The emperor duly donated [A10] Patmos to Christodoulos in a chrysobull of April 1088, the original of which is still preserved at the monastery.¹⁰ In another preserved chrysobull that is contemporary with the foundation, the emperor granted the monastery's boats an exemption from customs duties.¹¹ A praktikon issued by Nicholas Tzanzes, imperial judge of the Cycladic islands, formally turned Patmos over [A11] to Christodoulos in August 1088.¹² According to this document, the island was waterless and desolate, without houses or other buildings, except for a little chapel of St. John the Theologian. Christodoulos began [A12] construction of a monastery surrounded by fortified walls. The island was attacked by Tzachas, the Turkish emir of Smyrna, circa 1090. Christodoulos issued his Rule [A] in May 1091, but discontent among his followers and fears of future attacks led Christodoulos to abandon the island in 1092 and move to Euboea around May, where he died on March 16, 1093, six days after having issued his Testament [B] and only a day after drawing up the Codicil [C].¹³ He had spent three years and ten months on Patmos and eleven months on Euboea. His alternative choice for charistikarios of the Patmian foundation, the patriarchal notary Theodosios [B5], [C1], resigned his claim on March 5, 1094 in a document drawn up before a notary in Constantinople, citing, among other reasons, his fear of undertaking the foundation's superiorship while the monastery lay open to Turkish attack.¹⁴ He notes (correctly) that Christodoulos was dying at the time he wrote his Testament and Codicil. Thus the foundation appeared unlikely to survive its founder.

D. Revival of the Foundation after Christodoulos' Death

By the time the First Crusade passed through Asia Minor in 1097–98, however, conditions in the Aegean had improved. Even before, in the course of the summer of 1092, Alexios Komnenos' brother-in-law, the mezas doux John Doukas, who would later become a monk at Evergetis, had reconquered the neighboring islands of Chios, Lesbos, and Samos from Tzachas.¹⁵ Some monks returned with Christodoulos' body and resumed work on the monastery. The completion of the katholikon, the cistern beneath it, the wood-roofed refectory, a number of cells in the south wing, and a large part of the walls date from Christodoulos' original labors at the site in 1088–92 and from this stage of work soon after his death.¹⁶ Both the katholikon and the refectory were unpretentious structures of distinctly provincial workmanship.

*E. The Patmos Monastery at Its Height in the Twelfth Century*¹⁷

The monastery received reconfirmations of its patriarchal stauropegion from Patriarch John IX Agapetos (1111–34) in 1132 and from Patriarch Luke Chrysoberges (1157–70) in 1158.¹⁸ The stauropegion exempted the monastery from the control of local bishops; the original grant, which is lost, must have been issued by Patriarch Nicholas III Grammatikos (1084–1111). The Testament of the superior Theoktistos, dated to 1157, is preserved.¹⁹ Though Arabs from Spain attacked Patmos during the reign of Manuel I Komnenos (1143–80), overall the monastery flourished in the twelfth century, aided by customs exemptions granted to its boats and revenues from properties in Asia Minor, Crete, and nearby islands. Towards the end of the century, a major new building program was initiated.²⁰ The refectory was vaulted and acquired a dome. The narthex of the katholikon, a chapel of Leontios, and perhaps also the exonarthex of the katholikon and the mortuary chapel of Christodoulos were built at this time in an attempt to improve and embellish the structures erected at the end of the previous century.

Some additional twelfth-century sources illustrate the monastery's fortunes. Among them are a Life of the superior Leontios who became patriarch of Jerusalem in 1176.²¹ A second eulogy of Christodoulos composed after 1191 by the Constantinopolitan monk Theodosios records the founder's posthumous miracles and thereby preserves important information about the foundation during the twelfth century.²² Among these was the frustration of the attempt by the Normans, fresh from their attack on Thessalonike in 1185, to carry off the founder's miraculous relics, and the visit by King Philip II Augustus (1180–1223) in 1192, who made a generous cash gift to the monks.

An inventory drawn up in 1200 lists over three hundred manuscripts.²³ The library had been built up by men who brought their books with them when they became monks. Among the books listed in this inventory are many copies of Basil of Caesarea's Ascetic Treatises, several copies of the Catecheses of Theodore the Studite, including a rare copy of his Great Catecheses, two copies of Paul Evergetinos' Evergetinon, and a copy of the liturgical typikon of the Sabas monastery near Jerusalem.

*F. The Patmos Monastery down to the Ottoman Conquest*²⁴

For a time after the Fourth Crusade that overthrew Byzantine rule in Constantinople in 1204, the Venetians controlled Patmos. The monastery had some twenty dependencies outside of Patmos, in Crete, Kalymnos, Kos, Naxos, Smyrna, Zakynthos and elsewhere. The most important of these was the dependency at Stylos on Crete, where Venetian control proved more enduring. Beginning in the thirteenth century (and on down to the nineteenth century) there is a very substantial archive of some 770 documents relating to this dependency, in both Greek and Italian.²⁵ The early documents in this collection concern Patmos' attempt to retain its title to this rich dependency.

Patmos was back under the control of the Nicaean emperors late in the life of that Byzantine government in exile. Both Theodore II Laskaris (1254–58), probably in 1258, and Michael VIII Palaiologos (1259–82), in 1259 (original document preserved), confirmed all of the monastery's possessions.²⁶ An uncertain patriarch in the period 1258–72 also upheld the monastery's independence against encroachment by Constantine, bishop of Ikaria and Neilos, bishop of Leros.²⁷ This was a troubled period, however, as Patmos suffered from raids by "godless Italians and impious pirates," according to a contemporary source.²⁸ Patmos also suffered during the Byzantine-Venetian war of 1281–85.

Two later Palaiologan rulers, Andronikos II (1282–1328) and Andronikos III (1328–41), also confirmed the Patmos monastery in its possessions, in the years 1292 and 1329 respectively.²⁹

Towards the end of the thirteenth century, there are two more testaments of Patmian superiors preserved, one of Germanos (1272) and another of Sabbas (ca. 1300).³⁰ In 1307, the Venetian doge Pietro Gradenigo (1289–1311) gave permission for the monks of Stylos to export grain to Patmos and allowed refugees from Patmos to settle on Crete and own property.³¹ After the Knights Hospitallers of St. John conquered Rhodes in 1306–10, the Patmian monks recognized the Knights' authority over their own island in 1340.³² The monks also supplied useful intelligence on the Turks to the Venetian authorities on Crete and the Angevins on Naxos.

The monastery underwent hard times from the late thirteenth through the fifteenth centuries, but was not abandoned. It was never taken by force. There is no evidence of building activity from the end of the twelfth to the middle of the sixteenth century.³³

G. The Patmos Monastery during Ottoman Rule

After the fall of Constantinople in 1453, the monastery prudently recognized Ottoman suzerainty, and thereby retained control over its own affairs. The earliest of a group of about two hundred Turkish documents is a firman from Mehmet II (1454), in which the Ottoman sultan delegates to Patmos' superior Matthew, who was also metropolitan of Myra, the authority to collect the island's taxes.³⁴ There was apparently no Turkish settlement on Patmos. Additional firmans are preserved from Mehmet II (1465), Beyazid II (1496), (1503), (1507), and Suleiman the Magnificent (1521/22). They relate to such matters as self-taxation and protection of the monastery from plunderers. During Ottoman times, Patmos enjoyed renewed prosperity based on its ships and seaborne trade, down to about 1700.

This prosperity made possible new constructions at the foundation towards the end of the sixteenth century, the first major work in nearly four hundred years.³⁵ The Chapel of the Holy Cross was built at this time, probably in 1598. In 1603, Patmos' superior Nikephoros of Crete built another chapel dedicated to the Holy Apostles. He is said also to have provided for the construction of a sacristy attached to the katholikon for the housing of the books he donated to the monastery. In 1611, Parthenios Pangostas, founder of another monastery on Patmos, built a chapel dedicated to St. Onouphrios. His name is also connected with the chapel of St. John the Forerunner built before 1605. The walls were strengthened after an earthquake in 1646, paid for in part by a local patron, Nicholas Mathas. The chapel of St. Basil also belongs to this period.

Sylvester, the same patriarch of Alexandria who attempted a restoration of cenobitic life at the Lavra monastery on Mount Athos (for which see (11) Ath. Rule, Institutional History B.6), evidently tried in 1579 to do the same for Patmos, where the founder Christodoulos' cenobitic order had long since lapsed (at an uncertain date) in favor of an idiorhythmic lifestyle.³⁶

Starting in the late sixteenth century, documents in the library show the monastery seeking protection and economic support from Catholic powers and the princes of Russia and the Danubian principalities.³⁷ There are also 14,000 documents in a huge communal archive over four centuries (16th–19th). These make it possible to follow the post-Byzantine history of the island in great detail.³⁸

The late seventeenth century was a difficult period. Patmos was plundered, and the island absorbed refugees from Ottoman Crete. Yet a major rebuilding program was carried out in the last decade of the seventeenth century under Neophytos Grimanis, the archbishop of Karpathos, who became known as the “new founder” for his benefactions.³⁹ This work gave the monastery its essentially final form till modern times.

The Patmian monks did not neglect to seek confirmations of the independence of their foundation throughout the era of Turkish rule. Such confirmations are preserved from the following patriarchs of Constantinople: Pachomios I (1504), (1512); Joseph III (1561); Cyril I Loukaris (1624); Dionysios III Muselimes (1673); Parthenios IV Mongilalos (1680); Kallinikos II (1688); Kosmas III (1715); Jeremias III (1722); Joannikios III (1762); Sophronios II (1780); Gregory V (1797); and Germanos IV (1843).⁴⁰ Thus Patmos must rank with Lavra as one of the most successful and long-lived independent and self-governing monasteries ever created in the Byzantine world.

A school was established at Patmos in 1713 which drew pupils from various parts of Greece and other countries.⁴¹ In 1806, Nektarios, bishop of Sardis, erected an unpretentious chapter house.⁴² The monastery was economically prosperous but inactive during the nineteenth century. There were no new buildings, and existing facilities began to deteriorate.

H. Patmos in Modern Times

The Patmos monastery remains in operation, though its monks follow an idiorhythmic life as they have done since at least the seventeenth century. An earthquake caused considerable damage in 1956. In a subsequent rebuilding program carried out by the Ephorate of Antiquities of the Dodekanese in conjunction with the Greek Ministry of Education, several parts of the monastery were demolished in 1957–61 to allow others to be restored or to make room for modern buildings including one housing a museum, library, and lodging facilities.⁴³

The monastery’s rich archives and collections of icons, relics, church treasures and manuscripts have survived remarkably well down to the present. The monastery’s library, 900 years old, is one of the few Byzantine libraries to have survived to the present.⁴⁴ It once housed some additional treasures, such as the Arethas manuscript of Plato, now at Oxford (Clarke 39). The archives contain 150 Byzantine documents, either originals or validated copies, and constitute one of the most important surviving collections of these works, ranging in date from the eleventh to the fifteenth centuries. Among these Byzantine documents are fifty-three by emperors, including some original chrysobulls.

Analysis

This “document” is composed of three texts, the Rule [A] of 1091 and the Testament [B] and Codicil [C] of 1093, the last two composed at Euripos on Euboea a few days before the author’s death. In the Rule, Christodoulos provides a fairly brief regulation, prefaced by a detailed foundation history, for an independent and self-governing monastery like some others (e.g., (22) Evergetis and (23) Pakourianos) that came into being as a result of the monastic reform movement in the last half of the eleventh century. Almost two years later, the founder saw fit to merge his earlier vision with a provision, detailed in his Testament and Codicil, for institutional leadership under a powerful protector.

These three texts can be usefully compared to the works of Athanasios the Athonite, (11) Ath. Rule, (13) Ath. Typikon, and (14) Ath. Testament. Like his predecessor Athanasios, Christodoulos skillfully utilized imperial patronage to leverage his own modest resources to create a foundation that has survived into modern times. Also, like the earlier collection of documents, these texts reflect an important change of the founder's thinking on how to assure his foundation's protection and support, though here this change takes place over a shorter period of time, and in a more troubled era.

24. CHRISTODOULOS

These texts are also valuable because, instead of the usual idealized portrait, they provide a glimpses of an actual foundation in which cenobitic ideals, never easy to realize, were especially hard to achieve given the precariousness of imperial authority in the Aegean islands and the danger posed by Turkish raiders.

A. Lives of the Monks

1. Number of Monks

Unlike other founders blessed with more settled conditions, it must have seemed pointless for Christodoulos to set any limits on the number of monks at his foundation. By the time Christodoulos composed his Testament in 1093, there were [B6] at least eight residents still at the Patmos monastery; he also had hopes that another three rebellious monks would see fit to return. A recent Turkish attack had scattered [B12] most of the monks, including Christodoulos himself, though he does not admit it. Like the three rebels, they were also welcome to return, provided they all accepted the authority of Christodoulos' successor.

2. Liturgical Duties

Like his contemporary, the author of (23) Pakourianos [6], Christodoulos considered [A17] the performance of liturgical services, especially the canonical hours, to be the most important responsibility of his monks: "we have been brought into being and adorned with reason in order to honor the Creator with uninterrupted hymn-singing." This was to be conducted in accordance with the liturgical typikon of the Monastery of Sabas near Jerusalem, a document that Christodoulos may have become acquainted with [A3] during his stay in Palestine or perhaps at his earlier posting at the Stylos monastery, where we know from (7) Latros [8] that a version of this typikon had been in use since the mid-tenth century. In his Rule, Christodoulos instructs [A17] his monks to draw up a typikon or synaxarion based on this model, a command he repeats in his Codicil [C10], but with an amelioration of the demanding Sunday vigils aside from those in Lent. This suggests that the Sabaite liturgical typikon set a kind of rigorist standard for monasteries whose founders wanted to emphasize hymnody.

3. Other Offices

At the time when he wrote his Rule in 1091, Christodoulos expected [A21] that there would be a superior and ten officials: a steward, an ecclesiarch, two treasurers, a cellarer, a wine steward, two assistant cellarers (parakellaritai), a cook and a refectorian. Obviously Christodoulos could not fill all these positions with the eight monks left at Patmos in 1093.

4. Manual Labor

With the permission of the superior, the cenobitic monks were allowed [A22] to practice calligraphy or some other craft, but there was to be no production for profit. The monastery was to supply the necessary materials and take in the work when it was completed. The solitaries associated with the cenobitic community were expected [A23] to engage in some work in accordance with the same terms.

5. Length of the Novitiate

Christodoulos requires [A26] that lay candidates be screened for admission. There is a short but valuable list of certain candidates whose applications should be rejected: those who came to escape creditors or extreme poverty, those disinclined to work, and those with numerous children. Those accepted were to be garbed in the “robe of renunciation” while being read selections from Basil of Caesarea’s Shorter Rules ([SR 17], [SR 30]). Christodoulos refers to canonical legislation of the Council of Constantinople (861) for the term of the novitiate: six months for the pious or severely ill, three years for all others. These requirements, stricter than those of (22) Evergetis [37], match those set down later in (27) Kecharitomene [30]. Christodoulos’ willingness to use both patristic authority and canon law recalls the more slavishly deferential approach towards the use of precedents characteristic of (20) Black Mountain.

6. Cenobitic Lifestyle

Christodoulos provides [A28] a brief discussion of the requirements of cenobitic life, hurriedly summarized at the end of his Rule from an unspecified model. The provisions, including bans on idle talking, factions and cliques, secret eating and drinking, theft of monastic property, and conducting correspondence without the superior’s approval, are vaguely Evergetian, but may have been drawn directly from the latter’s Basilian sources.

7. Provision for Solitaries

Although Christodoulos cites [A15] Basil of Caesarea for the value of cenobitic life and warns [A16] that no one should consider abolishing it, the foundation as he describes it includes [A23] a role for solitaries in association with the cenobitic community. Earlier, Christodoulos had encountered [A4] this sort of mixed solitary and cenobitic foundation at Latros, and apparently thought it worth replicating on Patmos.

These solitaries, ordinarily to be chosen [A23] by the superior, were to report [A24] to the monastery for weekend services, common meals, and supplies of dry food and work materials. The superior could force those who failed to live virtuously to return to cenobitic life or else expel them from the island. Christodoulos orders that the number of those who follow “the solitary way of life” shall not exceed twelve, which suggests that the founder expected, in ordinary circumstances, that the cenobitic community would be much larger than that in size.

8. Personal Possessions

Christodoulos comes down on the side of the stricter reformers (e.g., (22) Evergetis [22]) on the issue of personal possessions. He orders [A22] that monks should have none, except for “necessary clothing and coverings,” adding, “I call those necessary without which one cannot live.”

9. Servants

In his original conception of the foundation, Christodoulos wanted to exclude [A10] married laymen, their wives and their children, young men “in their boyish prime,” and eunuchs entirely from Patmos. In the past, (3) Theodore Studites [18] banned adolescent boys while (13) Ath. Typikon [34], [48] and (23) Pakourianos [17] banned both boys and eunuchs. As far as personal servants were concerned, the reform document (22) Evergetis [24] joined with the older authorities (3) Theodore Studites [4] and (13) Ath. Typikon [31] in banning them, while (23) Pakourianos [4] permitted them to exalted personages. Most of Christodoulos' contemporaries, however, including the authors of (19) Attaleiates [39], (23) Pakourianos [1], and even (22) Evergetis [3] did not seek to get along without agricultural dependents. Reformers and traditionalists alike took for granted that someone else would have to tend to cultivation of the landed properties if their monks were to be free for psalm-singing and other liturgical responsibilities.

24. CHRISTODOULOS

Christodoulos' patron Alexios Komnenos had to be cajoled, against his better judgment, to include all of the holy man's restrictions in the chrysobull issued for the foundation, for the emperor thought that agricultural dependents would in fact be necessary "to carry out agricultural and other heavier duties of the monastery." This is a good example of an experienced patron who knew better than his monastic counterpart what was required for a successful foundation. Disregarding both advice and precedent, Christodoulos sought to "eliminate utterly all occasions of trouble," thereby returning to the sterner principles of the Studite and Athonite traditions (see (3) Theodore Studites [4] and (13) Ath. Typikon [31]).

Even before he composed his Rule, Christodoulos had to acknowledge his mistake. Unable to find any unmarried laymen willing to live and work permanently on the island, he announces [A13] his willingness to admit a few married men and their wives whom he expected would be segregated at the northern end of the island. Christodoulos' intent was that the men would work around the monastery for five days, then return to their wives and children during the weekends. Thus there would be some hope of avoiding scandal if the monks and the laborers' dependents did not mix.

Even this arrangement did not prove permanent, given the exposed position of the laborers' settlement while raids by the Turks continued.⁴⁵ A few years later in his Codicil, Christodoulos indicates [C4] that youths were working with the other laborers, though they were not allowed to eat with the monks until they grew beards. In his Testament, Christodoulos provides [B6] for allowing children whom he has "reared from infancy" to be allowed to become monks "if they are steady and work well in said monastery." Earlier, Christodoulos himself claims [A2] in his Rule that he chose his own monastic vocation while still a child.

B. Constitutional Matters

1. Independent and Self-Governing Status

Christodoulos firmly associates his foundation with the contemporary monastic reform by designating [A16], cf. [B13] his monastery as an independent and self-governing (eleuthera kai autexousios) foundation, subject to neither ecclesiastical nor (despite Alexios Komnenos' patronage) imperial rights. Moreover, the foundation was "not to fall into the hands of any private or official person," i.e., be granted out under the charistike, nor have a protectorate (ephoreia) imposed on it.

2. Leadership

Despite his selection of an independent and self-governing constitution for his foundation, Christodoulos was even more unwilling than the authors of (22) Evergetis [14] and (23) Pakourianos

[5], [18] to award the full powers of institutional governance to the monastery's superior. Instead, like (19) Attaleiates [10], Christodoulos resorts to a kind of private protectorate to provide leadership for the foundation (even though in [A16] he had rejected any protectorate that might be imposed externally!).

Christodoulos evidently had some difficulty recruiting a suitable individual to provide this leadership. When he drew up his Testament [B3], his first choice as “master and wielder of authority” in the monastery was the monk Arsenios Skenourios, a nobleman who earlier had convinced Christodoulos to establish [A6] a monastery on Skenourios' patrimonial estates on the island of Kos at Mount Pelion. Perhaps as superior of this foundation Christodoulos was answerable to Arsenios as Christodoulos expected Patmos' superior would be to him just later on. In any event, Christodoulos thought it prudent to designate [B5] the patriarchal notary Theodosios as an alternative leader for the foundation with the title of charistikarios.

By the time Christodoulos issued his Codicil a few days later, he had given up on Arsenios and settled [C1] on Theodosios as his designated leader for the foundation. Christodoulos' choice of charistikarios as his preferred title for the leader of an independent monastery, associated as it was with an institution that had been central to a century of terrible abuses committed against the empire's monasteries, is peculiar—to say the least—if not actually oxymoronic. The restrictions Christodoulos chose to impose [B5] on Theodosios in the Testament make it clear, however, that a protectorate (ephoreia) similar to what various imperial patrons and courtiers would impose on independent foundations in the twelfth century (see below, Chapters Five and Six) was what he really had in mind. Christodoulos requires that Theodosios take up residence in the foundation and be tonsured. Moreover, he was not to introduce any of his relatives into the monastery, i.e., attempt to privatize it. “In all else,” Christodoulos proclaims, “he has full authority within strict monastic observance . . .” and to “have all the authority and [right of] dominion of a master who cannot be removed.” Christodoulos reaffirms [B6] Theodosios' authority, especially against any monks who might return later to the foundation. He clearly saw Theodosios as successor to his own authority in the foundation and asks him to increase “its value by building as much as he is able,” that is, fulfilling the patronal responsibilities of a protector. It is the Codicil, however, which demonstrates [B13] convincingly that Christodoulos had not changed his mind about the independent status of his foundation in the two-year interval (1091–93) between his Rule and the two later texts, since it reaffirms this status “to the end of the world” and obliges the charistikarios to protect it.

Since Christodoulos fails to mention the charistikarios in his Rule, it appears that the need for one occurred to him only between 1091 and 1093, most likely after he himself felt frightened enough to flee Patmos for safety on Euboea.⁴⁶ His reassessment of the leadership needs of his independent foundation recalls Athanasios' reworking of administrative arrangements for the Lavra monastery on Mount Athos in which he also ended up resorting to the protectorate (see (14) Ath. Testament [4] ff.). In any event, with the superimposition of the charistikarios upon the foundation, it was necessary to clarify [C2] this official's relationship to the other officials of the monastery. The superior, according to the author, “shall not have power to do or perform anything at all without the knowledge and consent of the charistikarios, but shall manage everything as the latter wishes.” Should he fail to do so, the charistikarios was allowed to expel him from office. Although Christodoulos envisioned a monk, not a layman, as his charistikarios and specifically disabled him from exploiting the foundation as a source of patronage, this passage is useful indirect evidence for the arbitrary (and often pernicious) authority of unreformed charistikarioi during most of the eleventh century.

24. CHRISTODOULOS

Citing patristic precedents and the civil legislation of Justinian, Christodoulos orders [A18] in his Rule that the future superior be elected “in accordance with the general consensus and common vote of the preeminent brethren, indeed of all the brotherhood.” This statement is probably best interpreted as Christodoulos’ endorsement of the procedure common to many reform monasteries of using a limited electorate to select the superior (cf. (22) Evergetis [13] and (23) Pakourianos [5]).

Christodoulos expects [A21] that the superior would choose the other officials of the monastery, though in the Codicil we find [C2] Christodoulos himself designating the monk Neophytos as the foundation’s treasurer. Judging from the statement in [B6] that the charistikarios “shall meet with no obstruction from any person whatsoever,” these officials were also answerable to him.

3. Authoritarian Rule

In theory, as Christodoulos’ description of the authority of the charistikarios in his Testament [B5], [B6] and Codicil [C2] makes clear, he envisioned an authoritarian style of rule for his foundation patterned on his own behavior. Also, the author’s straightforwardly traditional admonition [A19] to the superior is an instructive contrast to the parallel passage in (22) Evergetis [17], especially the latter’s warning against pomposity and assertion of privilege.

In practice, however, Christodoulos’ community was scattered [B12], even rebellious [B6] by the time he wrote his Testament. Earlier, he frankly admits [A11] in the Rule that a majority of his monks who followed him from Kos to Patmos deserted him. So perhaps in these troubled times there was a price to be paid in factionalism for a non-consultative, absolutist monastic government. Christodoulos preferred those monks who declared, “We die obeying your orders.”

4. Removal of Superior

Christodoulos lists [A20] several reasons that would justify the deposition of the superior: 1) negation of Christodoulos’ regulations, present or future, 2) altering the cenobitic life “perhaps out of his own fondness for pleasure,” 3) misappropriating the monastery’s revenues, and 4) being convicted of stealing. The prominence of the founder’s concern about financial misconduct finds parallels in similar provisions in other reform documents like (22) Evergetis [14] and (23) Pakourianos [19]. The very different list in (19) Attaleiates [26], written for a traditional foundation, provides for the superior’s deposition in the event of a deterioration of relations with the protector; in this respect it is like Christodoulos’ provision in his Codicil [C2] which allows the charistikarios to depose the superior for insubordination.

As also in institutions represented by reform documents, the senior monks, here called the “more preeminent brothers” and identified as the steward, the ecclesiarch and the priests, were to take [A20] the lead in warning a wayward superior, then, if necessary, in removing him and choosing his successor. Christodoulos’ decision to allow [C2] the charistikarios a role in this process must be seen as an afterthought.

5. Patronal Privileges

Christodoulos left the subject of patronal privileges for his charistikarios unaddressed except in so far as he specifically forbids [B5] him to introduce his relatives into the monastery (cf. (23) Pakourianos [25], where admission of relatives of the founder is permitted). Christodoulos himself was willing to disregard reformist principles and oblige [B15] the charistikarios to accept (as kataemptoi?) his “spiritual son,” the notary and priest George, and his two children “without any difficulties being made.” The founder also makes [C12] the request that he be buried wherever the community settled permanently (i.e., on Patmos or Kos).

Christodoulos is anxious to disavow [B8] any inheritance of patronal privilege by his nephews, including one who was an assistant steward (paraikonomos) of the Stoudios monastery: “None of them has any power ever, at any time, to go to law or plead against my charistikarios or the interests of the monastery.” He emphasizes [B11], “I leave them only my blessing.” As other reform founders, e.g., the author of (23) Pakourianos [18], [25], recognized, relatives could pose one of the greatest threats to a foundation’s independence.

C. Financial Matters

1. Financial Administration

The superior, steward, ecclesiarch, and one of the two treasurers all had roles to play [A21] in the financial administration of the monastery. The steward was to carry out his duties under the close supervision of the superior. One of the treasurers was to be responsible for recording the monastery’s revenues; the superior, steward and ecclesiarch would all co-sign for receipts of income. The ecclesiarch was to store the monastery’s cash assets and, on the orders of the superior, disburse them as needed to the treasurer for day-to-day needs. The above-mentioned officials were to audit the treasurer’s accounts before he received any new disbursements. It appears, therefore, that in Christodoulos’ foundation the superior played a fairly important role in the institution’s financial administration, as was the case in (23) Pakourianos [26].

2. Inalienability of the Foundation’s Properties

Unlike most reformist founders, Christodoulos was not particularly concerned with asserting the inalienability of his foundation’s movable and immovable properties, though as we have seen financial misconduct figures [A20] prominently in his list of justifications for deposing the superior. Perhaps this was because at the time of the composition of the last of these documents, the Codicil, Christodoulos was still not sure whether his monastic settlement on Patmos would be viable. If it were not, he hoped to convince the emperor to give him back [C11] those properties on Kos that he had previously turned over [A9] to the imperial treasury in exchange for Patmos. Since the ultimate location of his foundation was at issue, it is perhaps not surprising that he might have thought an assertion of the inalienability of its underlying landed properties (cf. [B4]) premature.

As far as movable properties were concerned, a brief list of icons is to be found in his Testament [B10], but the founder’s greatest concern [B7], [C5] was the recovery of at least part of his collection of books that had once been at the patriarchal monastery of Latros. After the Turks sacked that foundation, Christodoulos had managed to send [C7] a military expedition to rescue the books, which were sent to Hagia Sophia in Constantinople for safekeeping. The Patriarch Nicholas III Grammatikos was apparently unwilling [C6] to concede ownership of all of the books to Christodoulos; perhaps he hoped that the monastery at Latros could be reconstituted some day.

24. CHRISTODOULOS

3. Imperial Exemptions

Like other founders of his era, such as the authors of (19) Attaleiates, (23) Pakourianos, and (10) Eleousa, Christodoulos was keen to obtain imperial chrysobulls to bolster his foundation's autonomy and to obtain immunities. Christodoulos had obtained [A7] a chrysobull from Emperor Nikephoros III Botaneiates to "confirm and establish [his] possession" of the properties donated by Arsenios Skenourios and smaller benefactors to support the foundation of Christodoulos' monastery on Kos.⁴⁷

Later, Christodoulos asked [A9] Alexios Komnenos for a grant of the island of Patmos "as an imperial gift, free of all obligations." A summary in the Rule of the emperor's chrysobull⁴⁸ issued in 1088 to grant this request states [A10] that Christodoulos received Patmos "exempt from all fiscal obligation and from any servitude whatsoever." This appears to be one of the most sweeping grants of immunity bestowed upon the authors of the monastic foundation documents.⁴⁹

4. Commemorative Observances

In support of his foundation on Kos, we are told [A7] that Christodoulos accepted offerings (prosenexeis) of both movable and immovable property from pious local inhabitants, presumably in exchange for the performance of commemorative observances. At Patmos, however, there is only Christodoulos' instruction to the charistikarios Theodosios to conduct [B5] memorial services for the emperor, Christodoulos himself, and "the whole world."

D. Relationship to the Monastic Reform

Like (23) Pakourianos, this document sets its own course for monastic reform that is independent of the prescriptions found in (22) Evergetis. One of the ways that Christodoulos does demonstrate his ideological links to other authors of the reform movement is his citation of ancient authorities [A18], [A26] as justification for some of the regulations in his rules. His citation of the legislation of Justinian is a first, indicating that that emperor's legal code was beginning to circulate independently of its incorporation and condensation in the Basilika of Emperor Leo VI (886–912). Like Nikon, the author of (20) Black Mountain, who yields to none of the reformers in his deference to patristic and other precedents, Christodoulos was familiar with some of the hagiographical literature of the early ascetic era, including the Life of Pachomios. Christodoulos' citation [A26] of canon law to justify his regulation of the length of the novitiate is another early example of the respect founders in the reform movement had for normative sources. These would prove one of that movement's most effective weapons against their traditionalist opponents (see above, Chapter Four, Historical Context).

E. External Relations

1. Institutional Philanthropy

Since his monastery "has not enjoyed sufficient resources," Christodoulos refrains [A25] from laying down a specific rule on quantities of charity for feeding the poor or extending hospitality.

2. Treatment of the Monastery's Dependents

Initially, Christodoulos thought it was more important to insulate his monks from sexual temptation than to be sensitive to the needs of the monastery's peasant cultivators. As we have seen, he quickly had to abandon [A13] his original resolution to populate [A10] Patmos with unmarried laymen. Yet eventually Christodoulos shows [A13] that he was prepared to recognize the requests of his lay workers for "the bath, rest and home life." Even after he relented, however, he holds [A14] workmen responsible for the trespasses of their wives and children, on pain of expulsion. Except for the steward, monks were not to go to any place where they were liable to meet a woman.

Notes on the Introduction

1. For an overview, see Vranoussis and Nystazopoulou-Pelekidou, Engrapha, pp. 4–20.
2. See Vranoussis, Hagiologika keimena.
3. Halkin, BHG 303, ed. I. Sakkéliou in Boines, Akolouthia, pp. 109–33.
4. Halkin, BHG 304, ed. I. Sakkéliou in Boines, Akolouthia, pp. 134–62.
5. Ed. MM 6.17–19, 30–32.
6. Ed. Vranoussis and Nystazopoulou-Pelekidou, Engrapha, nos. 4–7, 46–49, pp. 31–76, 327 ff., and MM 6.23–29, 32–59.
7. For an overview, see Vranoussis and Nystazopoulou-Pelekidou, Engrapha, pp. 21–32.
8. Entalma, MM 6.16–17 (1079).
9. See Vranoussis and Nystazopoulou-Pelekidou, Engrapha, pp. 33–58.
10. Dölger, Regesten, no. 1147, ed. Vranoussis and Nystazopoulou-Pelekidou, Engrapha, no. 6, pp. 55–67, and MM 6.44–49 (1088).
11. Dölger, Regesten, no. 1150, ed. Vranoussis and Nystazopoulou-Pelekidou, Engrapha, no. 7, pp. 68–76, and MM 6.51–53 (1088).
12. Praktikon, MM 6.55–57 (1088).
13. See Gautier, "Date," p. 238.
14. Engraphon, MM 6.90–94 (1094); see also Vranoussis and Nystazopoulou-Pelekidou, Engrapha, pp. 56–57.
15. For dating, see Gautier, "Date," p. 238.
16. See Ch. Bouras, "Architecture," pp. 26–27, in Komines, Patmos.
17. For an overview, see Vranoussis and Nystazopoulou-Pelekidou, Engrapha, pp. 59–84.
18. Grumel, Regestes, nos. 1005 and 1049, ed. MM 6.101–3 (1132) and 113–17 (1158); see also Vranoussis and Nystazopoulou-Pelekidou, Engrapha, pp. 64–66.
19. Ed. MM 6.106–10; see also Vranoussis and Nystazopoulou-Pelekidou, Engrapha, pp. 67, 75–76.
20. See Bouras, "Architecture," pp. 27–28, in Komines, Patmos.
21. BHG 985; see also Vranoussis and Nystazopoulou-Pelekidou, Engrapha, pp. 72–74.
22. BHG 305; see also Vranoussis and Nystazopoulou-Pelekidou, Engrapha, pp. 68–71.
23. First edited by Diehl, "Trésor"; new diplomatic edition by Astruc, "Inventaire," pp. 20–30, see esp. lines 83, 110, 113, 135–36, 142, 171–72, 210, and 221; see also Vranoussis and Nystazopoulou-Pelekidou, Engrapha, pp. 80–82.
24. For an overview, see Vranoussis and Nystazopoulou-Pelekidou, Engrapha, pp. 85–116.
25. Chr. Maltezou, "Archival Material in Foreign Languages," p. 338, in Komines, Patmos.
26. Dölger, Regesten, nos. 1849 and 1871, ed. Vranoussis and Nystazopoulou-Pelekidou, Engrapha, nos. 14 and 26, pp. 124–32, 243–46, and MM 6.196–97, 199–201.
27. Laurent, Regestes, no. 1782, ed. MM 6.203–4; see also Vranoussis and Nystazopoulou-Pelekidou, Engrapha, p. 94.

24. CHRISTODOULOS

28. H. Glykatzi-Ahrweiler, "The Historical Background," p. 13, in Komines, Patmos.
29. Ed. MM 6.236–38 (1292), 250–52 (1329).
30. Ed. MM 6.229–33 (1272), 241–46 (ca. 1300); see also Vranoussis and Nystazopoulou-Pelekidou, Engrapha, pp. 98–99.
31. Ed. MM 6.221 (1307); with Maltezou, "Archival Material," p. 338, in Komines, Patmos.
32. H. Glykatzi-Ahrweiler, "Background," p. 13, in Komines, Patmos.
33. Bouras, "Architecture," p. 29, in Komines, Patmos.
34. Maltezou, "Archival Material," p. 338, in Komines, Patmos; see also Vranoussis and Nystazopoulou-Pelekidou, Engrapha, pp. 110–12.
35. Bouras, "Architecture," pp. 29–32, in Komines, Patmos.
36. See MM 6.266–69 (1579).
37. Maltezou, "Archival Material," p. 338, in Komines, Patmos.
38. V. Panayatopoulos, "The Archive from the Period of Turkish Rule," p. 339, in Komines, Patmos; see also Vranoussis and Nystazopoulou-Pelekidou, Engrapha, p. 114.
39. Bouras, "Architecture," p. 32, in Komines, Patmos.
40. Ed. MM 6.261–62 (1504), 262–64 (1512), 264–65 (1561), 293–96 (1624), 300–303 (1673), 304–5 (1680), 305–9 (1688), 317–19 (1715), 328–32 (1722), 340–44 (1762), 359–65 (1780), 374–79 (1797), 383–86 (1843).
41. Glykatzi-Ahrweiler, "Background," p. 14, in Komines, Patmos; Vranoussis and Nystazopoulou-Pelekidou, Engrapha, p. 115; see also the eighteenth-century patriarchal documents in MM 6.347–50 (1769), 350–54 (1769), 372–74 (1797).
42. Bouras, "Architecture," in Komines, Patmos, p. 33.
43. Bouras, "Architecture," in Komines, Patmos, pp. 34–35.
44. A. Komines, "The Manuscripts," pp. 328–29, in Komines, Patmos.
45. See note to [A13] below.
46. Note the different justifications and agents proposed for deposing a superior in [A20] and [C2].
47. Cf. Dölger, Regesten, nos. 1045 and 1046, ed. Vranoussis and Nystazopoulou-Pelekidou, Engrapha, nos. 2 and 3, pp. 15–30, and MM 6.19–21, 21–23 (1079), both original documents preserved at Patmos, granted earlier for properties that may have later come under Christodoulos' control; Dölger, Regesten, no. 1123, ed. Vranoussis and Nystazopoulou-Pelekidou, Engrapha, no. 4, pp. 31–39, and MM 6.23–25 (1085), by Alexios I Komnenos, another original preserved document, appears to be the confirmation of the lost chrysobull of his predecessor Nikephoros III Botaneiates mentioned [A7] by Christodoulos.
48. Dölger, Regesten, no. 1147, ed. Vranoussis and Nystazopoulou-Pelekidou, Engrapha, no. 6, pp. 55–67, and MM 6.44–49 (1088).
49. Cf. (19) Attaleiates [INV 10] and [INV 11], which grant only exemption from extraordinary taxes and compulsory services.

Bibliography

- Astruc, Charles, "L'inventaire dressé en Septembre 1200 du Trésor et de la Bibliothèque de Patmos. Edition diplomatique," T&M 8 (1981), 15–30. Edition of the Inventory of 1200.
- Beck, Hans-Georg, Kirche und theologische Literatur im byzantinischen Reich (Munich, 1959), p. 647.
- Boines, Kyriillos, Akolouthia hiera tou hosiou kai theophorou patros hemon Christodoulou tou thaumatourgou (Athens, 1884).
- Bompaire, Jacques, "Les catalogues de livres-manuscrits d'époque byzantine (XI^e–XV^e s.)," in Byzance et les Slaves, Études de Civilisation: Mélanges Ivan Dujčev (Paris, 1979), pp. 63, 65.
- Chatzidakis, Manolis, Icons of Patmos (Athens, 1985).
- Diehl, Charles, "Le trésor et la bibliothèque de Patmos au commencement du 13^e siècle," BZ 1 (1892), 488–525.
- , "Remarques sur deux chartes byzantines de Patmos," Byzantion 4 (1927–28), 1–6.

ELEVENTH CENTURY

- Dölger, Franz, "Die Kaiserurkunden des Johannes-Theologos-Klosters auf Patmos," BZ 28 (1928), 332–71.
- Dumont, Pierre, "Vie cénobitique ou vie hésychaste dans quelques 'typica' byzantins," in L'Église et les Églises, vol. 2 (Chevetogne, 1955), pp. 3–13, esp. 9–13.
- Gautier, Paul, "La date de la mort de Christodule de Patmos (mercredi 16 mars 1093)," REB 25 (1967), 235–38.
- Gregory, Timothy, and Ševčenko, Nancy, "Patmos," ODB, pp. 1596–97.
- Halkin, François, Bibliotheca hagiographica graeca, 3rd ed. (Brussels, 1957), 307 (Rule), 308 (Testament and Codicil).
- Karlin-Hayter, Patricia, "Notes sur les archives de Patmos comme source pour la démographie et l'économie de l'île," BF 5 (1977), 189–215.
- Kazhdan, Alexander, "Christodoulos of Patmos," ODB, pp. 440–41.
- Komines, Athanasios, ed., Patmos, Treasures of the Monastery (Athens, 1988).
- Lebarbier, E., Saint-Christodule et la réforme des couvents grecs au XI^e siècle (Paris, 1863).
- Malamut, Elisabeth, Les îles de l'empire byzantin. VIII^e–XII^e siècles, vol. 2 (Paris, 1988), pp. 446–53.
- Nystazopoulou, M. G., "Ho epi tou kanikleiou kai he ephoreia tes en Patmo mones," Symmeikta 1 (1966), 76–94.
- Oeconomos, Lysimaque, La vie religieuse dans l'empire byzantin au temps des Commènes et des Anges (Paris, 1918), pp. 142–52.
- Orlandos, Anastasios, He architektonike kai hai Byzantinai toichographiai tes Mones tou Theologou Patmou (Athens, 1970).
- , He en Patmo mone Hagiou Ioannou tou Theologou (Athens, 1966).
- Renaudin, P., "Christodule, higoumène de Saint-Jean à Patmos," ROC 5 (1900), 215–46.
- Rouillard, Germaine, "Les taxes maritimes et commerciaux d'après des Actes de Patmos et de Lavra," in Mélanges Charles Diehl, vol. 1 (Paris, 1930), 277–89.
- Viller, Marcel, "Christodoulos," DS, vol. 2 (Paris, 1940), cols. 875–76.
- Volk, Robert, Gesundheitswesen und Wohltätigkeit im Spiegel der byzantinischen Klostertypika (Munich, 1983), pp. 109–12.
- Vranoussis, Era, Ta hagiologika keimena tou hosiou Christodoulou (Athens, 1966).
- Vranoussis, Era, and Nystazopoulou-Pelekidou, M., Byzantina engrapha tes Mones Patmou, 2 vols. (Athens, 1980).

Translation

Rule [A]

Godly Rule or Ordinance of our holy father Christodoulos, which he laid down for his disciples in the monastery belonging to him on the island of Patmos.

[A1.] Inasmuch as I, being but a man, have been maintained in this present life, by God's dispensation, a sufficient time and, being far advanced in age, have nothing more to look for, to quote Gregory the great Theologian,¹ but my departure hence, I have deemed it incumbent on me to set down in writing for my pious companions the rules that will, I believe, help them to be perfectly and salvifically pleasing to God, an ordinance for my very dear brothers and children in the Lord, in order that, taking it as a rule and a pointer, and governing their conduct by its precepts, their life may run smoothly (may God hear my words!) in peace, with good conscience, guarded by the grace of the life-giving and all-holy Trinity, three persons of one nature.

24. CHRISTODOULOS

But, O holy community (for here I turn and my words are addressed to you!), elect flock, chosen people, godly concourse, my blessed children in the Lord, come, hear that which I shall expound to you: “Come, listen to me, I will teach you fear of the Lord” (cf. Ps. 65 [66]:16). For I shall use, when opportune, the words of the sacred psalmist David—“Incline your ears to the words of my mouth” (cf. Ps. 77 [78]:1–2)—let Solomon’s voice mingle with David’s, the son and the father together sing to me, a father addressing my sons: “Hearken to me, for I will speak noble truths and will produce right sayings from my lips” (cf. Prov. 8:6).

At this point it seems to me right and necessary to begin with some personal information, and speak of it at acceptable length, then dealing summarily with essentials of a more practical kind. Indeed, even in Holy Writ we often observe that no reproach attaches to words that have a measure of partiality, or accounts that tend to redound to the praise of the speaker. No one attacked them for talking about themselves, nor was this considered a sin, so long as it was in order to expound and clarify something formerly obscure, and not from some other, merely human motive. Considering this, neither do I, a humble old man, think it reprehensible to take up my history, beginning at the beginning and continuing [p. 60] to the end, and place before you the course taken by my life in this vain world (for this seems to me useful for salvation!), after that laying injunction upon you, that you may be saved in the Lord, observing obedience.

[A2.] I come from the East.² From an early age I was tossed to and fro by conflicting thoughts and, still a small child, I thought of leaving home, parents, and family, and fleeing to refuge with Christ, our true God and Savior. This is exactly what I did—going to a flock of monks³ to whom I surrendered myself, and finding a teacher and educator in the superior of this holy band. But it was God, and he alone, who, through his ineffable mercy, opened my eyes, at that early, unformed and malleable age, well before my reasoning powers were firm. This was indeed worthy of his great works, for, of old, “Out of the mouth of babes and sucklings he perfected praise” (cf. Ps. 8:2), and “The manifestation of his word enlightens and instructs the simple” (cf. Ps. 118 [119]:130) as David divinely and prophetically sings.

[A3.] But desire for a more complete isolation possessed me and drove me from place to place. To Palestine I went, desiring, to venerate the holy steps of our Lord, but most of all to “flee like a sparrow” (cf. Ps. 10 [11]:3; 54 [55]:7), choosing, like those of old, “to lodge in the wilderness.” (Ps. 54 [55]: 7) So, after worshiping at the holy places to my fill, conversing with none but the luminaries and fathers there—and bearing fruit, though I, perhaps, should not say so, through imitation of their life—I presently moved to the most desolate parts of the country (Palestine, that is) settling there for some time.

But then the Saracen swarm made this impossible. They appeared in all regions of Palestine, and spread like a monstrous hailstorm, with a baneful rattling and gibbering,⁴ destroying and annihilating the whole Christian society. As I did not wish to fall into [the sin of] self-will (but for this I would not have been seen clinging to life!) I removed from thence, expelled, as it were, and driven out by the barbarian phalanx, and came to a peaceful mountain in a pleasant site in Asia [Minor], called Latros locally,⁵ led there by its ancient reputation, for those blessed fathers who once lived on Raithou and Sinai (if not all of them, at any rate the majority) are said to have moved there because of the continual raids of the savage Blemmyes, except those who suffered martyrdom on the spot. [p. 61]

[A4.] So, because of my love for these saints, my will too inclined to this mountain, settling me there, with my goal before me. I entered the lists, and perhaps the community I founded there [might be called] spiritual, at least by human standards. The hand of the Lord with us advanced our stay on that mountain to good fame. We practiced asceticism but not as solitaries. Here, two or three gathered in the name of the Lord;⁶ there, a slightly larger number settled in one place, choosing the cenobitic life.

Elsewhere, a considerable body could be seen, at once separate and together, maintaining, I may say, a lavra, in the ancient tradition of the fathers: together each Sunday, to perform the liturgy and exchange edifying conversation, thereafter returning to their cells, to devote the six days of the week to solitary contemplation with psalm-singing and handiwork. We were all things to each other, sharpening one another's resolve to the unadulterated labor of virtue.

The triumphs of cenobitic discipline among those subject to its rule showed abundant and overflowing, unadulterated, undebased. O! How should I remember it without tears! Never a coarse word was heard from those who were with us on Latros. Never was there any disreputable cohabitation. No sign of strife or hatred or envy. Not one of those who lived there in the monastery kept anything earthly to himself, private or secret, but all was dignity, freedom from worldly cares, poverty, virtue, saintliness and the crowning virtue of all, humility.⁷

[A5.] But O! My ill luck! Upon Asia Minor too and all Ionia falls now the saber of the Lord, slashing without rest or cease, refusing to return to the scabbard. Against these lands too is loosed the glittering sword, the bow drawn, with those deadly weapons, his arrows drunk with the blood of the wounded and of the captives. Here too is lit the fire kindled by the wrath of the Lord, that devoured the land of the Romans and set on fire the foundations of the mountains, in the prophetic words, the revelations made by the Lord through Jeremiah and David and Moses, against Israel when it transgressed.⁸

What do I mean by "saber," "bow," "drunken arrows," and "kindled fire"? The right arm of the Persians,⁹ the ferocity of the Turks, that wiped out the whole of the east and devastated it cruelly. That lawless nation, destroyer of towns and countryside alike, [p. 62] attacked that land too, bringing the same destruction upon its inhabitants. Because the multitude of our sins daily increased the successes of the Agarenes, they did not leave us untroubled in that mountain either, where we had taken refuge. For there was not a hole hidden from the godless [beasts].

So from this place too I was driven by fear, migrating for the second time, with little regard, I must admit, even for pastoral ordination—which I had not received willingly. How could we have been so bold as of ourselves to have assumed so great a burden? On the contrary, most reluctantly did I shoulder it [yet], making myself responsible, perhaps, in the legal sense, as a guardian, since that mountain of Latros was entrusted to me by his holiness the Patriarch,¹⁰ and I bore the title of protos on it. Well, perhaps I should have faced death there, if the law is to be interpreted rigorously.¹¹ But human frailty, ever turning to the Lord's mercy and emboldened thereby, made me confident I was doing no wrong in moving once more because of the great vexation caused by the aforesaid enemies.

24. CHRISTODOULOS

[A6.] So I came in due course to Strobilos, a city on the sea shore. I wished, in a way, to avoid the cruelty of the barbarians, and had with me, too, some of the brothers, who felt that expatriating themselves with me was the answer to their prayer, and what a man could most reasonably wish to do. Well, but God's grace was not yet pleased to let us be and grant us rest. After all we had been through, not even there did we find peace. The same fear continued to dog us.

There, however, we fell in with a pious man of distinguished birth (for he was of native stock, well born, and all looked up to him); he was godly in his ways, moderate in his opinions, imposing in his person, decorous in character, and a monk. His name was Arsenios, his surname Skenourios.¹² He devoted himself entirely to looking after us. No stranger to us before, he was now bound even closer in the spiritual bonds of affection. He began by offering me his own monastery at Strobilos, but, seeing he could not keep me there, I was sick of the East for good, what with continually being on the move out of fear of the enemy (at Strobilos too a Persian attack was expected any moment!); he begged me to cross over to the island of Kos, go round it, inspect his patrimonial lands there, and found a monastery on them wherever I chose. To it he would consecrate the whole property.

I obey and make haste to visit Kos. I go round Skenourios' properties, come upon an extensive ridge with no habitation, in a well-exposed site, well-watered besides, and temperate. This hill was called Pelion by the islanders. So, seeing it ringed [p. 63] in and cut off from the surrounding country, and isolated by a ring of ravines and natural gullies (one might think it a fortress!), I was straightway delighted with the site and eager to build a monastery there, for I thought to stay my wanderings in that hill and at last taste peace, until I should bequeath my clay to that same Pelion. But God, apparently, did not approve my plan.

[A7.] For there again, though I endured on Pelion labors too great to relate, in the end I failed of my aim. God had decided that on Patmos I should find my fate¹³ and my grave. However, acceding to the suggestions and appeals of the said brother Arsenios (I shall make room in the relation of my affairs for a short account of my stay on Pelion) I threw myself into the building program. He began by promising to help us and work beside us with all his might, but before long, at the very outset of work, he made up his mind to flee, slipped away by night, and sailed for Jerusalem without a backward glance.

As a result, a maximum was demanded of me. With pain and sweat, in those difficult times, amid a general shortage of necessaries, but with help from on high, I erected from the foundations and brought to completion a quite beautiful, a most elegant church, founding it in the name of the most holy Mother of God. I made a circuit-wall and cells and everything else that characterizes a self-supporting and completely equipped monastery. Delighted with its appearance and reckoning it, quite simply, as a "factory of virtue,"¹⁴ the pious and Christ-loving inhabitants of the aforesaid island, each according to his means and inclination, made offerings consisting not only of movables, but of immovables also. For all of them, viz. Skenourios' little properties and those that accrued to us from offerings, we procured a chrysobull¹⁵ from the then holder of the Romain scepter, the Lord Nikephoros [III] Botaneiates [(1078–81)], to confirm and establish our possession.

[A8.] So then for a little I thought we should have peace. But the land all round us was occupied. Next to those given us, and bordering on them, were properties belonging to the inhabitants of the island, and all this was a source of trouble for the brothers with me. They quarreled, differences arose with the neighbors, till the supervening distress for me was indistinguishable from the confusion of a city. Consequently I was in fear, and not, as the proverb has it “Where no fear was”;¹⁶ no indeed! With my brethren involved, from utter necessity, I may say crawling in the promiscuity and confusion, the ferment of worldly concerns, mingling with worldly men, engaged in barter and also, as is generally [p. 64] the case, in disputes, what if it should happen that one of them, besieged by the ambushes of the Evil One, should fall, alas!, a prey to his snares, and then his soul be required of my wretched self, a soul that the whole world, in Christ’s sacred words, is not worthy to purchase? (cf. Matt. 16:26)¹⁷

This was the fear, the terror that gripped my heart of hearts, that shattered my bones, that drained my marrow, that tore my sinews apart, that divided my flesh, while unceasingly I chanted within myself: “Flee,” poor wretch, “like a sparrow” (Ps. 10 [11]:2) to places wholly uninhabited and deserted, for it is out of the question, utterly out of the question for you to achieve peace and quiet until you find a place whence any inmixtion of worldly men is completely excluded, a tabernacle of peace for yourself and those with you, an habitation devoted to the utmost to the work of salvation.

[A9.] Being so minded, I discovered that the brothers’ choice in this matter was in harmony with mine. They had discussed it already and suggested an island to the east of the Icarian sea, far removed from the mainland and the prestigious islands (this little island is called Patmos), as being the uttermost wilderness, unknown to man, a place where life flows untroubled, whose harbor is inaccessible to regular shipping.¹⁸ In short, desire for this island completely took possession of me, a desire made more acute because here had dwelt the Apostle that Christ loved, [St. John] the virgin Evangelist. Here he had his famous vision, his all-blessed ecstasy and change, here his exalted and heavenly initiation into theology. Here the Gospel was dictated in the thunder of God’s voice. Taking all this into consideration, when I compare Patmos to Sinai, I set the former as far above the latter, and account it first, as I set grace above the shadow, truth above appearances, the spirit above the letter and the Gospel above the Law of the Tablets.

So, invoking the aid and influence of heaven, I addressed myself to our pious and God-governed monarch, pre-eminent among emperors, the lord Alexios [I Komnenos (1081–1118)]. I am introduced into his presence, he deigns to give me a kind reception. I have speech with his divine Majesty immediately. I acquaint him with what is in my mind, relate my aim, reveal my desire, plead fervently to be given the island of Patmos, beg to have it as an imperial gift, free of all obligations.

But the most powerful emperor, while on the one hand freely and royally extending to us his personal good will, yet begged our miserable self (all but inclining that crowned head to us!) not to persist in our aim, but to accept the government of a mountain called Kellia and Zagora¹⁹ (for it had been given to monks of old). Perhaps I would have yielded to the insistence of his imperial [p. 65] majesty, if I had not found the monks settled on this mountain far from what I hoped in their habits, little to my mind and nothing to my purpose, unsuited to the solitary life (I do not wish to sound tiresome!) for they were entirely lacking in exact instruction. When it became clear, even to the emperor, that these monks were completely unacceptable for my purpose, I again begged and beseeched his imperial majesty to accede to my wish concerning Patmos. This time, with the empress of blessed memory, the emperor's mother,²⁰ also interceding for me and urging this course, the most powerful emperor granted the request of our miserable self.

24. CHRISTODOULOS

Finally, to make a long story short, I renounced in favor of the fisc all my possessions received from Skenourios and others, on Kos and at Strobilos, retaining only the two estates on the island of Leros given me in full possession by this oft-mentioned Skenourios and by Kaballourios. In exchange I received by imperial chrysobull²¹ the whole island of Patmos, forfeited by the fisc for good, as well as the neighboring islets of Narkioi and Leipso, as also the two estates of Leros which I owned before, as already mentioned, viz. Parthenion and Temenion.

[A10.] The chrysobull for the lot turned out all I could wish for, all I had asked, completely satisfactory, to the effect that both such other properties as I had received and also Patmos itself, the whole island, were completely unburdened, exempt from all fiscal obligation, and from any servitude whatsoever, as the chrysobull itself sets forth more clearly and more expressly. [It laid down] further that no laymen with women and children might reside on Patmos, nor young men in their boyish prime, before their beard appears, nor eunuchs. For I strove, from the word "go," as they say, to remove any occasion of devilish abuse, to eliminate utterly all occasions of trouble, to cut away the roots of error.

That was, of course, why I implored the most powerful emperor to insert this desire of mine also into the chrysobull of gift. For sure inserted it was, though at first the emperor absolutely refused to agree to it, saying that it would prove a handicap to the monastery not to possess a few lay subjects, living on the island with women, under the yoke of matrimony, to carry out the agricultural and other heavier duties of the monastery. Indeed he was, in Zeno's words, "dipping into his mind,"²² as the turn of events made clear later, and [p. 66] the heart of the king, being in the hand of God (cf. Prov. 21:1), out of its abundance of piety, as the text puts it, prophesied better than I what was in the monastery's interest. But let us return to the point whence we digressed.

[A11.] Partly by exchange but, all in all, we may say by imperial gift, the matter went ahead. The chrysobull was finally written out, I took leave of the emperor and was dismissed after enjoying auspicious and truly imperial good treatment. I sailed for Kos, attended by one of our God-guarded emperor's men,²³ to whom I surrendered for the fisc all my real estate at Strobilos and on the island of Kos, receiving for myself the whole island of Patmos and the other property mentioned above.

The loneliness of the island made me leap for joy. I delighted in its tranquility, rejoiced that it was untrodden. Its remoteness and dreariness were to me a treasure of cheerfulness. But the brothers who had come with me, though they had shown every sign of eagerness at first, now, suddenly, like a spun coin, came down on the other side. They were uncomfortable, distressed, aggrieved. They remembered the charms of Kos and hated the narrow confines and harshness of Patmos. They blamed the step taken, found nothing to praise in the dispensation I had adopted; what had been done seemed foolish to them, risky, harmful, ruinous. It was clear that they thought (and behind our back they murmured) that we had given gold for copper. They shirked work on the building, evaded obeying my orders, factions appeared, doubts besieged them, they were in extreme distress and their minds full of trouble.

Finally they made their aim clear, dividing into two groups of opposite opinions, of which the first and largest proposed to leave us, and in fact did so, after first asking forgiveness for their slackness or rather pusillanimity, and receiving it from us immediately. The other group, smaller but sound, those to wit, who chose to endure with our unworthy self hardships and death, gave themselves up to the accomplishment of my purpose, one, I may say so before God, profitable to the soul. They set about restoring me, they stimulated me to the building waiting to be done, whetted my zeal, encouraged me. "We" they said "will serve you whatever happens. We will obey your God-pleasing instructions, we will die obeying your orders."

[A12.] Therefore I too, with renewed courage, possessed by love of Patmos for the sake of [St. John] the Theologian beloved of our Lord, along with the remaining brothers, who revered me, took it as the term of our long wandering, as our [p. 67] everlasting rest, at least as far as mortal life goes. We immediately began laying the foundations and building, faithful to our aim. We built round a wall, laboring with all our might at raising this wall to make it into a fort. Then it was I understood that my original purpose of having no married man live on the island, because of the women and children, was unrealizable, and I remembered the emperor, his truly imperial intelligence and prophetic forecast in this matter, and I recognized as inspired the infallibility of his conjectures, and I applied all too suitably to myself the proverbial saying of the ancients about afterthought: "After the event, even a simpleton knows the answer" and: "When he has been hurt the fisherman will learn sense."²⁴

[A13.] As a result, and not finding any unmarried laymen to work, at building to begin with and thereafter permanently at the heavy work of the monastery, I admitted perforce a few men with the wives they were tied to, to live, as you can see, on our island here of Patmos. Not, however, in uncontrolled confusion, not wherever they thought fit, but segregated in a separate part of the island, indeed just as they may now be seen to have settled. So that, if I am able to go, as I intend, before dying, and have audience of my most pious and sacred emperor, this matter will certainly be set right at my request, by an imperial concession. For I am confident the Emperor's most discerning mind will not despise this request either, but will resume his own earlier opinion, and that which was vetoed because of my mistaken insistence his most powerfulness will approve, and at last give it proper effect.

If, however, I pay the debt of nature before, I wish and direct that laymen with their women-folk and children be admitted to residence upon the island on no other terms than at present, under me. [Their settlement] shall be and remain right away from the monastery, in well-defined limits at one end of the island, viz. at the northern end,²⁵ from the promontory called Baios to the one called St. Nicholas at Eudelos, and as far as St. Marina. Outside this [limit], [there will be] no residence in wedlock; nor, assuredly, are their wives or children to go beyond the prescribed boundaries and into the island's interior. This I forbid absolutely, and bind [the monastic community] under pain of my curse, to keep this command of mine inviolate and unshaken so long as this world shall endure.²⁶

24. CHRISTODOULOS

As for the men of lay condition, they shall serve and remain available for the work of the monastery, in the monastery building or elsewhere, wherever the superior or the steward may order, for [p. 68] five whole days of each week. On Friday evening, taking a gift of food,²⁷ let them go to their homes. This was what they themselves, of their own choice, preferred and asked to do, so as to have two days to enjoy the bath, rest and home life, returning after Sunday to the monastery, at crack of dawn on Monday, to prosecute the tasks of the monastery according to the instructions then given them, with no sign of slacking or idling. As for my brothers, the monks that now are and will be in the future in my monastery, I command that none of them ever visit the houses of the laymen, except the steward, and he only on rare occasions when it shall be necessary in connection with pressing and unavoidable work to be done for the monastery; furthermore, he is to have two brothers to go with him.

[A14.] Such are my wishes and orders concerning the residence of laymen on the island. No light consideration has led me to accept in some measure and tolerate it; [no indeed,] but rather overwhelming necessity, as God knows to whom all secrets are known. Therefore I am taking precautions, instituting serviceable rules, and I conjure you vehemently to observe them, as they stand and unaltered.

But if any of the laymen should ever come to such a pitch of folly and recklessness as to dare to slight the boundaries set, and allow his own wife or daughter or, quite simply, any woman, whatever her relationship or connection with himself, to trespass deeper into the island, in breach of the above regulations, we order that he be expelled immediately from the island, and forcibly driven out with all that belong to him, however valuable he may be, even if you think it better to do without any other than without him for the monastery's work.

As for the monks, if at any time one of them should make light of the rule laid down, and go off without the steward, without an order of the superior, into the houses of the laity, that is to say where he is liable to meet a woman, he shall be subject to penance, dry bread and abstinence from wine for twenty days; if, that is to say, he has committed this fault once only and immediately shown bitter regret. But should one of the monks fall victim twice or even thrice (merely to say such a thing is unbearable!) to this terrible and pernicious sin of disobedience and contempt, the superior shall cut him off like gangrene or some pestilential disease from the monastery and its domain, that he may learn and know that it is neither pleasing to God nor sanctioned by divine law to "remove the ancient boundaries" (cf. Deut. 19:14) [i.e., the rules] "that our fathers fittingly laid down" (cf. Prov. 23:10), and also that the whole [p. 69] community of the brethren, through the loss of this "sinner who walked lawlessly" (II Thess. 3:6), may [learn to] heed all the rules assiduously and without transgression; for "Cast out" says he "a pestilent person from the council and strife shall go out with him" (Prov. 22:10).

After this introduction to our testament, viz. the chapter on laymen, with the injunctions to my very dear children and brothers, which they are to preserve and guard as the means to an untroubled mind and a life free from danger, I will now proceed to the rest of my dispositions for you in your condition as monks.

[A15.] Come now, listen to me intently, most dear and beloved children, hear and understand the things that are said. Among our good things, I will start with the one that most makes us what we are, the most comprehensive. What could this be other than our life together as a community, our spiritual unity and companionship? “What other way of life is brighter or more exalted or more full of grace for man?” to quote Basil the Great; absolutely none, if indeed this incomparable achievement is properly to be called human and not angelic. For certainly those true ascetics who observed cenobitic discipline rigorously, truly emulated the angels, presenting, in their virtues, their sharing of everything, their way of living, a perfect copy of the angelic condition. “Communion of life may be called perfect where private property is banished, whence conflict of wills is expelled, where everything is held in common, souls, wills, bodies and those things that nurture the body and procure its well-being; common the struggles, common the merchandise of hope, common the crowns, so that in several bodies a single soul is seen, and several bodies are revealed as the instruments of one soul.”²⁸ The life that is worthy to be praised according to the Ascetic Rules of Basil the Great is the one you and those who come after you will pursue living here.

[A16.] This my monastery of [St. John] the Evangelist and Theologian, with its present belongings and those that shall accrue to it and be acquired in addition, is most surely to be free and self-governing, subject to neither imperial nor ecclesiastical rights. It shall not, by any bias whatsoever, fall into the hands of any private or official person, not even in the form of ephoreia,²⁹ but shall remain independent eternally. No man in the world shall have power either to abolish and overthrow the aforesaid godly cenobitic rule of life in our monastery, or to attempt, for any cause or reason whatsoever, to enslave this monastery or any of its dependencies and set a debased stamp on its liberty; whoever, without any exception, should be led to make such an attempt, his fate shall be condemnation with Dathan and Abirom,³⁰ whoever he may be. So much for that. We will now address ourselves immediately to the remaining dispositions. [p. 70]

[A17.] Before all else it is assuredly fitting to speak of our true employment, that which has priority over all others, I mean the doxology of praise to God. For it is in view of this one thing that, from very “not being” (of this I am convinced) “we have been brought into being”³¹ and adorned with reason, in order to honor the Creator with uninterrupted hymn-singing. Besides everything else, the fact that the character and pursuit of the monastic life is called angelic leads to this conclusion. Hence it is that God’s creature, man, is shown to be, in the words of [Gregory] the Theologian, “the angels’ descant,” repeating what they do as closely as his nature will allow.³²

Then let this hymn be uninterrupted and unlimited. Whence our blessed and inspired fathers, having broken off every kind of human relationship and earthly care, clinging spiritually with all their might to their supreme desire, spent the whole “time of their exile” (I Pet. 1:17) in prayers and spiritual hymns, seeking, not carelessly but steadfastly, “the kingdom of heaven within them” (Luke 17:21) according to the Lord’s saying in the Gospels. Because of their constant prayer and their unwavering hope, they found it, having traded prudently and most profitably, and, like the merchant who is deemed happy, bought for all the visible world the pearl that may well be called precious (Matt. 13:46). They had heard and understood the holy psalmist David shouting “Let my mouth be filled with praise that I may hymn thy glory, and thy majesty all the day” (Ps. 70 [71]:8), and again “I will bless the Lord at all times, his praise shall be continually in my mouth” (Ps. 33 [34]:1), and the Apostle exhorting: “Pray without ceasing” (I Thess. 5:17), but also our Lord and

24. CHRISTODOULOS

Savior himself, on one occasion weaving into a parable the obligation to pray and not lose heart (Luke 18:1), on another giving an explicit order and saying: “Watch and pray, that ye enter not into temptation” (Matt. 26:41). [The fathers] obeyed eagerly and observed the [command] strictly.

They, as I have been saying, dedicated their whole life to the spirit. We, while acknowledging our own weakness, should never cease from self-reproach, nor yet should we neglect our duty of praying with all our might. We trust in the mercies of our benevolent God and Savior, Jesus Christ, he who, freely indeed and so freely, saves those whose hope he is, that we shall not be utterly cast out nor be deceived of our good hope, when we have true mediators and intercessors: the most holy Virgin Mother of God, who, transcending nature, bore him in the flesh, and the beloved disciple, the Evangelist and Theologian, the great John, I mean, the virgin and embosomed. For the source of wisdom and goodness is able to accept Paul’s planting as [p. 71] Paul’s, as well as Apollos’ watering and the widow’s two mites, the humility of the tax collector and Manasses’ confession.³³

I command, therefore, and dispose that the singing in church and the whole order of psalm-singing and prayers, to put it summarily, in this holy and venerable monastery of ours be conducted according to the typikon of the lavra at Jerusalem of our holy father Sabas,³⁴ the great desert teacher. On all feasts of the Lord, as also on the Sundays of Lent, for vigils and the long evening service the order of celebration shall be unalterably that set out in the typikon alluded to. On other Sundays you may relax it somewhat, and take things more easily in the matter of vigils. The superior’s discernment shall decide.

I direct you, therefore, to draw up a typikon or synaxarion for the church giving in detail the exact order of psalm-singing and prayers celebrated throughout the year by the said Hierosolymitai or Hagiosabitai, and, completed in the way we have indicated, it is to be used and adhered to by you, my prudent brothers and children. It is time now to consider the choosing and election of those who, after my death, will be your successive superiors and assume the dignity of the superiorship.

[A18.] It is my wish that the future superior be elected in accordance with the general consensus and common vote of the preeminent brothers, indeed of all the brotherhood of our holy monastery. Both in the history of the Life of our great father Pachomios³⁵ and in the Life of our holy and inspired father Euthymios³⁶ I found this preferred as right. Furthermore, that most memorable of emperors, Justinian, legislated in clear terms to this effect when considering this type of election in his Institutes.³⁷

Consequently all the brothers, taking with them the superior-elect, shall enter the church. After the priest has praised God the trisagion shall be sung by all, followed by the dismissal hymn and the final prayer. Only then shall the priest take the pastoral staff lying inside the holy screen, before the altar, put it in the hand of the superior-elect, and kiss him. Then the brothers, one after another, shall kiss him and, after this salutation, they shall take their superior (as he now is), seat him in the superior’s seat, intoning the “Worthy,” and file past, each one making the accustomed obeisance with reverence.

Henceforth he, having been elected to the authority of pastor and master—it would be better to say that he has taken the place of father and head to all the [p. 72] occupants of the monastery and all dependent on it—must, first of all undoubtedly, rule all the brothers here practicing the ascetic life, as one caring for and protecting his genuine sons³⁸ and his own limbs, taking thought and providing in the same way for the improvement of their reasonable souls and for the sustenance of their bodies, and, on the other hand, manage and plan all the monastery's affairs generally, both through the brothers appointed to each service, and of his own authority as he himself decides. For if, to quote the canons,³⁹ we entrust to him the precious souls of men, for not one of which is the whole world a worthy exchange (Matt. 16:26), what is the proper priority between human and material? As for those who are placed under his authority, from the first and most honored to the seeming last and meanest of disciples and servants, they shall preserve their willingness and ready obedience with all reverence and humility, never forgetting that body and head are organically one, adapted and joined in a mutual relationship.

[A19.] Then come to me, father and brother in the Lord, whoever you may be, as you assume this yoke of service and authority, for now to you, the superior, my words are addressed. “Gird up thy loins like a man” (Job 38:3) as it is written, and receive the words of my lips and the word of my command. If thou observest it thyself, Solomon the wise asserts, “thy ear shall hear wisdom, thou shalt apply thy heart to wisdom, and thou [in thy turn] shalt apply it to the admonition of thy son” (cf. Prov. 2:2). “For the commandment is a lamp and the teaching a light” (cf. Prov. 6: 23). Behold, I commit to you, in the presence of God and his chosen angels, all the brotherhood in Christ. Consider, then, how you are going to take them to you, adopt them, guide and keep them, cherishing and watching over them as your dearest limbs, with the full measure of love; rouse your soul eagerly, lead them in courage, in all good works, see that all is well ordered, defend them, lead them into the place of virtue, make them heirs to the land of impassibility, you yourself be a living pattern and model of good deeds for them, no “bad painter of virtue’s wonders” but rather (to borrow again [Gregory] the Theologian’s tongue) surpass those beneath you in virtue more than you surpass them in rank.⁴⁰

Never, my brother, prize anything more than the love of God, nor, I earnestly beg you, think anything whatsoever of more profit or more important than the salvation of the souls entrusted to you. Remember that he who is a good shepherd and not a hireling must face danger for the flock, and even, in the words of the Gospel, lay down his life for the safety of those under his care (cf. John 10:11–12). A potter, as the saying goes, does not learn his craft on a big jar.⁴¹ [p. 73] He who is not imbued with and fully conscious of this priority is in danger of finding addressed to himself the threat spoken in God’s name by the prophet to the bad shepherds: “Awake, my sword, against the shepherds, I will strike the shepherds, and I will make my hand felt by the shepherds, and I will require my sheep at their hands” (cf. Zach. 13:7). Why? “Because they do not strengthen that which is weak, they do not bind up that which is broken, they do not turn back those that stray, they do not look for the lost nor guard the sound” (cf. Ezech. 34:4, 10). This exhortation will suffice for the superior.

[A20.] However, since our nature is to some extent unreliable, and no animal is so quick to turn and changeable as man, I think it opportune to say just a little also about the superior who does not carry out his duties properly. If the superior should ever, in any way, set at nought any of these our dispositions in the present document, whether those above that we began with or those that we may add between here and the end, or if he should be seen corrupting the severity of the cenobitic way of life, perhaps out of his own fondness for pleasure, or if he should wish to misappropriate the monastery's revenues, and be convicted of stealing, I do not wish everyone immediately to stand up against him in a disorderly manner. The more preeminent brothers, those vested with authority, the steward, the ecclesiarch and the priests, may, with great mildness and suitable respect, draw his attention to his fault and point out the value of filial and brotherly love, in a generalized attempt to reform him; and this, not once but repeatedly, in a pleasant way with great gentleness. If he comes to himself and abstains from the forbidden activity, he shall be as before and remain superior, but if, even when they have exhorted him, both individually and in a body, he sticks obstinately to his evil ways and is completely incorrigible, I command that he be removed from his office without confusion or strife, and another elected and chosen in the manner prescribed.

24. CHRISTODOULOS

As executor of my decisions concerning the election of successive future superiors, I institute the all-seeing eye of Justice, and I command that the election of a superior as well as the removal of one who may be shown unsatisfactory (which God forbid!) or incorrigible, proceed in complete independence of human passion. Should any such thing occur, be assured of this: he who has betrayed integrity in these matters will not escape the dire threat of the just Judge in that day when that which is hidden shall be revealed, when "The inward thought of man" in the words of the godly David "shall sing praises to God, and the residues of his inward thought shall be reckoned as religious festivals for him" (Ps. 75 [76]:10). So much for this. [p. 74]

[A21.] Instructions must also be given for the election and promotion of the holders of offices. The superior shall choose among the whole brotherhood the one whose virtue, reputation and activity are outstanding, shall inform the preeminent members of the brotherhood, and appoint him steward of all possessions and property belonging to the monastery and around it. A trisagion is to be celebrated in the church in the presence of the brotherhood, and following it the appointment shall be made by the superior according to custom. As from then the steward shall carry out all his duties according to the will of the superior, without whose consent, knowledge and decision he is to do absolutely nothing.

In the same way the superior shall appoint as ecclesiarch a man distinguished for his piety, versed in all aspects of ecclesiastical order and discipline, and as conversant with it as possible. This ecclesiarch shall take charge of the books and in particular the title deeds of the monastery, and anything else belonging to the church, sign for them and take good care of them.

Two treasurers are also to be promoted in the manner described. The one will account in the greatest detail for expenditure from monies accruing to the community through the mercy of God and the inexhaustible sea of his bountiful and munificent goodness, whatever their origin. All entries whatsoever shall be signed for and delivered in presence of the superior, the steward, the ecclesiarch and, naturally, the treasurer himself. Sealed by them, the money will be entrusted to the keeping of the ecclesiarch, as keeper of valuables and things useful to the monastery. It is to be drawn on and given to the treasurer for day-to-day expenditure. The superior shall decide without any argument, how much is to be given [at a time]: a few nomismata, enough for a period of a month, perhaps, or a little more or less. Whenever the treasurer has exhausted that which was given before in expenditures for the monastery, ordered by the superior and accounted for in detail, the persons specified above shall check and reckon them up, and a certain sum shall be drawn again and given to [the treasurer] in the same way. This is the way in which entries of money and outlays shall continue to be handled.

ELEVENTH CENTURY

The other treasurer shall be in charge of textiles, both acquisitions and outlays, the brothers' clothes and coverings. In short he shall oversee all that pertains to the clothing of the monks in the monastery, and also that of the lay workers. In addition, all receipts of wax from whatever source, and particularly the oil. The ecclesiarch is to be supplied with both of these, [p. 75] on the order and directions of the superior, every four months enough oil and candles for the service of the church, after they have been processed under the supervision of the superior, as he shall judge proper, after which they shall be delivered to the ecclesiarch.

One more pious and capable man shall be promoted by the superior, to receive and look after all iron, that is, iron implements, as they come in or are bought. The food of the brotherhood and any other expense occurred for lay workers belong to his department.

A wine steward must likewise be designated; a man of temperance and reliability, to check in and out all wine entering the monastery. Also a cellarer, from among the most pious and experienced of the brotherhood, one particularly endowed with reasonableness, understanding and gentleness, a suitable person for this office. Two assistant cellarers and a cook are to be given him to be under his orders and assist him. Another of the brotherhood shall be promoted refectorian.

In short, all who, in absolute freedom, dead to their individual wills, in true and unadulterated faith, with genuine zeal and resolution, are unremittingly obedient, without hesitation or argument of any kind, to the orders of the superior, in the assurance that they are directly serving God and the angels whenever, in obedience to fatherly instructions, these work for the brothers. Nay, more, for something greater and more sublime. They are imitating, in so far as may be, Christ himself, our God, who said clearly in the Gospels: "I came not to be served but to serve" (Matt. 20:28), and did as he said, [so they] shall surely be heirs of his ineffable good things if they do their jobs honestly.

[A22.] No personal possession shall be allowed to any of the brothers except the necessary clothes and coverings. I call those necessary without which one cannot live. But our wealth, our "money," let it be, for every one of us, poverty, poverty that works all virtues, that gives consistency to our ascetic regimen, in order that without strife you may strive to outdo one another, fighting the good fight. But gold, silver and every material and earthly thing, the possession of them at any rate, loathe from the bottom of your heart.

Let none of you undertake any handiwork for gain, but if anyone practices calligraphy or any other pursuit, let each, with the knowledge of the superior and by his order, perform the work for which he is naturally suited; materials will be supplied by the monastery and the completed work returned to the monastery.

[A23.] It is not inappropriate to mention [p. 76] those too of our brothers who may come to aspire to the solitary life. For since much of the island is deserted, and it can show sites completely isolated and undisturbed, I think that this exalted way of life—hard to achieve for those still troubled by passions, not to say wholly unattainable—will yet challenge some.

24. CHRISTODOULOS

Therefore I command that if the superior see a [brother] who has already earned a solid good reputation in the cenobitic life and the exercise of submission, choosing, after this beginning, to wrestle with the solitary life and eager to strip for the fray, he should consent, and do not prevent his gaining a greater good. A father does not grudge his sons the spiritual ascent they feel a rational urge to pursue.

At the same time, he is not simply to consent without further ado, nor leave those who have chosen to be solitaries to live independently and follow their own judgment, as though they had now cast off the yoke of submission and freed their neck from the superior's leash. Never let this happen, not even once. Such a thing must not seem tolerable to any of those who after us shall rule our most holy fold, nor to their piously shepherded flock of Christ's reasonable sheep, my dear children in the Lord.

Let the aspiring solitary, whoever he may be, have as shepherd and supervisor the superior, preserving his subjection and his obedience wholly unshaken. He shall settle by himself, well away from the monastery, by a cliff, in a cave or cell, counseled by his superior, busied with hymns, prayers and inspired spiritual labors. Let the superior provide him with material for some handiwork [to ward off] akedia. The product, once finished as ordered, is to be turned in to the superior, in the same way as by the other brothers engaged in handiwork, as we have already prescribed.

[A24.] The solitary's diet, for five days of the week, is to be entirely uncooked and raw; he shall eat once a day, after the ninth hour, dry food and the necessary supplies will be given to him, at the superior's order, from the monastery. But for the Saturday liturgy he shall come to the monastery, eat with the brotherhood, take part with them in the office of lamplighting and the vigil, remaining for divine liturgy on Sunday, partaking of the holy mysteries of Christ if the superior permits (for without his permission neither the [solitary] nor any other of the brothers will be allowed to partake of the consecrated elements). Then, after again enjoying the common table of the brethren, on the evening of the same day, viz. Sunday, taking victuals for the coming week, or, rather, for the five [p. 77] week-days, and material for his handiwork, he shall return to his lair. He is to do this regularly, not speaking to anyone when he comes to the religious services except the superior alone, unless he in person directs the solitary to converse with another of the brothers.

If one of the Lord's feasts should fall on a weekday, with an all-night vigil to be held in the monastery, on these occasions too the solitary shall present himself and stay, exactly as on any Sunday.

When, however, he is in the solitude of his cell he shall neither open to nor converse with any who approach, unless he has first made sure they are sent by the superior. He shall never betake himself to that part [of the island] where we made clear at the beginning of these rules that the lay population are to live. He shall take no initiative, whether small or great, whether harmful or beneficial (to put it in a nutshell rather than itemize each point separately), without the will and approval of the superior.

Should any one of those who have embraced the solitary way of life be found doing otherwise, and should he fail to make suitable reparation but opinionatedly persist in his transgression, the superior may straightway bring him back, willy nilly, into the general body of the brotherhood, to remain thenceforth with all the others in the monastery, reduced to the rank of novice. If it appear that he does not submit to this, he shall be expelled irrevocably from both monastery and island, and cut off as a rotten limb from our undefiled flock.

ELEVENTH CENTURY

This severity is appropriate for those who aspire so high. No less can be required of such as determine to pursue with submission the solitary vocation in the Lord on this island of ours, or rather of the beloved of Christ, [St. John] the Theologian. The number of them, viz. of those who successively, in holes in the rocks and natural shelters or in the solitary cells of anchorites, shall follow the solitary way of life in the manner we have prescribed, shall not exceed twelve, even if there are others who would choose this way of life and are considered suitable. So much for them.

[A25.] I had wished to lay down here express rules for charity loved-of-God, and feeding the poor or hospitality, through which, to quote Scripture, “They entertained angels unawares” (Heb. 13:2), besides care for men shipwrecked or otherwise in straits, finding themselves, whether intentionally or through some accident, on this island and begging for help. For I am exceedingly concerned about all such, the truth is, in anguish. I am burned up. So far, however, the monastery has not enjoyed sufficient resources, and I did not think that I should lay down a rule on the quantities to be given. Nevertheless I exhort and enjoin in a brotherly fashion in Christ all those my spiritual fathers and brothers who will successively govern our [p. 78] monastery to give all possible thought to what I am saying, to provide for the poor and always attach great importance to caring for them, never neglecting the needy, but giving to them in proportion to the means of the monastery.

[A26.] The reception of those who come to the monastery from the world in order to renounce it and enter upon the ascetic life in accordance with the rules set out above, must be spoken of. Whenever a layman arrives asking to be admitted on the grounds that he wishes to enter the lists for Christ [and prove his mettle] in submission, first he must be carefully interrogated by the superior, and closely examined concerning his circumstances, lest he be come to the monastery not simply out of the love of God and desire to save his soul, but constrained by earthly contingencies, creditors, perhaps, or extreme poverty and disinclination to work, or numerous children, so that he is come to the monastery as to a refuge that will furnish escape and dispense from effort. If his initiative is recognized as having this kind of basis, if these are the cracked and rotten foundations he is laying for the laborious edifice of virtue, he must be allowed as much assistance as is possible, but, with benevolence, alms and the appropriate admonition, he must be sent away.

If, however, it appear that the new arrival be in truth come for the right reason and with an aim pleasing to God, let him be received in accordance with canon. Let him strip for the fray and prepare for the testing. The superior shall exhort him continually, introduce him to our way of life and confirm [his vocation]; this for not more than forty days. Then, in the presence of the brotherhood, he shall read aloud to him the seventeenth of the thirty chapters of the so-called Lesser Ascetics of Basil the Great, beginning: “He must also without doubt believe that he who has once joined a spiritual brotherhood may not divide or separate himself from those to whom he has been joined etc.,” to the end of the chapter.⁴² So shall he receive the introductory robe⁴³ and the black covering for his head.

Henceforth he shall wear the robe of renunciation, as the fathers have called it, and he shall be exercised in the works of submission until the time comes to tonsure him, as a prudent decision may deem advantageous, and in accordance with the full content of the fifth canon of the First-and-Second council [of Constantinople] gathered in the church of the Holy Apostles, which says clearly: “The holy council defines that none shall be deemed worthy of the monastic habit until a three-year period of trial has proved them and shown them worthy of so exalted a way of life. [p. 79] This ruling, it prescribes, must always be observed, unless a severe illness should make it necessary to abridge the period of trial, or in the case of a pious man who led a monastic life in the world. For this kind of man a six-month period will suffice for a complete testing.”⁴⁴ So much for those who come from the world. However it is probable that some will come from other monasteries; in their case too the legislation of the divine canons shall apply, as well as the rulings of Basil the Great in the relevant Ascetic Treatises.⁴⁵

24. CHRISTODOULOS

[A27.] But, O Savior Christ, enhypostatic Word of God; O thou who art without beginning equally with the Father, of one substance and one honor with the Spirit; O New Adam that hast put on all the Old Adam except sin, both remaining what thou art and become what he is in order to make him what thou art; preserving unmingled the identities of both natures even after the ineffable union; suffering impassibly for him who had suffered; dying in the flesh for mortal [Adam];⁴⁶ descending into Hell for the souls captive in Hell, and, by thy divine power, “breaking to pieces the brazen gates,” to quote the prophet, and “crushing the iron bars” (Ps. 106 [107]:16), destroying death and “trampling the Devil who has power over death” (Heb. 62:14), and through our clay raising us up anew in thy person, coexalting us and seating us with thyself on the throne of the Father, glorifying us with thyself to eternal life that is not subject to death, receive my pitiable poor prayer, through the intercession of the Virgin Mother of God, who supernaturally and ineffably bore thee, and that of thy beloved disciple, [St. John] the Theologian, do not leave without effect and void the instructions that I, in order to be pleasing to thee, have given to my brothers and children, do not let them fall by the wayside or on stony ground to be trampled underfoot, as the holy and all-sacred Gospel says. Let them not dry up and bear no fruit, but, O Lord and God!, let them be operative and effective, bearing manifold fruit to the sower.⁴⁷

[A28.] For my part, brothers and fathers, I have laid the foundation as the grace of God approved: here it is in this rule. As for you, let each of you look to himself and consider how he shall build. For “The work of each and its quality shall be revealed” (I Cor. 3:13), as has been said, and “Blessed is that servant whose master when he comes shall find him doing as he ordered” (Matt. 24:46). Hear, you, the superior, the words of the great theologian Gregory: “This is the rule of all spiritual government, always to disregard our own interest for the sake of the others.”⁴⁸ Then love your brotherhood, all those who are under your rule, strive for them as for your own children, [p. 80] cherish them as your very bowels, give to each the direction suited and appropriate to him, to the strong, the wretched, the sagacious, the ignorant, to the young, to the old. “Be urgent thyself” as the Apostle says “in season, out of season; reprove, rebuke, exhort” (II Tim. 4:2), reconcile, correct. Prescribe for each suitable treatment, neither for the sake of flattery and to gain a reputation for mildness, forbearing from correcting offenders, nor, out of odium or human pettiness, punishing indiscriminately.

You, on the other hand, my children and brothers, obey the commands of a father, be attentive to all the rest and also to decorum and orderly behavior; send idle talk and immoderate laughter to the Devil; detest inopportune meetings, factions, cliques, strife; do not, anyone, eat or drink in secret, or purloin in any manner anything belonging to the monastery; do not, any of you, receive a letter without the superior's knowledge, or send one clandestinely. Preserve union among yourselves, discretion, brotherly love and anything else these entail; speak peaceably. Towards your spiritual fathers in Christ, the superiors, preserve genuine and unfeigned love, trustworthiness and obedience. At least, if you wish to show yourselves above temptation and out of reach of the Enemy's arrows. May "The God of peace make you fit for all that is good" (Heb. 13:21), and may we be made worthy by his grace, flock and shepherds together, of eternal life, for his is all glory, honor and worship for ever. Amen +

ELEVENTH CENTURY

+ This present rule has been guaranteed by my autograph signature, May 8th, 14th indiction, in the year 6599 [= 1091 A.D.] +

+ I, the worthless and sinful monk, Christodoulos of Latros, in confirmation of this my rule, signed with my own hand +

Testament [B]

Private Testament of Saint Christodoulos [p. 81]

+ I, the monk Christodoulos of Latros, with my own hand signed my name at the beginning +

[B1.] Alas, how are we wretched men deceived, how vainly do we labor; we despise the things of heaven while exerting ourselves for the earthly . . . for the mystery of the . . . and the violent separation of body and soul . . . in the words of the prophet: "O Lord, have mercy on me . . . lest he snatch my soul, like a lion, and there be none to save or deliver me," because "there is no man shall live and not see death" (cf. Ps. 7:2; Ps. 88 [89]:48).

[B2.] Considering this, I too, the humble monk Christodoulos of Latros, sick in body and bedridden, but with my mind emphatically unimpaired and sound (for, by the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ, I enjoy robust health as far as that goes) yet in fear of the doubtful and inexorable hour of death, lest, as many . . . it come upon me and tear me away from everything here on a day and at an hour I do not foresee, by the present deed, written and signed, dispose of everything that has come to me by imperial gift as follows—in fact the two islands whole and entire, viz. Patmos and Leipso, with the two estates on the island of Leros, Parthenion and Temenion, which likewise are mine in full possession by virtue of a sacred and worshipful chrysobull⁴⁹ of donation [granted] by our most powerful and sacred emperor, the Lord Alexios Komnenos, with all tax exemptions of whatever description, [exemptions] maintained through the protection of his sacred Majesty, as the same sacred chrysobull sets forth more clearly.

24. CHRISTODOULOS

[B3.] On these islands, as I approached—at the time the worshipful chrysobull was delivered to me—wishing to build the church in the name of the all-praiseworthy beloved apostle, the virgin evangelist, John the Divine, [the church, I mean,] on Patmos, and to consecrate to him a monastery of pious men . . . and the monks and brothers under me. But first I began work on a fort, and raised it, too, as high as I was able, but sailed away leaving it unfinished, because of the raids of the godless Turks on these islands . . . abandoned . . . all there were on these islands . . . the small animals and other goods of which . . . the aforesaid monastery. It is my wish and my will, concerning all these that are left [p. 82] me, with the aforesaid islands, to leave the Jerusalem monk Arsenios Skenourios in my place as master and wielder of authority in the modest monastery of the venerable and beloved [St. John the] Theologian on the island of Patmos, with all its belongings, as listed in the sacred and worshipful chrysobull⁵⁰ of our most powerful and sacred emperor.

[B4.] Likewise I also leave to the same monastery the four boats. Item one koutroubin contracted out to John Pankas with . . . two hundred . . . chiata nomismata. Item one twin-masted platidion, contracted to Basil Euripotes [son] of Moroioannes,⁵¹ at present away . . . forty-two hyperpera nomismata. Item one small platidion, sent by my pious brethren to Crete from Patmos on the monastery's business . . . of Euripos with . . . of the four boats with [all] the animals . . . the horses and the rest as well as the . . . the ones we have now acquired with the protection of our most powerful and sacred emperor, viz. those on the island of Patmos and those on the two estates of Parthenion and Temenion, and those on Leros and Leipso.

[B5.] If the aforementioned monk, lord Arsenios Skenourios, comes to this same monastery, he is to have all authority and [right of] dominion over it and all its possessions, as specified above, in accordance with the tenor of the sacred and worshipful chrysobull delivered to me. But if he will not accept this office of superior, or if (as I have heard) he is gone to the Lord, I leave it to my spiritual son, the chartoularios and patriarchal notary lord Theodosios, nephew of the late lord Basil the kastrisios, to come to the said holy monastery, be tonsured there and assume the direction of all the brothers. He shall not have leave to introduce any of his relatives into the said monastery. If, as we said before, lord Arsenios comes and is ready and willing, let him direct it . . . so be it until his death. Second [to him] in the monastery is to be the aforementioned lord Theodosios, after he has been tonsured.

But if, as we said before, the monk Arsenios does not come, let our spiritual brother Theodosios have complete rule over the monastery, receiving from me full and unconditional authority, as I, the said monk Christodoulos, received it from our most powerful and sacred emperor, with this one proviso, that he is not to introduce any of his relatives into the monastery. In everything else [p. 83] he has full authority, within strict monastic observance, taking to himself a rigorous and discreet monk, whoever he chooses and God may send, to instruct him in the spiritual life.

He is not to meet with any opposition, either from the monks or from this instructor we spoke of, but have all the authority and [right of] dominion and inalienable ownership of a master who cannot be removed. He shall sing and pray for our most powerful and sacred emperor, commemorate the whole world and my own unworthiness.

ELEVENTH CENTURY

[B6.] These are the monks left in the monastery: Neophytos, monk; John, monk; Sabbas, monk; Iakobos, monk; Niketas, monk and . . . Ioannikios, monk; Kastellites John; the priest George of Leros, and any children I reared from infancy.⁵² If they are steady and work well in said monastery let them be brothers. But as for the monks Luke, Kyrillos and Zoilos, who rebelled and left me, if they want to come and submit to him I have, with the protection of our most powerful and sacred emperor, endowed with my power, let him receive them and give each his proper place, without its being allowed them, viz. Zoilos, Kyrillos and Luke, or any other monks of this same monastery, to withstand our said charistikarios,⁵³ Theodosios the nephew of the kastrisios, whatever he may do or purpose; he shall meet with no obstruction from any person whatsoever, himself observing, as we said before, this one proviso concerning his relations, that he shall not harm his soul for their sake. But for all the rest he shall dispose of everything in the monastery without hindrance, increasing its value by building as much as he is able, with the same full power and authority, throughout his life, as the authority I held in the said monastery, thanks to the protection of our most powerful and sacred emperor.

[B7.] Besides all the other things, the monastery is to have all my books too, as the inventory lists them, signed by me with my own hand, which inventory of sacred books I gave to my said spiritual son, lord Theodosios, in order that none of them should go missing.

[B8.] My three nephews, Theophanes, the monk and assistant steward of the Stoudios [monastery], Epiphanius and John, I exclude utterly from my fold. None of them has any power ever, at any time, to go to law or plead against my charistikarios or the interests of the monastery.

[B9.] To the monk Theodoretos, when death shall come, I leave nine chiata nomismata which he shall receive from my monastery for my soul's salvation, and he shall go where he will.

[B10.] The following holy and sacred icons which I have at [p. 84] Euripos:

Christ, the Mother of God and the Incorporeal [Archangel Michael], painting on wood, on a board

The Crucifixion with the [Saint John] the Theologian

A diptych with the feasts of our Lord

I leave [these] as well to the monastery.

Accounts are to be submitted to the charistikarios and the monks on the above-mentioned boats whenever voyages are made by those who have them on contract.

Another icon: the Mother of God painted on wood; I leave it too to the same monastery.

[B11.] As for my nephews mentioned above, I leave them only my blessing.

24. CHRISTODOULOS

[B12.] Most of the monks, after the attack of the infidels, became wanderers and scattered in different places for fear of them. Those who return to the said monastery in submission to the charistikarios Theodosios the nephew of the kastrisios, in genuine love and good faith, let him receive them.

[B13.] This too I order the said charistikarios to observe: he has no power to transfer this monastery to any [other] monastery; its independence is to be preserved and it is to be self-governing to the end of the world, in conformity with the contents of the divine and worshipful chrysobull.

[B14.] Whoever shall dare to invalidate the rules I have laid down, or oppose this my Private Testament or this monastery or my aforesaid charistikarios, whoever he may be, on him be the curse of the Lord God Creator of all things. Let him be estranged from the blameless faith of Christians, heir to the curse of the three hundred and eighteen holy and inspired fathers as well as that of my sinful self; let his portion be reckoned with those who shouted “Away with him, away with him, crucify the Son of God” (John 19:15).

To this end I set out this my Private Testament, written at my bidding by the hand of George, priest and notary of Euripos,⁵⁴ formerly of Strobilos, on Thursday 10th of March at the 9th hour, in the first indiction, in the year 6601 [= 1093 A.D.], having invited witnesses to sign and seal it.

[B15.] I prescribe this too, that . . . the notary and priest George, my spiritual son, the Strobilite, enter this same monastery with his two sons, to embrace the solitary life and to practice submission with the rest of the brotherhood, to be tonsured, he too, in order that the aforesaid charistikarioi—whichever of the two it happens to be—may have him. Provision shall be made for him in this monastery, with his two children, and without any difficulties being made, and they are to be warmly attached to him, as I have been.

+ I, Christodoulos of Latros, the least worthy of monks, having dictated this my Private Testament and read it, and [p. 85] being satisfied with it in all particulars, signed at the beginning and end, and requested the witnesses I had summoned to sign and affix their seal +

+ I, Leo, priest and sakellarios of the city of Euripos . . . witness to the present Private Testament of the most venerable monk Christodoulos, at his request, as appears from the text, signed and sealed as witness +

+ I, John, priest and notary of the see of Euripos, witness to the present Private Testament of the venerable monk lord Christodoulos, at his request, as the text shows, signed and sealed as witness +

+ I, Photios, unworthy deacon and protekdikos . . . witness to the present Private Testament of the most venerable monk, the lord Christodoulos, at his request as the text shows, signed and sealed +

ELEVENTH CENTURY

+ . . . priest . . . of the see of Euripos, witness to the Private Testament of the most venerable monk, lord Christodoulos, at his request as the text shows, signed and sealed as witness +

+ I, Michael . . . of the see of Euripos, witness to the present Private Testament of the most venerable monk lord Christodoulos, at his request as the text shows, signed and sealed as witness +

+ I, Basil, unworthy deacon . . . and notary of Euripos, the Strobilite, witness to the present Private Testament of the most reverend monk lord Christodoulos, at his request as the text shows, signed and set my seal +

+ . . . of the see of Euripos, witness to the present Private Testament of the most venerable monk lord Christodoulos, at his request signed and set my seal +

Codicil [C]

Codicil of the same holy father

+ I, the monk Christodoulos of Latros, with my own hand signed my name at the beginning +

[C1.] + I, Christodoulos of Latros, humblest of monks, by the present Codicil [p. 86] complete my Private Testament made earlier, being, through the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ, sound and firm in mind . . . prescribe further that my charistikarios, lord Theodosios [nephew] of [Basil] the kastrios, my spiritual son, is empowered to direct . . . the monks . . . and direct, in his [Skenourios'] place, all the monastery's concerns. The aforesaid is to be . . . and . . . and trustworthy. Above all have the fear of God . . . without fraud . . . from him.

[C2.] I am now leaving the monk Neophytos as treasurer of our monastery, to manage and control all the belongings of the monks under me; he is to show all submission to my charistikarios, lord Theodosios. The one I said should manage . . . But if he cannot do so while preserving his own tranquility and that of the brothers, if after he has been rebuked two or three times (as laid down in the rule), he stops causing offense and recognizes the authority of the charistikarios, confessing his fault, well and good; if not, he shall be expelled, and his place taken by someone who will manage everything . . . justly and piously . . . for the tranquility of the monks, since I have made this charistikarios lord of my monastery and of everything dependent on it, not answerable to anyone, just as I ruled in my lifetime, thanks to our most powerful and sacred emperor; accordingly the superior shall not have power to do or perform anything at all of the works relating to the said monastery without the knowledge and consent of the charistikarios, but shall manage everything as the latter wishes.

24. CHRISTODOULOS

[C3.] I command that the prayers of the monks be acquitted as strict monastic discipline requires, and in accordance with the prosperity and the possibilities of the said monastery.

[C4.] No layman may sit at the monks' table, save at Easter, Pentecost, the twelve days [of Christmas], Holy Apostles and the Sunday of Cheesefare. The servants working for the monastery⁵⁵ may not sit at table or drink wine till they get a beard; if it is scant, the decision is to rest with the charistikarios and the monks responsible for propriety. The monks owe complete submission to the superior entrusted with the administration, as he, in turn, owes submission to the charistikarios.

[C5.] You, Epiphanius, my child, the scribe, endeavor to perfect your own philosophy and do not hesitate to embark on eternal philosophy (viz. asceticism) but train your uncle in it also. But the deeds of the monastery, Epiphanius, in [the name] of God and as you wish for my blessing, let there be no concealing of a chrysobull or of any other deed, nor of the books you have with you. Give them all up, [p. 87] complete and sound, to the charistikarios I am leaving in my place as master of the monastery and of all in it, my spiritual son, lord Theodosios the nephew of the kastrisios, unless you want to answer for them in the coming Judgment and retribution. For he will be coming to Constantinople for them and to bid farewell to his brothers and relatives. For all the other possessions of the monastery have been made over to him, as is my wish.⁵⁶ For he gave me his promise to be tonsured as soon as he arrived there, and to appeal over the following matter to our sacred and most powerful emperor: about the monastery on Kos, where I worked myself to the bone, and its possessions. Make haste therefore, to remind lord Andronikos, the chaplain of our sacred empress, for he carries letters with him to our sacred emperor and to the empress. If you wish to have my blessing spare no pains to succeed, and do not neglect my orders and exhortations.

[C6.] Besides all the rest, I have left the monastery all the books which the most holy ecumenical patriarch, lord Nicholas (as God lives I am not lying!), gave me. If ever any attempt be made, whether by my own monastery of Stylos or by any other, to get any share of the books from Latros given me by the most holy patriarch, let him not be heard, and let him draw upon himself the curse of the three hundred and eighteen holy fathers,⁵⁷ as well as that of my sinful self. For after meeting with opposition two or three times, I persuaded the bishop to give back three-quarters of the books to Latros, and they were handed over to Hagia Sophia, which was entrusted with looking after the interests of the monastery of Latros. The fourth quarter, composed of unornamented books, was given to me by order of the most holy patriarch, and a semeioma and a memorandum of the synod⁵⁸ in session in the great sekretion deal with these books.

[C7.] For after Melanoudion⁵⁹ was taken and the vestry of Latros profaned, like those of the other monasteries, by the godless Turks, I sent a boat with soldiers [to] fetch the steward in whose charge they were, and bring him to Kos with the books, and after that I transferred them into the city [of Constantinople]. If I had not done this they would have been totally lost. Most of the said books I acquired through my own labors and at my own expense. That is why (the truth is my witness!) I have disposed of these books too here, in my Codicil.⁶⁰

ELEVENTH CENTURY

[C8.] On lord Theophanes, that monk who is so dear to me, and on the priest John, I bestow my blessing, an inexhaustible spiritual treasure.

[C9.] I gave the monk Luke the [p. 88] Cappadocian a promissory note, to recover on one of my boats, whichever should come in first, the 50 nomismata he claimed; but [then] I myself gave him one litra of good chiata nomismata . . . I paid [him] but I did not get my promissory note back. If he should ever try to claim these same nomismata from my boats or from my charistikarios, his claim must not be received, and the promissory note I gave him is to be [considered] null and without effect.

[C10.] Let a typikon be drawn up for St. Sabas' psalmody, and the monks are to observe the order of his service.

[C11.] The following matter too I forgot to settle in my Private Testament of earlier date:

Inasmuch as the lamented emperor of eternal memory, Nikephoros [III] Botaneiates, gave me by his honored chrysobull⁶¹ the place on Kos called Pelion and Ta Kastrianou as well as the estate of Peripatou, where of old stands the church of the most holy Mother of God, and I built⁶² a fort there, and founded a monastery of pious men, and consecrated to that monastery the two estates of the vestarches Kaballourios that had come into my possession, Anabasidion and Kardiasmenoi, and other estates that had come into my possession through gifts of the Christ-loving to this monastery, and from gifts and purchases in its vicinity. Inasmuch as our most powerful and sacred emperor, Lord Alexios Komnenos, in exchange for the monastery on Kos, gave me the island of Patmos, receiving in exchange the aforesaid monastery of the most holy Mother of God on Kos with its estates. For I expected to succeed in founding a monastery on the said island of Patmos, but because this same island of Patmos is uninhabited, raided by Agarenes, pirates and Turks, all after prisoners, the monks I had there fled in fear, refusing to live on Patmos, and left me alone.

For this reason, I appeal to the compassionate and serene might of his God-promoted and sacred majesty, in the hopes that, as if guided by God, his sacred majesty will, in his turn, give me my aforesaid monastery, known as God's most holy Mother on Kos, Kastrianou and Pelion, as well as the aforesaid estates belonging to it, the vestarches' two and the other in the vicinity of the monastery that belong to me in virtue of the donations of Limnites and Chardamion and the remainder near to the monastery, with the field called Kommation and the land I hold by purchase from Bergotos, as well as that at Peripatou, exempted from taxation by his sacred majesty, as they were by the aforementioned emperor, Lord Nikephoros Botaneiates, [p. 89] in order that the monks may find respite and live without fear, enjoying the favor of his sacred majesty and of all his relatives and that of our sacred empress till the end of the world, just as I, the humble and sinful monk, had my prayer granted by his sacred majesty.

In that monastery I have expended much labor and no slight efforts, in building the fort and transporting the stones inside it, and paid out great sums for expenses, but because on Kos the monks own Lachanitzin they take seed over from Patmos, because it should be a cattle byre,⁶³ and the monks of Kos live off it, both those on Kos and the monks from among them settled in the hermitage of Petra, which is towards Patmos, and is, as we said before, under the joint rule of Kos and Patmos, singing and praying for his sacred majesty, so as to receive from God their reward a hundredfold and eternal life.

24. CHRISTODOULOS

But if in any way God should concede, because of my sins, that they should create an obstacle, and arrest the mercy of his sacred majesty, so that he disregard my humble and pitiful self. . . obtained salvation for his soul, and not [consent] to return said monastery of my brotherhood of monks, the most holy Mother of God at Pelion on Kos, for which I struggled and worked myself to death, let him render account to the most holy Mother of God and [St. John] the beloved Theologian and to me the sinner in the fearful day of retribution.

[C12.] As for my humble remains, the monks my fellow-laborers may lay them in the monastery, wherever God may prosper it to be.⁶⁴

With this aim, I make good in the present Codicil the omissions of my earlier Private Testament as [already] stated. It was written at my request by the hand of George, of Strobilos, priest and notary of Euripos, on Tuesday 15th March at the 7th hour, in the 1st indiction, in the year 6601 [= 1093 A.D.], and I requested witnesses to sign and seal +

+ I, Christodoulos of Latros, unworthy monk, with my own hand signed at the beginning and end +

+ I, Nicholas Pappadopoulos, priest, present [at the dictation of] the present Codicil of the monk lord Christodoulos, at his invitation, signed and sealed as witness +

+ I, John . . . present [at the dictation of] the present Codicil [p. 90] of the monk lord Christodoulos, at his request signed and sealed as witness +

+ I, Theophanes, priest, [son] of Theodosios, present [at the dictation of] the present Codicil of the monk lord Christodoulos, at his request to witness it, signed and sealed +

+ I, Michael Phaphoulakes, priest, present [at the dictation] of the present Codicil of the monk lord Christodoulos, and invited by him to witness it, signed and sealed +

+ I, George, unworthy priest and notary of Euripos, the amanuensis, was also invited by the monk lord Christodoulos to sign and seal, as having written out the whole text +

Notes on the Translation

Editors' note: The assistance of our translator, Patricia Karlin-Hayter [PKH], is gratefully acknowledged for the notes to this document.

1. Gregory Nazianzen, Oratio 2.47, PG 35, col. 456A.
2. Christodoulos was born in Bithynia; his baptismal name was John: see John of Rhodes, Bios kai politeia, chap. 3, ed. Sakkélion in Boines, Akolouthia, pp. 111–13; according to Kazhdan, "Christodoulos," p. 440, he was born in the first half of the eleventh century.

ELEVENTH CENTURY

3. In a monastery on Mount Olympus near Bursa; see John of Rhodes, Bios kai politeia, chap. 5, ed. Sakkélion, in Boines, Akolouthia, pp. 115–16.
4. I could not find one English verb that expressed simultaneously the rattling or drumming of hail and the “meaningless” speech of the Saracens or Turks. [PKH]
5. For this foundation, see (7) Latros, Institutional History.
6. That is, as groups of kelliotic monks.
7. Cf. Ps.-Basil, Constitutiones asceticae 34, PG 31, cols. 1424D, 1425A.
8. Jer. 29:6; Ps. 7:13–14; Deut. 32:42; Deut. 32:22.
9. The archaism “Persians,” which had long been used for the Arabs, was at this date also used for the Turks. Whether Christodoulos made the distinction is unclear. [PKH]
10. Cosmas I (1075–81).
11. See Christodoulos’ appointment of his successors at Stylos in MM 6.16–17 (1079) and Patriarch Nicholas III Grammatikos’ acceptance of his resignation as superior of that monastery in MM 6.30–32 (1087); there is reference to the dignity of protos. [PKH]
12. For this individual, see the biographical details in Dölger, Regesten, no. 1046, ed. Vranoussis and Nystazopoulou-Pelekidou, Engrapha, no. 3, pp. 23–30, and MM 6.21–23.
13. This is a pun: Patmos / potmos (fate). [PKH]
14. aretēs ergasterion.
15. Not extant, but cf. the confirmation by Alexios Komnenos, Dölger, Regesten, no. 1123, ed. Vranoussis and Nystazopoulou-Pelekidou, Engrapha, no. 4, pp. 40–54, and MM 6.23–25.
16. Plato, Symposium 198a.
17. Christodoulos’ interpretation gives the words a twist not present in the original; cf. Ps.-Basil, Constitutiones asceticae 21, PG 31, col. 1397B: “Let him who is appointed superior consider for how many souls’ loss he is become answerable, when he cannot adequately render account for his own.” [PKH]
18. hemera ploia–hemeros: “Tame . . . civilized . . . gentle . . .” (LSJ). Christodoulos’ meaning is clear: one advantage of Patmos is that regular shipping does not call there, but I have failed to find any example of the use of this word in any such sense, or indeed used with “ship” in any sense. A misreading seems possible. [PKH]
19. Kellia and Zagora: a monastic colony on Mount Pelion in eastern Thessaly; see Vranoussis, Hagiologika keimena, pp. 132–39.
20. Anna Dalassena, who earlier addressed MM 6.32–33 (1087) to Christodoulos.
21. The fisc as landowner lost Patmos, which was taken from it and transferred to Christodoulos. The chrysobull, Dölger, Regesten, no. 1147, ed. Vranoussis and Nystazopoulou-Pelekidou, Engrapha, no. 6, pp. 55–67, and MM 6.44–49 (1088) states that Christodoulos has “surrendered to the fisc all that he had previously acquired on Kos, whatever the source . . . and received in exchange the said island (of Patmos) by an irrevocable donation . . . [Patmos] is detached from the property of the crown and . . . consecrated to God alone and the monks settled on it.” Note the use of basilika dikaia and demosia as equivalent. As well as the land itself, the fisc lost the taxes; see [11] below. [PKH]
22. Zeno of Citium, (in) Plutarch, Vita Phoc. c. 5, ed. I. von Arnim, Stoicorum Veterum Fragmenta, vol. 1 (Stuttgart, 1964), p. 68; cf. Suda, ed. Ada Adler, vol. 1 (Leipzig, 1929–38), p. 358, “Aristoteles.” [PKH]
23. Perhaps Nicholas Tzanzes, author of a praktikon, ed. MM 6.55–57 (1088), transferring Patmos to Christodoulos.
24. Iliad 17, 32; Suda, ed. Adler, vol. 1, p. 112 and Corpus paroemiographorum graecorum, ed. E. Leutsch and F. G. Schneidewin, vol. 1 (Hildesheim, 1965), p. 35. [PKH]
25. Patmos is very narrow at its midpoint, dividing the island into two distinct northern and southern sections.
26. The peasants were in fact resettled in a less exposed spot, nearer the monastery, possibly during Christodoulos’ lifetime when he himself fled to Euboea, but at any rate before the death of Alexios Komnenos in 1118; the new situation is implicit in the terms of the Parainesis, ed. MM 6.144–49, at

24. CHRISTODOULOS

- 147, a set of instructions for a superior other than Christodoulos but who was contemporary with Alexios Komnenos. On the date and the identity of the superior, see Karlin-Hayter, “Archives de Patmos,” p. 200, n. 18; at a still later date they were able to take refuge in the monastery itself. [PKH]
27. eulogia: “blessing,” or more specifically, “gift of food,” Lampe, PGL, s.v. eulogia, F 2. [PKH]
28. This chapter is much indebted to Ps.-Basil, Constitutiones asceticae 34, PG 31, cols. 1424–28; the passage in quotation marks comes almost verbatim from chap. 18, col. 1381C. [PKH]
29. In the thirteenth century, however, Patmos, like the Lavra monastery on Mount Athos in the eleventh century, came under the guardianship of the powerful Epi tou kanikleiou, with similar advantageous results; see Nystazopoulou, “Ephoreia,” 93–94.
30. Dathan and Abirom rose against Moses and were swallowed up by the earth together with their families; cf. Num. 16:1–32; Ps. 105 [106]:17–18.
31. Cf. Liturgy of John Chrysostom, ed. F. E. Brightman (Oxford, 1896), pp. 369, lines 27–29, 384, lines 27–28.
32. Cf. Ps.-Basil, Constitutiones asceticae, PG 31, col. 1384B, and Gregory Nazianzen, Carmina, I, PG 37, col. 513A.
33. I Cor. 3:6; Mark 12:42; Luke 19:1 ff.; II Chr. 33:12–13.
34. The liturgical typikon of Sabas of Jerusalem, ed. Dmitrievsky, Opisanie, vol. 3, pp. 20–64.
35. Sancti Pachonii Vita Prima 74, ed. F. Halkin (Brussels, 1932).
36. Cyril of Skythopolis, Vita Euthymii, chap. 39, ed. Ed. Schwartz, Kyrrillos von Skythopolis (Leipzig, 1939), p. 58.
37. Codex Justinianus 1.3.46 (530), ed. P. Krüger, Corpus juris civilis, vol. 2, 10th ed. (Berlin, 1929); cf. NJ 5.9 (535), 123.34 (546).
38. Cf. Ps.-Basil, Constitutiones asceticae 28, PG 31, col. 1417C.
39. C. Const. I et II, c. 3 (R&P 2.658); Matt. 16:26, Mark 8:36.
40. Gregory Nazianzen, Oratio 2.14, PG 35, col. 424A.
41. Plato, Gorgias 514e.
42. Ps.-Basil, Constitutiones asceticae 21, PG 31, col. 1393D.
43. eisagogikon esthema.
44. C. Const. I et II, c. 5 (R&P 2.662–67).
45. Contrary to a belief prevalent in monastic circles, Basil did not prescribe a specific length of time for the novitiate. See Theodore Balsamon, Epistola de rasophoris, PG 138, cols. 1359B–1382A.
46. Cf. Gregory Nazianzen, Oratio 39.11–13, PG 36, col. 348A, 349B; Oratio 30.5, PG 36, col. 108D.
47. Matt. 13:5, Mark 4:4, Luke 8:5–6: Christodoulos has distinctive elements from all three sources. [PKH]
48. Gregory Nazianzen, Oratio 2.54, PG 36, col. 464C.
49. Dölger, Regesten, no. 1139, ed. Vranoussis and Nystazopoulou-Pelekidou, Engrapha, no. 5, pp. 40–54, and MM 6.25–28.
50. Dölger, Regesten, no. 1147, ed. Vranoussis and Nystazopoulou-Pelekidou, Engrapha, no. 6, pp. 55–67, and MM 6.44–49.
51. Ed. reads: Monoioannes; corr. D. Sophianes, quoted by Vranoussis, Hagiologika keimena, p. 122, n. 3.
52. See [C4] below.
53. Christodoulos is not using the term technically, but as an equivalent for ephoros; see H. Ahrweiler, “Charisticariat et autres formes d’attribution de fondations pieuses aux X^e–XI^e siècles,” ZRVI 10 (1967), pp. 3 and 5, n. 31. [PKH]
54. The ancient Chalkis.
55. Presumably the “children I reared from infancy” mentioned in [B6] above, who are to join the brotherhood if they work well. [PKH]
56. Christodoulos’ assertion is premature; see MM 6.90–94 (1094), in which Theodosios, the nephew of the kastrisios, rejects his bequest. For the fact that kastrisios was not the surname of Theodosios but the title of his uncle Basil, see ibid., pp. 91 and 93.

ELEVENTH CENTURY

57. The text has 418.
58. The permanent synod, including presumably the bishop of Carian Herakleia, in whose see Latros stood. [PKH]
59. For Melanoudion, see Janin, Géographie, vol. 2, pp. 217, 220, 223.
60. According to H. Omont, "Note sur un ms. grec du mont Latros," REG 1 (1888), p. 337, there is a marginal note in Paris graecus 98, a manuscript of the Greek works attributed to Ephraem Syrus, which reads: "This sacred and improving book was copied in the monastery of the most holy Mother of God of Stylos or St. Paul of Latros, by the hand of Michael in the year 6558 [= 1049 A.D.], November, second indiction. . . . Some time later St. Christodoulos moved to Patmos because of the onslaught of the godless Ismaelites, taking with him all the books he could, and other objects . . ." [PKH]
61. Not extant, but cf. the confirmation by Alexios Komnenos, Dölger, Regesten, no. 1123, ed. Vranoussis, Engrapha, no. 4, pp. 40–54, and MM 6.23–25.
62. Grammatically, it is Nikephoros III Botaneiates who built the fort and founded the monastery; in fact it is Christodoulos who was responsible, as the balance of this chapter makes clear. These last few pages are rambling and incoherent, but the repetitions help in getting at the meaning. The point of the Codicil seems to be the recovery of the properties on Kos that had been given up in exchange for Patmos. [PKH]
63. zeugolation: cultivated land, ranging from a field to a small estate. [PKH] For a zeugolation/ zeugelateion with its vineyard, garden, and other holdings, see (39) Lips [44].
64. That is, either on Patmos or Kos.

Document Notes

1. Rule [A]

- [A1] Justification for the autobiographical excursus. Cf. the approach taken in (19) Attaleiates [1], [2].
- [A2] Christodoulos' monastic vocation. See also John of Rhodes, Bios kai politeia, chap. 5, ed. Sakkélion in Boines, Akolouthia, pp. 115–16.
- [A3] Pilgrimage to Palestine; flight to Latros. See also John of Rhodes, Bios kai politeia, chaps. 6–7, ed. Sakkélion, Boines, Akolouthia, pp. 116–18.
- [A4] Description of the monastic life at Latros. See also Bios kai politeia, chaps. 8–9, ed. Sakkélion, pp. 118–21.
- [A5] Justification for Christodoulos' abandonment of Latros. See also the documentary evidence in MM 6.17–19, 30–32 (1087).
- [A6] Arrival at Strobilos; inspection of properties on Kos. See also Bios kai politeia, chap. 10, ed. Sakkélion, Boines, Akolouthia, pp. 121–22.
- [A7] Construction of a monastery at Pelion on Kos.
- [A8] Explanation for Christodoulos' departure from Kos.
- [A9] Audience with Alexios Komnenos; his grant of Patmos. See also Bios kai politeia, chaps. 11–13, ed. Sakkélion, Boines, Akolouthia, pp. 122–26.
- [A10] Provisions of the chrysobull. Cf. the actual terms of Dölger, Regesten, no. 1147, ed. Vranoussis and Nystazopoulou-Pelekidou, Engrapha, no. 6, pp. 55–57, and MM 6.44–49 (1088).
- [A11] Exchange of properties; departure of some monks. See also Bios kai politeia, chaps. 14–15, ed. Sakkélion, Boines, Akolouthia, pp. 126–28.
- [A12] Construction of the monastery; regrets over exclusion of married men. See also Bios kai politeia, chap. 16, ed. Sakkélion, Boines, Akolouthia, pp. 128–30.
- [A13] Rules for neighboring lay people. See also the treatment in (29) Kosmosoteira [86], [101], [103], [104].
- [A14] Travel restrictions for lay people and monks. See earlier treatments in (3) Theodore Studites [17]; (12) Tzimiskes [8], [25]; and (13) Ath. Typikon [34].
- [A15] Praise of the cenobitic life. See also (6) Rila [11], (9) Galesios [187], (13) Ath. Typikon [38], (23)

24. CHRISTODOULOS

Pakourianos [4], (27) Kecharitomene [2], cf. [55].

- [A16] Self-governing constitution; ban on the protectorate. See [B13] below and also earlier provisions in (9) Galesios [247] and (13) Ath. Typikon [18] as well as contemporary provisions in (10) Eleousa [18], (19) Attaleiates [8], [14], (22) Evergetis [12], and (23) Pakourianos [18].
- [A17] Liturgical typikon of Sabas to regulate services. See [C10] below and similar endorsements of this typikon in (7) Latros [8]; (20) Black Mountain [22], [23], [29]; and (26) Luke of Messina [10].
- [A18] Election and installation of the superior. See also other treatments in (10) Eleousa [15], [16]; (13) Ath. Typikon [15], [16], [17], [19]; (14) Ath. Testament [13], [14]; (17) Nikon Metanoeite [13]; (18) Nea Gephyra [3]; (19) Attaleiates [26], [29]; (22) Evergetis [13] and related documents; and (23) Pakourianos [5].
- [A19] Admonition to the superior. See also other treatments in (3) Theodore Studites, Concerning the Superior; (10) Eleousa [12]; (13) Ath. Typikon [55]; and (22) Evergetis [17] and related documents.
- [A20] Removal of the superior. See analogous provisions in (10) Eleousa [16]; (14) Ath. Testament [16]; (17) Nikon Metanoeite [9]; (18) Nea Gephyra [3]; (19) Attaleiates [26]; (21) Roidion [A1], [A3], [A4], [B20]; (22) Evergetis [14]; and (23) Pakourianos [19].
- [A21] Officers of the monastery. See provisions for analogous officials in (22) Evergetis [30], [31] and related documents. A treasurer is identified in [C2] below.
- [A22] Prohibition of personal possessions; regulation of trades. For the ban on possessions, see also (3) Theodore Studites [2]; (6) Rila [6]; (9) Galesios [138], [191], [192]; (10) Eleousa [5]; (11) Ath. Rule [34]; (13) Ath. Typikon [30]; (22) Evergetis [22] and related documents; and (23) Pakourianos [4]. For the regulation of trades, see also (9) Galesios [191] and (20) Black Mountain [83].
- [A23] Procedure for becoming a solitary. See also earlier treatments in (9) Galesios [189]; (12) Tzimiskes [10]; and (13) Ath. Typikon [40].
- [A24] Regulation of the solitary's life. See also earlier treatments in (12) Tzimiskes [12], [18], [20], and (13) Ath. Typikon [37], cf. [43]; also similar provisions later in (34) Machairas [152] and (42) Sabas [7].
- [A25] Practice of charity and hospitality. See also provisions in (19) Attaleiates [18], [19], [20]; (21) Roidion [B2], [B3], [B4], [B7], [B8], [B13], [B14], [B15]; (22) Evergetis [38] and related documents; and (23) Pakourianos [10], [21], [29].
- [A26] Qualifications for tonsure; length of the novitiate. See also treatments of the novitiate in (4) Stoudios [24]; (10) Tzimiskes [3]; (11) Ath. Rule [18]; (22) Evergetis [37] and related documents; and (23) Pakourianos [25].
- [A27] Request for divine assistance for preservation of the Rule. See also (19) Attaleiates [7], cf. [15].
- [A28] Final exhortations to the superior and the monks. See also other treatments in (3) Theodore Studites [25]; (7) Latros [11]; (13) Ath. Typikon [56]; (14) Ath. Testament [20]; and (22) Evergetis [16] and related documents.

2. Testament [B]

- [B1] Meditation on death. See also (5) Euthymios [3]; (6) Rila [2]; (7) Latros, Introduction; (10) Eleousa [1]; (25) Fragala [A6], [B6]; (30) Phoberos [1]; (34) Machairas [1]; (35) Skoteine [1]; (41) Docheiariou [1]; (44) Karyes [1]; (45) Neophytos [2]; (48) Prodromos [1]; (49) Geromeri [2] ff.; (50) Gerasimos [1]; and (51) Kouloumoussi [A1], [C1].
- [B2] List of immovable properties. For the earlier acquisitions, see Dölger, Regesten, no. 1139, cf. 1142, ed. Vranoussis and Nystazopoulou-Pelekidou, Engrapha, no. 5, cf. 46, pp. 40–54, 327, and MM 6.25–28 (1087), cf. 29. The properties are mentioned again in [B4] below.
- [B3] Designation of Arsenios Skenourios as successor. This provision was superseded by [C1] below five days later.
- [B4] List of of movable properties. For the imperial exemption of the monastery's boats from customs duties, see Dölger, Regesten, no. 1150, ed. Vranoussis and Nystazopoulou-Pelekidou, Engrapha, no. 7, pp. 68–76, and MM 6.51–53 (1088); see also the regulation of boats owned by monasteries in (15)

ELEVENTH CENTURY

Constantine IX [2], [5].

- [B5] Designation of Theodosios as alternate successor. See also [C1] below. He was to decline this honor later; see MM 6.90–94 (1094).
- [B6] List of resident monks; amnesty for departed monks; Theodosios' powers. (52) Choumnos [4] ff. likewise provides a precise enumeration of the monks at the foundation for which that document was written. Theodosios is reminded of the amnesty in [B12] below.
- [B7] Monastery to inherit Christodoulos' books. See also [C6] and [C7] below.
- [B8] Christodoulos' nephews excluded from inheritance. See also [B11] below.
- [B9] Bequest to the monk Theodoret. This is evidently a personal bequest in exchange for the recipient's performance of memorial services; cf. (19) Attaleiates [30].
- [B10] List of icons at Euripos. These are probably the founder's personal icons, for which see (9) Galesios [138] and (10) Eleousa [5].
- [B11] Christodoulos' nephews to receive only his blessing. See also [B8] above; for a blessing in a more friendly spirit, see [C8] below.
- [B12] Theodosios to receive back returning monks. See also [B6] above.
- [B13] Independent and self-governing status. Confirms [A16] above.
- [B14] Curse on opponents of the rules. See similar curses in (8) John Xenos [2]; (9) Galesios [246]; (10) Eleousa [19]; (16) Mount Tmolos [5]; (17) Nikon Metanoieite [5]; (18) Nea Gephyra [4]; (19) Attaleiates [8], [23]; and (22) Evergetis [12] and related documents.
- [B15] Provision for the priest George and his children. Cf. provisions for support of individuals in (14) Ath. Testament [17], [18]. This chapter is an afterthought, as Christodoulos originally intended to end the Testament with [B14] above.

3. Codicil [C]

- [C1] Designation of Theodosios as successor. See also [B5] above; supersedes [B3].
- [C2] Appointment of a treasurer; subordination of the superior to the charistikarios. For the treasurer's duties, see [A21] above. For subordination of the superior to the charistikarios, see also [4] below and (19) Attaleiates [26], cf. [12].
- [C3] Performance of liturgical duties. For the impact of a foundation's finances on the performance of services, see (27) Kecharitomene [71] and (29) Kosmosoteira [11].
- [C4] Attendance of laymen and servants at meals; hierarchy of authority. See also (11) Ath. Rule [30], [31]; (32) Mamas [19], and (33) Heliou Bomon [19].
- [C5] Discussion of Theodosios' mission to Constantinople. The purpose of the mission is further elaborated in [C11] below.
- [C6] Discussion of rights to books once at Latros. See also [B7] above and [C7] below. (33) Heliou Bomon [37] discusses a similar use of Hagia Sophia as a temporary depository for books from an endangered monastic foundation.
- [C7] History of these books. See also [B7] and [C6] above.
- [C8] Blessings for Theophanes and John. See also [B11] above.
- [C9] Promissory note given to Luke the Cappadocian is invalid. See (29) Kosmosoteira [93], however, for an occasion on which promissory notes were to be honored after the founder's death.
- [C10] Order to draw up a liturgical typikon. See [A17] above with cross-references.
- [C11] Proposal for the emperor's return of the monastery on Kos. See also [C5] above.
- [C12] Burial instructions. See also treatments of founders' burials in (28) Pantokrator [8], [44]; (29) Kosmosoteira [89], [90], [109] cf. (27) Kecharitomene [70].

CHAPTER FIVE

Imperial and Royal Monasteries of the Twelfth Century

“ . . . let [the monks] pray for these people as long as the churches exist since they erected these churches so that prayers [may be offered for] them and the prosperity of their fortune.” (25) Fragala [C4]

“ . . . permission has been granted to me by the divine fathers, the ordinances of the church, and the requirements of the law to make regulations and act in the case of my own possessions just as I wish.” (28) Pantokrator [67]

“ . . . the absence of decrees generates confusion.” (29) Kosmosoteira [48]

This chapter includes five documents composed for foundations from the milieu of imperial or royal patronage. With one partial exception, all are from the twelfth century.¹ One, (28) Pantokrator, was actually composed by an emperor, John II Komnenos (1118–43), while another, (27) Kecharitomene, was authored by an empress, his mother Irene Doukaina Komnena. The irascible Komnenian prince Isaac Komnenos, younger brother of the former and son of the latter, was the author of (29) Kosmosoteira. Another document, (26) Luke of Messina, was authored by a monk who was helping the Norman King Roger II (1130–1154) carry out a reform of the Greek monasteries of Sicily, while the remaining text, (25) Fragala, was written a generation earlier for a foundation patronized by Roger II’s father Count Roger I (1061–1101) and mother Countess Adelaide.

A. Typology of the Documents

Three of the documents in this chapter, (27) Kecharitomene, (28) Pantokrator, and (29) Kosmosoteira, are long, complex founders’ typika in the series initiated by (22) Evergetis in the second half of the eleventh century. Since (27) Kecharitomene (indirectly) and (29) Kosmosoteira (more directly) are textually dependent on (22) Evergetis, it was natural that their authors should want to imitate the latter’s systematic regulation of monastic life. (27) Kecharitomene and (29) Kosmosoteira are also some of the longest documents in our collection, ranking second and third in length, respectively. The longest document, (30) Phoberos, is a contemporary work (see below, Chapter 6).

¹ The exception is the First Testament [A] of (25) Fragala which is dated to 1096/97; the balance of this text dates to 1105.

CHAPTER FIVE

The two documents from Norman Sicily, (25) Fragala and (26) Luke of Messina, are considerably shorter than the three typika discussed above. The first of these is in the traditional testamentary format, like the contemporary (24) Christodoulos. It consists of an original testament composed at the end of the eleventh century, a revision undertaken a few years later early in the twelfth century, and a supplementary text. With its tripartite structure, it is like (24) Christodoulos as well as the much later (51) Koutlounousi, illustrating the fluidity of a mercurial founder's "final arrangements." The second Sicilian document, (26) Luke of Messina, serves as a preface to the author's liturgical typikon,² which has also been preserved but is not translated here in our collection.

All three of the Komnenian authors intended to supplement their typika with testaments that they expected to draw up later.³ In (29) Kosmosoteira, the author Isaac Komnenos also mentions [116] a Gift and Grant Ordinance intended to make the final conveyance of his property to the foundation. Neither this document nor his Secret Testament are extant. Irene Doukaina, the author of (27) Kecharitomene, evidently decided to add a few chapters [79], [80] to her typikon rather than issuing a separate testament. John II Komnenos' Secret Testament has not survived, although the autograph copy of the typikon did until 1934 when it was destroyed by fire in the Peloponnesian monastery of Mega Spelaion.

Taking a precaution advocated by the monastic reform movement against private theft or official expropriation, two of the longer documents, (27) Kecharitomene [Appendix A], [Appendix B], and (28) Pantokrator [65] incorporate inventories (brevia) within their texts. Presumably Isaac Komnenos' Gift and Grant Ordinance would have contained an inventory of property conveyed to his monastery as a supplement to the considerable information on this subject already contained in (29) Kosmosoteira [69].

B. The Nature of Imperial and Royal Patronage

Imperial monasteries had a long history in the Byzantine Empire dating back to at least the sixth century.⁴ While no document in this collection comes unambiguously from a traditional imperial monastery before the twelfth century, it should be kept in mind that imperial patronage, unlike the private variety, was characterized by a light-handed, laissez-faire approach to institutional governance. Frequently, individual emperors relied upon their favorite monastic holy men to set up imperial monasteries, provided generous funding, and then allowed their favorites a fairly free hand with internal administration. The Life in which (5) Euthymios is encapsulated is a good illustration of how this sort of relationship between imperial patron and monastic founder functioned in the early ninth century (see above, Chapter One). (13) Ath. Typikon provides another example of the ambiguities and relative fluidity of this sort of patron-director relationship. In both

² Ed. Miguel Arranz, Le typikon du monastère du Saint-Sauveur à Messine (= OCA 185) (Rome, 1969).

³ (27) Kecharitomene [3]; (28) Pantokrator [68]; (29) Kosmosoteira [1], [116].

⁴ There has been no thorough study of imperial monasteries to date; much scattered information can be found in my Private Religious Foundations in the Byzantine Empire (Washington, D.C., 1987), pp. 44–46, 136–39, and passim, s.v. Index, "basilika monasteria" and "Imperial monasteries."

IMPERIAL AND ROYAL MONASTERIES OF THE TWELFTH CENTURY

cases, clever, ambitious monastic directors succeeded in avoiding close imperial control and were able to stake out their own claims to the institutions involved.

Over the long course of time, other institutions, regardless of their origins (often private), became more closely directed imperial monasteries. By the ninth century, if not before, this seems to have been the fate of the famous Constantinopolitan monastery of St. John Stoudios, in spite of the fact of its private foundation in the fifth century.⁵ Despite the distance involved, the emperors were also willing, upon invitation, to exercise their rights to arbitrate disputes among the monasteries of Mount Athos, as (12) Tzimiskes and (15) Constantine IX show (see above, Chapter Two).

Analyzed carefully, the two Sicilian documents in this chapter can be expected to reflect some of the conditions of imperial patronage in Byzantium itself before the twelfth century, since the Byzantine monastic reform seems to have had only a vague impact, if any, on Greek monasteries under Norman rule, while the perquisites the Norman rulers claimed for themselves were similar to the traditional rights claimed by earlier Byzantine emperors and private patrons. One of these documents, (26) Luke of Messina, illustrates the strong patronal role of Roger II, said to have chosen [3] the author for reconstituting certain idiorhythmic monasteries as cenobitic institutions, to have authorized him to draw up [10] a regulatory typikon, and to have provided [3] funding for the support of clergy and for operational expenses. There were also residential quarters (called archontarikia) [3], [8] for the use of the royal patron at the principal monastery of San Salvatore for which this document was written. The earlier document, (25) Fragala, shows a much less strong role for official patronage. Judging from it, the monastic director Gregory seems to have combined [A3], [B3] his own and other private donations with princely benefactions over two generations of Norman rule at the cost of compromising [C3] only a few of his own patronal rights, like the designation of his successor. Yet, like Athanasios in (13) Ath. Typikon, Gregory seems to have had a relatively free hand in administering his foundation despite his very considerable dependence on official support.

By the time imperial personages appear as the authors of founders' typika in the twelfth century, the triumph of the principles of the monastic reform movement had altered the nature of the patron-client relationship considerably from its earlier terms, though not entirely beyond recognition. The remarkable thing, of course, is that such august founders from the imperial family itself should have accepted the very considerable constraints on the arbitrary exercise of patronal authority that were fundamental tenets of this movement. Not only did they willingly choose in all three cases to base their foundations (either directly or indirectly) on the quintessentially reformist (22) Evergetis when other less extreme models (e.g., the typikon of the Panagios monastery, represented in our collection by (23) Pakourianos) were available, but in two cases, (27) Kecharitomene and (29) Kosmosoteira, they even imported much of the bitterly anti-elitist language of (22) Evergetis into their own typika.

A determination of the motivations of the imperial dynasty for embracing the Evergetian model for their own monastic foundations awaits further study. It appears, however, that there were individuals within the ruling elite like George Palaiologos, husband of Irene Doukaina's younger sister Anna, who were supporters even of the radical Chalcedonian wing of the reform movement.⁶ As noted above in the discussion of (22) Evergetis, Irene Doukaina's second brother John Doukas became an Evergetian monk at the end of his life.⁷ The Doukas family's connection to Evergetis might conceivably go back to the 1060s if, as seems likely, Constantine X Doukas (1059–67) was one of the unnamed emperors who confirmed the monastery's independent constitution.⁸ Later, we find Theodore Prodromos, author of a bitter critique against unreformed monastic superiors, in the circle of intellectuals and artists patronized by Isaac Komnenos many years before that patron's composition of (29) Kosmosoteira.⁹

⁵ See discussion above in (3) Theodore Studites, Institutional History.

C. Curtailments of Reform Principles

It is against the background of this surprising allegiance to what might well be thought to be an extremely uncongenial brand of Evergetian monastic reform that the more clearly conservative features of the three Byzantine typika in this chapter must be considered.

1. Imposition of Lay Protectorates

Since the monastic reform movement had been shaped in large measure by the successful struggle to free Byzantium's monasteries from the depredations of the charistike, most of our documents authored by the first generation of late eleventh-century reformers are understandably hostile to any revival of lay authority over their foundations. In this vein, (22) Evergetis [12] states that the foundation is "not subject to any rights, be they imperial or ecclesiastic or of a private person." (10) Eleousa [18] and (23) Pakourianos [3], cf. [18] are like-minded. Early in the twelfth century, (30) Phoberos [33] adopts the Evergetian view and adds a scathing denunciation of the charistikarioi. Only the author of (24) Christodoulos [B5] was willing to impose a protector on his foundation, but the protector had to become a monk in residence and his authority was carefully circumscribed.

The decision of Irene Doukaina Komnene to create a lay protectorate for her foundation in (27) Kecharitomene [3] was significant even though she, like her sons John and Isaac, adamantly asserts [1] the independence of her foundation and specifically prohibits establishment of an (external) protectorate or participation in the charistike or epidosis. It is noteworthy, however, that for this office Irene avoids what was by her day a most ideologically incorrect title of charistikarios (still found in (24) Christodoulos [B6]). Instead, she chooses "protectress" (antilambanomene), which would find favor with two like-minded benefactors of the twelfth century, the authors of (32) Mamas [3] and (33) Heliou Bomon [3].

Indeed, in the previous century the cautious, tradition-minded author of (19) Attaleiates [12] had anticipated the empress in her revival of the protectorate, reconstituted as a private rather than

⁶ See Anna Komnena, Alexiad 5.2, ed. Bernard Leib (Paris 1967), with B. Skoulatos, Les Personnages byzantins de l'Alexiade (Louvain, 1980), pp. 99–105; he is commemorated in (28) Pantokrator [8], while his wife Anna is in (27) Kecharitomene [71].

⁷ (22) Evergetis [Appendix]; he is commemorated in (27) Kecharitomene [71] and in (28) Pantokrator [8].

⁸ (22) Evergetis [12].

⁹ See Alexander Kazhdan, "Prodromos, Theodore," ODB, pp. 1726–27; E. Jeanselme and L. Oeconomos, "La Satire contre les Higoumènes," Byzantion 1 (1924), 317–39; Paul Magdalino and Robert Nelson, "The Emperor in Byzantine Art of the Twelfth Century," BF 8 (1982), 123–83, at 130–32.

as a public institution as it had been when originally developed in the late tenth century (see above, Chapter Three). While it is true that this revival of the protectorate would hardly have been anticipated, much less welcomed, by the first generation of monastic reformers, the empress was not simply restoring the position of the traditional private patron within her foundation. For in (27) Kecharitomene [3] she specifically denies the protector control over the convent's property. Moreover, the protector could not change the typikon, remove the superior, enroll or expel nuns, require financial accounts, or appropriate any assets. These restrictions and others [74], [80], along with the protector's meager allotment of rights, invite comparison with the parallel treatments in the far more traditional (19) Attaleiates.¹⁰ Such a comparison leaves no doubt that the empress' revival of the protectorate notwithstanding, the reform movement had drastically altered contemporary perceptions of acceptable patronal privilege.

Like his mother, John II Komnenos imposed a protectorate on his foundation in (28) Pantokrator [70], but with a similar understanding that the protector should assist rather than profit from the foundation. Isaac Komnenos, however, returned to pristine Evergetian principles in refusing to name any protector for his foundation in (29) Kosmosoteira [31] except for the Mother of God herself.

2. Preferential Admissions

The other significant deviation from reform principles was the willingness of two of the three Byzantine authors to require their foundations to grant preferential admissions to their personal favorites. The empress Irene not only allows [4] any of her granddaughters preferential admissions; she also was willing to grant significant concessions on their adherence to the requirements of the cenobitic life. The empress was unwilling, however, to permit these concessions to lead to a repetition of what had once been a common feature of institutions under the charistike,¹¹ namely the development of an independent base of authority within the convent in opposition to the superior. A nun of the imperial family who abused her privileged position in this way was to be expelled.

Although John II Komnenos declined to exploit his position to secure preferential admissions, his younger brother Isaac Komnenos thought differently. He obliges [107] his foundation to house one of his retainers "as though he were an internal monk" (i.e., an esomonites), thereby reviving an institution that was anathema to the early reformers.¹² This founder also burdens his monastery with the claims of other retainers and pensioners, placing himself at odds with the prohibition of imposed guests (katapemptoi) found in his mother's typikon, (27) Kecharitomene [53], and that of his contemporary the author of (32) Mamas [26].

3. Servants Allowed

The presence of domestic servants who ranked as a lesser order of monks or nuns in all three of ¹⁰ Cf. (19) Attaleiates [24], [25], [26], [29], [33].

¹¹ See John of Antioch, De monasteriis, chap. 14, ed. P. Gautier, "Réquisitoire du patriarche Jean d'Antioche contre le charisticariat," REB 33 (1975), p. 119, lines 425–28.

¹² See John of Antioch, De monasteriis, chap. 14, ed. Gautier, p. 123, lines 471–78; cf. Alexios Komnenos, De jure patriarchae circa monasteria (JGR 3.409.29–33).

CHAPTER FIVE

the institutions governed by the Byzantine imperial documents clearly distinguishes these foundations from (22) Evergetis [24], (30) Phoberos [43], and the earlier Studite tradition, which strictly forbid them.¹³ As in the matter of the protectorate, these imperial documents are closer to (19) Attaleiates [42] in which servants were also permitted.

4. Ameliorations in Lifestyle

Monastic poverty, taken seriously by Irene Doukaina in (27) Kecharitomene [50], as it was in (22) Evergetis [22], was evidently not imposed by her son John II Komnenos on his monks in (28) Pantokrator [31] ff. Her other son Isaac Komnenos, here as in some other matters, is content in (29) Kosmosoteira [53] to follow the Evergetian precedent. Even when they endorse monastic poverty, these founders seem to have envisioned a more indulgent lifestyle within the confines of cenobiticism for their monks. Bathing, permitted by (22) Evergetis [28], is allowed on a more frequent basis by the empress in (27) Kecharitomene [58] and by her sons in (28) Pantokrator [15] and (29) Kosmosoteira [97]. The Evergetian diet, slightly ameliorated by the empress in (27) Kecharitomene [46], [47], [48], is made more ample by her son the emperor in (28) Pantokrator [9], [11], who, moreover, was willing to allow [12] the superior discretion to make fasts less rigorous. In (29) Kosmosoteira [6], Isaac Komnenos goes further, stating that the monks should have a “bounteous supply” of food.

5. Desire for Future Growth

As we have seen, (22) Evergetis [23] was virtually alone among reform monasteries in refusing to set a precise number of positions for monks at that institution, preferring that the foundation shrink in size if enough pious monks could not be recruited to take advantage of the financial support available. All three of our Byzantine imperial founders, however, indicate the number of monks that they thought could be supported.¹⁴ There was also some agreement among these authors with the more explicit sentiment for future expansion seen in the Sicilian documents. In (27) Kecharitomene [5] Irene Doukaina is willing to allow an expansion in numbers from 30 to 40 nuns if an increase in resources permitted, but no more, lest an increase be “a cause of anarchy.” Her son Isaac Komnenos in (29) Kosmosoteira [48] declares his desire for a future increase “within the scope of its [i.e., the foundation’s] potential,” though like (22) Evergetis, he did not want to place quantity over quality.

6. Concessions for Wealthy Applicants

While our imperial founders generally held the line or better against possibly entangling fundraising schemes with external benefactors, they were increasingly willing to trade off disciplinary concessions to wealthy applicants in exchange for large, though voluntary, entrance gifts (prosenexeis). Not only the Empress Irene in (27) Kecharitomene [4] but also her sons John II Komnenos, in (28) Pantokrator [17] and Isaac, in (29) Kosmosoteira [55] endorse this approach to increasing the endowments of their foundations. Of the three founders, Isaac Komnenos was the most entrepreneurial of all, being willing to set aside his rules banning eunuchs [3] as postulants or burials of laymen [86] within the monastery if a large enough donations were offered in exchange for these concessions.

¹³ (27) Kecharitomene [5], (28) Pantokrator [19], and (29) Kosmosoteira [3]; cf. (3) Theodore Studites [4].

¹⁴ (27) Kecharitomene [5]; (28) Pantokrator [19], [28], [32]; and (29) Kosmosoteira [1], [48], [88].

D. Endorsements of the Evergetian Canon

Clearly then the governing class of Byzantium did not adopt the principles of the monastic reform movement without introducing considerable changes to make its content more palatable to their aristocratic tastes. Yet much of the Evergetian canon remains in their typika, with the striking originality of the model scarcely reduced. The two Sicilian foundations, both professedly based on Studite and other early precedents, are much less affected by the winds of change brought about by the monastic reform in contemporary Byzantium.

1. Institutional Independence

Consider in the first instance the endorsement of institutional independence by all three of the Byzantine authors,¹⁵ coupled with indignant condemnations of all the various exploitation schemes like the charistike, epidosis, and protectorate that had been practiced for a century or more by the imperial government and the ecclesiastical hierarchy before the reform. In the best reform tradition, the superior was the real governing officer of his monastery in all three of the Byzantine typika, the appointment of internal protectors in some of them notwithstanding.¹⁶ The authors of these documents reserve for themselves the right to appoint the superior during their own lifetimes, but allow subsequent choices to be made independently by vote of the monastic communities.¹⁷ This was obviously a crucial concession, which, combined with the careful curtailment of the power of designated protectors, gave real substance to the notion of institutional independence for the Byzantine foundations.

2. Control over Admissions through the Novitiate

The authors of the three Byzantine typika also provide for a probationary novitiate.¹⁸ This was an indispensable requirement for enabling reform monasteries to exercise some control over the quality of their individual monks, not to mention making it possible for them to resist applicants imposed by the public authorities of the imperial government or the church.

3. Condemnation of Alienations of Monastic Property

The three Byzantine authors also speak with one voice in condemning alienations of the landed and movable property of their foundations except under extraordinary circumstances.¹⁹

4. Support for the Principles of Cenobitic Monasticism

The authors of (25) Fragala and (26) Luke of Messina, backed by their patrons the Norman rulers of Sicily, are notably eager to uphold cenobitic life.²⁰ With varying degrees of enthusiasm, the authors of the Byzantine documents join their Sicilian counterparts in endorsing cenobitic monas-

¹⁵ (27) Kecharitomene [1], (28) Pantokrator [69], and (29) Kosmosoteira [12].

¹⁶ (27) Kecharitomene [1], (28) Pantokrator [26], and (29) Kosmosoteira [12].

¹⁷ (27) Kecharitomene [11], (28) Pantokrator [24], and (29) Kosmosoteira [32].

¹⁸ (27) Kecharitomene [30], (28) Pantokrator [16], and (29) Kosmosoteira [55].

¹⁹ (27) Kecharitomene [9], (28) Pantokrator [65], and (29) Kosmosoteira [45].

²⁰ (25) Fragala [B9] and (26) Luke of Messina [3].

ticism over idiorhythmic alternatives.²¹ The crucial provision of (22) Evergetis [26] providing for equality in food, drink and dress for all monks, regardless of rank, receives endorsement from (27) Kecharitomene [56], with an exception [4] only for privileged nuns from the imperial family, and from (29) Kosmosoteira [53], though not from (28) Pantokrator. Only in (28) Pantokrator do monks have private incomes.

5. Independent Financial Management

The authors of the Byzantine typika also share the scruples of (22) Evergetis in financial matters. Financial management independent of the patron was a cornerstone of the constitution of reform monasteries. After their own deaths, both the Empress Irene and her son Isaac Komnenos were willing to allow the superiors of their foundations to choose their own stewards to serve as chief financial officers; John II Komnenos provides for internal financial management by the four stewards of his foundation.²² Provisions for direct management of endowed properties varied, but except possibly for (28) Pantokrator, the property managers were to be appointed by the superior.²³

6. No Mandatory Entrance Gifts

Following (22) Evergetis [37], all three Byzantine authors reject the old requirement that postulants be required to pay mandatory entrance gifts.²⁴

E. Intensifications of Reform Concerns

The adherence of the three Byzantine authors to the core of the Evergetian canon would be sufficient to establish their place in the moderate reform tradition. Yet in a few matters these authors actually show an intensification of the reforming spirit initiated by (22) Evergetis.

1. Honest Financial Administration

Drawing on a strand of the reform movement separate from but ideologically consistent with (22) Evergetis, Empress Irene's typikon pays special attention to the financial officers of her convent, their responsibilities, and procedures to assure that they conduct their administrations honestly.²⁵ (27) Kecharitomene [9] explicitly disallows property speculation through sale or exchange of the institution's landed endowment. Isaac Komnenos follows his mother's lead here in (29) Kosmosoteira [58].

2. Rejection of Traditional Fund-Raising Schemes

Since the late eleventh century, most reform founders had been suspicious of various traditional schemes for raising money from lay benefactors—another unhappy legacy of the charistike. The author of (23) Pakourianos [20], for example, even worried about accepting gifts offered by the laity in exchange for memorial services. In (27) Kecharitomene [53], the empress is even more ²¹ (27) Kecharitomene [2], [3], [51], [55]; (28) Pantokrator [9], [20], [28]; and (29) Kosmosoteira [6].

²² (27) Kecharitomene [14] and (29) Kosmosoteira [34]; cf. (28) Pantokrator [64].

²³ (27) Kecharitomene [31]; (28) Pantokrator [19], [64]; and (29) Kosmosoteira [40]; cf. (22) Evergetis [34].

²⁴ (27) Kecharitomene [7], (28) Pantokrator [17], and (29) Kosmosoteira [55].

²⁵ (27) Kecharitomene [14], [19], [24], [31].

cautious, rejecting the sale of living allowances (siteresia) to external nuns (exomonitides) that the author of (19) Attaleiates [30] had been willing to permit a generation earlier.

3. Rejection of Externally-Imposed Appointments

While (27) Kecharitomene [30] welcomes nuns tonsured elsewhere (xenokouritides) as applicants, it rejects [54] nuns imposed by imperial, governmental, or patriarchal authority (i.e., katapemptai). As a ruler entitled to make such appointments himself, John II Komnenos realized that the ability to resist unsuitable appointments was dependent upon an end to the requirement of mandatory entrance gifts. Otherwise, as he declares in (28) Pantokrator [17], “freedom will be given to anyone to be admitted into the monastery.” He prefers instead that “virtue count above gold or any gift,” though he was willing to permit concessions to attractive nobly-born candidates who could offer useful skills or major donations to the monastery.

F. Other Concerns of the Authors

1. Institutional Philanthropy

Many of the authors of the documents included in this chapter shared a commitment to institutionalized philanthropy, a hallmark of monasteries in the reform tradition since the establishment of an infirmary in (22) Evergetis [41]. The Sicilian foundation described in (26) Luke of Messina [8] included a hospital and a hospice. The hospital associated with (28) Pantokrator [36] ff. is justly famous; this foundation also supported an old age home [58] ff. and a lepers’ sanatorium [63]. For his part, Isaac Komnenos provides for an old age infirmary in (29) Kosmosoteira [70].

2. Welfare of the Dependent Peasantry

A concern for the welfare of the peasantry, though not Evergetian, was also emerging by now as a characteristic of reform monasteries. (26) Luke of Messina mentions the housing provided for its field laborers [9] as well as its lay domestic servants [8]. In (27) Kecharitomene [31] the Empress Irene insists that her property managers be sensitive to the needs of the dependent peasantry. Her son Isaac Komnenos arguably shows the greatest solicitude of any of our authors towards the peasantry.²⁶

3. Building Maintenance

Perhaps with some awareness that the deteriorated state of many of the empire’s private religious foundations had been one of the pretexts for the institution of the charistike,²⁷ some of our founders oblige the officials of their foundations to make the physical maintenance of facilities an important responsibility. In (27) Kecharitomene [73] Irene Doukaina is particularly urgent in placing this responsibility upon the superior, “even if the damage should be as little as one glass lamp.” Her son Isaac Komnenos urges his superior and the monks to take diligent care of all the facilities of his foundation.²⁸

²⁶ (29) Kosmosoteira [71], [76], [98], [104].

²⁷ See Nikephoros Phokas, Novella de monasteriis (JGR 3.294); recalled with bitter irony by John of Antioch, De monasteriis, chaps. 9 and 13, ed. Gautier, pp. 109, 114.

²⁸ (29) Kosmosoteira [67], [70], [73], [79], [82], [104], [108].

4. Increasing Respect for Canon Law

Early on, the reform movement found canon law a useful tool in challenging the legitimacy of the various property exploitation schemes that had been employed by the imperial government and the unreformed ecclesiastical hierarchy during the eleventh century (see below, Historical Context). Originally, when relations between reform-minded founders and the hierarchy were bad, as they were when (22) Evergetis [13] provided for the choice of the superior through the promotion of the steward, the canonical prerogatives of the local bishop (or patriarch) with respect to the superior's installation and blessing (sphragis) were simply ignored. Later, when there had been some improvement, some founders like the author of (30) Phoberos [35] were willing to recognize the hierarchy's prerogatives. In (28) Pantokrator [25] the emperor chooses a middle course, distancing the patriarch by one remove from the installation ceremonies. In general, John II Komnenos was remarkably open-minded about considering the claims of canon law in this and other instances in which they impinged on the exercise of traditional patronal rights, even if he was not always willing to set his own judgments aside when they conflicted. Some years later in (29) Kosmosoteira, his younger brother Isaac Komnenos cites [49] canonical precedent when it was convenient to do so, and he recognizes [4], [32] the right of the local representative of the ecclesiastical hierarchy to install the superior of his monastery.

5. Development of Monastic Dependencies

Aside from the institution of the protectorate in (27) Kecharitomene [3] and in (28) Pantokrator [70] that has already been discussed above, there are some other institutional changes of note in the foundations represented by the documents in this chapter. One characteristic of the age was the development of large, powerful foundations with many dependencies. While an occasional private or independent monastery might well have a single dependency, especially one situated in the capital for the convenience of its monks on embassies,²⁹ the creation of foundations with many dependencies was accomplished most readily with imperial (or in Sicily, princely) resources. Thus Gregory, the author of (25) Fragala [B11], received as many as ten dependencies as the result of two generations of patronage from the ruling Norman dynasty in Sicily, and the author of (26) Luke of Messina [3] presided over twenty-two dependencies subordinated directly to the principal monastery of San Salvatore and another sixteen over which he had archimandritical authority by decree of his patron Roger II. In John II Komnenos' provision for his foundation in (28) Pantokrator [27], he annexes to it six dependent monasteries, presumably already richly endowed beyond their own needs.

In all three of the cases here cited, the patrons were pursuing basically political objectives in support of centralized cenobitic monasticism (see below, G. Historical Context). Newfound scruples in canon law and reform sentiment against simply seizing the assets of older foundations to support new ones may account for the phenomenon of preserving the former as dependencies while freeing up their assets for use by the latter. In (28) Pantokrator [27], the emperor is even careful to preserve the by-then unfashionable kelliotic constitutions that were in place in most of the dependencies.

²⁹ For examples of such dependencies, see: (5) Euthymios [1], (10) Eleousa [17], (13) Ath. Typikon [34], (15) Constantine IX [5], (19) Attaleiates [6], and (23) Pakourianos [31]; cf. (27) Kecharitomene [70]. (8) John Xenos [1], however, provides an example of an individual who was able to assemble a foundation with many dependencies with only subsidiary imperial support.

6. Definition of Monastic Offices

Several of the authors of the imperial typika also demonstrate a greater interest in defining the various offices to be held by the monks in their foundations and in articulating their responsibilities. This is hardly surprising, given the intimate familiarity of these authors with the complex governmental bureaucracy of the Komnenian dynasty. Yet in the previous century, the author of (22) Evergetis, after describing the duties of a few critical officials, had authorized [39] the superior to appoint individuals to other offices “as the occasion demands and if there is urgent need.” In (27) Kecharitomene [14], [19] ff., however, Irene Doukaina provides detailed descriptions of all the officials in her convent. In (28) Pantokrator [19], [32], her son John II Komnenos describes a foundation in which nearly all of the not fewer than eighty monks stationed at the main monastery and the additional fifty members of the clergy assigned to the adjacent church of the Mother of God Eleousa was either an office-holder or was assigned to a specific service. The separate listing [38] ff. of personnel assigned to the hospital is similarly comprehensive, and even suggests [48] a kind of career track.

7. Procedures for Election of the Superior

Given the central importance of the position of the superior in independent foundations, it is also not surprising that our authors were very interested in determining how the choice for this office should be made, particularly after their own deaths.

Gregory, author of (25) Fragala [A7], [B7], is the most old-fashioned, keeping the choice of his successor to himself as a personal prerogative, evidently subject [C3] to the confirmation of the royal patron. Curiously, however, this author comes the closest of all to obliging [A9] the superior to govern in such a way as to retain the confidence of his flock. The author of (26) Luke of Messina is more open to suggestions from below, providing [11] that the monks of each dependency were to nominate candidates for superior of their houses, from among which the archimandrite of the main monastery would make [12] his choice.

In (27) Kecharitomene [11], Irene Doukaina provides that the superior along with the entire community were to propose three candidates for the succession, with the final choice being made by drawing lots after the incumbent’s death. In (28) Pantokrator [24], John II Komnenos directs the current superior to make three nominations which would be discussed by the community at large after the superior’s death; if a consensus could not be reached, a choice would be made by lot. In (29) Kosmosoteira, Isaac Komnenos, who revives the Evergetian idea of a group of preeminent monks governing consultatively with the superior, likewise allows them to select a new superior if a unanimous choice by the community was not forthcoming.³⁰

G. Historical Context

The half-century during which these documents were composed was another crucial one for the history of the Byzantine church, which saw the triumph and consolidation of the monastic reform movement.

³⁰ (29) Kosmosoteira [34], [41], [45], [78]; cf. (22) Evergetis [13], [14], [19].

CHAPTER FIVE

1. Reconciliation of the Reformers and the Public Authorities

The reconciliation of the imperial government and the ecclesiastical hierarchy with the reform party took place at the Synod of Blachernai in 1094, which ended Leo of Chalcedon's eight years of exile and led to his reinstatement as metropolitan of Chalcedon.³¹ With the resolution of essentially personal differences between the moderates in the ecclesiastical hierarchy and the Chalcedonians, it was possible for Patriarch Nicholas III Grammatikos to concentrate on the reform of the charistike.

2. Alexios Komnenos' Activities in Support of the Reformers

Increasingly Emperor Alexios Komnenos could be depended upon to side with the reformers too. In May 1094, a few months before the Synod of Blachernai, he ruled that charistikarioi who held imperial diplomas awarding their grants could not use these as a basis for evading the registration requirement that the patriarch had announced in 1087.³² The patriarch's bold project of visiting all of the patriarchal monasteries then under lay management followed, either in 1095 or early 1096. Fiercely resisted by the charistikarioi who resented what they saw as an infringement of their rights or feared for the discovery of how badly they had abused their responsibilities, the patriarchal visitation brought to a head the long controversy over the charistike. In an important novel issued in 1096, the emperor basically upheld the patriarch's view that he should have unrestricted rights of oversight (epiteresis) and reformation (diorthosis) over all the monasteries within the patriarchate of Constantinople (i.e., the entire empire).³³

3. Impact of Alexios' Legislation on Contemporary Founders

Alexios' novel touched on several points of relevance to the interpretation of the documents in this chapter. His declaration that no patriarchal or imperial privilege could obstruct a patriarch from conducting a visitation of a monastery for the purpose of conducting a spiritual reformation, while aimed at curbing unscrupulous charistikarioi, failed to gain acceptance even by later reform-minded founders.³⁴ For instance, in (29) Kosmosoteira [4] Isaac Komnenos boldly forbids the patriarch to make such a visitation at his foundation, even in support of settling internal disputes which he himself refers to the patriarchal see for resolution.

The emperor forbade the exaction of mandatory entrance gifts (apotagai) from postulants on the grounds that they were uncanonical; free-will offerings (prosenexeis) were permitted as long as they were recorded in the institution's inventory and a notice was sent to the patriarch.³⁵ This was a tacit but precise endorsement of (22) Evergetis [37], which was in turn adopted by the emperor's wife Irene and his sons John and Isaac in their typika in later decades.

The emperor also drew a distinction between an exomonites, basically a non-resident lay

³¹ Acta synodi Constantinopolitanae, PG 127, cols. 972–84, with Paul Gautier, "Le synode des Blachernes (fin 1094). Étude prosopographique," REB 29 (1971), 213–84.

³² J. Darrouzès, "Dossier sur le charisticariat," Polychronion: Festschrift F. Dölger (Heidelberg, 1966), pp. 153–54, 157.

³³ Alexios Komnenos, De jure patriarchae (JRG 3.407–10); for a detailed discussion, see my Private Religious Foundations, pp. 207–9.

³⁴ De jure patriarchae (JGR 3.408.7–33).

³⁵ De jure patriarchae (JGR 3.409.16–27).

appointee entitled to support from a monastery's revenues, and a esomonites, by which he understood a lay postulant imposed by an external authority (i.e., a katapemptos). The patriarch was to refrain from appointing the former, but could (in patriarchal institutions, at any rate) continue to designate the latter unless a particular monastery was already overburdened with non-residents it was obliged to support.³⁶ (28) Pantokrator [28] provides an example of various kelliotic monasteries that supported both of these kinds of appointees.

Founders of independent monasteries were extremely hostile to attempts by anyone to impose postulants on their foundations. Empress Irene, in (27) Kecharitomene [53], flatly forbids the appointment of "external nuns" (exomonitides) as well as "imposed guests" (katapemptai). Her son Isaac Komnenos could hardly in good conscience repeat this condemnation, however, for in (29) Kosmosoteira [107] he imposes a lay esomonites upon his foundation.

4. Patriarch Nicholas III Grammatikos' Support of Monastic Patrons

Nicholas III Grammatikos remained a friend to the reformers until his death in 1111. In (27) Kecharitomene [70], Empress Irene records how he granted her a patriarchal convent to serve as a funerary chapel for her foundation. He also issued a memorandum (hypomnema) recognizing the independence of the foundation for which (30) Phoberos [33] was written, limiting his own and his successors' rights in this foundation to liturgical commemoration (anaphora) and blessing (sphragis) of the foundation's superior. According to (24) Christodoulos [A5], the patriarch also appointed Christodoulos protos of the patriarchal monastery at Latros and supplied [C6] him with a fine library. Relations between them subsequently became strained, however, when Christodoulos subsequently abandoned his post, fearing for his life at the hands of the Turks. Later, though, it was the patriarchal notary Theodosios to whom Christodoulos turned when he set up a protectorate over his foundation on Patmos (see (24) Christodoulos [B5]).

5. John IX Agapetos and a New Generation of Reformers

Fortunately for the cause of the reformers, Nicholas' successor John IX Agapetos (1111–34) also proved to be a friend to their movement. He followed his predecessor's example (in the Athens case of 1089) in using canon law to justify annulling the grants of certain monasteries to laymen under the charistike in a case brought to the patriarchal synod by Constantine, metropolitan of Kyzikos, in 1116.³⁷ By cleverly locating and skillfully interpreting an old canonical precedent that had long since fallen into disuse, this patriarch determined that it was illegal for a bishop to alienate any part of the essential endowment of landed property (the autourgion) necessary to support his see.

Broadly interpreted, this may have served as the crucial decision that made possible the overthrow (as opposed just to the careful regulation) of the charistike. The reform movement had clearly paved the way for this outcome by insisting on the inalienability of a monastery's landed endowment, a principle endorsed by Empress Irene, her son John II Komnenos, and his brother Isaac Komnenos in their typika.

³⁶ De jure patriarchae (JGR 3.409.29–33).

³⁷ Grumel, Regestes, no. 1000; text edited by Th. Uspensky, "Mneniya i postanovleniya konstantinopolskikh pomestnikh sobarov XI i XII vv. o razdache tserkovnikh imuschestv (Charistikarii)," IRAIK 5 (1900), 1–48, at 15–29.

CHAPTER FIVE

6. Activities of Later Patriarchs in Support of Monastic Reform

Less is known about the activities of the next patriarch, Leo Styppes (1134–43). It was likely he who granted John II Komnenos the patriarchal monastery of Satyros, populated by eighteen kelliotic monks, which serves as a dependency for the emperor's foundation in (28) Pantokrator [27]. Yet in return, the emperor was willing to make [25] only a partial concession to him of the right to install the superior of his foundation. An unnamed patriarch similarly awarded Isaac Komnenos the ruined church of St. Stephen of the Aurelian as he records in (29) Kosmosoteira [108]. Later, after its restoration, this was to serve as Kosmosoteira's Constantinopolitan dependency. Isaac Komnenos was also willing to trust the patriarchate for the resolution of disputes between the superior and the monks of his monastery,³⁸ which is an indication of how much relations between founders and the patriarchate had improved by the mid-twelfth century.

³⁸ (29) Kosmosoteira [4], [111].

25. Fragala: Testaments of Gregory for the Monastery of St. Philip of Fragala in Sicily

Date: 1096/97 (First Testament)

May 1105 (Second and Third Testaments)

Translator: Patricia Karlin-Hayter

Translator: Timothy Miller

Editions employed: Vera von Falkenhausen, “Die Testamente des Abtes Gregor von San Filippo di Fragalà,” in HUS 7 (1983), 174–195, with text at 191–94 (First Testament); Giuseppe Spata, Le Pergamene greche esistenti nel Grande Archivio di Palermo (Palermo, 1861), pp. 197–214, with texts at 197–204 (Second Testament) and 211–13 (Third Testament).

Manuscripts: Original documents, in Catania, Archivio di Stato, Fondo pergamenaceo, Archivio privato Raddusa (photoreproduction by von Falkenhausen, “Testamente,” p. 195) (First Testament); Palermo, Archivio di Stato, Ospedale Grande di Palermo, Abbazie di San Filippo di Fragala e Santa Maria di Maniace, no. 8, and Catania, Archivio Provinciale, Fondo Raddusa, no. 22 (Second Testament); Palermo, Archivio di Stato, Pergamene varie, no. 73 (Third Testament).¹

Other translations: Italian, in Spata, Le pergamene, pp. 197–204 (Second Testament), 211–13 (Third Testament); Latin, by G. Cozza-Luzi, “Del testamento dell’abate fondatore di Demenna,” ASS 15 (1890), 35–39, at 37–39 (Third Testament).

Institutional History

This monastery, structural remains of which still exist, is located in the region of northeastern Sicily called Val Demone, some twelve miles due south of Capo d’Orlando, on the mountain road beyond the villages of Mirto and Frazzano.

A. Early History of the Monastery

1. Origins

Nothing is known about the foundation and early history of the monastery. It existed already during the era of Arab rule over this area of Sicily, since Gregory, the author of our document and the monastery’s first known superior, says in his Testament that he began his career as a monk there at that time.² This would suggest that Fragala dated back to before the Arab conquest of the Val Demone, one of the last areas of Sicily to come under their control after the fall of Taormina (902) and Rametta (965). It is also possible, however, that the monastery dated from the Byzantine general George Maniakes’ ephemeral recovery of eastern Sicily for the empire in 1038–42, as was likely the case for at least one of the dependent churches later subordinated to the monastery.³

2. Fragala under Arab Rule

Gregory asserts that the monastery was virtually abandoned [A1], [B1] when he arrived there as a child and that he suffered [A2] personally from the Arab rulers of the island. Although Fragala as well as other Greek monasteries in the Val Demone remained inhabited during the era of Arab rule, they retained at least some of their properties perhaps because the Arabs came relatively late to this part of Sicily and seem to have settled there only lightly.⁴ Gregory himself [A3], [B3], [B4] and previously his parents [B12] were able to donate property to the monastery.

3. Refoundation under Norman Patronage

The Normans under the brothers Robert Guiscard and Roger began their invasion of the island in 1060. They conquered the predominantly Greek Val Demone in less than three years, while the Norman conquest of the rest of Sicily was not concluded until 1091. As Roger I, Count of Sicily (1072–1101), the Norman leader pursued a policy of supporting existing Greek monasteries and assisting in the rebuilding of others. Gregory claims [A2] that his monastery began to benefit from Roger's patronage soon after the reconquest, i.e., in the mid-1060s. With Roger's financial assistance, Gregory built [A2], [A3] the main church, a defensive tower, monastic cells, and another church dedicated to St. Michael.

4. Roger I's Foundation Charter of 1090

Roger I granted a charter of privileges to the monastery in June 1090.⁵ In this important but textually problematic document Roger I declares that Fragala will be exempt from the control of the ecclesiastical hierarchy and also of his own heirs. Like the greater part of the privileges of the early Norman period which were written on paper and needed to be recopied after a few years, Roger I's original diploma has not been preserved. It is known from two Latin translations executed from the Greek original in the mid-fifteenth century. The possibility of later interpolations or even of forgery cannot be excluded in considering documentary evidence of this provenance.⁶

Roger I made a similar series of concessions to other Greek monasteries in Sicily during the period 1090–93.⁷ His awards of institutional autonomy, well known as an imperial prerogative in Byzantium, are exceptional for a ruler in the medieval West, and are thought to have been retroactively recognized in a concession of hereditary legatine authority awarded to him by a bull of Pope Urban II (1088–99) in 1098.⁸

5. Growth of the Monastery's Dependencies

In his First Testament of 1096/97, Gregory mentions [A2] specifically only the aforementioned dependency of St. Michael while alluding to "such others as the principal monastery holds secure in her possession." In his Second and Third Testaments of 1105, however, we are supplied [B2], [C3] with lists of as many as ten dependencies, many of which were likely founded in the eight-year interval towards the end of Roger I's rule and at the beginning of the regency of his widow Adelaide (1101–12). Several of these are independently attested in other documentary sources, which add information on other dependencies as well.⁹

6. Patronage of the Monastery During the Regency of Adelaide

The golden age for the monastery was in the years after Roger I's death, during the regency of Adelaide for her sons Symeon (1101–5) and Roger II (1105–1112). Adelaide moved her late husband's court from Mileto in Calabria to San Marco in the Val Demone, close to Fragala, and granted the monastery many benefits. These benefactions, which Gregory acknowledges generally in [B11] and [C1] below, can be studied in some detail, along with those of her successors and (through confirmations) her predecessors, because the monastery's tabulary has been fairly well preserved.¹⁰ There are thirty-seven documents from the era of Norman rule, from 1090 down to 1192. Twenty-seven of these are comital or royal donations and/or confirmations.¹¹ In an act of donation of October 1101, one of her first, Adelaide indicates the reason for her devotion to St. Philip of Fragala, a cure for an ear illness suffered by her son Roger at the saint's intercession.¹² Gregory also acknowledges [B11], [C3], [C4] benefactions from Greek officials of the Norman court that took place at this time. These are also independently attested by documentary evidence in the tabulary.¹³

7. Gregory's Arrangements for the Succession to the Superiorship

A notice in the author Gregory's hand on the verso of the manuscript of his Second Testament published for the first time by von Falkenhausen ("Testamente," pp. 184–85) considerably illuminates the problem of the selection of Fragala's next superior that was the most important motivation for the composition of the first two versions of the document. This indicates that Gregory's first choice as successor, the priest Blasios said [A7], cf. [B7] to have "belonged to this monastery from childhood," was in fact Gregory's nephew. In the Second Testament of 1105, we learn [B10] of Blasios' planned pilgrimage to Jerusalem, from which Gregory suspected he might not return. In the verso notice, dated to 1107, Gregory, then near death, announces his disappointment at Blasios' failure to return and appoints another nephew, Gregory, as his successor instead. Von Falkenhausen ("Patrimonio," p. 781) suggests, presumably based on the harsh language of the notice, that both of these nephews were imposed on the community against the will of the monks.

B. Subsequent History of the Monastery

1. Fragala under the Later Norman Rulers of Sicily

Even after Gregory's death, the monastery continued to benefit from Norman patronage on a reduced level. Roger II, who was born in 1095, came of age in 1112, serving as Count of Sicily until 1130, and thereafter as King (1130–54). In May 1117, he issued a golden bull that confirmed Fragala's privileges as originally granted by his father Roger I in 1090.¹⁴ At this time, donations from members of the Norman feudal aristocracy like Eleazar Mallabret (1116) and the brothers Matthew and Hugo de Craon (1122) replace the benefactions of the earlier Greek officials of the Norman court.¹⁵ The founder's nephew and namesake Gregory (II) was serving as superior of the monastery.

In 1133, however, Roger II decided to carry out a reorganization of the Sicilian kingdom's Greek monasteries under which some thirteen of these foundations, including Fragala, were subordinated to the archimandrite of the newly founded monastery of Christ Savior (San Salvatore) at Messina (for which see below, (26) Luke of Messina).¹⁶ The subordinated institutions, described as kephalika (capital) and autodespota (independent), continued to be ruled by their own superiors with a certain degree of independence and thus were not simple dependencies of the archimandral monastery at Messina in the strict sense of the term.

Occasional royal donations and confirmations later in the twelfth century demonstrate Fragala's enduring ties to the Norman court (von Falkenhausen, "Testamente," p. 176). In 1145,

TWELFTH CENTURY

Roger II issued a bull for Fragala's (Latin?) superior Boniface confirming thirteen documents originally issued by himself, his father Roger I, and his mother Adelaide.¹⁷ Later, there are three documents issued by Queen Margaret, acting as regent for her son King William II (1166–89), dated to 1168, 1171, and 1175 or 1176.¹⁸ The bilingual diploma of 1171 was issued in response to a visit to the court at Palermo by Fragala's superior Pankratios and some of his monks to complain of unjust treatment by royal officials ignoring the immunities conceded them in Roger II's golden bull of 1117. The last of Margaret's documents is addressed to the superior Luke. The last two documents issued for Fragala by the Norman court are one granted by William II in 1187 for another superior named Pankratios (II?), and another by Tancred of Lecce (1189–94) issued in 1192 for this same Pankratios that confirms all prior liberties and concessions granted by the Norman rulers of Sicily.¹⁹

2. Fragala under Angevin and Aragonese Rule²⁰

Although as late as 1192 Greek was still being used in chancery documents of the Norman court awarded to Fragala, most Greek monasteries began to decline in the middle of the thirteenth century, as the Sicilian administration was latinized under new rulers (von Falkenhausen, "Testamente," p. 176) like Charles of Anjou (1266–82) and Peter of Aragon (1276–85). According to the visitation report drawn up for the archimandrite of San Salvatore, there were only seven monks left in 1329 and Fragala controlled just two of its dependencies, yet von Falkenhausen reckons that it was still better off economically at this time than most other Greek Sicilian monasteries. Restorations ordered by the archimandrite were completed three years later in 1332, including a repair of the church roof. A commendatory abbot was appointed in 1417, who had the right to vote in the Sicilian parliament. In 1490, Pope Innocent VIII (1484–92) subordinated the monastery to the Ospedale Grande in Palermo.²¹ Seven years later, Pope Alexander VI (1492–1503) allowed Benedictine monks to replace the Greek (Basilian) monks on the grounds that it was impossible to find the latter who were "good, honest, and exemplary in their lives."²² By 1511, the monastery had four dependencies, two of which, San Talleleo and Sant' Ippolito, dated back to the eleventh century.

3. Fragala in Modern Times until its Secularization

According to von Falkenhausen ("Testamente," p. 175), the buildings were completely renovated in the eighteenth century, leaving hardly a trace of the medieval structures, but Salinas ("Escursioni," p. 387) reported in 1887 that the church had preserved its original plan despite modern restorations and plasterings. The royal visitor Monsignor J. A. De Ciocchis visited Fragala in 1742 while it was still an operating monastery. He described the whitewashed exterior of the church and noted the presence of the foundation's archives, with diplomas, in the library.²³

The Benedictine monks left the monastery in August 1866 when it was secularized after the fall of the Bourbon Kingdom of Sicily in 1861 and the establishment of the modern Kingdom of Italy. At that time there were twenty-four monasteries in Sicily that could be traced back to Greek origins.²⁴

The greater part of the archives of the monastery are found today under the title of "Tabulario dell'Ospedale Grande" in the Archivio di Stato in Palermo, where they were placed after the secularization of 1866.²⁵ A modern edition of the tabulary would greatly assist our understanding of the history of this foundation, which operated as a monastery for over eight hundred years.

Analysis

The three Testaments attributed to Gregory, superior of the monastery of Saint Philip of Fragala, illustrate the life of a monastic foundation in early twelfth-century Sicily that had prospered through royal patronage. In default of comparable documents from pre-reform imperial monasteries in Byzantium proper, these may be used with care to provide some idea of how monastic leaders and their imperial patrons might have worked together before the monastic reform in Byzantium irrevocably altered the terms of that relationship.

A. Typology of the Document

The First Testament [A], edited only relatively recently, is dated to 1096/97. Along with the Second Testament [B] of 1105, it is concerned primarily with arranging the succession to the superiorship, but the latter document also revises some of the terms of the former. The Third Testament [C], also dated to 1105, is concerned principally with the foundation's dependencies. The author also composed [A4] a rule (kanon) for his monks, now lost, that was not an original work but drew on [B4] the writings of Basil of Caesarea, Theodore the Studite (possibly (4) Stoudios), and "all the fathers." Thus this was a foundation that stood outside of the Evergetian tradition that was then so influential in Byzantium itself.

B. Lives of the Monks

Unlike contemporary Byzantine institutions such as those governed by (10) Eleousa, (23) Pakourianos, and (27) Kecharitomene in which the performance of the canonical hours dominated the lives of the monks, here psalms and hymns were performed [A5], [B5] only on designated feast days. The monks are exempted [A5], [B5] from the practice of manual labor on feast days, but there is no further discussion. The novitiate of three years [A8], [B8] was a relatively long one by contemporary standards, stricter than in (22) Evergetis [37], but equal to that provided for in (27) Kecharitomene.

C. Constitutional Matters

The author exercises [A7], [B7] his patronal right to designate his successor, the ordained monk Blasios. He took the precaution of securing [C3] from Countess Adelaide her confirmation of his choice. Yet after the latter sought permission to go off on pilgrimage to the Holy Land, the author decided [B10] to reassert his prerogative to choose someone else to lead the community if Blasios fails to return within three years. If the author himself has died by then, the monks are to choose a successor from among themselves. As we learn from a note on the verso of the Second Testament, Gregory actually did this himself in 1107. There is no mention of any episcopal role in his successor's consecration, though Luke, bishop of Asyla, served as the scribe for all three testaments.

The author binds [A9] the monks to obedience to his successor, provided that "he is doing a good job of directing the flock" (cf. [A10]). Although this implies the possibility that the superior might be deposed by his fellow monks, the author explicitly declares [B12] that he is to be immune from removal by any external authority. For his part, the successor must preserve [A11] the testament, observe [B10] the author's canons (i.e., the lost typikon), and "not make use of secular persons and officials so that he dishonors this dignity."

D. Financial Matters

The foundation was supported both by private donations and royal patronage. The author, who had been dedicated [A1] to the monastery as a child, brought with him from his parents certain landed properties. He made [B4] another donation of landed and movable property at his tonsure. Still later, he donated [A3], [B3] additional vineyards and small farms to support the community as it increased in size. He carefully excludes [B12] any attempt by his lay relatives to reclaim these properties. Count Roger I provided [A2] financial assistance for the construction of the foundation's church and a protective tower. He also was at least partly responsible [B11] for the assignment of dependencies to the foundation, which the author then rebuilt [B2], [C2]. These included a nunnery and also a church likely founded by the Byzantine general George Maniakes († 1042).

After Roger's death, his wife Adelaide, acting in the name of her sons Symeon and Roger II, continued to provide [C3] financial assistance for the reconstruction of the foundation's dependencies. Other officials of the Norman court also provided dedications for the foundation. The royal patrons and other benefactors were to be rewarded [C3] with "unceasing prayers" in the dependencies. The author astutely seeks to associate [C4] the benefactors' interest in the continuance of these prayers with their vigilance to see to it that the foundation is not subsequently deprived of its dependencies.

This external support and the apparent acceptability of entrance gifts help explain both the large increase [B1] in the number of monks at the foundation and the author's expectation [B8] of future growth.

E. Relationship to the Monastic Reform

This was a very different kind of foundation from many reform monasteries, which were limited in size by the financial implications of their ideological scruples and comprehensive liturgical programs. Yet, in his own way, the author has tightened the disciplinary standards expected of his monks. He has reintroduced [B4] the practice of abstinence from meat, which had been disregarded during the period of Arab rule. By 1105, he has also introduced [B9] a prohibition of private property (pekoulia) which was absent from the First Testament.

Notes on the Introduction

1. See von Falkenhausen, "Testamente," pp. 177–78, with n. 20, and p. 183, n. 43.
2. (25) Fragala [A1], cf. [A2]; [B1], cf. [B2], [B4].
3. The church of the Mother of God of Maniakes; see (25) Fragala [B2] and [C2].
4. M. Amari, Storia dei Musulmani di Sicilia, 2nd ed., vol. 2 (Catania, 1935), p. 435.
5. Silvestri, Tabulario pt. 1, no. 34, pp. 126–31, cf. confirmation by Roger II (1117) in Cusa, Diplomi, vol. 1, pt. 1, pp. 383–84, and Spata, Pergamene greche, no. 14, pp. 245–54; with discussions in von Falkenhausen, "Testamente," p. 175, Scaduto, Monachesimo Basiliano, p. 104, and Siciliano, "Greek Community," pp. 79, 139, n. 55.
6. Von Falkenhausen, "Testamente," p. 175, n. 8.
7. See references in White, Latin Monasticism, p. 39, n. 6.
8. See discussion in White, Latin Monasticism, pp. 39–40, 44.
9. Scaduto, Monachesimo Basiliano, pp. 106–11.
10. See the editions of Cusa, Diplomi, vol. 1, pt. 1, pp. 383–467; Silvestri, Tabulario, pt. 1, and Spata,

25. FRAGALA

- Pergamene greche*; Siciliano, "Greek Community," pp. 81–84, provides a brief discussion of each of the documents attributed to Adelaide.
11. Siciliano, "Greek Community," pp. 78–79.
 12. Cusa, Diplomi, vol. 1, pt. 1, no. 7, pp. 394–95; Spata, Pergamene greche, no. 5, pp. 191–93; with Siciliano, "Greek Community," pp. 81–82.
 13. Cusa, Diplomi, vol. 1, pt. 1, pp. 399ff; with von Falkenhausen, "Ceti dirigenti," pp. 352–54, and "Testamente," pp. 175–76.
 14. Cusa, Diplomi, vol. 1, pt. 1, no. 1, pp. 383–85, and Spata, Pergamene greche, no. 14, pp. 245–49; with Siciliano, "Greek Community," p. 85.
 15. Cusa, Diplomi, vol. 1, pt. 1, nos. 15–17, pp. 411–15, and Spata, Pergamene greche, nos. 13, 15–16, pp. 241–43, 255–59; with Siciliano, "Greek Community," pp. 89–90.
 16. See discussions in von Falkenhausen, "Patrimonio," pp. 785–86, and "Testamente," p. 176. As von Falkenhausen notes in the former work, p. 786, n. 33, the Greek text of the document ordering the subordination, Codex Vaticanus Latinus 8202, ff. 56–59, 130–32, remains unedited; a fifteenth-century Latin translation has been published by R. Pirri, Sicilia Sacra, 3rd ed., vol. 2 (Palermo, 1733), pp. 974–76.
 17. Spata, Pergamene greche, no. 41, pp. 379–82, and Silvestri, Tabulario, pt. 1, no. 39, pp. 151–55; with Siciliano, "Greek Community," pp. 85–86.
 18. Cusa, Diplomi, vol. 1, pt. 1, no. 21, pp. 421–23; Spata, Pergamene greche, nos. 19, 21–22, 40, pp. 269–70, 273–76, 373–74; Silvestri, Tabulario, pt. 1, no. 30C, G, pp. 106–7, 110–11; with Siciliano, "Greek Community," pp. 86–88.
 19. Cusa, Diplomi, vol. 1, pt. 1, no. 27, pp. 438–39; Spata, Pergamene greche, nos. 27 and 29, pp. 301–3, 371–72, 305–7; and Silvestri, Tabulario, pt. 1, nos. 1 and 30A, pp. 1–3, 102–3; with Siciliano, "Greek Community," pp. 88–89.
 20. For the monastery's later history, see especially Filangeri, Monasteri basiliani, p. 36.
 21. Silvestri, Tabulario, pt. 1, no. 36, pp. 137–40.
 22. Silvestri, Tabulario, pt. 1, no. 38, p. 149.
 23. Salinas, "Escursioni," pp. 386, 392–93.
 24. White, Latin Monasticism, p. 46.
 25. Von Falkenhausen, "Testamente," p. 177.

Bibliography

- Amico, Vito, Dizionario topografico della Sicilia, trans. Gioacchino Dimarzo, vol. 1 (Palermo, 1855), s.v. "Demana," pp. 368–69, "Fragalà," p. 469.
- Cusa, S., I diplomi greci ed arabi di Sicilia, vol. 1, pt. 1 (Palermo, 1868).
- Falkenhausen, Vera von, "I ceti dirigenti prenормanni al tempo della costituzione degli stati normanni nell'Italia meridionale e in Sicilia," in Forme di potere e struttura sociale in Italia nel Medioevo, ed. Gabriella Rossetti (Bologna, 1977), pp. 321–77.
- , "Patrimonio e politica patrimoniale dei monasteri greci nella Sicilia normanno-sveva," in Basilio di Cesarea. La sua età, la sua opere e il basilianesimo in Sicilia, vol. 2 (Messina, 1983), pp. 777–90.
- Filangeri, Camillo, Monasteri basiliani di Sicilia (Messina, 1979), esp. pp. 36–54.
- White, Lynn Townsend, Latin Monasticism in Norman Sicily (Cambridge, Mass., 1938), esp. pp. 27–46.
- Salinas, A., "Escursioni archeologiche. III. Il monastero de San Filippo di Fragala," ASS 12 (1887), 385–93.
- Scaduto, Mario, Il monachesimo Basiliano nella Sicilia medievale (Rome, 1947), esp. pp. 102–17.
- Siciliano, Joseph, "The Greek Religious and Secular Community of Southern Italy and Sicily During the Later Middle Ages" (Ph.D. diss., Rutgers University, 1983).

TWELFTH CENTURY

———, “The Monastery of Saint Philip of Fragala and Norman Monastic Policy in Southern Italy and Sicily,” BSC 5 (1979), 56–57.

Silvestri, G., Tabulario di San Filippo di Fragala e Santa Maria di Maniaci, pt. 1: Pergamene latine (Palermo, 1887).

Translation

Note on the translation of the Second Testament [B]: italics indicate borrowings from the First Testament [A].

First Testament [A]

+ Gregory, the lowly monk and, however unworthy, superior of the monastery of our holy father Philip at Demenna.

[A1.] I, Gregory, the above signed humble sinner, renounced the world and all things worldly from my earliest childhood and dedicated myself to the monastery of St. Philip, which was completely deserted and unknown, not then packed with crowds of monks as it is today. With the help of God, who provides for our salvation and foreknows what is to come, and through the intercession of the most holy Philip, I persevered in this place and fought hard to bring this obscure place to prominence.

[A2.] Indeed, scarcely had the island of Sicily been freed from all the bloodshed and the taking of prisoners—for I too daily endured many terrors in this monastery from our masters the Ismaelites—when, with the approval of the most noble Count [Roger I (1061–1101)], and through the efforts of my humble self and the obedient [service] of the first brothers in submission to me, this church was erected from its foundations and the tower built, as those whose [p. 192] eyes gaze on it [today] can see. For we were not only engaged in the building of the [main] church, but also with the one [dedicated to] Michael, the commander of the heavenly armies, and such others as the principal monastery holds secure in her possession, safely reckoned with her property.

[A3.] I built the cells, too, for the monks to live in. I gave vines and fields to feed them and all those who stream towards this holy monastery. In a word, I exerted myself to the utmost [to improve] all her resources, in the fear of God and for the good of the brothers.

[A4.] As for the holy monks in it, whom I had tonsured, I governed them and gave them a rule, not of my own devising, but culled from the fathers. I handed on to them the rule of complete abstinence from meat, ordaining strict abstinence. I ruled that they should fast not only in renowned Lent, but also during the [period of] the purification that precedes Christmas and the feast of the Holy Apostles. [Fasting on] Wednesday and Friday is, as aforesaid, the tradition of our holy fathers.

[A5.] I handed on to them [the rule of] observing not Sunday only, but the fourteen holy days [of the Lord] and the days of the Apostles and major saints. These days I told them to observe, taking care to do no work of any kind on these days, so that they may be spent, free from distraction, in psalms and hymns. I enjoined that, equally with these, be observed the feasts of God's holy Mother, she who is a fortress for all Christianity. For if we have been ordered to observe the feasts of the Apostles, how much more those of our most pure Lady, Mary ever-virgin.

[A6.] Now that I have reached impotent old age, the reasoning power of my mind has recognized that the inexorable cup of death is near, and that it has no respect for grey hair nor pity for youth, and that it comes in turn to all. In the words of the sweet-singing Prophet, "What man is there," says he, "who shall live and not see death? Or who shall deliver his soul from the hand of Hades?" (Ps. 88 [89]: 49).

[A7.] So, because of this unpredictable suddenness of death, taking as advisers the goodly and choice assembly of my brothers and children, in the tradition of our father of blessed memory, Theodore of the Studites,¹ and the holy fathers who have practiced asceticism before us, I selected to take my place the most devout Blasios, my disciple, a priest, who has belonged to this monastery from childhood. Scrupulously observing all a monk should, [he is] to take into his capable hands the helm of this monastery and govern the holy monks abiding there, to drive and administer them, piously and lawfully, according to the Gospel, as a most excellent shepherd promoted by God, and [be] ready to lay down his life for the sheep, as Christ the great shepherd commanded. For "No one," says he, "has greater love than this, that he should lay down his life for his friends" (John 15:13), and, "The good [p. 193] shepherd lays down his life for the sheep" (John 10:11).

[A8.] He must be the support, not only of the sheep entrusted to him by me, but of those who at any time shall join this flock after stringent examination. That is, [he shall] tonsure them after three years probation and . . . to the other . . . through them service is paid to the Divinity, and the church should come to further increase. For if whenever two or three are, God has promised to be in their midst (cf. Matt. 18:20), how much more so where there are [greater] numbers. His efforts should be devoted not only to increasing the flock but also to strengthening the whole tradition of the rules prescribed for this flock of God's elect, so that when he appears before the Savior at his great Second Coming, he may, with the brothers subject to him, receive the prize of the upward call (Phil. 3: 14)² and present himself joyfully³ before that fearful tribunal, shouting, "Here am I and the children God has given me" (Heb. 2:13).

[A9.] If he is doing a good job of directing the flock and steering the souls of the brothers, let there be no murmuring against him. Rather, [show him] the obedience becoming to monks, since a blameless life and untroubled faith shown to the fathers by their children can correct the heart of both. Thus to both the grace of the Holy Spirit often reveals, instead of features the senses apprehend, the inward disposition, establishing them, as the hymn goes, "Gods in their heart."⁴ So while they obey him without a qualm, he spends sleepless nights for their souls. In the words of the Apostle, "Obey," says he, "those that have rule over you, and submit to them, for they watch at night for your souls, as being answerable for them; so they may do it with joy and not with grief" (Heb. 13:17).

TWELFTH CENTURY

[A10.] So he, the shepherd honored by his own sheep, shall not have leave to be irritable with them, but kind and gentle like [God's] servant Moses. For forming letters does less to incline men to obedience than the character of a kind and mild shepherd. So long as the shepherd appointed⁵ by me herds the flock properly, and those under him are well guarded, no one has leave to rebel against him or make trouble with factions and disorderly dissensions, under pain of the same curse with the Jews who bartered God.

[A11.] No one shall have leave to set aside this my lawful and genuine testament, which I have drawn up, being sane in mind and with my faculties undiminished. If anyone should attempt not to observe it whole and entire, on him be the curse of the Father, the Son and the Holy Spirit, and the curse of the Holy Fathers, and a bond from me that cannot be loosed.

[A12.] This [testament is] to stand firm and unshakeable,⁶ through the intercession of our Lady, Mother of God above-all-praise, and of the godlike angels, and of all the saints. Amen. +++ [p. 194]

+ Written by the hand of Luke, humble and sinful bishop of Syla,⁷ in the presence of all the monks
+

In the year 6605, indiction 5 [1096/97 A.D.] + Be Saint Nicholas of Kastellon⁸ inseparable from the Monastery of St. Philip +

+ In the presence of the [following] trustworthy witnesses: Basil protopapas. Constantine priest, witness. Polykarpos priest, witness. Gerasimos priest and monk, witness. Nicholas, deacon. Sergios, priest. Witnessed further by [other] priests and monks.

Second Testament [B]

This testament has been issued and confirmed by me, Gregory, the humble superior of Saint Philip's in Demenna. [p. 197]

[B1.] I Gregory, the humble sinner who signed above in this document, renounced the world and the vain and dream-filled things of the world and dedicated myself from my earliest childhood to the aforementioned monastery of Saint Philip which was at that time deserted and unknown, not packed with crowds of monks as it appears today. With the help of God, who provides for our salvation and foreknows what is to come and through the intercessions of the most holy Philip, I persevered [p. 198] in this place and fought hard to bring this obscure place to prominence.

[B2.] Indeed, scarcely had the island of Sicily been freed from all the bloodshed and the taking of prisoners perpetrated by the godless Saracens—for I, too, the humble one endured many terrors in this most holy monastery—when with the understanding of the late most noble Count Roger [I] and through the efforts of my humble self and the obedience and submission of those brothers and fathers who first came to this monastery, this church was erected from its foundations and the tower built, as those whose eyes gaze on it [today] can see. I, the unworthy, was not only engaged in the building of this great monastery but also in the nearby church of the archangel Michael and [the churches] of Saint John the Forerunner, the Mother of God, the Apostle Peter, the Holy Philadelphoi, Saint Thallelaios, our holy father and bishop Nicholas, and the other church of the Apostle Peter and [the church] of the Mother of God [founded] by the late most noble Maniakes⁹ and the church of Saint Mark most recently constructed in this city, which has been entrusted to holy women for the glory of God who is greatly praised in song.¹⁰ [I have also labored on many other properties such as this greatest of monasteries holds secure in her possession, safely reckoned with her property.

25. FRAGALA

[B3.] Along with the tower, I built cells [p. 199] ,too, and upper stories where the monks sleep and take their necessary nourishment. I gave to this monastery out of my own diligence the revenues of vines and fields to feed the monks persevering there and those who stream towards this holy and divine monastery. In a word, [I exerted myself] to the utmost [to improve] all her resources, in the fear of God and for the good of the monks thereafter.

[B4.] In addition, when I first was tonsured and was numbered in the chorus of the monks, I dedicated to the monastery both the movable and immovable property which belonged to me from my family. As for the holy monks whom I had tonsured, I gave them a rule from the holy fathers, I mean that of Basil the Great, of the holy Theodore the Studite and of all the fathers, [the rule] of complete abstinence from meat,¹¹ [a rule] which was not observed on the island of Sicily because it had been plundered by the descendants of Agar and fallen into disorder. In the same way I ruled that they should fast not only in renowned Lent but also during [the period of] purification that precedes Christmas (beginning on the feast of the Apostle Philip) and also before the feast of the Apostles. [Fasting] throughout the year on the weekdays, Wednesday and Friday—except for the feasts of major saints and those who are sick in body—is as aforesaid, the tradition of the holy fathers.

[B5.] I handed on to them [the rule] [p. 200] of doing no work on the holy days of the twelve Apostles and major saints together with the holy days of the Resurrection; to sing to God his canticles without distraction and never cease to carry his praises in their throats. I also enjoined them to give greater effort to their care for the holy Scriptures so that Christ will be kind with regard to our sins and will look upon his people and revoke their evil deeds.

[B6.] Now that I have reached impotent old age through many evils, the reasoning power of my mind recognized that the inexorable obligation of death is near and that it has no respect for grey hair nor pity for youth and that it comes in turn to all, according to the divine and sweet-singing prophet [who says] that “there is no man who shall live and not see death and that” no one shall deliver his soul from the hand of Hades” (Ps. 88 [89]: 49).

[B7.] Because of this unpredictable suddenness of death, making use of the good counsel of my sons and brothers, I explained to them my benevolent intention to dispose of my affairs as I wish, in the tradition of our holy father Theodore of the Studites and the other holy fathers who practiced asceticism before [us].¹² Having [their instructions] above all in my heart, I selected by my own choice and that of the brothers my disciple, the most devout Blasios, to take my place. He has been raised in this most pious monastery from childhood and is learned [p. 201] and observes scrupulously all a monk should. I established him as the superior to take into his capable hands the helm of this monastery and steer the holy monks abiding there into serene harbors and lead them to the heavenly sheepfold; to drive and administer them piously and lawfully, according to the word of the Lord “laying down his life for the sheep” (John 10:11). For “greater love has no man than this, that he lay down his life for his friends” (John 15: 13).

TWELFTH CENTURY

[B8.] He must be the support not only of the sheep entrusted to him by me but of those who at any time shall join this flock after stringent examination, that is, after they have completed three years probation and have been numbered with those who have already been laboring so that service is paid to the Divinity and the Church should come to further increase. For if “where two or three [are gathered] ,” God promised, “to be in their midst” (Matt. 18: 20), how much more so when there are [greater] numbers? His efforts should be devoted not only to increasing the flock but also to preserving intact the whole tradition of the rules prescribed for this flock so that when he appears before the Savior at his great Second Coming, he may with the brothers subject to him “receive the prize of the upward call” (Phil. 3: 14). With confidence he will proudly say “Here am I and the children God has given me” (Heb. 2: 13).

[B9.] If he is doing a good job of directing the flock and steering the souls of the brothers, let there be no murmuring [p. 202] against him, but fitting obedience. I command that the superior and his whole congregation are to avoid any private property.¹³ Everything should be held in common and with similar rights, according to the passage in the Acts of the Apostles, “they had all things in common” (Acts, 2: 44). [I ordain obedience] *because a pure and sincere life shown by the sons to their own fathers can correct the heart of both. Thus to both the grace of the Holy Spirit often reveals, instead of features the senses apprehend, the inward disposition, establishing them “Gods in their heart,”*¹⁴ in accordance with the saying “I said you are Gods” (John 10: 34) and “sons of the most High” (Luke 6: 35).

[B10.] If this superior whom I have promoted should journey to Jerusalem as he desires and concerning which he has many times made requests of my lowliness, the monks have permission to wait three years in accordance with the declarations of the superior before me and the brothers. If he should return in the manner he has said, he should retain his pastoral rank. If he should not return, and if I, a poor sinner, am still alive, I will promote another to the service of the flock.¹⁵ If, on the other hand, I have departed from this transient life before he should arrive back after the stipulated time, let one from among the brothers be selected by the decision and discretion of the brothers, one whom the grace of the Holy Spirit shall reveal, a suitable person who has knowledge of the Holy Scriptures. He shall shepherd the flock in holiness and justice according to the canons which I have handed down. He should not [p. 203] make use of secular persons and officials so that he dishonors this dignity, but [he should rule] by the discretion of the brothers as has been said, and as the divine plan orders because God knows those who are with him.

25. FRAGALA

[B11.] The aforementioned churches, together with this great monastery, were built by me with the help of the count of blessed memory [Roger I] who was led by the Holy Spirit, and similarly with the help of the honored officials, that is to say, with the help of Nicholas, the most glorious kaprilingas, and of Leo the logothetes.¹⁶ These men and the most gentle Eugenios of gentle birth,¹⁷ together with the sovereign and the sovereign's wife, Adelaide, made great efforts to construct these churches. Moreover, they dedicated other things for the priests and [gave] other treasures for the forgiveness of their sins and for their eternal life. For them the prayers of this monastery will be unceasing unto the ages of ages.

[B12.] If anyone, seized by demonic deception, should attempt to block the valid testament I have made, to detach the aforementioned dependencies from the great monastery of Saint Philip, to seek from members of my household and from my heirs the properties dedicated by my parents to this same monastery, to expel the superior whom I promoted over this monastery or to dissolve the canon set forth by the Holy Fathers, he will have the curse of the God-inspired fathers as well as the anathema, even the [p. 204] added anathema and the total anathema, and my own malediction. Would that my testament were acceptable and would be confirmed and remain pure and sound, the testament which has been written by the hand of Luke, the sinner, bishop and scribe, in the month of May, thirteenth indiction, in the year 6613 [= 1105 A.D.].

The mark of Gregory, the superior of Saint Philip of Argiro¹⁸ in Demenna.

Third Testament [C]

The testament issued and confirmed by Gregory, superior of Saint Philip's in Demenna. [p. 211]

[C1.] I, the aforementioned Gregory, have placed first in the text the holy cross. Fearing the end of death lest it somehow catch me without a testament and send me empty and without provisions to those on the other side as has often happened and befallen many, I have thus made provision before all else for the monastery of Saint Philip and its dependencies. I, a sinner, have been the builder of these [institutions] with the assistance and cooperation of that great Count Roger and his wife, our sovereign [p. 212] and Lady Adelaide, who remains behind the count of blessed memory together with her son, the new count and our sovereign, Symeon [(1101–1105)], and his brother, the little Roger [II, Count (1105–1130), King (1130–1154)]. These people have watched over and guarded the flock together with its dependencies, just as the blessed and great count has.

[C2.] These are the dependencies of Saint Philip's monastery. First is the nearby church of the Holy Archangel, then of Saint Nicholas', Saint Peter's, the martyr Thallelaios', the Apostle Mark's, the church of the Mother of God [built by] Maniakes, the other Saint Peter's, and the Holy Philadelphoi.

TWELFTH CENTURY

[C3.] As I stated, these buildings were constructed out of the personal expense of the blessed count and of the Lady Adelaide and their children; and also of the lord Nicholas, the notary of the blessed count and his son, the new sovereign Symeon, who together with his mother helped with these churches in his father's place. For these people unceasing prayers will be said in these churches as well as for all those officials who have made dedications to these monasteries. Thus, I settle matters just as I did in the other large testament¹⁹ so that the aforementioned dependencies will remain unshaken in the possession of the great monastery of Saint Philip and so that the superior [will also remain] whom I have established in my place as the sovereign countess and her son, the young count, have ordained.

[C4.] If anyone should be discovered doing anything against these dependencies so that they should not belong to the great monastery, [p. 213] or if anyone should put a stop to the prayers on behalf of the blessed count and the Lady Adelaide and her sons as well as on behalf of the lord Nicholas and all those who love these churches, let him receive the curse of the Holy Fathers and a malediction from me a sinner. To the contrary, let [the monks] pray for these people as long as the churches exist since they erected these churches so that prayers [may be offered for] them and the prosperity of their fortune. God have mercy on them and give them guidance.

[C5.] [I hope] also that the sovereign count, still a little one, and the lady, his mother [Adelaide], will love the superior who has taken my place as they have loved me. I refer to the superior I have left for the church. May [these rulers] not permit these churches to be abandoned.

This testament has been written by Luke, the bishop of Asyla, in the month of May, in the thirteenth indiction, in the year 6613 [= 1105 A.D.]

Notes on the Translation

Editors' note: The assistance of one of our translators, Patricia Karlin-Hayter [PKH], is gratefully acknowledged for the notes to this document.

1. An allusion to (3) Theodore Studites; see also [B7] below.
2. Athanasius, Epistola ad Dracontium 8, PG 25, col. 532C. [PKH]
3. For parousias read parresias. [PKH]
4. E. Follieri, I calendari in metro innografico de Cristoforo Mitilineo, vol. 2 (= Subsidia Hagiographica 63) (Brussels, 1980), p. 431. [PKH]
5. For prostatheis read protatheis. [PKH]
6. For aparasalyton read aparasaleuton. [PKH]
7. Luke signs as bishop of Syla here after [A12] and as bishop of Asyla after [C5]. Von Falkenhausen, "Testamente," p. 181 suggests that Syla may be a scribal error for Asyla which is attested in contemporary sources as the name of Luke's diocese. Luke is also known to have been a scribe (grammatikos); see below [B12].
8. Evidently a dependency of the monastery; see Scaduto, Monachesimo Basiliano, p. 109, and [B2], [C3] below.
9. This church was perhaps founded by George Maniakes during his temporary reconquest (1038–1042) of eastern Sicily; see also [C2] below.

25. FRAGALA

10. For identifications and discussions of these dependencies, see Scaduto, Monachesimo Basiliano, pp. 106–10.
11. Cf. Pseudo-Basil, Canones 28, 85 (R&P 4.164, 257), which permit the use of meat.
12. An apparent reference to (3) Theodore Studites; see also [A7] above.
13. Peculia; cf. (26) Luke of Messina [3].
14. Reading theous tas kardias as in [A9], ed. von Falkenhausen, “Testamente,” p. 193, line 35. See also n. 4 above.
15. Gregory actually exercised this option according to the note on the verso of the Second Testament (ed. von Falkenhausen, p. 184), appointing his namesake and other nephew Gregory to replace the absent Blasios.
16. For benefactions from these officials, see Cusa, Diplomi, vol. 1, pt. 1, pp. 399 ff.; for Nicholas, see also [C3] and [C4] below.
17. “Gentle Eugenios of gentle birth,” a possible pun: eugeneias, Eugenios; for this Greek official at the Norman court, see von Falkenhausen, “Ceti dirigenti,” p. 354.
18. For this local saint to whom, according to some sources, the monastery was dedicated, see von Falkenhausen, “Testamente,” p. 174.
19. An allusion to [B12].

Document Notes

1. First Testament [A]

- [A1] Founder’s personal association with the monastery. See similar treatment in [B1] below; [B12] informs us that his parents donated properties at the time of his entrance into the monastery.
- [A2] Refoundation under patronage of Roger I. See similar but longer treatment in [B2] below, which lists all the dependencies acquired by 1105.
- [A3] Founder’s personal contribution. See similar treatment in [B3] below, with more details.
- [A4] Source of the rule; regulation of fasting. See similar treatment in [B4] below, with its specific identification of sources. For similar regulations of fasting in contemporary documents, see (20) Black Mountain [38], [38R], [54], [56]; (22) Evergetis [10]; (23) Pakourianos [10]; (27) Kecharitomene [47], [48]; and (30) Phoberos [27], [28], [29], [30].
- [A5] Feasts to be observed. [B5] below has a different focus. For similar regulations in contemporary documents on celebration of feasts of the Lord, see (20) Black Mountain [48], [52], [53]; (22) Evergetis [11]; and (30) Phoberos [32].
- [A6] Meditation on death. See similar treatment in [B6] below and in (5) Euthymios [3]; (6) Rila [2]; (7) Latros Introduction; (10) Eleousa [1]; (24) Christodoulos [B1]; (30) Phoberos [1]; (41) Docheiariou [1]; (44) Karyes [1]; (45) Neophytos [2]; (48) Prodromos [1]; (49) Geromeri [2] ff.; and (50) Gerasimos [1]; (51) Koutloumoussi [A1], [C1].
- [A7] Designation of Blasios as his successor. See similar treatment in [B7] below.
- [A8] Length of novitiate; mandate to increase number of resident monks. See similar treatment in [B8] below, and contemporary discussions of the novitiate in (22) Evergetis [37]; (24) Christodoulos [A26]; (23) Pakourianos [25]; (27) Kecharitomene [30]; and (30) Phoberos [51].
- [A9] Obligation of obedience to the new superior. See similar treatment in [B9] below, and contemporary treatments in (22) Evergetis [16]; (27) Kecharitomene [12]; (30) Phoberos [36]; and (24) Christodoulos [A28].
- [A10] Superior to show kindness to monks. There is no equivalent in [B] below, but see contemporary treatments in (10) Eleousa [12]; (22) Evergetis [17]; (24) Christodoulos [A19]; (27) Kecharitomene [12]; and (30) Phoberos [36].
- [A11] Preservation of the Testament. See similar treatment in [B12] below, and contemporary provisions in (10) Eleousa [22]; (23) Pakourianos [33]; (22) Evergetis [40]; and (24) Christodoulos [A27].

TWELFTH CENTURY

[A12] Appeal for heavenly assistance. See also treatments in (19) Attaleiates [7], cf. [15], and (24) Christodoulos [A28].

2. Second Testament [B]

[B1] Founder's personal association with the monastery. See similar treatment in [A1] above.

[B2] Description of the foundation; list of dependencies. See similar but much briefer treatment in [A2] above; for another briefer list of dependencies, see [C2] below.

[B3] Founder's personal contribution. See similar treatment in [A3] above. The upper stories "in which the monks sleep and take their necessary nourishment" are also found in the present structure on the site.

[B4] Earlier contributions of the founder; sources of the rule; real and movable property; regulation of fasting. See similar treatment in [A4] above, with cross-references to other documents. The sources of the monastery's rule are specifically identified here. For the requirement to abstain from meat, see also (26) Luke of Messina [3].

[B5] Exemption from work on feast days; study of holy scripture. [A5] above is different.

[B6] Meditation on death. See similar treatment in [A6] above, with cross-references to other documents.

[B7] Designation of Blasios as his successor. See similar treatment in [A7] above. This provision is effectively cancelled by the note on the verso of this Testament (for which see von Falkenhausen, "Testamente," p. 184), which appoints the founder's namesake and other nephew Gregory instead.

[B8] Length of novitiate; mandate to increase number of resident monks. See similar treatment in [A8] above, with cross-references to other documents.

[B9] Obligation of obedience to the new superior; ban on private property. See similar treatment on obedience in [A9] above (but without the ban on property), with cross-references to other documents. In the same spirit, the note on the verso of this Testament (von Falkenhausen, "Testamente," p. 184) commands the expulsion of monks who refuse to accept the leadership of the founder's designated successor. For similar bans on private property in contemporary documents, see (10) Eleousa [5]; (22) Evergetis [22]; (23) Pakourianos [4]; (24) Christodoulos [A22]; (26) Luke of Messina [3]; (27) Kecharitomene [50]; and (30) Phoberos [41].

[B10] Alternative arrangements for the succession. This is a new chapter, with no equivalent in [A], prompted by Blasios' planned pilgrimage to Jerusalem. As the note on the verso of this Testament (von Falkenhausen, "Testamente," p. 184) indicates, Gregory exercised the option reserved here of designating an alternate successor, his namesake nephew Gregory (II). The enigmatic command "not to make use of secular persons and officials so that he dishonors this dignity" may be an allusion to the charistike or some other external management program.

[B11] Acknowledgement of patrons. See also [C1] and [C3] below.

[B12] Preservation of the Testament. See similar treatment in [A11] above, with cross-references to other documents.

3. Third Testament [C]

[C1] Acknowledgement of patrons. See also [B11] above and [C3] below.

[C2] List of dependencies. Eight dependencies are listed here; see also the longer list in [B2] above.

[C3] Acknowledgement of patronage of the dependencies; prayers for benefactors. See also [B11] and [C1] above.

[C4] Curse against anyone harming the dependencies or halting prayers for benefactors.

[C5] Commendation of the superior to the count.

26. Luke of Messina: Typikon of Luke for the Monastery of Christ Savior (San Salvatore) in Messina

Date: May 1131–July 1132¹

Translator: Timothy Miller

Edition employed: J. Cozza-Luzi, Novum patrum bibliotheca, vol. 10, pt. 2 (Rome, 1905), pp. 117–37, with text at 121–30.

Manuscript: Codex Messinensis graecus 115 (autograph Ms. ?)²

Other translations: Latin, by Cozza-Luzi, NPB 10.2, pp. 121–30.

Institutional History

A. Foundation by Roger II, King of Sicily (1130–54)

The monastery of the Holy Savior or San Salvatore dell’Acroterio was from its origins a royal foundation. The Norman King of Sicily, Roger II, chose the site for it on a tongue of land in the harbor of Messina where his father Roger I had taken the city from the Muslims in 1061.³ A note in the liturgical typikon drawn up subsequently for the foundation records the commencement of construction in 1122, which continued for ten years until July 1132.⁴ Thus the work had long been underway before Roger II sought to persuade Bartholomew of Simeri, superior of the monastery of the Mother of God the “New Hodegetria” at Rossano in Calabria, to assume the direction of the monastery sometime before the holy man’s death in 1130.⁵ Bartholomew persuaded the king to accept his disciple Luke instead, the author of our document.

B. Role of Luke of Messina

A little before 1130, Luke arrived in Messina with a dozen other monks and a package of basic artifacts from Rossano for setting up a monastery, including sacred vessels and service books. In the document below, Luke notes [2] that on his arrival the monastery was not yet ready for use and there were no monks present at the facility. Arranz (“Typicon,” p. xxi) reckons that Roger II’s diploma, which dates to May 1131 and which gives legal recognition to the foundation,⁶ must predate the composition of our document. The latter is preserved as an introduction to the foundation’s liturgical typikon, Codex Messinensis graecus 115, now in the library of the University of Messina, which Arranz believed was Luke’s autograph copy. Leroy (“Date,” p. 44, etc.) cast doubt on this proposition, however, citing among other arguments errors of orthography that the reportedly highly learned Luke was unlikely to have made himself. In any event, the manuscript remained in use at San Salvatore until late in the sixteenth century, and was copied by several other surviving manuscripts.⁷

C. Establishment of the Archimandritical Authority

In the document below, Luke mentions [3] a disappointing tour of Greek Sicilian monasteries he undertook after his arrival at San Salvatore. It is likely that Roger II had already determined to subordinate a large number of these deficient foundations to San Salvatore, an idea that was actually carried out in February 1133, when he established an archimandritical authority at the royal monastery, with Luke as the first incumbent.⁸ The king cleared the way by getting Hugh, the Latin bishop of Messina, to cede his jurisdiction over some thirty Greek monasteries in his diocese in favor of the new archimandrite in 1131.⁹ Eighteen small Sicilian monasteries and four Calabrian ones were directly subordinated to San Salvatore as formal dependencies, while thirteen larger Sicilian monasteries, including St. Philip of Fragala, and three Calabrian ones were joined to it as kephalika (capital) and autodespota (independent) institutions.¹⁰ These latter, however, were hardly what contemporary Byzantine monastic reformers would have considered “independent” monasteries, since they were subordinated to the disciplinary and economic control of the archimandritical monastery. Also, though this second group of monasteries continued to have their own superiors, as our document indicates [11] ff. below, the archimandrite had a determinative role in the choice. The dependent monasteries in the first group were administered through stewards stationed in the individual facilities.

Roger II bolstered San Salvatore’s position with important economic concessions and grants of valuable properties.¹¹ The prestige of San Salvatore and the political connections of the archimandrite likely served to protect the subordinate monasteries from rapacious barons and overzealous royal officials. Von Falkenhausen (“Patrimonio,” p. 785) reckons the success of the archimandritical authority by noting that of the thirteen so-called independent monasteries listed in Roger II’s diploma of 1133, eleven still existed more than two hundred years later in 1336, long after Norman rule over Sicily had itself disappeared.

D. Witness to the Lost Disciplinary (Founder’s) Typikon

The numerous disciplinary lapses Luke discovered in the Greek monasteries he toured at the beginning of his superiorship apparently led in 1133 to the issuance of a disciplinary typikon meant to reform these institutions. The original Greek text of this typikon is now lost though there is a translation (not included in our collection of monastic foundation documents) in an Italo-Calabrian dialect transliterated in Greek characters composed by Francesco Vucisano in 1571.¹² This curious manuscript, evidently employed for the Calabrian monastery of St. Bartholomew of Trigona (located near Sinopoli), also contains a translation of San Salvatore’s liturgical typikon. This rule is composed of two sets of canons, the first of thirty-three and the second of ten, which treat of such matters as the duties of the superior, requirements for entrance into religious life and promotion to holy orders, monastic officials, aspects of the cenobitic regime, monastic virtues, and the liturgy.¹³ This typikon is to be distinguished from the so-called typikon of Patir or of Bartholomew of Semeri, a genuine but unpublished Greek founder’s typikon of 1130–50 (also not included in our collection) last reported to be in the library of the University of Jena in Germany.¹⁴

26. LUKE OF MESSINA

E. Subsequent History of the Foundation in Medieval Times

Luke of Messina died in 1149, and was succeeded as superior and archimandrite by a successor of the same name, who also enjoyed close relations with Roger II.¹⁵ Even after the end of the Norman dynasty, San Salvatore remained prosperous for a time, being a principal lender to Gualtiero of Paleraria, chancellor of Frederick II (1198–1250) in the early years of the thirteenth century.¹⁶ Frederick II's mother Constance, daughter of Roger II, recalled San Salvatore's role in the reorganization and rejuvenation of many "nearly deserted" Greek monasteries.¹⁷ During Frederick II's minority, Pope Innocent III (1198–1216) took San Salvatore under papal protection in 1216.¹⁸ The monks, who had frequently sought papal assistance in years past during quarrels with the local archbishops of Messina, found themselves under papal censure from 1222 to 1235 during the pontificates of Honorius III (1216–27) and Gregory IX (1227–41).

The wars between the Angevins and the Aragonese towards the end of the thirteenth century devastated eastern Sicily and southern Calabria where most of the monastery's endowed properties were located.¹⁹ This seems to have initiated the monastery's slow decline that continued down to early modern times, though in the first decade of the fourteenth century there were still a greater number of Greek than Latin rite monasteries in the diocese of Messina.

F. Confiscation of the Monastery and Attempted Suppression

The Holy Roman Emperor Charles V (1516–56), acting in his capacity as ruler of Sicily, confiscated the monastery of San Salvatore, either in 1540 (Rossi, "Prefazione," p. 74) or in 1546 (Arranz, Typicon, p. xxvii), in order to erect a fortress on its strategic site in the harbor of Messina. A subsequent explosion of a powder magazine at the fortress destroyed all trace of the twelfth-century monastery. After a long delay, the monks were relocated in 1573 to a permanent home in a new monastery built in the baroque style in the Charibdis neighborhood of the city.

Philip II (1556–90), ruler of Sicily like his father, proposed the complete suppression of the Greek monasteries in his dominions, but was successfully opposed by Pope Gregory XIII (1572–85). Instead, in 1579 the pope reorganized what was known as the "Basilian Congregation" of Italy into three provinces, one of which was headquartered in Messina.²⁰ A few years later under his successor Pope Sixtus V (1585–90), San Salvatore was ordered to adopt the liturgical typikon of the mainland Basilian monastery of Grottaferrata. A copy of this typikon was duly prepared and completed in 1583; from a note in an older liturgical typikon at San Salvatore, it appears that the Grottaferrata typikon was instituted in 1587.²¹ The original liturgical typikon, though no longer in use, was still preserved at the monastery when it was examined by the superior Romano Vassali in 1656.²²

G. Fate of the Foundation in Modern Times

The monastic community at San Salvatore was legally suppressed in 1866, along with all the other Basilian monasteries of Italy.²³ The baroque monastery was one of the many old buildings destroyed when an earthquake devastated Messina in 1908. The Basilian community was never reconstituted, but another church in the city now bears the name of San Salvatore, while the archbishop preserves the title of archimandrite long borne by the monastery's superior.²⁴ The Museo Regionale is located on the site of the baroque monastery.²⁵

Analysis

A. Typology of the Document

As noted above, (26) Luke of Messina serves as a preface (here called a discourse—diegesis) [4] to the foundation's liturgical typikon. This present document, like (25) Fragala's Third Testament [C], addresses itself principally to the regulation of the foundation's dependencies. It presumes the existence of the archimandritical authority which, even if it was not formally established by Roger II until February 1133, is nevertheless the subject of some of Luke's regulations here. There is also an allusion to the lost founder's typikon, which was to be read [4] annually at an assembly at San Salvatore on the patronal feast of the Transfiguration.

B. Model Typika

(26) Luke of Messina is particularly valuable for the information it provides [10] on the sources for the composition of both the liturgical and the lost founder's typika and on the processes employed in their development. Cognizant of the need to leave his monks rules for their "physical and spiritual way of life," the author asserts [10] that he has made use of existing typika, including those of Stoudios, the Holy Mountain (i.e., Mount Athos), and Jerusalem. Most likely these are (4) Stoudios, (11) Ath. Rule, and the liturgical typikon of (42) Sabas. He also claims to have framed some rules of his own to regulate liturgical services and aspects of the cenobitic life. These precepts the author transmitted verbally to his monks until the time came for the composition of the founder's typikon "so that the rules which have been established might not be swept away and handed over to oblivion in times to come."

C. Lives of the Monks

For the regulatory content of this document, the author does indeed look back [3] to Studite and earlier precedents to prohibit spiritual brotherhoods, any unnecessary relations with women, and journeys outside the monastery (cf. (3) Theodore Studites [8], [10], [15]). Some more contemporary concerns appear, too, such as a ban on idiorhythmic practices (cf. (33) Heliou Bomon [26]). The prohibition on eating meat and the ban on the retention of private property (pekoulia) after admission are shared with (25) Fragala [B4], [B9]. The prohibition on secret eating was also a concern of typika written for monasteries in the monastic reform tradition, like (27) Kecharitomene [49]. The importance placed on confession, good order, and humility suggests other possible links to the monastic reform movement in Byzantium proper. Indeed, the author of this document shows [5] an unusually forthright awareness of his role as a reformer, even using the term "reformation" (diorthosis).

The author cites [5] qualifications for his monks that clearly have their liturgical responsibilities foremost in mind. He also expects [6] the foundation to be staffed with other monks who would take care of physical needs, practice crafts, serve as scribes and calligraphers, and be versed in sacred and profane literature. As in (25) Fragala [B8], the desirability of the growth of the community is taken [7], [9] for granted. The library donated to the foundation presumed a large group of literate monks; by contrast, Gregory, the author of (25) Fragala, seems himself to have been illiterate. There were also lay domestic servants [8] and field laborers [9] associated with this foundation.

26. LUKE OF MESSINA

D. Constitutional Matters

1. Source of Authority

Much more so than Gregory, the author of (25) Fragala, who sought to preserve some institutional autonomy in spite of his foundation's dependence on royal philanthropy, Luke of Messina was acting [1] forthrightly as an instrument of royal patronage. It was at the orders of the Norman King Roger II that he carried out [3] the reconstitution of several monasteries previously in "considerable disorder" (probably practicing idiorhythmic monasticism), and issued [10] the founder's typikon.

2. Procedures for the Election of Superiors in Dependent Monasteries

The author provides for control of the dependencies by the head monastery through a unique set of regulations for the election of their superiors. After the funeral service for a departed superior, two of the leading monks (perhaps the steward and another financial official) were sent out [11] from the head monastery to examine the dependency's books, probably to check on any irregularities. The monks in the dependency were then allowed to nominate three candidates for superior; at least one of these had to be a monk then resident at the head monastery. The final choice [12] was up to the archimandrite of the head institution "with the common consent and deliberation of all." The archimandrite was also responsible [13] for the ordination of the new superior.

3. Patronal Privileges

As in (27) Kecharitomene [17]), there were [3], [8] rooms set aside for official visitors known as archontarikia where presumably the Norman king or his representatives were entitled to stay.

E. Financial Matters

According to the author, Roger II provided [3] endowments for the clergy in each of the dependent monasteries for the performance of hymnody and funds for the illumination of the churches.²⁶ The royal funding mechanism gave this foundation a much more liturgically oriented mission than that seen in (25) Fragala. The agricultural properties that formed the endowments included [9] olive groves, vineyards, vegetable gardens, granaries and housing for the field laborers.

F. External Relations

This foundation sponsored [3], [8] both hospitals (nosokomeia) and hospices (xenodocheia). The importance placed on institutional philanthropic activities is another link to the contemporary Byzantine monastic reform movement. The main monastery of San Salvatore was enclosed by a wall, as in (29) Kosmosoteira [101], within which were to be found [8] the philanthropic institutions, the royal guest quarters, a bakery, a mill, and housing for the domestics.

TWELFTH CENTURY

Notes on the Introduction

1. As proposed by Arranz, Typicon, p. xxi; the publication of Roger II's unedited diplomas in Vaticanus latinus 8201 might help make the dating less problematic.
2. Leroy, "Date," p. 54, disagreed, and argued for a date in the second half of the thirteenth century.
3. Arranz, Typicon, p. xix.
4. Arranz, Typicon, p. xx.
5. For Bartholomew of Simeri, see Vera von Falkenhausen, "Patir," ODB, p. 1596; his Vita is edited in Acta Sanctorum, vol. 3, September, p. 810 ff. (= Halkin, BHG 235).
6. The Greek text found in Vaticanus latinus 8201, fol. 128, is unedited; see Arranz, Typicon, p. xxi.
7. See Arranz, Typicon, p. xi and Pertusi, "Rapporti," pp. 484–85.
8. The Greek text, Vaticanus latinus 8201, fols. 56–59, 130–32 is unedited; R. Pirri, Sicilia Sacra, 3rd ed., vol. 2 (Palermo, 1733), published a fifteenth-century Latin translation, pp. 974–76; see discussion in von Falkenhausen, "Patrimonio," pp. 785–86.
9. Arranz, Typicon, p. xxii.
10. Von Falkenhausen, "Patrimonio," p. 782.
11. Concessions are to be found in Codex Vaticanus latinus 8201, fols. 59, 64–66, 67–69, 73–75, 77–78, 79–81, 96, 107–9, 128 ff., 132, 135 ff., 137 ff., 145, 148–53, 156, 189–91, with some found in Latin translation in Pirri, Sicilia Sacra, vol. 2, p. 972 ff.; von Falkenhausen, "Patrimonio," p. 783, has a summary.
12. Ed. Mercati, "Trigona," see discussion in Beck, KTL, p. 648, Leroy, "Date," p. 12, with n. 15, Minisci, "Riflessi studitani," pp. 227–28, Turyn, Greek Manuscripts, p. xv, and Volk, Gesundheitswesen, pp. 133–34. The manuscript is now in the Istituto Siciliano di Studi Bizantini e Neoellenici in Palermo.
13. Summary in Scaduto, Monachesimo Basiliano, pp. 198–209.
14. Jenensis Bibliotheca universitatis graecus G.B. q. 6a; there is also a copy in the Grottaferrata library, Cryptensis 401. See discussion by Arranz, Typicon, p. xi, Minisci, "Riflessi," p. 228, and Pertusi, "Rapporti," p. 483.
15. Scaduto, Monachesimo Basiliano, p. 192; von Falkenhausen, "Patrimonio," p. 784.
16. Von Falkenhausen, "Patrimonio," p. 785.
17. L. T. White, Latin Monasticism in Norman Sicily (Cambridge, Mass., 1938), p. 45.
18. Arranz, Typicon, p. xxvi.
19. Von Falkenhausen, "Patrimonio," p. 789.
20. Minisci, "Monaci basiliani," p. 82.
21. Arranz, Typicon, p. xxvii.
22. Arranz, Typicon, p. xxvi.
23. Minisci, "Monaci basiliani," p. 88.
24. Arranz, Typicon, p. xxvii.
25. Alexander Kazhdan and Dale Kinney, "Messina," ODB p. 1351.
26. Photaugeia; cf. the photapsiai, imperial dedications for the illumination of churches found in middle Byzantine sources like Basil II, Peri ton dynaton (JGR 3.314) as well as in the contemporary (28) Pantokrator [7], [29], [34].

Bibliography

- Arranz, Miguel, Le typicon du monastère du Saint-Sauveur à Messine, Codex Messinensis gr 115, A.D. 1131 (= OCA 185) (Rome, 1969). Critical edition of the monastery's liturgical typikon.
- Beck, Hans-Georg, Kirche und theologische Literatur im byzantinischen Reich (Munich, 1959), p. 648.
- Falkenhausen, Vera von, "Patrimonio e politica patrimoniale dei monasteri greci nella Sicilia normanno-sveva," in Basilio di Cesarea. La sua età, la sua opere e il basilianesimo in Sicilia, vol. 2 (Messina, 1983), pp. 777–90.
- Giunta, F., "Il monachesimo basiliano nella Sicilia normanna," in Basilio di Cesarea. La sua età, la sua opere e il basilianesimo in Sicilia, vol. 2 (Messina, 1983), pp. 709–31.

26. LUKE OF MESSINA

- Guillou, André, “Grecs d’Italie du sud et de Sicilie au moyen âge: Les moines,” MAH 75 (1963), 79–110.
- Leroy, Julien, “La date du typicon de Messine et de ses manuscrits,” BBGG, n.s., 24 (1970), 39–55.
- Matranga, F., Il monasterio dei greci del S. Salvatore dell’ Acroterio di Messina e S. Luca primo archimandrita auctore del cartofilacio o sia della Raccolta dei codici greci di quel monastero (Messina, 1887).
- Mercati, S. G., “Sul tipicon del monastero di S. Bartolomeo di Trigona tradotto in italo-calabrese in trascrizione greca da Francesco Vucisano,” ASCL 8 (1938), 197–223; reprinted in the author’s Collectanea Byzantina, vol. 2 (Bari, 1970), 372–94. An edition of a rule derived from the lost founder’s typikon.
- Minisci, Teodoro, “I monaci basiliani in Sicilia e in Albania,” BBGG, n.s., 11 (1957), 73–89.
- , “Riflessi studianti nel monachesimo italo-greco,” OCA 153 (1958), 215–33, esp. 220–21, 227.
- Pertusi, Agostino, “Rapporti tra il monachesimo italo-greco ed il monachesimo bizantino nell’alto medio evo,” in La chiesa greca in Italia dall’ VIII al XVI secolo, vol. 2 (Padua, 1972), pp. 484–85.
- Rossi, Salvatore, “La Prefazione al ‘Typicon’ del monastero del SS. Salvatore da Luca primo Archimandrita,” Atti della Reale Accademia Peloritana 17 (1902), 71–84. Editio princeps of the document.
- Rougeris, Petros, “Ricerca bibliografica sui ‘Typika’ italogreci,” BBGG, n.s., 27 (1973), 11–42, esp. 13.
- Scaduto, Mario, Il monachismo Basiliano nella Sicilia medievale (Rome, 1947), esp. pp. 192–213.
- Scordino, A., “I còliva nel tipicòn di Messina,” SM 3 (1970), 271–75.
- Turyn, Alexander, Dated Greek Manuscripts of the Thirteenth and Fourteenth Centuries in the Libraries of Italy, vol. 1 (Urbana, 1972), pp. 3–4. An analysis of Codex Messinensis graecus 159, a copy of Messinensis graecus 115 dated to 1210/11.
- Volk, Robert, Gesundheitswesen und Wohltätigkeit im Spiegel der byzantinischen Klostertypika (Munich, 1983), pp. 132–34.

Translation

Concerning the Typikon of the monastery in Messina: The introduction of our holy father Luke, the first archimandrite.

1. . . .¹ on the one hand, we have sought after the patristic commands and the suggestions of that blessed man—if one can call this person a man and not remember him with some more noble term as someone who lived beyond [the strength of] a man. On the other hand, taking measure of ourselves, we reckoned that such a task was beyond our strength and at first hesitated before the order and delayed on account of a praiseworthy timidity. The ruler [Roger II], however, became all the more vehement and forceful in stirring us on. Both with the promise of honors and also with threats, he forced us to bend to the yoke of this work dear to God. We observed such resolution on the part of the ruler, and in fact feared lest we offend both God and the king himself. For we reckoned that we were not totally without God’s [blessing] when we entered upon such work which is pleasing to him. If indeed it is as [the scripture] has said, “The heart of the king is anchored in the omnipotent hand” (cf. Prov. 21:1), we know how great is the risk of offending both God and the king. Often weighing these many things in our thoughts, [p. 122] we finally took all our [concerns] and handed them over to the Spirit who guides and governs all things, and the will of God was victorious.

TWELFTH CENTURY

2. Therefore, we assumed this spiritual authority willingly, but as someone said “with an unwilling heart”² we came to the aforementioned sacred church of the Savior. It was not yet ready for use, but was also totally destitute of monks. We did not give way to delay in doing this work which pleases God so that days ran past, nor did we postpone it from day to day, but we immediately exerted ourselves in this project with our whole being. Then, pursuing the matters proper to beginning, we first toured all of Sicily and Calabria and visited the sacred monasteries. But what sort of people we met at that time and how the majority of monks ordered their life—not to say all of them—knowledgeable men know. Moreover, why is it necessary for us to explain each matter by itself and confuse our account?

3. Through the assistance of Christ, my God and Savior, through the intercession of the Mother of God, and through the good fortune of the most fortunate prince, the monasteries won a proper constitution in place of considerable disorder. Sufficient clergy were established in each monastic house [p. 123] who must always persevere in the sacred hymns, and those who have chosen this life of renunciation have been required to obey the men set over them. The illumination necessary for the sacred churches has become a matter of law. The consumption of meat has been totally banned from the sacred dwellings. Promiscuity among the monks has been utterly rejected; so too a disorderly way of life and social contact with anyone who happens by. Forbidden, too, are adoptions of lay brothers, holding conversations with women, and forming spiritual relationships with them.³ Also forbidden are frequent meetings with nuns and journeys [away from the monastery]. Idiorhythmic practices and eating alone in secret, and in addition to these anything which is called private property or resembles such a thing were completely banned since they destroy the law of the cenobitic constitution. For these are the tares of the enemy who sows secretly in the most pure and pearl-like grain of [our] vocation the filthy and unfruitful harvest of his own malice (cf. Matt. 13:24–30). In their place, confession and good order as well as obedience and humility have been introduced, together with hospitals, hospices, and what are called rooms for official visitors.⁴

4. So that we do not recount everything word by word and stretch out this discourse to greater length, [we note that] anyone who wishes can find all of this written down in chapters⁵ dealing with regulations and given over to the superiors of the most pious houses to keep on record and to serve as a reminder. It has been ordained that every year these rules [p. 124] be read out for all the monks to hear at the assembly held in our illustrious monastery of the Savior on the universal feast of the Transfiguration of the Word [August 6], God made man.

5. With God’s help, I declare that the affairs of these sacred monastic houses and ascetic communities have experienced significant reform and are doing well. Moreover, I pray that the holy flock of God be preserved by him for ever in a higher state worthy of God and that it be led by the Great Shepherd. As for the illustrious, sacred, and august monastery of the Savior, it was established as follows: First, we were eager to assemble God-loving men who held the fear of God before their eyes, primarily men who have some experience of sacred things, are initiated in the inspired scripture, and have been trained in the discipline of Church melodies so that, striking the spiritual lyre of the Hebrews, they make those who sing the sacred praises more steadfast and they themselves pursue their music more eagerly. For mixing the pleasure of music with the sacred hymns makes the ascetic more zealous in singing and praying to God. So, too, whenever the experienced among the physicians offer some unpleasant medicines to the sick, at that moment they coat the cup with honey. [p. 125]

26. LUKE OF MESSINA

6. In addition to these, we introduced others who could perform necessary and useful service for the physical well-being of the monks and also many trained in diverse crafts; then, scribes and calligraphers, and teachers of our sacred books who were sufficiently trained in profane literature. We collected many beautiful books pertaining to our own sacred writings, totally familiar to us, as well as [other books] not pertaining to our sacred writings. We collected the compositions of [St. John] Chrysostom, of the great father Basil, of Gregory the very great Theologian, and of his namesake [Gregory] of Nyssa, and of the other fathers and teachers inspired by God. We collected other compositions and works of ascetic writers, both the simple ones and also the more advanced, as well as historical works and other treatises from the outer and alien courtyard, works such as strive after the sacred knowledge. Other books [we obtained] which teach us about the lives of the fathers and contain the paraphrases⁶ which that most wise Symeon [Metaphrastes] the Logothete composed while moved by the most sacred Spirit. Moreover, we have adorned and beautified this church with the most venerable relics of the great saints and with their sacred images to make it a holy and dignified place. [p. 126]

7. After having assembled such men in such numbers with God's help and after having trained them sufficiently and shorn their worldly locks, we planted them with our own hands, like some sacred shoots in this spiritual paradise of Christ. Then, we most frequently irrigated with the sweet and most fresh springs of the sacred commands and teachings, while God brought the increase. We trusted that the Good Farmer would bring the increase and raise the monks to the summit of spiritual manhood.

8. In addition to these things, we marked out another court beyond this divine court and sacred fold [of the flock] shepherded by God and we encircled this [second] court with a wall. Here, we constructed a hospital and a hospice as well as the facilities for official visitors, granaries, an area to make bread—both a bakery and a mill and cells sufficient to house the lay servants.

9. In addition to these things [we set up] olive groves and vineyards, vegetable gardens, and very large houses in the fields to receive the fruits of the harvest time and to serve as quarters for those laboring out there. In some places, too, we restored churches or planted [new ones]. [p. 127]

To put it simply, from the beginning and throughout we have not rested in our efforts to increase the flock of Christ, and we have brought about every physical and spiritual refreshment for the monks in order that they will have no excuse to interrupt or hinder their ascetic exercises and their inclination toward only the better things. Moreover, we were never seen to have given our eyes over to sleep and our eyelids to drowsiness, since we were frightened lest some wild mule suddenly run out of the forest and tear the flock of Christ asunder and probably ruin it.

TWELFTH CENTURY

Whoever hears what has been said and fairly examines it, let him glance all about and behold our flock [following] after Christ and [living] with him. In this flock, then, let him glorify the name of the heavenly father, and know from now on that he was not false who said: “For every one who asks, receives, and he who seeks finds, and to him who knocks it will be opened” (Matt. 7:8; Luke 11:10).

10. So much for this. Nevertheless, since time is always flowing and is unstable, all affairs of a temporal nature are swept up and moved by its ceaseless flow. They are gradually reduced by time and covered by the deep weavings of forgetfulness. For time flows on relentlessly, and anything good that may have happened or happens in it flows with it so that whatever was seems never to have existed. On account of this we knew that for the benefit of those who come after us we had to clarify the rules regarding the physical and spiritual [p. 128] way of life for the monks and their organization by means of some written constitution or composition. From the first, we have collected some of these rules from many different typika: that of the monastery of Stoudios, of the Holy Mountain, of Jerusalem,⁷ and of several others. Other rules we have carefully framed ourselves. These dealt with every ecclesiastical service in the sacred church, with [the rules] in the brothers' cells, with eating and drinking in the refectory, and simply, with every other administrative matter. We taught all this and passed it on in unwritten form. Then, in conformity with this unwritten tradition, we issued the clauses of this present typikon in written form as has been said both so that the rules which have been established might not be swept away and handed over to oblivion in times to come and so that we might obey the royal decree as we said earlier.

11. It is necessary at this point to state precisely how superiors are chosen. When any one of the superiors of the dependent monasteries dies, any two of the brothers there are to go and report [p. 129] the death of their father to the archimandrite. They are to bring along the superior's donkey with its saddle. Immediately, the wooden semantron is struck. When all the brothers are assembled, [the community] performs the customary trisagion and prayer for those who have fallen asleep. After this, two of the leading brothers from here are sent to the monastery in question with written documents of the archimandrite. They are to record in detail all the effects of that monastery, both internal and external. They are to counsel the brothers there and strengthen them in the fear of God so that each one performs the ministry entrusted to him without hesitation. They are also to tell them to make their nomination for their leader. If any two are found [suitable] in that house, then one [candidate is added] from this great monastery. If two are not found, then it is the other way around, with two candidates from here and one from there. When this is finished, those [sent out from here] are to return to the monastery. When the monks at the subject monastery make their written nominations in the manner described, they come [to this monastery] and request that the archimandrite establish one of those nominated to be their superior most dear to God. [p. 130]

12. For his part, the archimandrite examines well these names, and carrying out everything canonically with the common consent and deliberation of all, he chooses one as God directs and sets him up as superior. All the others shout out the customary salutation, “Worthy, worthy.”⁸

26. LUKE OF MESSINA

13. After this takes place, the man chosen proceeds to his installation in the presence of the monks who elected him. After the deacon says, “Let us beseech the Lord,” the archimandrite places his hand on the man’s head and says the prayers for installing superiors. The archimandrite then removes the candidate’s old pallium and places another on him.⁹ When this new superior has taken the customary oath to the Church, the archimandrite embraces him and then dismisses [all] in peace.

Notes on the Translation

Editors’ note: The assistance of our translator, Timothy Miller [TM], is gratefully acknowledged for the notes to this document.

1. One or two folios are missing at the beginning of the manuscript; see Arranz, Typicon, p. xiv.
2. Iliad 4:43.
3. Apparently an allusion to (3) Theodore Studites [8], [9], [15].
4. Archontarikia; derived from archontareion, a hall in the imperial palace where the emperors received officers of the tagmata and of the themes. In this passage it refers to separate hostels which monasteries maintained for noble guests; cf. (27) Kecharitomene [17]. [TM]
5. A reference to the lost founder’s typikon; cf. Institutional History, D.
6. A reference to the Menologium of Symeon Metaphrastes (10th c.), a vast hagiographic compendium, ed. PG 114–16.
7. Probably (4) Stoudios, (11) Ath. Rule, and the liturgical typikon of the Sabas monastery are intended here; cf. (20) Black Mountain [23].
8. The acclamation is found also in (22) Evergetis [13], (27) Kecharitomene [11], and (29) Kosmosoteira [33].
9. In this passage “pallium” does not refer to the omophorion, the scarf worn by Eastern bishops at the divine liturgy and often equated with the Latin pallium, but rather the monastic cloak; see Lampe, s.v. pallium. [TM]

Document Notes

- [1] Roger II’s recruitment of the author. For the background to Luke’s selection, see above, Institutional History, A; see also discussions of other patronal relationships in (13) Ath. Typikon [2] ff.; (23) Pakourianos [30]; (24) Christodoulos [A6], [A9]; and (25) Fragala [A2], [B2].
- [2] Inspection tour of Sicilian and Calabrian monasteries. This led to the issuance of the disciplinary typikon summarized below in [3]; see discussion above in Institutional History, D.
- [3] Overview of disciplinary regulations. Those listed here show a strong Studite influence; cf. (3) Theodore Studites [8], [9], [15]. Along with (4) Stoudios and Theodore the Studite’s Small Catecheses, the Studite Testament enjoyed a wide circulation at this time in Southern Italy and Sicily; see J. Leroy, “Les Petites Catéchèses de S. Théodore Studite,” Le Muséon 71 (1958), p. 337, n. 37, cf. Arranz, Typicon, p. xii. For the prohibition on secret eating in contemporary documents, see (27) Kecharitomene [49], (32) Mamas [20], and (33) Heliou Bomon [20]. The prohibition on eating meat is found only in (25) Fragala [B4].
- [4] Reference to the disciplinary typikon; provision for annual reading. See above, Institutional History, D, for the discussion of a sixteenth-century witness to this lost document. For provisions for reading of the typikon, generally at meal times, in contemporary documents, see (27) Kecharitomene [65], (29) Kosmosoteira [59], (30) Phoberos [59], (32) Mamas [16], and (33) Heliou Bomon [16]; earlier, (11) Ath. Rule [37] has a provision, as here, for a reading in assembly.
- [5] Qualifications of the monks. With a view to the performance of liturgical services, there is, as in (29) Kosmosoteira [3], a preference for educated monks. Arranz, Typicon, pp. xxxiv–l, summarizes the liturgical responsibilities of the monks based on the liturgical typikon.

TWELFTH CENTURY

- [6] Craftsmen monks; books; relics. For the library of San Salvatore during Luke's superiorship, see Arranz, Typicon, pp. xxx–xxxii.
- [7] Selection, tonsure, and training of the monks. For the gardening analogy, see (31) Areia [M2]. Note the same expectation of increase in [9] below and in (25) Fragala [B8].
- [8] Auxiliary buildings of the monastery. These are also found in the closely related founder's typikon of St. Bartholomew of Trigona, ed. Mercati, "Trigona," in Collectanea, p. 390, cf. 394. For provisions for philanthropic institutions in contemporary documents, see (28) Pantokrator [36] ff, [58] ff., [63], and (29) Kosmosoteira [70]; (27) Kecharitomene [17] also features archontarikia. Contemporary enclosure walls are also found in (27) Kecharitomene [73], [74], and in (29) Kosmosoteira [86]
- [9] Agricultural properties; foundation and restoration of churches. See similar contemporary descriptions of endowment properties in (25) Fragala [B3], (27) Kecharitomene [Appendix A], and (28) Pantokrator [65]. For San Salvatore's role in the restoration of churches, see above, Institutional History, E.
- [10] Sources of the liturgical typikon. The sources identified are also those chosen by the author of (20) Black Mountain [23].
- [11] Procedure for electing a new superior in a dependent monastery. These procedures also set down in the lost founder's typikon and in Roger II's legislation for the archimandritical authority; see Scaduto, Monachesimo Basiliano, p. 199.
- [12] Final choice by the archimandrite. The archimandrite here actively fulfills the role in elections passively conceded to the lot in (27) Kecharitomene [11]; cf. (32) Mamas [1] and (33) Heliou Bomon [1].
- [13] Installation ceremony for a new superior. See also installation ceremonies for officials in (22) Evergetis [13]; (27) Kecharitomene [11]; (28) Pantokrator [25]; (29) Kosmosoteira [33], [34]; and (34) Machairas [81].

27. Kecharitomene: Typikon of Empress Irene Doukaina Komnene for the Convent of the Mother of God Kecharitomene in Constantinople

Date: 1110–16¹

Translator: Robert Jordan

Edition employed: Paul Gautier, “Le typikon de la Théotokos Kécharitôméné,” REB 43 (1985), 5–165, at 19–155.

Manuscript: Parisinus graecus 384 (autograph)²

Other translations: French, by Paul Gautier, REB 43 (1985), 18–148; Latin, by B. Montfaucon, Anecdota graeca (Paris, 1688), pp. 129–298, reprinted in PG 127, cols. 985–1128.

Institutional History

A. Foundation under Irene Doukaina Komnene

The convent of the Mother of God Kecharitomene, “Full of Grace,” was founded joined with a male monastery dedicated to Christ Philanthropos by the Empress Irene Doukaina Komnene,³ wife of Alexios I Komnenos (1081–1118), probably in the early years of the twelfth century. The first reference to either foundation is in a colophon of a manuscript in the Esphigmenou monastery on Mount Athos, which mentions a certain Sophronios as superior of the Philanthropos monastery in 1107.⁴ The convent was built adjacent to the monastery; both were located towards the north-western corner of Constantinople in the Deuteron neighborhood,⁵ not far from the future site of the Pantokrator monastery which was to be founded a generation later by the founder’s son Emperor John II Komnenos (1118–43).

B. Subsequent History

According to the typikon, Patriarch Nicholas III Grammatikos (1084–1111) donated [70] a patriarchal convent to Kecharitomene that was intended to serve as the convent’s mortuary chapel. The typikon itself seems on internal evidence to date from 1110–16. It is clear that Irene’s husband the Emperor Alexios was still alive at the time that it was written. After his death in 1118, it is generally assumed that Irene retired to Kecharitomene where she died on February 19, probably in the year 1123, though 1133 has also been proposed.⁶ Her daughter, the famous historian Anna Komnene,⁷ also retired here after the death of her own husband Nikephoros Bryennios ca. 1136–37. After 1148 Anna wrote her history, the Alexiad, at the convent. She apparently died here ca. 1153/54, becoming a nun only on her deathbed.

Little else is known of the convent subsequently, but either its typikon or, more likely, the lost typikon of its companion foundation Philanthropos was a source for (32) Mamas in 1158, which itself was the model for (33) Heliou Bomon in 1161/62. Then, much later, in the first half of the fourteenth century, the surviving fragments of (47) Philanthropos, written for a Constantinopolitan convent, appear to use (27) Kecharitomene or some other text related to or derived from it. (39) Lips, an earlier document, also suggests some acquaintance with (27) Kecharitomene. The convent was still in existence in Palaiologan times, for both Stephen of Novgorod, who visited Constantinople in 1348 or 1349, and the Russian deacon Zosima, who visited in 1419–22, mention it in connection with the relics of St. John Damascene, which are independently reported to have been present in an unnamed Constantinopolitan convent after 1261.⁸ No remains of the convent have been identified in modern Istanbul.

TWELFTH CENTURY

Analysis

That the Empress Irene should have been the author of this document, a typikon heavily influenced by the monastic reform movement, is certainly a testimony to the extent of the ideological victory that the reformers had achieved by the close of the eleventh century, for her husband Emperor Alexios Komnenos had once been in the forefront of their opponents. This is not to say that the empress betrays no traces here of behavioral patterns of more traditional patronage. She insists [4] on preferential admissions and special treatment for her relatives and other nobly-born ladies seeking admission to the convent, and, in an initiative that would have met with the disapproval of reformers of the eleventh century (though not some later ones), she imposes [3] a lay protectress on the foundation despite its independent and self-governing status. Yet in other important ways, particularly in the elaborate precautions taken against financial misconduct by the foundation's officials, the empress' typikon shows an actual intensification of concerns advanced by reformers like Leo of Chalcedon and John of Antioch in the early years of her reign.

A. Utility for History of the Reform Movement

Through careful examination of its relationships to other documents, (27) Kecharitomene yields important information on the history of the second generation of the reform movement that was active after the compilation of (22) Evergetis.

1. Analytic Groups of (27) Kecharitomene's Chapters⁹

This document is itself an indubitable part of the Evergetian reform tradition, not just ideologically, but textually, for, like the contemporary (30) Phoberos (an independent but even closer copy), (27) Kecharitomene is heavily influenced by the content and also the wording of (22) Evergetis.¹⁰ Even so, thirty-nine of this document's eighty chapters are entirely new (Group A).¹¹ Of these, twenty-six treat material for which there are no equivalent chapters in (22) Evergetis (Subgroup A.1).¹² Another thirteen chapters have equivalent, but different chapters in (22) Evergetis (Subgroup A.2).¹³ These last treat subjects of common interest to the authors of these two documents, but without any textual linkage. There are, however, twenty-eight chapters of (27) Kecharitomene in which there is textual linkage with (22) Evergetis. Of these, twenty-one are also linked textually to a later document, (32) Mamas (Group B),¹⁴ while seven are not (Group C).¹⁵ Finally, there is a group of thirteen chapters of (27) Kecharitomene that are textually linked to the later (32) Mamas but not the earlier (22) Evergetis (Group D).¹⁶

27. KECHARITOMENE

2. Significance of the Analytic Chapter Groups

The original chapters of (27) Kecharitomene (Group A) are of prime importance for determining the new concerns of the reform movement in the first decade of the twelfth century, that is, those of the generation of reformers active after the composition of (22) Evergetis. This is true in those cases (Subgroup A.1) in which there are no equivalent chapters in (22) Evergetis (see esp. [31]), but even more so in those (Subgroup A.2) that represent a rejection of the Evergetian textual tradition, though perhaps not of the overall philosophical approach of (22) Evergetis. Among the chapters in this last subgroup, the description of the duties of the steward [14] is notable as an example of the elaborate precautions prescribed here and elsewhere in the document against financial misconduct.¹⁷

Even those chapters of (27) Kecharitomene textually dependent on (22) Evergetis, whether shared later with (32) Mamas (Group B) or not (Group C), demonstrate the Evergetian typikon's continued relevance for contemporaries in the early twelfth century. These chapters can also provide useful information on contemporary developments of Evergetian institutions whenever they have been substantially rewritten with additional provisions, as [10], [25] were, for example, reflecting heightened concerns about preventing financial or administrative abuses. Considered separately, the chapters in Group B are valuable for identifying certain durable textual elements of the Evergetian reform tradition that survived all the way through the composition of (32) Mamas in 1158, while those in Group C are useful for identifying elements that did not, but were primarily matters of concern for the second generation of monastic reformers contemporary with the issuance of (27) Kecharitomene in the early years of the twelfth century.

The twelve chapters of Group D, that are shared with (32) Mamas but are not in (22) Evergetis, are useful for examining durable, long-term reform concerns that were articulated only after that document's authorship. These chapters represent the original contributions of the second generation of the reform movement. Among them, a twice-repeated injunction [2], [55] to maintain the cenobitic lifestyle at all costs and a series of careful descriptions of the duties of various officials [19], [20], [23], [24], [29], are prominent.

It should also be noted here that the empress' signature at the end of [78] indicates that the last two chapters [79] and [80] must be the result of a later addition, circa 1120–30, whose provisions on the whole weaken the reform credentials of the document.¹⁸

B. Model Typikon

This document's analytic chapter groups indicate that it was ultimately based on (22) Evergetis, but neither directly nor exclusively. Of the considerable amount of "new" material found in (27) Kecharitomene's Group A, some but hardly all of it can be considered the original work of the author or her editor, and, moreover, there is other material in Group D that is clearly non-Evergetian. Therefore, it appears that (27) Kecharitomene reflects such Evergetian institutions and customs as it does through the mediation of another document, now lost, which must have adapted and rewritten the Evergetian typikon to reflect the concerns of a newly emerging generation of reformers, battle-hardened, as it were, in the successful campaigns against government requisitions of ecclesiastical property and, above all, the charistike.

One possibility is that this lost Typikon was that of the monastery of Philanthropos, the other half of the double monastery jointly founded by the empress with Kecharitomene (see [69], [77] below), but since this document likely was authored (at least nominally) by her too, the same reservations about the author's capacity for such a complete reworking of the Evergetian legacy in (27) Kecharitomene also apply to Philanthropos. Moreover, since Philanthropos and Kecharitomene were joint foundations, it is unlikely that the lost typikon of the former institution was, mutatis mutandis, substantially different from that of the latter on areas of common concern.

The Philanthropos typikon probably was the intermediary through which Evergetian content shared by (27) Kecharitomene and (32) Mamas was transmitted from (22) Evergetis to (32) Mamas and through it to (33) Heliou Bomon. The author of (32) Mamas had once been an official at Philanthropos, and so he must have used its typikon as a model after his recruitment as Mamas' superior rather than resorting to (27) Kecharitomene, which had been written for a nunnery.

Therefore, it seems most satisfactory to postulate an earlier document, utilized by the empress for the typika of both Philanthropos and Kecharitomene, that would have served the function of digesting and updating (22) Evergetis for the concerns of a new generation, its existence betrayed by the chapters in (27) Kecharitomene Group D. In the accompanying Chart One, this is identified as the "Lost Typikon."

C. Lives of the Nuns

1. Number of Nuns

The empress sets [5] the number of nuns at twenty-four, aside from the superior, two girls being reared in the convent, and six assistants. The latter might have been intended [4] for the personal service of high-born nuns from the imperial family. The empress was willing to see the limit set increase to thirty or even forty nuns if the convent should gain the additional endowment needed to support them.

2. Liturgical Duties

The empress endorses the continual performance of the canonical hours popularized by Evergetis and other reform monasteries. The regulatory chapters [32], [35]–[39] appear to utilize some of the language and procedures of (22) Evergetis [4], [6], but may in fact be drawn from a different but related source. Like her son the future Emperor John II Komnenos in (28) Pantokrator, the empress was very interested in prescribing lighting arrangements for various feasts [59]–[63], [72] in the church as well as for ordinary occasions [66]–[68]. On Holy Thursday, the superior was to re-enact [72] Christ's washing of the feet of his disciples in the narthex of the church. Only the nuns and the resident priest were to serve as singers in the church [75]; professional singers—mentioned for the first time in these documents—were not allowed to enter the convent.

3. Manual Labor

Manual labor also played an important part in the lives of the nuns. How this was coordinated with their liturgical responsibilities is not addressed directly. Work organizers were charged [27] with securing the necessary raw materials from the storehouse, distributing them to the nuns, and collecting the finished articles of clothing. The nuns worked [6] in part of their dormitory to the accompaniment of scriptural readings chosen by the superior. Work of any kind was not to take place [75] in the church, especially not during services.

27. KECHARITOMENE

4. Length of the Novitiate

As the text's editor Paul Gautier observed,¹⁹ the convent's nuns were divided [30], cf. [70] into two categories, those who received the so-called "small" habit after a novitiate of six months, and those who aspired to the "great" or "angelic" habit after serving a much longer probation, usually three years. Pious women already "practicing the monastic life in secular clothing" had only to serve six months. "Familiar and important personages," no doubt the nobly born, cf. (22) Evergetis [37], could be tonsured whenever the superior decided was fit. The empress was glad to welcome [54] women who had been tonsured at other monasteries; this should be compared to the more guarded attitude of (22) Evergetis [37] and the outright hostility of (30) Phoberos [52].

5. Sacramental Life

The empress' typikon makes use of (22) Evergetis [5] in its own regulation [33] of the reception of the Eucharist, but does not, like its model, suggest a frequency for receiving the sacrament. She hoped to recruit [15] two eunuchs who were also ordained monks and who knew "how to read scripture well" to provide the sacraments for the nuns.

6. Cenobitic Lifestyle

In keeping with the reform movement's preference for cenobitic monasticism, the empress stresses in several places [2], [3], [51], [55] the utmost importance she placed on the preservation of the cenobitic lifestyle among her nuns. Moreover, the empress chose to give [56] her endorsement to the Evergetian version of cenobitic life by quoting from (22) Evergetis [26]'s provision for all the monks to share the same food, drink and clothing. The nuns were to embrace [50] a life of absolute poverty without personal possessions. The vice of secret eating, condemned by (22) Evergetis [22], receives [49] a special treatment here. Even a personal fast that a nun might choose to impose upon herself was not considered [51] to be an excuse for avoiding the communal table. Only the sick were excused [44].

The diet itself was regulated for ordinary days [46], for the Lenten fast [47], and for the other fasts of the year [48]. Dietary regulations during fasts generally followed the provisions of (22) Evergetis [10], with small ameliorations. A new feature is the empress' provision [45] of a second sitting at dinner for the servers.

Communalism was also the rule for sleeping arrangements and wardrobe. All the nuns were to sleep together [6] in a large dormitory room, visible to one another. Certain nuns were charged [28] with issuing garments, bedding materials, and supplies for the bath on the orders of the superior.

Despite her proclamations of allegiance to the principles of communal life, the empress was willing to bend [4] the rules for members of the imperial family. A princess who was unable to submit to the rigors of the cenobitic regime had the option of living in her own cell behind the apse of the refectory with the assistance of two servants maintained by the convent, but following the diet and liturgical regime of the rest of the nuns in so far as she was able.

7. Care of the Sick and Bathing

A cell was to be set aside [57] for care of sick nuns by a doctor who should be a eunuch or an old man. A sick nun would also be served [44] her meals here, and could bathe [58] as often as the doctor ordered. Healthy nuns were allowed to bathe once a month, in keeping with a more indulgent attitude common later in the twelfth century (cf. (32) Mamas [28]) that contrasts with stricter provisions in (22) Evergetis [28], not to mention Kecharitomene' contemporary (30) Phoberos [46] which was unwilling to allow bathing to the healthy at all.

8. Relations with Family

Distinguished and noble women were allowed [17] to visit the convent once or twice a year; overnight visitors were lodged in the archontarikion near the gate. The nuns' own female relatives could make daytime visits with the same frequency; a nun's mother could stay overnight if her daughter were sick. Visits from male relatives were not allowed, except—under close supervision—for veneration [80] of the Kecharitomene icon, especially on the patronal feast. A nun could leave to visit [17] only a dying parent, and then only if chaperoned by two old nuns.

9. Burial

The empress provides [70] for the burial of the nuns in her foundation, the first time this subject is addressed in the Byzantine monastic foundation documents (other than for founders themselves). Since there was no room for burial within the convent itself, the empress got Patriarch Nicholas III Grammatikos to award her the patriarchal convent of Ta Kellaraias to serve as a funerary chapel for Kecharitomene.

D. Constitutional Matters

1. Independent and Self-Governing Status

The empress desired [1] that her convent be “administered and managed in whatever manner I myself wish while I am preserved in this life,” that is to say, that she should be entitled to govern it as a traditional private religious foundation, but after her death Kecharitomene was to be an independent and self-governing institution. Though she was not willing, as the author of (23) Pakourianos [3] had been, to declare her convent to be constitutionally independent from its foundation, she provided for this independence sooner than the authors of either (10) Eleousa [18] or (19) Attaleiates [14]. In language that draws in part on (22) Evergetis [12], the empress exempts [1] her foundation from participation in the charistike, epidosis, ephoreia, or any other program for external administration or subordination to another ecclesiastical institution or governmental office.

2. Office and Responsibilities of the Protectress

Like her contemporary, the author of (24) Christodoulos [B5], the empress thought it essential to provide [3] a powerful protector for her foundation. As she puts it with unvarnished bluntness, it was important to see to it that the convent was “well supplied with people who would protect it so that plundering by those who rob other people's property should not take place.” For this purpose, she turned to the ephoreia, one of the traditional means of providing protection to ecclesiastical institutions (see above, Chapter Three). This was not to be an external protectorate conceded to a governmental office (which was prohibited in [1]), but as in (19) Attaleiates [10], would be based on hereditary transmission within the founder's family line, a kind of private ephorate, as it were.

For the holder of this office she chose the title of protectress (antilambanomene). The first incumbent was intended to be her daughter, the nun Eudokia, who was to reside in the convent. Like the author of (24) Christodoulos [B2], the empress intended to draw up a separate testament

27. KECHARITOMENE

[3] formally creating the ephoreia, but when Eudokia predeceased her, she apparently chose instead to add a chapter [80] to the typikon designating another daughter, Anna, as the first protectress. Thereafter, the empress intended for the ephoreia to be held by her direct female descendants, then her female in-laws, and finally other suitable female relatives in perpetuity.

The empress specifically denies [3] the protectress control over the convent's property; moreover, the protectress could not change the typikon, arbitrarily remove the superior, enroll or expel nuns, require financial accounts, or appropriate any assets. If the protectress was not a nun in residence, she was not even to enter [80] the convent except during the liturgy and for meetings on building maintenance (for this see also [74]). The empress' allotment of rights to the protectress was meager, including use [76] of certain well-appointed quarters adjacent to the convent, burial in the exonarthex [76], cf. [70] (but only if she became a nun), and liturgical commemoration [3]. Perhaps more significant is her substitution of the protectress for the preeminent monks [13] in a passage borrowed from (22) Evergetis [14] as the agent for the removal of an unfit or corrupt superior.

3. Role of the Superior

Although the empress is somewhat circumspect about stating it [1], the superior was to have the key role in governing the foundation. This is in accord with what reform opinion thought proper. The superior was to choose [25] all of the other officials of the convent, including the steward [14], and allow them to hold office "for a very long time" if she so chose. She also might play [11] an important, though not decisive, role in choosing her own successor.

4. Election of the Superior

The superior and "all the community" (not just the preeminent monks as elsewhere) were to select [11] three nuns distinguished by their piety and intelligence; after her death, the priest, in the presence of the protectress, was to pick at random from among the three names written on sealed slips of paper and left on the altar. The protectress was to play a more important though still not a decisive role in the election of a successor if the superior died suddenly. In that event, she would guide the community to make a choice of three candidates, even supplying a suitable outside candidate if necessary, but the final choice would still be made by lot.

5. The Convent's Other Officials

One of the distinguishing features of this typikon is its detailed description of the officers of the convent and their responsibilities. Some of these were evidently taken from a now lost source also used by (32) Mamas, specifically the chapters on the duties of the sacristan [19], the ecclesiarchissa and her assistant [20], the provisioner [23], the two treasurers [24], and the gatekeeper [29]; others may be original to this document, namely those on the steward [14], food buyer [21], the wine-pourer [22], the work organizers [27], and the storeroom treasurers [28]. The chapters on the refectorian [25] and the disciplinary official [26] were inspired by (22) Evergetis [31].

6. Patronal Privileges

The empress claims for herself some of the most important privileges of traditional Byzantine patrons. She reserves to herself the right to appoint both the superiors [11] and the stewards [14] during her own lifetime. She obliges [4] the convent to grant automatic admission to any of her granddaughters who might wish to become nuns, and as noted above, she was willing to allow them to live in their own quarters, have a more substantial diet than the other nuns, and be attended to by servants. Even the scrupulous author of (23) Pakourianos [25], however, did not blush to require his foundation to provide preferential admission to his relatives. Among the more less controversial rights here are the empress' reservation [71] of memorial services for members of the imperial family and her provision [34] for liturgical offerings for both living and deceased relatives.

As noted above, the protectress' rights were more circumscribed; she was not to choose the superior and the latter was herself to choose the steward, although the protectress played a role [14] in the installation ceremony for the steward. Even the protectress' right to reside in quarters adjacent to the convent was structured in such a way as to prevent her presence and that of her family and retinue of male and female servants from disrupting the lives of the nuns. Yet the penultimate chapter in the typikon demonstrates [79] that the very close association of a privately founded religious institution like Kecharitomene with the private estate of the founder continued to be problematic even in this age of "independent" foundations.

In this case, as in that of (19) Attaleiates [5], [16], [17], the foundation and the founder's secular dwellings were not even physically separate from one another, but were linked here by a doorway [80] which the empress ordered to be kept locked. She bequeaths [79] use of her non-consecrated properties on the site to Anna, the intended protectress, and provides for continued rights of usage by her descendants for as long as the female line continues. Thereafter, the convent was to assume possession. In the meantime, the empress' relatives were free to erect new structures or make alterations on existing ones so long as these changes did not adversely affect the privacy of the convent.

7. Preservation of the Typikon

Since the typikon was to be the authoritative document governing the life of the community, the empress chose to stress its importance by providing [65] for its being read to the community (following (22) Evergetis [43]) "so that through continuous reading the instructions laid down might be especially permanent and indelible." Like the authors of (19) Attaleiates [40] and (23) Pakourianos [33], she also took precautions to assure the physical preservation of the typikon, providing [77] for three sets of the typikon and the inventory (preserved here as Appendix B) to be drawn up and placed in Hagia Sophia, in the sacristy of Kecharitomene, and in the possession of the protectress. The set of documents at Kecharitomene, drawn up on paper, were to be the ordinary working copies.

E. Financial Matters

1. Financial Administration

The chief financial officer, appointed [14] by the empress during her lifetime and by the superior thereafter, was to be the steward. He was to be a pious eunuch, supported by an assistant steward (paroikonomos) chosen [15] from among the two eunuchs who served as the foundation's ordained monks. In the usual course of events, the assistant would succeed the steward in his post. A lengthy new chapter in the typikon provides [14] a detailed list of the steward's responsibilities; he was to receive a copy of this chapter as a reminder of them. These included the maintenance and repair of the foundation's buildings, the management of the revenues in cash and in kind produced from the landed estates and other properties which supported the convent, and striving to make the management of these properties "more profitable." If the steward was found to be in default of his responsibilities, the superior could remove him [14] in consultation with the protectress of the convent.

27. KECHARITOMENE

There were also the two treasurers [24] who, unlike the steward and his assistant, were to be selected by the superior from among the nuns in the convent. One was to control the cash box (kibotion) and the other the storeroom. The precise procedures set down for regulating disbursement of funds, under which the superior and the treasurers were required to act in concert and keep detailed records, recall those of (23) Pakourianos [26] rather than the less detailed prescriptions of (22) Evergetis [20]. This typonikon's regulation of the treasurers and their responsibilities is non-Evergetian, but is similar to that found in (32) Mamas [10].

The superior, steward, sacristan and the two treasurers were jointly responsible [24] for the maintenance and security of a second cash box in which surplus money was to be stored; this recalls a prudent feature of financial administration found in (23) Pakourianos [26]. Evidently reform monasteries were now repudiating the old principle found in (4) Studios [21], which itself had Basilian roots, that monasteries should not store up surplus money but instead distribute it to the poor.

The landed estates supporting the convent required lay property administrators who would be chosen by the superior based on qualifications listed [31] in the typonikon. These are different from those found in (22) Evergetis [34], which is not employed here as a model, and include the requirement that the administrators "not be selected for any family connection or affinity."

A key to assuring financial security was holding [14] the property administrators to accurate accounts. The steward was to bring these to the convent annually for examination by the superior, who would issue exonerations to the administrators like those received by the author of (23) Pakourianos [33] from various emperors for his own administrative assignments. On occasion the property administrators might need to consult [17] with the superior in person, though direct contact was discouraged.

2. Inalienability of Property

In a chapter that is considerably stronger than its counterpart in (22) Evergetis [19], the empress endorses [9] the by-now well accepted precept of the reform movement that the foundation's movable and immovable properties should be inalienable. Any violation, no matter by whom, is declared to be "sheer sacrilege," strong words, considering that her husband the Emperor Alexios Komnenos had done much to provoke the reform movement to the formulation of this position through his confiscations of ecclesiastical properties earlier in his reign. The empress here appeals to the patriarch "who by the laws and canons has responsibility for this," the protectress, the nuns, and any concerned outsider to seek redress for any alienations that might occur in the future.

Like (22) Evergetis [19], however, the empress was willing [10] to permit emergency alienations of movable property should the convent or its possessions suffer great damage due to depredations of foreign invaders or from fire or earthquake. She defends her willingness to part with movable but not immovable property on the grounds that “with the help of immovable property it is possible sometimes to acquire movable property, but the opposite is difficult.” Even so, the sale of movable property was to be to other ecclesiastical institutions, since “it is acknowledged by all” (though not, some decades before, her husband) “that what has once been consecrated ought not to be made public property.”

The alienation procedures themselves are similar but not identical to those in (22) Evergetis [19]. The sacristan and the priests of the convent are added to the list of officials who need to be present. As in Evergetis, a detailed list (praktikon) of valuation had to be drawn up to record the transaction; here, the protectress also needed to be informed.

3. Entrance Gifts Not Mandatory

The empress follows the example and adopts part of the language of (22) Evergetis [37] in forswearing [7] mandatory entrance gifts such as the renunciation (apotage), the customary gift (synetheia), and the refectorial (trapeziatikon). As at Evergetis, however, voluntary gifts, be they of movable or immovable property, were welcomed, though they could not be reclaimed if the donor later chose to leave the convent, for this would be sacrilege.

4. Other Sources of Outside Support

Reform founders understood that outside donations frequently came with undesirable strings attached that might serve to compromise a foundation’s independence. The empress welcomes [8] donations of movable and immovable property by lay people, but restricts their use to increasing the number of nuns who could be supported, supplementing the institution’s charitable distributions to the poor, and meeting the expenses of feasts and commemorations. Donations for such memorial services are noted in [71]. Donations were not to be used to increase the diet of the nuns (as was done even in the appendix to (22) Evergetis) or to institute other changes. Donors were not “to make any new rules on the pretext of their offerings or issue instructions opposed to our commands.” This was not a groundless fear, as (46) Akropolites [7], [8] illustrates.

The empress’ rejection [53] of external (i.e., non-resident) nuns (exomonitides) and imposed guests (katapemptai)—even notables and the very wealthy—followed reform opinion in rejecting these basic threats to the cenobitic order. The empress was unwilling to contemplate [76] an exception being made even to rules less crucial to the maintenance of cenobiticism, such as her prescription that lay people not be buried in the nuns’ mortuary church, even if “a large, expensive, and useful offering” to the convent needed to be turned down to preserve the principle.

5. Provisions against Financial Misconduct

In addition to the procedural precautions described above, the empress provided [13] for the removal of a superior guilty of doing favors for her relatives or stealing possessions of the convent. These grounds for removal are derived from (22) Evergetis [14]. The empress also turned to the Evergetian tradition in incorporating [14] the use of patronal icons in the investiture ceremony for the steward, thereby, like (22) Evergetis [29], seeking to enlist fear of heavenly powers as an inducement to officials to carry out their responsibilities honestly. The drawing up of a detailed inventory, preserved here as Appendix B along with a list of the convent’s incomes, Appendix A, is another feature of this typikon influenced by the reform movement that was intended to assist in the prevention of financial misconduct.

6. Building Maintenance and Repair

Since the desperate need of many older private religious foundations for rebuilding and repairs had been one of the original justifications for the now discredited program of the charistike, it is not at all surprising that reform founders would eventually see the importance of providing for building maintenance and repairs on their own. Among the authors of our documents, the empress was the first to do so, [73] giving the superior the responsibility for preservation, repair, improvement, and adornment as well as for the retiling of the roofs. She herself claims credit for structural additions to the church and the construction of the convent.

F. General Philosophy

Given the author's own exalted status in Byzantine society, it is perhaps surprising that her typikon shares much of the hostility to privilege found in (22) Evergetis.²⁰ She adopts the language of (22) Evergetis [17] in warning [12] that no one should usurp the superiorship or, she adds, "any other office," on grounds of seniority, professional background, noble birth or donations made previously to the convent. As we have seen, nuns were not welcome [53] even if they were from an exalted background and offered generous donations or subventions in exchange for being accepted. Nuns tonsured outside of Kecharitomene were welcomed [54], especially if they were not being imposed by imperial or patriarchal authority (that is, if they were not katapemptai, cf. [53]).

The empress also adopts [42] the condemnation found in (22) Evergetis [9] of those who quarreled about precedence in seating in the refectory, though in a much abbreviated form without the violent language. To be sure, the empress also insists [4] on preferential admissions and special treatment for nobly born ladies who wished to be nuns. However, even such a nun installed in private quarters in the convent was not to use them for meeting with the other nuns and causing division in the community (that is, as a place in which to set herself up as an independent locus of authority in opposition to the superior) on pain of expulsion by the protectress.

G. External Relations

1. Institutional Philanthropy

Like other institutions influenced by the monastic reform, Kecharitomene featured a role for institutional philanthropy. Because this was a nunnery in an urban setting, this role was kept small to avoid exposing the nuns to scandal. There was a daily distribution of bread [64] at the gate and a distribution of money and bread [59] on the patronal feast. Smaller donations took place [61], [63] on other feasts of the church year.

2. Fairness to the Peasantry

Similarly, Kecharitomene reflects in a diluted form the typical reform concern with the welfare of the dependent peasantry, listing [31] bringing "relief to the people in the properties" as one of the desired qualifications for the selection of the convent's property administrators.

TWELFTH CENTURY

Notes on the Introduction

1. So Skoulatos, Personnages, p. 149, but see also Gautier, “Kécharitôménè,” p. 13, who proposed a date ca. 1110.
2. Described in Gautier, “Kécharitôménè,” pp. 9–12; supplemented by Sainte-Croix 57 (12th–13th c.) from the lavra of St. Sabas for Appendix B, for which see Gautier, pp. 16–17.
3. For Irene, see Brand and Cutler, “Irene Doukaina,” p. 1009; Diehl, Figures, pp. 53–58; Gautier, “Kécharitôménè,” pp. 6–9; Polemis, Doukai, pp. 70–74; and Skoulatos, Personnages, pp. 119–24.
4. Sp. Lampros, Catalogue of the Greek Manuscripts on Mount Athos, vol. 1 (Cambridge, 1895), p. 176; for the Philanthropos monastery, see Janin, Géographie, vol. 3, pp. 525–27, “Christ Philanthrope,” and Sidéridès, “Philanthropou.”
5. For the location, see Majeska, Russian Travelers, p. 298, and plate II, no. 31.
6. See Polemis, Doukai, p. 71, with n. 17; cf. Gautier, “Kécharitôménè,” pp. 8–9.
7. For Anna Komnene, see Alexander Kazhdan, “Komnene, Anna,” ODB, p. 1142, and Varzos, Genealogia, vol. 1, pp. 176–97.
8. Majeska, Russian Travelers, p. 298; with Pachymeres, De Andronico Palaeologo, ed. I. Bekker, CSHB (Bonn, 1835), vol. 2, pp. 40–41.
9. For an illustration of the analytic groups proposed below, see Chart One: Analytic Chapter Groups of (27) Kecharitomene.
10. See Gautier, “Kécharitôménè,” pp. 14–16.
11. Group A: Chapters (39) new to (27) Kecharitomene: [4], [5], [6], [8], [9], [14], [15], [16], [17], [21], [22], [26], [27], [28], [31], [34], [44], [51], [52], [54], [58], [59], [60], [61], [62], [63], [66], [67], [68], [69], [71], [72], [73], [74], [75], [76], [77], [79], [80].
12. Subgroup A.1: New chapters (26) with no equivalent in (22) Evergetis: [4], [6], [8], [15], [21], [22], [27], [34], [51], [60], [61], [62], [63], [66], [67], [68], [69], [71], [72], [73], [74], [75], [76], [77], [79], [80].
13. Subgroup A.2: New chapters (13) with equivalent (but different) chapters in (22) Evergetis: [5] = (22) Evergetis [23]; [9] = (22) Evergetis [19]; [14] = (22) Evergetis [13]; [16] = (22) Evergetis [15]; [17] = (22) Evergetis [39]; [26] = (22) Evergetis [31]; [28] = (22) Evergetis [30]; [31] = (22) Evergetis [34]; [44] = (22) Evergetis [30]; [52] = (22) Evergetis [25]; [54] = (22) Evergetis [37]; [58] = (22) Evergetis [28]; [59] = (22) Evergetis [11].
14. Group B: Chapters (21) with textual links to both (22) Evergetis and (32) Mamas: [1], cf. (22) Evergetis [12] and (32) Mamas [4]; [7], cf. (22) Evergetis [37] and (32) Mamas [5]; [11], cf. (22) Evergetis [13] and (32) Mamas [1]; [12], cf. (22) Evergetis [14], [16], [17] and (32) Mamas [45]; [13], cf. (22) Evergetis [13], [14] and (32) Mamas [2]; [18], cf. (22) Evergetis [29] and (32) Mamas [6]; [25], cf. (22) Evergetis [31], [33] and (32) Mamas [23]; [30], cf. (22) Evergetis [37] and (32) Mamas [22]; [32], cf. (22) Evergetis [4] and (32) Mamas [47], [31]; [35], [37], [38], and [39], cf. (22) Evergetis [6] and (32) Mamas [47]; [40] and [42], cf. (22) Evergetis [9] and (32) Mamas [17]; [47] and [48], cf. (22) Evergetis [10] and (32) Mamas [18]; [56], cf. (22) Evergetis [26] and (32) Mamas [34]; [57], cf. (22) Evergetis [41] and (32) Mamas [34]; [70], cf. (22) Evergetis [36] and (32) Mamas [39], [40]; [78], cf. (22) Evergetis [42], [43] and (32) Mamas [46].
15. Group C: Chapters (7) with textual links to (22) Evergetis but not (32) Mamas: [10], cf. (22) Evergetis [19]; [33], cf. (22) Evergetis [4], [5]; [36], cf. (22) Evergetis [6]; [41] and [43], cf. (22) Evergetis [9]; [64], cf. (22) Evergetis [38]; [65], cf. (22) Evergetis [43].
16. Group D: Chapters (13) with textual links to (32) Mamas but not (22) Evergetis: [2] = (32) Mamas [5]; [3], cf. (32) Mamas [3]; [19] = (32) Mamas [9]; [20] = (32) Mamas [8]; [23], cf. (32) Mamas [11]; [24], cf. (32) Mamas [10]; [29] = (32) Mamas [12]; [45], cf. (32) Mamas [17]; [46], cf. (32) Mamas [17]; [49], cf. (32) Mamas [20]; [50] = part of (32) Mamas [20]; [53], cf. (32) Mamas [26]; [55] = (32) Mamas [25].
17. See also (27) Kecharitomene [10], [24], [25], and [31].

27. KECHARITOMENE

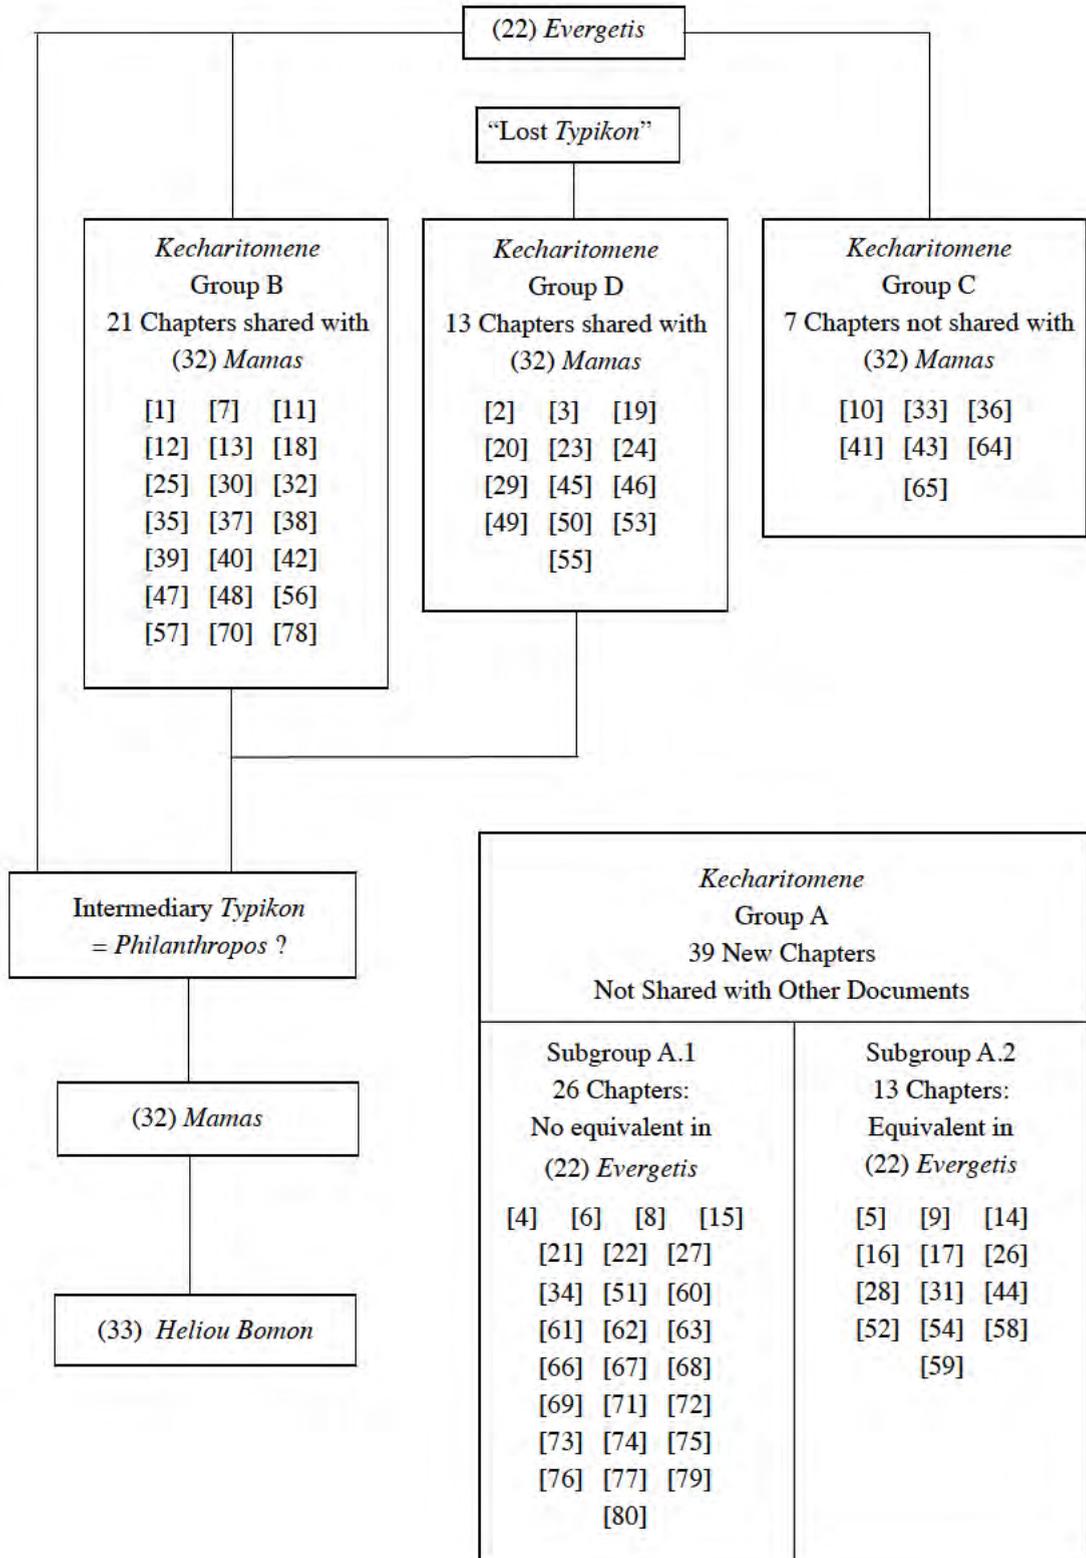

18. Gautier, "Kécharitôménè," p. 14.
19. Gautier, "Kécharitôménè," p. 76, n. 9.
20. For a different assessment, see Galatariotou, "Women's Communities," pp. 271–76, 289–90.

Bibliography

- Abrahamse, Dorothy de F., "Women's Monasticism in the Middle Byzantine Period: Problems and Prospects," BF 9 (1985), 35–58.
- Beck, Hans-Georg, Kirche und theologische Literatur im byzantinischen Reich (Munich, 1959), p. 647.
- Brand, Charles, and Cutler, Anthony, "Irene Doukaina," ODB, p. 1009.
- Chalandon, Ferdinand, Essai sur le règne d'Alexis I^{er} Comnène (Paris, 1900).
- , Jean II Comnène (1118–1143) et Manuel I Comnène (1143–1180) (Paris, 1912), esp. pp. 23–28.
- Diehl, Charles, Figures byzantines, 9th ed. (Paris, 1938), pp. 53–85.
- Galatariotou, Catia, "Byzantine Women's Monastic Communities: The Evidence of the Typika," JÖB 38 (1988), 263–90.
- Janin, Raymond, La géographie ecclésiastique de l'empire byzantin, vol. 3: Les églises et les monastères [de Constantinople], 2nd ed. (Paris, 1969), pp. 188–91.
- , "Les monastères du Christ Philanthrope à Constantinople," EB 4 (1946), 131–62.
- Kazhdan, Alexander, "Die Liste der Kinder des Kaiser Alexios I. in einer Moskauer Handschrift," in Beiträge zur alten Geschichte und deren Nachleben. Festschrift für Franz Altheim, ed. Ruth Stiehl and Hans Erich Stier, vol. 2 (Berlin, 1970), pp. 233–37.
- Majeska, George, Russian Travelers to Constantinople in the Fourteenth and Fifteenth Centuries (Washington, D.C., 1984), p. 298.
- Medico, M. H. E. del, "Essai sur Kahrié Djami au début du XII^e siècle," BZ 32 (1932), 16–48.
- Oeconomus, Lysimaque, La vie religieuse dans l'empire byzantin au temps des Comnènes et des Anges (Paris, 1918), pp. 166–92.
- Pargoire, J., "Les monastères doubles chez les Byzantins," EO 9 (1906), 21–25.
- Polemis, D., The Doukai: A Contribution to Byzantine Prosopography (London, 1968), pp. 70–74.
- Sidéridès, Xenophon. "Peri tes en Konstantinoupolei mones tou Soteros tou Philanthropou," EA 21 (1897), 234–36, 250–51, 257–59, 267–68, 276–79, 291–93, 309–10, 316–19, 323–25, 341–43; EA 18 (1898), 4–6, 10–11.
- Skoulatos, Basile, Les personnages byzantins de l'Alexiade (Louvain, 1980), pp. 119–24.
- Talbot, Alice-Mary, "Kecharitomene Nunnery," ODB, p. 1118.
- Varzos, Konstantinos, He geneologia ton Komnenon, 2 vols. (Thessaloniki, 1984).
- Volk, Robert, Gesundheitswesen und Wohltätigkeit im Spiegel der byzantinischen Klostertypika (Munich, 1983), pp. 120–32.

(27) Kecharitomene is the first of six typika written for Byzantine convents that have survived. The later examples of typika for womens' monasteries are (39) Lips, (40) Anargyroi, (47) Philanthropos, (54) Neilos Damilas, and (57) Bebaia Elpis. The works cited in the General Bibliography, XXI. Women in Byzantine Monasticism, are part of the impressive scholarship that has been done in recent years on this subject.

Chart One: Analytic Chapter Groups of (27) Kecharitomene

TWELFTH CENTURY

As noted above, this document shares substantial portions of the text of (22) Evergetis. In our translation, the borrowings are indicated in boldface type.

Translation

Rule of the revered convent of the most holy Mother of God Kecharitomene newly built from its foundations and established by the most devout Augusta, Lady Irene Doukaina, in accordance with her command and intention explained and set out [here].

[Prologue]

O Mother of God [who gave birth to] the Living Word without birth pangs, and after his birth [became] again an all-holy and precious vessel of virginity, your Son and God was the source and provider of many great good things for us, truly our Savior Jesus and “God with us” (Is. 7:14), which is the great and revered meaning of the name Emmanuel, according to the holy Isaiah, who created what exists from what did not and bestowed on us well-being by all his gifts, who honored us with reason and gave us intelligence and perception as standards to judge reality, and by these [faculties] distinguished us from the animals on the earth and set up man to rule over them, while he is being ruled from above. “What shall I render to the Lord for all the things wherein he has rewarded me?” (Ps. 115:12). He has brought to his handiwork a providential care, never up to now halting the rich springs of his goodness towards us, ever since he set the heavens in a circle, divided up time, poured out the air and spread the earth underneath, and appointed man as overseer of the visible world.

So these [acts] are indeed great and worthy of the power which has created and preserves them, as great David says, “Who will ever seek out his mercy and truth?” (Ps. 60 [61]:8). But what a good gift the bountiful visitation of the Holy Spirit gave us in you and the power of the Most High overshadowed you (cf. Luke 1:35) and rendered you a spiritual and living temple to him. Without defilement or change, out of your all-holy virgin blood there came into existence and became subject to time and was born without a father he who was born from his Father without a mother before eternity. But what a good gift he gave us in you, as I said before, he who is the giver of the other good things to us, when he raised you up as a ladder and spread you out as a bridge leading or conducting mankind to heaven. Even if the whole of heaven had happened to become one voice, I do not think it would have worthily declared or praised the greatness of this gift [p. 21] which was worthy of God. “For who can utter the mighty doings of the Lord or who will show forth all his praises?” (Ps. 105 [106]:2). Or what tongue, O Mother of God’s Word full of grace, will relate the miracles that have come about at different times through you, by which the divine “foundation of faith in God remains unshaken” (Col. 2:5) and the “strongholds of impiety are destroyed” (Prov. 21:22) and Christ’s sacred religion is firmly established on the “foundation of the apostles” (Eph. 2:20)? Who could speak of the greatness of your miracles? Who will relate the wonders that occurred at different times? Who will confess your mighty works or praise your miraculous signs, by which you strengthen the Empire and destroy tyrannies, and cause the most Christian nation to dwell in the hope of future well-being?

27. KECHARITOMENE

What word would come to me, O divine mother of all things supernatural, either as I related simply or tried to praise the magnificence of your wonderful deeds on my behalf from my earliest years to this point in my life, and tried to describe the flood of your goodness towards me ever since my birth? For with regard to my birth—O ornament of our race with most saving power and, as is fitting, the much talked-of cause of rejoicing for the assemblies in heaven at the heavenly festivals—by the favor of God and your care and help my life had its beginning in a pious family¹ and one naturally suited to virtue; and with regard to my upbringing and education my instruction was under the finest principles and habits (let envy and the unpleasantness of boasting be kept away) which did not induce laxity or perversity. This was totally the gift of God and of you his mother. With regard to my true arrival at adulthood, whom of all men or women did you guide in every way thus as you did me, your servant, with the greatest ease, you who “are clothed” in spiritual and truly unfading “fringed garments” (Ps. 44 [45]:14), an adorned queen standing at the right hand of the Pantokrator? For when you had surrounded or flooded my life on all sides with human prosperity and placed nothing of earthly human abundance far from my surroundings, you led me even further, for reasons you know, to the summit of human good fortune—the position of empress.²

Furthermore you have granted [me] much fruitfulness in the Purple, adding to my calling and relationship as a mother those of both a maternal and paternal grandmother.³ [p. 23] For these reasons you extended the period of imperial power as far as today in your glorious defenses of the emperor [Alexios I Komnenos (1081–1118)] in terrible and dangerous crises, in his great triumphs bringing safety to the empire of the Romans achieved with you as his ally over barbarians, and in the recovery of our dearest ones from diseases or their deliverance “from the throat of a pouncing lion” (Ps. 21 [22]:21). May you “add days to the days” (Ps. 60 [61]:7) of the emperor and be his irresistible ally against barbarians, so that your inheritance, and the great city [of Constantinople] entrusted to you, be preserved as an ever-flourishing root and ever-flowing font of piety.

So in these matters leaving it to the tongues of angels, whatever the tongues of angels happen to be, to praise and worship your greatness and your undefiled purity which is above the highest and oldest thrones and the Cherubim, and to thank you in a spiritual way for your compassion and mercy towards us, all that I bring to you in return is most fervent love, you who with your First-Born and Only-Begotten maintain the most providential and saving love for humanity. And the great and fearful dignity of your motherhood of God is a subject of much joyful talk and very dear to my heart and an unceasing thought, and I think of your holy childbirth with the purest pleasure and delight. No other utterance or statement is so very pleasing to me as the wonders and mystical truths concerning you, and the ever-flowing stream of good things that come to us from God through you, the intercessor. For in these matters I know that there is nothing in us worthy of your holiness which is beyond word and thought, just as there is nothing worthy of the One who became poor to take from you our substance, we who possess nothing of ourselves but are entirely God’s. For when you gave birth to the Immaterial Word beyond words, you were then granted self-sufficiency and perfection, and material things are of no value [to you].

Since it is impossible for human beings who still live and move in this world to show the ardor of their faith in you in a human way by more divine and immaterial offerings, imitating and copying the condescension and humility of the Word, I myself have built for you, the mother of the Word, a holy temple from those who are around us and are of our kind for you, “the holy and wonderful temple in righteousness” (Ps. 64 [65]:5), in the words of your forefather, the great David, and have “established” in it “solitary” singers of praise (Ps. 67 [68]:6) for you and the Divine Bliss from [the members] of the chaste female sex among us, dispensing to each of them from your great gifts to me the yearly and daily necessities in accordance with their physical needs. [p. 25] Furthermore I have set up the life of devotion for them cenobitic in everything, establishing and ensuring for this divine company an absence of distraction from all sides in the matter of their holy way of life. They in hope and with devout prayer are running the race ever since they made that noble vow “in the presence of God and his chosen angels” (I Tim. 5:21) concerning this holy convent, and not even in this have my hopes in you failed, virgin Mother of God, and choirs of angels whom the gospels declare to rejoice and exult greatly at a person’s salvation (cf. Luke 15:7) will always be offering thanks for this to you.

TWELFTH CENTURY

Thus then I built the holy convent for you who bore “the Great Shepherd of the sheep” (Heb. 13:20) in the abundance of my love for God, and brought a rational flock to you, the mother of the First and Only Shepherd according to the wise Solomon (cf. Eccl. 12:11). In what way would anyone rightly address you, the one favored by God (cf. Luke 1:28), the one beyond the visible and intelligible world, the one who passed beyond the bounds of nature, the mediatrix between God and men, (but why list the many things?) truly the Mother of God in virgin purity. Since you have gently tested the faith of my heart, receive my offering with favor and do not thrust away my oblation, nor “turn away your face from” your child (Ps. 26 [27]:9), but add a happy ending to an auspicious beginning, and you, wholly without blemish, spread your “wings,” as Moses says (Deut. 32:11), “silvered” with the gifts of the All-Holy Spirit (Ps. 67 [68]:15), and then protect this lovely convent from the lion who goes about seeking whom he may devour and prowls around its holy precincts in hunger and guile.

Preserve this flock which is dedicated to your majesty secure for ever, O virgin and mother, and fortify the sisterhood’s feminine nature in virtue, holding your all-powerful right hand over this good flock continuously, so that the old deceiver and serpent (cf. Rev. 12:9) might not find one Eve among them again nor whisper his deadly tricks in her ears as he leads her to “the snare of Hell” (Prov. 9:19), but that they all living together in the holy place under your most powerful protection, might buzz around this hive most diligently, to use another expression, cultivating the fruit of virtue which is sweeter than honey, “bowing down” without defilement to the Almighty “in the holy courtyard of God” (Ps. 95 [96]:9), “rendering a sacrifice of praise” (Ps. 115:7) to God “seven times a day, praising the judgments of divine righteousness” (Ps. 118 [119]:164), praising the Divine Bliss and your majesty for the decrees of the Deity beyond all being, “rising” with David “at midnight” (Ps. 118 [119]:62) and without [other] thoughts lifting [p. 27] holy hands during the night to the Holy of Holies (I Tim. 2:8; Ps. 133 [134]:2) in their churches blessing God the Lord who came forth from [the people of] Israel, casting off their dust and giving their minds wings, being slaves of the Lord, ardent in spirit, “considering how to stir up one another to love and good works” (Heb. 10:24) as the divine apostle says.

In this, O favored mother of the Word and queen of all, preserve this flock for me and keep it safe, so that then all their wickedness and ignorance may be driven out and through cleansing they may always walk towards purity and their supplications may reach and gain entrance “to the ears of the Lord Sabaoth” (James 5:4) and then he may send to us from there every thing that is for the well-being of the priesthood, the empire, and the Christian community, so that as a result the one who rules the empire of Christ may also in sincere devotion rule his subjects and labor to bring about peace and stability in the world, preserving the whole nation in goodness and routing barbarians, both those seen and unseen, those who wait for his back to be turned and those who try to strike him from in front, both those from beyond our boundaries and those of our own race or vipers in his bosom, something to be deprecated and repudiated. [Preserve] this your emperor and his descendants, since he is in other respects and in the matter of this my offering a like-minded helper and loyal fellow-servant. This fine company of my flock, praying to be kept safe for a very long time in a community living according to Christ, always needs your assistance and mighty aid, as is reasonable, in this very great request that brings salvation to the world, for if this is missing and divine help is not present, no good action is easy to accomplish for anyone at all.

27. KECHARITOMENE

These are our thank-offerings to you for the past, Mother of God and mistress of all creation, and our supplications for the future. In this turbulent and very stormy life may we lodge under your wings, since the person who is not protected underneath them but lives in the midst of the world or at the center of worldly affairs finds it difficult, or even completely impossible, not to be burnt as he walks on coals or not to be scratched on thorns or not to be cut on swords. Throughout this present variable life with its many movements at least may we have you, “the beauty of Jacob” (Ps. 46 [47]:4), as our champion unassailable in every way, since we have fixed all the anchors of our hopes on your goodness, and in our future life may we find you again a protector at the great and fearful judgment-seat of your Son and King, when [p. 29] those who act righteously will understand more purely and clearly the words of the great good news in lovely Nazareth about the incarnation in you of the Unutterable Word and the swaddling-clothes in the manger at holy Bethlehem (cf. Luke 2:10–12). So these are our thank-offerings and supplications to you, the very splendid and divine ark of the sanctuary; but what concerns your holy convent and the establishment of what we have prescribed for it is as follows.

1. Concerning the fact that the convent of the most holy Mother of God Kecharitomene should be independent and under its own control [cf. (22) Evergetis [12], ed. lines 539–41; 547–63]

I wish that the convent of my Lady the Mother of God Kecharitomene set up by me be administered and managed in whatever manner I myself wish while I am preserved in this life through the grace and fervent intercession of the same Lady, and after my death (for being mortal I expect to die and know the common obligation of our nature) that it should be independent and under its own control, a stranger to all mastery and ownership, and that no one at all should have any right or privilege in respect of it but it should remain independent in every way, separate and in control of itself, and be administered in accordance with what will be expressly laid down here by me. It should neither be made subject to imperial or ecclesiastic or personal rights at any time nor assigned as a gift or epidosis or for reasons of ephoreia, stewardship or superintendence or for any other reason to any kind of person whatsoever or monastery or holy house or orphanage or other bureau or any hospital but remain for ever only under the authority of the virgin Mother of God Kecharitomene, to whom it has in fact been dedicated and it should be governed and administered by the superior at the time in accordance with our present instructions. For my most powerful emperor, Lord Alexios Komnenos, whom I pray the Lord God grant to live a long life and reach a grand old age, will have the same authority over the convent as I. But after my most powerful emperor has departed from this life, I do not wish the convent of the Mother of God Kecharitomene to be administered and managed by anyone at all, but remain for ever independent and under its own control as has been settled above in more detail, but it should be administered and directed under its own authority by the superior in it at the time in accordance with the command of this present rule.

But if anyone ever at any time and in any way wishes to gain control over this our convent and set it under the power of someone else, whether he be an emperor, or a patriarch, or some other [p. 31] member of the clergy or of the senate, or the superior herself, or its steward, or simply one of its sisters at present in it prompted by an attack of the devil, not only will he be held responsible for the divine body and blood of our God and Savior Jesus Christ but will also “be accursed,” as the holy apostle says (Gal. 1:8) and subject to the curse of the three hundred and eighteen Holy Fathers, because of the fact that out of a fervent heart and faith we established a convent from a very small part of the benefits conferred on us by the Mother of God Kecharitomene and we entrusted it to the authority and power of our Mother of God Kecharitomene herself, wishing it to be independent from simply everyone. This that wretched person wretchedly planned with malicious and deceitful intent to place under the power of persons who are perhaps corrupt and wicked and who look to nothing else but pernicious gain.*

2. Concerning the necessity for those following the monastic way of life in the convent of the Kecharitomene to pursue the cenobitic way of life

It is right that something be said more clearly and briefly next concerning the way of life of the nuns and the whole organization of life in the convent. What will be prescribed on this matter will be compatible with what has been clearly stated and declared by the divine fathers with regard to those who have recently renounced the world. For they decided and laid it down that those who recently fled from the very stormy world and took refuge in the calm harbor of the monastic life should enter upon a cenobitic way of life, and renouncing their own will give themselves up to a life of submission, seeing that they need a helmsman and guide as they direct the blind eye of their soul this way and that and are not able to help themselves through their ignorance of goodness. Therefore, obeying these men I wish, I very much wish, that the nuns in the convent of the virgin Mother of God Kecharitomene should live in a cenobitic order and way of life and that the rule of this constitution should always be in force in it, unchanged and unaltered and unshaken by every misfortune, perverted or changed in no way during the existence of this whole age, nor altered for any reason or pretext whatsoever, neither because of wealth or poverty, neither through scarcity or abundance, nor any other plausible reason or pretext whatsoever, but the cenobitic order and way of life should be completely preserved in every way unbroken for ever.

Even if the entire income of the convent should happen to be reduced to what would be enough for two nuns, we wish them to live in the cenobitic way and conform [p. 33] to the rule for this way of life. If any of the mothers superior wants the opposite to this, the nuns are to speak against it, and if the nuns want the opposite, the superior should resist; but if they all should agree the protectress of the convent should defend what I have laid down. But if she is led astray by them, we grant permission to anyone who wishes to fight for a holy object, if this is not done by our relatives, and to go to court for goodness itself and the reward for this, to seek that what we have laid down should be effective and that those chiefly responsible for the dissolution of the cenobitic way of life be expelled from the convent and not consider this a small achievement but one that is very great and brings salvation.

27. KECHARITOMENE

3. Concerning those appointed to protect the convent and concerning their power and the fact that the things that I will prescribe about the convent in my will are of equal importance with this rule, which must be for ever unchanged and unaltered

Since it was necessary for my majesty to be concerned how the convent of my Mother of God Kecharitomene, after the departure of both of us from this world, would be well supplied with people who would protect it so that plundering by those who rob other people's property should not take place, as would happen if it were not guarded with some protection and security, this I have done and with the finest management I wish my most beloved daughter, the nun Lady Eudokia⁴ Born-in-the-Purple, to look after it, support and defend it, and keep away by every means those who try to injure it, and whenever there is perhaps a danger of any of the provisions of this rule being infringed she should prevent it, seeing that she is a nun and is going to reside in this convent. Moreover after she has departed to the other world ladies will be appointed to the oversight and ephoreia of the convent to whom my majesty will give this right, either by means of a supplement added to this rule⁵ or some document recording my last wish. For as regards the things that I shall prescribe in my last wishes [p. 35] concerning this convent and all the things in its possession, I wish that they also should have force, as if they had been written in this my rule and then that they should also remain forever unaltered in the same way as the things prescribed here. Yet if I should wish in my will to alter some of the things written by me in this document, this I will always be able to do, and no distinction will be made between this my rule and my last wish, in as much as all the decisions of my majesty in both documents concerning matters in the convent have great and equal force, unless some of the things written here, as has been stated, will be annulled by my will.

For this reason none of those who have been entrusted with the protection of the convent by my majesty should have control over any property in it, or pervert any of the provisions in this rule, or remove the superior, or enroll nuns, or introduce and expel them, or demand any accounts either of the superior herself or the steward or one of the nuns in the matters they manage and look after, or demand knowledge of the income and the expenditure, or try to get anything at all from the convent, or appropriate anything whatsoever or try to issue instructions. For we are entrusting the undisturbed management of the convent and of all the things in its possession to the superior herself and the nuns in accordance with the specification of the rule. We place the aforesaid women in charge of the convent for this purpose only, namely to support and look after it and its possessions, to pacify the nuns who are perhaps offended, and drive away those who wish to trample on the rights of the convent or infringe any of the things laid down in this rule. It will be enough for them to be commemorated each day in the convent only and after their deaths for their names to be inscribed on the holy diptychs. For we wish this our rule to have undisturbed and unviolated authority for ever, receiving no supplement nor suffering any deletion or change. For never will be violated anything that has been or will be laid down in this document, nor will an alteration or change be accepted in any way from anyone whatever, not even at a critical moment, even if much better edicts and arrangements are brought upon the convent either by the superior herself or the protectress of the convent as a result of which the convent and its possessions are expected to increase greatly and its situation to improve. [p. 37]

TWELFTH CENTURY

4. Concerning those of our granddaughters who have been tonsured and who have been permitted to live here, and those women of illustrious and noble life who come to this convent and are tonsured in it, and how they should live in the convent

If any of the daughters of my dearly beloved Lady Anna⁶ Born-in-the-Purple or of dearly beloved Lady Maria⁷ Born-in-the-Purple will wish to have her worldly hair cut in this convent or even enters after having her hair cut somewhere else, she will have to be accepted, and if she is willing to abide by the same rule and regulation, keeping to the way of life and diet and living accommodation and all the other conditions of those who practice the religious life in this convent, and introducing nothing different and at variance with the communal life of the remaining nuns, she is acceptable both to God and to me as concerns her very noble transformation and right conversion. But if perhaps as a result of her customary very luxurious way of life she were not able to change to one too harsh, she herself will communicate her own thoughts and actions to the common father of the nuns, confessing to him in the same way as the rest of the nuns, but she will follow the diet and the singing of psalms as far as she is able in the cell that will be given to her, that is the small tropike built behind the apse of the nuns' refectory close to their enclosure together with its lavatory and the rest of the necessary attendance that goes with this room. She will live on her own and eat more food than the usual diet of the other nuns, as both the situation of the tonsured [lady] demands and the discretion of the superior directs, and she will be permitted to have also two free women [p. 39] or even slaves acting as her servants, and they must be maintained by the convent.

However since the convent has been declared to be inaccessible to men, if in fact she were to wish to meet some of her family, or a pressing need demands it, she will not be allowed to bring them inside the convent but she will go out with the consent of the superior to the exit that leads to the gate, and when she has talked to them there, she will enter into the convent again keeping it inaccessible to men, as has been said. But if one of these women is not able to abide by the regulation laid down for the rest of the nuns in this our rule concerning going out of the convent, she will be permitted by the superior, if some unfortunate circumstance has happened to her, to leave the convent with one of the very old and devout sisters, whichever one the superior wishes. The nun will return immediately and she, when she has seen her sick relative for two or three days, will return to the convent. But if her sick relative is in fact breathing his last, she will remain there until he reaches the end of his life, if his end is delayed for one or two days or even longer, and then she will return to the convent.

Also if someone else who is very illustrious and has a devout disposition were to wish to cast off her worldly hair in this convent or were to enter after her hair was cut elsewhere, she also will have to be accepted. If she is willing to abide by the same rule and regulation keeping to the way of life and diet and living accommodation and all the other conditions of the nuns in this convent, she is acceptable to God and me. But if perhaps she were to shrink from the communal living, in this point only will it be possible for her to differ from the whole way of life and condition of the nuns, that is for her to have the aforementioned tropike for her private accommodation, being allowed to have also one servant maintained by the convent to minister to her. But in any other matters strict observance of communal living will not be neglected by the superior in the case of these women, except for what has been laid down here about them. For we did not prescribe that these women should be accepted for the destruction and disordering of the cenobitic way of life; for the distinction specified in their cases is sufficient. But if perhaps one of all these were to try to injure the convent in some way, and there are many examples of foolishness, or receive some of the nuns in her own cell and converse with them causing offense and division among the whole community, and if the superior is not able to get her to mend her ways, she will be removed even against her will by the protectress of the convent at the time. [p. 41]

27. KECHARITOMENE

5. Concerning the number of the nuns

So the nuns of the most pure Lady and Mother of God Kecharitomene will be twenty-four in number, who must devote themselves to the service of the church and the singing of psalms and the ministries of the convent continually. But if through the favor of the Mother of God Kecharitomene the [wealth] in the possession of her convent should increase considerably by any way, so that there is sufficient to provide for more, the limit of nuns should be fixed at thirty or should even be allowed to surpass this by a little and be set at as many as forty. But we forbid that those practicing the religious life in the convent should be more than this, though the superior should not be included in this number nor indeed the two girls; for we also prescribe that two girls should be reared in the convent and brought up and educated and prepared and be tonsured at the appropriate time. Nor should the six servants be included whom we prescribe to be in the convent to serve the community, and if these are not sufficient another one or two will be brought in. Also we allow the increase in the nuns to be up to forty, if the nuns keep unbroken the rule and terms of their cenobitic way of life which we have laid down, and their number does not hinder their strict observance of it. But if the increase of nuns becomes a cause of anarchy, we specify that this number should be totally void. For our concern is chiefly for the cenobitic way of life of the nuns, and not that there should be many nuns.

6. Concerning the fact that all the nuns should remain in one house

So all these women must sleep in one dormitory which was recently built by my majesty and set aside for this very purpose, all visible to all, so that the more indolent may imitate the conscientious as an “encouragement to virtue and good works” (Heb. 10:24). But if the number of the nuns is too big for the size of the room, those for whom there is no room in the dormitory that has been set aside will live in a part of the adjoining room. The other part of the room will be useful to them when they are devoting themselves to their handiwork under the gaze of the superior, whatever it is that she should decide for each of them, while one of them [p. 43] is reading a portion of the Holy Scriptures, whatever seems to the superior to be appropriate and conducive to spiritual pleasure and alleviates the toil of manual labor. The dormitories recently built by my majesty and set aside for the nuns for their rest, and the remaining cells inside the convent set aside for the nuns for a use of any sort, will remain in the same form and the same condition, neither becoming two-storied nor being altered in any other way.⁸

7. Concerning the fact that those who are going to be tonsured should be tonsured free of charge, and when the offering will be acceptable

We wish that those who enter should be accepted and have their hair cut as a gift and be counted in the aforesaid number of sisters without any gift. For neither will anyone provide a renunciation nor a customary gift nor will an offering be sought—neither that termed refectorial nor any other described by whatever name. For such things are a cause of insubordination, arguing, and disobedience for those who provide them, and not only are these people harmed very much as a result, but also they become an evil example among the rest of the community. Therefore I wish and prescribe that those who are going to have their hair cut be received into the convent as a gift without an offering of any kind and without them being asked for anything at all. But if one of them were to wish of her own free will to offer something of her own possessions, whether the offering is of movable or immovable property, it will be accepted. For what is offered in faith as a dedication to our all-pure Lady Kecharitomene and is going to be for the maintenance of the convent and to commemorate and help the soul of the giver ought not to be rejected.

[= (22) Evergetis [37], ed. lines 1154–61]: Yet she who makes an offering must not suppose that because of this she has any preference over the rest of the sisters, but she should be treated in the same way as every one else and will have to follow the rule of the convent. But if she ever tries to leave the convent tempted by demons—there are many examples of fickleness—and would like to take what she has given back, it must not be given to her whatever it happens to be. For what has once been consecrated to God cannot be taken away, and the person who takes it away is sacrilegious and everyone knows, even if we do not say it, the sort of punishment that committing sacrilege carries. So whoever makes an offering of private movable or immovable [p. 45] property should read the preceding words here, and if she makes her offering with a free motive pleasing to God, neither with the intention of getting it back later, nor seeking some preference over the other sisters as a result of it, then indeed her gift should be accepted and dedicated to Kecharitomene by whom she will be recompensed with the reward of her faith.

8. Concerning the fact that the movable and immovable property consecrated by lay people to the convent of Kecharitomene with a motive that is pleasing to God should be accepted

But if some lay person or one of our children or one of our other relatives or someone completely unrelated to us moved by an intention that is pleasing to God and by his own choice should choose to consecrate some movable or immovable property to the convent, we approve most readily his God-pleasing choice, knowing that he receives from God a recompense many times greater. We wish the income from the immovable property consecrated by him not to be spent to increase the diet of the nuns or to bring about any other change in our instructions, but to add to the number of nuns submitting themselves to the same rule, for distributions to the poor, as he wishes, and for the expenses of feasts and commemorations. For it will not be possible for those bringing offerings to make any new rules on the pretext of their offerings or issue instructions opposed to our commands, but the nuns will accept the things that have been offered with a motive that is pleasing to God, and will carry out whatever those who make the offerings prescribe concerning commemorations and distributions, but nothing more than this, as has been said before.

27. KECHARITOMENE

9. Concerning the fact that all the movable and immovable property set apart for the convent should be inalienable

I wish everything that has been set apart or will be set apart for the convent or that which will accrue in any way, not only immovable property but also the movable, to remain immovable and inalienable in its possession, not being given away nor removed, nor sold, nor disposed of in any way whatsoever, even if double or triple or ten times as much were given for the object being alienated. For to do such a thing or to consent to it taking place is sheer sacrilege, and he who has done such a thing or is responsible, whether he be an emperor, or patriarch or official, or private person, or superior of the convent, or one of the nuns in it, will render account to the Fearful and Just Judge. I specify that the immovable property that has been alienated be restored again to the convent by the efforts of the most holy patriarch, who by the laws and canons has responsibility for this, of the protectress of the convent, of the rest of the nuns who are to remind [her] and recall this [property], and anyone else wishing to seek revenge for the sake of piety. [p. 47]

10. Concerning when the movable property of the convent can be alienated

[cf. (22) Evergetis [19], ed. lines 851–53; 858–63]: So then alienation of the immovable property will be completely forbidden; and my majesty considers alienation of the movable property to be reasonable for one reason only, namely whenever some great damage has been done to the convent or the possessions in its control from foreign attack or fire or earthquake, and the convent is without money to repair the damage. For in that case I permit some of the movable property to be alienated for the repair of the immovable property, and then the alienation should take place to holy churches and divine chapels so that sacred objects might continue sacred and holy things might not be made public property. For it is acknowledged by all that what has once been consecrated ought not to be made public property. We choose the alienation of movable property in order to repair the immovable property for no simple-minded or chance reason, as someone might think, but because the income from immovable property is able to help the convent to a much greater extent, and because with the help of immovable property it is possible sometimes to acquire movable property, but the opposite is difficult. Also we do not allow this alienation to take place in this way without examination, nor secretly, nor in a corner, nor with the knowledge of some section of those in the convent but unknown to the rest, but it should take place when the superior, the steward, the ecclesiarchissa, the sacristan, and the rest of the preminent officials and the priests of the convent gather together for this purpose, decide about the proposed expenditure, and consider the category of the object to be alienated; then certain people are called in who have precise knowledge of the object to be sold off and publish a detailed list of valuation,⁹ which must be deposited and kept with the documents of the convent, and all this takes place with the knowledge of the protectress of the convent.

11. Concerning how the superior must be chosen and installed

The choosing and installation of the superior must now be discussed. For as my majesty has already appointed the superior who has been appointed, if a superior is needed again while I am alive, she will be appointed by me, but after my death this regulation of mine will be in force. For I prescribe that if the death of the superior then in office is expected and known in advance, all the community should go to her, and by the common decision of both them and her, since she has knowledge of the conduct and way of life of each of the nuns, three should be chosen who are distinguished for their mode of life, excel in intellect and good sense, and are wiser and more skilled than the others in the leading and tending of souls, being women recognized and acknowledged as such, whether [p. 49] some such women are found among the officials or among the rest of the nuns.

But if the superior should happen to depart from this life unexpectedly, without giving any consideration to her successor or making anything known, then, when the whole community has gathered by itself, it should make its choice of the three in the presence also of the current protectress of the convent. But if a rift should occur and a dispute arise among them concerning the choice, which I pray does not happen, the protectress of the convent will resolve the argument favoring the judgment of the group which excels in virtue and the spiritual life, but she will always be careful to make her decision freely and dispassionately, unless she wishes to see the Judge and Master of all creation perversely influenced against her because she perhaps perverted the course of justice in an unjust decision, which I pray does not happen. Those are the instructions concerning the selection.

The selection and installation of one of the chosen women will be carried out in this manner. On three similar pieces of paper of the same size the following words will be written by the spiritual father of the nuns, "Master, Our Lord Jesus Christ, Thou who knowest the hearts [of men], by the intercessions of our all-pure Lady the Mother of God Kecharitomene, reveal to us sinners whether thou hast judged this our sister worthy of the position of our superior," and again the same words will be written on the other pieces of paper with only the names changed. When the pieces of paper have been stamped with a seal by the protectress of the convent, they will be placed on the holy table by the priest during vespers on Saturday in the sight of the protectress and the community, or, if some feast of Our Savior Jesus Christ or of our all-pure Lady the Mother of God should occur then, after a vigil has been completed and you have made whole-hearted supplication to God from a contrite heart, my most venerable mothers, since the matter for which we made the supplication is important and on it hangs the maintenance of the convent and equally its destruction as well as the hope of salvation.

[cf. (22) Evergetis [13], ed. lines 633–40]: On the next day when [the divine liturgy has been celebrated, after the completion of this and while the priest is still dressed in his priestly vestments, a trisagion will be performed by you and these troparia will be sung, "Have mercy on us, O Lord," "Glory," "Lord, turn to us from heaven and behold" (Ps. 79 [80]:14), "And now," "Only-Begotten One of the Same Substance." The priest will make an ektenes declaiming this after the other petitions, "We again beg that the Lord Our God reveal to us the one worthy of our leadership." You will respond "Kyrie eleison" thirty times and perform fifteen genuflections repeating this also to yourselves while you raise your hands to God: "God, Thou who knowest the hearts [of men], show to us sinners the one worthy of our leadership.” [p. 51] After these genuflections, when the priest himself has performed three full genuflections in front of the holy table and, still dressed in his priestly vestments, is repeating the same invocation, he will choose and lift up one of the three pieces of paper. When it has been offered in the presence of the whole community by the priest himself to the one who placed her own seal upon it, she will recognize her own seal, and, as all watch, the piece of paper will be opened and the owner of the name written on it will be revealed. Then as our typikon and the staff are lying in the place before the holy altar she, after performing three genuflections, will take these objects, pondering and considering with herself from where she takes them, and to whom she promises to protect them, and that angels are recording her promise and are the ones who are going to lead her to that fearful place of judgment to give account of the fulfilling of her promises. Then she will stand in the place assigned to the superior, and everyone will offer her the divine greeting [with a kiss]. After the greeting, glory will be offered to God and the dismissal will follow with the priest’s customary prayer. She will be your superior thereafter; you will revere her as a mother, and have an obedient attitude towards her as the one appointed by God.

27. KECHARITOMENE

So it is my prayer that there will always be among you yourselves an abundance of women worthy of the leadership, and that there will never fail to be nuns naturally suitable for this office in this most holy convent of the Kecharitomene, and whenever a need to appoint a superior arises, the selection can take place from the nuns themselves who practice the religious life here, seeing that with God’s help they have laid down a very good foundation of the monastic and cenobitic way of life and in keeping with the foundation are building the edifice of the virtuous community. But if there is not an abundance of three such nuns in the convent but only two are found worthy of such leadership, they will be sufficient, and when the names of these two only are written down, the events that follow will proceed as has been stated. But if, something my majesty prays does not happen, there appears to be no one worthy of this leadership in the convent, then the protectress of the convent at the time will find a second nun from another convent, someone reverent and proven as suitable for the position of superior. Then again when the names of these two have been written down, the one in the convent and the one brought from outside, as has been stated, the procedure will be observed as it has been written down, and then the one approved by it and shown to be worthy will be appointed to the position of superior.

12. Concerning the fact that the selection of the superior and the appointment of officials also should be carried out dispassionately

[= (22) Evergetis [14], ed. lines 707–27]: Well then, we also entreat you, our most venerable mothers, when you are obliged to carry out the selection of the superior, and the choosing of the rest of the officials [p. 53] is being done by the superior, there should be no strife, there should be no jealousy, there should be no pointless partiality or irrational favoritism, but the judgment and testing should be made by you truly, with a strict purpose and correct judgment, as if the eye “that beholds all things” was watching (Sir. 15:19). So then, do not resort to quarreling and dissension in your selection, but choose the one who has been selected with unanimity, peace, and love.

[= Evergetis [17], ed. lines 800–07]: When the selection and choosing is taking place there will be no one who will usurp unworthily the office of superior or any other office, making a display perhaps of her seniority or sphere of work or noble birth or her offering of some property or money. But the one who is to be preferred among you, will be whoever is such as the passage above described, whether she happens to have been recently tonsured or came to the convent from a secular life.

[= (22) Evergetis [16], ed. lines 764–80]: Therefore you should reserve all affection, all submission, and all obedience for your superior, as one of the divine fathers has said in these words, “for if those who care for us are going to render account for us, how will we not submit to them in everything, and obey and serve them as the other parts of the body do the head?”¹⁰ As the Divine Apostle also says, “Obey your leaders and submit to them, for they are keeping watch over your souls as men who will have to give account” (Heb. 13:17). But for my sake may you maintain love, peace, and harmony with one another, burning with a tender affection for one another, supporting one another, instructing (Rom. 15:14), comforting (1 Thes. 4:18), forbearing (Eph. 4:2), exerting yourselves strongly to achieve whatever is good or brings salvation, whatever is virtuous and worthy of praise (cf. Phil. 4:8). For Our Lord Jesus Christ says “this is my commandment to you that you love one another even as I have loved you” (John 15:12) and “by this all men will know that you are my disciples if you love one another” (John 13:34).

[= (22) Evergetis [17], ed. lines 785–99]: You, spiritual mother and guide of this holy flock, be moderate, and in your concern for the sisters, maintain in everything a motherly affection towards them, yes, we entreat you, care for them all, support them all instructing, advising, teaching, comforting, healing the sick, supporting the weak, encouraging the faint-hearted, restoring those who sin, as St. Basil says in these words, “the superior himself like a father caring for true children will watch over the need of each one, and will bring them as far as he can suitable healing and care, and will support the member that is truly weak, whether physically or spiritually, with love and fatherly affection.”¹¹

13. Concerning the removal of the superior who does not act as she ought to [= (22) Evergetis [13], ed. lines 644–58]: So much for those matters. What is about to be said next concerning the one who will be superior after our death and those who will be mothers superior after her, [p. 55] I did not wish to commit to writing, for it should not be necessary to remove from this position and rank someone who has previously been selected for this. Also this would be a pleasing and agreeable state of affairs if in fact our nature had been unchanging and immutable, but since that is impossible—for later we change and alter, such is human nature, and when we are thought worthy of honor we grow weaker with regard to the performance of good deeds, whether it is through giving way to laziness, as in most cases, since authority has a habit of weakening those who have been elevated to it, whereas they ought to demonstrate a greater struggle and diligence—for these reasons the matter must be committed to writing and punishment given as strongly as possible.

[cf. (22) Evergetis [14], ed. lines 661–74, 694–700]: So if the superior should continue unchanged, properly maintaining her virtue through which she was thought worthy of that rank, she will not be removed from this office but remain firm. But if time proves her to be unqualified and unsuitable, either because she has exercised her leadership of the sisters in a careless and indifferent manner, or because she has been doing favors for her relatives, or has been appropriating some of the convent's property herself, or has been betraying or subjecting it to someone else, or totally disregarding any of the [instructions] in the rule, following her own wishes and therefore has been proved unsuitable for the guiding of souls, if then living wickedly she were ever to take stock of herself and give up her evil ways and embark on the road that leads to the higher things and salvation, let her stay and be the superior. But should this same woman still not give up her evil ways, but in fact indulge in them more widely, we instruct the protectress of the convent to remove that worthless woman from your leadership, and again another selection and vote be held and an appointment of another superior in accordance with the above instructions.

[cf. (22) Evergetis [14], ed. lines 701–02]: But the one removed from the position of superior, if she were removed from it because of old age or lack of intelligence and wished to remain and reside in the future in the convent as one of the sisters and be subject to the superior in everything, provided that she neither destroyed in any way the good order of the convent nor was the cause or object of mischief, she should stay then in the convent. But the one who clearly contributed to the destruction of the convent's structure and its discipline and way of life and to the disregarding of the instructions in this rule of my majesty should be completely driven out so no cause for offense may arise for the rest.

14. Concerning the fact that the steward in the convent must be a eunuch of godly life

My majesty prescribes that there should be a steward in the convent administering the properties that belong to it according to the decision of the superior, and managing matters in them according to her wish. There is one already appointed by my majesty, and if another is needed, another will be brought in by my majesty. [p. 57] But whenever I depart from this life, he will be appointed by the superior either from among those who carry out the liturgy in the convent, that is if one of these is active and worthy of being the steward, or even someone from outside, approved and appointed in the following manner. After he has been selected following an inquiry and knows what he has to do, he will be revealed to the one who has the oversight of the convent in order to be acknowledged by her, then entering the church of the convent and remaining for a short time while a trisagion is performed by the sisters,¹² falling down he will prostrate himself both before the other divine icons of the saints and before the revered and all-holy icon of the Mother of God Kecharitomene. Then when he has kissed it and the priest has prayed the prayer for the dismissal, he will go out of the church and from that moment be the steward and will look after the convent's properties, receiving a private copy of this chapter which makes clear his duties.

The oversight of all the immovable property belonging to the convent both inside and outside the capital will be a task requiring zealous attention, as will the accounts of the caretakers and building superintendents, the retiling of the convent and of the properties in its possession which is carried out every year with suitable care, the repair of buildings which perhaps collapse in the convent; on the instruction of the superior, he must devote his efforts and attention to this. In addition he should concern himself with the revenues from legitimate endowments and with the management of everything in the properties and houses to make them more profitable, and should not allow those who at the time are looking after these things either to be careless in protecting and increasing them or to appropriate some of the income and make private profit. But his oversight in these matters should be exercised carefully and the revenues brought to the convent unaltered, and the crops and other items dispatched at the appropriate time, the ships that should transport them being dispatched in good time; the money should be brought to the convent and in the presence of the steward handed over to the superior and the treasurer, with a receipt for it signed by them and then entered in the income and expenditure of the treasury. But if the steward is away perhaps, staying in properties outside the convent, the handing over to them of the money that is being paid in should take place in the presence of the assistant steward. But if the assistant steward is also away in properties outside the convent, the money should be brought to the superior and the treasurer alone, and the receipts signed by them as has been stated.

The steward should be careful to make accounts of the caretakers at the appropriate time and not defer them, but more importantly he should go round the properties everywhere and observe the caretakers themselves and the properties, and be keen that these should increase; he should also visit the places that belong to the convent in the City, [p. 59] as is possible, and thus by his very deeds demonstrate his work as steward and bring to the convent the accounts of the caretakers and building superintendents made annually by him, and hand them over to the superior each year so that they may be scrutinized by her and then an exoneration of the caretakers issued by her. But if perhaps one of the stewards then in office should be discovered not carrying out these things according to the above description, he will be removed from his stewardship, and when the superior consults with the protectress of the convent concerning the report on this man, another person will be appointed such as the passage above described.

Briefly, my majesty gives this instruction: let everything be managed by the steward at the time with the knowledge and consent of the superior. He will also have an assistant steward, one of the assigned priests in the convent, as will be described, and his task will be to list all the revenues coming into the convent—money, crops, and other items—and know about these. But when the steward is perhaps not present, on the authority of the superior he will carry out her instructions.

15. Concerning the priests

There must be two priests around the convent; they should be eunuchs and monks, venerable in their way of life, gentle, restrained, knowing how to read the holy words of divine scripture well. But if through a shortage of these they are not monks, they should nevertheless be eunuchs of proven virtue and piety, so that the community may be helped towards the practice of virtue by their holy blessings and acceptable prayers and may raise a pleasing song “to the ears of the Lord of hosts” (James 5:4); and he, accepting their supplications on our behalf, will graciously forgive our sins on the day of judgment (cf. Matt. 6:12; 12:36).

Of these two priests one will also be the assistant steward as has been explained more fully in the chapter on the steward. Whenever the steward is either dismissed as unsuitable perhaps or departs from this life, the assistant steward, if he is worthy to act as steward, should be appointed steward, and in his place another priest should be introduced at once, the sort of person that the passage above described.

27. KECHARITOMENE

16. Concerning the fact that all the nuns should be subject to one spiritual father

I wish all the nuns to confess their thoughts to one spiritual father who is a eunuch very distinguished for virtue, and, as a result of his age and monastic life, has gained much experience in the hearing of confessions and is capable of administering appropriate remedies to souls who make confession. [p. 61]

17. Concerning the way that visitors must speak with the nuns; who they must be and when

Even though it has been stated by the fathers in many places in the monastic regulations that monks do not have any family relationship on earth, yet because of human weakness we order that if a woman should visit the convent, the mother of a nun perhaps, or a sister, or a brother's wife, she will enter the convent with the permission of the superior, and when she has eaten with the nuns the food that has been set out, she will depart in the evening. If she came to see a relative who is in good health, she will do this once or twice a year, but if it was to see someone sick with a serious disease, if she is the mother, she will stay in the convent and sit beside her sick daughter, and on the second day when she has eaten the same food as the nuns she will depart in the evening. But if it happens to be a sister or a brother's wife or a sister's or brother's daughter who has come to see her, she will quite definitely depart in the evening on whatever day she comes.

But if it is a man who had come to see her, her father perhaps or a brother or a sister's husband, in no way will he enter the convent. For my majesty specifies that this be untrodden by any men and be for ever barred to them, but when a man knocks outside, after the superior has been told, the nun whom the caller wishes to see will go to the gate at her command and the superior will go with her, if she wishes and is able, or on her instruction one of the oldest and most venerable nuns, and when the gate has been opened the caller will stand at the gate, talk to the nun briefly, and go away. But if the nun whom the father or brother or sister's husband has come to see is perhaps sick and is in such a condition that she cannot reach the gate, none of them even then will enter the convent. But if the sick nun were to wish and consider it necessary to see her relative who has called, she should be carried in a litter, and when she has reached the gate, see him there, and be brought back.

For to give men an excuse to enter the convent and not have the outside gate at once barred against them all is a great burden to my majesty and ill-considered. For I have a fear that some harm from an attack of the devil might come to those who are married to the Holy Bridegroom, and for this reason I think it appropriate that men be barred from all entry, and so I command it. The same rule should apply even if a man should visit the convent to speak with the superior. But if perhaps the father or mother of one of the nuns were to be sick and be in such a condition as to be breathing his last, and the nun whose father or mother was ill were to wish and think it necessary to see her sick father or mother, she will leave the convent with the permission of the superior, taking along with her two of the oldest and most godly nuns, and when she has seen her sick father perhaps or her mother, she will return to the convent in the evening, not allowing herself in any way to stay anywhere outside the convent. [p. 63]

Moreover we do not wish those who take care of the property of the convent and those who visit the convent for other reasons, for whom it is necessary and useful to be seen by the superior, to speak to her inside the convent, but she will go out beyond the inner gate with two or three of the most devout old women and speak with the visitors between the two gates, and give consideration to the convent's property and then come back again into the convent keeping it untrodden by men, as has been said. But if there were no compelling business for which she was likely to go out and speak with those entering, she should not go out but be informed either by the steward or by the priest, and she should carry out what seems to her beneficial.

TWELFTH CENTURY

If a woman should come to the convent to see her, we leave the matter to her decision, for she would not dare to have a conversation with someone who visits from outside, contrary to the monastic rules. But if a woman of a distinguished and noble life, a lay person or nun from outside the convent, will wish to visit the convent because of the virtue of the nuns leading the religious life in it, she will in no way be prevented, but will enter it with the permission of the superior, and when she has eaten along with the nuns will depart in the evening. But if the visitor were to wish and think it necessary to stay in the convent, she will remain in it and leave on the following day. This will happen once or twice in the year, in the case of each of the devout women who visit. Those who arrive in this way will rest in the room for official visitors near the gate and will enter and leave the convent through the entrance there.

18. Concerning the person by whom the installation of the officials must be made and how [cf. (22) Evergetis [29]]: The superior will be the one carrying out both the selection and the installation of all the officials of the convent, selecting and installing by her own decision. For whenever it is necessary for anyone to be installed to whatever sort of office, the keys will be placed in front of the holy sanctuary and along with them the words about this office copied from this rule of my majesty. After a trisagion has been completed the one set apart for the office will approach, genuflect three times, receive the keys, and after this will bow her head to the superior having prostrated herself before the feet of the superior and got up again. She will install her, addressing these words to her "The most pure Mother of God Kecharitomene sets you apart for this office." [p. 65] However in the case of the offices for which there are no keys, the words of installation spoken by the superior will be sufficient for the installation and the receipt of the written instructions concerning each office from the place in front of the holy sanctuary, as has been described. It is necessary that the officials receive from the place in front of the holy sanctuary personal instructions for the office entrusted to each of them, so that [each] may know from where she is receiving her office and in what way she promises to manage it.

19. Concerning the sacristan

I wish there to be a sacristan in the convent who must guard the sacred vessels and liturgical cloths, and think worthy of every kind of care the things handed over to her in a written and reliable inventory of transfer. Similarly, the same official must receive the wax that is brought into the convent, and record in detail the expenditures on it, and render an account to the superior. The same official must with the help of women inside the convent make the prescribed quantity of candles for the year according to the weight laid down by my majesty for all the lighting of the church, and hand them over to the ecclesiarchissa, who will carry out the lighting of the church in the way that will be described in what follows. This official must hand over to the ecclesiarchissa for the service of the church both the things for daily use and the things used in the feasts, and when it is time, receive these back again from her and guard them; and the things surplus to requirements she must keep in the sacristy shut up and sealed by the superior, and she is required to hand back everything that has been entrusted to her whenever she is moved from this office according to the inventory of transfer made out for it. For it is within the power of the superior to remove and change those who hold office in the manner that will be described.

27. KECHARITOMENE

[= (22) Evergetis [32], ed. lines 1012–18]: For it is just to leave unchanged those who have been appointed to each of the offices while they are performing them in a careful and devout manner, but those who neglect or despise them, and perhaps even behave deceitfully in them, should be removed and others appointed. If one of these people were to appropriate something, anything at all, she will be responsible to the all-pure Mother of God Kecharitomene from whom in fact she received her keys.

The same person will be not only sacristan but also archivist, receiving with a register all the papers containing the rights of ownership of the convent, and will guard these, thinking them worthy of every kind of care, and will not allow them to become moth-eaten. When a need for some document occurs, on the instruction of the superior she will bring out the required document and hand it over, noting down what sort of document it is and who received it. When a few days have passed after this, she will remind the superior [p. 67] and recall the document that was produced, as has been described, and will not allow it to be lost. Since the wax coming into the convent is greatly in excess of the outlays, my majesty prescribes that only five kentenaria of it be kept for the church and the remaining requirements, and the rest at the time it comes in be immediately sold and the proceeds devoted to the other expenses of the convent.¹³

20. Concerning the ecclesiarchissa

The ecclesiarchissa moreover, being appointed by the superior, will be whoever seems to her fit and suitable for this office, receiving from the sacristan at the time of her appointment with an inventory everything that should be used in the church of the convent, and at the proper time the other things suitable for daily use or for use during the feasts. She will look after the customary decoration of the church and the lighting laid down for each occasion in this rule, receiving from the sacristan the made-up candles as prescribed in the rule, both those prescribed to be burnt for daily use and those for each feast, and she should look after the orderly condition of the church during the singing of the psalms as is customary for ecclesiarchissai. The ecclesiarchissa ought always to have an assistant ecclesiarchissa working with her, ministering and assisting in the office assigned to her.

21. Concerning the official who takes in the food and issues it, and the register of these things that she must make

Similarly we instruct the official taking in and issuing all the provisions of food for the convent to list them in detail, how much and when and from where, and to see that the issue is clearly in accordance with the instruction of the superior, if she is going to ensure that her office is free from blame and scandal, and to inform them all if she is going to maintain peace and avoid giving offense to the whole community.

TWELFTH CENTURY

22. Concerning the wine-steward

The superior will also appoint a wine-steward who must receive all the wine both old and new that is brought into the convent, list this, and issue it when she is instructed by the superior. [p. 69]

23. Concerning the provisioner

The superior will also appoint a provisioner who must receive all the crops and the legumes also, and issue these on the instruction of the superior, and take care of these things in every way, so that they are not perhaps ruined by neglect in the granaries.

24. Concerning the office of the treasurers

Now I must speak about the keeping and listing of monetary income and expenditure. For we prescribe that there should be two treasurers in the convent, one of whom should control the box for monetary income and expenditure and the other should control the storeroom for clothes; for she will also be called the treasurer. The treasurer of the monetary income along with the other treasurer in charge of the storeroom with the knowledge of the superior and in her presence will list all the monetary income that comes into the convent, what sort it is and from where, and on the instruction of the superior removing from it whatever amount of money the superior wishes, and recording this in a small register, she with the other treasurer will take it and pay it out when the superior instructs her. A detailed note will be made by her of the payment of this money, and she will bring the note back after paying the money in full, and a calculation will be made by the superior in the presence also of the other treasurer, and lists of the money paid out in this way must be set out on a special register and placed in the treasury; then the treasurer will take more money again on the instruction of the superior and this will go on continuously. Moreover the box of this money for income and expenditure must be sealed by the two treasurers and the superior herself.

But we wish another box to be placed in the sacristy sealed by the superior, the steward, the sacristan, and the treasurers, which must contain the stored-up money. So when in the fullness of time some money of an old issue is found to be superfluous by the mercy of the Kecharitomene, since it happens then to be of no use to the convent, this should be stored up in the aforementioned box which is to be unsealed and sealed, as has been described above, and a note should be made of the deposit of money. Conversely, if some misfortune should happen to the convent—which I pray does not happen—with the result that it does not have the means for its expenditure from anywhere else, this box can be unsealed again by those who sealed it, and an amount of money removed and this given to the treasury and the payments can proceed as has been described above. [p. 71]

25. Concerning the refectorian and her office

[= (22) Evergetis [31], ed. lines 997–1005]: Along with the other officials which the way of life of those living in a community obviously needs, the superior will appoint a refectorian also, who serves whatever the cellarer supplies her with and during the meal itself she must go around the refectory silently and quietly and if she should see any of the sisters causing annoyance and being disorderly or whispering, she ought to gently remind them of silence and advise them to sing in their heart and refrain from conversation. Furthermore the strict adherence of the sisters to proper observance will be her concern, and to be aware of which of them was absent during grace and who was missing from the meal, and to make a report about each one to the superior who by her own selection and choice appoints those who ought to hold office and will have the power to allow those who blamelessly carry out the office entrusted to them to occupy them for a very long time, if she wishes, but to remove as unsuitable those who do not carry them out as they ought, which I pray does not happen, and appoint others instead. In these cases the superior will act in accordance with her own decision and pleasure.

I exhort all those entrusted with an office of any sort, even the lowest, and as a favor I ask each of them to exercise her own office well and in a way pleasing to God, and have the sort of attitude towards the fulfillment of what is connected with it as those who are entrusted with the things of God and will have to render an account for them to God, as is the truth indeed. For the merciful God mercifully receives for himself what is done by us for each other, as the Holy Gospels teach us in which he clearly says, “As you did it to one of these, you did it to me, and as you did it not, you did it not to me” (Matt. 25:40).

[= (22) Evergetis [33], ed. lines 1036–58]: I entreat them to apply themselves wholeheartedly to their offices and not to be neglectful or despairing, as if they have lost benefit to themselves by being absent from the divine services as a result of being occupied with their offices, but I bid them be more cheerful and joyful because the Lord has given them the strength through the intercessions of his virgin mother Kecharitomene to serve their own sisters in imitation of him, who says “I came not to be served but to serve and give my life as a ransom for many” (Matt. 20:28; Mark 10:45).

You see, sisters, what work you perform, you see whom you imitate. You see that you are putting into practice the greatest of all good, love. So you should be happy and rejoice because you yourselves are accomplishing each day by your work what could scarcely be achieved by those devoting themselves to prayer. You are blessed in that occupation and to be envied. For prayer is indeed a fine thing, a very fine thing, bringing us into contact with God [p. 73] and raising us from earth to heaven, but love is of course greater and much more important. For the former is part of virtue and an element and section of the whole body of perfection, but love is its crown and consummation. For joined to itself it displays humility that exalts (cf. Matt. 23:12), mercy, and love of mankind because of which God indeed became man and is called God, and through which man is revealed as God and like the “Heavenly Father” (Matt. 5:48).

So why do you give up the treasure house and culmination of all these good things and run to what is inferior and to the possession of one thing when thus having reached the summit easily you should hold on to it securely and do everything so as not to be thrown down from it? “We are afraid,” she says, “because of our failure to carry out the rule;” but do not be afraid, for sincere confession will make up to your failure in this, justly granting you pardon. Only let it not be a failure caused by indolence. Fear this, be on your guard against this; but if this is not the case, then rejoice, I beg you, attending to your offices eagerly.

TWELFTH CENTURY

26. Concerning the appointment of a disciplinary official and her office

Moreover the superior will appoint also a disciplinary official whom she by her own selection considers worthy of this office. She should be in charge of the monastic way of life and orderliness, and keep a close watch during the communal gatherings and the singing of hymns, lest any of the sisters anywhere should neglect the singing and talk to each other, and neglect speaking with God but have a conversation one with another. She should also watch them during the communal gatherings for eating so that they remain quiet and orderly as befits nuns. Furthermore in all aspects of their life and behavior she should keep a close watch on their actions, and if she sees any of them either sitting with each other and talking foolishly or remaining idle and lazy by themselves—those whom the great apostle orders not to eat (II Thess. 3:10)—or doing something else incompatible with a monastic profession and foreign to a spiritual way of life that is pleasing to God, she should approach them gently like a sister, and quietly and lovingly instruct them in what they should do and advise them of what is beneficial, that, ceasing from whispering which brings no benefit, or rather is harmful to the soul—for no other reason than those who are involved are distracted from their communion with God—they should devote themselves to the giving of praise to God, and fix their minds on what is being sung, and flee from the source “of all evil, laziness” (Sir. 30:28), copying David who was wise in divine matters when he says “I am alone” (Ps. 140 [141]:10), and remain quietly in their own places either applying themselves to prayer or doing some work with their hands to rout pernicious akedia and meditate continuously on frightening death [p. 75] and recall unceasingly the fearful day of judgment. One of these nuns who are occupied with the handiwork, the one instructed by the superior, will read the holy and saving words of the Holy Scripture for all to hear.

27. Concerning the work organizers

The superior will appoint two of the nuns, whichever ones she selects from the rest, to be in charge of the work. They must take from the storehouse material useful for the handiwork of the nuns with a note at the time and give this out to those who are working on the instruction of the superior. Again with her knowledge they must take back the articles made with the materials that were given out and hand them over to those working in the storeroom for clothes with a note so that these can be issued on the instruction of the superior.

28. Concerning the treasurers in the storeroom for clothes

The treasurers of the storeroom for the clothes of the nuns—for these also will be called treasurers—should receive all the things that must be used for the clothing of the nuns with a note and give them out on the instruction of the superior whenever she wishes. These same nuns will also receive all the other things for the service of the nuns, that is blankets, pillows, bed covers, articles necessary for the bath, in short, everything, and they will give them out whenever the superior instructs them, making notes of the issue of these things and rendering an account to her.

29. Concerning the gatekeeper

Furthermore the superior must appoint the one who is to hold the keys of the gate, whom we call the gatekeeper, whose responsibility it will be not to open the gate at all without the permission of the superior and to see to it that people do not enter or leave the convent without the knowledge of the superior. For this reason the chapter dealing with these things, namely how and when and which of the visitors should speak with the nuns, will be copied out and put into her hands, so that having a knowledge of the words of the rule she might remind the superior, and on her instruction the conversations may take place in accordance with the intent of the rule. Moreover the one appointed to this office must be an old woman and by the testimony of the whole community a person of godly life. Each evening she will bring the keys to the superior. Nor will she see relatives who have come to see her without the permission of the superior, but with her permission she will see them in whatever way she is permitted. Furthermore [p. 77] my majesty does not wish her to remain continuously at the gate, but prescribes that she should sit with the community in the house set apart, and if there is a need for her to visit the gate, being informed by the bell that she is called to the gate, she will go on the instruction of the superior, and when she has fulfilled her office, whatever it is, she will come back again and sit down with the rest.

27. KECHARITOMENE

30. Concerning how long a woman who enters from outside and is going to be tonsured must stay in the convent¹⁴

If those women, who are going to be tonsured and make up the prescribed number of the nuns, wish once they have lost their hair to put on the robe of submission and the cloak only, they will wait for the period of six months. But if some happen to be familiar and important personages so that it is known what sort of people they were in their lives and they are well aware of the way of life and conduct of the convent, they will have their hair cut in accordance with the rule, when the superior judges it beneficial. Those who wish to put on the holy habit at once, if they are devout women and were practicing the monastic life in secular clothing, will not wait for the period of testing—that is three years—which the holy fathers laid down as a rule for a trial and test in the case of those whose state of life is different, but in the case of these women the period of six months will be sufficient for a complete trial, and then they will get their desire as has been declared by the holy fathers. But if they happen to be women who have no knowledge and are not known, after remaining in the convent for one week they will put on monastic cloaks, and being ordered to serve in tasks according to their abilities, they will persevere for three years in the convent, not being thought worthy of the great and angelic habit, until the three-year period of their trial is passed and proves them acceptable and worthy of such a way of life. For the regulations laid down to meet these cases require that this period of time should remain in force, except when a serious disease occurs and forces the period of testing to be reduced. [p. 79]

31. Concerning who should be sent to take care of the properties of the convent

The men who are sent to take care of the properties of the convent must not be selected for any family connection or affinity or any other reason of that sort, but the superior and the steward at the time must put a lot of care into finding people who are reputable and content with little, who bring relief to the people in the properties and appropriate nothing that belongs to the convent, and are experienced in husbandry. The superior will have the authority to send out these men and to decide who will succeed them whenever they are found to have strayed from uprightness. The steward must oversee them whenever he is sent by the superior to inspect the storehouses and receive the accounts of the caretakers and manage everything as he ought.

32. Concerning the office of the first, third, and sixth hour

[cf. (22) Evergetis [4], ed. lines 75–117]: But having spoken up to now about these matters, come now, we shall discuss in future the ecclesiastical office and, in order to begin with the light, let us begin with the first hour of the day imitating God in this, who began his formation of the world with the creation of light. So then after the completion of the worship of matins, we must continue with the first hour in the customary way and at the end of this the following prayer should be said, “Thou who at all times and all hours.” After the prayer the customary genuflections should be performed, by the more able ones from the ground without a prie-dieu but by the weaker ones with a low support and aid. The genuflection consists of fifteen prostrations, of which the first three must be performed in a more unhurried manner and slowly enough in the standing up and the bending of the knees, that each of you is able to say each time three times while standing with hands stretched out, “God, be merciful to me the sinner” (Luke 18:13). Then when you have knelt down with your head on the ground, you should say three times in the same way, “I have sinned against Thee, Lord, forgive me.” You must perform three genuflections like that, but the remaining twelve more quickly, so that each of you can say once when kneeling and once when standing the aforementioned words of supplication. You will not perform the kneeling down and the rising up when each of you wishes in a disorderly and confused manner, but as one body, kneeling down together and getting up together, [p. 81] using as a guide for both actions the ecclesiarchissa who is standing in front of the holy sanctuary and is indicating by her kneeling when to kneel and by her rising when to rise.

This is the procedure on the day when “Alleluia” is chanted instead of “God is the Lord.” (Ps.117 [118]: 27) However, if the day has an office and dismissal hymn, and “God is the Lord” is sung, the first three genuflections will be performed with the words of supplication, as previously stated, but the twelve will be omitted and will in no way be performed in the church but in your dormitory; moreover after the three slower genuflections you will say aloud with hands stretched out, “Eternal God, the Maker of all creation.”

After this prayer a reading of the catechesis will be set out for you, and after the reading you will perform the prescribed trisagion which is for us. While God wishes me to live, I command you to say these troparia: “Have mercy on us, Lord, have mercy on us,” “Gloria,” “Good Hope of the world,” “And now,” “No one who has recourse to you.” But when I have died I command you to say troparia of repose: “Remember, Lord, as Thou art good, Thy servant,” “Gloria,” “Give her repose, Our Savior,” “And now,” “No one who has recourse to Thee,” “Refuge and Might.” In addition to this say, Kyrie eleison, fifteen times and then you will add on this prayer, “Thou who sendest out the light.” Moreover you will pray all the prayers with hands stretched out.

When the aforementioned prayer has been said and the priest has spoken the customary prayer, you will all fall on your faces to the ground, and the superior, being your leader in all goodness will say as follows, “Pray for me, sisters, to the Lord, that I may be delivered from passions and the snares of the Evil One.” You will answer, “May God save you, honored mother, and you also, pray for us, holy mother, that we may be delivered from passions and the snares of the Evil One.” Then she again praying will say, “May God through the prayers of our fathers save us all.” Then standing up proceed to the communal house of your shared life, and when you are there, you will avoid every foolish distraction, but all of you will apply yourselves to your work, while one of you, whoever has been ordered by the superior, sits in the middle and reads whatever she has been instructed to; for the reading will prevent all foolish and useless or even harmful conversations and will secure great benefit for those who are willing to attend to it.

27. KECHARITOMENE

33. Concerning the mesoria of the first, third, and sixth hour, the typika, the holy liturgy, and the holy partaking

[cf. (22) Evergetis [4], ed. lines 140–45]: When the proper time comes, the semantron will be struck and at that point you will sing the mesoria of the first hour, then the third and the sixth hour [p. 83] with their mesoria, prayers, and prostrations, wherever the superior wishes, either in the dormitory or in the exonarthex of the church. You will sing the typika in the narthex of the church; however when there is a vigil, you will not perform a prostration in your dormitory because of weariness from the vigil, neither during the Twelve Days nor during the whole of Pentecost nor yet during the nine days after the feast of the Dormition of the most holy Mother of God and those after that of the Transfiguration of my Savior Christ,¹⁵ nor on the actual feast days of the twelve glorious and all-blessed Apostles, nor on any Saturday. But the holy and divine liturgy must be celebrated each Wednesday, Friday, Saturday, and Sunday, and during the feasts. Moreover it must take place during the fasts, as the synaxarion prescribes.

[cf. (22) Evergetis [5], ed. lines 160–90]: I instruct you, sisters, that while the divine liturgy is being celebrated you keep yourselves very attentive and stand full of fear and dread. For very holy and awesome and dreadful, surpassing all speech and understanding, are the happenings during this most precious sacrifice of the all-pure body and blood of Christ Our True God, during which you must be especially attentive and chase away every foul thought and only think about the great, divine, and fearful mystery beyond our comprehension which is being celebrated. Then those who have been allowed to partake must partake of the divine elements. Therefore, since partaking of the elements is an illumination of the soul for those who are nearly worthy, the one who partakes unworthily, eats and drinks judgment upon himself, as the Divine Apostle says (cf. I Cor. 11:27–29). We wish you to partake of these very frequently; nevertheless we entrust the decision on the divine partaking to your spiritual father with the knowledge also of the superior. But for someone to consider herself unworthy of communion without his knowledge cannot be approved. The one who does this will be condemned as one who carries out her own wish. However it is permitted that those who should partake sing the office for the holy partaking, make together a common genuflection to one another to grant forgiveness and then partake of the life-giving elements.

34. Concerning how many loaves must be offered during each liturgy and by whom

During the divine liturgy each day seven loaves will be offered, one for Our Lord, another for our Lady the Mother of God Kecharitomene, another for the saint of the day, another as a ransom and for the remission of my most mighty emperor's sins and mine, another for the nuns who have died, another for our parents¹⁶ [p. 85] and other relatives who have died, and another for our living children and sons-in-law¹⁷ and our other relatives. After our death the aforesaid loaf will be offered specifically for the remission of our sins, and this will be done for ever. But if one of the two of us should die before the other, one loaf will be offered again specifically for the one still alive, another then for the one who died. But after the death of the one who was living, again one loaf will be offered for both of us.

TWELFTH CENTURY

Each Saturday stauria must be offered on behalf of our parents and children and daughters-in-law who have predeceased us and for those who will die in the future, one for every four, and these people must be inscribed on the diptychs and must be remembered according to the description in the rule. Other stauria besides those for the deceased will be offered similarly each Sunday on behalf of those who are alive and are recorded on the diptychs and in the rule.

35. Concerning the ninth hour, vespers, and the night office

[cf. (22) Evergetis [6], ed. lines 195–98]: Similarly we wish the mesoria of the ninth hour to be sung in your dormitory, when the small semantron is struck; but you must sing the ninth hour in the same way as the hours previously described with its mesoria and prostrations when the semantron calls you all as is usual. The office of vespers will be performed by you according to the description in the synaxarion and immediately afterwards the night office. Since at the present time six troparia are sung in the night office with each canticle, after our departure to the Lord four must be sung according to the synaxarion, and there must be two for the dead.

36. Concerning compline

[cf. (22) Evergetis [6], ed. lines 199–200]: The office of compline will be carried out by you after supper in the exonarthex of the church during which you should genuflect, unless “God is the Lord” (Ps. 117 [118]: 27) is sung.

37. Concerning the night office

[cf. (22) Evergetis [6], ed. lines 201–13]: After the completion of compline when the priest has recited the customary prayer, you will fall on your faces to the ground facing the superior. When she has said to you, “Forgive me in the Lord, sisters, for I have sinned in deed and word and thought” [p. 87] and when she has prayed for you and said “May God forgive us all through the prayers of our fathers,” then begin the night office according to the regulation, when you have reached the dormitory. You should perform this office either inside your dormitory or outside it, as the occasion demands and the superior wishes; when this has been completed you should turn to sleep full of spiritual joy.

38. Concerning the midnight office

[cf. (22) Evergetis [6], ed. lines 218–21]: At the appropriate time when the nun carrying out the office of the ecclesiarchissa makes a deep bow to the superior and has struck the semantron, you will arrive and perform the midnight office in the narthex of the church; and the ecclesiarchissa, when she has woken you, will not be absent but will sing with you and light the lamps of the church. When you have completed the singing of the midnight office, the great semantron will be struck and furthermore the bronze one also. Then you will begin the office of matins, the preliminary part of which will be described next.

39. Concerning the preliminary part of matins

[cf. (22) Evergetis [6], ed. lines 222–39]: After the bronze semantron has been struck, the priest will give praise to God making the sign of the venerable cross with his censer before the holy table. Then when you have completed a trisagion to accompany the praising of God, you will sing the nineteenth and twentieth psalms with the usual troparia and the Kyrie eleison as evenly and attentively as possible. These will be sung by you as long as my most mighty emperor is alive—and may it be a very long time, O Lord and O Mother of God—but whenever he departs this life, the psalms sung by you will be “The Lord is my shepherd” (Ps. 22 [23]:1) and “Praise is due to thee, O God, in Zion” (Ps. 64 [65]:1); the troparia will be those for repose: “Remember, Lord, give him repose,” “Our Savior,” “Gloria,” “And now.” After the completion of the trisagion, the ecclesiarchissa will begin the six psalms singing them slowly and carefully and with a quiet voice so that the rest can follow her without stumbling or error, and can complete the words of the psalms by themselves. Then after the completion of the six psalms, the whole office of matins will be performed according to the description in the synaxarion. [p. 89] As the synaxarion will lay down the most exact details about the procedure for the holy fasts, so you must carry out the other instructions and in particular the vigils every Sunday, and at a feast of Our Lord, and at the remembrances of the rest of the saints, which the synaxarion details.

Yet here showing consideration for your weakness my majesty has decided something more compassionate concerning vigils. For I wish and lay it down that the vigils that will be celebrated for the feasts of the Lord, God, and Savior and for those of the all-holy Lady and Mother of God should last all night, also that for the Great Canon and that for the Holy Passion, and further that for the Exaltation of the venerable Cross and that for the holy chief apostles Peter and Paul, but you should carry out those on Sundays, unless of course one of the feasts of Our Lord should occur on those days, at the beginning of the third hour in summer and at the beginning of the fourth in winter. If two vigils should happen to occur in one week, one for a feast of Our Lord, the other being one of those specified for Sundays, we order that the one for Our Lord, whether it precedes or not, should last all night, but the one for Sunday should be performed at the beginning of the sixth hour so that in that way having rested a little, you might be more eager for what is before you. Also my majesty wishes you to get up for matins on a day after an all-night vigil and sing matins one hour later than is usual so that your bodies may be revived from weariness and restored again to their proper strength.

40. Concerning the summons to the refectory and the behavior in it

[cf. (22) Evergetis [9], ed. lines 337–57]: Since my decisions about ecclesiastical offices have been discussed, I must now speak about the nuns’ eating. Well then, when the holy and divine liturgy has been completed they must remain in the narthex waiting for the summons to the communal refectory by the semantron as is usual. When the semantron has been struck, they must go out with the ecclesiarchissa, make obeisance to the superior, and then beginning the customary psalm in a quiet and fitting voice, that is the one that begins “I will extol thee, my God and King” (Ps. 144 [145]:1), they must walk quietly to the refectory, and when they have completed the psalm, sit down in an orderly manner in whatever way the superior arranges their seats. Then they should gratefully partake of what is set out without noise and distur- bance, while a reading as is usual takes place; the superior only may speak, if she wishes to say something, and she must do so quietly, and the one who must answer her must use a very quiet voice and as few and concise phrases as possible, so that when there is the utmost quiet in the refectory, you may attend only to the reading, and cheer and gladden your souls with it and nourish your bodies with what is set out. [p. 91]

41. Concerning the position if someone is disorderly during the meal

[cf. (22) Evergetis [9], ed. lines 357–63]: If someone during the meal were to cause a disturbance and be disturbed, cause noise and be noisy, and ruin the reading with untimely and improper words, destroying the calm and quiet conditions, she ought to be silenced by the refectorian with quiet advice and admonition. If she ceases, she should be allowed to stay, but if she persists, she should be removed from the refectory, even if she is unwilling, by a decree of the superior who, if she wishes, will impose on her the penalty of going without food or will teach her self-control in another way, as she decides.

42. Concerning the position if someone argues about precedence in seating

[cf. (22) Evergetis [9], ed. lines 374–82]: If any one of you were to be fanned by the breezes of evil to such an extent that she concerned herself with vainglory and precedence in seating putting forward as an excuse that she has resided longer in the convent or any other sphere of work whatsoever, I command in the Lord that she be allocated the last place and if she were to be corrected, thanks are due to God, but if she should remain uncorrected, she is to be driven out of the convent so as not to infect the others with this filth.

43. Concerning the fact that they should not seek anything from each other [cf. (22) Evergetis [9], ed. lines 384–419]: Moreover while you eat you will in no way share either any food or drink with each other, even so much as a small drop to cool the wine [mixed with water] when it is much hotter than it should be, but the one who needs some such thing will ask the superior for what she needs with as much reverence and solemnity as possible, and if she gains her nod of approval, she will obtain her request. If not, she will restrain herself and sit in silence, giving thanks because of the command of God. Then when you have eaten, you will get up from the table, and on the completion of the specified office and the prayer, you will go away to your dormitory.

44. Concerning the fact that the communal refectory table is obligatory for those who are healthy and concerning the sick

Those of you who are healthy will have no excuse or reason to reject this table prepared for you in common, and no excuse will be sufficient for you to reject the gathering for the communal meal. But those who are seriously ill, so much so that they are unable to get up out of bed [p. 93] or sleep peacefully but cause a disturbance and are disturbed, will obtain rest and more attentive treatment in a private cell on the decision of the superior. The superior will show more attentive concern for those who are sick, as if they were her own limbs, providing them with things appropriate for their nourishment and giving thought to their other comfort.

27. KECHARITOMENE

45. Concerning the fact that there should also be a second sitting

So then, after the nuns have got up from the table, there should be a second sitting of loaves and courses set out, whatever has been set out on the table for the first sitting, and those who served should eat. But it must not be allowed—something which I forgot to lay down in the case of the first sitting—for anyone standing up from the table to take with her anything of what had been set out, neither bread, nor anything else, also none of the nuns should ask to take with her either cooked food or legumes or anything else, but they must all eat together.

46. Concerning the food on ordinary days

On ordinary days on Tuesday, Thursday, Saturday, and Sunday your food at the midday meal will be two dishes, or three if the superior decides, of fish and cheese; on Monday two or three dishes of legumes cooked with olive oil, and shellfish if there are any; on Wednesday and Friday, two or three dishes of legumes cooked with olive oil and vegetables similarly treated. If on these days, I mean on Monday, Wednesday, and Friday a refreshment is supplied by some devout people, or a feast of Our Lord occurs, or of one of the twelve Holy Apostles, or of the famous martyrs or hierarchs, then you should eat fish, with the superior taking care of this, unless a refreshment should come from other people.

On all the ordinary days your drink will be of the larger measure; but when the superior decides, it will be increased as much as she wishes. At supper on the same days bread and vegetables in season and small fruits will be set out for you at the discretion of the superior; your drink will be distributed with the larger measure.

47. Concerning the food during the Great Lent

[cf. (22) Evergetis [9], ed. lines 435–36, and [10], lines 438–50]: This is the procedure on the ordinary days of the year, but not during the holy fast days and especially during the first and greatest fast, [p. 95] on the first day of the first week of which, that is on Monday, the liturgy should not be celebrated nor should care be taken with the table or food. However on the subsequent days of this week a table should be set, and whoever chooses should partake of food. This will be composed of legumes soaked in water and perhaps some raw vegetables and fruits, and you will drink hot water seasoned with cumin. However on Friday you should eat two dishes of food, one cooked with olive oil, the other without olive oil, and drink wine distributed in the larger measure because of the feast of the great martyr St. Theodore, which the superior must celebrate as a duty and give you refreshment on Saturday and feed the community with shellfish. But if a refreshment were to be provided by some devout person, you will be fed also on fish.

[cf. (22) Evergetis [10], ed. lines 451–76]: You should carry out the first week of the great and holy Lent in that way. But on all Saturdays and Sundays of the same holy fast three cooked dishes with olive oil should be set out for you and for your drink the customary large measure of wine should be distributed. The same thing should take place also both on Wednesday in the middle of Lent and on Thursday of the Great Canon. But on Tuesdays and on the other Thursdays two cooked dishes will be set out for you, both with olive oil; and your wine will be measured out with the smaller measure. Moreover on Mondays two cooked dishes will be set out before you, of which one will be with olive oil, the other without olive oil, and your wine will be measured out with the smaller measure, which is half the larger. On Wednesdays and Fridays there will be two cooked dishes but without olive oil and for your drink wine measured with the smaller measure. But if the commemoration of the discovery of the precious head of [St. John] the Forerunner or the remembrance of the Forty Saints or the feast of the Annunciation¹⁸ should happen to fall on any Monday or Tuesday or Thursday or Saturday or Sunday, you must eat fish and the wine must be distributed in the larger measure, either with fish bought by the convent or through a refreshment sent by devout people. But if one of the aforesaid feasts should happen to be celebrated on one of the days of the first week, you are to eat the same food as on Tuesdays and Thursdays of the other weeks of the holy Lent and wine must be distributed in the larger measure. But then on all the other days of the holy Lent you will not be allowed to eat fish at all, unless a refreshment is perhaps sent by someone on Saturday or Sunday.

[cf. (22) Evergetis [10], ed. lines 480–505]: When the feast of the Annunciation falls, you should celebrate it as splendidly as possible partaking of fish provided by the convent and drinking wine of the larger measure. You will eat fish during this holy feast, as has been said, if it does not fall during the great holy week. For at that time you will use only shellfish. Rather you will receive a refreshment because of the feast, [p. 97] since for three days of that week, that is Monday, Tuesday, and Wednesday it is right that you should live content with some legumes soaked in water, raw vegetables, fruits that happen to be at hand, and hot water flavored with cumin. If the aforementioned feast of the Annunciation should fall on the Monday and Tuesday of the great holy week or on Holy Thursday, you will partake of shellfish only. But if it should fall on the Wednesday of Holy Week or Good Friday or on Holy Saturday itself, on Wednesday of Holy Week and on Good Friday, you will be content with some cooked legumes and vegetables accompanied by olive oil. You should partake of wine also in the larger measure.

But on Holy Saturday all anxiety that produces distraction must be avoided, for because of the feast you will not break the fast of Holy Saturday, on which day alone we have been instructed by the canon to fast from everything, but you should observe all the more the commands of the divine fathers¹⁹ and you should achieve, according to Gregory the Theologian, all the other good things that is in them as far as you can. He says “For to celebrate a feast is this, to gain a treasure for our soul from what is firm and established, not from what is voided and becomes rotten, [things] which beguile our senses a little, but do us in my opinion a very great harm.” Again, “Let the body’s own trouble be sufficient for the body (cf. Matt. 6:34). Why does a flame need more wood or a wild animal more abundant food in order to become more difficult to restrain and unimaginably more violent? Therefore for these reasons a feast should be celebrated spiritually.”²⁰

So on Holy Thursday, whenever we do not celebrate the feast of the Annunciation, your meal will be composed of dishes and wine in the larger measure, as on the Tuesdays and Thursdays of the remaining weeks of Lent. However on Good Friday, unless the aforementioned feast of our all-pure Lady the Mother of God should occur, no cooking is to be done at all, but you are to partake of some raw vegetables and fruits, and wine distributed with the larger measure because of your weariness from the vigil.

But on Holy Saturday all anxiety that produces distraction must be avoided and there should only be a collation as is customary, even if the feast of the Annunciation of our all-pure Lady the Mother of God occurs.

In this manner your diet for the great and holy period of Lent must be kept, though care should be shown to the sick at the discretion of the superior. The procedure for the fast of the Holy Apostles will be laid down immediately next.

48. Concerning the food during the fast of the Holy Apostles and that of the Nativity of Christ

[cf. (22) Evergetis [10], ed. lines 509–24]: After the completion of the whole canonical office of the hours and the divine liturgy as the synaxarion prescribes in detail, you should be summoned to the refectory [p. 99] at the seventh hour in accordance with the rule laid down above. There on Monday, Wednesday, and Friday you should eat two dishes cooked with olive oil and drink wine of the larger measure; and on Tuesdays and Thursdays two or three similar dishes, as the superior wishes; on Saturdays and Sundays you should partake of fish provided by the convent, unless a special refreshment is sent by someone, and on all these days the wine will be of the larger measure. Furthermore on all the days a supper should be set for you of bread and raw vegetables and fruits that happen to be at hand and the wine should be of the larger measure because of the heat and dryness of the season. But if a refreshment were to come in, even on another day, you should partake of the fish on that day gratefully.

The fast of the Holy Nativity of Christ will be similar to that of the Holy Apostles²¹ in both food and drink, and the whole canonical office will be in accordance with the synaxarion. The diet during this fast will differ from that during the fast of the Holy Apostles in these two points only.[First], you will eat once for when a fast is being observed your meal will be set out at the ninth hour, and it will always be a fast when “God is the Lord” is not sung at matins. On the other days a small supper will be set out for you, because the midday meal does not take place at the ninth hour but earlier. [Second], the wine will be distributed in the smaller measure at supper, on the days when you are allowed to take supper. But during the feast of the Entry of the Mother of God into the Temple²² you will eat fish—even if no one brings any as an offering—and on the other days whenever it is offered by someone.

49. Concerning not eating in secret

So since instructions have been thus laid down for you concerning food, we also introduce the matter of abstinence from secret eating and drinking. Avoid this to the utmost of your power, continually keeping in mind the fact that in the beginning disobedient eating made us subject to death and deprived us of life in paradise when the devil, the wicked author of evil, introduced it, who from that time right up to the present has not ceased suggesting to those who take up war against him like an ancient weapon the secret and forbidden tasting of some food or drink. Not only does he suggest it but advocates secret tasting saying that it is a natural action and blameless. But you, do not be ignorant of his intentions, looking away to the result of his advice, namely the transgression of a command. [p. 101]

50. Concerning poverty

So that you may easily surmount this trap of the evil one, we are imposing on you the utmost poverty which can be of the greatest service, and preserving this you would without effort escape the danger of secret eating and drinking. For what would the person who has nothing taste? So then, practice utmost poverty, not only as regards money even to the extent of an obol, but also in food and drink even to the smallest amount. For in order that you may not transgress this command of ours, we instruct the superior to examine you whenever and as often as she wishes, and to allow you to have nothing more than the things allowed by the cenobitic rule.

TWELFTH CENTURY

51. Concerning the fact that the nuns must not be despondent at the precepts of the rule concerning the cenobitic way of life

Not only should you not be despondent at these our precepts and instructions nor burdened by them, but rather it is reasonable that you should rejoice and exult, because freed from all worry you will have one task without distraction, namely care and concern for your spiritual salvation. For we have prepared for you a common table lacking none of the necessities. This you will maintain for ever inevitably and without hesitation, avoiding it in no way. For even if someone because of an ascetic practice says that she wishes to be absent from the common table, yet according to the great Basil²³ since it is possible for her being present to taste each of the things that are set out but not eat them—a statement which is accustomed to overthrow the conceit that comes from fasting—the only acceptable reason for being absent from the common meal is an illness which is known to the superior of the convent.

52. Concerning the fact that all the housekeeping expenses of the nuns should be covered by the revenue of the convent

I prescribe that garments and cloaks and headcloths and the rest of the things you need should be provided for you from the revenue set aside for the convent, and be bought in advance and stored away at the appropriate time. The appropriate time is when these items are not in short supply, but when they are very plentiful and are sold very cheaply. I prescribe that simply all your necessary provision, so that I need not enumerate individual items, is to come from the convent. These things will be done in this way so that the name of community [p. 103] may be true and not imperfect in the case of the convent of the Mother of God Kecharitomene. There will always be managers of these things and overseers appointed by the superior, taking care that not only are the new items not damaged, but also that the worn items are repaired. We instruct that these things be carried out in this way so that you may remain free from all worry about your life, but with one continuous task, namely to pray for yourselves and us.

53. Concerning the fact that external nuns or imposed guests should not be received into the convent

I wish that there should neither be any external nuns or imposed guests nor any called such. Therefore I instruct that an external nun should in no way be received, whether she is a woman of exalted station in life, or the possessor of great wealth and as a result either brings or promises an ample and generous offering in order to gain certain specified living allowances. For such a thing amounts to the violation of our decision and instruction. For we opened the gates of the convent freely and without any gift whatsoever to those who embrace the cenobitic way of life and seek to have or receive nothing more than what has been laid down by us, and we do not accept in any way a gift made with some specific aim which perverts what we have laid down.

27. KECHARITOMENE

Who would send an imposed guest to an independent convent, a convent dedicated and entrusted to the mighty hand of the Mother of God Kecharitomene and having her as its champion? Who would want the totally unblemished mother of the Word to make war on him by doing a favor for a corrupt person? No one would ever wish this, he would not be so foolish. For no small reward is laid up for the person upholding the wishes of those who made offerings to God, but everlasting punishment has been made ready for those who try to set them aside and pervert them.

54. Concerning the fact that virtuous nuns tonsured at another convent should be received unless they use imperial or governmental authority

Moreover if any nun, priding herself on a life pleasing to God and possessing a good name for this and showing clear traces of virtue, either through a yearning for the convent or a love of the way of life in it or even a friendly attitude [p. 105] towards us, were to wish to become a part of the community, we are ashamed and blush to refuse entry to such a person. In that case we prescribe that she be received, as it is said, with open arms, and the more so if she comes without having recourse to imperial authority or using governmental assistance or that of a patriarch, but in accordance with the observances explained by the holy fathers in the ascetic rules concerning those who move from one convent to another. For how else could we have shown that virtue is to be prized and thought important by those with sense?

However what has been said about such a nun will in no way be taken as a precedent for those who are not like her. Nor will it provide room for a pretext for those who seek pretexts to throw established procedure into confusion, transform and change good precepts, and not go straight towards the prescribed objective but bend it to their own wish. For if someone were accepted as being the kind of person as the passage previously proclaimed, but proved to be not like that—for we humans change most of all things—and appeared to be harmful to the convent or those in it and of no benefit, the superior will be able with the appropriate respect and gentleness to bar her from life in the convent in the future and send her away with prayers.

55. Concerning the fact that the cenobitic way of life should never be changed

Reference has been made many times and in many places²⁴ in this document to the cenobitic way of life, and it will be discussed again now as briefly as possible. For there is something I wish, I wish very much; I wish that the cenobitic way of life and constitution remain in the convent unaltered and unchanged for as long as this whole world exists, not perverted or altered for any reason, nor removed for any reason or excuse whatsoever, neither because of wealth nor poverty, neither because of shortage nor abundance, nor for any other specious reason or pretext of whatever kind, but that the cenobitic way of life and constitution should be preserved in every way for ever unbroken. Even if the whole revenue of the convent should happen to be reduced to being sufficient for two nuns, we wish them to live cenobitically and conform to the rule of this way of life. If one of the mothers superior wishes the opposite, the nuns are to oppose her; and if the nuns, the superior should resist them; and if all of them were to agree, the protectress of the convent should defend what has been laid down by us, and if she also were to consort with them, we grant permission to anyone who wishes to strive for a pious action, and go to court on behalf of goodness itself and the reward for it, and seek to make our instructions effective, and drive from the convent those chiefly responsible for the abolition of the cenobitic way of life and not to think that this is a small achievement but a very great one that brings salvation. [p. 107]

56. Concerning the fact that apart from the sick the food and drink and clothing of all the nuns should be the same

[= (22) Evergetis [26]]: In addition to these we give you this instruction that you should all have the same food and drink, clothing and footwear, and that there should never be any difference in these things among you. But you will all use the same—I mean the superior, the ecclesiarchissa, those who are distinguished in age and virtue and in their exalted station in life, and those who are inferior to them in these matters. For you should only help and take care in every way of those who are clearly afflicted with illness and for this reason perhaps need better food and drink to sustain their unfortunate bodies. For I think that this shows discernment and preserves the conscience of everyone else free of offense.

57. Concerning the fact that a doctor should call at the convent and concerning the care of those who are sick

[cf. (22) Evergetis [41], ed. lines 1250–51; 1254–56; 1259–62]: It is necessary also that a doctor should live at our convent for the care and visitation of the sisters who are sick, a eunuch or an old man, calling at the convent and visiting those who are sick and bringing means of healing appropriate to the diseases. But the superior herself must carry out the care of the sick not in any perfunctory manner, but according to what is necessary and possible in food and drink and other necessities. She must set aside a special cell for them to rest and buy medicines when the time is suitable, and prepare and store in it all the things useful for those who are ill. But our sick sisters emboldened by this should not cast off self-restraint, by seeking for extra things and things which perhaps they have never even heard of much less seen or eaten, but they should restrain and control themselves, being satisfied only with those things which the circumstance of the season and the resources provide for them.

58. Concerning bathing

It remains for me to discuss bathing. So we order that the nuns who are healthy should have a bath each month, but those who are sick, as often as the doctor who is deciding on the disease should say that bathing is beneficial. He also will speak about the appropriate food for the disease. [p. 109]

59. Concerning the feast of the Dormition of the Mother of God

At the very beginning of the feast of the Dormition of our Lady the Mother of God Kecharitomene the crater lamps must be removed and the silver chandeliers with many lights must be hung up and the silver pot-shaped lamps and silver crater lamps, and all of them should be filled with oil and water, and lit. Candles with cotton wick each weighing six ounces must be fixed in the lamnai of both the templa and the images for veneration to fill them, and candles with cotton wick of one litra must be fixed in the candelabra with twelve candleholders standing in front of the holy icon of the Mother of God set out for veneration. In the church four large candles of six litrai each must stand in the candlesticks and two of six ounces on each side of the holy altar, and candles of four ounces must stand on the tombs wherever they are, one on each, when the remains have been interred. Rose-essence and bitter aloes and incense must be supplied from wherever the superior sees that it is possible. Loaves of three modioi and six trachea nomismata in noummia must be distributed at this feast in the gateway to our brothers, the poor, and sufficient trachea nomismata must be provided for the purchase of fresh fish for the table of the sisters who are leading the religious life.

27. KECHARITOMENE

60. Concerning the feast of the Birth of the Mother of God

At the feast of the Birth of the Mother of God²⁵ they must light six of the standing candles in each of the candelabra with twelve candleholders, and six at the templon, and a sufficient provision [of food] must be supplied for the nuns. The feast of the Exaltation of the venerable and life-giving Cross and the feast of the martyr St. Demetrios and the feast of the Entry of the Mother of God into the Temple must be carried out similarly. [p. 111]

61. Concerning the feast of the Nativity

At the feast of the Nativity of Christ the lighting will be similar to that for the feast of the Dormition and the provision [of food] for the nuns will be similar. The distribution at the gate will be of loaves of two modioi and four trachea nomismata [in noummia]. This lighting will be sufficient also during the feast of the Epiphany. The distribution at the gate will be the same as that at the aforementioned feast, that is the Nativity of Christ, and the provision [of food] for the nuns will be similar.

62. Concerning the feast of the Presentation of Our Lord in the Temple

At the feast of the Presentation of Our Lord in the Temple²⁶ they must light six of the aforementioned standing candles in each of the candelabra with twelve candleholders, and at the templon similarly six each. The feast of the Annunciation and the feast of Palm Sunday will likewise have the same lighting.

63. Concerning the lighting for the Holy Passion

Moreover the lighting for the feast on Holy Thursday will be the same as that for the feast of the Dormition.²⁷ Likewise the distribution at the gate will be the same as that for the aforementioned feast, apart from the provision [of food]. Holy Easter Sunday will have the same lighting and distribution and provision of food as that for the feast mentioned above.

The feast of the Ascension and the Feast of Pentecost, and likewise that of the Holy Apostles²⁸ will have the same lighting and provision [of food] as that for the feast of the Birth of the Mother of God. The feast of the Transfiguration of Our Lord God and Savior Jesus Christ must be celebrated in the same way as that of the Dormition of the Mother of God, but the distribution should consist of [loaves] of two modioi of grain and four trachea nomismata in noummia.

TWELFTH CENTURY

64. Concerning the fact that a distribution at the gate should take place each day

[cf. (22) Evergetis [38], ed. line 1183]: It is obligatory that a distribution take place at the gate each day of loaves of a third of a modios of grain or of one modios of grain for three days, since the leftovers from the table must also be distributed each day, so that, through your joyful almsgiving to our brothers, you also may receive joyful and abundant mercy from God. [p. 113]

65. Concerning the fact that the rule should be read each month in the hearing of all

[cf. (22) Evergetis [43], ed. lines 1313–14]: This instruction must be observed in every respect no less than the rest, or even more so, as it is the source and reason for the unaltered observance of what has been laid down and for the whole setting up of the convent, I mean the reading of the typikon on the first day of each month in the hearing of all those in the convent, so that through continuous reading the instructions laid down might be especially permanent and indelible, and successful in forming the habit of carrying them out. They must be kept in force and effective by total observance, unbroken and unaltered like divine laws, neither made obsolete and obliterated by time, nor weakened by any attack or violent change, nor consigned to oblivion through laziness, nor repudiated as burdensome through lack of discipline.

66. Concerning the daily lighting of the holy church

So then the daily lighting in the holy church should be like this. Lamps must be kept burning continuously night and day, one in the conch of the apse, one before the Mother of God Kecharitomene, one on the templon, one in the narthex, and another in the exonarthex. Whenever remains come to be interred in a tomb, one lamp must be lit.

67. Concerning the crater lamps that hang around the dome and the rest of them

Every second one of the crater lamps that hang in the middle of the choros must be lit at the beginning of the services that are usually celebrated in the church, at matins, vespers, and the liturgy; and they must be extinguished again at the end of these. The same thing should be done concerning all the lamps of the templon.

68. Concerning the candles that must be lit

Candles must be lit to burn continuously night and day, one in the sanctuary, and one before my Mother of God Kecharitomene. The candelabra with twelve candle holders must stand always at the images for veneration. One candle must be lit on these each day during the singing of the psalm, and one at the templon, and they must be extinguished during the dismissal. Three must be lit at the feasts which are not listed in the rule. Similarly three must be lit also at the templon. But at the very important feasts already mentioned, instead of burnt-down candles whole ones must be fitted, which must be kept again so that they can be used in the daily lighting until they are completely burnt up. [p. 115]

69. Concerning water

Since after much effort my majesty was able with the assistance of God to bring ever-flowing water to my monasteries,²⁹ and two cisterns of equal capacity have been constructed, I prescribe that the convent and the imperial houses which my majesty built should be supplied with water by one, and the monastery by the other. If a break occurs in these pipes, it must be repaired by those who receive this water. Since it was decreed by my majesty that there be two conduits to bring this water, one person from the one monastic establishment and another from the other should take care of them. If a break ever occurs in the aqueduct bringing this water, an appraisal should be obtained from one of the tribounoi and the expenditure contributed by both of the monastic establishments equally and the aqueduct repaired and the water kept ever-flowing.

27. KECHARITOMENE

70. Concerning the burial-place of the nuns

That is how those matters have been managed and those are the instructions. Since it was necessary to establish a burial-place for the interring of the remains of those nuns who go away to the Lord, but the confined situation of the convent did not provide us with room for the building of such a place, my majesty received from the great church of God the convent called *Ta Kellaraias*³⁰ which was patriarchal, but is now dedicated to the convent of my Mother of God Kecharitomene as a burial-place of the nuns leading the religious life in it, as the memorandum of the most holy and ecumenical patriarch, Lord Nicholas [III Grammatikos],³¹ made on this matter also clearly states. We also decree that there should be four nuns in it, receiving from the convent of my Mother of God Kecharitomene each of them each year eighteen maritime modioi of grain each, twelve maritime measures of wine each, fifty litrai of cheese each, one modios of legumes each, and for their allowance twenty-four trachea nomismata each, and for their clothing allowance one hyperpyron nomisma. Furthermore we decree that a lay priest be assigned there to serve in this convent both in the singing of psalms and the lighting and all the appropriate care, and that it be decreed that he receive what is necessary for this service from the convent of my Mother of God Kecharitomene from which items for the lighting of the lamps in this burial place should be supplied, namely two maritime measures of oil each year and twelve modioi of grain. [p. 117]

We prescribe that the transporting and burial of the nuns who die should be carried out as follows. The customary things done for the dead nun should be carried out in the exonarthex, I mean both the singing of psalms and all the clothing of the remains, and then she should be transported to the convent of the Mother of God called Ta Kellaraias with the bier carried either by her sister nuns or by the female servants with as many of the nuns following her as the superior orders. She is to be buried there in the tombs of the nuns, where only the nuns who practice the religious life in the convent of my Mother of God Kecharitomene must be buried.

No one who is not on the list of this community is to be buried with them, even though she were a relative of the superior or of another of the nuns or a friend or acquaintance, nor even on the instruction of the protectress of the convent, so that the burial-place of the nuns may not become a stranger's burial place. But if anyone tries to do this, she will receive condemnation from God for her transgression of the rule, and will be prevented by the protectress of the convent. Moreover one vault will be assigned for the burial of the female servants of these nuns, another for the mothers superior, another for those wearing the great habit, another for the rest of the nuns and female servants, as many as are nuns and virtuous, and another for the nuns in the convent of Ta Kellaraias.

TWELFTH CENTURY

When the sisters who went away with the nun who died have returned to their own convent, they must not go away there any more, but the commemorations on the third, ninth, and fortieth days for the nun who died should be sung by the priest appointed there and be carried out by the nuns in the convent.

[= (22) Evergetis [36], ed. lines 1086–92, 1118–21]: They also should be remembered every day with ekteneis in the divine liturgies and at matins and vespers until the fortieth day, and an offering should be made specifically for a nun until the completion of her forty-day commemorations. The ecclesiarchissa must note down the commemorations of each of those who die and write their names on the diptychs, so that their commemorations may not be forgotten and may be performed without fail. Moreover we urge the priests to consult the diptychs during every liturgy in order to commemorate those listed on them, so that they may not bear the accusation of forgetting and omitting them.

A common commemoration of all the nuns must take place each Friday after the office of lamplighting, unless a feast prevents it; the nuns must sing a canon for the dead and carry out also a parastasimon, and an ektenes should be made for all those who have already departed. Moreover, a supplication should be made on the Saturday of Meatfare, the Saturday of Cheesefare, and the Saturday of Pentecost for the nuns who have already departed, one for each name, and they should be commemorated. Likewise, during the commemorations for each one a liturgy should be celebrated for her and an offering made, and on the Saturday of Meatfare and on the Saturday [p. 119] of Pentecost the nuns must receive one offering of bread each, to commemorate their parents and relatives, and after the oblation has been made the offerings should be assembled by the gatekeeper and a distribution should take place at the gate.

71. Concerning different commemorations that must be performed annually

Having given sufficient instructions now concerning the matters of the convent, we decree and issue instructions now also concerning our parents, brothers according to the flesh, and children who have died, and those who will die. For the commemorations for all those expressly set out below will be celebrated at the times and on the days recorded in this way.

We wish a night office for the dead to take place with a parastasimon, and the lighting in the church to be more abundant than the usual, and during the liturgy an offering should be made and kollyba offered for the deceased, and he is to be remembered in ekteneis during the night office and matins and the liturgy and vespers. The usual table should not be set out for the nuns, but food should be bought and they should be fed as we previously decreed should happen at the feasts of Our Lord, at whatever season the remembrance of the dead person happens to be. However if the commemoration were to occur on Wednesday or Friday, they will eat shellfish only, except for the commemoration of my most mighty and holy emperor. For at his commemoration, even if it should occur on a Wednesday or a Friday, fish in liberal quantities will also be bought for a meal for the nuns. For it is necessary that the person who is special among mankind should gain a special commemoration. But on all the non-fast days at the commemorations for the rest of our relatives they will eat fish. But if a commemoration for someone were to occur on any of the days of the Great Lent, the night office will be held only on Friday evening of that week, during which the commemoration occurred, and on the following Saturday the nuns will have a refreshment of shellfish. However, if someone were to come bringing fish for them, they will eat these also. The other two fasts have every day free for the holding of commemorations. We also wish the distribution at the gate to take place on that day, as will be made clear in the naming of each. [p. 121]

27. KECHARITOMENE

The commemoration for my most mighty emperor, Lord Alexios Komnenos, must be performed on whatever day he dies, and there must be abundant lighting and special fare for the nuns, and at the gate loaves of ten modioi [of grain] must be distributed, and eight measures of wine, and twelve trachea nomismata in noummia. I wish my commemorations to take place on whatever day I leave this body, and be exactly the same as those for my most mighty emperor. The commemorations for the dearly beloved son of my majesty, the basileus Lord John,³² Born-in-the-Purple, must be celebrated on whatever day he dies, and there must be abundant lighting and special fare for the nuns, and at the gate loaves of five modioi [of grain] must be distributed, and six trachea nomismata in noummia. The commemorations for the dearly beloved daughter-in-law of my majesty, despoina Lady Irene,³³ his wife, must be celebrated on whatever day she dies, and there must be abundant lighting and special fare for the nuns, and at the gate loaves of five modioi [of grain] must be distributed, and six trachea nomismata in noummia. The commemorations for the dearly beloved son of my majesty, the sebastokrator Lord Andronikos,³⁴ Born-in-the-Purple, must be celebrated on whatever day he dies in the same way.

The commemorations for the dearly beloved son-in-law of my majesty, Caesar Lord Nikephoros,³⁵ must be celebrated on whatever day he dies in the same way. The commemorations for the dearly beloved son of my majesty, Caesar Lord Isaac,³⁶ Born-in-the-Purple, must be celebrated on whatever day he dies in the same way. The commemorations for the dearly beloved son-in-law of my majesty, panhypersebastos Lord Nikephoros,³⁷ must be celebrated on whatever day he dies in the same way. The commemorations for the dearly beloved son-in-law of my majesty, the pansebastohypertatos Lord Constantine,³⁸ must be celebrated on whatever day he dies similarly in other respects, but the loaf should be of three modioi [of grain] and three trachea nomismata in noummia. [p. 123] The commemorations for the dearly beloved granddaughter of my majesty, Irene Doukaina,³⁹ the daughter of Caesarissa Lady Anna, Born-in-the-Purple, must be celebrated on whatever day she dies, and there must be abundant lighting and a special fare for the nuns, and at the gate loaves of four modioi [of grain] must be distributed, and four trachea nomismata in noummia.

The commemorations for the dearly beloved daughter of my majesty, the Caesarissa Lady Anna,⁴⁰ Born-in-the-Purple, must be celebrated on whatever day she dies, and there must be abundant lighting and special fare for the nuns, and at the gate loaves of five modioi [of grain] and six trachea nomismata in noummia distributed. The commemorations for the dearly beloved daughter of my majesty, the Lady Maria,⁴¹ Born-in-the-Purple, must be celebrated on whatever day she dies in the same way. The commemorations for the dearly beloved daughter of my majesty, the Lady Eudokia,⁴² Born-in-the-Purple, must be celebrated on whatever day she dies in the same way. The commemorations for the dearly beloved daughter-in-law of my majesty, the sebastokratorissa Lady Irene,⁴³ must be celebrated on whatever day she dies in the same way, but loaves of three modioi should be distributed.

The commemorations for the dearly beloved daughter-in-law of my majesty, the Caesarissa Lady Irene,⁴⁴ must be celebrated on whatever day she dies in the same way. The commemorations for the dearly beloved daughter of my majesty, the Lady Theodora,⁴⁵ Born-in-the-Purple, must be celebrated on whatever day she dies in the same way. On the 14th of October the commemorations must be celebrated for the holy master and dearly beloved father of my majesty of blessed memory, the protoproedros and protovestiaros and megas doux ton scholon in the East, Lord Andronikos Doukas,⁴⁶ who on taking the holy and great angelic habit changed his name to Lord Antony, and at the gate loaves of five modioi [of grain] must be distributed, [p. 125] and six trachea nomismata in noummia, and there must be abundant lighting and special fare for the nuns.

TWELFTH CENTURY

On the 21st of November the commemorations must be celebrated in the same way for the sanctified mistress and mother of my majesty, the Lady Maria,⁴⁷ who on taking the holy and great angelic habit changed her name to Lady Xene. On the 12th of July the commemorations must be celebrated in the same way for Lord John⁴⁸ of blessed memory, the dearly beloved father-in-law of my majesty. On the 1st of November the commemorations must be celebrated in the same way for my sanctified Lady⁴⁹ the mother-in-law of my majesty. On the 9th of January the commemorations must be celebrated for the dearly beloved brother of my majesty, the protostrator Lord Michael Doukas,⁵⁰ and there must be abundant lighting and a special fare for the nuns. On the 20th of February the commemorations must be celebrated for the dearly beloved sister of my majesty, the most honorable, honorable Lady Theodora,⁵¹ who on taking the holy and great angelic habit changed her name to Lady Irene, and they must be carried out in the same way.

The commemorations must be celebrated on whatever day he dies for the dearly beloved brother of my majesty, the pansebastos, sebastos Lord John Doukas,⁵² who on taking the holy and great angelic habit changed his name to Lord Antony, and they must be carried out in the same way. The commemorations must be celebrated on whatever day she departs to the Lord for the dearly beloved sister of my majesty, the pansebaste, sebaste Lady Anna Doukaina,⁵³ and they must be carried out in the same way.

Our children, when they depart to the Lord, will be inscribed on the diptychs of those who have already died, and the commemorations for them all will be celebrated in the manner declared above.⁵⁴ But if some of them perhaps dedicate to the convent important movable or immovable property, their commemorations must be celebrated in accordance with their regulation.

72. Concerning the washing of the feet that is going to take place on Holy Thursday

Moreover on Holy Thursday the washing of the feet must be carried out by the most venerable superior in the narthex of the church, where the washing of the feet by the Savior has been portrayed, according to the procedure contained in the synaxarion and the rule contained in it. [p. 127] The divine festival of light during the world-wide feast of Epiphany will also be celebrated in the same narthex, in which the phiale stands, with the bronze chandeliers hanging in it and receiving their full lighting. In the same way the chandeliers of the church must also be lit then, and two candelabra with large candles stand on this side and on that of the phiale.

73. Concerning the fact that no alterations should be made to the buildings of the convent

Since the long-suffering mercy of God towards me approved of this project, and I still remaining in this life have completed all the buildings of the convent, transforming in it the divine church itself, restoring the very beautiful narthex, and adding an exonarthex of Carian wood⁵⁵ and have built the whole convent to reach this form and state that I had decided, I wish and desire that, as all the things in it were built by me, they should remain thus and be kept unchanged and unaltered. If in time some of them should suffer destruction whether small or greater, or be diminished by some chance accidents, they should be restored again with God's help to the same form without any delay and postponement, and that they should never in any way be changed, either to produce a greater establishment or for any other reason whatsoever. For I do not wish any alteration to be made in them, neither another improved establishment of these buildings compared with the present one, nor even that another gate be added or side-gate or simply any means of entry to the convent from another place, in addition to the one that exists today on the instruction of my majesty.

27. KECHARITOMENE

Since my majesty built a wall of rubble masonry⁵⁶ behind the resting-place of the nuns, that is their common dormitory, setting aside a place in this way for their rest and relief, I do not wish a gate ever to be opened at all in this wall or a side-gate, or a door of any sort or a window or a bow slit or a small opening of any sort, and if damage ever occurs to this wall or a collapse of any kind, the portion that has fallen down or has been destroyed should be restored again in rubble masonry so as to quickly return to its previous form. [p. 129]

The most venerable superior must have complete responsibility for both the preservation and repair of the whole convent and for the improvement, adornment, and retiling of everything in it, but above and beyond everything, of the holy church of God, and she must not despise the smallest thing, but even if the damage should be as little as one glass lamp, she must fill up the place of the missing piece with another piece at once, and I decree that the retiling of the whole convent be carried out with utmost care.

74. Concerning the fact that the convent should remain unobserved from all sides

Moreover this decision of my majesty is no less important than any of those declared before, and ranks with the most necessary, deserving no casual consideration and care. For since the whole dwelling of the nuns is completely unobserved from all sides, I wish what has been set aside by my majesty for their practice of the religious life to be preserved for ever with God's help. Although it is obvious to anyone who is willing to judge correctly from the context and meaning of what has already been written that to establish a [place] of observation of [the convent] is undesirable and quite contrary to the intention of my majesty, nevertheless I thought it necessary to specifically and expressly forbid such an innovation. So because of this my consideration of the matter my majesty dismisses and completely rejects the observing at any time in any way whatsoever of any of the places inside the enclosed area which has been assigned to the way of life of the nuns, either of their courtyard, whether the outer or the inner, or of the enclosure from any side, whether from the imperial buildings or the others, whether from their outer or inner courtyard, whether by the decision of one of the protectresses of the convent or in any other way. It will never be possible at all for anyone for whatever reason, even if it seems in some way to be reasonable, to establish any observation of the activities of the convent either by means of a balcony and a top story or a door or a side door or a window or any moderately sized opening.

But if anything like this is dared by anyone, even if it should be done unintentionally, it will be for the protectress of the convent at the time of necessity to decide at once on the harm arising from it, and even if this is very small, remove it without any investigation or discussion. For, as has been made clear, since my majesty took care to ensure that the way of life of the nuns dedicated to my Mother of God Kecharitomene would remain inside their holy convent completely unobserved by every person, so the situation with regard to this has been made secure. Furthermore, it will be forbidden for any buildings either to be attached or built on to the dividing brick wall of both the outer courtyard and the enclosure of the convent, after the departure of my majesty from this present life, or for any other structure to be freshly built, but rather it will be prevented in every way, since my majesty wishes this wall also to remain in the same form and in the same condition as it is found to have on the day of my departure to God, and that it should not receive any change of any sort whatsoever at any time either by way of an addition or diminution. [p. 131]

TWELFTH CENTURY

75. Concerning the fact that chanters should not be assembled during the feast but that the convent should be untroubled by these also

Since I have completely forbidden entry into this holy place by men, as has already been made clear, I do not at all wish even that chanters should ever enter the church in it either on the day of a feast perhaps or for a commemoration, but that the nuns only themselves who happen to be there at the time should be the chanters along with the devout priests appointed in the convent.

Since it is customary for the sacrament of unction to be celebrated by seven priests once a year on the eve of Palm Sunday in the church at the cemetery, or at the burial place, I decree that it should take place. While this is being performed there, one of the seven priests should enter the convent and conduct the prayer for the anointing with holy oil for the nuns, anointing them at the same time, and leave at once.

The religious processions which must be made by the nuns in the convent according to the ecclesiastical tradition will not last long and they will go out from the church through the narthex and along [the path] which goes on from there as far as the [oratory of the] Dormition of our most-pure Lady and Mother of God, the one outside their common dormitory, with the priests of the convent carrying the holy gospel and the venerable cross, and the progress of their advance will cease there, and when the priest has made an ektenes there, they will return again to the church.

Moreover in this holy church of the convent (for it appeared necessary to me to add this, since it must be abominated, even if perhaps to some it does not seem an abomination) the performance of any handiwork must not go on either at the time of hymn-singing or during the reading or at any other time.

76. Concerning where and how those of our daughters and granddaughters who choose to be buried in the convent must be buried, and how their commemorations should take place

If ever any of our daughters or daughters-in-law or even of our granddaughters, to whom the ephoreia of the convent has been assigned and the use of the more sumptuous buildings, should choose to be buried in this convent (for it is not unreasonable to discuss this also), this will be possible for her if she has assumed the monastic habit, but not at all otherwise, and she will have a place in the exonarthex for the burial of her remains, making her own tomb according to her own wishes.

The commemorations of those who will be buried thus in this convent and the lighting of lamps on the tombs of those who have not chosen to dedicate anything at all in the convent will be carried out as my majesty decreed, [p. 133] with one lamp lit for each tomb to burn continuously; but [the commemorations] for those who were glad to offer and dedicate something of their own possessions by their own decision and choice, will be carried out in whatever way they decree from what is given by them, that is, as an addition to what has been decreed by us.

27. KECHARITOMENE

But it will not be possible for any of them all, whether an official or a private person, whether a superior or a nun, or even if that person makes a large, expensive and useful offering to the convent, on any pretext to plan the removal of any of the remains that will be buried in it, much less to accomplish it, or to discuss in any way burial or joint burial with these. For my majesty by this present document itself keeps everyone from such a plan and action.

77. Concerning the number of inventories and rules that have been made for the holy convent of the Kecharitomene and where each must be deposited

Since three rules have been drawn up by us on parchment covered with precious fabric and three inventories, that is including the present rule and the inventory of dedications to the convent, we decree that two of these—that is the rule and the inventory—should be deposited in the divine, inviolable, and holy sacristy of the Great Church of God, as that is also where the [documents] of the monastery of Philanthropos are, that is the rule and the inventory, so that for all time what we have decreed in it concerning the monastery of Philanthropos and what was dedicated to it may be indelibly preserved. Two others are to be in the possession of the protectresses of the convent at the time, so they can have an accurate knowledge of what we decreed in these. The other two, the rule and the inventory, should be deposited in the sacristy of the convent of Kecharitomene. Moreover the other two volumes, one of which is in the form of the rule and the other in that of the inventory, both being of paper will be for daily use in the convent.

78. A consoling exhortation to the nuns

[= (22) Evergetis [42]]: So then these should be the wishes of my majesty and I hope it may be said that they are acceptable to God and my most holy Mother of God Kecharitomene and are greatly beneficial for your help; in the future it will be your concern [p. 135] to maintain them unbroken and unchanged always. By this I mean, to carry out completely in all the services the canonical procedure handed on to you, to preserve loyalty and honor which is due to your superiors, to love one another, to be keen each of you to surpass each other in humility, to labor all of you with one another in everything as the limbs of one body, and “to complete what is lacking” (Col. 1:24) in one another, not to stir up quarrels nor form improper friendships or cause schisms and breakaway services, to refrain from claiming the seat of honor and worldly preferments, but look to one thing only, that is to live and conduct yourselves virtuously and breathe in nothing else, if possible, than the word of salvation and everything that is for the edification and benefit of your soul, furthermore to banish from you the source of all evils, I mean the love of money and the filching of the convent’s possessions or in any other way at all to set aside and store up anything whatsoever which the superior has not approved nor the rule given to you has allowed, not only that but as a result of carelessness or some other act of disregard, to allow something belonging to the convent to disappear. For that is the same as the former case, even if it seems to be somewhat differ- ent, and brings the same liability in the presence of God. You must root out familiarity as much as possible and, that I may be brief, banish everything that does not lead to salvation.

So, my most revered mothers, let us in no way prefer the things that harm and pass by those that bring salvation. For nothing of what has been handed on to you is impossible or hard to accomplish. But if one of these [instructions] were to be thought of as such, yet let us strive, let us persevere, let us endure, let us bear it nobly, let us force ourselves a little. For you did not abandon the world for indulgence and luxury, but for exertion and to strive as much as you could to gain the good things that were promised. Therefore let us force ourselves, let us force ourselves, “for the kingdom of heaven has suffered violence, and men of violence take it by force” (Matt. 11:12). No one has ever gained a triumph by being careless, no one has triumphed over his enemy by sleeping and dreaming. Crowns and triumphs belong to those who toil, strive, and persevere in the labors of battles. “Through many tribulations,” the Lord says, “we must enter the kingdom of heaven” (Acts 14:22). So then I beseech you all, “lead a life worthy of your calling” (Eph. 4:1), “present your bodies holy to the Lord,” (cf Rom. 12:1) “love one another” (John 15: 12), “run well the race that is set before you” (Heb. 12:1). Whatsoever is good, whatsoever is beloved of God, consider these things (Phil. 4:8). Do not fail to do the things “you have heard and learned” (Phil. 4:8–9), holy mothers, “the appointed time has grown very short” (I Cor. 7:29), remember your souls.

For in thinking over these things for you, it is likely that I should have forgotten myself, who am full of every wickedness and am disposed to be careless in every way with regard to the commands of God. Because of this I earnestly beg your community never to forget our souls, but in your prayers to support us continuously who are unworthy of heaven and earth, bearing in mind, if nothing else, our great and fervent [p. 137] eagerness and our zeal directed both towards the establishment of your holy convent, and the gathering of your community, and organizing the things that support its material independence and spiritual benefit, for no other purpose at all except the care of your own souls and continuous praying for our insignificance, which we pray you never forget. But even if we are absent in the body, you should think that we are present with you in spirit and that we fall at your feet and appeal to your company very piteously and with burning tears to pray for us who have sinned against God more than all men, and, what is more, beg for more goodness from him through your holy prayers. So may you not forget to pray for our insignificance.

[= (22) Evergetis [43], ed. lines 1318–22]: “May the God of peace who called us to his eternal glory” (Heb. 13:20–21) through his great and unspeakable goodness confirm and strengthen you in his holy will through his only-begotten Son Our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ and the All-Holy Life-Giving Spirit through the intercessions of our Mother of God Kecharitomene.

Irene Doukaina in Christ Our God the faithful Empress of the Romans.⁵⁷

79. Concerning the more sumptuous buildings newly built in the convent by my majesty

It is necessary also to discuss what is reasonable concerning the very sumptuous buildings newly built by my majesty in the convent of the Mother of God Kecharitomene. For when my majesty built more splendid buildings around this revered convent, apart from those necessary for the convent and supplying all the needs of the nuns for their way of life, it wished my [daughter] of blessed memory, the nun Lady Eudokia,⁵⁸ Born-in-the-Purple, to have these and use them for her own residence and repose, but since she was snatched away before my hopes were realized and went to “the eternal dwelling-places” (Heb. 13:20–21), it was necessary for my majesty to decree what it decided about them.

27. KECHARITOMENE

This I have in fact done, and I decree that after my departure from this life my most beloved [daughter] the Caesarissa Lady Anna,⁵⁹ Born-in-the-Purple, should possess and occupy without hindrance, while she lives, not only all the cells in which she resided while I was alive, but also all the buildings in the convent of Kecharitomene, that is all those which were for the use of my majesty and our children and our servants both men and women, together with the outer courtyard [p. 139] situated immediately next to the inner courtyard of the more sumptuous buildings. For a written instruction concerning the other courtyard which was once used as a vineyard but was changed into a courtyard, will be issued by me at some time and will be in force.

Furthermore, she should possess the church of St. Demetrios⁶⁰ with the two bathhouses and a third of the spring water that is brought into the buildings of the convent, that is, just as I possess them, and she must have complete freedom to build other new buildings, whatever kind she wishes, and to change those that exist, both the imperial and the other ones, in whatever way she chooses, and alter them to whatever form she wishes, observing this only, namely, not to set a new burden of any sort whatsoever on the dividing wall of both monasteries, that is that of Philanthropos and that of Kecharitomene, nor to have a place overlooking them.

After her death I decree that my most beloved granddaughter Lady Irene Doukaina,⁶¹ the daughter of Lady Anna, should have the use, possessions, and occupation of all the immovable property listed above and the remaining rights, inalienable and without any proviso. After the departure from this life of Lady Anna, Born-in-the-Purple, only the buildings overhanging the dividing wall and looking towards the garden of the monastery of Philanthropos must be destroyed, in which today resides the aforesaid lady, Born-in-the-Purple; and this wall must be raised by a further two cubits.

But after the death of Lady Irene, if her mother, Born-in-the-Purple, dies leaving a will, I decree that she should bequeath these imperial buildings and the others to whichever of her children or grandchildren or great-grandchildren, whether male or female, she chooses. But if her mother departs from this life before the Lady Irene, or even after her but has not settled this matter, for it is not important, then the right of possession and occupation of the buildings listed above and the other things will pass to the oldest male or female descendant, child or grandchild or great grandchild of Lady Anna, Born-in-the-Purple, moreover with this provision, that if the person to whom this right will belong departs from this life leaving a will, he has the power to pass on these to whichever of the children, grandchildren, and so on descended from him that he wishes. But if he should not have any descendants or does not settle this matter, then the aforementioned right passes again to the oldest male or female descendant of Lady Anna, Born-in-the-Purple, and this proviso is to continue thus for ever, as long as there remains enough of those descended from the line of the aforementioned lady, Born-in-the-Purple.

The lady Born-in-the-Purple will bequeath this right in her will not only to her children or grandchildren or great-grandchildren, as has been stated above, but also to one of her daughters-in-law married to one of these, whomsoever she wishes, and this lady will possess these in the same way, unless she were to consider a second marriage. [p. 141] For if she were so inclined, she will immediately lose this right which will always pass to the line of the lady Born-in-the-Purple. It must happen like this without any change also in the case of all the other daughters-in-law to whom this right will belong, by being passed on from those who have possessed this, as has been described above. For it will be possible not only for the lady Born-in-the-Purple but also for those who are descended from her to pass this on in their wills, if they should wish, to one of their daughters-in-law married to the men descended from them. For we must admit one thing, that even though we specifically mention the male sex only yet the female sex also must be understood by this and considered equally designated, as far as the chapter regarding these buildings is concerned.

TWELFTH CENTURY

But if, something I pray does not happen, the family fails so that there is no descendent from the line of the family of Lady Anna, Born-in-the-Purple, remaining, then I decree that these buildings should be restored to the power of this convent, and the buildings of the outside courtyard should be transformed into rented properties, and the convent should reap the revenue from them, and they should take down those of the inner courtyard and use the material and the site as the convent wishes for profitable gardens and orchards, all the revenues from which the convent will gain with those also of the bathhouses.

Moreover those who at the time are to have the occupation and the dwelling in the aforementioned buildings will live in them in a reverent manner, and will not cause any distress at all to the convent of Kecharitomene. But they will have the power to build where they wish inside the boundary of the buildings granted to them, and to such a height that they do not look down on any of the parts of either the monastery or the convent, but they will not prop any building on the empty walls around the convent or its buildings but the buildings will be completely free-standing just as they have been made by us. The use of these [buildings] will in no way whatsoever be granted to strangers, either by sale or hire or exchange or gift or mortgage or pledge or by any other means whatsoever by any of the people prescribed to have the possession and occupation of the aforementioned buildings, and the one who possesses this right will simply not be allowed to lodge anyone else in them, having perhaps a personal residence elsewhere. For this we completely forbid.

But if ever—and may this not happen—the person who at any particular time has the use of the buildings of the convent—for I must repeat again my words about them—incurs any civil or private liability of any kind whatsoever connected with money or a criminal charge or should even be found guilty of treason, my majesty does not wish these buildings or their use to be made liable, but remain free of all liability. If the liability is one regarding money, that person who has the use of these buildings should possess and occupy them again, even if all the rest of this person's wealth is perhaps forfeit by law to his creditors. For this use and possession of these buildings and all the things in them must be above all debt liability, since my majesty passes them on in this way to those who are going to possess them. But if he should be indicted for a crime or on a charge of treason and should be ejected from this usage, the usage must revert to the person summoned next, according to the proviso [p. 143] and definition given above. But if perhaps there should be no [descendants] left, [the buildings] will return to the controlling convent.

27. KECHARITOMENE

If also perhaps some day—may this not happen—these buildings are burned down partially or totally, my majesty does not wish the usage to come to an end, because the residential buildings have been destroyed, but the person who then has the right of this usage according to the above regulation should again have it and possess these rights and use them, as has been described above, having the power to rebuild the buildings on the sites of those that were burnt, of whatever kind he can, though the provisos concerning the way these buildings should be passed on and go from one to another must be kept, just as has been described more clearly above, and be in force and operate. However it will not be possible for anyone to give away the site of these buildings to anyone for a garden or for the building of rental property, but to build other buildings again in place of them of whatever kind he can in order to reside in them, and we decree that the one who uses the place differently contrary to this decree of ours should be ejected from those [buildings] and they should pass to the person summoned after the man or woman who has been expelled, as has been discussed above.

Moreover I wish all these commands and provisos that have been discussed to remain secure with the party of the convent not having the power to go against the decrees of my majesty here in any way whatsoever. For with these provisos my majesty has thus created and creates the attachment of these immovable rights to the party of the convent, and in the aforementioned ways instructs that the control of them be attached to the convent. If perhaps the party of the convent possesses some rights from some documents or from elsewhere in respect of these buildings and the others and the whole of their surrounding area, my majesty does not wish that anything else should be done in respect of them contrary to what has been laid down here. For my majesty, since it has established the whole convent and the properties around it and in its control at great personal expenditure and cost, has the power in every way to decree in respect of these immovable properties whatever it decides, and wishes its decrees to remain unchanged; and if the nuns were perhaps to attempt to try something else, those chiefly responsible among the rest for this attempt will not be received favorably by any court of law, and will be expelled from the convent.

80. Concerning those who must have the ephoreia of the convent

Since it was inevitable that someone should be appointed by me to protect the convent, and be active in preserving the instructions in the rule unbroken in every way, and moreover my majesty decreed, in the chapter⁶² concerning those who should protect the convent, that my dearly beloved daughter, Lady Eudokia, Born-in-the-Purple, should take care of it [p. 145] and exact vengeance on those who perhaps try to harm it, and be zealous in preserving unbroken the instructions in the rule published by me. But she, because of my sins, as has been mentioned, departed this life, and I decree that after my departure from this life my most beloved [daughter] the Caesarissa, Lady Anna, should have the ephoreia of the convent; and after her death, my dearly beloved daughter, Lady Maria, Born-in-the-Purple, should have the ephoreia of this convent along with my dearly beloved granddaughter, Lady Irene Doukaina, the daughter of Lady Anna, Born-in-the-Purple. But when these depart from this life, this ephoreia should go to the other daughter of Lady Anna, Born-in-the-Purple, or to a granddaughter or a great-granddaughter and so on, for my majesty wishes her daughters and granddaughters and great-granddaughters and so on, as long as the female line continues, to oversee the convent of my Mother of God Kecharitomene, the one who is the eldest.

TWELFTH CENTURY

But if the female line descended from the often mentioned Lady Anna, Born-in-the-Purple, fails, then the protection of this convent will pass, as a result of this written decree of my majesty, to one of the daughters-in-law married to one of those descended from the lady, Born-in-the-Purple, that is the one married to the eldest. Again this arrangement will be preserved until the daughters-in-law married to the males of the family fail, as long as this is observed, namely, that the woman who is going to oversee the convent does not enter into a second marriage after the death of her husband. If perhaps she gains the appointment to the ephoreia and then turns aside to a second marriage, she will at once be deprived of the ephoreia, and it will pass to the one summoned after her. This proviso must be observed in the case of them all.

Moreover after these all fail, it will pass to the lady from the most distinguished of our family, but she will not be the one who surpasses the others in age but the one in fact whom the nuns practicing the religious life in this convent at the time will choose with their superior. This will be maintained like this for ever, for as long as this present age lasts.

The one who has the right of the ephoreia will never enter the convent at any other time except during the liturgy, and when this finishes she will leave at once, unless some meeting is proposed which is necessary and is connected with the maintenance of the convent and then with two or three women. But if one of our noble female relatives or another woman should happen to be with her, she alone will enter the convent together with her, but not a single man, because we decree that the convent is to be completely untrodden by men and continuously closed even to eunuchs themselves.

But if some of our male children and sons-in-law married to our daughters or even of our grandsons will wish to enter the convent, through a desire for us or because of some matter necessary for the convent, they will enter as far as the exonarthex in the company of the protectress of the convent, themselves alone with her, and stand until the liturgy is completed. After the completion of this, [p. 147] when the nuns have gone away to their dormitory, they will enter the church with only the superior left behind with two or three of the oldest and devout nuns, and when they have had an appropriate conversation with them and venerated the [icon] of the Mother of God Kecharitomene, they will leave. They will do this once or twice a year and at the feast of the Mother of God.

Moreover my dearly beloved daughters, Lady Anna and Lady Maria Born-in-the-Purple and my most beloved granddaughter, Lady Irene Doukaina, will have the liberty, whenever they wish, to attend the church at all the divine services, and at the time of the meals to eat with the nuns but with [only] two or three of their women.

The door which leads into this convent from the direction of the imperial buildings will be closed on the inside by the superior and on the outside by the protectress of the convent. All the other things discussed in the third chapter concerning the oversight must be maintained unchanged for ever.

Concerning the delimitation of the convent

The dividing wall of the convent of Kecharitomene begins from the gate of entry to the convent situated in front of the public road, which comes from the direction of the convent of St. Anna of Deuteron,⁶³ and goes eastwards keeping close to the same public road and goes on as far as the lavatory of the infirmarian of the convent which is opposite the end of the balcony of the buildings [by] the oak tree of the convent. In length it is forty-eight cubits, and separates the buildings of the convent on the left from the public road on the right. It curves away a little, keeping close again to the same public road, and goes away as far as the lane behind the cells of the patriarchal convent of St. Nicholas.⁶⁴ In length it is fifty-three cubits, and separates the buildings of the convent on the left from the public road on the right. It turns to the north keeping close to the lane, separating the church of St. Nicholas on the right from the buildings of the monastery on the left. In length it is eighteen and a half cubits. It bends to the east for a distance of three cubits, then veers a little to the north for a distance of one cubit. It bends back eastwards again for a distance of five cubits, then again turns eastwards for four and a half cubits and bends again to the east for a distance of four and a half cubits. It turns back again northwards separating the buildings of St. Nicholas on the right from the buildings of the convent on the left and continues as far as the wall of the two-story building [housing] the wardrobe [p. 149] of my majesty; in length it is twelve cubits. It turns a little towards the west for a distance of two cubits then goes northwards again for a distance of twenty-three cubits separating the alley in front of the workshop of the convent on the left from the buildings of my majesty on the right. Up against this wall is placed the omphaitos belonging to [the building housing] the wardrobe of my majesty and the balcony built from Carian wood which is of the same dimensions as the uncovered balcony. It turns to the west separating the alley and the workshop of the convent on the left from the houses of my majesty on the right for a distance of fifteen cubits. It bends to the north separating the empty space behind the sanctuary of the church of the convent on the left from the houses of my majesty on the right for a distance of sixteen cubits. It turns back westwards separating the colonnade of the church of the convent on the left from the tetrakarikoxyton of my majesty on the right for a distance of nine cubits. It turns back again northwards separating the oratory of my majesty on the left from the tetrakarikoxyton on the right for a distance of twelve cubits in which also there is only . . .

27. KECHARITOMENE

TWELFTH CENTURY

Appendix A [p. 148]

The vineyards paying tax⁶⁵ to the holy convent of the most holy Mother of God Kecharitomene situated around the exterior of [the convent of] Zoodochos Pege.⁶⁶

	mod(ioi)	(nomismata)	k(okkia)
Basil Kalogerites	2 5/6	–	23
Tzignogoulina the widow	3	1	–
Polypeirina the widow [p. 149]	2 1/2	–	20
Demetrios Kanokes	5 1/5	1	18
Kanokes the priest, his brother	3 1/2	1	4
Apostoles Lithognomon	6 1/10	2 (?)	1
Gounares Kentarchos	5	1	16
John Tzibitzoulos	5 1/3 and 3 lepta	1	2 (1/2)
Konstas Galotes	2 1/4	–	18
Manuel Koursares	2 1/8	–	17
Lampadares Panopoulos	4 1/10	1	9
[p. 150]
Theodore Keporos	6	2	–
(total) (hyperpera)	15	(kokkia)	8 1/2
(total) (hyperpera)	12

The *chrysoteleia*⁶⁷ of our convent of the most holy Mother of God Kecharitomene; the property outside our courtyard.

	(nomismata)	k(okkia)
The house of Sophianos with its land	2	–
The house of Euphemia near Sophianos	–	15
The house of Bardales, that is of Kourasmene	–	15
The house of Kapassou	1	–
The house of Angelina, the priest's wife	–	12
The house of her daughter	1	–
The house of Souroumina	–	12
The house of Garatzias	–	15
The house of Syropoulos with the vineyard	3	–
The house of Pelekanos	1	–
The house of Boutzas	1	–
The house of Theodora Kathare, who is in the old age home	–	12
The house of Gerakares	–	12

27. KECHARITOMENE

	(nomismata)	k(okkia)
The house of Roudroa	1	3
The house of Thomais, the stepdaughter of Tzoukena	–	12
The house of Tzoukis	1	–
The house of Chamopournea	–	12
The house of Katakalos; Mamitzonites has it	–	18
Another house near this one	–	21
(total) (hyper)p(y)r(a)	17	k(okkia) 13

John Serbos for the small vineyard (?) [p. 151]

The chrysoteleia of the convent of the Mother of God Kecharitomene, outside the chronological limits (?)⁶⁸ of the first indiction.

	(nomismata)	(kokkia)
Rent [of] the bakery	20	–
Rent [of] house next to the warehouse	2	12
Rent [of] house once belonging to Sophianos	5	–
House of Tzegoudes	–	15
House of Sophianos, the maker of rush mats	1	–
House of Latouros	1	–
House, a workshop of the same man
Another house of his son-in-law	–	12
Rent [of] house near it	2	–
Two houses of Apedou	1	12
House of Mauraganos	–	21
House of Maurianos
Another of the same man, total	1	12
The vine dressing
House of the priest Zagaras	1	9
House of Thomais	–	21
House of Michael Charastias	1	3
House of Triantaphylos	–	12
House of Mauros	1	–
House of miller's wife	1	–
House of Charatzias	–	15
And a vineyard measuring a small modios	1	12
John Serbos, a small modios	6	18

TWELFTH CENTURY

	(nomismata)	(kokkia)
Palaiologos as a result of purchase from Apedou	1	12
(total)	50	9
And from the tax of [zoodochos] Pege	10	12
And from the workshop	20	–
And from Galatas	3	–
The priest has [his] allowance for the year	20	–
The man who looks after the vineyard has [his allowance] for the year	42	–
The church has [its] expenditure, wax and oil	12	–

[p. 152]

Appendix B

with the [following] lines: O Queen full of grace, Irene presents a gift of the wood of the Cross to your convent. Inside it [is] the venerable wood with six gold caskets (?)⁶⁹ and with gold: the middle of this [is] silver the inner of the reliquary silver-gilt with six silver reliquaries the lids of which are silver-gilt depicting the scourging of Christ, the Crucifixion, the Descent from the Cross, the Entombment, the Resurrection, and Christ greeting the Marys, with a larger of silver with gold inlay and two other small <Another> reliquary fully tzapotos inside and out⁷⁰ silver-gilt having depicted on its doors St. Peter and St. Paul and [the venerable] wood on the outside of the doors it has hierarchs [St. John] Chrysostom and St. Nicholas; on the inside on this side and that of the venerable wood [are] silver reliquaries and above and below is an encaustic inscription in [the following] lines: The faith of the empress Irene gained a protection of herself and her husband and children, the holy passion of the most revered of the relics of the martyrs also with large silver rings (?)⁷¹ and p....

..... and two glass jewels.

Another reliquary, silver-gilt all over for the venerable wood, having its lid depicting the Crucifixion with the Mother of God and [St. John] the Theologian and the evangelists; on the outside of the lid the <Crucifixion> and inside the reliquary the venerable wood completely covered with silver, and it has depicted on it the Crucifixion above and St. Stephen below and six <other> of the Cross St. John on this side and St. [Mary] Magdalene on the other side; it has and katovlia and a lock (?)⁷² with a silver key and Another reliquary tzapotos all round having depicted above St. Demetrios and inside of St. Demetrios himself and on top with a deep purple cross. [p. 153]

..... silver-gilt, and two others, two silver-gilt icons, the first [of] St. Peter and the other [of] St. Paul.

27. KECHARITOMENE

Suspended between these pillars, a small silver tzapotos having the four evangelists.

<Another icon> depicting the Dormition [and] the birth—both of the Mother of God—the Presentation of Christ in the Temple, the Annunciation, the Nativity of Christ, the Baptism, and Christ enthroned and the Mother of God similarly. <Another> [icon] St. Theo <Another> [icon]

About <painted on wood> and unadorned [icons].....

<Another> large icon <painted on wood> for the sanctuary [of] the most holy <Mother of God> and Child.

<Another> similar large icon [of St. John] the Theologian.

Another similar icon [of] St. Basil.

Another icon with wings, [of] the prophet Daniel and other saints.

Another of St. Eupraxia, Christ Antiphonetes, and the most holy Mother of God.

<Another> [of] the martyr St.

<Another>

Another icon [of the] Forty <Martyrs>.

<Another> of the most holy Mother of God.

Another icon

<Another>

<Another>

<Another>

And another icon [of] <the> three <hierarchs> ... [St. John] Chrysostom and St. Gregory the Theologian.

Another old icon.

Another similar icon.

Another icon [of] the Mother of God and Child with a silver-gilt frame with various saints depicted and various glass jewels.

Another new icon, painted on wood, [of] Christ enthroned, and below similarly the Mother of God and on this side and on that of both of them [Sts.] Peter and Paul and the Saints Theodore with a silver-gilt frame and a similar ring.

TWELFTH CENTURY

Another small silver icon [of] the Crucifixion and another small one similarly of silver [of] the Nativity of Christ.

Two *amparateines*⁷³ icons with gold studs, one with a ring of silver with gold inlay, the other with a similar golden ring and [both] were ruined by age. [p. 154]

Concerning the templa, the lilies,⁷⁴ the crosses, the arched candlestands⁷⁵ above these, the holy doors, the capitals⁷⁶ the doorposts,⁷⁷ and the curtains woven with silver and gold fixed on the pillars.

..... of the holy sanctuary various decorated holy crosses of silver with gold inlay along with their complete Hexapteryga [and] various saints.

Three other [crosses] stand inside the templon, silver-gilt with various glass jewels and on their sides two silver-gilt lilies weighing six litrai, twenty-six hexagia and above [them] similar silver-gilt lilies weighing eight litrai.

The holy doors of the sanctuary of silver completely [covered with] gold inlay [depicting] the Annunciation, with all their [complete set of] identical studs, weighing altogether ten litrai, <that is> fifty-eight hexagia and their studs four.

The doorposts of the holy doors of silver completely [covered with] gold inlay depicting Christ and the Mother of God weigh three litrai hexagia.

<The curtains> of the four pillars bearing a representation of a cross [and the] portraits of <various> saints.

About the venerable crosses.

A silver-gilt cross which stands inside the sanctuary tzapotos from head to foot, silver-gilt, having on the front side of it and the back eleven [pieces of] silver enamelling with various glass jewels and a complete [set of] pendants⁷⁸ and six complete arched candlestands (?) above.⁷⁹

Another small cross completely made of gold with six similar pendants and various glass jewels.

Another plain silver cross tzapotos, small, with two bosses (?)⁸⁰ missing from it.

Another two small crosses, one of which is larger [and] has Christ depicted across the middle; on the back of it [is] an inscription; the other one [is] small and without a covering, but was of gold.

Another small black with Another wooden [reliquary] containing the relics of St. Demetrianos. [p. 155]

Concerning the sacred patens and chalices and [other] patens.

One set of silver-gilt paten and chalice, together with a spoon, ithmos and asterisk, weighing eight litrai and one ounce.

27. KECHARITOMENE

Another set of silver paten and chalice, plain, with bands of gold inlay, together with an ithmos, asterisk and spoon.

Another set of paten and chalice, similar in all respects [to the former set] together with an ithmos, asterisk and spoon. Both [paten and chalice] are of silver. These two similar sets of paten and chalice weigh twelve litrai eight ounces.

Another set of paten and chalice resting on a foot, plain, together with an ithmos, asterisk and spoon. Both [paten and chalice] are of silver, with a cross and stars of gold inlay. [The set] weighs five litrai and ten ounces.

Another small silver paten with gold inlay of octagonal shape for the sacrament; it weighs two litrai seven ounces.

Another large paten for the bread offerings

Notes on the Translation

1. The Doukas family, for which see Polemis, Doukai, pp. 1–15.
2. Irene, who was born ca. 1066, married Alexios Komnenos ca. 1078 and became empress in 1081 with the accession of her husband to the throne; see Brand and Cutler, “Irene Doukaina,” ODB, p. 1009.
3. Irene was the mother of Anna, Maria, John (the future emperor John II Komnenos), Andronikos, Isaac, Eudokia, Theodora, Michael, and Zoe. There are provisions below in [71] for the commemoration of all of her children except for Michael (born 1097) and Zoe (born 1098). Of Irene’s ten known grandchildren, only Anna’s daughter Irene Doukaina is mentioned in this document (see [71], [79], [80] below).
4. Eudokia Komnene, Irene’s third daughter, born 1089 or 1094 (Kazhdan, “Liste,” p. 236), for whom see Varzos, Genealogia, vol. 1, pp. 254–59, and [71], [79] below.
5. As [79] and [80] in fact were; cf. Gautier, “Kécharitôménè,” p. 14.
6. Anna Komnene, Irene’s eldest daughter, born 1083, for whom see Varzos, Genealogia, vol. 1, pp. 176–97, and [71], [79], [80] below.
7. Maria Komnene, Irene’s second daughter, born 1085, for whom see Varzos, Genealogia, vol. 1, pp. 198–202, and [71], [80] below.
8. See also [73] below.
9. praktikon.
10. Unidentified quotation.
11. Pseudo-Basil, Constitutiones asceticae 28, PG 31, col. 1417C.
12. Possible quotation from (22) Evergetis [13], ed. line 611.
13. The candles were manufactured at the convent.
14. This chapter is a paraphrase of (22) Evergetis [37]; see Gautier, “Kécharitôménè,” p. 76, n. 9, and p. 77, n. 11.
15. Feast of the Dormition, August 15; feast of the Transfiguration, August 6.
16. Andronikos Doukas, for whom see Polemis, Doukai, pp. 55–59, and Maria of Bulgaria, for whom see Gautier, “Kécharitôménè,” p. 124, n. 37; see also [71] below.
17. Living children: Anna, Maria, the future emperor John, Andronikos, Isaac, Eudokia, Theodora, Michael, and Zoe, though Michael and Zoe are omitted in [71] below. Sons-in-law: Nikephoros Bryennios, husband of Anna; Nikephoros Katakalon, husband of Maria; and Constantine Kourtikios, husband of Theodora, are mentioned below in [71], while George Botaneiates, husband of Zoe, is not.
18. Feast of the Discovery of the Head of the Forerunner, February 24; feast of the Holy Martyrs, March 9; feast of the Annunciation, March 25.

TWELFTH CENTURY

19. C. Trull. c. 89 (R&P 2.512); Constitutiones apostolicae, ed. J. B. Pitra, Juris ecclesiastici graecorum historia et monumenta, vol. 1 (Rome, 1864), pp. 284, 288–89.
20. Gregory Nazianzen, Oratio in Pentecosten, PG 36, col. 429B.
21. Fast of the Holy Apostles, from the Monday after the feast of All Saints (Sunday after Pentecost) through the vigil of the feast of Sts. Peter and Paul, June 28; fast of the Nativity, from November 15 until Christmas.
22. Feast of the Entrance into the Temple, November 21.
23. Basil of Caesarea, Regulae fusius tractatae 18 ([LR 18]), PG 31, col. 965.
24. In [2] and [51] above.
25. Birth of the Mother of God, September 8.
26. Feast of the Presentation of Our Lord in the Temple, February 2.
27. As discussed in [59] above.
28. Feast of Sts. Peter and Paul, June 29.
29. Kecharitomene and the male monastery of Philanthropos, for which see [77] and [79] below.
30. For this foundation, see Janin, Géographie, vol. 3, p. 188.
31. Patriarch of Constantinople, (1084–1111); see Alexander Kazhdan and Anthony Cutler, “Nicholas III Grammatikos,” ODB, p. 1467.
32. John II Komnenos, the future emperor (1118–43) and Irene’s eldest son, born 1087, for whom see Varzos, Genealogia, vol. 1, pp. 203–28, and the bibliography for (28) Pantokrator below.
33. Irene of Hungary, died 1134, who is also commemorated in (28) Pantokrator [8], [32], [35], and [44].
34. Andronikos Komnenos, Irene’s second son, born 1091, for whom see Varzos, Genealogia, vol. 1, pp. 229–37. He is also commemorated in (28) Pantokrator [8].
35. Nikephoros Bryennios, husband of Irene’s daughter Anna Komnene, for whom see Alexander Kazhdan, “Bryennios, Nikephoros the Younger,” ODB, p. 331. He is also commemorated in (28) Pantokrator [8].
36. Isaac Komnenos, Irene’s third son, born 1093, for whom see Varzos, Genealogia, vol. 1, pp. 238–54, and the bibliography for (29) Kosmosoteira below.
37. Nikephoros Katakalon Euphorbenos, husband of Irene’s daughter Maria Komnene, for whom see Gautier, “Kécharitôménè,” p. 121, n. 27. He is also commemorated in (28) Pantokrator [8].
38. Probably Constantine Kourtikios, first husband of Irene’s daughter Theodora Komnene; see Gautier, “Kécharitôménè,” p. 121, n. 28, and p. 122, n. 35.
39. Irene Doukaina, Irene’s granddaughter by Anna Komnene and Nikephoros Bryennios, born ca. 1105, for whom see Varzos, Genealogia, vol. 1, pp. 326–30 and [79], [80] below.
40. Irene’s eldest daughter; see also [4] above and [79] below.
41. Irene’s second daughter; see also [4] above and [79] below.
42. Irene’s third daughter; see also [4] above and [79] below. She is also commemorated in (28) Pantokrator [8].
43. Wife of Irene’s second son Andronikos Komnenos; see Gautier, “Kécharitôménè,” p. 122, n. 33.
44. Wife of Irene’s third son Isaac Komnenos; see Gautier, “Kécharitôménè,” p. 122, n. 34.
45. Theodora Komnene, Irene’s fourth daughter, born 1096, for whom see Gautier, “Kécharitôménè,” p. 122, n. 35, and Varzos, Genealogia, vol. 1, pp. 259–64.
46. Irene’s father, who died in 1077; see also [34] above. He is also commemorated in (28) Pantokrator [8].
47. Irene’s mother, who died shortly before 1095; see also [34] above. She is also commemorated in (28) Pantokrator [8].
48. The kouropalates John Komnenos, father of Irene’s husband Alexios I Komnenos, who died 1067, for whom see Varzos, Genealogia, vol. 1, pp. 49–57. He is also commemorated in (28) Pantokrator [8].
49. Anna Dalassena, mother of Alexios I Komnenos, patron of Christodoulos of Patmos, and founder of the Christ Pantepoptes monastery in Constantinople, for whom see Abrahamse, “Women’s Monasti-

27. KECHARITOMENE

- cism,” p. 48, Charles Brand, “Dalassene, Anna,” ODB, p. 578, and Skoulatos, Personnages, pp. 20–24. She is also commemorated in (28) Pantokrator [8], [32].
50. The protostrator Michael Doukas, Irene’s eldest brother, for whom see Polemis, Doukai, pp. 63–66. He is also commemorated in (28) Pantokrator [8].
51. Theodora Doukaina, Irene’s youngest sister, for whom see Polemis, Doukai, p. 75. She is also commemorated in (28) Pantokrator [8].
52. John Doukas, Irene’s second brother, monk and patron of Evergetis, for whom see Polemis, Doukai, pp. 66–70, and Skoulatos, Personnages, pp. 145–50.
53. Anna Doukaina, Irene’s younger sister and wife of George Palaiologos, a partisan of the Chalcedonian reform movement; see Polemis, Doukai, pp. 74–75. She is also commemorated in (28) Pantokrator [8].
54. See also [34] above.
55. Tentative translation of the otherwise unattested karikoxylon. See Gautier, “Kécharitôménè,” p. 126, n. 46.
56. enchoregos.
57. Original signature; see Gautier, “Kécharitôménè,” p. 10.
58. Irene’s third daughter, who died after 1118; see also [3] and [71] above.
59. Irene’s eldest daughter, who did in fact retire to the convent after her husband Nikephoros Bryennios’ death ca. 1136–37; see also [4] and [71] above and [80] below.
60. For this foundation, see Janin, Géographie, vol. 3, p. 91.
61. See the mentions of her in [71] above and [80] below; the date of her death is unknown.
62. See [3] above.
63. For this foundation, see Janin, Géographie, vol. 3, pp. 35–37.
64. For this foundation, see Janin, Géographie, vol. 3, pp. 373–74.
65. hypotele ampelia. For the tax on vineyards, see Gautier, “Kécharitôménè,” p. 150, n. 15.
66. For this convent, see Janin, Géographie, vol. 3, pp. 223–28.
67. chrysoteleia. On this tax, see A. Kazhdan, “Chrysoteleia,” ODB, p. 455.
68. ta ekstos chronika indiktionos a’.
69. boutia.
70. tzapotos: the meaning of this term is uncertain. It is thought to denote either a silver or gold revetment or the technique used to ornament the metal by means of a hammer and chisel. See Lemerle, Actes de Saint-Pantéléémôn, p. 68, note to lines 8 and 17. The term is still used in the latter sense (skalistos) by old silversmiths on Mount Athos, according to Professor Tsames of the University of Thessalonike who very kindly discussed the word tzapotos with us.
71. kichroule.
72. tzikos.
73. amparateines: we are most grateful to Professor Tsames for suggesting that the reference may be to elektron, since the latter is known in the demotic as amparo. See K. Langitsis, Etymologiko Lexiko tes Neoellenikes (Athens, 1978), s.v. amparo. For candelabra made of elektron, see (61) Eleousa Inv. [6] and footnote 57 where the meaning of elektron is discussed.
74. krina.
75. kamarai. On these candlestands, used also over icons, see (61) Eleousa Inv., p. 1677, n. 56.
76. kephalides.
77. harmosphinia.
78. meta kataseiston: for which see Lemerle, Actes de Saint-Pantéléémôn, p. 68, note to line 11.
79. kamarai.
80. Reading melon for milon.

TWELFTH CENTURY

Document Notes

- [1] Free and self-governing constitution. A Group B chapter; makes minor use of (22) Evergetis [12]; text shared later with (32) Mamas [4], (33) Heliou Bomon [4], and (34) Machairas [21]. See also provisions in (23) Pakourianos [18], (24) Christodoulos [A16], (28) Pantokrator [69], (29) Kosmosoteira [31], (30) Phoberos [33], and (31) Areia [M12], [T12].
- [2] Maintenance of the cenobitic life. See also [51], [55] below. A Group D chapter; independent of (22) Evergetis; text shared later with (32) Mamas [5], (33) Heliou Bomon [5], and (47) Philanthropos [1], [2], [3], [4].
- [3] Role of the protector. A Group D chapter; independent of (22) Evergetis; text shared later with (32) Mamas [3] and (33) Heliou Bomon [3]. Amended by [80] below.
- [4] Special privileges for founder's relatives. A Subgroup A.1 chapter; cf. other treatments of this issue in (23) Pakourianos [25] and (29) Kosmosoteira [50]. Amended by [80] below.
- [5] Number of nuns. A Subgroup A.2 chapter; cf. other treatments of this issue in (22) Evergetis [23], (23) Pakourianos [6], (28) Pantokrator [19], (29) Kosmosoteira [48], (30) Phoberos [42], (31) Areia [M4], (32) Mamas [5], and (33) Heliou Bomon [5].
- [6] Common residence in one dormitory. A Subgroup A.1 chapter.
- [7] No mandatory entrance gifts. A Group B chapter; makes minor use of (22) Evergetis [37] on irrevocability of voluntary offerings; text shared later with (32) Mamas [5], (33) Heliou Bomon [5], and (34) Machairas [59]. See also provisions in (29) Kosmosoteira [55], (30) Phoberos [53A] and (31) Areia [T6].
- [8] Conditions for acceptance of outside gifts. A Subgroup A.1 chapter; cf. treatments of this issue in (20) Black Mountain [85], (22) Evergetis [36], (23) Pakourianos [20], (31) Areia [M10], [T6], and (46) Akropolites [8].
- [9] Inalienability of consecrated property. A Subgroup A.2 chapter. For exceptions to the general rule, see [10] below.
- [10] Regulations for emergency alienations of movable property. A Group C chapter; makes minor use of (22) Evergetis [19].
- [11] Election of the superior. A Group B chapter; makes minor use of (22) Evergetis [13] for the investiture ceremony; text shared later with (32) Mamas [1] and (33) Heliou Bomon [1]. See also provisions in (23) Pakourianos [5], (24) Christodoulos [A18], (26) Luke of Messina [11], [12], [13], (29) Kosmosoteira [32], and (30) Phoberos [35].
- [12] No partiality or favoritism in choice of officials. A Group B chapter; quotes (22) Evergetis [14], [16], [17]; text shared later with (32) Mamas [42], [45], (33) Heliou Bomon [41], [44], and (58) Menoikeion [18], [19].
- [13] Removal of the superior. A Group B chapter; makes use of (22) Evergetis [13], [14]; text shared later with (32) Mamas [2], (33) Heliou Bomon [2], and (34) Machairas [88], [89], [90]. See also provisions in (10) Eleousa [16], (23) Pakourianos [19], (24) Christodoulos [A20], (29) Kosmosoteira [41], and (30) Phoberos [35].
- [14] Qualifications and duties of the steward. A Subgroup A.2 chapter; cf. other treatments in (22) Evergetis [13], (24) Christodoulos [A21], (28) Pantokrator [64], (29) Kosmosoteira [34], (30) Phoberos [35], (31) Areia [T7], (32) Mamas [7], and (33) Heliou Bomon [7].
- [15] Duties of two eunuch priests. A Subgroup A.1 chapter; cf. other treatments of qualifications of priests in (19) Attaleiates [30]; (23) Pakourianos [7], [24]; (39) Lips [6]; (40) Anargyroi [5]; and (57) Bebaia Elpis [79].
- [16] Confession of nuns to a eunuch spiritual father. A Subgroup A.2 chapter; cf. later provisions for nuns (39) Lips [11] and (57) Bebaia Elpis [111].
- [17] Visitation procedures. A Subgroup A.2 chapter; the ban on male visitors is analogous to the ban on women in (22) Evergetis [39] and related documents. See also later provisions for visitations in (39)

27. KECHARITOMENE

- Lips* [15], [16]; (40) Anargyroi [5]; and (57) Bebaia Elpis [75], [76]. The absolute ban on male visitors is amended in [80] below.
- [18] Installation ceremony for officials. A Group B chapter; makes minor use of (22) Evergetis [29]; text shared later with (32) Mamas [6], (33) Heliou Bomon [6], and (34) Machairas [92]. See also the provisions in (29) Kosmosoteira [35] and (30) Phoberos [18].
- [19] Duties of the sacristan. A Group D chapter; independent of (22) Evergetis [32] except for the brief quotation of the latter's provision of tenure of office for officials; text shared later with (32) Mamas [9], (33) Heliou Bomon [9], and (58) Menoikeion [5].
- [20] Duties of the ecclesiarchisssa. A Group D chapter; independent of (22) Evergetis; text shared later with (32) Mamas [8], (33) Heliou Bomon [8], and (58) Menoikeion [4]; cf. (34) Machairas [93].
- [21] Duties of the food buyer. A Subgroup A.1 chapter, not shared with later documents. See also (57) Bebaia Elpis [88].
- [22] Duties of the wine stewardess. A Subgroup A.1 chapter, not shared with other documents.
- [23] Duties of the provisioner. A Group D chapter; independent of (22) Evergetis; text shared later with (32) Mamas [11] and (33) Heliou Bomon [11]; cf. (34) Machairas [96].
- [24] Duties of the two treasurers; cash reserve fund. A Group D chapter; independent of (22) Evergetis; text shared later with (32) Mamas [10] and (33) Heliou Bomon [10]. (23) Pakourianos [26] and (29) Kosmosoteira [94] also provide for cash reserves.
- [25] Duties of the refectorian; exhortation to all officials. A Group B chapter; copies (22) Evergetis [31] and [33]; text shared later with (32) Mamas [23] and (33) Heliou Bomon [23]. See also provisions in (29) Kosmosoteira [37], [39], (30) Phoberos [48], and (58) Menoikeion [10].
- [26] Duties of the disciplinary official. A Subgroup A.2 chapter, not shared with other documents. See different treatments in (22) Evergetis [31], (29) Kosmosoteira [37], (30) Phoberos [48], and (34) Machairas [114].
- [27] Duties of the work organizers. A Subgroup A.1 chapter, not shared with other documents. See (20) Black Mountain [80], (34) Machairas [86], and (37) Auxentios [7] for officials with similar responsibilities.
- [28] Duties of the treasurers of the wardrobe. A Subgroup A.2 chapter, not shared with other documents. See different provisions in (22) Evergetis [30], (29) Kosmosoteira [36], and (30) Phoberos [47].
- [29] Duties of the gatekeeper. A Group D chapter; independent of (22) Evergetis; text shared later with (32) Mamas [12], (33) Heliou Bomon [12], and (58) Menoikeion [7]; cf. (34) Machairas [116].
- [30] Length of the novitiate. A Group B chapter; paraphrases (22) Evergetis [37]; text shared later with (32) Mamas [22], (33) Heliou Bomon [22], and (34) Machairas [55], [56]. See also treatments in (23) Pakourianos [25], (24) Christodoulos [A26], (25) Fragala [A8], [B8], (29) Kosmosoteira [55], and (30) Phoberos [51].
- [31] Qualifications and duties of the property managers. A Subgroup A.2 chapter, not shared with other documents. See different provisions in (22) Evergetis [34], (23) Pakourianos [16], (29) Kosmosoteira [40], (30) Phoberos [49], and (34) Machairas [109].
- [32] Offices of the first, third and sixth hours. A Group B chapter; makes use of (22) Evergetis [4]; text shared later with (32) Mamas [47], cf. [31], (33) Heliou Bomon [46], and (34) Machairas [31], [36]. See also treatments in (20) Black Mountain [10], (29) Kosmosoteira [9], and (30) Phoberos [9].
- [33] Regulation of the mesoria, the liturgy, and reception of the eucharist. A Group C chapter; makes minor use of (22) Evergetis [4], [5]. See also treatments in (10) Eleousa [7], (29) Kosmosoteira [14], (30) Phoberos [11], (32) Mamas [32], (33) Heliou Bomon [32], (34) Machairas [36], [37], [38], and (58) Menoikeion [16].
- [34] Offerings of bread at the liturgy. A Subgroup A.1 chapter, not shared with other documents.
- [35] Prescriptions for the ninth hour, vespers, and the night office. A Group B chapter; makes use of (22) Evergetis [6]; text shared later with (32) Mamas [47] and (33) Heliou Bomon [46]. See also treat-

TWELFTH CENTURY

- ments in (10) Eleousa [7], (20) Black Mountain [11], [12], (29) Kosmosoteira [15], (30) Phoberos [12], and (34) Machairas [42], [43].
- [36] Office of compline. A Group C chapter; makes use of (22) Evergetis [6]. See also treatments in (20) Black Mountain [13], [14], (29) Kosmosoteira [15], (30) Phoberos [12], (32) Mamas [47], (33) Heliou Bomon [46], and (34) Machairas [44].
- [37] Night office. A Group B chapter; makes use of (22) Evergetis [6]; text shared later with (32) Mamas [47] and (33) Heliou Bomon [46]. See also treatments in (29) Kosmosoteira [15] and (30) Phoberos [12].
- [38] Midnight office. A Group B chapter; makes use of (22) Evergetis [6]; text shared later with (32) Mamas [47], (33) Heliou Bomon [46]; cf. (34) Machairas [45], [46]. See also treatments in (20) Black Mountain [15], [16], (29) Kosmosoteira [15], and (30) Phoberos [12].
- [39] Office of matins; celebration of vigils. A Group B chapter; makes use of (22) Evergetis [6] for discussion of matins; text shared later with (32) Mamas [47], (33) Heliou Bomon [46], and (34) Machairas [39]. See also treatments in (20) Black Mountain [17], (29) Kosmosoteira [15], and (30) Phoberos [13].
- [40] Behavior in the refectory. A Group B chapter; makes use of (22) Evergetis [9]; text shared later with (32) Mamas [17], (33) Heliou Bomon [17], and (34) Machairas [63]. See also provisions in (20) Black Mountain [33], (23) Pakourianos [8], (29) Kosmosoteira [21], and (30) Phoberos [21].
- [41] Discipline of the disorderly at meals. A Group C chapter; makes use of (22) Evergetis [9]. See also treatments in (29) Kosmosoteira [21], (30) Phoberos [21], and (34) Machairas [63].
- [42] No arguments about precedence in seating. A Group B chapter; makes use of (22) Evergetis [9]; text shared later with (32) Mamas [36], (33) Heliou Bomon [35], and (34) Machairas [64]. See also provisions in (29) Kosmosoteira [22], (30) Phoberos [22], and (31) Areia [T3].
- [43] No sharing food and drink. A Group C chapter; makes use of (22) Evergetis [9]. See also treatments in (29) Kosmosoteira [23] and (30) Phoberos [22].
- [44] Communal meals obligatory except for the sick. See also [47] below and (10) Eleousa [13]. A Subgroup A.2 chapter, not shared with other documents.
- [45] Second sitting for meal servers. A Group D chapter; independent of (22) Evergetis; text shared later with (32) Mamas [17] and (33) Heliou Bomon [17]. See also provision in (28) Pantokrator [9].
- [46] Diet on ordinary days. A Group D chapter; independent of (22) Evergetis; text shared later with (32) Mamas [17] and (33) Heliou Bomon [17]. See also provisions in (20) Black Mountain [37], [38], [47], [57], (23) Pakourianos [8], (28) Pantokrator [12], and (43) Kasoulon [2], [5].
- [47] Lenten diet. A Group B chapter; makes use of (22) Evergetis [10]; text shared later with (32) Mamas [18], (33) Heliou Bomon [18], and (34) Machairas [67], [68], [69], [70], [71], [72], [73]. See also provisions in (20) Black Mountain [56] ff.; (23) Pakourianos [10]; (28) Pantokrator [12]; (29) Kosmosoteira [25], [26], [27], [28]; (30) Phoberos [27], [28]; (31) Areia [T5]; and (43) Kasoulon [9].
- [48] Diet for the fasts of the Holy Apostles and the Nativity. A Group B chapter; makes use of (22) Evergetis [10]; text shared later with (32) Mamas [18], (33) Heliou Bomon [18], and (34) Machairas [76]. See also provisions in (20) Black Mountain [38R], [54], (23) Pakourianos [10], (28) Pantokrator [12], (29) Kosmosoteira [28], (30) Phoberos [29], [30], (31) Areia [T5], and (43) Kasoulon [3].
- [49] No secret eating. A Group D chapter; independent of (22) Evergetis; text shared later with (32) Mamas [20] and (33) Heliou Bomon [20]. See also provisions in (20) Black Mountain [24], [69], [71], [72]; (22) Evergetis [9], [22]; (28) Pantokrator [9]; (29) Kosmosoteira [23], [47]; and (30) Phoberos [23], [41].
- [50] superior to inspect cells. A Group D chapter; independent of (22) Evergetis; text shared later with (32) Mamas [20] and (33) Heliou Bomon [20]. See also provisions in (22) Evergetis [27], (29) Kosmosoteira [53], and (30) Phoberos [45].
- [51] Advantages of cenobiticism; attendance at common table mandatory. A Subgroup A.1 chapter, not shared with other documents.
- [52] Communal purchase and provision of clothing. A Subgroup A.2 chapter, not shared with other docu-

27. KECHARITOMENE

- ments; cf. other treatments of this issue in (20) Black Mountain [75], (22) Evergetis [25], (23) Pakourianos [9], (28) Pantokrator [22], (29) Kosmosoteira [52], (30) Phoberos [44], (31) Areia [T4], (32) Mamas [28], and (33) Heliou Bomon [28], and (34) Machairas [102].
- [53] No external nuns nor imposed guests. A Group D chapter; independent of (22) Evergetis; text shared later with (32) Mamas [26], (33) Heliou Bomon [26], and (58) Menoikeion [11]. See also treatment of this issue in (31) Areia [M15].
- [54] Nuns tonsured elsewhere welcomed. A Subgroup A.2 chapter, not shared with other documents; cf. other treatments of this issue in (22) Evergetis [37], (23) Pakourianos [25], (30) Phoberos [52], (32) Mamas [22], (33) Heliou Bomon [22], and (34) Machairas [60].
- [55] Maintenance of the cenobitic life. Repeats some of the text of [2] above; cf. [51]. A Group D chapter; independent of (22) Evergetis; text shared later with (32) Mamas [25] and (33) Heliou Bomon [25].
- [56] Equality in food, drink and clothing. A Group B chapter; copies (22) Evergetis [26]; text shared later with (32) Mamas [34], (33) Heliou Bomon [33], and (34) Machairas [106]. See also provisions in (10) Eleousa [4], [13], (23) Pakourianos [4], (29) Kosmosoteira [53], and (30) Phoberos [45].
- [57] Provision for a doctor, care of sick nuns. A Group B chapter; makes use of (22) Evergetis [41]; text shared later with (32) Mamas [34], (33) Heliou Bomon [33], and (34) Machairas [108]. See also provisions in (23) Pakourianos [28], (28) Pantokrator [10], (29) Kosmosoteira [61], and (30) Phoberos [55], [56].
- [58] Bathing. A Subgroup A.2 chapter, not shared with other documents; cf. other treatments of this issue in (22) Evergetis [28], (28) Pantokrator [13], [15], (29) Kosmosoteira [97], [113], (30) Phoberos [46], (31) Areia [T3], (32) Mamas [28], and (33) Heliou Bomon [28].
- [59] Feast of the Dormition. A Subgroup A.2 chapter, not shared with other documents; cf. other treatments of patronal feasts in (10) Eleousa [13]; (22) Evergetis [11]; (23) Pakourianos [11]; (28) Pantokrator [7]; (29) Kosmosoteira [10], [29], [65]; (30) Phoberos [32]; (33) Heliou Bomon [48]; and (34) Machairas [27], cf. [29].
- [60] Feast of the birth of the Mother of God and other feasts. A Subgroup A.1 chapter, not shared with other documents. See also treatment in (34) Machairas [28].
- [61] Feast of Christmas. A Subgroup A.1 chapter, not shared with other documents. See also treatments in (28) Pantokrator [7] and (34) Machairas [34].
- [62] Feast of the Presentation of the Lord. A Subgroup A.1 chapter, not shared with other documents.
- [63] Lighting of the church for Holy Week and other feasts. A Subgroup A.1 chapter, not shared with other documents. See also the provision in (28) Pantokrator [7].
- [64] Daily charitable distributions at the gate. A Group C chapter; makes minor use of (22) Evergetis [38]. See also treatments in (28) Pantokrator [8], [11], (29) Kosmosoteira [6], (30) Phoberos [54], (32) Mamas [13], (33) Heliou Bomon [13], (34) Machairas [118].
- [65] Monthly reading of the typikon. A Group C chapter; makes minor use of (22) Evergetis [43]. See also treatments in (29) Kosmosoteira [59], (30) Phoberos [59], (32) Mamas [16], (33) Heliou Bomon [16], (34) Machairas [167], and (58) Menoikeion [9].
- [66] Lighting of the church. See also [67], [68] below. A Subgroup A.1 chapter, not shared with other documents. (28) Pantokrator [6] makes a similar provision.
- [67] Lighting of crater lamps. A Subgroup A.1 chapter, not shared with other documents. These lamps also mentioned in (28) Pantokrator [6].
- [68] Illumination with candles. A Subgroup A.1 chapter, not shared with other documents. See also (28) Pantokrator [6].
- [69] Maintenance of the aqueduct and water pipes. A Subgroup A.1 chapter, not shared with other documents. See also provisions in (32) Mamas, Prologue.
- [70] Burial of nuns; commemorations for nuns and benefactors. A Group B chapter; makes minor use of (22) Evergetis [36] for the regulation of commemorations; text shared later with (32) Mamas [39], [40]; (33) Heliou Bomon [39]; and (34) Machairas [156], [157]. See also provisions in (21) Roidion [B12]; (23) Pakourianos [20], [21]; (28) Pantokrator [56]; (29) Kosmosoteira [54]; and (30) Phoberos

TWELFTH CENTURY

- [50].
- [71] Commemorations for members of the imperial family. A Subgroup A.1 chapter, not shared with other documents. See other provisions for commemorations of the founder and his relatives in (22) Evergetis [36], Appendix; (23) Pakourianos [21]; (24) Christodoulos [B5]; (28) Pantokrator [8], [32], [44], [72]; (29) Kosmosoteira [7], [11], [64], [72], [91]; (30) Phoberos [50]; (32) Mamas [40]; (33) Heliou Bomon [50]; and (34) Machairas [154].
- [72] Observances for Holy Thursday and the Epiphany. A Subgroup A.1 chapter, not shared with other documents. See other treatments of the feast of Epiphany in (4) Stoudios [A38], [B37] and (20) Black Mountain [92].
- [73] No structural alterations to the convent. A Subgroup A.1 chapter, not shared with other documents.
- [74] Convent to remain unobserved from all sides. A Subgroup A.1 chapter, not shared with other documents.
- [75] Male singers banned; procession on the eve of Palm Sunday; no handiwork during services. A Subgroup A.1 chapter, not shared with other documents, made up of miscellaneous disciplinary regulations. See also (39) Lips [39] for the ban on male singers.
- [76] Burial and commemoration of the founder's tonsured relatives. A Subgroup A.1 chapter, not shared with other documents.
- [77] Preservation of the typikon and the inventory. A Subgroup A.1 chapter, not shared with other documents. See also security provisions in (19) Attaleiates [40], (29) Kosmosoteira [78], and (32) Mamas [Second Semeioma].
- [78] Founder's final instructions. A Group B chapter; makes extensive use of (22) Evergetis [42] and a part of [43]; text shared later with (32) Mamas [46], (33) Heliou Bomon [45], and (34) Machairas [163], [166], [168]. See also provisions in (29) Kosmosoteira [57] and (30) Phoberos [59]. Note the empress' original signature at the end of this chapter.
- [79] Inheritance rights to secular residences within the nunnery. A Subgroup A.1 chapter, not shared with other documents. According to Gautier, "Kécharitôméné," p. 14, this chapter and [80] below are in a different hand from the rest of the document.
- [80] Succession to the protectorate; access by male relatives; victualing rights for female relatives; door to the imperial buildings. A Subgroup A.1 chapter, not shared with other documents. Amends [3] by designating an alternate protectress, [4] by conceding additional patronal privileges, and [17] by allowing male relatives restricted access.
- Delimitation of the convent. See similar property delimitations in (35) Skoteine [40] and (57) Bebaia Elpis [145].
- [Appendix A] Lists of vineyards and taxes due. Note that properties are not tax exempt. See contemporary inventories of immovable properties in (19) Attaleiates [INV 9] and (28) Pantokrator [65], [66].
- [Appendix B] Inventory. See contemporary inventories of movable properties in (19) Attaleiates [INV 5], [INV 6], [INV 7], [INV 8], [INV 12] ff.; (23) Pakourianos [33B]; and (31) Areia [T11].

28. Pantokrator: Typikon of Emperor John II Komnenos for the Monastery of Christ Pantokrator in Constantinople

Date: October 1136

Translator: Robert Jordan

Edition employed: Paul Gautier, “Le typikon du Christ Sauveur Pantocrator,” REB 32 (1974), 1–145, with text at 27–131.

Manuscripts: Parisinus graecus 389, fols. 1–61 (before 1740); Codex 85, nunc 79, Theological School, Halki, now in the Patriarchal Library, Istanbul, fols. 69–122v (1749).¹

Other translation: French, by Gautier, “Pantocrator,” pp. 26–130.

Institutional History

A. Description of the Foundation

The monastery of Christ tou Pantokratoros “The Ruler of All” was built by Emperor John II Komnenos (1118–43) on a hill in the north central part of Constantinople.² In some sources the work is attributed to his spouse Irene, daughter of King Ladislav of Hungary.³ The construction is attributed to an architect named Nikephoros. The foundation included a triple church, with discrete but physically joined facilities dedicated to Christ Pantokrator (south church), the Archangel Michael (central church), and the Mother of God Eleousa (north church). This structure survives as the mosque Zeyrek Kilise Camii in modern Istanbul. Archaeological evidence suggests that the Pantokrator was built first, followed by the Eleousa, and lastly by the Archangel Michael, which was designed to serve as an imperial mortuary chapel for the Komnenian dynasty.⁴ There was also a famous hospital attached to the foundation as well as an old age home. A lepers’ sanatorium associated with the foundation was in a separate location. All of these structural components of the foundation are mentioned in the typikon translated below.

B. Pantokrator under the Komnenian Dynasty

Though it was technically an independent monastery (see [69] below), the Komnenian emperors employed Pantokrator for many of the usual purposes of more traditional imperial monasteries. Upon his sudden accession to the throne upon John II’s accidental death in 1143, Manuel I Komnenos (1143–80) ordered the mezas domestikos John Axouch to confine his older brother Isaac Komnenos there until he himself was able to reach Constantinople. Both John II and his wife Irene were buried there, in 1143 and 1134 respectively. In 1158, Manuel buried his wife Bertha (Irene) of Sulzbach in the mortuary chapel, and in 1180 he himself was buried there too.⁵

The monastery also began its famous collection of icons and relics at this time, including an icon of St. Demetrios brought by Manuel I from Thessalonike in 1149, and the marble slab on which Jesus Christ was thought to have been laid out for burial, brought by the same emperor from Ephesos in 1169/70.⁶

The first known superior of the foundation was Joseph Hagioglykerites, who is mentioned in a source in 1149 in connection with Pantokrator's acquisition of the icon of St. Demetrios and also as the donor of an undated manuscript to the monastery of the Mother of God Pantanassa on the tiny island of Hagia Glykeria south of Cape Akritas where he himself had once been a monk.⁷ Since (28) Pantokrator [24] limits the pool for the selection of a superior to monks already at the head monastery or its dependencies, Gautier ("Pantocrator," p. 22) supposed that Joseph was either John II's own first appointee as superior or else Pantanassa must have become a dependency before his elevation to the office. He apparently served until his death, circa 1154–55.

*C. Pantokrator during the Latin Empire of Constantinople (1204–61)*⁸

The foundation was located in the quarter of the city conceded to the Venetians, who used it as a repository for valuable relics and the famous icon of the Mother of God Hodegetria that they had forcibly removed from Hagia Sophia in 1206. Other famous relics of the monastery, including a head of St. Blasios sent by the Latin emperor Baldwin II (1240–61) to St. Louis IX (1226–70) of France, were dispersed to various locations in western Europe. It is not known whether the monastery continued to be inhabited by Greek monks during the era of Latin rule, or whether they were replaced by monks from western Europe.

D. Pantokrator under the Palaiologan Dynasty (1261–1453)

Michael VIII Palaiologos (1259–82) is reported in a traveler's account to have sought out the icon of the Hodegetria at the Pantokrator immediately upon the Greek reconquest of Constantinople so it could be paraded on August 15, 1261, as he made his re-entry to the city.⁹ A report that Michael VIII's Genoese allies set fire to Pantokrator to avenge the Venetian destruction of one of their churches in Acre probably refers to some dependency rather than the principal foundation.¹⁰ Michael VIII chose Theodosios of Villehardouin, then superior of another monastery, to serve as the Pantokrator's spiritual director, circa 1261–62.¹¹ In 1265, the emperor entrusted Theodosios with the care of his illegitimate daughter Mary while she was traveling to the Mongol khan Hülegü to consummate a marriage alliance. On his return, Theodosios retired to the monastery of the Mother of God ton Hodegon rather than to Pantokrator, which suggests that he must have resigned the office of superior of the latter institution. Considered as a candidate for the patriarchate of Constantinople in 1275, Theodosios was actually named patriarch of Antioch in 1277 or 1278, serving until 1283 or 1284.

Early in his reign, Andronikos II Palaiologos (1282–1325) used the monastery as a place of imprisonment for opponents of his anti-unionist policy vis-à-vis the Roman church.¹² The son of the Serbian king Stefan Uroš II Milutin (1282–1321), Stefan Dečanski, was imprisoned here too in 1313–20, along with his own two sons.¹³ Alexios Philanthropenos may also have been imprisoned here after being blinded at the order of the emperor.¹⁴ Andronikos II also resumed use of the monastery as an imperial burial site, interring his second wife Irene here in 1317.¹⁵ Eight members of the ruling dynasty were buried at Pantokrator in the fifteenth century, including the emperors Manuel II Palaiologos (1391–1425) and John VIII Palaiologos (1425–48).¹⁶

28. PANTOKRATOR

In the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries, several Russian pilgrims, attracted by Pantokrator's famous icons and relics, visited the foundation and left brief accounts, including Stephen of Novgorod (ca. 1349), Alexander the Clerk (1394–95), Zosima the Deacon (1419–22), and the Russian Anonymous (1424–34).¹⁷

Sometime between 1422 and 1425, the courtier and historian George Sphrantzes got Manuel II to choose his friend Makarios Makres as superior of Pantokrator.¹⁸ Pantokrator had fallen on hard times, its buildings in bad shape and its community down to only six monks. Sphrantzes and Makres collaborated in restoring and improving the monastery. They also managed to double the number of resident monks. At about this same time, Manuel II's son Andronikos, once despot of Thessalonike, retired to Pantokrator as a monk and died there in 1426. Later in 1429–30, Makarios served as John VIII's envoy to Pope Martin V (1417–31) for negotiations on the reunification of the Greek and Latin churches.¹⁹ After the conclusion of his mission, Makarios returned to Pantokrator, where he died in 1431.

Makarios' immediate successor may have been Gerontios, perhaps Pantokrator's last superior.²⁰ Though Gerontios took part at the reunification council of Ferrara-Florence (1438–39) and signed the decree of union in 1439, he became an ardent anti-unionist on his return to Constantinople in 1440.

E. Conversion into a Mosque under the Ottoman Empire

The monastery apparently ceased operation upon the Turkish conquest of Constantinople in 1453. Zeyrek Mehmet Efendi converted the triple church into a mosque towards the end of the fifteenth century under its present name, Zeyrek Kilise Camii.²¹

F. Fate of the Typikon

The original typikon came into the manuscript and book collection of John Nicolas Mavrocordato, dragoman or “official interpreter” of the Sublime Porte, the court of the Ottoman sultan in Constantinople, who later served as voivode or governor of Moldavia (1709) and Wallachia (1716).²² His library was dispersed after his death in 1730 and the typikon came into the possession of the monastery of Blakserai, a dependency in Constantinople of the Peloponnesian monastery of Mega Spelaion. Copies were made, one before 1740, that is now in the Bibliothèque Nationale in Paris (Parisinus graecus 389), and another in 1749, which also contains a transcription of (19) Attaleiates, that was once in the library of the Theological School on the island of Halki and is now in the Patriarchal Library, Istanbul (Halki 85, nunc 79).²³ By discovering the Halki manuscript and another copy derived from it on a journey to the Ottoman Empire, the Russian scholar P. Bezobrazov was able to publish short excerpts from (28) Pantokrator for the first time in 1887.²⁴ The editio princeps by Dmitrievsky in his collection of monastic typika followed in 1895, is based on the same Halki manuscript.²⁵

In 1902, however, Spyridon Lampros discovered the original typikon at the Mega Spelaion monastery near Kalavrita, still bearing the autograph signature of John II Komnenos. He published some extended excerpts from the document in 1908, but unfortunately (as fate would have it), neither he nor Nikos Bees, who announced his intention to do so in 1909, prepared an edition.²⁶ On July 17, 1934, a fire swept the monastery library, destroying the original typikon and virtually all of the other manuscripts in its collection.²⁷

*G. Archaeological Evidence*²⁸

The three parallel churches built by John II Komnenos are still standing and constitute the largest and most important surviving architectural monument of the middle Byzantine period. Only the central church building, the former imperial mausoleum, is now in service as a mosque. Cyril Mango located the site of the tomb of Manuel I, and a Komnenian sarcophagus, perhaps of John II's wife Irene, is now in the museum at Hagia Sophia. The inlaid marble pavement of the south church building was uncovered by the Byzantine Institute in 1953, and structural repairs were carried out by the Turkish authorities in 1966–67.

Outside the mosque to the south are ruins that belong to the monastic complex but they have not yet been studied. At the base of the hill to the southwest, there are also the remains of a large cistern associated with the original foundation.

Analysis

This typikon is undoubtedly the best known of all the Byzantine monastic foundation documents thanks to the author's establishment and detailed description of a hospital [36]–[55] associated with the foundation.²⁹ Though justifiably famous, this philanthropic institution was only a part of a large monastic foundation governed to some extent by principles of the monastic reform movement.

A. Lives of the Monks

1. Number of Monks

The emperor provides [19] for “not less than eighty monks” at this foundation, making it one of the largest of those represented by the monastic foundation documents. Fifty of these were to be responsible for the performance of liturgical services, while thirty were to fill service functions as cooks, bakers, gardeners, kitchen helpers and bath attendants. Another fifty salaried members of the clergy of various ranks are assigned [32] to provide liturgical services at the church dedicated to the Mother of God Eleousa. Also reckoned separately are [28] the seventy monks and six servants stationed at the foundation's six dependencies.

2. Liturgical Duties

The emperor provides instructions for the performance of liturgical services in all three of the foundation's churches: the main church of the Pantokrator [1], the church of St. Michael [35] where the imperial tombs were to be located, and in the church of the Mother of God Eleousa [33]. The large contingent of clergy assigned to the Eleousa were divided into two groups which took turns singing the liturgy of St. Andrew that was also celebrated in the Imperial Palace. The emperor also provides prescriptions for the illumination of all three churches.³⁰

3. The Novitiate

Applicants seeking admission to the monastery were not to be admitted [16] without a period of testing, the length of which is not specified. Citing canon law, the emperor also provides that monks tonsured elsewhere were not to be admitted without first gaining permission from their current superiors.

28. PANTOKRATOR

4. Sacramental Life

The Holy Eucharist was to be made available [9] to the monks on feast days. Like the author of (22) Evergetis [15], the emperor obliges [20] his monks to offer confession to their superior, or else to the superior's designee who should be an old and pious monk. In accordance with canon law, confessors are obliged to obtain permission "through episcopal authorization" to hear confessions.

5. Cenobitic Lifestyle

The emperor implicitly endorses [9], cf. [20] the provisions of (22) Evergetis [9], [22] on sharing common meals and forbidding secret eating. He also envisions [22] a communal provision of clothing to the monks. He evidently held [28] alternatives to cenobiticism, such as the kelliotic lifestyle practiced in several of the dependent institutions of the foundation, in disfavor, but did not attempt their abolition. There is no ringing endorsement of the superiority of the cenobitic lifestyle, however, as in (27) Kecharitomene [2], [51].

6. Diet

There were to be two meals daily on ordinary days. The emperor provides regulations for both dinner [9] and supper [11]. As in (27) Kecharitomene [45], there was a second sitting at dinner for the servers, here joined also by those who were legitimately delayed from prompt attendance by their duties. The supper seems to have been more bountiful than usual for many Byzantine monasteries: it consisted of bread, wine, seasonal fruits and vegetables, and "whatever else is suitable for eating at dinner." Fairly detailed prescriptions are found in [12] for both fast days and ordinary days. The emperor permits the superior to make changes from "strict conformity to the canons" in the community's diet during fasts.

7. Personal Possessions

There is no outright endorsement of monastic poverty, as in (27) Kecharitomene [50]. The clergy stationed at the church of the Eleousa were to receive [32] both monetary and in-kind remuneration for their services on a graduated pay scale; likewise for the servants in the philanthropic institutions. Those clergy who participated in the weekly vigil service for the forgiveness of the emperor's sins were to receive [31] an additional cash payment, as they would [33] also on the celebration of the patronal feast of the Mother of God. If they missed the feast, however, they were to be subject to a fine payable from their personal resources. Also, the priest stationed at the foundation's mortuary chapel was allowed [56] to keep any donations offered to him, and the kelliotic monks in most of the foundation's dependencies [28] surely also had their private incomes.

8. Care of Sick Monks

The presence of a fully staffed hospital on the premises of the foundation facilitated the care of monks who fell sick. The emperor instructs [10] the superior to see to it that appropriate care was provided to an ailing monk in his cell. Alternatively, a six-bed sanatorium (triklinarion) could be made available for rest and recuperation.

9. Bathing

Following a gradually liberalizing attitude towards the use of baths by monks observable since the late eleventh century (cf. (22) Evergetis [28] and (27) Kecharitomene [58]), the emperor permits [15] the monks to bathe twice a month except for the Lenten fast, when it was not to be allowed [13] at all, and during other fasts when the frequency was reduced to once a month. Supplies for bathing were to be maintained [10] in the sanatorium for both ailing and healthy monks. Elderly residents of the old age home were also to be bathed [60] twice a month in the separate hospital bath. The sick are allowed to bathe [46] twice a week in this bath, or more frequently if the attending doctor so ordered.

10. Relations with Family

Although the emperor does not address this subject directly, he does forbid [18] women entry to the monastery, “even if they are distinguished ladies and are adorned by a devout life and a noble birth.” In this respect he was even stricter than the author of (22) Evergetis [39], who allows women to come in “rarely and carefully and unexpectedly.” At this foundation, however, women were to be allowed entrance only under exceptional circumstances, such as for the burial of kinfolk or for memorial services. The emperor also strictly enjoins [21] the monks not to be absent from the monastery overnight. Barring an exceptional need, even the stewards were to be bound [64] by this requirement.

11. Burial

There was a cemetery at Medikariou, one of the foundation’s dependencies, apparently across the Golden Horn, where the emperor intended [56] for a funerary chapel to be built. A priest from the dependency was to celebrate a weekly liturgy for the departed monks buried there and legitimately receive donations (paramythiai) for this service, presumably from relatives of the deceased.

B. Constitutional Matters

1. Independent and Self-Governing Status

Towards the end of the typikon and as an apparent afterthought, the emperor provides [69] for the constitutional independence of his foundation. While this provision clearly states that the foundation was to be exempt from imperial, governmental, and ecclesiastical control, the chapter lacks the passion and rigor of its counterparts in earlier documents, e.g., (22) Evergetis [12] or (27) Kecharitomene [1].

The emperor also subordinates [28] six older monasteries as dependencies of his new foundation. Five of these, Monokastanon, Anthemiou, Medikariou, Galakrenai, and Satyros, were populated by kelliotai who were to be allowed to continue with their traditional monastic lifestyle (cf. the less indulgent attitude towards kelliotai shown by the author of (21) Roidion [A2]). Some of these kelliotai were so-called internal monks and others external monks “according to the decision of those supervising them and without due canonical observance or the maintenance of the monastic way of life.” This suggests that these institutions were imperial monasteries (except for Satyros which is said to have been patriarchal) that had until recently been administered under the charistike. In any event, the emperor orders that a list (katastichon) be drawn up of those monks entitled to support. A sixth dependency, Nossiai, had twelve resident cenobitic monks and six servants, and was to be governed by its own typikon. None of these monasteries was to have its own superior, but they were to be governed directly by the superior of the Pantokrator monastery instead. Each of them had [64] their own stewards to look after their financial affairs, though these officials were subordinated to one of the stewards of the main monastery. A seventh dependency, Bordai, appears [65] only in the inventory towards the end of the document.

28. PANTOKRATOR

2. The Protectorate

As another apparent afterthought, the emperor adds [70] an important constitutional feature by designating his son the basileus Lord Alexios as the defender and supporter of the monastery. His untitled position was analogous to that of the protectress in (27) Kecharitomene [3]. The emperor intends that the office should be inherited by the “leading member of our family.” He cautions that the incumbent had no license to exploit his position to seize any of the assets of the foundation.

3. Election of the Superior

Evidently the emperor had already chosen the incumbent superior, and like his mother Irene, the author of (27) Kecharitomene [11], he must have considered this to be his lifetime prerogative. As for later, he instructs [24] that the superior will select from among the monks not only of the Pantokrator but also of its dependent institutions three candidates worthy to be his successor. After the superior’s death, the community was to discuss the nominations and select the new superior by consensus. If there was no agreement on one of the nominees, the determination was to be made by a random choice of lots by an unlettered member of the community. The emperor also provides for one of his successors to add the name of an especially worthy but hitherto overlooked candidate to the list of those being considered, though this had to be done at the instigation of a member of the community, and even then the emperor’s nomination was still not formally determinative.

4. Installation of the Superior

The emperor provides [25] regulations for the installation of the new superior. The patriarch was to issue an ordinance (pittakion) instructing one of the bishops resident in the capital to install the nominee “so that strict adherence to the canon may be maintained” and “the independence of the monastery may in no way be disturbed” as a result of this bishop’s sphragis of the new superior.

Earlier, especially when relations between founders and the ecclesiastical hierarchy were bad, the canonical prerogatives of the local bishop or (in Constantinople) the patriarch with respect to the superior’s installation were often simply ignored, as in (22) Evergetis [13]. Later, when there had been some improvement, some founders like the author of (30) Phoberos [35] were willing to recognize the hierarchy’s prerogatives. In (28) Pantokrator [25] the emperor chooses a middle course, distancing the patriarch by one remove from the installation ceremonies.

5. Role of the Superior

Though the emperor is not anxious to say so forthrightly, by default the superior is [26] the effective master of the foundation here, just as in other reform monasteries. Unlike other cautious founders such as the author of (23) Pakourianos [5], [18], however, the emperor was willing to grant [23] a considerable amount of latitude to the superior to make necessary changes in the daily life of the monks or the liturgical rituals in the church on account of an individual’s illness or other good reason. We have already mentioned his concession [12] to the superior allowing him to make changes in the monks' diet. The emperor also authorizes [34] the superior to appoint the numerous members of the clergy to their posts in the church of the Eleousa. When necessary, the superior was to appoint [64] a new steward in consultation with the other stewards. Though there is no direct confirmation, he may have appointed the rest of the monastery's officials as well.

TWELFTH CENTURY

6. Patronal Privileges

As noted, the emperor appears to have exercised [24] his patronal right to appoint the superior. He may have appointed other officials as well, but if so, he was not anxious to assert his right to do so. Although his declaration of the foundation's independence is made [69] without fanfare, the emperor evidently took it very seriously, for he makes it clear [70] that the incumbent of the protectorate should expect no compensation from the monastery for his services.

A note at the end of the document's inventory indicates [65] that, like his mother in (27) Kecharitomene [79], the emperor had provided some sort of private residence for himself nearby the monastery. His intentions for this dwelling are lost in a lacuna in the manuscript. In the document as we now have it, the emperor's explicit claims of patronal privileges for himself are limited to the traditional liturgical offerings and posthumous commemorations [8], [44] cf. [72]. In a way the entire foundation was meant to serve as a kind of commemorative offering for the benefit of the souls of the emperor and other members of the imperial family. To this end the hospital staff and even "as many of the sick as are able" were not exempt from obligation, and accordingly are asked [44] to participate in annual commemorative processions to the church of the Eleousa.

7. Security for the Typikon and Other Documents

The remarkable preservation of the autograph of the typikon down to modern times occurred despite the fact that the emperor chose to issue no particular directives for the security of this important document. He was more concerned about a secret testament that he intended to draw up [68] later. This latter document was to be stored in the monastery's sacristy and opened only after the emperor's death and after notification of the patriarch in the presence of five specified witnesses from the monastery and elsewhere.

C. Financial Matters

1. Financial Administration

The emperor follows contemporary practice in seeking to get the superior more directly involved in the financial administration of the foundation. Yet rather than consolidating the responsibility for the foundation's finances into the hands of a single steward supported by one or more assistant treasurers, as in (22) Evergetis [13], [30] or (27) Kecharitomene [14], [24], the emperor chose to establish [64] no fewer than four stewards (all resident monks): one for the chief monastery, a second for the six dependencies, a third for the church of the Eleousa, and a fourth for the hospital and the old age home. The superior was not to make any important decisions without consulting them "for in the meeting together and advice of a greater number, the management of these matters will be carried out better."

2. Entrance Gifts Not Mandatory

Following the lead of the Evergetian reformers, the emperor declares [17] that entrance gifts will not be required as a prerequisite for admission to the monastery. The justification offered here, that otherwise “freedom will be given to anyone to be admitted to the monastery,” implies that in pre-reform foundations preference was given to applicants who offered the largest gifts regardless of their personal suitability. Here, the emperor requires that character, training, righteousness, and virtue should rank above (but perhaps not exclude?) consideration of “gold or any gift” offered. The emperor then authorizes the superior to make special accommodations (perhaps disciplinary concessions) for applicants offering valuable professional qualifications or who come from “a preeminent family” or were brought up in a “luxurious way of life.”

28. PANTOKRATOR

3. Endowment of the Foundation

An inventory incorporated into the typikon illustrates [65] the range of properties and other sources of income required to support a foundation of this size. Among these, the six dependent monasteries mentioned above [27] must themselves have been richly endowed with incomes considerably beyond what was required to sustain the small number of mostly kelliotic monks stationed in them. One of these monasteries, Galakrenai, had been donated to the foundation by the emperor’s late wife Irene along with various other properties.

4. Commemorative Observances

As elsewhere, the willingness of the monks to conduct commemorative observances in exchange for donations from outside benefactors was another potentially important source of income for the foundation (in this era, see (27) Kecharitomene [71]). The emperor specifically mentions [8] his nephew John Arbantenos who donated a house and estates producing a considerable income, in return for which he was to be buried in the monastery, receive memorial commemorations three times daily, and have charitable distributions carried out in his name equivalent to one-third of the revenue of the property he had consecrated to the monastery. Various other court officials were to receive commemorations three times yearly though their contributions are not specified.

D. Overall Philosophy

1. Acceptance of Privileges

Even more so than his mother did in (27) Kecharitomene [4], the emperor was willing to sacrifice reform principles in order to accommodate the maintenance of aristocratic privilege. He forthrightly declares [26] that since the superior has “more cares and toil than the others” he should also have “more privileges in daily routine compared with the rest,” including better bread, wine and fish. His mother’s endorsement of the Evergetian prescription of equality in food, drink and clothing (see (27) Kecharitomene [56]) is not repeated here in this document. Indeed, he considers [26] it reasonable for the superior to enjoy a better diet than the other monks “since he necessarily has more cares and toil than the others.” The emperor’s willingness also to allow [23] the superior considerable latitude in determining dietary requirements and liturgical obligations for individual monks is consonant with his desire [17] to offer disciplinary concessions to novices valued for their skills or the benefactions they promised to bring with them upon admission.

On the other hand, the emperor does endorse [9] the Evergetian warning to the monks not to quarrel about precedence in seating at meals in the refectory. Instead, he instructs that “each should defer to each in the matter of a seat; for this is a sign of humility and love.” Like his mother, however, the emperor declines to adopt the violent language of (22) Evergetis [9] in support of this admonition.

2. Respect for Canon Law

In one notable respect, this document does show a considerable change from the traditions of essentially arbitrary, idiosyncratic private patronage. This is the emperor's willingness to take into account the requirements of canon law in framing the regulations in his typikon. His insistence [20] that the superior or his designee obtain episcopal authorization to hear the monks' confessions and his prohibition [16] of accepting a monk from another monastery without the permission of the candidate's previous superior are examples of provisions for which the emperor accepts canonical precedents on matters about which the early Evergetian monastic reformers were less scrupulous.

Yet in some other cases, the emperor's awareness of the requirements of canon law does not necessarily lead him to offer full compliance. At one point he in fact declares [67] that "permission has been granted to me by the divine fathers, the ordinances of the church, and the requirements of the law to make regulations and act in the case of my own possessions just as I wish." As noted above, he only partly concedes [25] the rights of the patriarch to ratify the election of a new superior and to install him. Moreover, he authorizes [12] the superior to make changes from "strict conformity to the canons" in dietary and other observances during fasts. Still, the significance of the author's acknowledgement of an external body of pertinent legislation cannot be underestimated given the entirely opposite weight of prior patronal tradition.

E. External Relations

The remarkable hospital (xenon) associated with this foundation caps a long tradition of institutional philanthropy observed in these documents since (16) Mount Tmolos in the late tenth century. Chapters [36] through [55] regulate this hospital, while [58] through [62] concern the old age home and [63] the lepers' sanatorium.

1. The Hospital

The hospital, presided over [41] by an infirmarian (nosokomos), was to have sixty beds [36] divided into five wards, one of which was to be reserved for women. Each ward was to be staffed [38] by two non-resident doctors (serving in alternate months [39]) and a complement of assistants and orderlies. The doctors were not to undertake [54] any outside work (during their months of service?), not even "unpaid service by imperial command." The women's ward had an extra female doctor. An outpatient department was to be staffed by four extra doctors including two surgeons. Two of the doctors from this department would take turns providing services to the monks of the monastery in alternate months. There were also to be various service personnel [43], including a chief pharmacist and three druggists as well as two priests stationed in the hospital's chapel. A teacher of medicine was to "teach the principles of medical knowledge" [55] to student doctors, apparently chosen [48] from among the hospital's auxiliaries.

Salaries [52] for the various hospital personnel are detailed, as are the supplies needed by the infirmarian [49] and the superintendent [50], who served as a cellarer. The emperor also does not neglect to provide [51] regulations for liturgical services, burials and commemorations of the deceased.

28. PANTOKRATOR

2. The Old Age Home

The director (gerokomos) of the old age home was to be chosen [61] from among the monks of the monastery. With the assistance of six orderlies, he would take care [58] of twenty-four old, infirm men in the home; the healthy are specifically excluded, regardless of social class. As at the hospital, there would be [59] a chapel for the use of the residents, staffed here by a priest and a reader. The emperor provides cash and in-kind allowances for both the staff [62] and the residents [59].

3. The Sanatorium

A lepers' sanatorium [63] was to be established at a site away from the monastery. The emperor seeks a "special remembrance" from its residents, but unlike those of the hospital, he does not presume to tell them to come to church to pray for his soul.

4. Routine Charitable Donations

Less institutionalized forms of philanthropy were practiced at the foundation as well. A bakery (mankipeion) was to provide [45] bread to nourish the residents of both the hospital and the old age home. For non-residents, there were to be [8] charitable distributions at the gate in honor of the foundation's benefactors. Leftovers were to be collected [11] for this purpose after both the mid-day and evening meals.

Notes on the Introduction

1. See Gautier, "Pantocrator," pp. 6–7; the autograph manuscript, once in the Peloponnesian monastery of Mega Spelaion, was destroyed by fire in 1934; see discussion below in Institutional History, F.
2. Niketas Choniates, Historia, ed. J. A. Van Dieten (Berlin, 1975), p. 48, and Synopsis Chronike, ed. K. N. Sathas, Mesaionike Bibliotheke, vol. 7 (Paris, 1894), p. 216.
3. John Kinnamos, Historia, ed. A. Meineke, CSHB (Bonn, 1836), p. 10.
4. The order of construction is as proposed by Megaw, "Notes on Recent Work of the Byzantine Institute," 333–71.
5. Choniates, Historia, ed. Van Dieten, p. 222, and Synopsis Chronike, ed. Sathas, MB, vol. 7, p. 248.
6. A. Papadopoulos-Kerameus, Analekta hierosolymitikes stachyologias, vol. 4 (St. Petersburg, 1897), pp. 238–42; Choniates, ed. Van Dieten, p. 222, and Synopsis Chronike, ed. Sathas, MB, vol. 7, p. 307.
7. See discussion in Gautier, "Pantocrator," pp. 21–23.
8. See discussion in Janin, Géographie, vol. 3, pp. 516–17, and "Les sanctuaires de Byzance sous la domination latine," REB 2 (1944), pp. 174–75.
9. Paul Riant, Exuviae sacrae Constantinopolitanae, vol. 1 (Geneva, 1877), pp. 105–6.
10. So Janin, Géographie, vol. 3, p. 517.
11. Gautier, "Pantocrator," p. 23.
12. Pachymeres, De Andronico Paleologo, ed. I. Bekker, CSHB, vol. 1 (Bonn, 1835), p. 402.
13. Janin, Géographie, vol. 3, p. 517, with Jelisaveta Allen, "Stefan Uroš III Dečanski," ODB, p. 1950.
14. Janin, Géographie, vol. 3, p. 518, n. 9.
15. Nikephoros Gregoras, Byzantina Historia, ed. L. Schopen and I. Bekker, CSHB, vol. 1 (Bonn, 1829), p. 273.
16. Janin, Géographie, vol. 3, pp. 517–18.
17. Majeska, Russian Travelers, pp. 289–95.
18. Gautier, "Pantocrator," pp. 23–25; Janin, Géographie, vol. 3, p. 518; George Sphrantzes, Chronicon minus, ed. V. Grecu, Georgios Sphrantzes, Memorii 1401–1477 (Bucharest, 1966), p. 50.
19. Sphrantzes, ed. Grecu, Memorii, p. 48.

TWELFTH CENTURY

20. Gautier, "Pantocrator," pp. 25–26.
21. Müller-Wiener, Bildlexikon, p. 214.
22. Gautier, "Pantocrator," p. 6, and "Obituaire," pp. 235–36, with n. 2.
23. Gautier, "Pantocrator," pp. 6–8, and "Obituaire," pp. 236–37.
24. P. Bezobrazov, "Materiali dlya istorii vizantiiskoi imperii: I. Ne izdannie monastirskie ustav," ZMNP 254 (1887), 65–78.
25. Dmitrievsky, Opisanie, vol. 1, pt. 1, pp. 656–702.
26. Lampros, "Prototypon," pp. 392–93; Bees, "Parasemeioseis," p. 234.
27. Gautier, "Obituaire," p. 236.
28. For the archaeological evidence on the site, see Mango, "Byzantine Monuments"; Mathews, Byzantine Churches, pp. 71–101; Megaw, "Recent Work"; Müller-Wiener, Bildlexikon, pp. 209–15; and Schweinfurth, "Mosaikfussboden."
29. For the hospital, see especially Hergès, "Pantocrator"; Miller, Hospital, pp. 12–21; Schreiber, "Spitalordnung"; and Volk, Gesundheitswesen, pp. 134–94. Codellas, "Pantocrator," p. 399, has a conjectural plan of the facility.
30. Church of the Pantokrator: [6], [7]; church of St. Michael: [34]; church of the Eleousa: [29].

Bibliography

- Angold, Michael, The Byzantine Empire, 1025–1204: A Political History (London, 1984), pp. 150–60.
- Beck, Hans-Georg, Kirche und theologische Literatur im byzantinischen Reich (Munich, 1959), p. 647.
- Bees, Nikos, "Philologikai parasemeioseis tes en Konstantinoupolei mones tou Pantokratoros Christou," EP 3 (1909), 229–39.
- Brand, Charles, Kazhdan, Alexander, and Cutler, Anthony, "John II Komnenos," ODB, pp. 1046–47.
- Browning, Robert, "The Death of John II Comnenus," Byzantion 31 (1961), 229–35.
- Butler, Lawrence, "The Pantocrator Monastery, An Imperial Foundation," (M.A. thesis, Oberlin College, 1980), summarized in Allen Memorial Art Museum Bulletin 37 (1980), 88–90.
- Chalandon, Ferdinand, Jean II Comnène (1118–1143) et Manuel I Comnène (1143–1180) (Paris, 1912), pp. 23–24, 28–34.
- Codellas, P., "The Pantocrator, Imperial Byzantine Medical Center of the XIIIth Century in Constantinople," Bulletin of the History of Medicine 12 (1942), 392–410.
- Dmitrievsky, Aleksei, "Pandokratorskii konstantinopolskii monastir xii v. i ego Tipik, dannii imperatorom Ioannom Komnenom," TKDA (August 1895), 537–85.
- Frolow, A., "Les noms de monnaies dans la typikon du Pantocrator," Byzantinoslavica 10 (1949), 241–53.
- Gautier, Paul, "L'obituaire du typikon du Pantocrator," REB 27 (1969), 235–62.
- Hendy, Michael, Coinage and Money in the Byzantine Empire, 1081–1261 (Washington, DC, 1969).
- Hergès, Adolphe, "Le monastère du Pantocrator à Constantinople," EO 2 (1898), 70–88.
- Janin, La géographie ecclésiastique de l'empire byzantin, vol. 3: Les églises et les monastères [de Constantinople], 2nd ed. (Paris, 1969), pp. 176–76, 344, 515–23.
- Jeanselme, Edouard, "Calcul de la ration alimentaire des malades de l'hôpital et de l'asile des vieillards annexés au monastère du Pantocrator à Byzance (1136)," extract from 2^e Congrès d'Histoire de la Médecine (Evreux, 1922), 10 pp.
- Jeanselme, Edouard, and Oeconomos, Lysimaque, "Les oeuvres d'assistance et les hôpitaux byzantins au siècle des Comnènes," extract from 1^{er} Congrès de l'histoire de l'art de Guérir (Anvers, 1921).
- Lampros, Sp. "To prototypon tou typikou tes en Konstantinoupolei mones tou Pantokratoros," NH 5 (1908), 392–99; rev. by Nikos Bees, Byzantis 1 (1909), 490–92.
- Magdalino, Paul, and Nelson, Robert, "The Emperor in Byzantine Art of the Twelfth Century," BF 8 (1982), 123–83, esp. 126–30.
- Majeska, George, Russian Travelers to Constantinople in the Fourteenth and Fifteenth Centuries (Washington, D.C., 1984), pp. 289–95.

28. PANTOKRATOR

- Mango, Cyril, "Notes on Byzantine Monuments: Tomb of Manuel I Comnenus," DOP 23–24 (1969–70), 372–75.
- Mathews, Thomas, The Byzantine Churches of Istanbul: A Photographic Survey (University Park, Pa., 1976), pp. 71–101.
- Megaw, A. H. S., "Notes on Recent Work of the Byzantine Institute in Istanbul, Zeyrek Camii," DOP 17 (1963), 335–64.
- Miller, Timothy, The Birth of the Hospital in the Byzantine Empire (Baltimore, Md., 1985), esp. pp. 12–21.
- Moravcsik, Gyula, Szent László Leánya és a Bizánci pantokratormonostor (Budapest-Constantinople, 1923), with German summary, pp. 67–84. Currently the best history of the foundation.
- Müller-Wiener, Wolfgang, Bildlexikon zur Topographie Istanbuls (Tübingen, 1977), pp. 209–15.
- Oeconomus, Lysimaque, La vie religieuse dans l'empire byzantin au temps des Comnènes et des Anges (Paris, 1918), pp. 194–210.
- Orlandos, A., "He anaparastasis tou xenonos tes en Konstantinoupolei mones tou Pantokratoros," EEBS 16 (1941), 198–207.
- Philipsborn, A., "Der Fortschritt in der Entwicklung des byzantinischen Krankenhauswesens," BZ 54 (1961), 338–65, esp. 353–55.
- , "Hiera nosos und die Spezial-Anstalt des Pantokrator-Krankenhauses," Byzantion 23 (1963), 223–30.
- Schreiber, G., "Byzantinisches und abendländisches Hospital. Zur Spitalordnung des Pantocrator und zur byzantinischen Medizin," BZ 42 (1943), 116–49, 373–76.
- Schweinfurth, Ph., "Der Mosaikfussboden der komnenischen Pantokratorkirche in Istanbul," JDAI 69 (1954), 253–60.
- Talbot, Alice-Mary, and Cutler, Anthony, "Pantocrator Monastery in Constantinople," ODB, p. 1575.
- Taylor, Alice, "The Pantocrator Monastery in Constantinople. A Comparison of Its Remains and Its Typikon," BSC 3 (1977), 47–8.
- Tzirakes, N. E., "Pantokratoros mone," TEE 9 (1966), cols. 1150–55.
- Van Millingen, A., Byzantine Churches in Constantinople, Their History and Architecture (London, 1912), pp. 219–42.
- Varzos, Konstantinos, He geneologia ton Komnenon, 2 vols. (Thessaloniki, 1984), pp. 203–28.
- Volk, Robert, Gesundheitswesen und Wohltätigkeit im Spiegel der byzantinischen Kloster typika (Munich, 1983), pp. 134–94.

Translation

Typikon of the Imperial Monastery of the *Pantokrator*¹

. . . it raised me above all treachery and plotting and at the right time² painlessly set me at the position of absolute power in the ancestral empire of the Ausones [Romans], agreeing, as one might say, with the final command and wish of my late father's divine soul. Then after that extraordinary elevation it also destroyed the cunning plots of my visible and invisible enemies and rescued me from every trap subjecting all my enemies under my feet (cf. Ps. 8:6; 24 [25]:16). How will I recount in full the wonders that God's right arm achieved for me against Persians,

TWELFTH CENTURY

Scythians, Dalmatians, Dacians, and Paeonians,³ the many unspeakable victories [p. 29] that it often wondrously wrought with me on them all, making me stronger than all the invaders, dispersing and scattering the ambushes of those within and those without, destroying and binding hand and foot those of my friends and relations⁴ who stood against me and wickedly distanced themselves from brotherly concord?

So, what might I offer to the All-Merciful One for such great favors? What could I give thee, Master who lovest goodness, for such great debts except that I turn to thee completely and submit whole-heartedly to thy will? Under its guidance I built a new church dedicated to thine almighty wisdom and portrayed in front of the church and in the sanctuary the Indescribable One and I offer thee that which is thine own, for through thy help I found someone to share its planning, construction, and completion, my partner and helper in life, though before the complete establishment of the task she left this world by thy mysterious decision and by her departure cut me apart and left me torn in two.

Yet though I am not able to fathom the depths of thine incomprehensible wisdom which beneficially manages our lives, I give thanks for thy patience and at last according to my capabilities I unveil my enterprise bringing thee a band of ascetics, a precious gathering of monks, whose duty it is to devote themselves to the monastery and propitiate thy goodness for our sins. To these I add another holy group, a chosen band,⁵ a precious portion, a very fine company of dedicated men—priests, deacons, and as large a number as is necessary for the church and the sanctuary. For I am building another sacred dwelling also for the most-pure Virgin, thy virgin mother, and I am maintaining its offering of praise in a fitting manner through a holy assembly of clergy. Along with these I bring thee, the Lover of goodness, some fellow-servants, whom thou in thy compassion called brothers (Matt. 25:40), worn out by old age and toil, oppressed by poverty and suffering from diseases of many kinds.⁶ Those whose bodies are ravaged by leprosy [p. 31] are all receiving the appropriate care, others are being relieved of their burdens, revived from weakness, and are receiving complete healing of their wounds, and others are being freed from want, finding consolation in a sufficient supply of food and clothing. We bring thee these people as ambassadors to intercede for our sins; by them we attract thy favor and through them we plead for thy compassion. For we have taken due thought for the protection, care, and managing of these animate and inanimate temples, and now we prescribe in detail what will be done in their regard.

So then we wish the sequence of divine praises in this most-holy monastery to proceed according to the ecclesiastical rule set up by us.

[1. Ceremonial of the Office]

The service of matins on Sundays and the great feast days will begin at the fifth hour of the night, but on all the remaining days it will take place before or after the midnight office according to ecclesiastical procedure. For the superior will take care that those attending the church get a moderate amount of sleep so that they may have the strength to offer up prayer and perform the singing of psalms with an alert mind, when the grosser exhalations caused by food have been dissipated by a moderate amount of sleep so the mind can offer the praise and intercession more attentively.

When the hour of the ecclesiastical office and service arrives, the rites of the church will be performed each day like this. The waker will get up and go to the superior's cell, bow outside it and call out, "Bless me, pray for me, Father." The superior will bless him in an audible manner and the other will go away and immediately sound the semantron. Then as the brothers assemble in the church⁷ he will sound the service semantron which is also called the great one. So when the monks have gathered in the narthex, they will perform the midnight office of psalm-singing [p. 33], being obliged in this office to sing the psalm "Blameless" (Ps. 118 [119]) so as to complete it at three stations, and at each of the stations, they should sing a trisagion with three troparia, two penitential [kathismata] and one theotokion.

28. PANTOKRATOR

[2. Incenses]

When the psalm "Blameless" has thus been completed and the monks are now about to process into the church, the priest who has the duty for the day will go in with them and receive the censer from the ecclesiarch. Then he will stand in front of the sanctuary and with the usual prayer bow and when he has performed a censuring in the form of a cross in front of the sanctuary screen he will go next into the sanctuary and will perform a censuring three times in the form of a cross in front of the holy table, then he will do likewise also at each of the other sides of the holy table. When he comes out of the sanctuary one of the readers will receive him and with his head uncovered will precede him with a light. The priest will follow and first of all will go to the chapel of the Incorporal⁸ where our tombs are situated; then standing before the icon of the Pantokrator itself, he will cense it in the form of a cross, after that all the holy places in the church and the most venerable icons in them, and along with them all the monks who are standing there.

[3. Chants and Prayers in Honor of the Emperors]

During the course of the censuring the monks will sing at this point a trisagion for my majesty and the specified psalms, that is the nineteenth which begins "The Lord hear thee in the day of trouble, the name of the God of Jacob defend thee," and the twentieth which begins, "In thy strength the king shall rejoice, O Lord, and in thy salvation he shall greatly exult," and these troparia, "Save thy people, Lord," and, "He who was raised on the cross," and a theotokion, "Quickly intervene before we are enslaved," and kyrie eleison fifteen times. But after the passing of my majesty they will perform the trisagion twice on the same occasion instead of once. The first one will be for the emperors who are alive at the time with one psalm which [p. 35] begins "The Lord hear thee in the day of trouble," and the aforementioned troparia and the theotokion, but they will perform the other trisagion in our memory when psalm six will be recited which begins, "O Lord, rebuke me not in thy wrath," and they will sing one troparion, "Rest with the saints," and a theotokion, "You who are like a wall and harbor." Then they will repeat this prayer—"Remember, Lord, our orthodox rulers and founders who are at rest and pardon for them every voluntary and involuntary sin committed by them in word or deed or thought and make them dwell in the places of light, in green places where all pain, grief, and sorrow have fled away, where the sight of thy face gladdens all thy saints for ever, and grant them thy kingdom and the favor of participating in indescribable and everlasting benefits and thine eternal and blessed life. For thou are the life and repose of those who are at rest and to thee be the glory."

So while this is being carried out, when the priest has carried out the censuring of the whole church, he will go again, as has previously been made clear, to the doors of the sanctuary and when he has performed a censuring at them three times in the form of a cross, he will pronounce “Glory be ever to the holy, consubstantial and life-giving Trinity now, always, and for ever and ever.” The monks having said “Amen” will immediately begin the six psalms,⁹ not chanting them raucously but quietly to themselves, taking care to harmonize with the ecclesiarch who is standing in the middle of the church and reciting clearly enough to be heard. After the completion of the six psalms sometimes “God is the Lord” (Ps. 117 [118]:27) will be sung, that is on festival days and feasts, and sometimes “Alleluia,” but both of them with a bright and triumphant chant.

TWELFTH CENTURY

[4. Order of Precedence]

The position of the monks will be as follows: the priests will stand in front of the deacons and the deacons behind them and the rest like this in order, in whatever position the ecclesiarch assigns to each one on the instruction of the superior. The deacons however will never stand among the priests even though they have been entrusted with one of the more important offices. The steward however will be exempted from this and will always keep his own position even if he has not been honored with the priestly status.

[5. Other Instructions]

Whenever the monks are gathering in the church no one is allowed to pray in front of the sanctuary screen or in any other place, but when each one is about to enter the church he will bow in front of the royal doors¹⁰ and then he will enter reverently and stand in his own place not bowing to the monks. When the recitation of the psalms or another chant is beginning, they must all wait for the one who begins and whenever he completes the beginning verse he should prostrate himself on the ground and they should all prostrate themselves in time with him. No one should dare to begin unless instructed by the one who has this office, but each one must wait [p. 37] with patience to be instructed when to begin by the one who will be appointed and will take the lead. Even if someone knows the liturgy accurately, he must keep quiet and everyone must refrain from all conversation during the singing of the psalms having this only in his mouth; but if someone being uncertain wishes to learn something for his own benefit, he should ask about this quietly during the kathisma. When the hypakoe or another chant of this kind is being sung, the specialist chanters should stand in front of the sanctuary and sing this in a fitting and orderly way.

[6. Illumination of the Main Church on Ordinary Days]

The church should be lit like this. Some lamps should burn continuously—two in the sanctuary, one standing lamp¹¹ in the synthronon below and another in the triple lamp of the sanctuary, two before the Pantokrator, one before the Resurrection and another before the Crucifixion, one in the triple lamp of the dome, one in the apse on the right of the sanctuary where the Last Supper is, another in the apse on the left where the Washing of the Feet is, and another before the beautiful doors where the Dormition of the Mother of God is.

The following lamps also should burn continuously at night—one in the narthex, another in the exonarthex, and another before the [representation] of the ecumenical councils. But during the services of matins, the liturgy, and vespers all the crater lamps of the choros, sixteen in number, should be lit all around as well as lamps of the templon, four of the triple lamps, four lamps in the four vaults, three in the narthex in addition to the night-lamp, and two in the exonarthex in addition to the night-lamp there too.

28. PANTOKRATOR

Candles should burn continuously, one in the conch of the apse, two before the Pantokrator, one before the Resurrection, one before the Crucifixion, one before the Washing of the Feet, one before the Last Supper, and another one above the beautiful doors, and the candle in the dome along with the others. During the services three lighted ones should stand on the templon, one on the little templon and another one at the altar, two others before the Pantokrator and another one before each of the two icons set out for veneration. But on [p. 39] Sundays during matins and the liturgy and furthermore during vespers on Saturdays seven candles should be lit on the middle templon and three candles before the templon on the right at the small sanctuary. The same things should be done during ordinary feasts.

[7. Illumination of the Main Church on Feast Days]

During the more important feasts the church will be lit as follows. Firstly, during the feast of the Transfiguration¹² instead of crater lamps, chandeliers should be hung up and all of them should be brightly lit, fitted with all their lamps. Six-ounce candles should be fixed around the templon and the icons for veneration. In the candelabras with twelve candleholders which stand in front of the holy icon of the Savior which is on display candles of one litra should be put, and in the choirs six large candles weighing eight litrai; three more should be put in the narthex and one in the exonarthex. In the candleholders of the triple lamps in the conch of the apse and in the dome candles of eight ounces should be put and the same thing should be done with the rest of the triple lamps on which there are points for candles, and in the sacristies. Two large candles should be put on either side of the holy altar. Rose-essence and bitter aloes will be provided from the storehouse by purchase and a distribution at the gate will take place of twenty-four modioi of bread and of noummia or tetartera to the value of two of the gold nomismata preferred at the time, and for the provisioning of the table three courses of fresh fish will be supplied. The feast of Easter also will be celebrated similarly in all respects.

During the feast of the Nativity of Christ the chandeliers will be lit in the same way, and four-ounce candles will be put on the templon and at the icons for veneration, eight-ounce candles in the candelabra with twelve candleholders, and at the choirs six large candles weighing six litrai will be put and two in the narthex. The distribution at the gate will be similar but the provisioning of the table will consist of the supply of two courses. The same things will take place during the feast of the Epiphany and that of the Exaltation of the Cross;¹³ but the distribution at the gate will be reduced by a half.

For the feast of the Annunciation¹⁴ the amount of lighting will be half as much and a distribution will take place of eight modioi of bread and of noummia or tetartera [p. 41] to the value of one gold nomisma and provisions for the monks will be the amount of one course. During the feast of Pentecost the same things will be carried out in the same way, also on Palm Sunday, and during the feasts of the Presentation of Our Lord in the Temple, of the Birth of the Mother of God, and of her Entry into the Temple.¹⁵

But during the feasts of St. Basil, of St. Gregory the Theologian, and of St. [John]

TWELFTH CENTURY

Chrysostom¹⁶ the amount of lighting will be even more reduced so as to add to the illumination of the ordinary feasts only one candelabrum with twelve candleholders, the one that is going to stand in front of the holy icon of the one whose feast is being celebrated. The provisioning will be similar—that of one course.

The feast of the Holy Apostles¹⁷ will have the lighting and the provisioning of the feast of the Annunciation, but the feast of St. Philip¹⁸ only its provisioning. On Holy Thursday there will be a distribution of twenty-four modioi of bread and of noummia or tetartera to the value of two similar gold nomismata.

The feast of the Dormition of the Mother of God¹⁹ will be celebrated in the monastery in the same way as the feast of the Annunciation, but a more splendid festival will be held in the church of the Eleousa as will be made clear later on. However at the gate there will be a distribution of twenty-four modioi of bread and of noummia or tetartera to the value of two similar gold nomismata and for the provisioning of the table sufficient nomismata will be provided for two courses.

[8. Liturgical Offerings and Commemorations]

It is time to speak also about the offerings of bread for the holy liturgy. For each day there should be four hexagia of fine wheat flour and from this offerings of bread should be made, two greater ones—one for Our Lord and the other for the Mother of God—another for the saint of the day, and four others as memorials, for the sovereign and father²⁰ of my majesty of blessed memory, for my lady grandmother²¹ of blessed memory, for the lady and mother²² of my majesty of blessed memory, and for my lady wife²³ of blessed memory. From these same hexagia the superior's daily supply of fine white bread also should be made. The bread offerings should be broken into pieces and distributed to the monks.

Each Saturday other offerings also should be made from flour as follows: for the grandfather²⁴ of my majesty of blessed memory, the kouropalates; [p. 43] for my grandmother²⁵ of blessed memory, the protovestiaria; for her husband;²⁶ for the uncle²⁷ of my majesty of blessed memory, the sebastokrator; for the daughter-in-law²⁸ of my majesty of blessed memory, the wife of my most dear son, Basileus Lord Alexios; for my brother of blessed memory, sebastokrator Lord Andronikos;²⁹ for my sister, the nun Lady Eudokia;³⁰ for the brother-in-law of my majesty, Caesar Bryennios;³¹ for my other brother-in-law Euphorbenos;³² for the uncle³³ of my majesty, the megas domestikos; for my aunt³⁴ his wife; for Lord Manuel,³⁵ the uncle of my majesty; for the Caesar;³⁶ for the three aunts³⁷ of my majesty of blessed memory, the Caesarissa, the panhypersebaste, and the Lady Xene; for my other uncle,³⁸ the megas doux; for sebastos Lord George Palaiologos;³⁹ for my aunt,⁴⁰ the most honorable; and for my other aunt,⁴¹ the wife of Palaiologos.

Two offerings should also be made on behalf of my grandchildren who have died, one offering specifically on behalf of my much loved grandson Lord Alexios, the son of my most dear son sebastokrator Lord Isaac. Three baskets of kollyba should be offered on Saturdays jointly on behalf of them all equally. So the aforementioned names of the dead will be remembered in these ways.

[p. 45] On the Saturdays of Meatfare,⁴² Cheesefare,⁴³ and Pentecost the following people

28. PANTOKRATOR

will also be remembered: the late eunuch John the mystikos, the other mystikos Tzykanisteriotes, sebastos lord Constantine Rogeres, sebastos Eustathios Kamytzes, Michaelitzes Stypeiotes, the doctor Niketas the protos, George Dekanos, and the vestiarites of my majesty, Theodore Beroites, one offering being made on behalf of each of these.⁴⁴

After our decease these offerings also will be added to the commemorations of each day, namely, offerings for me and my most dear sons Born-in-the-Purple: basileus Lord Alexios,⁴⁵ sebastokrator Lord Andronikos, sebastokrator Lord Isaac, and sebastokrator Lord Manuel;⁴⁶ for my very dear daughters,⁴⁷ the Caesarissa Lady Maria, the Lady Anna, the Lady Theodora, and the Lady Eudokia.

Another basket of kollyba will also be offered once in the week.

The names of all these people will be written on the diptychs and we will be remembered then during the offering and the divine mysteries but at the moment our names will be written on the diptychs of the living and will be remembered in the same way during the offering and the divine mysteries.

Since the husband of a niece of my majesty, the pansebastos sebastos Lord John Arbantenos,⁴⁸ wished to be buried in this monastery founded by my majesty, he consecrated to it some of his own landed property—a house and estates producing a considerable income—on condition that a night office should take place every day on his behalf and the trisagion be repeated at matins and at vespers by some monks from the monastery, by four at least. In addition to this, the same man wished that [p. 47] at the time of his remembrance distributions should be made for his soul from the revenues of the same landed property amounting to one-third of the revenues from the landed property consecrated by him.

My majesty decrees that these things be carried out in such a way that a trisagion be repeated each day by some monks both during matins and after the office of lamplighting, a night office be also sung by them to intercede for him, a candle should burn unceasingly, similarly a lamp should be kept burning continuously on his tomb, and distributions for his soul be carefully carried out before and after his commemoration so that what is distributed on both occasions adds up to a third of the revenues from his landed property. This procedure should continue unchanged for ever because this man consecrated his property in this hope to this monastery of my majesty.

However on our tombs, that is, on that of my most dear wife and on that of my majesty, instead of one candle two must burn continuously on each.

[9. Regulations for Dinner]

It is time to discuss the common table of the brothers. The monks should have a common table in the monastery of the Savior Pantokrator; they should share in common food. No one should eat in secret, since this has been forbidden by the divine fathers and causes very great damage to the soul and brings greater danger. The time of eating is not always the same. For when the psalms are recited during the hours, it being a period of fasting, I mean before the feast of the Holy Apostles, the third hour and the sixth will be recited according to the rule of the church and after the divine liturgy the ninth hour will be celebrated without a recitation of the psalms.

When the blessed bread has already been given to the monks and the semantron has been struck for the third time, they will walk to the refectory with a psalm on their lips, the one which begins, "I will exalt thee, my God" (Ps. 144 [145]). But when the days are not fast days but glorious feast days, the holy mystery will be celebrated and the monks will receive the blessed bread as has been stated, and the semantron will be struck three times and they will go off to the refectory with the aforementioned psalm on their lips. This will be the difference in the time of eating except during the fasts of the great Lent and Christmas. [p. 49]

TWELFTH CENTURY

Also their progress to the refectory will be orderly with the priest who officiated at the sacrament leading them all, the superior walking after him, and the rest of the brothers following one after another. When they are approaching the refectory table, the priest, being at the head on the right, turning to the east should say this prayer by himself, "O Lord, my God, the heavenly and life-giving bread, the true food of the whole world, who governs this present life and has promised us enjoyment of the life to come, thyself bless our food and drink and allow us to partake of them without incurring condemnation, glorifying and giving thanks to the One who provides all good gifts."

Next, the superior should stand in his proper position at the head table, and then the priest making the sign of the cross over the table should say aloud after the aforementioned prayer "Because thy most honored and magnificent name has been blessed and glorified." Then when the brothers have responded with "Amen," the superior should sit down and after him the rest without noise and disturbance and each should defer to each in the matter of his seat; for this is a sign of humility and love. When all are seated, the person appointed to read should begin the reading; but the priest who celebrated the sacrament, standing up, should pronounce a blessing, saying "God be blessed" and when the brothers have responded with "Amen," the refectorian should impose silence on all and then the reader should begin the reading.

When the food has been set out, the refectorian should shout in a loud voice "Master, bless, pray," and the priest who celebrated the sacrament should bless the food that has been set out. Then, when the superior has stretched his hand out to the food, the rest also should begin to eat. Brothers also should go round after this to distribute the hot water when wine-cups have already been distributed to all. However the superior should first strike the top of the table three times with a small wooden gavel at each serving. At the first stroke they should all stand upright holding their own wine-cups and the superior likewise, and then when they have all received a common blessing they should sit down again and after this each one should bless his own [p. 51] wine-cup with the sign of the cross.

No one however will ask a blessing from anyone else if the superior is present, but if he is absent, the steward should carry out both the knocking and the blessing of the wine-cups instead of him. But if he is not a priest, he should strike the table himself but should entrust the blessing of the drink to the senior priest or the priest who celebrated the sacrament. But if the steward is not present, the most senior priest himself or the priest who celebrated the sacrament should perform what ought to be done by the superior. No one should sit in the seat of the superior.

When the food has been eaten and silence prevails on the insistence of the refectorian, the second course should be brought in, whatever it is, and the priest should bless this too. This should happen for each dish even if there is a refreshment and more is put out. When there is a refreshment and more food is put out, the wine-cups should also receive an extra amount at the discretion of the superior.

28. PANTOKRATOR

When the meal has been completed and the reader has stopped, the refectorian at the command of the superior should place a basket to receive the plates and another in which spoons will be put. Then the superior should say grace and likewise all of them in turn, and immediately the basket should be placed to receive the leftovers and first the superior should throw his leftover bread into it, then all the rest while “Blessed is God who nourishes us” is sung; the pieces of bread should be given to the brothers in front of the gate. After “Blessed is God” is finished, the priest who celebrated the sacrament should repeat the following prayer, “Lord, our God, increase the surplus of thy servants and pity us because thou art holy now and always and for ever and ever.” Then after the “Amen” the refectorian after a sign from the superior should make a sign of the cross with the basket and say in a loud voice “Great is the name” and all of them should reply “of the holy consubstantial and life-giving Trinity.” Then the superior should bless them all, and the refectorian should sing loudly “Merciful and pitiful is the Lord” (Ex. 34: 6) and the rest of the brothers should join in the singing with him. Then when the priest who celebrated the sacrament has given thanks to God with them all, he should begin Psalm 121 [122], “I was glad when they said to me,” and Psalm 83 [84], “How lovely is thy dwelling place, O Lord.” After that the priest should pronounce a thanksgiving and then say a prayer and each should go away to his cell.

After the monks have got up from the table, those who have been in attendance should eat; but no one should be allowed to take bread or anything else from what was set out to his cell. If some of those sent away on duties are so delayed that they do not arrive at the time of the meal, then the same food must be placed on the table for these people in the same way [p. 53] to prevent a scandal arising if they took food away to their cells.

[10. Care of Sick Monks]

If anyone is so sick that he is bed-ridden and cannot walk, the appropriate care should be provided in his cell. Also the superior should with sincerity take care of all those who are ill, securing a doctor to visit the monastery and provide soothing plasters and oils so that they can be stored up in the sick room; and he himself should call, often visiting those who need care, ministering to all their needs with white bread, the best wine, and other things that can comfort those who are ill.

The sanatorium should have six made-up beds for those who wish to lie down and another for the doctor who will stay here too to care for the sick whenever necessity demands. Useful articles for washing oneself should be placed in it in sufficient quantity—I mean basins, ewers, and soap dishes, towels, hair wipers, hand towels, etc.—and enough for six to wash at the same time; and not only will those who are ill use these things but also in fact all the monks. Care must especially be taken that those who look after them should show their care for them in every action and in their concern, believing Christ who said “As you did it to one of the least of these my brothers, you did it for me” (Matt. 25:40). This is what concerns the sick.

[11. Regulations for Supper]

Rules must be laid down also about supper. For after the office of lamplighting when the semantron is struck three times, the monks will go to the refectory singing the verse which begins “The poor shall eat and be satisfied” as far as “for ever and ever” (Ps. 21 [22]:26–27), and then they should sit down and when the priest who celebrated the sacrament has pronounced a blessing they should eat bread and drink wine. As the time of the year allows they will be supplied with vegetables and some fruit according to the season and whatever else is suitable for eating at supper. Concerning the serving of the drink the rule which we also mentioned in connection with the midday meal will be observed.

TWELFTH CENTURY

After the completion of the eating and the drinking, a basket should be set out for the leftovers to be put in and the following should be said, "Glory be to the Father and to the Son and to the Holy Spirit." Then the superior should pronounce the blessing after the brothers have previously said "Kyrie eleison" three times together and added "Lord, bless," and after that the superior should repeat "Christ our God, increase," and what follows. Next the refectorian should lift the basket, make a sign of the cross with it at the end of the table, and say in a loud voice "All-holy Mother of God, help us." Then when the refectorian has begun the verse which goes "O Lord, thou hast made us glad with thy work, and in the operations of thy hands will we exult" (Ps. 91 [92]:4); "The light of thy countenance, O Lord, has been manifested towards us," (Ps. 4:6) he should keep [p. 55] them all chanting this verse together as far as "For thou hast caused me to dwell securely" (Ps. 4:6-8). Then they should be dismissed by the superior at the last word.

[12. Dietary Regulations]

Immediately upon the command of the superior the ecclesiarch should give the signal for compline. But on the vigils of the great feast days and especially those of the Savior they must prepare the things for supper more carefully and lavishly so that cooked dishes also should be put before them prepared with vegetables and legumes, and fruits of the season. Fish too should be often supplied to them and a measure of wine greater than is customary.

It is necessary to speak of both the number and the kind of dishes that will be set before the monks on each occasion. On all Wednesdays and Fridays observance of the sacred canons will not be neglected nor will there be any thought of neglecting it, yet any change made in the strict conformity to the canon to accommodate weakness of the brothers will be completely at the discretion of the superior. On the Mondays which are not fast days, except those during the great fasts, three dishes will be set before the monks brightened with olive oil and seasoning, prepared not only with vegetables and legumes but also oysters and mussels when in season. On Tuesdays and Thursdays cheese and eggs will be eaten; and on Saturdays and Sundays fresh fish will also be set before them. There will always be three cooked dishes; on the four aforementioned days of the week there will be two dishes made from salted and fresh fish, cheese, and eggs and the third will be of legumes.

The great fasts will be different in the following way. The fast of the Holy Apostles⁴⁹ will have an abstinence from cheese and eggs only to be observed on the days without a fast. The fast of St. Philip⁵⁰ will also put an end to the eating of fish during five days of the week, with the exception of Saturday and Sunday. If, however, a feast day occurs on one of the five days, then they will have the refreshment of fish. They will eat once in the day during this fast after the completion of the office of lamplighting although the fast of the feast of the Holy Apostles does not preclude the eating of supper. On the five aforementioned days of the week the food of the monks will be set out sometimes with olive oil for their refreshment and sometimes without any of this gladdening because of the holiness of the days.

28. PANTOKRATOR

When a feast of our Lord comes round or of the Mother of God or of one of the famous saints, on these feast days there will be a refreshment for the monks at the discretion of the superior. However the revered name of the Mother of God should be set as a seal to mark the end of all meals of the monks, both the midday meal and supper, and with this invocation the refectorian at the bidding of the superior should take a piece of bread of reasonable size, bless it with the sign of the cross, and then all the monks taking a portion of it [p. 57] should also drink a final drink in the name of the Mother of God, so that they may be sanctified both in their souls and bodies through the invocation of her divine name and by what is eaten and drunk in its honor.

Also each day the distribution of two maritime modioi of bread should take place at the gate and the observance of this distribution should be maintained without evasion every day.

During the week of Cheesefare, the eating of cheese and eggs will be firmly maintained that the faithful may not seem to observe the fasts of unbelievers by respecting their ordinances.

The great [Lenten] fast, being special in every way since we offer to God a consecration of ourselves, will have the strictest possible observance in every way with regard to both food and drink. Thus they should eat once a day during it, apart from Saturday and Sunday, even if a feast should occur, and during the first week they will be served with less bread than the usual portion, legumes soaked in water, almaia without olive oil, nuts, and dried figs. During these days they will take less wine than usual. If some wish to spend the first day without food, as is the custom of many, it will be allowed according to their preference.

On Friday evening because of the vigil of St. Theodore a measure of wine should be given to each of the brothers and olive oil should be sprinkled on the almaia. On Saturdays and Sundays three dishes should be served, one of fresh vegetables, the second of legumes, and the third of oysters, mussels, scallops,⁵¹ and onions, all seasoned with olive oil. Also they should be given the usual measure of wine. A similar system of diet to that of the first week will continue on Mondays, Wednesdays, and Fridays during the following weeks of the fast. On Tuesdays and Thursdays they will be served legumes and fresh vegetables with a moderate amount of olive oil poured over them after the cooking. As an additional refreshment the legumes they will eat will be prepared with honey and they will be given the usual measure of wine.

Because it is fitting that those who struggle spiritually should have some respite, the monks should have the refreshment during this holy fast of eating fish on the feast day of the [p. 59] Forty Saints,⁵² unless this falls on one of the five days of the first week; for then they will have the refreshment only of olive oil. In the same way they will eat fish also on Palm Sunday. However the whole of the fourth week of the Lenten fast will have the same observance in the matter of food as the first week, and Holy Week similarly, with the refreshment of olive oil allowed only on Holy Thursday. On Good Friday and Holy Saturday until the evening the diet should consist only of bread, legumes soaked in water, and wine mulled with cumin. On the joyful day of the Annunciation, whichever of the days of Lent it occurs—apart from the five days of the first week and Holy Week—permission will be granted for the monks to eat fish; but should it occur on the five days of these two weeks, the monks will have the refreshment of wine and olive oil. Yet if the feast falls on Holy Thursday they will also eat fish.

TWELFTH CENTURY

[13. Clastration and Abstention from Bathing during Lent]

However none of the monks will be allowed to wash himself during all this period of Lent, unless the constraints of some disease make it necessary; nor will they be allowed to go out of the monastery so that they may maintain an undistracted perseverance at their prayers. If some pressing need to go out urgently requires it, the side gate will be opened and the one instructed by the superior will go out through it. All those who are going to carry out some service, whether inside or outside the monastery, should first receive a blessing from the superior; but if the superior is away, the steward should do this, and if both of them are absent, the senior priest should take their place.

[14. Honor and Respect Due the Superior]

All should show such honor to the superior that they never pass him by without a greeting, whether they meet him on the road or see him just poking his head out. Also, anyone summoned to him or whoever comes of his own accord should in the same way do obeisance, and should clasp his hands together while standing in front of the superior and show him the respect that is his due everywhere, with peace and obedience guiding them in everything.

[15. Bathing Permitted]

Since it is also fitting that the monks should have the refreshment of bathing, they should all have a bath twice in the month to wash themselves, except however during fasts. For in no way will they wash themselves during Lent, as has been stated, and during the other two fasts they will take a bath once a month.

[16. Reception of Postulants]

Whenever someone comes asking to be received into the monastery, he will not be admitted without any testing, but with a strict examination. If he is from another monastery he will not be admitted without the encouragement of that superior, since the observance of the canons also prevents this. [p. 61]

[17. Entrance Gifts Not Required]

An entry gift will be required of no one lest, because of this, freedom be given to anyone to be admitted into the monastery. For the character of each person, his training, the righteousness of his actions, and the abundance of his virtue will count above gold or any gift, and the whole brotherhood's way of life will have equal consideration. But if someone is necessary for the monastery, since the requirements of its activities demand people who are able to contribute as they can, or if a person for certain reasons needs some concession, either because he happens to be from a pre-eminent family or he has been brought up in a rather luxurious way of life, it will rest with the superior after consideration to devise measures for the care of that person in accordance with the benefit to the monastery as he perceives it.

28. PANTOKRATOR

[18. Entry Forbidden to Women]

Women will not enter the monastery and the monastery will be a forbidden area for them, even if they are distinguished ladies and are adorned by a devout life and a noble birth. But if some must enter, perhaps for the burial of their relations or their commemoration, they will not enter by the monastery gate but by the gate of the church of the Eleousa.

[19. Number and Responsibilities of the Monks]

Since it is appropriate to discuss the number of the monks, the total of the monks will not be less than eighty. Moreover those who are active in the church will come to as many as fifty and will devote themselves to the praise of God and be concerned with the divine hymns without interruption. The rest will be divided up among the menial duties. However those who are active in the church will be men who are reverent in manner, adorned with virtue, zealous in the duties entrusted to them, of venerable wisdom, and will take care that none of the monastery's possessions are destroyed through carelessness. There will not only be bakers, gardeners, and cooks among the servants but also helpers for the ecclesiarch and assistants to the steward and other such people. However the ecclesiarch, the sacristans, the archivists, the infirmarian, and the guest-master must be from those assigned to the church, also the treasurers, [p. 63] the provisioners, two choir leaders, six priests, six deacons—as to whether there can be more priests and deacons there will be nothing in this document to hinder the superior—two precentors, two assistant choir leaders, and an official responsible for summoning the brothers to church.

From the category of servants there will be four together serving all the brothers in the lowliest tasks, or rather the most important and godlike ones, if the saying is true which says “whoever humbles himself will be exalted” (Matt. 23:12). So these men will wash their tunics and outer garments, bathe those who are dirty, minister eagerly to the sick, and will clean the jugs, plates, and pots. The superior will control all these men from the most important to the lowest and will keep an account of the tasks they are all employed on and will consider worthy of the appropriate respect and honor those who carry out their duties well but those who conduct themselves in the opposite way he will move completely to something useful.

However none of the monks will be entrusted with the supervision of property or any of the tasks that require the spending of time outside the monastery lest they incur a harm to their souls greater than the expected benefit to the running of the monastery. For not even the whole world itself is equal to one soul. But the monks will carry out all the tasks inside the monastery and no lay person will live inside the monastery but they themselves will dwell alone in their own paradise and will cultivate this carefully and plant it, one for a yield of thirtyfold, another of sixtyfold, and another of an hundredfold (cf. Matt. 13:23), having attained the full measure of perfection, and so no secular darnel will grow among them. On the other hand lay people will carry out the duties in the properties of the monastery and each one will be liable for the appropriate accounts.

None of the monks serving in the church will be permitted to leave the monastery to sing psalms, whatever festival is being celebrated by anyone, whether it is another monastery that is celebrating it or some lay people. For such an undertaking will be in every way dangerous and harmful to the monks in the monastery as well as bringing shame on the monastery and its superior because those who are subject to him are not watched over and supervised.

TWELFTH CENTURY

[20. Confession to the Superior]

As the preceding text has prescribed all the requirements common to the monks—sharing the refectory, living inside the monastery, attendance in the church, unwavering prayer—it also lays down as their common duty the confession of their sins before the superior and urges them [p. 65] all alike to reveal to him willingly their dangerous thoughts and all the stirrings of their soul so that the enemy hidden within them thus shamed might run away very quickly from their minds. So as a result monks looking to the confession of their thoughts as an excuse to leave the monastery will not be allowed to depart from the precincts of the monastery lest they unwittingly receive a fatal wound instead of a draught of salvation, and instead of gaining the healing they seek suffer a wound caused by the doors themselves. They should drink the most valuable water which comes from their own well and each should receive the appropriate healing from confessing to his superior.

But if perhaps someone becomes so lacking in faith and clearly finds it distasteful to confess to his superior, the latter will take care to win him, as far as he can, and will make allowances for his weakness, entrusting him to one of the old monks in the monastery, a godly man who is capable of discerning thoughts and hearing the confessions of this brother. Naturally both the superior and the one who receives permission from him to hear confessions in accordance with the divine canons will previously have been given permission through episcopal sphragis to hear the confessions of the brothers and will receive spiritually and devoutly the power to bind and loose from those who have received it from God. (Matt. 18:18)

[21. No Overnight Absences]

However not a single monk will be allowed ever to spend the night outside the monastery. For each of those who go out on the request of the superior will take every care to get back inside the gate of the monastery before sunset. For evening solitude is harmful and fatal to those sheep of the flock who are left outside the fold, and is a joy to wolves. May this not happen to any of those in this holy sheepfold since all of them are protected by the almighty hand of the Savior.

[22. Communal Provision of Clothing]

Since the brothers need a reasonable number of clothes, each of them at Easter time will be supplied with two undergarments, one cotton tunic containing four litrai of cotton, two pairs of boots and every two years one woolen cloak and one vest also every two years. These the monks will receive, first showing the old ones to the superior so that they can be dealt with by him as he wishes. [p. 67]

[23. Superior's Discretionary Authority]

These then are the instructions my majesty has given concerning the procedure of the monastery. If from time to time the superior in office should notice that something ought to be added or taken away either in the daily life of the monks or in the liturgical procedure of the church whether through some illness on the part of the monks or for another acceptable reason, this will be a matter for his discretion.

28. PANTOKRATOR

[24. Election of the Superior]

It is time now to speak about the installation of the superior. Since disagreements and quarrels have customarily occurred among the brothers at the selection of superiors, some preferring this one, and some that, I wish the one who is superior after my death to choose on his own three brothers from all the monks, both those in the controlling monastery of the Pantokrator and those in the monasteries attached to it and even in the dependencies. For he will in no way exclude them should he find anyone worthy of this position of leadership in any of these monasteries or dependencies. When he has gathered the monks together, he will write the names of those who have been chosen on a piece of paper in their sight, then he will sign and fix his seal to this paper, and he will deposit it in the sacristy and it will be kept there until his death, but the names written on it will not be made known to any of the brothers. Then, when the position of superior is empty, the paper will be brought out when all the brothers have gathered and will be set out before them, then the seal will be broken, and if all of them together are pleased with one of the three written down as being a person who excels the others, this person will be accepted at once without any hesitation for the position of superior.

If however there is a difference of opinion about the three, and some choose one and others another, when all from the other monasteries are gathered in the chief monastery, all the brotherhood will together make a most earnest supplication to God and will entreat him earnestly with tears to reveal to them the one who is worthy of the leadership. Then the names should be written on three pieces of paper and someone who does not know how to read should carry these to the holy table, place them under its holy cloths, and then night office should be held for three days with vespers and liturgies, and when the [divine] mystery is completed on the third day some other person who does not know how to read should on the instruction of the brotherhood go into the sanctuary and putting his hand on the holy table take one of the pieces of paper and show it to them all and the person written on it should be considered by all to have been judged by God worthy of the leadership.

If it should ever happen that when the names written down by the superior are considered, someone is found to have been left off this document, though he surpasses those who are written down in excellence and clearly shines out in his personal conduct and is a better candidate for the leadership, and most of the monks testify to this—I mean two-thirds of the brotherhood—they will hereby have the authority to bring it to the notice of the divine Emperor through one of his closest aides and to seek correction of what has happened, to prevent one [p. 69] who is better than the rest being overlooked through some human failing, which seems to happen often, by being wrongly omitted from the vote for the leadership.

[25. Installation of the Superior]

So when the selection for the office of superior has been carried out following the aforementioned procedure, one of the bishops who reside in the capital,⁵³ after a request from the monks, should be instructed by patriarchal ordinance to celebrate the divine mystery and install the superior, so that strict adherence to the canon may be maintained and the independence of the monastery in no way disturbed as a result of the [episcopal] sphragis of the superior. Then the one being installed will receive with all reverence his pastoral staff from the icon of the Pantokrator itself as he will surely render account to him on the day of judgment for his period of rule. The brotherhood will accept the one to be appointed thus by God's instigation and choosing, as one could say, with great joy and, as the phrase goes, with open arms, and the brotherhood will show him total affection, submission, reverence, and willing obedience. He in return will help them as beloved children (Eph. 5:1), and will show a careful concern for each one, advising, encouraging, strengthening, exhorting, reproving, summoning them to reform, always acting for the benefit of all like the apostle (cf. I Cor. 9:19).

TWELFTH CENTURY

[26. Privileges of the Superior]

Therefore this superior, since he necessarily has more cares and toil than the others, will for this reason also have privileges in the daily regimen⁵⁴ compared with the rest, and no one will be jealous of his different mode of life, each one thinking to himself that his selection for the office of superior was due to him and that the number and variety of his cares merit some consolation. So, each day he will be supplied with the fine leavened bread previously mentioned, which we ordered to be made for him, he will drink a superior wine, and will be given provisions from the storehouse on the days that the brothers are permitted to eat fish.

I order that the reverend superior who after my death will then take over the reins, as long as he behaves in a godly and spiritual manner in accordance with the contents of the typikon, is to be criticized by no one nor asked to render account, since he is going to render account to the Pantokrator alone at the time of his righteous judgment.

[27. Revenues of the Dependent Monasteries]

Since other monasteries were attached by my majesty to this monastery, that is, the monastery of Nossiai,⁵⁵ the monastery of Monokastanon,⁵⁶ the monastery of Anthemiou,⁵⁷ the monastery of [p. 71] Medikariou⁵⁸ on the far side opposite the city, the monastery of Galakrenai,⁵⁹ and the monastery of Satyros⁶⁰ in accordance with the patriarchal ordinance issued for it, with all the properties of those monasteries inside and those outside the city, I wish the revenues of these to be used in the first place for all the administration, care, and maintenance of the monks themselves and the churches in the monasteries, the customary feasts and commemorations, and the other necessities of each of the monasteries. Then, after all reasonable and necessary expenditures have been made, whatever is left over of the revenue will pass to the controlling monastery of the Pantokrator. On the other hand if one of these monasteries should find itself in need, through a difficult situation, whatever it needs will be provided.

[28. Constitutions of the Dependent Monasteries]

The monastery of Nossiai will have a cenobitic way of life in accordance with its typikon, but the others will have the kelliotic way of life as they have had up to now. Since each of these monasteries has contained up to now with no distinction some internal monks⁶¹ and some external monks⁶² according to the decision of those supervising them and without due canonical observance or the maintenance of the monastic way of life in them, we have decreed that a list should be made of those in them now and it be given to the superior so that these men may be kept undisturbed. But from now on no internal monks or external monks will be admitted to any of these monasteries until the number of the monks in each monastery is reduced to the number laid down here.

28. PANTOKRATOR

For we wish the monastery of Nossiai to have twelve monks living a cenobitic way of life and six other servants carrying out all the necessary service of the monastery. Their way of life will be in accordance with the procedure at the controlling monastery of the Pantokrator.

We wish the monastery of Monokastanon to have sixteen kelliotic internal monks and these monks will receive whatever has been given to each of them up to now, in accordance with what is contained in their typikon and the customs they have followed up to now. There will be twelve kelliotic monks in the monastery of Anthemiou and they will receive [p. 73] whatever they were receiving up to now, in accordance with the rule they have followed.

In the monastery of Medikariou there will be six kelliotic internal monks and they will receive the same. In the monastery of Galakrenai also there will be six kelliotic monks having the same procedure as the rest of the kelliotics. In the monastery of Satyros there will be eighteen monks similarly living the kelliotic life, and each one of them will receive whatever they have been receiving up to now.

There will be no superior in any of these monasteries, but their affairs will be managed by the stewards who must be included and counted in the aforementioned number of brothers in each monastery. However, all of the monasteries will be under the superior of the monastery of the Pantokrator and will be set, like one body made up of different limbs, under one head, the aforementioned superior.

[29. Church of the Mother of God Eleousa and Its Lighting]

Since my majesty wished a church also to be built near this monastery dedicated to my most holy Lady and Mother of God Eleousa, and between this church and the monastery another chapel in the form of a heroon dedicated to Michael the commander of the heavenly armies, in which we have decreed our tomb to be placed, now at this point I must discuss matters concerning the procedure in these two churches.

For I wish the lighting in the church of the Eleousa to be like this. One lamp should burn continuously in the conch of the apse, one standing lamp in the synthronon, one before each of the two icons for veneration, three lamps before the banner of the holy icon of the Eleousa, and one in the dome. These then I prescribe to burn continuously. The ones that are lit in the services and are again extinguished at the end will be as follows—one in each of the three apses of the church, all the crater lamps around the choros, seven lamps before the middle of the templon, three before each of the two small templa, another triple lamp before the holy icon of the Eleousa, one lamp in each of the four corner bays, and three lamps in the narthex. A candle will be lit to burn continuously in front of the banner, one before each of the two icons for veneration, one in the dome and another in the conch of the apse. Three others will be lit and extinguished before the banner, one before each of the two icons for veneration, three before the middle templon, one before each of the small ones, one in the synthronon, [p. 75] one in each of the three apses and in the narthex, and one at the mosaic icon of the Eleousa.

Since it was decreed by us that on Friday evening of each week the banner of intercession with the rest of the holy icons following it should turn aside and go among our tombs and that an ektenes should be made for us, now we also issue these instructions concerning the illumination that there will be on that evening. For the arrival of the holy banners four large candles will be lit in those colonnades which are alongside the public colonnade and are used both for the arrival and the departure of these sacred icons. On the same evening also ten lamps will be lit and each must burn in its own lantern. In the phiale, where water must flow to refresh those who are weary from traveling, another lamp with lantern will be lit; on the exterior side of the church situated beyond this passageway six lamps; in the passageway situated in front of the door of the narthex one standing lamp and one candle; in the narthex itself three other lamps; before [St. John the] Forerunner above the door of the narthex one standing lamp and one candle, and opposite him before the icon in mosaic of the Mother of God one candle; outside the other phiale, in which other water similarly flows to refresh the people, one lamp with its lantern; inside the church four large candles, seven other candles, that is one candle before each icon that is placed above the different doors in the church, and the rest of the candles that are usually lit; in the passageway of the heroon itself in front of the icon of Christ, which is placed above the passageway to our tombs, two candles; all the crater lamps around the heroon should be lit or the chandeliers whenever these are hung up instead of the crater lamps. In the two apses of the heroon, that is before the Crucifixion and the Resurrection, there should be one candle each, and in the other apse one candle before the Holy Sepulchre and another candle before Christ appearing to the Marys.

TWELFTH CENTURY

[30. Clergy Stationed in the Church of the Eleousa]

We decree that all the clergy of the church should number fifty, that is, eight priests, two of whom, being more distinguished, will lead the others each during his own week with the same applying to the deacons, ten deacons, two choir leaders, two others acting as laosynaktai, sixteen chanters, four precentors, and eight orphans acting as lamplighters, and four [p. 77] other extra orphans who must receive advancement in precedence whenever the number of certified orphans is incomplete. In addition, we decree that four respectable women of propriety, mature in age and character and with the rank of graptai, should carry out their duties, two in one week and the other two in the next, and the four of them should be present on a Friday evening and watch over the church and what happens there. For we have decreed that these orphans and graptai should exist for this reason, that they should conduct the procedure of the meeting of the holy banners every week, carry out the service to those brothers who gather by refreshing them all with water, and see to the oversight of the church and the things connected with it.

[31. Duties of the Clergy of the Eleousa]

These clergy should follow a pattern of two weeks. Half of them should sing during one week and the rest during the second. They should sing the liturgy of the Hagiopolites⁶³ in the form that is used in the great church in the palace. On Friday of each week a vigil should take place with the night office when the banner of intercession with all the rest preceding and following it, together with all the clergy and people, will be invoked on the way by the members of the clergy of the Eleousa and will be met with all reverence and fitting honor and in faith brought into the church and all men and women, that is as many as follow these revered banners, will make an ektenes, banners and people alike in the appropriate order, for the pardon and remission of our sins. Kyrie eleison will be repeated fifteen times for each banner and then they will go forwards again towards the holy tomb.⁶⁴ Then those taking part will receive for their own consolation twelve hyperpyra nomismata;⁶⁵ this procedure will take place each week and the distribution also at the departure of the banners from the church.

28. PANTOKRATOR

[32. Remunerations of the Clergy of Eleousa]

We decree that the clergy of this church should receive as their [cash] allowances and grain allowances the following: the leading priests should each receive fifteen hyperpyra nomismata and twenty-five maritime modioi of grain each, the other six [p. 79] priests similarly fourteen hyperpyra nomismata each and twenty-five maritime modioi of grain each, the ten deacons thirteen similar nomismata each and twenty-four maritime modioi of grain each, the two choir leaders the same as the deacons, the two laosynaktai and the sixteen chanters twelve similar nomismata each and twenty maritime modioi of grain each, the four precentors six similar nomismata each and fifteen similar modioi of grain each, the eight orphans or lamplighters the same amount, the four graptai four similar nomismata each and twelve maritime modioi of grain each. The distribution will take place at the times it has traditionally been carried out from the beginning.

A weekly allowance should also be given to the servants, one hyperpyron nomisma each week and another similar nomisma to the same people each week for the vigil on Friday. At the two feasts of the Mother of God, that is the Annunciation and the Purification [Presentation of Christ in the Temple], all of them should receive two hyperpyra nomismata at each of these two feasts; at the commemoration of the sovereign and father of my majesty of blessed memory three hyperpyra nomismata; at the commemoration of my majesty the same amount; at the commemoration of the lady my most beloved wife of blessed memory the same amount; at the commemoration of the lady and mother of my majesty of blessed memory two hyperpyra nomismata; at the commemoration of the lady and grandmother of my majesty of blessed memory the same amount. Since my majesty hopes that my most beloved son the basileus Lord Alexios Born-in-the-Purple wishes to be placed, as he promised me, in the same tomb with me, they will receive at his commemoration the same as at the commemoration of my majesty.

[33. Liturgical Ritual of the Church of Eleousa]

However the feasts of my most holy Lady and Mother of God will take place as follows. The feast of her holy Metastasis will be celebrated with a vigil, with all the clergy assembling and carrying out the whole liturgy with fitting diligence, and they will receive for their singing fourteen hyperpyra nomismata. But if some of them are missing from this feast and are not eager to carry out all the liturgy with fitting diligence, not only are these not to share with the rest in what is given for this feast, but each of them as a punishment will be fined two hyperpyra nomismata out of those which belong to him. The lighting of the church will be made brighter following the procedure set out above for the feast of the [p. 81] Transfiguration in the monastery. The feast of the Entry into the Temple will have a little less lighting but the singing at the feast will be carried out by all the clergy. The same procedure will hold good also for the feast of the Birth of the Mother of God. However for each feast in the church one offering of fine wheat flour weighing two litrai and two other offerings of the purest flour weighing two litrai each also will be supplied from the bakery of the monastery. That made from fine wheat flour will be for the Lord, but those made from flour for our commemorations. At the same time half a maritime measure [of wine] for the eucharist will be supplied every week from the monastery and incense will be provided from the monastery also each week weighing half a litra. These are the things I prescribe for the church of the Eleousa.

TWELFTH CENTURY

[34. The Church of St. Michael and Its Lighting]

In the church of [St. Michael] the Incorporeal one candle will be lit to burn continuously in the conch of the apse and another before the tomb of my most beloved wife and one before that of my majesty. In the services, during matins and the liturgy and during vespers there should be one candle before the icon for veneration of the Incorporeal opposite the Savior, three candles before the middle templon, another in the holy sanctuary, and another one before each of our tombs. Lamps should be lit to burn continuously, one in the conch of the apse, a triple lamp before the Incorporeal, another single lamp in the dome of the Incorporeal, and one in the middle of the exterior heroon. One lamp should also be lit to burn continuously in each of the tombs which have remains and one candle in each during the services of the vigil on Friday.

[35. Liturgical Ritual of the Church of St. Michael]

All the singing of psalms in this church and the rest of the office should be carried out completely by a group from the monastery but the trisagion at the tombs should be performed by clergy from outside;⁶⁶ the same applies to the night office each evening. The ecclesiarch of the monastery should carefully maintain the lighting in the church of the Incorporeal and in the tombs themselves, and he should take care that this is done in the approved manner. For he must supply the oil and the candles for this church from the monastery in sufficient quantities. The liturgy should take place in this church three times a week, that is on Tuesday, Thursday, and Saturday, and for each liturgy three offerings should be provided by the monastery weighing two litrai and made of the purest flour, and sufficient wine also. The particulars of our commemorations will take place as my majesty prescribed in the other more secret document.⁶⁷

However I wish the holy icon of my most pure Lady and Mother of God Hodegetria [p. 83] to be taken into the monastery on the days of our commemorations—that is, those for the most beloved wife of my majesty, for my majesty itself, for my most beloved son and basileus, Lord Alexios, if he will want to be buried with me—and while her holy icon is brought in, an ektenes should be made for us by all those who are following it and the kyrie eleison repeated thirty times. Then this holy icon should be set in the church of the Incorporeal near our tombs and on those nights vigils should be held by the monks and the clergy, and on the next day the divine liturgy should be celebrated while the holy icon is present, and after the dismissal an ektenes should again be made for us in the presence of all the assembled people, and they should receive when they leave fifty hyperpyra nomismata at each visit of the Mother of God. The division of the money should be as follows: six hyperpyra nomismata for the holy icon, twenty-four hyperpyra nomismata for the twelve koudai, two similar nomismata for the bearers and the other servants of the holy icon. The rest should be changed into hagiogeorgata nomismata and distributed to the banners.

However the superior and those who with him administer matters concerning the monastery and the church will take care in every way that those who are going to be appointed to the church are worthy clergy.

28. PANTOKRATOR

[36. Establishment of a Hospital]

Since my majesty also prescribed a hospital which should shelter fifty bedridden sick people, I wish and decree that there should be that number of beds for the comfort of these sick people. Of these fifty beds, ten will be for those suffering from wounds or those with fractures, eight others for those afflicted with ophthalmia and those with sickness of the stomach and any other very acute and painful illnesses; twelve beds will be set aside for sick women and the remainder will be left for those who are moderately ill. But if from time to time there is a lack of people ill either from wounds or from ophthalmia and other very acute illnesses, the number will be made up from other [p. 85] sick people afflicted with simply any disease whatever. Each bed should have a mat, a mattress with a pillow and a coverlet, and in the winter also two blankets made of goat's hair.⁶⁸ So since these fifty beds have been divided into five wards, there will be an extra bed also in each ward in which will be placed any patient whose condition of emergency requires that he lie down but who because the beds are full cannot find an appointed place to lie down. Apart from these beds, six more extra beds will be set aside with mattresses pierced through the middle for those who cannot move at all, either because of the severity of their illnesses or their utter weakness or sometimes even the pain of the wounds they may suffer.

[37. Bedding and Clothes for the Sick]

They must maintain a continuous supply of as many as fifteen or even twenty shirts and cloaks for the poorer invalids or those suffering from more acute illnesses so that whenever they go to bed they can change into these and their own clothes can be washed and kept for them to put on whenever they had got rid of their illness and are about to leave. Each year they should change any of these bedclothes and other clothes that are completely unserviceable, unsew the mattresses and pillows and pull apart the wool, and change the torn linen or sew it up again for the comfort of those in the beds. However any of the old clothes and bedclothes that have been changed and are of use for the invalids will be kept by the infirmarian, but the rest will be distributed to the poor.

[38. Medical Personnel]

When these fifty beds have been divided up into five wards, each ward will be served by two doctors, three certified assistants, two auxiliary assistants, and two orderlies. However, each evening four male and one female assistant from the assistants will remain with the patients, that is one to each ward, and they are called watchers. There will be two doctors for the women's ward, and they will be accompanied by one female doctor, four certified female assistants, two auxiliary female assistants, and two female orderlies. Of these doctors appointed to the wards the two chief ones will be called protomenitai, and there will be two in addition to the doctors on the wards called primikerioi, one teacher to teach medical skill, and two attendants. For the sick who visit from outside [p. 87] there will be four extra doctors of whom two will be physicians and two surgeons. These two surgeons will serve the women's ward also whenever any of the women has an illness caused by an open wound. These four doctors who have been assigned to the sick who visit from outside will be accompanied by four certified assistants and four other auxiliary ones, two of whom will also serve the monastery for a month alternately.

TWELFTH CENTURY

[39. The Doctors]

Then all these doctors will be divided into two groups and half of them will minister for one month, the other half the next month. The same will apply to the two primikerioi. They will visit the hospital each day without fail. But from the beginning of May to the feast of the Exaltation of the Cross they will also visit in the late afternoon and after the customary singing of a psalm they will examine the sick carefully and scrutinize each person's illness in accurate detail, treating each person with appropriate remedies, making suitable arrangements for all, and showing great devotion and a careful concern for all as they are going to render an account of these actions to the Pantokrator.

[40. Primikerioi]

So also, each of the primikerioi will go round all the beds independently each day for a month alternately and will ask each of the patients how he is being treated and whether he is being tended by those appointed to this task with proper care and attention, and he will actively correct what is not right, reprove the negligent, and firmly put an end to anything being done improperly. He will also supervise the bread that is given to the patients and anything else laid down to be given to them on a daily basis. He will watch over everything with care and will properly attend to and straighten out each matter. For this reason he should not be in charge of a ward, since supervision only has been laid upon him and no other task. If any of the sick who visit the hospital from outside is found to be seriously ill, the doctor assigned to them will explain to the primikerios about them and on his instruction another doctor, the most experienced of the rest, will go and examine the invalid and take appropriate measures to bring him healing.

[41. The Infirmarian and the Superintendent]

Besides the doctors described above, there will also be an infirmarian and a superintendent who will receive all that is necessary in sufficient quantities and will supply it plentifully not only for those lying in bed inside but also for the sick coming from outside, as has been stated. These men will pay no heed to the expense of these things in maintaining an unfailing supply of everything.

[42. Exhortation to the Hospital Staff]

We give this instruction jointly to all, to the doctors, the supervisors, assistants, and the rest, [p. 89] that they all turn their gaze on him, the Pantokrator, and not neglect their careful examination of the sick, knowing what a great reward this work has when it is properly carried out and again what danger it brings when it is neglected and falls short of what is fitting. For Our Master accepts as his own what is done for each of the least of our brothers (cf. Matt. 25:40) and measures out rewards in proportion to our good deeds. So then with regard to these our brothers we will all behave as people unable to escape the unsleeping eye of God and view with apprehension and great fear the time when we shall fall into his hands.

28. PANTOKRATOR

[43. Service Personnel]

To the aforementioned group of doctors, assistants, and others these also will be added—one chief pharmacist, three certified druggists, and two auxiliaries, one doorkeeper, five washerwomen, one man to heat water, two cooks, one groom who is going to work with the horses at the mill and will also receive and keep an eye on the horses of the doctors during the time that they are treating the patients, a gatekeeper, another to act as a caterer, two priests for the churches, two readers—one of the priests, however, will also have episcopal sphragis to hear the confessions of very sick patients, lest they should die a spiritual and ruinous death should they depart from this life without making their confession—two bakers, four undertakers, one priest for funerals, one cleaner of drains, and one miller.

[44. Commemorations]

On the occasions of the commemorations of the sovereign and father of my majesty of blessed memory, and of the lady of blessed memory, my very dear wife, and furthermore when commemorating my own majesty and my very dear son the basileus Lord Alexios (if he also wishes to be buried in the same tomb with me, as has often been mentioned), all these people will gather in the church of the most immaculate Lady and Mother of God with those of the sick who are able to move, carrying out a procession and singing “Remember, Lord, thy servants since thou art good,” and “Rest with the saints,” and “Ardent intercession.” Then they should make an ektenes, say Kyrie eleison forty times and “God will bless the founders,” and they should partake in a collation and depart. Four maritime modioi of eucharistic bread will be provided for the collation and four similar measures of wine.

On returning, the doctors along with the other servants of the hospital should receive four hyperpyra nomismata and the [p. 91] fifty sick people one trachy nomisma each, that is for each procession in these commemorations. Also, sixteen large torches should be provided for the processions of the whole year so that the primikerioi can have them to light at the time of the processions.

In addition to this we decree that seventy-two monastic modioi of wheat, that is six modioi each month, should be given for the offerings of bread and kollyba that take place on the first day of each month and are distributed to the doctors, assistants, and other servants of the hospital. Similarly, for the offerings of bread and kollyba that are going to take place on the Saturdays of Meatfare, Cheesefare, and Pentecost in memory of the brothers who die in this same hospital, fifteen similar modioi of wheat should be given and forty folleis for the decoration of each of these baskets, and the doctors and other servants should receive two hundred and fifty folleis on each of these three Saturdays.

[45. Allotments for the Sick and for Service Personnel]

We decree that the fifty patients along with the four assistants—those also called watchers—the four orderlies, the one female assistant, the female orderly, and the man to heat water should receive each day one white loaf weighing one-fifteenth of a maritime modios and as food they should all be provided together with a similar modios of beans and another modios of another kind of legumes—but if peas are being provided, instead of a modios a half modios will be provided—and in addition to these two foods a hundred onion heads. But sometimes, instead of one of the legumes, fresh vegetables will be supplied, and sufficient oil will be provided by the superintendent for the preparation of these two courses. For wine and all other refreshment the fifty will receive one trachy nomisma each or it will be quite in order to distribute to the fifty each day the preferred gold nomisma of the day in tetartera or noummia, and each of them will receive three folleis for their soap each Sunday. There will also be a bakery in which bread will be made for our brothers in Christ—the residents of both the hospital and the old age home—and it should have two milling establishments and three horses.

TWELFTH CENTURY

[46. Bathing of the Sick]

Since those who are ill need to bathe, as many as the doctors prescribe this for will bathe twice a week in the hospital's bath in the company of sufficient assistants and orderlies. But if someone [p. 93] because of his condition needs more frequently the therapy that comes from bathing, the doctor who is attending this sick person will be able to take him into the bathhouse without anyone hindering him.

[47. Washing and Cooking Utensils]

There will be without fail in the hospital ten hand towels, the same number of towels, and the same number of hair wipers, three wash bowls, four copper buckets, and four ewers kept by the infirmarian for those who are going to have a bath. There will also be copper cooking pots and kettles for the kitchen kept in store and other small vessels, pestles and mortars for the needs of the hospital, one large cauldron, and another small one.

[48. Doctors Assigned to the Monastery]

We decree that there should be a further two extra doctors to serve the monastery month by month and tend in every way to those in it who are sick, receiving from the hospital the appropriate remedies for the invalids, both medicines, plasters, and other necessary articles. The people who should be assigned to the monastery should be from among the more established of the hospital's auxiliaries, since they are going to receive advancement from there to the hospital. First they will take the place of those who are missing in the women's ward, then also with promotion in the other wards in succession, as has been mentioned. In place of the auxiliaries who are promoted and gain appointed status, we decree that of necessity other auxiliaries should be brought in who should carry out their service to the hospital and the monastery, as has been stated previously.

[49. Allotment of Supplies for the Infirmarian]

So that the infirmarian may not have any excuse for providing the monastery with what it needs in a niggardly fashion, he also will be receiving annually twenty hyperpyra nomismata for the things which should be provided for the monastery besides what has been prescribed for the hospital. Since four orderlies and one female orderly were included in the distribution of the daily bread and food of the patients in the hospital, and since there are two orderlies for each ward, the orderlies will receive this daily allocation, half of them on one day and half on the next. The same applies to the female orderlies so that they will carry out their task eagerly.

28. PANTOKRATOR

Sixty-six maritime measures of olive oil will be supplied to the infirmarian for the preparation of all the ointments and for the making up of plasters, and furthermore for the two lamps that burn continuously in the churches of the hospital, for eight other lamps that must burn in the churches during matins, the liturgy, and vespers, for the five lamps in the wards of the patients that will burn together with the one lamp in the portico, for the two lamps in the lavatories, for the triple lamp which should burn at the doctors' office, and for every other outlay of olive oil that he will make. Of this oil two measures will be of old oil and two others of unripe oil. [p. 95]

Similarly fifty maritime measures of honey will be supplied to the infirmarian for medicines, rose-water, oxymel, the liquid of Diospolis, sour grape juice with honey,⁶⁹ and for every other outlay of honey made by him, including the juices that will be distributed at the feast of the Savior and at the feast of the Holy Anargyroi celebrated on the first of November. He will also be supplied with forty measures of vinegar for all the different outlays made by him, as has been described, and twenty peisai of firewood for the cooking of the medications and the cooking of the juices and the kollyba offering. He will also receive a hundred litrai of pure wax weighed out on the steelyard⁷⁰ and two hyperpyra nomismata for incense for the churches along with what is distributed for the mulled wine, and for the candles in the churches along with what is also distributed, three theotokia for vine-oil,⁷¹ ten trachea nomismata for the purchase of cups and plates,⁷² two theotokia for cold cauterizers,⁷³ and one theotokion for the purchase of lamps.

Each month he will receive five monastic modioi of fine wheat flour, one hundred weighed litrai of sugar for the whole year, three barrels of grapes, two barrels of pomegranates, four barrels of wild grapejuice for must, four maritime modioi of barley for juice for each of the two feasts, and one loaf each day for poultice⁷⁴ and leavened bread. He will receive two hyperpyra nomismata for the purchase of candles for the patients, the doctors, the assistants, the orderlies, etc. during the festival of Palms and Holy Week, and two hyperpyroi litrai at the beginning of spring for the purchase of medical supplies, medicines, plasters, and the other preparations for the hospital excluding the antidote theriac and the Mithridate.⁷⁵ Similarly he will also receive [p. 97] ten maritime modioi of wheat and ten similar measures of wine yearly for the two churches of the hospital, that of the men and that of the women, for the offerings of bread and wine.

[50. Allotment of Supplies for the Superintendent]

The superintendent, since he must carry out the work of the cellarer, will himself also receive thirty-six maritime measures of oil for the seasoning of the two meals that are going to be distributed daily to the patients of the hospital, also for hot poultices⁷⁶ and enemas and all other outlay in olive oil that is going to be made by him; for juices, plasters, lozenges,⁷⁷ etc. fifty maritime measures of honey, forty-eight similar measures of must concentrate,⁷⁸ and thirty similar measures of vinegar; for wine syrup,⁷⁹ hot poultices, and plasters thirty-six measures of wine, thirty modioi of linseed, thirty modioi of salt, eight modioi of rice, eight modioi of spelt, eighteen modioi of almonds, and all of these in the monastic modios and measure. For the purchase of mastic, myrrh, incense, gum-ammoniac, and other simply medical articles, also for dates, plums, eggs, tow, etc. he will receive three hyperpyra nomismata each month, for starch⁸⁰ and jelly⁸¹ three modioi yearly; for the purchase of beet and the proper seasoning for almaia one hyperpyron nomisma; for the two cauldrons, one big one and one small one, which are going to be heated continuously in the hospital, also for the kitchen forty maritime peisai of firewood will be provided each month.

TWELFTH CENTURY

The superintendent will also receive each month one length of pine torch and twelve monastic modioi of barley each month for barley water, dry poultices, barley-meal, husked barley, etc., one similar modios of wheat-flour, half a modios of bean-flour, half a modios of lentils, half a modios of millet, half a modios of chickpeas, and a quarter of a modios of vetches: for the purchase of goat-fat, pig-fat, and goose-fat, deer marrow, and other such things yearly one hyperpyron nomisma, two modioi yearly for pickled and crushed olives, four modioi of raisins a year, twelve modioi of dried figs, and fifty litrai a year of rose water: four hyperpyra nomismata a year for chamber pots, cooking pots, [p. 99] aprons, pots, wooden seats, sponges, sawdust, bran, cloths, combs, and other things; and for the purchase of brooms (?)⁸² and for the washing out of the dining room which must be done twice a month by the orderlies half a hyperpyron nomisma yearly.

[51. Miscellaneous Dispositions for the Hospital]

There will be one large brazier in the hospital, one small one in the surgery, and another similar one in the women's ward, and they will be supplied yearly with twenty wagons of coal. Each week four liturgies will be celebrated in the hospital, on Wednesday, Friday, Saturday, and Sunday for the glorification of Our Lord and in our memory, excluding the feasts of Our Lord and other significant ones which occur during the week. For on those days also the divine mystery will be specially celebrated. Commemorations of the sick who die should take place three times a year, as has been stated above, that is during [the Saturdays of] Meatfare, Cheesefare, and at Pentecost. Two aspra trachea nomismata, or a twenty-fourth part of the preferred gold nomisma of the day, will be given to the priest taking funerals for incense and candles for each of the sick who die. The washing of the feet of the sick by the superior will take place on Holy Thursday and the fifty sick will receive one trikephalon nomisma each; for the purchase of candles on that same day for the washing of the feet, three hyperpyra nomismata will be provided to be distributed to the whole medical establishment. No assistant or servant of the monastery or of any of those carrying out any task in the monastery or of those acting under its authority will occupy a bed in the hospital. For the fifty beds will be kept free for our brothers in Christ, and the care of the sick of the monastery will take place in the monastery, as has been made clear above. Those who drink a purgative will also lie down with those with ophthalmia and those suffering from a bowel disease so that they may not interrupt the sleep and rest of the other sick people by their continual getting up and the pains which come on them from this.

[52. Salaries of the Hospital Staff]

We prescribe that all staff in the hospital who have been appointed to look after the sick are to receive the following:

The two primikerioi as their allowance should receive seven and a half golden nomismata each of the most preferred type of the day, for their food half a similar nomisma each, and for their grain allowance forty-five annonikoi modioi of grain each. [p. 101]

28. PANTOKRATOR

The two chief doctors, those whom we have decreed should be called protomenitai, should receive seven similar nomismata each, for their food half a nomisma each, and for their grain allowance thirty-eight modioi of grain each.

The two chief surgeons should receive precisely the same.

The other four after them should receive six and a half similar nomismata each, for their food a third of a nomisma each, and thirty-six modioi of grain each.

The two doctors of the monastery should receive four similar nomismata each, for their food a quarter of a similar nomisma each, and thirty modioi of grain each.

The two physicians for the sick who come from outside and the two surgeons appointed as assistants should receive four similar nomismata each, for their food a quarter of a nomisma each, and thirty modioi of grain each.

The infirmarian should receive eight similar nomismata, for his food two-thirds of a similar nomisma, fifty modioi of grain, sixty modioi of barley, and a thousand bundles of hay.

The female doctor should receive three similar nomismata including her food allowance, and twenty-six modioi of grain.

The two attendants should receive three similar nomismata each, for their food a sixth of a nomisma each, and twenty-eight modioi of grain each.

The superintendent who is also going to carry out the job of the cellarer should receive four similar nomismata, for his food a third of a nomisma, and thirty-six modioi of grain.

The chief pharmacist should receive three and a sixth similar nomismata, for his food a third of a similar nomisma, for the wine and food of the druggists when they make their preparations twenty-five trachea nomismata, forty-two annonikoi modioi of grain, for sieves one theotokion nomisma, and in the month of May for the gathering of herbs six old hyperpyra nomismata, and nine similar modioi of grain.

The sixteen certified assistants and the four female assistants should each receive two and a half of the new preferred nomismata of the day, for their food a sixth of a nomisma each, and twenty-four modioi of grain each. [p. 103]

The eight auxiliary assistants and female assistants should receive two similar nomismata each, for their food a twelfth of a nomisma each, and twenty modioi of grain each.

The three certified druggists should receive three and a third similar nomismata each, for their food a sixth of a nomisma each, and twenty-four modioi of grain each.

The two auxiliary druggists should receive two and a half similar nomismata each, for their food a twelfth of a nomisma each, and twenty modioi of grain each.

The four auxiliary assistants who have been allocated to those from outside and to the monastery should also receive the same.

The eight orderlies together with the three female orderlies should receive four similar nomismata each, for their food a quarter of a nomisma each, thirty modioi of grain each, and for their monthly allowance each of them should receive four similar trachea nomismata every month.

The two readers should receive including their food allowance three similar new hyperpyra nomismata each, twelve maritime modioi of grain each, nine measures of wine each, and for their monthly allowance four nomismata each every month.

The doorkeeper should receive as his allowance including that for his food three similar new nomismata, twenty-four annonikoi modioi of grain, and for his monthly allowance four trachea nomismata every month.

TWELFTH CENTURY

The man who heats the water should receive as his allowance three similar nomismata, for his food a quarter of a nomisma, thirty similar modioi of grain, and a monthly allowance of four trachea nomismata every month.

The two cooks along with the caterer should receive including their food allowance three similar nomismata each, thirty similar modioi of grain each, and four trachea nomismata each every month.

The five washerwomen should receive one and a half similar nomismata each, twelve similar modioi of grain each, for their monthly allowance four nomismata each every month, and each Sunday twelve folleis each for soap to wash the clothes of the sick who are confined to bed.

The priest to take funerals should receive including his food allowance three new nomismata, twenty modioi of grain, and four trachea nomismata every month.

The four undertakers should receive two similar nomismata each, and twelve modioi of grain each.

The gatekeeper should receive two and a third new hyperpyra nomismata, for his food a sixth of a nomisma, and fifteen annonikoi modioi of grain.

The two bakers should receive as an allowance four similar hyperpyra nomismata each, for their food one similar nomisma each, and for their grain allowance thirty similar modioi of grain each.

The groom who is going to work with the horses of the mill and must keep the horses of the doctors during the time that they are on duty should receive four similar hyperpyra nomismata, and twenty-four similar modioi of grain; for the upkeep of these three milling horses five hundred and forty-seven annonikoi modioi of barley will be provided, three thousand bundles of hay, and sufficient straw; for baking the bread for the sick in the hospital and the brothers in the old age homes one hundred and eighty maritime peisai of firewood each year, for sieves for the bakery two theotokia nomismata each year, and for kneading troughs [p. 105] and linen covers and all the rest that goes with them three more theotokia nomismata.

There will also be a miller who must receive, if there are two milling establishments, two hyperpyra nomismata and sixteen annonikoi modioi of grain, but if there is one, half of this, and a drain cleaner who will receive two new hyperpyra nomismata as his allowance, for his food a sixth of a similar nomisma, and fifteen monastic modioi of grain.

In addition to these there will be a sharpener who must clean up the medical instruments which are going to be kept in the hospital and used to bleed the sick. For in the hospital itself there will be stored at all times lancets, cauterizing irons, a catheter, forceps for drawing teeth, instruments for the stomach and head—simply whatever is necessary for them all. There will also always be copper washbasins and ewers, one for each ward, for the doctors to wash after they have finished tending the sick with whatever is beneficial for the curing of each one, and the sharpener will receive one and a half new hyperpyra nomismata, and twelve annonikoi modioi of grain.

The hospital will also be sure to have the services of a hernia surgeon who will also receive as his allowance three and a third similar new hyperpyra nomismata, for his food a third of a nomisma, and for his grain allowance thirty similar modioi of grain.

28. PANTOKRATOR

The coppersmith who must also be the cooper will receive two similar hyperpyra nomismata, and twenty modioi of grain.

As a monthly allowance the doctors and the assistants will receive five trikephala nomismata each month, in the same way the protomenites will receive one similar trikephalon nomisma for distribution to the sick who come from outside, and the watchers will be given as their monthly allowance thirty-six trachea nomismata each month.

[53. Allocation of Other Sums]

In addition to the other things we also decree as follows. On the glorious day of the Transfiguration of Our Lord God and Savior Jesus Christ one annonikon measure of olive oil will be given for brightening the two churches in the hospital and elsewhere, and two annonikoi modioi of grain for the bread of the offerings and the kollyba; one trachy nomisma each will be given to the fifty patients and fifty trachea nomismata and nine hundred and twenty tetartera to the doctors and the other servants of the hospital. In the same way also at the feast celebrated on the first of November, the feast of the miracle-working saints the Anargyroi, for brightening these two churches and elsewhere one annonikon measure of olive oil will be given, one annonikos modios of grain for the bread of the offerings and the kollyba, and fifteen trachea nomismata will be given to the doctors and other servants of the hospital. At the feast of the Presentation of Christ in the Temple three hundred [p. 107] and nine tetartera nomismata will be given to the same people. On Holy Thursday when the washing of feet usually takes place, forty-two trachea nomismata will be given to the doctors, assistants, and the other servants of the hospital.

[54. Doctors Not to Undertake Outside Work]

However the doctors will not be allowed to go out of the city to tend any of the ruling class, even if they are very important and related to the emperor. In general we forbid any of the doctors to carry out additional work. So we forbid even more these doctors to perform unpaid service by imperial command on occasional secular excursions, and furthermore we forbid the taking of any medical articles from the hospital for these excursions, making this present document of ours a request to those who will be emperors after us.

[55. Teacher of Medicine]

We also prescribe that there should be a teacher to teach the principles of medical knowledge, who will also receive exactly the same allowances as the infirmarian. The aforementioned food allowances have been prescribed for him for this reason, that he may attend to the task of teaching and teach the student doctors of the hospital the knowledge of medicine in a consistent and zealous manner. For the teaching post is not being set up by us as an office so that the man thought fit for this responsibility receives his food allowance but neglects his teaching, since the man who is discovered not to be performing this service will be deprived of the receipt of his food allowance and someone else will be appointed instead who will carry out in full the teaching of medical knowledge according to our instructions.

TWELFTH CENTURY

[56. Cemetery of Medikariou]

Since it is necessary to bury the brothers who die in the hospital and in the old age home, and it is a troublesome imposition to convey them either to the common burial ground of the dead which are taken to the church of the holy apostle Luke,⁸³ or elsewhere to the cemeteries throughout the city and those beyond it, we consecrate a place for their burial in our monastery of Medikariou across the water consisting of about two modioi of its own land, in which there will also be a chapel, and an enclosing wall will be built completely mud-blind surrounding the same place and at one point providing an entrance for visitors by means of a gate.

In the same chapel a priest, one of the monks in the monastery of Medikariou, should celebrate the sacrament once a week, that is on the prescribed day of Saturday for all the brothers who have previously died; on the day before, that is Friday, he should sing vespers with a night office. For this chapel there should be provided each year from the controlling monastery of the Pantokrator for its lighting twelve litrai of wax, one and a half annonika measures of olive oil, six litrai of incense, and for the bread and wine of the offering six monastic modioi of grain and six similar measures of wine. [p. 109] The same priest, who is also a monk, should not be criticized by the rest of the brotherhood for whatever donations he perhaps receives for this his service to those who die and are buried there.

[57. Standards of Measurement]

Of course the monastic modioi and measures must equal four-fifths of the maritime ones and the annonika measures two-thirds of the maritime ones.

[58. Establishment of an Old Age Home]

Since I also wish there to be an old age home in this monastery, in it will be twenty-four old men being looked after, all of them crippled, lame, infirm, and suffering in other ways. Six orderlies will give them assistance. It will not be possible for the superior or anyone else to enroll in this number of old men any who are healthy and strong either from the monastery or from any of the ruling class or even from clergy, whether they are slaves or others able to provide from their own work the means of their livelihood. For we threaten the superior himself and anyone else with great condemnation if they try to transgress this order in any way.

[59. Allowances of Old Age Home Residents]

Each of the old people in the old age home will receive each year twenty maritime modioi of bread, eighteen maritime measures of wine, two maritime modioi of legumes, fifty litrai of cheese, one maritime measure of olive oil, three maritime peisai of firewood, and two hyperpyra nomismata for their allowance and clothing allowance. In the distributions at the feasts and commemorations, they will also receive from what is distributed as alms from the monastery whatever the brothers at the gate receive. These men moreover will also attend our commemorations and make supplication for us, as has been specified above. For the chapel in which they are going to attend divine service they will be given annually two maritime measures of olive oil, six similar measures of wine for the wine of the sacrament, six similar modioi of grain for the offering, twenty-four litrai of wax, and six litrai of incense. For the priest of this chapel including his food allowance there will be six hyperpyra nomismata, twenty-four maritime modioi of grain, eighteen similar measures of wine, and for the reader there will be half of this. [p. 111]

28. PANTOKRATOR

[60. Transfer of the Sick to the Hospital]

If any of the old men in this old age home are afflicted with any other sickness besides the one for which they were thought fit to enter the old age home, the priest of the old age home will notify the infirmarian of the hospital and information will be supplied to the medical team and they will command one of the doctors or assistants to take care of the sick man, as has been stated, so that he finds relief from this disease. But if the illness is judged to be too serious he will be put to bed in the hospital and will be entitled to the necessary care and medical attention, and when he has regained his strength once more, he will return to the old age home. Each of the old men in the old age home will be washed twice a month in the bath of the hospital.

[61. Appointment of an Infirmarian]

From time to time an infirmarian will be appointed from the monks in the monastery, the most reverent of them all, who will devote all his concern and zeal to ministering well to the old men in his care. Also the superior himself will pay careful attention to these brothers. On Holy Thursday he will take care to wash these also as he does the sick in the hospital and after the washing he will give them three hyperpyra nomismata, that is one nomisma among eight.

[62. Allowances for the Orderlies]

Their six orderlies will each receive as an allowance two hyperpyra nomismata each, twenty maritime modioi of grain each, sixteen similar measures of wine each, and for their food two maritime modioi of legumes and fifty litrai of cheese.

[63. Establishment of a Lepers' Sanatorium]

Though we wished to set apart in a certain place separately some brothers afflicted with leprosy⁸⁴ and establish from certain revenues their relief, consolation of every kind, and care to be maintained for them undisturbed, yet the establishment in the city of such a place for their residence and way of life seemed an annoyance to those living in the neighborhood because of the concentration of buildings and it being difficult to approach, on the other hand to establish [a facility] for the special care of these seriously afflicted people selected by us in the same area which we had originally dedicated to that entire group of brothers appeared difficult for such a group.

For this reason we have turned our attention to this scheme, namely to build a special house near the other rooms in which the brothers now live being especially near to the old age home of the emperor Lord Romanos⁸⁵ [p. 113] for those afflicted brothers selected by us, and then to dedicate and set up a revenue that is going to be spent on their behalf in addition to the other revenues which these our brothers in Christ now have, so that the management of these also can be carried on jointly by the one managing the care and administration of all these afflicted brothers.

If then because of this we are thought worthy of special remembrance by this holy and divine community as having ourselves also expended concern and toil on the resources for their livelihood along with the others who showed care about their prosperity, I am grateful for their gratitude towards me. But if perhaps they wish to be in some way neglectful of their special entreaty on our behalf, then in that case we are confident of not being deprived of the reward for this concern by God the Good Rewarder.

TWELFTH CENTURY

[64. Responsibilities of the Stewards]

Since the multitude of cares for things both inside and outside the monastery and for matters both spiritual and secular arising from what has been decreed here by us gives rise to the reasonable thought that the superior in daily control of the monastery could not by himself superintend all matters and keep a watch on everything equally, since he could not divide his attention among so many things, we therefore decree that there be several stewards, one of necessity appointed in the controlling monastery dealing carefully with the spheres and concerns that apply to him, another one to be in charge of the other monasteries attached to this monastery and manage things in them, watching all their several stewards with much similar care and earnest zeal and effecting the appropriate improvements in all matters, another one to manage the business of the church of the Eleousa, and another the business of the hospital and the old age home. All of them with the permission and knowledge of the superior should deal with the matters that ought to be dealt with by them.

Furthermore I decree that the superior himself in all the most important matters should not do anything without meeting these men, neither appoint agents or suppliers, nor grant leases or immovable property or contracts or other hirings, also in the sanctioning of the most important expenditure and in the case of the other most essential procedures he should carry out whatever seems possible in the presence of these stewards, just as in the appointing of each of these stewards. For in the meeting together and advice of a greater number, the management of these matters will be carried out better.

All these stewards will be required necessarily to reside in the controlling monastery, since they should also be monks, and never on any pretext take up residence outside it, unless [p. 115] one of them has to go out to one of the properties outside for some necessary and unavoidable cause. If however the superior from time to time finds any monk among those in the associated monasteries worthy of being appointed to one of these stewardships, and if it is decided that this should be done, this also will be carried out after a joint gathering and decision of the aforementioned monks. However the successive stewards of the monasteries will each live in the monastery of which he is the steward.

[65. Inventory of Properties]

Since various properties have been assigned to this monastery both by my own majesty and by the lady my dearly beloved wife of blessed memory, those from my majesty are:⁸⁶

In the village of Diabenetoi the estate of Anthemiotes and the estate of Kostomyres, the estate Kottabos together with its hostel

In the village of Ta Mintou an estate called that of Kiboulios and the other estate called that of

28. PANTOKRATOR

Kyklobios or of Kamytzes

The property of Monomachatos in Daonion, his estate called that of Tornikios and his other estate called Auzizin

The house of Seth in Rhaidestos with its rental property also

The house of Nestongos with its two hostels and fields, also the vineyards which he possessed outside this town

The estate of Agelastos

The village of Melandros

The estate Kryon Neron

The estate of Morochartzanes bought from the monastery of Kanchres

The village Achnistai [p. 117]

The estate of the eparch in the district⁸⁷ of Pamphilon and the estate St. Theodore

The two aulai of Triakontaphyllos inside the fort of Panion, of which one is at the gate of Polydrion and the other at the shore

The village Psychron Pegadin

The estate Zapechonion

The village Madytos which the Alakasseis occupied

The estate St. Blasios in the district of Apros

The village of Marmaras

The village Leuke

The pronoia of the late Synadenos situated in Hexamilion in the market of Brachionion

The maritime rights of the market of Brachionion with the fishing grounds

The village Thrymbakin with the dependent peasants subject to strateia settled there and the estate in it

The estate Limnin

The estate Platanin

The village Boupi

The village of Gregoras

The estate Kinsterna

The village Armoukomis

All the salt works in the Chersonesos [p. 119]

TWELFTH CENTURY

The whole Jewish quarter in the market of Koila in the Chersonesos and the tithes on the wines

The whole market of Madytos apart from the strateiai

The whole property of Alousianos which is in this market, that is his house, his rental property, his gardens and bathhouse with the cultivated areas there and vineyards, his estate St. George of Melos, the estate St. Demetrios, his other estate Kochlakea, his estate Kareon, the estate Sthlaboi, the two villages subject to the strateia—that is the village Daphne and the village Damon together with the dependent peasants of Alousianos settled there

The episkepsis of Dadouna and that of Tzoubakos just as they were transferred to the treasury by sequestration⁸⁸

The episkepsis of the Kaminia which passed to the treasury as a result of an obligation to the state and was transferred from it by exchange and gift to the monastery

The village Loxadi

The village of Kanikleion which is near it

The village of Megalebos

The village Mixis with its ford

The village of Dabroboulos

The village Poumoud...

The episkepsis of Kypsella and the fort of Kypsella itself

The episkepsis of Ialoukos along with the ford of the river Maritza

The episkepsis of Pareuria just as it came to my majesty by gift of sebastos Botaneiates and by the purchase of the daughters of the sebastos cousin of my majesty, the monk Lord John,⁸⁹ the son of the late sebastokrator [p. 121]

The property St. John of Chalkeus bought from Antzas

The property of Ma..... and Malon along with the hostels in Kypsella, bought from the monastery of Psychosostes

The property Itea bought from Kourtikios

The estate of Lykos bought from Synadenos

The village of Koxes..... in the district of Popolia

The village Ta Adriana

The village Tzerkoubitzianes

The village upper and lower Blaktista with Neochorion

The estate of Theodoritzes, sthlabopolos of my majesty, called Kodoneianes along with the mills on it

28. PANTOKRATOR

The village Orniales

The house of the same Theodoritzes which is in Christoupolis and its vineyards

The *praitorion*⁹⁰ in Christoupolis near the shore along with the rental property around it

The village P..... that is Neobolianes bought by the treasury through the agency of the bureau epi ton oikeiakon from the grandson of the late sebastos Eumathios along with the mills in it

The fort Panakas

The new episkepsis at Thessalonike as it was handed over by Galaton with the rest of its rights

The ownership of the water running down from Chortaites with the conduit and the mills operating in Thessalonike

The building-site (?)⁹¹ inside the city of Thessalonike bought from Kakodikos and Karbeas

The confraternity⁹² of Krambeas with its two bathhouses, rental property, and other rights

The estate called St. Galaktere which passed to the monastery by gift from some people of Thessalonike [p. 123]

The episkepsis in Berroia which passed to my majesty by gift from sebastos Lord Manuel Botaneiates with its pastures and other rights

The property of Machetarios in Mytilene

The property of Kapsex in Kos with the episkepsis of Drosos and that of the monk Christodoulos

The taxes from the metropolis of Patras

The taxes from the episcopate of Methone

Four hyperpyroi litrai from the taxes of the monastery of Molibotos

The house of Oumbertopolos

The house of Sarantenos

The monastery of Nossiai⁹³

The monastery of Monokastanon

The monastery of Anthemiou

The monastery of Medikariou

The monastery of Satyros together with all conditional and unconditional rights belonging to them⁹⁴

From my wife of a most blessed memory:

The episkepsis of Kodoneianes

The property of Skleraina in Diabenetoi with her rights in the village of Phlorios, the wharves, the maritime rights, and the fishing grounds.

TWELFTH CENTURY

The monastery of Bordai in Opsikion⁹⁵

The monastery of Galakrenai and the monastery of St. Horaiozele⁹⁶ which came to [the former] by epidosis together with all conditional and unconditional rights belonging to them

The house of Raoul [p. 125]

The house 1 of the metropolitan of Athens

The building-site (?) of Radenos

The building-site (?) of Ergodotes

The building-site (?) of Kamachon

The houses in Salibaria

And the whole territory of the monastery of Savior Pantokrator thus brought together from different acquisitions. I also wish that all these possessions be preserved in the keeping of the monastery forever inalienable.

However as for the cells⁹⁷ built close by this monastery for our dwelling and rest or those that will be built, after my death I wish . . .⁹⁸

[66. Rights to Unlisted Properties]

Since perhaps it is likely that either some of the possessions which have already passed to the monastery have by some chance been omitted in the present document or that the possessions which will pass to it later have not been mentioned here, this will not prejudice the right of the monastery to have secure possession of what rightly and truly belongs to it. So if in accordance with the intention of my majesty the possessions of the monastery are managed fittingly and irreproachably, thanks are due to the Pantokrator my Savior who showed his favor in increasing the possessions of the monastery and helping them gain a fitting improvement.

But if the contrary results in their case, which I pray does not happen, then my majesty will invoke the Pantokrator himself to put right what has been wrongly done and will apply itself with his help to bring about an improvement, because while my majesty still lives it will not bear seeing before its eyes our enterprise thus neglected and endangered. These plans and decisions have been made in accordance with what seemed to be for the benefit of the monastery and the places connected with it, and I wish that what has been decreed should, with God's help, be observed for ever unchanged.

[67. Typikon Subject to Emendation by the Founder]

If after this I were ever able to alter any of my present decisions because of a change in circumstances, it will be possible to do this in accordance with my wishes and the later regulations and alterations will have force once they are set down in writing. [p. 127] For permission has been granted to me by the divine Fathers, the ordinances of the church, and the requirements of the law to make regulations and act in the case of my own possessions just as I wish.

28. PANTOKRATOR

[68. Secret Testament of the Founder]

Since another document was drawn up by my majesty containing some of my wishes, which I wished to be sealed and deposited in the sacristy of the monastery, it will be kept there as long as I wish it to be protected in that way. But if at any time I should happen to die before my return, such being the chances of mortal life, then the document will be brought out from the sacristy and unsealed in the presence of the superior himself, the steward, the ecclesiarch, the archivist, the megas droungarios Nikephoros,⁹⁹ the protonotarios Constantine, the nephew of the metropolitan of Nikomedia when notice has been given to the most holy patriarch.¹⁰⁰ After this document has been unsealed and read, those who are mentioned in it will take care to act in every way according to its contents.

[69. Independent Status of the Monastery]

The monastery will be completely free and under no subjection, being subject to no authority, with no one having control over it, independent and self-governing, master and controller of itself, placed under no ecclesiastical control, or princely authority or any other governmental power, with sole claim on its own possessions and enjoying all of them with complete power and authority and with the regulation of inalienability observed in respect of all the things dedicated to it, whether properties or monasteries or any rights both secular and spiritual.

[70. Defender of the Monastery]

I wish this monastery to be respected, defended and supported first by my very dear son the basileus Lord Alexios and then in turn by the leading member of our family, not only that they should not take anything at all from the monastery but should drive away those who harass it from outside, enriching the Savior who generously repays such actions not only guiding their steps well in this life [p. 129] but also reimbursing them many times over in the judgment to come.

[71. Supplication to the Pantokrator]

But, O Savior, most high Pantokrator, Lord of mercy, Reflection of the Father's glory (Heb. 1:3), equal in honor with the Father and equal in power with the Spirit, Word of God, Wisdom and Might, who for our sakes wore our flesh and emptied thyself even as far as death on a cross for us (Phil. 2:7–8), bestowing salvation on us through thy precious blood (I Pet. 1:19; Eph. 1:7) accept this my small offering, if not like the sacrifice of Abel and the burnt offering of Abraham and the widow's money and whatever sacrifices there are pure and blameless before and after the law, yet as the repentance of the publican and the repayment by the chief tax-gatherer of what was defrauded many times over and the confession with contrition of Manasses.¹⁰¹ Bend thine ear with compassion to the anguished entreaties of our brothers and grant pardon to our transgressions. Accept those who are the living dead, half-separated from their bodies and half-dead, as suppliants of thy goodness begging for thy compassion on our behalf. Thou who waitest for our reform and repentance do not wish for the death of sinners (Ezek. 18:23). Furthermore I offer thee an acceptable advocate, that cannot be put to shame, the very fount of pity, the pure expiation, the refuge of mortals (Phil. 4:18; Rom. 3:25). For I am completing this holy habitation for the spotless and divine house of thy majesty. I pray thee, the compassionate one, accepting its confidently spoken entreaties, to grant us redemption from our sins, to keep the enterprise of our hands intact, to guide the souls of the monks towards thy saving will, strengthening the failings of their spirits and treating as an acceptable incense before thy goodness their penitent intercessions on their own behalf and ours (Phil. 4:18).

TWELFTH CENTURY

[72. Final Exhortation to the Monks]

What about you, my fathers and brothers? For now I shall address a few words to you also. You yourselves remember your own undertakings entered into in the presence of God and the angels, reckon up the promises made to God, shudder at the penalty laid down for their denial, bear in mind the rewards that are stored up for your labor, and taking to heart the mortification of human life that each one of you promised, desire to be rid of every earthly passion, setting aside all shouting, blaspheming, strife, and jealousy and acquiring the fruit of the Spirit, joy, [p. 131] love, peace, patience (Gal. 5:22), obedience, accepting as your master himself the one who receives from him your leadership and, like sheep their shepherd, following the leader of your souls to the life-giving pastures of salvation, being eager to obtain the inheritance of the chosen ones.

Remember also our wretchedness and, as you are able, beseech God for us. Pray also for the rulers now dead, for the parents of my majesty, for my very dear son the basileus Lord Alexios, for the most fortunate sebastokratores,¹⁰² for the rest of my very dear children,¹⁰³ and the whole world. May you keep the small flock of the Savior safe for me and may we all be kept safe by the gracious will of the Pantokrator.

The present rule of my own monastery of Christ Pantokrator was signed by my majesty in the month of October, of the fifteenth indiction, and of the six thousand six hundred and forty-fifth year [= 1136 A.D.].

John Komnenos in Christ our God a faithful emperor Born-in-the-Purple, and Emperor of the Romans.

Notes on the Translation

1. The title is not original, but the work of the eighteenth-century copyist of the manuscript from the Halki Theological School; the beginning of the document is missing, as it was also in the original typikon destroyed in 1934; see Gautier, "Pantocrator," p. 26, n. 1.
2. August 15, 1118, upon the death of his father Alexios I Komnenos (1081–1118).
3. Archaic references to the contemporary Turks, Patzinaks, Serbians, Hungarians and Bulgarians; see Gautier, "Pantocrator," p. 27, n. 5.
4. An allusion to the opposition to his accession to the throne staged by his sister Anna Komnene on behalf of her husband Nikephoros Bryennios.
5. The clergy assigned to services in the church of the Eleousa; see [30, [31] below.
6. The anticipated beneficiaries of the hospital [36] ff., and lepers' sanatorium [63] below.
7. Presumably the main church of the Pantokrator.
8. Michael the Archangel; for his chapel see [34], [35] below.
9. Psalms 3, 37 [38], 63 [64], 87 [88], 102 [103], and 142 [143].
10. The main entranceway to the naos of the church of the Pantokrator.

28. PANTOKRATOR

11. kathiste; cf. Laskarina Bouras, "Byzantine Lighting Devices," JÖB 32.3 (1982), p. 479.
12. Feast of the Transfiguration, August 6.
13. Feast of the Epiphany, January 6; feast of the Exaltation of the Cross, September 14.
14. Feast of the Annunciation, March 25.
15. Feast of the Presentation of the Lord, February 2; feast of the Birth of the Mother of God, September 8; feast of the Entry into the Temple, November 21.
16. Possibly January 30; see Gautier, "Pantocrator," p. 40, n. 38.
17. Feast of the Holy Apostles, June 29.
18. Feast of St. Philip, November 14.
19. Feast of the Dormition, August 15.
20. Alexios I Komnenos; see the additional commemorative provisions in [32], [44] below and in (27) Kecharitomene [71].
21. Anna Dalassena; see the additional commemorative provisions in [32] below and in (27) Kecharitomene [71].
22. Irene Doukaina Komnene, author of (27) Kecharitomene; see the additional commemorative provision in [32] below.
23. Irene of Hungary († August 13, 1134); see the additional commemorative provisions in [32], [35], [44] below and in (27) Kecharitomene [71].
24. John Komnenos († July 12, 1067), John's paternal grandfather, for whom see Gautier, "Obituaire," p. 248, and Varzos, Genealogia, vol. 1, pp. 49–57; he is also commemorated in (27) Kecharitomene [71].
25. Maria of Bulgaria, John's maternal grandmother, for whom see Gautier, "Obituaire," p. 248; she is also commemorated in (27) Kecharitomene [71].
26. Andronikos Doukas († October 14, 1077), John's maternal grandfather, for whom see Gautier, "Obituaire," pp. 248–49, and Polemis, The Doukai: A Contribution to Byzantine Prosopography (London, 1968), pp. 55–59; he is also commemorated in (27) Kecharitomene [71].
27. Isaac Komnenos, Alexios I Komnenos' brother, for whom see Gautier, "Obituaire," p. 249, B. Skoulatos, Les personnages byzantins de l'Alexiade (Louvain, 1980), pp. 124–30, and Varzos, Genealogia, vol. 1, pp. 67–79.
28. Eudokia (Dobrodeja Mstislavna), for whom see Gautier, "Obituaire," p. 249, and "Pantocrator," p. 42, n. 5.
29. Andronikos Komnenos, for whom see Gautier, "Obituaire," pp. 249–50, and Varzos, Genealogia, vol. 1, pp. 229–37; he is also commemorated in (27) Kecharitomene [71].
30. Eudokia Komnene; for whom see Gautier, "Obituaire," p. 251, and Varzos, Genealogia, vol. 1, pp. 254–59; she is also commemorated in (27) Kecharitomene [71].
31. Nikephoros Bryennios, husband of John's sister Anna Komnene; for whom see Gautier, "Obituaire," pp. 251–52; he is also commemorated in (27) Kecharitomene [71].
32. Nikephoros Katakalon Euphorbenos, husband of John's sister Maria Komnene, for whom see Gautier, "Obituaire," pp. 252–53; he is also commemorated in (27) Kecharitomene [71].
33. Adrian Komnenos (+ April 19, 1105), younger brother of Alexios I Komnenos, for whom see Gautier, "Obituaire," p. 253, and Varzos, Genealogia, vol. 1, pp. 114–18.
34. Zoe Doukaina, daughter of Constantine X Doukas, for whom see Gautier, "Obituaire," p. 253, and Polemis, Doukai, pp. 54–55.
35. Manuel Komnenos, brother of Alexios I Komnenos, for whom see Gautier, "Obituaire," p. 253, and Varzos, Genealogia, vol. 1, pp. 62–64.
36. Nikephoros Melissenos (+ November 17, 1104), husband of Eudokia Komnene, sister of Alexios I Komnenos, for whom see Gautier, "Obituaire," p. 253.
37. These three sisters of Alexios I Komnenos are: Eudokia Komnene, wife of Nikephoros Melissenos, for whom see Gautier, "Obituaire," p. 253, and Varzos, Genealogia, vol. 1, pp. 80–84; Maria Komnene, wife of Michael Taronites, for whom see Gautier, p. 253, and Varzos, pp. 64–67; and Theodora Komnene,

TWELFTH CENTURY

- wife of Constantine Diogenes, for whom see Gautier, p. 254, and Varzos, pp. 85–86.
38. Michael Doukas, oldest brother of John's mother Irene Doukaina, for whom see Gautier, "Obituaire," p. 254, and Polemis, Doukai, pp. 63–66; he is also commemorated in (27) Kecharitomene [71].
 39. Husband of Anna Doukaina (see below) and a supporter of the reform leader Leo of Chalcedon, for whom see Gautier, "Obituaire," p. 254, and (38) Kellibara I [12].
 40. Theodora Doukaina, youngest sister of John's mother Irene Doukaina, for whom see Gautier, "Obituaire," p. 255, and Polemis, Doukai, p. 75; she is also commemorated in (27) Kecharitomene [71].
 41. Anna Doukaina, a younger sister of John's mother Irene Doukaina, for whom see Gautier, "Obituaire," p. 255, and Polemis, Doukai, pp. 74–75.
 42. Second week before the beginning of the Great Lent.
 43. The week immediately preceding the Great Lent.
 44. Kamytzes, Stypeiotes, and perhaps also Dekanos were courtiers of Alexios I Komnenos; the others mentioned here are otherwise unknown; see Gautier, "Obituaire," pp. 255–57, and "Pantocrator," p. 44, nn. 24–28.
 45. The monastery's designated protector [70], who died in 1142; see the additional commemorative provisions in [32], [35], [44] and [72] below.
 46. John's youngest son, the future emperor Manuel I Komnenos (1143–80); see also [72] below.
 47. Their dates of birth are unknown; see Gautier, "Obituaire," p. 260. There is an additional provision for their commemoration in [72] below.
 48. For this individual, see Gautier, "Obituaire," pp. 260–62.
 49. Fast of the Holy Apostles, from Monday after the feast of All Saints (Sunday after Pentecost) through the vigil of the feast of Sts. Peter and Paul, June 28.
 50. Fast of St. Philip, from November 15 until Christmas.
 51. The meaning of the obscure term neura is provided by Eustathios of Thessalonike, who identifies them with ktenia; see Ph. Koukoules, ed., Thessalonikes Eustathiou ta laographika, vol. 2 (Athens, 1950), p. 254. On the word ktenion, the demotic form of kteis, i.e., "scallop," see Demetrakos, Lexikon, s.v. ktenion.
 52. Feast of the Forty Martyrs, March 9.
 53. One of the many absentee bishops nominally assigned to dioceses overrun by the Turks who were resident in Constantinople.
 54. diaita refers to a daily allowance for food and drink, which in the case of the superior differs from that of the monks.
 55. An imperial monastery founded by Leo VI (886–912) located in a port on the Asiatic coast of the Sea of Marmora; see Gautier, "Pantocrator," p. 68, n. 18.
 56. A monastery located somewhere on the Asiatic coast used as a place of imprisonment by Romanus I Lekapenos (920–944); see Gautier, "Pantocrator," p. 68, n. 19.
 57. A monastery in the Asiatic suburbs, probably south of Anadolu Hisar, that was founded by Alexios Mousele, son-in-law of the emperor Theophilos (829–842); see Gautier, "Pantocrator," p. 70, n. 20.
 58. Probably near Chalcedon. See Gautier, "Pantocrator," p. 70, n. 21.
 59. Monastery of uncertain identification in the vicinity of Chalcedon; see Gautier, "Pantocrator," p. 70, n. 22.
 60. Monastery on the Asiatic shore opposite the Princes' Islands founded by Patriarch Ignatios in 873–774; see Gautier, "Pantocrator," p. 71, n. 23.
 61. esomonitai, resident recipients of support from a monastic foundation; sometimes these are lay appointees—see Alexios I Komnenos, De jure patriarchae circa monasteria (JGR 3.409).
 62. exomonitai, non-resident recipients of support from a monastic foundation; they could also be laymen in some situations.
 63. Andrew, archbishop of Crete; see Beck, KTL, pp. 500–502, and Gautier, "Pantocrator," p. 76, n. 10.

28. PANTOKRATOR

64. Obscure reference; see Gautier, "Pantocrator," p. 77, n. 12.
65. For this and other numismatic terms in the typikon, see Frolow, "Noms de monnaies" and especially Hendy, Coinage, pp. 26–38.
66. Those described in [31] above.
67. See discussion of this document in [68] below.
68. losnikion; a word of Slavic origin denoting a blanket made of goat's hair or skin. See Gautier, "Pantocrator," p. 84, n. 2.
69. For the preparation and medicinal purposes of rose-water, oxymel, the liquid of Diospolis, and sour grape juice with honey, see Gautier, "Pantocrator," p. 94, nn. 27–30.
70. kampanos: a balance for gross weighing; see G. Vikan, "Steelyard," ODB, p. 1947.
71. oinanthion; aromatic oil made from the flower of the wild vine. See Demetrakos, Lexikon, s.v. oinanthe.
72. kaukopinakia; see Demetrakos, Lexikon, s.v. kaukion, and Kriaras, Lexiko, s.v. kaukin.
73. psychrokauter; for this surgical instrument, see Gautier, "Pantocrator," p. 95, n. 36.
74. artomeli; see Demetrakos, Lexikon, s.v.
75. The theriac was an antidote to poison; the Mithridate was a medication attributed to Mithridates VI King of Pontus and transmitted by Galen; see Gautier, "Pantocrator," p. 95, n. 40.
76. pyria; see Gautier, "Pantocrator," p. 96, n. 43.
77. eligma (ekleigma); see Gautier, "Pantocrator," p. 96, n. 44.
78. hepsema; see Gautier, "Pantocrator," p. 96, n. 45.
79. Tentative translation of the otherwise unattested oinokolle.
80. katastaton.
81. Tentative translation of the otherwise unattested tremousa (lit. "shaking," "wiggling").
82. chouspe (or chouspa?); the meaning of this otherwise unknown term is surmised from the context.
83. For this foundation, see Janin, Géographie, vol. 3, p. 311. It was used as a place of burial for indigents.
84. hiera nosos; as already noted by Gautier, "Pantocrator," p. 110, n. 5, starting with the patristic age, this phrase no longer applied to epilepsy but to leprosy.
85. Gautier, "Pantocrator," p. 112, n. 6, proposed Romanos I Lekapenos as the founder of this philanthropic institution.
86. For a prosopographical and topographical commentary on this chapter, see Gautier, "Pantocrator," pp. 114–25.
87. petiton; on this territorial unit, see Gautier, "Pantocrator," p. 116, n. 9.
88. schideumos: "seizure for debts." See Gautier, "Pantocrator," p. 119, n. 20.
89. According to Gautier, "Pantocrator," p. 119, n. 22, this is the monastic name of Adrian Komnenos, son of Alexios I Komnenos' brother Isaac the sebastokrator, who had been named archbishop of Bulgaria ca. 1140.
90. The reference may be to an "inn." For this meaning of praitorion, see C. G. Pitsakes, Konstantinou Armenopoulou Procheiron Nomon e Hexabiblos (Athens, 1971), p. 32.
91. oikostasion; not in the dictionaries.
92. diakonia; for which see M. C. Bartusis-A. Cutler, "Confraternity," ODB, p. 494.
93. For these dependencies, see [27] above.
94. somatika kai asomata dikaia; see H. Glykatzi-Ahrweiler, "La concession des droits incorporels. Donations conditionnelles," Actes du 12^e Congrès international d'Études byzantines, vol. 2 (Belgrade, 1964), pp. 103–14.
95. This is evidently an additional dependency contributing to Pantokrator's endowment; the monastery is attested in the late eighth century when its superior Theophylact attended the Second Ecumenical Council of Nicaea (787); see Gautier, "Pantocrator," p. 123, n. 38.
96. Not otherwise known, but evidently a dependency of the monastery of Galakrenai, which was itself now a dependency of Pantokrator; see [27] above.
97. Presumably a reference to a private residence for the founder; cf. (13) Ath. Typikon [6], (27)

TWELFTH CENTURY

- Kecharitomene* [4], [79] and (29) Kosmosoteira [115]. Given the author's dislike of kelliotic monasticism (see [28] above), he may have intended for these cells to be torn down after his death, as his uncle Isaac Komnenos foresaw being necessary for his own private residence in (29) Kosmosoteira [115] if it should cause "some harm or disturbance to the monastery."
98. A lacuna occurs here in all of the surviving manuscript witnesses; Gautier, "Pantocrator," p. 124, n. 42, reckoned that there was at least one folio missing here from the original manuscript.
99. As Gautier, "Pantocrator," p. 126, n. 46, suggested, possibly Nikephoros Komnenos, John's uncle and Alexios I Komnenos's youngest brother, for whom see Varzos, Genealogia, vol. 1, p. 119.
100. At the time this typikon was issued, the patriarch would have been Leo Styppes (1134–43); John II Komnenos died on April 8, 1143, in the midst of a patriarchal interregnum.
101. Cf. Gen. 4:8 and 22:13; Mark 12:42; Luke 18:13 and 19:2; II Chron. 33:12.
102. John's other sons Andronikos, Isaac, and Manuel; see [8] above.
103. John's daughters Maria, Anna, Theodora, and Eudokia; see [8] above.

Document Notes

- [1] Performance of the canonical hours. See comparable provisions for the performance of matins and the midnight office in (4) Stoudios [2], [A4], [11], [12], [18], [A36]; (20) Black Mountain [15], [16], [17], [18]; (22) Evergetis [6] and related documents.
- [2] Incenses. See comparable provisions in (4) Stoudios [A2] and in (22) Evergetis [6] and related documents.
- [3] Chants and prayers in honor of the emperors. There are analogous provisions in honor of the Norman rulers of Sicily in (25) Fragala [C3], [C4].
- [4] Order of precedence. Note that the honor of the priesthood outranks even high office in the monastery.
- [5] Other instructions. See the role assigned to choir organizers in (4) Stoudios [18]; according to [19] below, the specialist singers were not allowed to perform outside the monastery.
- [6] Illumination of the main church on ordinary days. See comparable provisions in [29] and [34] below for the foundation's other two churches, in [53] below for the chapels in the hospital, and in (27) Kecharitomene [66], [68], (34) Machairas [26], and (48) Prodromos [10]. (23) Pakourianos [33B] has a list of lighting devices.
- [7] Illumination of the main church on feast days. See comparable provisions in (27) Kecharitomene [59], [61], [63].
- [8] Liturgical offerings and commemorations. See also [32], [44], [72] below and comparable provisions for members of the imperial family in (27) Kecharitomene [34], [71] and (29) Kosmosoteira [54].
- [9] Regulations for dinner. For the requirement of a common table, see also (10) Eleousa [13] and (27) Kecharitomene [44]. For the ban on secret eating, see also (20) Black Mountain [24], [72]; (22) Evergetis [9], [22]; (23) Pakourianos [4]; (27) Kecharitomene [49]; (29) Kosmosoteira [23], [47]; (30) Phoberos [23], [41]; (31) Areia [T3], (32) Mamas [20]; (33) Heliou Bomon [20]. For deference in seating precedence, see the generally stronger provisions in (22) Evergetis [9], (27) Kecharitomene [42], (29) Kosmosoteira [22], (30) Phoberos [22], (31) Areia [T3], (32) Mamas [36], (33) Heliou Bomon [36], and (34) Machairas [64]. For the second sitting for food servers, see also (27) Kecharitomene [45], (32) Mamas [17], and (33) Heliou Bomon [17].
- [10] Care of sick monks. See comparable provisions in (22) Evergetis [41], (23) Pakourianos [28], (27) Kecharitomene [57], (29) Kosmosoteira [61], (30) Phoberos [56], (32) Mamas [34], (33) Heliou Bomon [33], and (34) Machairas [108].
- [11] Regulations for supper. See comparable provisions in (4) Stoudios [29], (22) Evergetis [9], (29) Kosmosoteira [24], (30) Phoberos [24], and (34) Machairas [66].
- [12] Dietary regulations. See comparable provisions in (22) Evergetis [10] and related documents, (20) Black Mountain [34] ff., (23) Pakourianos [10], and (43) Kasoulon [2], [3], [5], [9].

28. PANTOKRATOR

- [13] Clausturation and abstention from bathing during Lent. See also [15] below and provisions in (7) Latros [6] and (31) Areia [T3].
- [14] Honor and respect due to the superior. See the very similar provisions in (32) Mamas [24] and (33) Heliou Bomon [24]; cf. (22) Evergetis [16] and related documents.
- [15] Bathing permitted except during fasts. See also [13] above and (22) Evergetis [28], (27) Kecharitomene [58], (29) Kosmosoteira [97], (31) Areia [T3], (32) Mamas [28], and (33) Heliou Bomon [28].
- [16] Reception of postulants. See the generally more detailed provisions in (22) Evergetis [37] and related documents; (23) Pakourianos [25]; (24) Christodoulos [A6]; (25) Fragala [A8], [B8]; and (27) Kecharitomene [30], [54].
- [17] Entrance gifts not required. See similar provisions in (22) Evergetis [37] and related documents, and in (27) Kecharitomene [7].
- [18] Entry forbidden to women. See similar provisions in (22) Evergetis [39], (23) Pakourianos [23], (24) Christodoulos [A10], (29) Kosmosoteira [84], (30) Phoberos [55], (32) Mamas [27], (33) Heliou Bomon [27], and (34) Machairas [115]; cf. (27) Kecharitomene [84]. Moreover, (26) Luke of Messina [3] implies a ban on women.
- [19] Number and responsibilities of the monks. For regulations of numbers, see also provisions in (23) Pakourianos [6], (27) Kecharitomene [5], (29) Kosmosoteira [48], (30) Phoberos [42], (31) Areia [M4], (32) Mamas [5], (33) Heliou Bomon [5]; cf. (22) Evergetis [23], which declines to set a fixed number.
- [20] Confession to the superior. See similar provisions in (22) Evergetis [7], [15]; (29) Kosmosoteira [16], [17]; (30) Phoberos [14], [35]; (32) Mamas [29], [30]; (33) Heliou Bomon [29], [30]; and (34) Machairas [50], [141].
- [21] No overnight absences. A strict provision not found in other regulations for male monasteries.
- [22] Communal provision of clothing. See similar provisions in (20) Black Mountain [75], (22) Evergetis (25), (23) Pakourianos [9], (27) Kecharitomene, (29) Kosmosoteira [52], (30) Phoberos [44], (31) Areia [T4], and (34) Machairas [102], [103].
- [23] Superior's discretionary authority. (22) Evergetis [26] and related documents concede discretionary authority to the superior in dietary regulations.
- [24] Election of the superior. See different provisions in (10) Eleousa [15], [16]; (22) Evergetis [13]; (23) Pakourianos [5]; (24) Christodoulos [A18]; (26) Luke of Messina [11], [12], [13]; (27) Kecharitomene [1]; (29) Kosmosoteira [12], [32]; (30) Phoberos [35]; (31) Areia [M7], [T10]; (32) Mamas [1]; and (33) Heliou Bomon [1].
- [25] Installation of the superior. See also provisions in (22) Evergetis [13], (27) Kecharitomene [11], (29) Kosmosoteira [33], (32) Mamas [1], and (33) Heliou Bomon [1].
- [26] Privileges of the superior. This is a rejection of the principle of equal food and drink for all monks found in (22) Evergetis [26] and related documents.
- [27] Revenues of the dependent monasteries. For identifications of these institutions, see Gautier, "Pantokrator," p. 68, nn. 18, 19, p. 69, nn. 20–22, and p. 70, n. 23. They are also listed in the inventory in [65] below, along with an additional dependency of Bordai in the theme of Opsikion.
- [28] Constitutions of the dependent monasteries. Cf. the less tolerant treatment of a kelliotic dependency in (33) Heliou Bomon [26].
- [29] Church of the Mother of God Eleousa and its lighting. See comparable provisions above in [6] for the main church, [34] below for the church of St. Michael, and [53] below for the hospital chapels.
- [30] Clergy stationed in the Church of the Eleousa. This facility is staffed with a corps of imperial clergy such as had existed in Byzantium since the late ninth century, when one such group staffed Basil I's (867–886) Nea Basilike; see my Private Religious Foundations in the Byzantine Empire (Washington, D.C., 1987), pp. 136–37, cf. 225.
- [31] Duties of the clergy in the Church of the Eleousa. Cf. the provision in (29) Kosmosoteira [7]. The commemorations are in addition to those provided for in [8] above and [44] below.

TWELFTH CENTURY

- [32] Remunerations of the clergy of the Eleousa. See also provisions in (19) Attaleiates [33], 35.
- [33] Liturgical ritual of the church of the Eleousa. See comparable provisions for the church of St. Michael in [35] below.
- [34] The Church of St. Michael and its lighting. See comparable provisions above in [6] for the main church and in [29] for the church of the Eleousa.
- [35] Liturgical ritual of the Church of St. Michael. See comparable provisions for the church of the Eleousa in [33] above.
- [36] Establishment of a hospital. See a similar provision for a public hospital in (39) Lips [50], [51]. The chapter headings employed in our translation are listed below to facilitate reference:
- [37] Bedding and clothes for the sick.
- [38] Medical personnel.
- [39] Doctors.
- [40] Primikerioi.
- [41] The infirmarian and the superintendent.
- [42] Exhortation to the hospital staff.
- [43] Service personnel.
- [44] Commemorations.
- [45] Allotments for the sick and for service personnel.
- [46] Bathing of the sick.
- [47] Washing and cooking utensils.
- [48] Doctors assigned to the monastery.
- [49] Allotment of supplies for the infirmarian.
- [50] Allotment of supplies for the superintendent.
- [51] Miscellaneous dispositions for the hospital.
- [52] Salaries of hospital staff.
- [53] Allocation of other sums.
- [54] Doctors not to undertake outside work.
- [55] Teacher of medicine.
- [56] Cemetery of Medikariou.
- [57] Standards of measurement.
- [58] Establishment of an old age home. See a similar provision for old age homes in (16) Mount Tmolos [1] and (29) Kosmosoteira [70]. The chapter headings employed in our translation are listed below to facilitate reference:
- [59] Allowances of residents of the old age home.
- [60] Transfer of the sick to the hospital.
- [61] Appointment of an infirmarian.
- [62] Allowances for the orderlies.
- [63] Establishment of a lepers' sanatorium. See the special study of this unit of the foundation by Philipsborn, "Hiera nosos."
- [64] Responsibilities of the stewards. Separate stewards to administer monastic dependencies are also found in (9) Galesios [221], [244]; In (17) Nikon Metanoieite [11] and (34) Machairas [86] there are two stewards.
- [65] Inventory of properties. See other inventories of immovable properties in (19) Attaleiates [INV 9] and (27) Kecharitomene, Appendix A, (35) Skoteine [31] ff., (37) Auxentios [17] (missing), (39) Lips [44] ff., and (57) Bebaia Elpis [121] ff.
- [66] Secure possession of unlisted properties. See Gautier, "Pantocrator," p. 22, for a possible example of one such property.
- [67] typon subject to emendation by the founder. See similar provision in (27) Kecharitomene [3]; cf. (23) Pakourianos [5], in which this authority is denied to the superior.

28. PANTOKRATOR

- [68] Secret testament of the founder. For other secret testaments, see (14) Ath. Testament [3]; (24) Christodoulos [B]; (29) Kosmosoteira [1], [96], [116]; (51) Koutloumousi [C11]; and (52) Choumnos [A3].
- [69] Independent status of the monastery. See similar provisions in (10) Eleousa [18]; (22) Evergetis [12] and related documents; (23) Pakourianos [18]; (24) Christodoulos; and (31) Areia [M11], [T12].
- [70] Defender of the monastery. See similar provisions in (27) Kecharitomene [3], (32) Mamas [3], (33) Heliou Bomon, and (34) Machairas [160].
- [71] Supplication to the Pantokrator. See similar requests for heavenly assistance in (10) Eleousa [14], (19) Attaleiates [7], [15], and (29) Kosmosoteira [119].
- [72] Final exhortation to the monks. See similar provisions in (22) Evergetis [42] and related documents.

29. Kosmosoteira: Typikon of the Sebastokrator Isaac Komnenos for the Monastery of the Mother of God Kosmosoteira near Bera

Date: 1152

Translator: Nancy Patterson Ševčenko

Edition employed: L. Petit, “Typikon du monastère de la Kosmosotira près d’Aenos (1152),” IRAIK 13 (1908), 17–75, with text at 19–75.¹

Manuscript: Copy executed by Elias Tsitelis (before 1904) from a codex of the late sixteenth century

Other translations: None

Institutional History

*A. Career of the Founder*²

Isaac Komnenos was born in 1093, the sixth child of Alexios I Komnenos and Irene Doukaina Komnene. In 1118 he supported his eldest brother in securing the throne as John II Komnenos (1118–43) against the opposition of their sister Anna Komnene. He became patron of the Chora monastery in Constantinople and was responsible for a substantial reconstruction of the church.³ According to his account in (29) Kosmosoteira [89], he originally intended to be buried there, and a suitably elaborate tomb was prepared for the purpose. He was also a patron of the arts at this time, having commissioned a deluxe octateuch now in the library of the Seraglio in Istanbul.⁴ Isaac quarreled with the new emperor in 1122 or early 1123, and went into voluntary exile for the next fourteen years.⁵ During this period he visited the Holy Land, where he paid for the construction of an aqueduct for the benefit of a monastery of St. John the Forerunner near the Jordan River.⁶ Isaac’s repeated attempts to gain support from neighboring rulers for an alliance against his brother met with no success. He was reconciled with John II in 1136.⁷

After a brief period of good relations, Isaac began to intrigue against John II again, and was banished to Herakleia in Pontos, where he was to be found at the emperor’s sudden death in a hunting accident in 1143.⁸ After John II’s son Manuel I Komnenos (1143–80) was able to secure the throne, he recalled his uncle from exile. Isaac next appears at his patrimonial estate at Thracian Bera when he began the composition of his typikon in 1152. As he indicates below in (29) Kosmosoteira [5], it was Isaac’s intention to donate virtually his entire estate to the monastery. According to the author, his role was as “restorer” of this foundation [5], implying that there was once an earlier facility on the site, but the foundations of the monastery church that is preserved on the site are of the twelfth century. At the time when the typikon was concluded, there were still auxiliary facilities that had not yet been completed, including the burial chapel for the monks [118] and possibly also the cistern [73], cf. [113]. The date of Isaac’s death is unknown, but a large, broken marble slab, now in the Episcopal Museum in Alexandroupolis, preserves an epigraphical inscription that may have been composed for his tomb.⁹

29. KOSMOSOTEIRA

B. Subsequent History of the Foundation in Byzantine Times

Thirty years after the date of the typikon, Isaac's son became emperor as Andronikos I (1183–85). This talented but brutal ruler visited the monastery of Kosmosoteira in 1183 to pay his respects at his father's grave.¹⁰ The monastery may well have been confiscated by the government of Isaac II Angelos (1185–95), who led a successful revolt against Andronikos I, but who was arrested and blinded at the monastery in 1195 at the orders of his own brother Alexios III Angelos (1195–1203).¹¹

After the conquest of Constantinople by the Fourth Crusade, the monastery was awarded to Geoffrey Villehardouin, author of the famous history of that crusade.¹² The locality did not long remain in Latin hands, but was conquered by the Bulgarian ruler Kalojan (1197–1207) in 1205. It was back under Greek rule by the time the Nicaean Emperor John III Vatatzes (1221–54) stopped at the monastery in 1246.¹³

In the later Palaiologan era, the monastery had become a fortified site and, like many imperial monasteries, an occasional place of imprisonment.¹⁴ In 1341, the then rebel and future emperor John VI Kantakouzenos (1347–54) found the monastery defended by its monks and a group of peasants.¹⁵ The monastery had been abandoned by its monks by the time of Kantakouzenos's abdication in 1354.¹⁶

C. Conversion of the Church to a Mosque in Ottoman Times

The Turks conquered Bera in the second half of the fourteenth century, either in 1357 or (more likely) in 1371/72.¹⁷ The old monastery is mentioned again in 1433, when Bertrandon de la Broquière visited the site.¹⁸ A Turkish town of some size had already grown up around the fortified citadel that stood on the site of the former religious foundation, the church of which had already been converted into a mosque. Another traveler, Robert de Dreux, who visited Bera in 1699, was also aware of the mosque's origins as a Christian church.¹⁹

D. Identification of the Site and Publication of the Typikon

Manuel Gedeon published the first excerpts from (29) Kosmosoteira in 1898.²⁰ The Russian scholar Theodore Uspensky's study of Isaac Komnenos' Seraglio Octateuch, published in 1907 for the Russian Archaeological Institute in Constantinople, interested him in identifying the location of Isaac's monastery. He identified the large mosque at the Turkish village of Feredjik, evidently once a Byzantine church, as the likely site of the foundation.

Feredjik was renamed Pherrai when this area of Thrace was assigned to Greece after the Balkan Wars of 1912–13. Earlier, during a brief period of Bulgarian rule over this area, the mosque was reconverted into a church, and the minaret was demolished along with most of the other structures dating from the Turkish era.²¹ The Greek Archaeological Service undertook structural repairs to keep the building from collapsing in 1926, and Anastasios Orlandos undertook a survey published in 1933.²² An inscription over the main door records the reconsecration of the church by Ioakeim, metropolitan of Alexandroupolis, in 1940.²³ Aside from the monastery church, certain fortifications, likely of the Palaiologan era or later, and some aqueducts survive on the site.²⁴

Gedeon left the production of the complete edition of (29) Kosmosoteira to Louis Petit, to whom he sent his working manuscript, a recent copy made by a journalist, Elias Tsitselis of the island of Kephallenia, of an older manuscript, once thought to be of the fifteenth century, which Tsitselis had found in the collection of Nicolas Pollanis, a local priest.²⁵ Petit was unable to obtain access to the older manuscript for his edition of (29) Kosmosoteira published by the Russian Archaeological Institute in Constantinople in 1908.

Analysis

This remarkable document takes its place among the reform typika of the Evergetian tradition even though the author, like his mother Irene Doukaina Komnene, found some of the egalitarian features of the reform movement not to his liking. Generally speaking, Isaac Komnenos assimilated the ideology and structure of the Byzantine reform monastery of the twelfth century to more familiar norms of traditional private patronage, which provided far fewer constraints on a founder's patronal prerogatives.

A. Use of the Model Typikon

Like (27) Kecharitomene, this is an Evergetian typikon. While it is necessary to sort the chapters of (27) Kecharitomene into entirely new analytic groups in order to appreciate the nature of its relationship to other Evergetian texts, (29) Kosmosoteira lends itself to a more straightforward division into five sections marked by differing degrees of originality and dependence on the model typikon.

1. Section One: Original Prefatory Materials

From the start, the author intended to employ the Evergetian model for his foundation. His identification [8] of his intended source, (22) Evergetis, is remarkably straightforward. His own regulations, chapters [1] through [12], in the first section of the typikon were intended only as a supplement to the Evergetian transcriptions that were to follow.

2. Section Two: Evergetian Transcriptions

The next section of the typikon, chapters [13] through [29], are, as the author himself declares, essentially transcriptions from (22) Evergetis, meant to serve as a guide for his own foundation in liturgical and dietary matters. These transcriptions are usually verbatim or nearly so; only at the end of [27] is there a significant addition by the author.

3. Section Three: Mixed Original and Evergetian Materials

The author indicates the conclusion of his quotations in [30] and claims that "what follows now are my own wishes." In actual fact, the author continues to rely heavily on (22) Evergetis through extensive quotations or paraphrases in this third section, chapters [30] through [61], which are intermixed with some of his own materials and another Evergetian typikon as well. This is an unusual technique; the authors of the two earlier documents dependent on (22) Evergetis, (30) Phoberos and (27) Kecharitomene, were considerably more deferential to the actual text of the model typikon, just as our author himself was in the previous section of his typikon. In this third section Isaac also seems to echo (though he does not actually quote from) his mother's typikon.²⁶ Our author uses this typikon, or perhaps some other Evergetian document such as the lost typikon of the Philanthropos monastery, to update the ideology of his own typikon. Thus we find a provision [45] for the emergency sale of movable property to other churches, an injunction [57] to preserve the cenobitic constitution even in extremis, a prohibition [58] of even profitable sales or exchanges of property, and a description [60] of procedures for safeguarding the treasury that are all to be found in (27) Kecharitomene but not in the earlier (22) Evergetis.

29. KOSMOSOTEIRA

4. Section Four: Idiosyncratic Original Materials

This section, from chapters [62] through [116], contains a large number of often quite brief chapters, apparently of the author's own composition. Only [81], in rejecting the right of monks to question their superior, seems to owe inspiration to (22) Evergetis [18], yet there is a great deal of repetition and clarification in this section, much of it resulting from the author's rethinking of certain provisions he copied out of or paraphrased from (22) Evergetis earlier in the document. In a more smoothly edited document like (30) Phoberos or his mother's (27) Kecharitomene, the author's personal preferences are folded into the appropriate places in the transcriptions from (22) Evergetis. Perhaps it was the author's illness [70] if not his approaching death that made a more orderly, conventional approach to the composition of an Evergetian typikon impossible.

5. Section Five: Justifications of Earlier Provisions

This last section, chapters [117] through [119], was apparently composed in response to a critique of the rest of the document, perhaps by the foundation's superior or even the entire community of monks. It has a noticeably defensive tone as the author defends his provision [117] of privileges for certain of his lay associates and his plans [118] for the burial of deceased monks.

6. The Immediate Model for the Document

Like John, the author of (30) Phoberos, Isaac Komnenos was a close copier of (22) Evergetis, certainly much more so than his mother in her (27) Kecharitomene, not to mention the authors of later documents in the Evergetian tradition. (30) Phoberos and (29) Kosmosoteira are frequently the only surviving typika to adopt some of (22) Evergetis' more archaic institutions, such as the latter's three treasurers. They frequently break down (22) Evergetis's long, unwieldy chapters in the same way, they draw upon their model in the same order, and in a few cases they even share the same chapter numeration (see Appendix C).

That (30) Phoberos, written either a little after or perhaps even before the final edition of (22) Evergetis, should be such a close copy of its model is hardly remarkable. What is surprising is that (29) Kosmosoteira should be such a close copy of (22) Evergetis too, and have so few detectable links (except those few chapters in Section Three) to (27) Kecharitomene. This curious set of relationships among these four documents suggests that there was a "vulgate" version of (22) Evergetis circulating during the twelfth century that was somewhat different from our present text of that important document. Hypothetically, it could be identified with either the "Lost Typikon" postulated earlier as the source of the post-Evergetian content of (27) Kecharitomene or perhaps some other link in the chain of reform typika stemming from the original (22) Evergetis.²⁷ Whatever its precise identity, it appears to have been the most likely model first for (30) Phoberos, and then later in a slightly updated version, for (29) Kosmosoteira.

B. Stages of Composition

Except perhaps for (19) Attaleiates, (29) Kosmosoteira claims honors for the worst job of editorship by its medieval author. Therefore, there are more traces than usual of the document's stages of composition. Repetitive treatments provide some important clues. There are at least twenty-five multiple treatments of regulatory topics: twenty doublets, seven triplets, and a quintuplet.²⁸

The chapters in Section One, the author's original prefatory materials, surely were composed first. These include a notice [8] of his intent to use (22) Evergetis and a chapter [10] that echoes that source. The composition of the chapters in Section Two, the Evergetian transcriptions, likely followed shortly thereafter. Much as the author promises in [8], there is little overlap of materials in these two sections.²⁹

The chapters in Section Three, those of mixed original and Evergetian derivation, were composed after some reflection on the provisions contained in the earlier sections. In this section the author returns to five topics he had addressed earlier in Section One.³⁰ A doublet of a topic addressed in this section for the first time³¹ indicates that the section was composed in at least two sittings, with a break someplace between [45] and [58]. Most likely the author broke off work on this section after the Evergetian quotation in [53] and resumed work on this section with [54], an original chapter .

Section Four is home to the largest number of repetitive treatments. Most of these are reconsiderations or reiterations of positions on topics first discussed in the previous sections of the typikon.³² Others show the author taking up new topics and then returning to them again in this same section.³³ These latter repetitions help to demonstrate that this section, like the previous one, was not composed in one sitting either. Rather, it appears that the author added chapters as he saw a need for them.

Three double treatments occurring in this section suggest a break in composition after [68] but before [72].³⁴ The wordings of the first sentences of [70] and [71] suggest that these chapters were products of individual work sessions. A doublet confirms a break between [71] and [76].³⁵ Perhaps the author resumed work with [72], with three more double treatments suggesting a break again sometime after [86] but before [91].³⁶ Judging from two later double treatments, there was apparently a final compositional break in this section after [97] but before [113].³⁷ The reading of the text suggests [100] as the most likely place for the author to have resumed work. Lastly, the author states in [115] that a regulation he provided in [113] was written "some time ago," indicating another compositional break. Thus the Fourth Section may well have taken seven sessions or more of writing to complete.

The Fifth Section of the typikon consists of three chapters, two of them justifications of earlier provisions.³⁸ These suggest that before the author composed this section, an earlier version of the typikon (or at least knowledge of its contents) had begun to circulate among the monastery's officials and perhaps also the monks, provoking the criticism that led to this response.

The evidence adduced above then indicates that Isaac Komnenos worked on (29) Kosmosoteira in no less than twelve work sessions, which supports Nancy Ševčenko's hypothesis of the incremental composition of this document.³⁹

C. Lives of the Monks

1. Number of Monks

Isaac Komnenos evidently changed his mind several times on the number of monks who should be supported at the monastery. Originally, he sets the [3] the number at fifty; they were to be assisted by another twenty-four servants. All were to be over thirty years of age, but later he lowers [49] the minimum age to twenty-four or to twenty-six (so [50]) for relatives and acquaintances of monks previously admitted. Eunuchs were banned, except [55] for donors of valuable property. The superior is told [3] to select monks “adorned with virtue, not ones vulgar and undisciplined and thoroughly without learning,” which may mean that the author expected that they be of upper-class origins. Subsequently, the author declares [48] his anticipation of a future increase in the number of monks, circumstances permitting; but under the influence of (22) Evergetis [23] he also endorses the idea of not exceeding the number of pious monks that happened to be available. Towards the end of the typikon, the author simply urges [88] the superior to “make haste to further increase” the number of monks in so far as the income of the foundation permits.

2. Liturgical Duties

All of the fifty monks were to be assigned [3] to the performance of hymnody in the church. The treatment of the canonical offices [13], [14], [15] follows the pattern established in (22) Evergetis [4], [5], [6] from which the author quotes with only minor changes. The author had heard reports of monks in other monasteries who neglected their hymnody, and not wanting that to happen here, provides [68] set hours for their awakening in winter and summer. Later, he makes [80] the superior responsible for seeing to it that the monks meet their responsibilities to the choir; only sickness could excuse an assigned monk from attendance.

There were processions on the most important feasts, at Easter [103] and on the patronal feast day of the Dormition of the Mother of God [65], cf. [10]. The other feasts of the Mother of God were also celebrated [9] with special solemnity.

3. Manual Labor

The servants’ performance of their duties was to be considered [81] “as a hymn to the Mother of God,” that is to say, of equivalent worth to the choir duties of the monks. The only specific responsibility mentioned is the obligation of some to serve [61], [70] as orderlies in the hospital. Although the author instructs [97] the superior to establish craftsmen inside the enclosure of the monastery to work on construction projects, these were likely a separate group of lay workers at the disposal of the monastery.

4. Length of the Novitiate

Isaac Komnenos provides [55] that there should be a novitiate of six months’ duration. Unlike the authors of other documents in the reform tradition, even (22) Evergetis [37], he chose not to make any distinction between distinguished (i.e., noble) applicants and others in the term of probationary service required. Relatives and acquaintances of monks already at the foundation were especially welcome; the author instructs [50] the superior to admit them “without hesitation or hindrance” provided they were at least twenty-six years old.

5. Sacramental Life

The monks’ sacramental life was patterned closely on the provisions of (22) Evergetis [13], including a “first and great confession” [18] at tonsure, daily confession [16] to the superior thereafter, and reception of the eucharist [14] at the superior’s discretion.

6. Cenobitic Lifestyle

The founder endorses [6] the cenobitic lifestyle, which he understood to mean in the first instance a common partaking of meals. Later in the typikon, paraphrasing (22) Evergetis [25], he also provides [52] for a communal supply of clothes (with specific items listed in [62]); an endorsement of the key provision of (22) Evergetis [26] providing for equality in food, drink and clothing for all follows [53] immediately afterward, backed up as in the model typikon by monthly visitations by the superior to the monks' cells to seize unauthorized belongings. In typical fashion for this author, there is a repetition [57] of the exhortation to the common life, which paraphrases a chapter of (22) Evergetis [42]. Substantial donors, however, may have been exempt (cf. [55]) from the requirement of communal residence.

7. Cohabitation of Older and Younger Monks

The author chooses [51] to revive the idea of (22) Evergetis [24] of placing monks two to a cell. After having been advanced by his model typikon, this idea had fallen out of favor in the twelfth century; (30) Phoberos [43], for example, suggested putting three monks in a cell. Perhaps the pairing facilitated the author's eagerness [50] to admit relatives and acquaintances of the monks (as their servants?). To avoid problems, the author declares [49] that no young men less than twenty-four years of age (twenty-six in [50]) should be admitted, even if they are relatives or friends. Doing the opposite he notes has been the cause of "many scandals and physical harm, antithetical to laws and canons." This had also been the opinion of the author of (30) Phoberos [58].

8. Servants

The author's use of (22) Evergetis [24] for placement of two monks in a cell pointedly omits the Evergetian ban on servants for the obvious reason that they are in fact permitted [3] in this foundation. Ten of the servants were assigned [61] to the foundation's infirmary.

9. Diet

Although he incorporates ([24] through [29]) the dietary regulations of (22) Evergetis [9], [10], [11], Isaac Komnenos also declares [6] that there will be a "bounteous supply" of food. Later in the typikon, he returns [63] to the subject to discuss the ordinary diet during non-fast days, thereby filling a gap in the model typikon, which was more concerned about special provisions for fasts and feasts. The founder also urges the superior to make cheap seasonal purchases of bulk quantities of oil and wine for use throughout the year.

10. Bathing

Originally it seems that Isaac Komnenos intended that the monks should use [97] the same bathhouse as was placed at the disposal of the general public for the monthly baths he allowed them to take. The superior could allow the sick unlimited access. Later, the founder evidently thought better of this arrangement. Towards the end of the typikon he announces [113] that, after his death, the monks should use another bathhouse that he had erected for his own "seasonal use and enjoyment." But like his own private residence, the founder provides that it should be torn down "if it should appear to be a liability to the monastery and [lead] to the monks being disturbed by powerful individuals" admitted to the monastery to worship the Mother of God.

11. Care of Sick Monks

Isaac Komnenos provides [61] that a “competent and proven” doctor be given “appropriate recompense and a salary” for caring for sick monks and other “ailing brethren” he has arranged to be hospitalized in the foundation’s old age infirmary (gerokomeion, for which see [70]). Eight [70] or perhaps ten [61] of the monastery’s servants would help the doctor care for the patients.

12. Burial

When Isaac Komnenos began his typikon, he had not yet completed the cemetery in which he proposes [54] to bury the foundation’s departed monks. There would be a funeral procession and proper burial for each. The founder trusted to the superior to know how to perform the funerary hymn (epitaphios). Except for certain favorites and a possible future benefactor willing to pay handsomely for the privilege of an exception, the author wished [86] to keep all burials outside the enclosure wall of the monastery. This proved to be an unpopular decision with the monks (they had been promised burial within the enclosure), and subsequently the author thought he had to explain [118] his change of plans. By that time, he had laid the foundations of a small chapel at his own preferred site near the bathhouse, and of a stone wall meant to enclose it. The superior was to finish the work if necessary, adding a mausoleum. Two monks would be stationed at the chapel for performing commemorative services.

D. Constitutional Matters

1. Independent and Self-Governing Status

Isaac Komnenos declares [12] that Kosmosoteira should be an independent monastery, never “subject to imperial, private or patriarchal authority” nor to any of his own heirs. In a damaged part of this text there appears to be an allusion to the charistike or perhaps some more recent scheme of institutional exploitation; the founder instructs the superior to avoid “this sort of damaging administration conducive to destruction.”

Later in the typikon, the author returns to the subject in a more legalistic chapter [31] that reflects some of the terminology in (22) Evergetis [12] but is actually closer to the longer, post-Evergetian formulation (cf. (30) Phoberos [33], (27) Kecharitomene [1], (28) Pantokrator [69], and (32) Mamas [4]) which explicitly bans future participation in the charistike, epidosis, and ephoreia among other schemes for institutional exploitation.

Isaac also notes that he has obtained [108] by patriarchal grant the ruined church of St. Stephen of the Aurelian at Constantinople, which, after having been restored by him, was now to serve as Kosmosoteira’s dependency, to be used as a temporary residence by monks visiting the capital city.

2. Leadership

The author appeals [31] to the emperor to assist the monks should they find themselves in difficulty in the future, but he refrains from designating him as the institution’s protector. In this important respect then the author was truer to Evergetian reform principles than either his mother Empress Irene Doukaina, the author of (27) Kecharitomene, or his brother, Emperor John II, the author of (28) Pantokrator.

Instead, in a pietistic gesture, Isaac designates [12] the Mother of God herself as protectress; guardian and ally for the protection (ephoreia) and assistance (epikouria) of the monastery. This meant in effect that the superior, in keeping with Evergetian principles, would be the real master of the foundation: “he has free rein over the administration of the monastery in all things.” Later, Isaac defines [31] this to include the enrollment and removal of monks in the foundation and the control of income and expenditure. Moreover, the superior was to have the right (if in full possession of his faculties at his death) to choose [12], by convocation and consultation of all the monks, his successor. Even if the superior were to resign, he would still have the right, with the help of the rest of the monks, to designate his successor.

As he does with many other topics, the author returns [32] to this one to expand on his earlier treatment. Here he takes his lead from (22) Evergetis [14], providing for a new superior to be chosen “without the influence of bribery or any heated voting,” preferably unanimously or at least by a vote of the “more important and eminent monks.” This second treatment of the issue represents the author’s attempt to reconcile the Evergetian tradition with his own ideas, which envisioned a more important role for the superior in choosing his own successor.

Later on in the typikon, Isaac Komnenos adds [78] the restriction that no outsider is to be chosen superior, but should be selected instead from among the monks of the brotherhood.

The superior’s installation ceremony was designed to emphasize [33] that the superior derived his authority ultimately from the typikon, which was placed with the pastoral staff on the altar.

3. Selection of Other Officials

The superior, in conjunction with “some distinguished” monks of the brotherhood, was to select [34] the steward by vote. He would then be installed in a ceremony cribbed from (22) Evergetis [13]. The monastery’s other officials were to be chosen [35] in the same way, then installed in office as in (22) Evergetis [29]. In the description of the other officials of the monastery, Isaac limits himself to those featured in the comparable chapters of (22) Evergetis, [30], [31], [34], namely the three treasurers [36], the disciplinarian and the refectorian [37], and the property administrators [40]. He does not draw on the more developed list of officials and duties found in his mother’s typikon, (27) Kecharitomene [19] through [29]. As in (22) Evergetis [38], the officials were to have lifetime tenure [38] unless they proved to be unfit.

4. Consultative Rule by the Superior

By sticking so closely to the example of (22) Evergetis [13], [14], [19], the author deliberately or otherwise revives the importance of the preeminent monks in such matters as the choice of the steward [34] and, if necessary, his deposition [41], and the witnessing of permitted alienations [45]. They were also to be responsible [78], along with the superior, for the security of the foundation’s inventory. There is no provision for removal of the superior. Following the lead of (22) Evergetis [18] which freed the superior from any financial accountability to his monks, Isaac was unwilling to allow [81] the monks to question the superior about anything, with the notable exceptions of his “desiring things that [could lead] to the ruin of the monastery” or if he should “think or act in secret” (i.e., fail to govern consultatively).

5. Patronal Privileges

Patronal privileges made for a subject dear to the author’s heart. During his own lifetime, Isaac

29. KOSMOSOTEIRA

Kommenos reserves for himself the right to appoint the superior [12] and, apparently, the steward [5]. Isaac lived at the foundation in his own residence, which he instructs [115] the superior to tear down after his death if it should become a nuisance because of travelers camping inside of it. Isaac also expected [89] to be buried in the monastery church, after his tomb had been packed up from its original site at the Chora church in Constantinople and shipped to the foundation at Kosmosoteira. The monks were to conduct [90] a daily service of propitiation at the tomb in the narthex. Isaac reminds the superior and monks no less than five times of their responsibility not to neglect his commemoration.⁴⁰ After all, he declares [11], “I did assign my own possessions and properties to the monastery and to them,” thereby reminding the superior and the monks of the essential patronal quid pro quo of the twelfth century. He was unwilling to allow [77] the monks to create a portrait of himself, however, since “to do so would be a condemnation of my wretched soul.” The icons at his tomb, however, were to be maintained [109] and restored if necessary.

Even the monastery’s independence is made conditional [12] on its employment of the founder’s secretary Michael and the retainer Leo Kastamonites. The former, said to have played an important role in the design of the foundation, was to be housed [107] by it within the enclosure of the monastery “as [though he were] an internal monk⁴¹ and a ward (thremma) of the monastery.”

Both Michael and Leo Kastamonites were to be buried in the church [107] cf. [54] and receive posthumous commemoration. Leo was to be reckoned as “an integral part” of the monastery which may mean that he too, like Michael, was to be considered as an internal monk.

The third special beneficiary was to be [107] the founder’s foster child Konstitzes. He too was to be a ward of the monastery. The founder also provides [110] him and Michael with the income from several villages for their maintenance. Like the latter, Konstitzes would eventually be buried [107], cf. [86] “in a special place of honor” in the monastery.

The founder attempts to clarify [117] these privileges towards the end of the typikon. The tone adopted suggests that the founder was trying to respond to objections raised (perhaps by the superior or some other representative of the foundation) to his indulgent provisions for his associates in [107]. To this end, he emphasizes the reciprocal nature of the relationship between his associates Michael and Leo on the one hand and the monastery on the other. The former are to “be of assistance and every support” to the latter “and look upon it and reckon it as something that lives in place of me.” As far as Konstitzes was concerned, the monastery was to pay maintenance to him until he reached the age of twenty-four and married.

So the answer to the question “Who would dare to send an imposed guest (katapemptos) to an independent monastery?” posed by the authors of (27) Kecharitomene [53] and (32) Mamas [26], is here “the founder” himself. Isaac Komnenos is careful, however, to exclude [107] Leo Kastamonites’ relatives from claiming his associate’s properties and possessions after his death. Presumably these were to be inherited by the monastery. Inheritance claims such as those foreclosed here may have been among the reasons founders more committed to reform principles than our author were anxious to eradicate the use of “imposed guests” (cf. (27) Kecharitomene [79]).

The founder’s parents, Alexios Komnenos and Irene Doukaina, were to be commemorated on the days of their deaths [54], cf. [95]. Two Jewish converts, Irene and an unnamed husband, were to continue to receive [93] from the foundation the cash and in-kind annuities originally provided to them by the founder in a promissory note. He also instructs the superior to honor other promissory notes that might be presented to him.

6. Reading of the Typikon and Security of Documents

Following (22) Evergetis [43], the founder provides [59] for a monthly reading of his typikon at mealtimes. The physical security of the typikon and other important documents was also a concern for the founder, as it was for other founders of the twelfth century. He clearly foresees [69] how an institution might lose valuable property titles by surrendering them to officials making inquiries into the monastery's rights and privileges. The typikon, the inventory, and property titles were to be kept [99] in a secure storehouse ([78] says in the sacristy); working copies authenticated by the local archbishop were to be used for ordinary purposes in their stead. Officials conducting investigations were to be supplied [69] with transcriptions of the relevant passages. The documents relating to the foundation's dependency of St. Stephen at Constantinople were also to be kept [108] in the sacristy at Kosmosoteira. Isaac Komnenos instructs [92] the superior to retrieve certain property titles from his counterpart at the Chora monastery, which suggests that the former had originally intended to donate the properties represented by these deeds to that monastery. The sacristy was also where Isaac expected to place [116] the sealed Gift and Grant Ordinance meant to serve as the final conveyance of his personal properties to the monastery.

E. Financial Matters

1. Financial Administration

Isaac Komnenos borrows from (22) Evergetis [13], [30], [34] to set up the financial administration for his foundation. The officials are the steward [34], the three treasurers [36], and the property administrators [40]. After his own death, he expected the superior, along with "some of the distinguished [monks] of the foundation," to select [34] a steward. The preeminent monks could join together to remove [41] an unfit steward, even one being protected by the superior. In keeping with the sentiments of his age, Isaac orders [46], cf. [36] that officials keep accurate records of the foundation's income and expenditures. He declines [57] to follow (22) Evergetis [42] in the latter's assertion that losses to the monastery through the carelessness of its officials were morally equivalent to outright theft or profiteering. His provisions [60] for a cash box jointly administered by the superior and certain of his financial administrators are shared with other post-Evergetian institutions in the reform movement. He likewise adopts another practice of twelfth-century founders (e.g., his mother the author of (27) Kecharitomene [24]) in providing [94] for a special reserve treasury to be used in the event of some calamity befalling the monastery.

2. Inalienability of Property

Isaac Komnenos makes use of (22) Evergetis [19] in asserting [45] the inalienability of his foundation's properties except under the usual calamitous circumstances such as a fire, earthquake, or destruction resulting from an enemy raid. He returns to this topic later in the typikon in order to prohibit [58] alienations again, even if "the price or equivalent value offered should be double, triple, or even ten times as much" as the property offered for sale or exchange (cf. (27) Kecharitomene [9]). The books donated by the founder and listed in the inventory were also to be included [106] in this ban on the alienation of property. Evidently a certain vineyard, then in dispute with a monastery dedicated to the Pantokrator, was considered a special case, for he provides [106] that the superior was to agree to a cash settlement and use the money to buy another useful property if Kosmosoteira's claim to the vineyard could not be vindicated.

29. KOSMOSOTEIRA

3. Entrance Gifts Not Mandatory

As in other reform monasteries, applicants for admission to Kosmosoteira were not to be obliged to make [55] a contribution (apotage) or offering (prosenexis) to secure entrance. As elsewhere, however, free-will gifts were acceptable, and such gifts, once made, could not be reclaimed by donors who subsequently chose to leave the monastery.

4. Other Sources of Income

The typikon contains [69] a list of consecrated immovable properties, including some atypical ones such as rights over annual fairs, a marketplace, and twelve ships exempt from cargo tax. Isaac Komnenos shows himself keenly alert to other possible sources of income for his foundation. He was willing to bend [86] his rule against burials within the monastery's enclosure to allow the burial of someone "who is very rich" in exchange for a sizable donation of movable and immovable property. Likewise, a very wealthy individual seeking tonsure was to receive [55] preferential admission and "dwellings suitable for his own habitation" in exchange for substantial donations. Isaac Komnenos foresees [103] the possibility of adding to the foundation's endowment of landed properties through subsequent purchases of neighboring villages. The public bathhouse [97] and the fisheries on the river Maritza [66] were certainly additional sources of income for the monastery; the bridges [67] the founder built for the convenience of travelers may have been too.

5. Provisions for Building Maintenance

Isaac Komnenos shared the concern of his mother, Irene Doukaina, the author of (27) Kecharitomene [73], for building maintenance. His foremost concern in this regard was the structural integrity of the monastery's church. The roof was to be retiled [79] as needed to avoid water damage to the adornment of the church. The monks were also to clean [82] the marble floor of the church daily. Should the building be destroyed by an earthquake or other calamity, the superior was to rebuild [102] it without delay, preserving the existing quality in color and material. The founder also provides for the maintenance or repair of the monks' dormitory and the old age infirmary [70], the cistern [73], cf. [113], the bridges [67], the peasants' church of St. Prokopios [104], and the dependency of St. Stephen [108] in Constantinople.

F. Overall Philosophy

1. Moral Integrity of the Foundation's Assets

The founder declares [2] that he has built this foundation in order to seek pardon for "innumerable sins," and that this was done "not out of the profits of injustice," but "at private expense." He also asserts [5] that the resources he has donated to the foundation are the result of lifetime labors and his "patrimonial inheritance, not "some unjust way of life." Later, he repeats this assertion, asserting [70] that "not one stone did I bring to the church without paying for it."

2. Acceptance of Privileges

To be sure, the author reproduces some of the egalitarian sentiments of his model, (22) Evergetis [9], [17], that can properly be seen as hostile to aristocratic privilege within the monastery. Among these are the condemnation [22] of quarrels about seating at meals which includes the violent language of its Evergetian equivalent, and the disclaimer [42] of noble birth or largess as qualifications for the superiorship. These bows to the rhetoric of the Evergetian tradition must be discounted in view of the founder's willingness to make [55] disciplinary concessions in return for substantial donations of landed or movable property. The extensive special privileges conceded by the founder to his lay associates Michael and Leo Kastamonites as well as to his foster-son Konstitzes (see especially [107]), while not necessarily compromising the cenobitic life of the monastery, still must be seen as counter-Evergetian revivals of the mores of traditional private patronage before the monastic reform.

G. External Relations

1. Canon Law and Relations with the Ecclesiastical Hierarchy

Isaac Komnenos continues the trend observable among founders of the twelfth century of showing increasing knowledge of and a certain amount of respect for the requirements of canon law. For example, he justifies [49] his exclusion of youths from the monastery by claiming that their admission is "antithetical to the laws and canons." Our author's willingness to establish cooperative relations with the ecclesiastical hierarchy was where the claims of canon law evidently had the greatest impact on him. As noted above, he recognizes [4], [32] the right of the archbishop of Traianoupolis to install the monastery's superior. This official is also charged [4] with preparing an official report on disputes between the superior and the monks that cannot be resolved internally. This was to serve to frame the dispute for resolution by the patriarch of Constantinople "in accordance with the canons." The same metropolitan was also to assist [41] the preeminent monks in counseling the superior to dismiss an unfit steward.

After some further reflection, the founder returns [111] to this subject late in the typikon. By then he thought it prudent to limit patriarchal authority explicitly to the mediation of disputes, "for I have not given to the patriarch any other authority or supervision over the monastery." Evidently Isaac had become worried that even partial recognitions of the perquisites of the ecclesiastical hierarchy might compromise his foundation's independence.

2. Institutional Philanthropy

Isaac Komnenos, claiming that he would "happily throw thrift to the wind when it comes to distributing to those in need," warns [87] the monks not to cite a lack of income as an excuse for not practicing almsgiving. Indeed, this document may be the first of our typika to take almsgiving so seriously as an institutional obligation, going considerably beyond the perfunctory charity found in earlier documents, even those in the reform tradition. Edible leftovers from the monks' "bounteous supply" of food were to be distributed [6] daily at the gate. Additional charitable distributions at the gate were to take place [9] on all feasts of the Mother of God; on the feast of the Dormition, some one hundred "brothers" were to be invited [10] into the monastery to partake in a special feast for which the founder provides detailed prescriptions. As usual in the Evergetian tradition, women were excluded [56] from the regular distributions but not from those on feast days. They were allowed [84] access to the church to worship and pray for the founder's soul three times a year.

There was also to be an old age home (gerokomeion) established [70] at the monastery, located inside the outer periphery wall. Isaac Komnenos provides [61] that a "competent and proven" doctor paid by the monastery was to be stationed there here to care not only for sick monks but also lay people, up to the institution's capacity of thirty-six patients. Ten ([70] says eight) of the monastery's servants would assist the doctor; an ordained monk assigned to a church established there would provide [70] religious services. Those patients who died at the infirmary would receive proper funerals and burials.

Isaac Komnenos also was proud of his abolition [114] of highway tolls along a road running near the monastery that belonged to him as a "paternal inheritance."

More than most of his contemporaries, Isaac Komnenos realized the necessary link between the financial resources dedicated to his foundation and the performance of the prescribed philanthropic activities. He asserts [96], however, that the former are "adequate for a reasonable reinforcement of my injunctions."

3. Relations with the Peasantry and Other Dependents

Isaac Komnenos' solicitude for the dependent peasantry, like his commitment to institutional philanthropy, goes considerably beyond the typical admonitions of his contemporaries that the institution's cultivators should not be treated unfairly. Claiming that the latter have "not been accustomed to unjust collections," he asserts [71] further that "it is senseless and unreasonable for a holy monastery such as this to be awarded to the Mother of God yet have the inhabitants who furnish its income be harmed or made miserable, in so far as this is unnecessary." This demonstrates a fairly keen social conscience for the times. He repeats [76] this line of argument later as justification for his admonition to the superior and the monks not to impose any new burdens or unreasonable exactions on the peasants.

Later still, the founder provides [103] that the peasants' villages are not to be dislocated. He also establishes [104] a ministry for them based in a church of St. Prokopios he has restored for this purpose. They were also permitted to worship in the monastery's church. The founder charges the superior personally with their spiritual supervision.

Clearly, though, the founder placed the welfare of his monks above that of the peasants. The latter were not allowed [86] to bury their dead in their own villages, but were to do so far away so that "no unhealthy pollution enters the atmosphere." Beasts were also prohibited [101] from the monastery's enclosure, also for hygienic reasons.

A curious set of provisions which attempt to adjudicate [98] cases of arson among the villagers, while displaying the author's good sense and compassion, do not oblige the monastery to provide financial assistance to the victims. Soldiers (stratiotai) were stationed [110] in two of the monastery's villages; they were notorious for behaving badly towards their neighbors and they refused to pay taxes. The superior was nevertheless to treat them as potential allies, useful for defending the monastery's villages from unnamed predators. Another group of privileged, armed dependents, the vestiaritai, were left over [112] from the construction of the monastery. They were to be allowed to settle near the monastery's fortress (kastron), from which base they would provide dispatch services for the superior and, like the tributary soldiers, protection for the monastery's possessions.

TWELFTH CENTURY

Notes on the Introduction

1. After this volume had gone to press, a new edition of the typikon of Kosmosoteira was published by G. K. Papazoglou based on a late 16th-century manuscript recently discovered in the library of the monastery of Saint Gerasimos on Kephallenia (Typikon Isaakiou Alexiou Komnenou tes mones Theotokou tes Kosmosoteiras [Komotene, 1994]). This is the manuscript thought to have been lost at the turn of the century (see below, Institutional History, D: Identification of the Site and Publication of the Typikon, and Petit, “Kosmosotira,” pp. 17–18). We wish to thank Dr. Nancy P. Ševčenko for bringing this edition to our attention and regret that it appeared too late for us to benefit from it.
2. For Isaac Komnenos, see Ferjančić, “Sevastokratori,” pp. 156–57; Jurewicz, Andronikos I, pp. 28–35; Kazhdan, “Isaac Komnenos,” p. 1146; Varzos, Genealogia, vol. 1, pp. 238–54.
3. For this foundation, see Janin, Géographie, vol. 3, pp. 531–38; Ousterhout, Kariye Camii; and Underwood, Kariye Djami, vol. 1, pp. 3–23.
4. Uspensky, “Seralskii kodeks.”
5. Niketas Choniates, Historia, ed. J. A. Van Dieten (Berlin, 1975), p. 32; for dating, see Sinos, Kosmosoteira, p. 9, n. 24.
6. Kurtz, “Unedierte Texte,” p. 102.
7. Choniates, Historia, ed. Van Dieten, p. 32; for dating, see Sinos, Kosmosoteira, p. 10, n. 29.
8. John Kinnamos, Historia, ed. A. Meineke, CSHB (Bonn, 1836), p. 32.
9. Ed. Uspensky, “Seralskii kodeks,” p. 26, and Patterson (Ševčenko), “Frescoes,” p. 47 (with English translation); see also discussion in Ousterhout, rev. Sinos, Kosmosoteira, p. 230.
10. Choniates, Historia, ed. Van Dieten, p. 280.
11. Choniates, Historia, ed. Van Dieten, p. 452.
12. Geoffrey de Villehardouin, La conquête de Constantinople, ed. Edmond Faral, 2 vols. (Paris, 1938–39), vol. 2, p. 190.
13. George Akropolites, Chronike Syngraphe, ed. A. Heisenberg, Georgii Acropolitae opera (Leipzig, 1903), corr. P. Wirth, vol. 1 (Stuttgart, 1978), p. 72.
14. John Kantakouzenos, Historiarum libri IV, ed. L. Schopen, CSHB, vol. 2 (Bonn, 1828–32), pp. 111, 348; see also Sinos, Kosmosoteira, pp. 22–23.
15. Kantakouzenos, Historiarum libri IV, CSHB, vol. 2, p. 196.
16. Kantakouzenos, Historiarum libri IV, CSHB, vol. 3, p. 310.
17. See discussion of the Turkish sources in Sinos, Kosmosoteira, pp. 26–27.
18. C. H. A. Schefer, Le voyage d’Outremer de Bértrandon de la Broquière (Paris, 1892), pp. 179–80.
19. Robert de Dreux, Voyage en Turquie et en Grèce, ed. H. Pernot (Paris, 1925), p. 85; quoted in Sinos, Kosmosoteira, p. 29, n. 102.
20. Gedeon, “Typikon.”
21. Sinos, Kosmosoteira, p. 33.
22. Orlandos, “Mnemeia.”
23. Ed. Patterson (Ševčenko), “Frescoes,” p. 19, n. 5.
24. Orlandos, “Mnemeia,” pp. 29–34; Ousterhout, rev. Sinos, Kosmosoteira, p. 229.
25. Petit, “Kosmosotira,” p. 18.
26. (27) Kecharitomene [2], [9], [10], [24], [55]; cf. (29) Kosmosoteira [57], [58], [45], [60], [57], respectively.
27. For these proposed intermediaries, see the discussion above in (27) Kecharitomene, Analysis, B. Model Typikon.
28. Repetitive treatments, by section (roman numerals) and chapter (in brackets):
 - Secret Testament*: I [1]; IV [96], [116]
 - Honest endowment: I [2]; IV [70]
 - Number of monks: I [3]; III [48]; IV [88]
 - Installation of the superior: I [4]; III [32]

29. KOSMOSOTEIRA

- Patriarchal mediation: I [4]; IV [111]
Diet: I [6]; II [24] through [29]; IV [63]
Maintenance of cenobiticism: I [6]; III [57]
Founder's commemoration: I [7]; [11]; IV [64], [72], [91]
Feast of the Dormition: I [10]; II [29]; IV [65]
Institutional independence: I [12]; III [31]
Election of the superior: I [12]; III [32]
Performance of the hours: II [13] through [15]; IV [68], [80]
Financial officials: III [36]; IV [60]
Inalienability of property: III [45], [58]
Bookkeeping requirements: III [46]; IV [100]
Communal provision of clothing: III [52]; IV [62]
Parents' commemoration: III [54]; IV [95]
Special privileges for associates: III [54]; IV [107]; V [117]
Burial of the monks: III [54]; IV [86]; V [118]
Women's access: III [56]; IV [84]
Old age home: III [61]; IV [70]
Relations with the peasantry: IV [71], [76]
Care of the cistern: IV [73], [113]
Storage of the inventory: IV [78], [99]
Burial of Konstitzes: IV [86], [107]
Founder's icons: IV [90], [109]
Monks' bath: IV [97], [113]
Demolition of the founder's personal facilities: IV [113], [115]
29. But see discussions of diet in I [6] and in II [24] through [29], and of the feast of the Dormition in I [10] and in II [29].
30. Installation of the superior: III [32], cf. I [4]; institutional independence: III [31], cf. I [12]; election of the superior: III [32], cf. I [12]; number of monks: III [48], cf. I [3]; and maintenance of cenobiticism: III [57], cf. I [6].
31. Inalienability of property: III [45], [58].
32. Financial officials: IV [60], cf. III [36]; communal provision of clothing: IV [62], cf. III [52]; diet: IV [63], cf. I [6] and II [24] through [29]; founder's commemoration: IV [64], [72], [91], cf. I [7], [11]; feast of the Dormition: IV [65], cf. I [10], II [29]; performance of the hours: IV [68], [80], cf. II [13] through [15]; honest endowment: IV [70], cf. I [2]; old age home: IV [70], cf. III [61]; women's access: IV [84], cf. III [56]; burial of the monks: IV [86], cf. III [54]; number of monks: IV [88], cf. I [3], III [48]; parents' commemoration: IV [95], cf. III [54]; Secret Testament: IV [96], [116], cf. I [1]; bookkeeping requirements: IV [100], cf. III [46]; special privileges for associates: IV [107], cf. III [54]; patriarchal mediation: IV [111], cf. I [4].
33. Relations with the peasantry: IV [71], [76]; care of the cistern: [73], [113]; storage of the inventory: [78], [99]; burial of Konstitzes: [86], [107]; monks' bath: [97], [113]; demolition of the founder's personal facilities: [113], [115].
34. Founder's commemoration: IV [64], [72]; performance of the hours: IV [68], [80].
35. Relations with the peasantry: IV [71], [76].
36. Founder's commemoration: IV [72], [91]; storage of the inventory: IV [78], [99]; burial of Konstitzes: [86], [107].
37. Secret Testament: IV [96], [116]; monks' bath: [97], [113].
38. Special privileges for associates: V [117], cf. III [54], IV [107]; burial of the monks: V [118], cf. III [54].
39. N. Ševčenko, "The Tomb of Isaak Komnenos at Pherrai," GOTR 29.2 (1984), p. 135, n. 2.
40. (29) Kosmosoteira [7], [11], [64], [72], [91].
41. An esomonites; cf. (28) Pantokrator [28].

TWELFTH CENTURY

Bibliography

- Beck, Hans-Georg, Kirche und theologische Literatur im byzantinischen Reich (Munich, 1959), p. 648.
- Ferjančić, Božhidar, "Sevastokratori u Vizantiji," ZRVI 11 (1968), pp. 159–92, esp. 156–57.
- Gedeon, Manuel, "To typikon tes mones Theotokou Kosmosoteiras," EA 18 (1898), 112–15, 144–48, 188–91.
- Jeanselme, Edouard, "Le régime alimentaire des anachorètes et des moines byzantins," extract from 2^e Congrès d'histoire de la médecine (Evreux, 1922), 28 pp.
- Jurewicz, Oktawiusz, Andronikos I. Komnenos (Amsterdam, 1970), pp. 28–35.
- Kazhdan, Alexander, "Isaac Komnenos, the Porphyrogenetos," ODB, p. 1146.
- Kurtz, Ed., "Unedierte Texte aus der Zeit des Kaisers Johannes Komnenos," BZ 16 (1907), 69–119, esp. 101–19.
- Magdalino, Paul, "The Byzantine Aristocratic Oikos," in The Byzantine Aristocracy, IX–XIII Centuries, ed. Michael Angold (Oxford, 1984), pp. 92–111, esp. 103–5.
- Magdalino, Paul, and Nelson, Robert, "The Emperor in Byzantine Art of the Twelfth Century," BF 8 (1982), 123–83, esp. 130–32.
- Medico, M. H. E. del, "Essai sur Kahrié Djami au début du XII^e siècle," BZ 32 (1932), 16–48.
- Oeconomos, Lysimaque, La vie religieuse dans l'empire byzantin au temps des Comnènes et des Anges (Paris, 1918), pp. 210–13.
- Orlandos, A. K., "Ta vyzantina mnemeia tes Veras," Thrakika 4 (1933), 3–34.
- Ousterhout, Robert, The Architecture of the Kariye Camii in Istanbul (Washington, D.C., 1987), p. 21.
- , Speculum 63 (1988), 229–31, review of Stefan Sinos, Die Klosterkirche der Kosmosoteira in Bera (Vira) (Munich, 1985).
- Patterson (Ševčenko), Nancy, "Byzantine Frescoes at Pherrai" (M.A. thesis, Columbia University, 1964).
- Ševčenko, Nancy P., "The Tomb of Isaak Komnenos at Pherrai," GOTR 29 (1984), 135–39.
- Sinos, Stefan, Die Klosterkirche der Kosmosoteira in Bera (Vira) (Munich, 1985).
- Talbot, Alice-Mary, "Bera," ODB, pp. 282–83.
- Tapkova-Zaimova, V., "Les noms de lieux dans le typicon du monastère de la Kosmosotira," Balkansko ezikoznanie/Linguistique balkanique 2 (1960), 123–27.
- Underwood, Paul, "The Deesis Mosaic in the Kahrie Cami at Istanbul," in Late Classical and Mediaeval Studies in Honor of Albert Mathias Friend, Jr., ed. Kurt Weitzmann (Princeton, 1955), pp. 254–60.
- , The Kariye Djami, vol. 1 (New York, 1966), Historical Introduction, pp. 3–23.
- Uspensky, Th., "Konstantinopolskii seralskii kodeks vosmikhnižhiya," IRAİK 12 (1907), esp. 18–32.
- Varzos, Konstantinos, He genealogia ton Komnenon, 2 vols. (Thessalonike, 1984), pp. 238–54.
- Volk, Robert, Gesundheitswesen und Wohltätigkeit im Spiegel der byzantinischen Klostertypika (Munich, 1983), pp. 200–215.

As noted above, this document shares substantial portions of the text of (22) Evergetis. In our translation, the borrowings are indicated in boldface type.

Translation

1. [This is the] typikon which I, Isaac [the Sebastokrator], son of the great Emperor Lord Alexios Komnenos, have composed for the monastery which I restored and newly established in the fifteenth indiction of the year 6660 [= 1152 A.D.]. Herein is placed the mosaic image¹ of the Kosmosoteira and Mother of God, in many a thing my Benefactress. The region in which this monastery lies was altogether devoid of men and houses, [the haunt] only of snakes and scorpions . . . [lacuna in the text] wild in every way, and encircled by wide-spreading branches. This typikon of mine here sets forth in detail my decrees for the administration with the aid of God of this monastery, and commands (these decrees which I now set forth in it being in fact [contained] in my Last and Secret Testament as well, if not in their entirety) that my orders remain immutable and undisturbed throughout all time.

29. KOSMOSOTEIRA

The preface and full text of the typikon have been issued by me while in a condition of grave illness. This is the preface to the full text of [p. 20] this present work which I, the restorer of the holy monastery, as has been said, have set forth in burning faith for my Benefactress, the Mother of God and Kosmosoteira. A flawless ally in every way, I now invoke thee, since it is with thine aid, O all-seeing universal Queen, that I would express the wishes nourished in this at present so wretched mind of mine.

2. Many men, O Mother of God, have piously accomplished in this life many projects pleasing to God, in praise of him, the Lord of all. The works successfully completed proclaim him—though in silence—as with songs of praise, by their very perfection, in the upright faith of the doers. Such men have been allotted everlasting fame after their departure from here. Some of them, by the distribution of monetary wealth to the poor (whom the Lord our Creator called his brothers) (Matt. 25:40), drew his gracious mercy on to themselves and arrived at an end of life befitting their efforts. Others in grand style founded magnificent churches at private expense, and established holy monasteries throughout cities and towns. Still others, those who lacked worldly substance, contributed—according to Gregory, great among theologians—the intensity of their zeal as a graciously accepted offering to the Lord of all.² Those who successfully accomplished [their projects] and those who did not, received the Lord and Master of all things as the immediate protector of their individual works.

As for me, the unfortunate, I am a latecomer to the works of good men, one who never once gave thought to, nor was cognizant of these things—nor hitherto reflected on the potential advantage for my soul in some form of good works. I was finishing the course of my life as a barren and senseless shoot, when at long last I emerged, feebly, barely, from my terrible and long-standing habits as from the deep grave of ignorance, and calculated in my mind the punishment for sin lying in store for me in the next life. Woe is me! So, for some remission and pardon for my innumerable recurring sins, I emerged by God's inclination from the darkness of ignorance, as I have said, and, exiled from my own country for what crimes God knows, and afflicted with grave illness, I restored this holy monastery of the Mother of God, with the help of God, not out of the profits of injustice (far be it from me, O God!) but at private expense, and in a fashion I believe not unpleasing to God.

From its very foundations, then, I restored the said monastery, in a deserted area, formerly nothing but thickets, commonly called Bera, for the salvation of many [lacuna in the text] and as atonement and ransom for my countless errors. I awarded it to the Kosmosoteira, Mother of God and Benefactress. I encircled it round with a strong enclosure [wall], and the other necessary dwellings around it, including the wine cellars and granaries, and—to be brief—all the rest of the things required by the monks. I tightly enclosed everything within a double wall. I then realized it was necessary to draw up a well-ordered system, in burning faith for the Mother of God, for this holy monastery and the monks who abide therein with God. [p. 21]

TWELFTH CENTURY

3. First of all, then, for the sake of [singing] the praise of her and of God whom she bore, fifty adult monks living in the monastery [should] be appointed as cantors, seemly in their godly lives and conduct, to attend constantly upon God and to pray for my wretched soul. Moreover, [there should be] another twenty-four adult monks to serve these and to tend to their needs. I do not wish that any one in either group be less than thirty years of age, nor indeed do I want any eunuch to be included among the monks, for I want the monks to live far from this cause of turmoil to natural habits and to morals. For Gregory, the great Theologian, praised quiet in all things as being good for those who devote themselves to it, citing Elijah's Carmel and John's desert as testimonies to this truth.³

I want the most honorable superior of this said holy monastery, [whoever he may be] at the time, to enlist monks such as these into it: monks [who are] adorned with virtue, not ones vulgar and undisciplined and thoroughly without learning. May the superior, in his impartial and incorruptible judgment, find [both] my Kosmosoteira and Benefactress the Mother of God, and his own godly zeal, ever-present allies indeed for the ready recruitment of such monks. For the Word of God has plainly declared: "Seek and you will find, knock and it will be opened to you" (Matt. 7:7; Luke 11:9).

4. I wish for the superior who is next in line for the succession to be installed in the office of superior by the most holy metropolitan of Traianoupolis—always being chosen for the succession by all the monks, as the metropolitan must not be involved in any other way in regulating the freedom of the monastery. Since it often happens that matters of dispute crop up between men, and even among monks themselves through the malice of the devil, I wish those insoluble and troublesome matters which crop up among the monks to be resolved by their coming together with each other and by the judgment of the most honorable superior. Thus they will achieve quiet and that state of peace with one another which the Lord Creator lovingly recommends at all times to all of us who believe in him. But if the matter is raised by the monks against the superior himself and is insoluble, let the monks raising the matter, along with the most honorable superior, [armed] with the official report of the metropolitan of Traianoupolis of the time, approach the most holy ecumenical patriarch, and submit the matter to him and let it receive the solution from him, in accordance with the canons.

No patriarchal [representative] should be sent by his Holiness for an investigation into this monastery of Kosmosoteira. Rather, let the inquiry and the judgment in the affair come to a valid conclusion before the patriarchal presence and authority. Which patriarch I beseech with tears not to deal lightly with such matters of the monastery and the judgments [concerning them], nor to allow any delay, on account of his Holiness' overcrowded [p. 22] schedule, in the monks' sojourn [in the capital], lest they stay away from the monastery for too long and occupy themselves in legal matters. I request that these things be carried out in this way in accordance with the pastoral dignity of my lord the ecumenical patriarch, for the eternal reward of his soul and a peaceful state of affairs among the monks.

5. Now since I have dedicated practically all my resources, both movable and immovable, to the Mother of God here, for my spiritual salvation—on account of which I, the unfortunate, eagerly await [her] intercession with her Son our God for my wretched soul—I want and wish the monks of the Kosmosoteira my Mother of God to be of one mind with each other with regard to these regulations of mine, and to offer their unwavering assistance. For we have learned that division is in every way a cause of ruin. “For love one another” (John 13:34), our Creator in his divine way has exhorted us. We should keep always the archetype of this exhortation ever present; we must look towards it, and strive [to perform] good works. For this very reason I have appointed an utterly flawless steward for the monastery and have established the Mother of God within it. For [it is] my long labors in life, and my patrimonial inheritance—and not some unjust way of life, so help me God!—which have rightfully furnished the things I have donated to the monastery. O Mother of God, receive graciously what has been offered to thee!

29. KOSMOSOTEIRA

6. I wish the monastery to be a cenobitic institution, [this being] a way of life pleasing to God, and [I wish] the monks to submit to the superior. Their daily meals should be supplied to them all together at a common table, and, it being likely that, with the help of God, they will have a bounteous supply of food, I make this request to the most honorable superior of the time, and to those performing under him as monks: I earnestly recommend to them, although I am altogether unworthy to make recommendations, that whatever edible food is left over each day from their table be distributed by the superior to the poor at the entrance to the monastery enclosure. Let the superior of [the monastery] instruct some of the monks to carry this out without fail for the relief of my boundless errors, so that we may not hear the Lord saying bitterly, “When did you see me hungry and feed me, or thirsty and give me drink?” (cf. Matt. 25:37) and the following chapters of our salvation.

7. Hence, as [I] move along with the present discourse and [begin] to lay out before the monks point by point my whole account and my will, I make this slight request of the most honorable superior and all the monks under him: after the dismissal at vespers, they [should] all assemble before the icon of the Mother of God, and perform the trisagion every evening, [to bring] mercy on my wretched soul, and pronounce on its behalf a suitable ektenes, and stretch out their arms and recite this way the kyrie eleison forty times, with all their hearts. Then they [should] make this recitation: “O Lady Mother of God, deliver thy servant who approaches thee, the founder Isaac, [p. 23] from the punishment to come, by thy intercession with thy Son, enfolding him in thy immaculate arms.” Then they should say the “Fervent intercession” and what follows, while modifying in this way the phrase in the middle: “And deliver him from spiritual danger, as thou art the sole swift protectress,” and one further theotokion, suitable for [bringing] mercy on my soul. Thereupon they should each of them proceed to their cells to rest. I wish this to be done throughout the year, in perpetuity, and I beg with tears for loyalty [on the part] of the monks, that they do not set aside this godly undertaking—this being [but] a slight request.

8. Among those wise men who restored holy monasteries and assigned monks to them to sing praise to God, there were many who preferred the Typikon of the Evergetis to the [typika] used in other monasteries. I, too, following their [example], prefer this one, and I wish the monks to join in using it for all instructions, and not to overlook that which it stresses concerning the straight spiritual path. They should hold to it with reference to the hymnody, and indeed with reference to all [matters of] conduct, as the best possible guide for the benefit of the soul, and [as it were] an enkolpion [in a setting] of pearls.

For this very reason I took particular care, with guidance from Heaven, in copying and transcribing, in this work, word-for-word what was written in the [other typikon]. I then entrusted it to the monks of my Lady the Kosmosoteira and Mother of God and to the most honorable superior, [having arranged things] with as much precision and close consideration as anyone could want, ordering the monks to keep it inviolate throughout all time. For through this work they will surely be guided toward what should be done piously and strictly with respect to hymns to God, and the distribution and use of appropriate food and diet for the body. I have avoided expounding on these things at great length in this work here, not wishing the mind to be trapped by empty repetition. So then let me pull together what I intend [to say] in this present typikon, invoking God and his forever-virgin Mother as defenders of this present exposition and its inalienable preservation. What these things are, and what is my intention regarding them, may this present exposition make entirely clear, and may thou, O God of all, and thy Mother, not overlook their content.

9. Therefore on every feast—I mean of the Mother of God throughout the year, so that [starting] with her I can make a suitable preface of my intent—I wish the monks to get ready to ring the two bells quite loudly with [their own] hands before the hymnody—I mean the two bells which I hung high up in the tower, in place of semantra. But the monks [should] make their way into the space of the church in a holy fashion and celebrate in a splendid fashion the whole hymnody proper to the feast. There should be four lamps lit in the very middle of the church, and two candelabra with eight candleholders should stand by the two icons set out for veneration, that is, in the two parts of the church where my Supremely-good Christ, and the Mother of God and Kosmosoteira, are respectively represented with great skill, so [p. 24] that the images appear alive to the beholder, and as though letting out a beautiful sound from their mouths toward him. For it is a marvel to behold these likenesses in painting, that is, alive and yet unmoving in space, and hence to praise the artist whom the First Creator and Lord endowed with the knowledge of how to paint in a novel fashion. For who would not congratulate him, after having traced the form of these likenesses onto his eye and his heart as though it were living.

At any rate, I wish that by both of these icons there be lit as well the triple lamps of silver, those which I hung up nicely before them. Moreover, let all the little candles be lit, along with these, as many as the bronze lamna is able to hold, the one extending above and across the entrance doors to the sanctuary. Furthermore, [one should light] every lamp suspended from the beams of the church, and from the objects designed to support the holders for the candles—I mean inside the narthex. This is the way I wish the splendid illumination to be arranged on the feasts of the Mother of God, who has given me hopes for intercession and for my salvation. Indeed I wish, in addition to those other things, for her to be honored with expensive oils and incense, and, as far as is possible, by charitable distributions to the poor by the gate—as the judgment and preference of the superior shall surely determine, having God as the ever-present beneficiary of this kind of charitable distribution.

10. I wish, however, for the honored vespers [preceding] the holy Dormition of the Mother of God,⁴ as well as the day after it, to be celebrated more splendidly than all her other feasts, by the lighting of all the lamps, and by the assemblage of a greater number of priests and deacons in the sanctuary, it being the feast of feasts and the festival of festivals. [I also wish it] to be celebrated with an all-night vigil by all the monks. I want the vigil to be interspersed with an intercessory canon on behalf of my soul, with readings coming twice in the night to [provide] a moderate respite for the monks and to [lead to] contrition. After the completion of the hymnody, let this song and salutation, so revered by us and by the heavenly powers, be proclaimed with one accord: “[Thou] more honored than the Cherubim,”⁵ then the kyrie eleison one hundred times for the salvation and liberation of my wretched soul, and thereafter the ektenes proper for the dismissal.

It is thus quite clear how, after the vespers, the monks must perform the morning hymnody and the liturgy in a brilliant fashion, and how, after the celebration of the holy rites, the superior and the steward of the monastery are to proceed with the distribution to the needy. For I wish one hundred [of our] brothers to assemble at the entrance, and for each of them to take one loaf of bread on her feast day (there being ten made from one local modios), plus six trachea [nomismata], and one measure of wine for [their] fresh food and drink. For if we fill the souls of those hungry ones, we may [ourselves] be filled without fail with more abundant food from on high, in the other world, by God, the rewarder [lacuna in the text] as far as possible, God eyeing from above the conscience of those who are [in charge of the feast’s] celebration: that they not only [see to it that] the monks are provided with enough to eat, but are able also to provide a bit more to some of the needy, out of the things which I furnished for them, with the help of God.

I pray [p. 25] over and over to the Lord of all, that after my death the monastery will be able to provide wider access to those who love Christ, and that it stretch out its right hand magnanimously to the needy. For this is my major aim, most aimed at. Let there be distributed, furthermore, to the one hundred poor [brothers enough] beans boiled over the fire to suffice as their food for that day. If, at the discretion of the superior, this legume is offered to them in a soup with seasoning, or some freshwater fish [is offered], which is cheap and fat (which the river situated nearest the monastery and flowing to the sea is often able to provide to the fisherman), this would be good, and the reward could be referred to God. If the superior should fail in obtaining such catch, let the poor be given cheese. They should be seated on the floor in a line or a circle, to partake of the food in a more dignified way. When they will be filled, I want them to rise all at once from their places, to raise their hands up high and to recite for my sake the Kyrie eleison forty times, and then to go on home. I wish that this particular action of the monks at the time of the feast never once cease, nor ever be altered, in the present age. For I myself have judged it necessary to discuss matters pertaining to the feast in this way, and may I not despair of the intercession of the Mother of God on this account.

11. On her other feasts in the year let a vigil be performed with comparable illumination—even if [it is] not an all-night one, so that the singers are not burdened with too much effort. Wherefore I did not wish to drag them, in the present typikon, to [shoulder], like some wage-earners, the unbearable load of great efforts on my behalf, or to require them to celebrate the vigil on my behalf every Saturday, as is the custom in most monasteries. For what is [morally] good is fine above all when not forced upon those who practice it. Still, I want the monks to recite the Kyrie eleison forty times for my sake during every one of the said vigils, after the dismissal. I wish their prayers to be [performed] in good conscience and not unwillingly, inasmuch as I did assign my own possessions and properties to the monastery and to them, with the help of God—things which doubtless the text of the present typikon will partially elucidate.

Now on the feasts of the Mother of God that follow after the Dormition, whatever is proper at matins and the liturgy and at vespers should be carried out in splendor, the distribution to the poor on these [days] I entrust to the godly discretion of the most honorable superior. For it is God who presides over the recompense for my good works. I wish moreover for the feast of the Birth of Christ my God, and of his Passion—and along with these, that of the Transfiguration—to be celebrated magnificently. On Holy Thursday, [let there be] a distribution to the poor comparable and equivalent to [that on] the feast of the Dormition (that is, of the Mother of God)—of course in accordance with the monastery’s capabilities. Furthermore, I wish that [St. John] the Forerunner and my Saint Nicholas be celebrated.⁶

[I do not wish] the monks of the [monastery] to do anything divergent or deviant with regard to these and [other] such [matters], contrary to this my instruction. So on all the rest of the days of the year that are not feast days, let the small semantron [p. 26] be sounded first, to call together the monks for the hymnodies, then the large wooden one. On Sundays and on all the feast days [I] enumerated, particularly [on the day of] the holy Dormition of the Mother of God, I wish, as was said, for the two large bells hanging quite high up in the tower to be rung loudly, as long as necessary—these being the very bells that I had hung up in fervent faith and in my reverence toward the Mother of God.

12. I therefore order that this monastery that I have re-established be altogether and entirely independent, throughout all time, that no one encroach upon it, and that it never be subject to imperial, private or patriarchal authority, nor to any heir of my property. I do not wish it surrendered to the ephoreia of anyone, and as aides, there must be hired only my secretary Michael,⁷ for his long-lasting faith and friendship to me, since he has served me faithfully for many years with seemly and scrupulous attention, and my man Leo Kastamonites,⁸ unrivaled among my retainers. For his faithful service to me from the time of his youth, may God not deprive him of just rewards.

This requirement, that the monastery be subject to no one’s supervision, is its safeguard, next to God, that [guarantees its] preservation and removes it from the grasping reach of the unjust and [prevents] obvious damage to the monastery. For some superiors were deceived in their hopes, and let the holy monasteries under their control, and their possessions, fall into greedy hands perhaps [lacuna in the text] and for that reason willingly—although appearing unwilling—involved themselves more in innovation than in assistance to their monasteries.

Let us avoid then, O most honorable superior, whoever you may be, this sort of damaging administration conducive to destruction. Let us suffer this holy monastery of My Lady the Kosmosoteira and Mother of God to remain entirely independent of any ephoreia, lest we appear grasping, indeed sinful, in her eyes. I refer to the Mother of God, whom I, as the present typikon suggests, have proposed in place of all others as ephoros, guardian and ally for this monastery and all the properties and possessions it governs. May she altogether suffice, then, without equal and in place of all others, for the ephoreia of the monastery and its invincible and unshakeable assistance. To substitute any other person for her I deem an [outright] act of want of faith, provoking a heavy curse on you. By fleeing this, we might certainly obtain the mercy of God and his Mother.

Therefore I wish for two large candles to be kept always burning the whole year [before] Christ the Absolute in Goodness, and [before] the Mother of God—that is, one at the [icon] of Christ set out for veneration, one at that of the Mother of God. As regards the lighting of the little candles during the daily office of hymnody, I refer the arrangements to the best judgment of the most honorable superior of the time.

As he has free rein over the administration of the monastery in all things, he is responsible, if in full possession of his faculties at the time of his death, by convocation and consultation of all the monks under him, for the choice from among them all of the superior who is to succeed him in the monastery. Perhaps at some time the superior may wish, for some reason, to resign his office. [p. 27] In that case, let him choose impartially, with the help of the rest of the monks of the monastery, one who is more notable than the others, and appoint him superior, although during my lifetime I wish to choose and install a superior at my own discretion.

13. Here then is what the typikon of the Evergetis (which [I] have already mentioned) decrees regarding the hymnodies of the monks, and other liturgical procedure, with the help of God. One must attend to what has already been stated, to wit:

[= (22) Evergetis [4]]: So after the worship of matins, I say, the office of the first hour should be sung by you monks following on immediately, as is customary, and at the end of this the following prayer should next be recited, “Thou who at all times” and what follows. After the prayer the customary genuflections should be performed, by the able-bodied on the bare floor but the weak should have some small supports. Three of them should be completed in a more leisurely manner inasmuch as while you are standing you should say three times to yourselves with hands stretched out “God, be merciful to me the sinner” (Luke 18:13), then when you are kneeling down with your heads resting on the ground, you should say three times in the same way “I have sinned against thee, Lord, forgive me.” But the remaining twelve should be carried out more quickly so as to utter the aforementioned supplicatory phrases once at each genuflection and each time you stand, but yet in unison and with fitting good order, not with some getting ahead and others falling behind, but all following the lead of the ecclesiarch or the priest on duty that day as he stands near the holy screen and indicates the successive movements.

That should take place when “God is the Lord” (Ps. 117 [118]:27) is not sung during matins; but if it is, the performing of these genuflections in the church should be omitted but three deep bows should be performed while at each of them, as has been mentioned, the aforesaid supplicatory phrases should be said to yourselves three times. Then after these genuflections or bows all should repeat the following prayer aloud with hands raised, “O eternal God, the Maker of all creation.” Immediately after the prayer the short catechesis from the words of the Fathers should take place, read by the superior, and this should never be omitted unless set aside by the synaxarion. At this point after the reading the trisagion which is prescribed for us should take place and to it the following prayer should be joined, “Thou who sendest out the light and it proceeds.”⁹ That is to take place when the catechesis is read; otherwise the trisagion should be omitted and the prayer should be recited to follow the other prayer before the catechesis.

All the prayers should be said with hands held up in accordance with the following, “Lift up your hands in the sanctuaries and bless the Lord” (Ps. 133 [134]:2), and “The lifting of my hands as an evening sacrifice” (Ps. 140 [141]:2), and “In every place lifting holy hands without anger or quarreling” (I Tim. 2:8). When the aforementioned prayer and the others have been said by the priest and the priest has spoken his customary one as well, all of you should immediately fall on your faces and hearing the superior asking for your prayers like this, [p. 28] “Brothers, pray for me to the Lord that I may be delivered from passions and the snares of the Evil One,” you should answer, “May God save you, honored father, and you, pray for us, that we may be delivered from passions and the snares of the Evil One.” Then again the superior praying should say, “May God through the prayers of our fathers save you all.”

Then you should stand up and depart to your cells, avoiding all meeting together and foolish distraction, idle chatter, and disorderly laughter. For what comes of such things? Clearly, the lapsing into disgraceful talk, abuse, and condemnations because your mind is relaxed by this and you forget what is really good, and reaching your cells in a dilatory and lazy frame of mind you sink at once into a sleep of akedia and pass almost all the day in idleness without engaging in any beneficial activity whatever, as the great Basil also says, “To lapse from a fitting spiritual state is easy when the soul indulges in unrestrained laughter, and it is easier for a concern for goodness to be dissipated and lapse into disgraceful talk.”¹⁰

May this not be the case with my fathers and brothers, but let each go away to his cell in a sober frame of mind most vigilant, always doing what is pleasing to God. But if perhaps some are discovered to be at fault in this matter, whether they are young or old, advanced in the monastic life or novices, they are to be admonished with the laws of love by the disciplinary official, and if they do not mend their ways they are to be punished. For it is not fitting that novices alone who behave carelessly perhaps should be punished, but rather those who have spent many years in the monastic way of life but are careless and lazy, as [John Klimakos] the author of The Ladder says somewhere concerning this.¹¹ Going away to your cells you should carry out the whole obligatory canonical procedure, with the customary prayers and genuflections in the manner mentioned above, I mean the six psalms, the third hour and the sixth according to custom when the semantra are struck. For genuflections should not be carried out in the church only when “God is the Lord” (Ps. 117 [118]:27) is sung, as we have said. So when you pray in your cells you should always kneel down, but we will avoid this also in our cells whenever there is a vigil because of the weariness that comes from that, also during the twelve days of Christmas, during Easter week, and further, during the nine days after the feast for the Dormition of our most holy Lady, the Mother of God the Kosmosoteira. So the ritual of the first hour should be like that.

14. [= (22) Evergetis [5]]: It is necessary now also to speak about the divine mystery, which must be celebrated in the church each day, but you yourselves must be sure to take care in this, my brothers, because what is performed there is divine and fearful, and because there more than in anything else the fearful and very great mystery of our orthodox and holy faith is accomplished, I mean the most divine and supreme sacrifice of the completely undefiled body and blood of our God and Savior Jesus Christ. So during it, [p. 29] as has been said, you must pay strict attention, and as far as possible chase from you every thought that is impure, sown by the devil, and unworthy of that fearful celebration, and purify yourselves in every way. Then as many as have been allowed to partake of communion should partake of the divine elements. For it will not be possible for any of you to partake freely and in a thoughtless manner, nor yet each day. This we would indeed wish, for to partake often of the divine elements is often to share in life, as Christ himself says, “He who eats my flesh and drinks my blood abides in me,” (John 6:56) and again, “Unless you eat my flesh and drink my blood, you have no life in you” (John 6:53), and as the divine apostle says “He who is united to the Lord becomes one body” (I Cor. 6:17), and as the most gentle David says conversely “They that remove themselves far from thee shall perish” (Ps. 72 [73]:27).

Therefore we would indeed wish this, as has been said, but because of human weakness and the danger of the action we do not allow it, for “Whoever eats the body and drinks the blood of Jesus unworthily is guilty of his body and blood” (I Cor. 11:27) says the divine apostle. This statement is frightening, my brothers, and causes not sinners like me but also those who are very confident in themselves to fear partaking. So then as many as are sure that they are pure and free from disgraceful thoughts and submission to them, from anger and grumbling, grief and denigration, deceit and disorderly laughter, furthermore and more especially the bearing of a grudge and irritation, disgraceful talk and such things, should partake of communion only three times a week. But those who fall prey to the aforementioned passions and hasten to a renunciation of them through confession and repentance should partake of communion once a week or not at all at the discretion of the superior of course, for he should be in charge of such matters. But for someone to consider himself unworthy of communion without his knowledge cannot be approved. For he who does this will be condemned as someone fulfilling his own wish. However it is permitted that those who should partake of communion sing the office laid down for the partaking, make a common genuflection together to one another, to grant forgiveness, and thus joyfully partake of the life-giving elements. So let these things be carried out in this way.

15. [= (22) Evergetis [6]]: The ninth hour should be sung in the same way as the preceding hours, with the striking of the semantron calling you to it. The regulation in the synaxarion sets out very clearly how the office of vespers should be carried out, with the night office immediately next, as well as compline after the supper. During these you should genuflect in the way you do whenever you are not to celebrate a feast, and by feast we mean a day that includes “God is the Lord” (Ps. 117 [118]:27) at matins. When compline has been sung and the priest has said his customary prayer also, you should fall on your knees just as at the end of the first hour and incline your ear well to the superior as he says, "Forgive me in the Lord, brothers, for I have sinned in word, deed, and in thought," and [p. 30] you should grant him forgiveness saying, "May God forgive you." But you also should immediately beg this from him by adding, "Forgive us also yourself, honored father, for we have sinned in word, deed, and in thought," then again he should pray for you and say, "May God through the prayers of our fathers forgive you all."

Then standing up and according him the required obeisance, you should go away to your cells and carry out your night office in accordance with the regulation, and then full of gratitude and spiritual joy you should turn to sleep until the one who is in charge of the clock learns from it the appropriate hour and goes to the superior, and receiving from him the required blessing then shouts out with a loud voice in a rhythmic fashion, "Bless, O saints." Then when he has struck the semantron in the customary way and distributed lights to all, he will rouse you for the celebration of the midnight office which he himself will also sing all the time as he carries out the prescribed lighting of the church, and then when he has sounded the great semantron and the bronze one also, he will call you all for the dawn worship. The preliminary part of which you must carry out as follows.

For after the striking of the semantron praise should be ascribed to God by the priest who has the duty for the day, and as he praises God he should at once with the censer make the sign of the venerable cross in front of the holy table; and you replying "Amen," should immediately sing a trisagion together with the nineteenth and twentieth psalms and the usual troparia and the Kyrie eleison, taking care to keep together as far as is reasonable while these are being sung.

The priest himself should go round all the divine church and cense everyone, and then, standing before the holy screen, when he has once more made the sign of the venerable cross with the censer, with the censuring he should offer up praise to the Holy Trinity, speaking audibly as follows, "Glory to the holy and consubstantial and life-giving Trinity always, now and always and for ever and ever, amen." After replying "Amen" the ecclesiarch should at once begin the six psalms, saying the words of the psalms in a low voice slowly, quietly, and carefully so that all may then be able to recite them without error or stumbling. Then after the completion of the six psalms, the whole office of matins should next be celebrated as the synaxarion describes. That constitutes the pattern of your all-night office.

16. [= (22) Evergetis [7], ed. lines 241–61]: We must also speak about life-preserving confession and the discourse about the table must wait for a while. Well then, the superior must sit in a private place twice a day, and leaving aside all work whatsoever and all the trouble of managing and directing, must take most diligent care to hear those who wish to make confession and set for each one the appropriate healing. We specify that after the doxology at matins has begun should be one time when he will bring healing to those who live continuously in the monastery and are not employed in any ministries; and after compline he will bring healing to those ministering inside or outside who are present. He is to be allowed, if perhaps he does not have the time since the brotherhood is numerous, [p. 31] to authorize whichever priests and deacons he wishes, and even some of the more reverent brother monks, to hear the thoughts of the more uneducated majority, the thoughts that trouble you day by day and hour by hour which must always be easy to absolve and not have caused more deep-seated trouble, and to remit them and grant forgiveness. But the thoughts that require some healing and care must be referred to the superior by those who hear them, and he is to bring about the appropriate healing. So then, those who confess will conceal nothing, though perhaps hesitant if they know their thoughts need care, but they will uncover everything completely to their confessor; also it is right that we should tell them what is expected of them.

17. [= (22) Evergetis [7], ed. lines 262–311]: So then you, my brothers, seeing the superior hurrying off to this good ministry which is very beneficial to your souls, you should run, and running reach with eagerness this very calm harbor that is safe for your souls, and reveal completely without any covering up every stirring of your mind and every thought that harms your soul, as though you are making your confession in the presence of God and not a man. Indeed the one who sets out to lie to God will get his punishment for lying along with everything else. For the psalmist says “Thou wilt destroy all that speak falsehood” (Ps. 5:6). So then, by confessing without deceit and ridding your minds of all wrangling, impurity, confusion and trouble, you may be happy and rejoice, having gained this good hope namely that you will not fail to gain salvation. But make your confession without accusing each other when perhaps a violent dispute or some other argument occurs. Do not make your confession if you consider yourselves blameless and you are looking really for condemnations, nor should you speak about the bodily needs which afflict you. For there is always a time for them but this is a time for making confession and obtaining healing for your souls. If you must speak of some violent dispute, be keen to ascribe and assign to yourselves all the blame and reason for the fault, whatever it is. But if you speak about some other passions, reveal these completely so that you can gain double benefit from this, by both attaining sound health of soul and clothing yourself in exalting humility, for possessing this we will be like God who says, “Learn from me that I am gentle and lowly in heart” (Matt. 11:29). What else would be a proof of gentleness and humility in heart than clearly to bear all affliction nobly and blame oneself? The true confession without which I do not think anyone gains salvation is such a good thing.

Then we order and decree that a person who does not make confession should be placed under the penalty of excommunication by the superior until, coming to his senses and thinking of higher things, he confesses all his faulty and harmful habits. Thus it would be necessary also to expel such a person from the monastery and cut him off like a rotten limb, and as a wound that is hard to heal or completely incurable to remove him and cast him away, but the uncertainty of the future and the expectation that perhaps one day he may come to his senses held us back from this purpose. However for him to be liable to the penalty of excommunication is very [p. 32] useful since it is very effective. Indeed, what benefit does he obtain from remaining at the monastery? What benefit comes from not making confession or rather does not harm and ruin follow and a continued practice of evil and everything whatsoever that brings destruction to the soul? So then, as it is difficult for someone who is sick or has wounds to return to health when he hides these from the doctor, so it is much more difficult for the person who does not make confession ever to gain health of soul. The divine Basil is witness of this when he speaks as follows “If a monk is going to show proper progress and come into a state of life in accordance with the decree of the Lord’s command, he must keep no stirring of his soul hidden, but offer to his superior all that is hidden in his heart stripped bare.”¹² So then, by acting in this way, my brothers, we will not only be rescued from our own faults but we will possess later on something that is more sure; for [John Klimakos] the author of The Ladder says “Stripes that are exposed will not become worse, but will be healed” and again, “A soul that thinks about confession is held back by it from sinning as if by a rein.”¹³ So the revelation of one’s own faults is very useful. In future let us all run eagerly to it.

18. [= (22) Evergetis [7], ed. lines 312–17]: Therefore we prescribe that confession should be held like this every day, by the superior himself clearly and by as many as seem to him to be suitable people to hear thoughts; but the first and great confession which we should make when casting off the hair of this world must be offered to the superior alone and not to anyone else so that he can know everyone himself and mix the medicine suitable for each one. These things should be so.

19. [= (22) Evergetis [8]]: Concerning the procedure for the holy fasts the synaxarion will inform you most precisely, and you should carry them out always in accordance with it. Vigils should also take place following the prescribed rule for every feast of the Lord.

20. [= (22) Evergetis [9], ed. lines 325–36]: It should be the right time now to mention the table and food and the other things that supply nourishment to the body. For as we are made up of two parts, I mean soul and body, so also are the activities of the monastery. The whole daily divine office expressed in the singing of psalms could reasonably be thought of as the soul of the monastery, whereas the monastery itself and all the things that benefit your bodies could be considered its body. So then, since with God’s help we have said enough already about its soul, it is right that we should also speak about matters which concern its body, by prescribing the diet and setting out for you more precisely all the other things that secure a more lasting continuance of the monastery, as it is necessary for the one who wishes to increase his monastery to be no less concerned about these things. So then, these things also should be said and should of course be imparted to my dear fathers and brothers.

21. [= (22) Evergetis [9], ed. lines 337–63]: After the customary collation has taken place in the narthex, when the divine liturgy has already been completed, all the monks should gather and sit there waiting for the summons to the table which is given by the striking of the refectory semantron. When the semantron has been struck, going out at once with the priest who officiated [p. 33] at the liturgy, you should make obeisance to the superior and then beginning to recite audibly the customary psalm walk to the refectory, that is the superior and all those without exception who have been instructed to sit down at the table during the first sitting. Then entering the refectory and completing the aforementioned psalm and the prayer that accompanies it, you should sit down in the order laid down by the superior and gratefully partake of what has been set before you. Then anyone who was late for the psalm and the thanksgiving should be reported by the refectorian to the superior, and he should enquire the reason for his lateness and grant him pardon if it seems reasonable, but if not, he is to perform as many genuflections as the superior wishes.

Moreover, the traditional reading must take place during the sittings in the customary way, with no one making a noise or causing a disturbance or destroying the benefit which comes from that with worldly conversations and idle chatter. The superior only may speak sparingly if he wishes and perhaps the one asked by him may answer similarly in a few brief phrases, if possible. But if someone causes a disturbance or is disturbed, is noisy or causes a noise, and ruins the reading by untimely and improper conversation, he is to be silenced by the refectorian. But if, something I hope does not happen, when he silences him the noisy person pays no attention, he is to be removed from the refectory even if he is unwilling and subjected to the penalty of going without his food or made to learn self-control in another way as the superior wishes.

22. [= (22) Evergetis [9], ed. lines 364–83]: So we completely refuse to speak about first seating. For how could this be acceptable, that men who are living according to God's will should quarrel at all about seating, like those who are keen to show themselves in a worldly way superior to everyone else in this, as those who are excited by glory that is vain and hated by God? For "Everyone that is proud in heart is an abomination to the Lord" (Prov. 16:5), says Holy Scripture, "The Lord resists the proud, but he gives grace to the humble" (Prov. 3:34). So this will not happen among you, it will not. For if you are in your right minds, you would not choose to present yourselves as an abomination to the Lord rather than to receive favor from him and have him near you, as those who "are of contrite heart" (Ps. 33 [34]:18), or, to speak truly, to be his dwelling and beloved of him. But if any of you is found, alas, causing annoyance in this matter, putting forward as an excuse perhaps age or sphere of work, and does not abide by the command of the superior nor is satisfied with the place allocated to him, I command in the Lord that he be allocated the last place and be taught to leave to the world the habits of the world. But if, something that is in every way detestable and disorderly, he still disagrees and objects, persisting after the second and third admonition in being incorrigible, he is to be driven out of the monastery, and like some cancer be thrown out somewhere far away from you, so that he may not also infect the rest of you with his filth. For, as some wise man said, taking part in evil is much easier than in virtue.

23. [= (22) Evergetis [9], ed. lines 384–417]: When you are eating a meal you must not share with each other any food or drink, even as much as a small drop to cool the wine [mixed with water], but the person who at the time is in need of [p. 34] any of these things should raise himself very respectfully and ask the superior reverently, speaking as follows, "Bless me, father, I need this." So if the superior gives permission, he is to receive what he needs, but if not, he is to restrain himself and sit down again and sit thankfully in silence.

We do this not through any meanness and stinginess, as some people think—for we will not be so wrapped up in things that are transient as to prefer them to the comfort of our brothers. For why should we, my brothers, be keen to possess these things if they do not contribute to your service, as has been said? But we do this securing for you reverence and orderliness in this also, that the laxity of the majority may not find an opportunity from this to ruin the whole orderliness of the table, and we become no better than those who are undisciplined and irreligious, who are indulgent and entertain each other by drinking toasts and replying to toasts. [Not only] are we curbing the inclination of the will but furthermore we are rooting out the lack of self-control of the majority and teaching them to be satisfied with a few necessities and at the same time plaiting for you crowns for self-restraint. Also we are keeping you away from committing unintentionally a secret deed of darkness, not to say one of stealth.

Well then, is not something done in secret a deed of darkness? This is of course very obvious and the divine gospel of John makes it clear as follows, “Everyone who does evil does not come towards the light, lest his evil deeds should be exposed by the light” (John 3:20). The apostle also says, “Anything that is exposed is light” (Eph. 5:13), the statement showing that what is not exposed is complete darkness. “So for what purpose do you reject the deed of light and do the deed of darkness, my brother?” “I am ashamed to ask,” he says. So while you do the opposite and something which God hates you are not ashamed and you hesitate about what is good. Do not, I beg you. However I know that many do this trampling their consciences underfoot, and think that they are not noticed, which touches me to the depths of my heart, and I do not cease from weeping over them because they neither realize that they are in that evil plight, alas, nor acknowledge their passion. May the Lord have pity on them and guide them for their good as he manages all things for our good. We must now return to the point from which we digressed.

24. [= (22) Evergetis [9], ed. lines 418–36]: So after you have eaten and said the customary grace and risen, you should sing the specified office with the prayer and then go away to your own cells. At supper also, if someone who wishes to have supper arrives after grace, he will incur the same penalty as he who was late at the midday meal, if of course he does not have a reasonable excuse when he is asked. The one, however, who because of abstinence does not come to the supper incurs no blame. Then when you are at supper, only bread will be set before you and that in small quantities; but if some small fruits are set out by the decision of the superior, you should gratefully partake of these also. Drink will be distributed to you with the larger wine measure as is prescribed. But if in fact a feast happens to be being celebrated by one of the brothers with the knowledge of the superior, this regulation should not be observed [p. 35] at supper but you should act in whatever way the one celebrating the feast wishes.

The disciplinary official should go in during the second sitting and, if there are some who should have eaten at the first but missed it, he should enquire the reason for their absence. If their excuse is reasonable, they are excused, but if it is unreasonable, we instruct him not to allow them to eat. For to be late for meals for no reasonable cause is not something to be approved of, and this practice must always be punished and discouraged as much as possible. So this is the procedure on the ordinary days of the year.

25. [= (22) Evergetis [10], ed. lines 438–52]: But that is not the procedure during the holy fast days and especially during the first and greatest fast, on the first day of which, that is the Monday of the first week, the liturgy should not be celebrated nor should care be taken with the table or food. However on the subsequent days of the same week attention should be paid to the table, and whoever chooses should partake of food. This will be composed of legumes soaked in water and perhaps some raw vegetables and fruits, and the drink will be hot water seasoned with cumin. That is apart from Friday. On this day you should eat two dishes of food cooked without olive oil, and drink a better wine distributed in the larger measure because of the feast of the great martyr St. Theodore,¹⁴ which the superior must celebrate as a duty and give you a refreshment. But if someone else wishes to celebrate this feast, we give him permission to feed the brotherhood with some shellfish on the Saturday, but we will not eat fish. You should carry out the first week of the great and holy Lent in that way.

26. [= (22) Evergetis [10], ed. lines 453–78]: On all Saturdays and Sundays of the same holy fast two cooked dishes containing olive oil should be set out for you and for your drink the customary large measure of wine should be distributed. The same thing should take place also on Wednesday in the middle of Lent and on the Thursday of the great canon. But on Tuesdays and on the other Thursdays two cooked dishes will be set out for you, but only one not both of them will have olive oil; and wine will be measured out with the smaller measure, that is half of the larger one. Then on the rest of the days, I mean Mondays, Wednesdays, and Fridays, you should not partake of anything cooked nor wine but only boiled beans and some small fruits, if there are any, and hot water flavored with cumin. But if the commemoration of the discovery of the precious head of [St. John] the Forerunner or the remembrance of the Forty Saints should happen to fall on one of these days,¹⁵ then the fast should be broken and you should eat two dishes with olive oil and take wine measured out with the larger measure.

You are to eat fish if some are sent by devout people as a refreshment, however it is not to be procured by the monastery deliberately, and you should take care to celebrate one of these aforesaid days when it falls on one of the days of the first week, and you should have as refreshment not that of the aforementioned refreshments, but only wine of the larger measure and gruel. But then, on all the other days of the holy Lent you will not be allowed to eat fish at all, not even if [p. 36] perhaps some refreshment is sent you by someone. If however the person who is providing you with the refreshment should come himself to eat with you, then the fast should be broken on this occasion because of this special treat lest “We be seen by men to fast” (Matt. 6:16).

27. [= (22) Evergetis [10], ed. lines 480–502]: When the feast of the Annunciation falls,¹⁶ you should celebrate it as splendidly as possible, partaking of fish provided by the monastery and drinking wine of the larger measure. Furthermore on the next day you should eat anything left from the table of the previous day, and in the same way drink the wine. If no fish has been left, then you will have two dishes with olive oil. The procedure of the feast should be carried out as for days free from fasting. We will eat fish during this holy feast, as has been said, if it does not fall during the great holy week. For at that time we will use only shellfish, rather we will receive a refreshment because of the feast since for three days of that week—that is Monday, Tuesday, and Wednesday—as on the days of the first [week], it is right that we should live content with some legumes soaked in water, raw vegetables, fruits that happen to be at hand, and hot water flavored with cumin. If the aforementioned holy feast should fall on those days, we shall not partake of fish but of shell-fish, as we said, and we shall drink wine of the larger measure, and we will do everything appropriate for the feast even if it should fall on Holy Thursday, or Good Friday, or even Holy Saturday itself. We will keep the same rule also for the feast of the Presentation of Christ in the Temple¹⁷ which often falls in the first week [of Lent], as well as for the commemoration of the holy God-receiver Symeon¹⁸ as well, [which comes] one day later. On Holy Thursday your eating will be as on the days of Lent that are free from fasting in the matter of both dishes and wine; but on Holy Friday no cooking is to be done at all, but you are to partake of some raw vegetables and fruits, and wine distributed with the larger measure because of your weariness from the vigil. On Holy Saturday all anxiety that produces distraction must be avoided and there should only be a collation, as is customary.

28. [= (22) Evergetis [10], ed. lines 503–25]: In this manner your diet for the great and holy period of Lent must be kept, though care should be shown to the sick at the discretion of the superior. The procedure for the fast of the Holy Apostles¹⁹ we will lay down immediately next. After the completion of the whole canonical office of the hours and the divine liturgy as the synaxarion prescribes in detail, you should be summoned to the refectory at the seventh hour in accordance with the rule laid down above, and there you should eat two dishes cooked with olive oil and drink wine of the larger measure. Also supper should be set out for you consisting of a small piece of bread and the same amount of wine, namely a larger [measure], because of the heat and dryness of the season. However we will not eat fish provided by the monastery; but if some were to come as a refreshment, then we should partake of it gratefully, for [p. 37] it is not right to forbid this during these two lesser fasts.

The fast of the Holy Nativity²⁰ will be similar to that of the Holy Apostles in both food and drink, after the completion of course of the whole canonical office according to the synaxarion. It will differ from it in these two points only—in not performing the divine liturgy each day during the period of the fast, for the day being short does not provide enough time, and in eating once. For your food should be set out for you at the ninth hour during the period of a fast, as has been said; and it will always be a fast when “God is the Lord” (Ps. 117 [118]:27) is not sung at matins but “Alleluia.” So these rules should be kept in this way.

29. [= (22) Evergetis [11]: All the divine feasts of our Lord, and those of our most holy Lady, the Mother of God and Kosmosoteira, shall be celebrated by you differently from the rest. I mean in the singing of psalms, and the lighting of lamps, and in your own meals. Let the feast of holy metastasis, which we also call the Dormition, be celebrated by you—in a splendid, splendid and sumptuous manner. For it is the feast of feasts, and the festival of festivals.

During this feast, I decree that the previously mentioned distribution take place at the gate of the monastery.

30. Such then are the edifying injunctions and edicts excerpted, as has been said, from that typikon, and may they remain unchanged, and never be tampered with. What follows now are my wishes, and the decrees of my wretched mind for the said monastery, regarding the independence of the monastery (about which I previously set forth some few words);²¹ regarding the appointment of the superior and of the other officials, including the steward; [regarding] the tonsuring of the monks, and [their] entrance gift, and conduct, and regarding the government and management of affairs. [These] I wish to voice [on the basis of] my own conscience.

31. [cf. (22) Evergetis [12], ed. lines 538–43]: I desire, then, and decree, before God the Ruler of All and his all-immaculate Mother, that this holy monastery, as was stated previously, is to be independent, free of everyone’s control, self-governing, and not subject to any rights, be they imperial, or ecclesiastic, or of a private person, whether official or private. Nor should it be pledged or granted in the guise of a gift, by epidosis, ephoreia or management, or any other pretext to any person whatsoever, or to any monastery, any philanthropic institution, any government department or any hospital. Rather it should be watched over, managed, governed and directed by the Mother of God alone, worthy of all praise, the Kosmosoteira, and the superior of the time.

This superior, following his own discretion and inclination, will have sole charge of the introduction and removal of monks in the monastery, and all income and expenditures. To him, and to the monks under him, I entrust all these things with the help of God.

Since these words of mine here, and my orders have clearly excluded all those persons listed above from any authority over the monastery (except for the superior and the rest of the monks)—and although the gist of the present argument was outlined concisely and condensed in what was said before—I repeat: may he who [p. 38] wishes to invalidate a small or great part of my orders not escape the lot of the Jews and the anathema of those who crucified our Lord Jesus Christ. For with much sweat and struggle, and at well-nigh countless expense, I rebuilt this place from a ruin into a monastery, with the help of God. This much is clear to anyone.

It may happen that sometime or another, the monks might have need of the almighty emperor,²² he being truly the lover of Christ, on account of some threat that might perhaps arise to the monastery from people with malicious designs. If so, I fervently beseech his majesty to admit, graciously and courteously, those monks from the monastery who would come on account of that troublesome matter, and to hearken to their charges in the spirit of love for the Lord. He should, with the strong arm of his majesty, dispel those attempting to lay their greedy hands on the monastery and scatter them to the birds, as people who may have conceived designs, contrary to God and his righteous judgment, of obtaining gains for themselves at the expense of the monastery. For protecting it thus, the emperor may find the all-just eye of God merciful thereafter, and on the day of his fearful judgment.

32. I have now spoken enough already, therefore, about these things. I have given some instructions in advance,²³ and also made arrangements for the appointment of the superior—things that I myself have set forth—how, after my departure to the Lord, and when the superior himself is about to join him, the whole brotherhood should be called together in his presence, and with it the election be made of that pastor who will succeed him. The decision [should be reached] without the influence of bribery or any heated voting, but with either the unanimous consent of all the brothers, or a vote of the majority, [which should include] the more important and eminent of the monks in regard to rank and merit.

For it is necessary to elect a man renowned for his mind and his ways, in both active and contemplative life, and acknowledged by common consent to be the most spiritual, and, for the leadership and service of souls, wiser than the others and more experienced. Such is also the sort [of man] who should be elected steward. But if the superior dies before the election, [the election of his successor] will be the concern of the brotherhood, and he will be installed by the most holy metropolitan of Traianoupolis of the time, as I said before.²⁴

33. [cf. (22) Evergetis [13], ed. lines 633–39]: What follows now is a word about the installation of the superior. Whenever the brotherhood wishes to bring him before the said metropolitan, let them wait for a day on which there falls a feast of the Mother of God. On that particular day (and not on any other), let the typikon and the pastoral staff be placed on the Holy Table, [that] on which the sacrificial mysteries are celebrated. Then let him who has been chosen to lead be encouraged to enter the holy sanctuary, once the prescribed trisagion and the following troparia have been said: “Have mercy on us, Lord, have mercy on us,” “Glory,” “Lord, Lord, turn to us from heaven and behold” (Ps. 79 [80]:14), “And now,” “Thou, the only begotten Son, of one substance with the Father and the Spirit,” and thirty repetitions of “Kyrie eleison.” He should make three full genuflections before the [holy] table, [p. 39] and, taking from it the typikon and the staff, with everyone proclaiming the “[He is] worthy,” he [should] go out and stand at the place assigned to the superior, and be kissed by everyone—kissed as [their] father. This is then enough about the election and installation of the superior. For I have made things sufficiently plain here, and earlier as well.

34. [= (22) Evergetis [13], ed. lines 610–24]: As I have just enjoined regarding the election and installation of the steward, I wish for him to be chosen impartially by the superior, along with some eminent [monks] of the brotherhood. Let a vote be taken, and let him surpass all the other monks; in [his] ways and intellect and character and discipline—as much as possible like the superior in all this—and be distinguished for his superiority in spiritual [matters]. His installation should take place after the dismissal from matins and the customary prayer said by the priest, a trisagion should be said by all and the one chosen should make three full genuflections near the sacred screen of the holy sanctuary; then he should reverently kiss the holy, divine, and revered icons of God our Savior and of his most holy Mother. After that he should perform the proper obeisance to the superior and then bow his head to him uncovered and he making over it the sign of the venerable cross should say as follows, “The intercession of my most holy Mother of God through the prayers of our Holy Fathers is installing you steward of the monastery.” Then when he has given him the kiss in the name of the Lord, he is to set him in the place assigned to him. Next all without exception are to kiss him, and after the kiss glory should be given to God and the dismissal should follow the usual prayer of the priest.

35. [= (22) Evergetis [29]]: Thus it is necessary to proceed to the installation of the other officials in the manner of the steward's installation. The keys should be placed before Christ and the Mother of God, and the trisagion recited. He who is being installed, after the three required genuflections, should take the keys from there with his own hands, then bow to the superior, and receive from him the blessing mentioned above. For those installations which do not involve keys, the kissing of the holy icon, and the sphragis of the superior will be sufficient for the installation.

36. [cf. (22) Evergetis [30]]: It is fitting, therefore, that there should be three treasurers. One must watch carefully over the vessels and sacred liturgical cloths of the monastery, and he should be called the sacristan. Another will deal with the money and revenue and expenses, under the full knowledge and control of the superior and under the eye of the other notably virtuous brothers, he will record all the income and expenditures in detail. The chest containing all the money should be opened with them watching, and sealed again with their seals. For, by this arrangement, no [p. 40] dirt will be sprinkled on the clean, but the light of their commission will be bright before the brotherhood, and shall disperse the cloud of suspicion and shall persuade our Father who is in heaven to glorify the brotherhood on account of this good work. The third [treasurer] will distribute to the brothers the necessities from the wardrobe, I mean clothing and footwear and so forth—and see to the comfort of visiting brothers in their bedrooms as far as he is able. The common table of course will minister to their need for food to meet the occasion and the person.

37. [= (22) Evergetis [31]]: It is necessary that there should be a disciplinary official observing the brothers both as they enter the church for the singing of psalms and as they gather for meals, and in the same way at every hour advising and correcting in a brotherly way any who sit down together without good reason or chatter idly or do nothing or do something improper and foolish, persuading them to go to their cells and devote themselves to prayer and handiwork.

Furthermore there should also be a refectorian, attending to whatever the cellarer supplies him with, and going round the refectory at meal times reminding those brothers who are noisy perhaps or are whispering of the need for silence and that each of them should be reciting the fiftieth psalm in his mind. Also he should question visitors and sit them down at the table in a fitting position, and he should observe the entry of the brothers into the refectory and note which of them was absent during grace and which during the meal and report these to the superior. For if he does not do this, he will be punished as one who is not carrying out his office wholeheartedly.

38. [= (22) Evergetis [32]]: Naturally it is just to leave unchanged those who have been appointed to each of the offices while they are performing them in a careful and devout manner, but those who neglect or despise them and perhaps even behave deceitfully in them should be removed and others appointed. If one of these people were to appropriate something, anything at all, he will be answerable to our Lord Jesus Christ and his all-pure mother and Mother of God, from whom in fact he received his keys, promising to carry out his office eagerly and without deceit.

39. [= (22) Evergetis [33], ed. lines 1021–36, 1058–60]:

So I entreat the cellarers, the bakers, the cooks, those who look after the mules, those responsible for the dependencies, those acting as stewards in the monastery’s properties, those sent to the City [of Constantinople], those going away elsewhere on the instruction of the superior, and in short all those carrying out offices, to apply themselves to their offices wholeheartedly since they expect no small recompense from them. As regards those among them who are unlettered, the diligence and care they show in their office will be totally sufficient as their defense before God and us, but we exhort those who are educated but are perhaps prevented by the busy nature of their office from carrying out the daily cycle of prayers and from meeting with the brothers in the services not to be neglectful [p. 41] or despairing, as if they had lost the benefit to themselves, but be more cheerful and joyful because the Lord has given them the strength, who says, “I came not to be served but to serve and to give my life as a ransom for many” (Matt. 20:28). Those with offices who have been sufficiently exhorted by this will be devoted to their office and will carry it out well. But I will add to my discourse that matter which has almost slipped by me.

40. [= (22) Evergetis [34]]: Since then I have dedicated immovable properties to the monastery, the superior must have concern for them also, and he should be as careful as he can as to what sort of people are sent to have the oversight of them, that is they should always be reverent and discreet, and elderly if possible, unaffected by passions that are caused by the attacks of Belial (cf. 2 Cor. 6:15). This is all, at any rate, generally speaking.

41. [= (22) Evergetis [14], ed. lines 661–73, 675–76, 701–7]: So if the steward should continue unchanged, properly maintaining his virtue through which he was thought worthy of his dignity, he will not be removed from his office but remain firm. Furthermore he will rise to the office of superior, if, that is, he is trained and skillful in the tending of souls, and not unversed or inexperienced, and is judged as such as I previously described him. But if time proves him to be unqualified and unsuitable, either because he has carried out his office in a careless and indifferent manner or because he has been doing favors for his relatives or has been appropriating some of the monastery’s property or has shown himself to be a trouble maker and a dissident contradicting the reasonable regulations of the superior, or has been betraying or subjecting the monastery’s property to anyone’s control or has been totally disregarding any of the [instructions] in the rule and following his own wishes or clearly been involved in bodily passions or has become unreasonably attached to someone in preference to the rest of the community and therefore has been proved as unsuitable for the guiding of souls, and apparently unsuitable for the administration of affairs he will be removed from his rank and be submissive and another will be chosen and installed in his place, just as I have already said and specified.

29. KOSMOSOTEIRA

If the bad steward is shielded at the time by the superior's attachment [to him], and fortified, as with a strong wall, by his support, and is retained in office without being removed—[though] he has proved himself unworthy of it by his actions—then a select group of the most honorable monks may go before the superior, and take counsel with him once, twice or three times over this matter. If they find him adamant regarding the replacement of the steward, let them take counsel straightaway about him with the most holy metropolitan of Traianoupolis of the time, as a good advisor [regarding] the dismissal of the steward from office, [since] he was entirely responsible for the installation of the superior of our monastery, namely the Kosmosoteira. I know that he who is installed will not disregard the good advice of the one who installed him, but instead will be shamed before the man and before these spiritual regulations of mine. Thus, in place of that inefficient steward, let him substitute one who is manifestly good and virtuous—one such as I already described [p. 42] above. But if the superior, in his desire to dominate, chooses to persist in his bad judgment, unchanged, (as so often seems to happen among men), come all ye monks together with one single purpose, and dismiss the bad administrator who has charge of you. For God eyes from on high the conscience of those who are in charge. Then lead forward the one you have chosen as worthy of the office.

As for the one who is removed from office, if he wishes, let him reside in a cell of the monastery and be accorded the rank and seat of second to the superior, in the refectory I mean, and at the other gatherings, being content with the food and drink and all the rest of the community's way of life. However we do not allow him to leave the monastery and following his own inclinations go where he wishes, but this matter will be for the superior to consider.

42. [cf. (22) Evergetis [14], ed. lines 708–16]: But I beseech all of you monks, O heaven-guided gathering, before God the Ruler of All and his all-immaculate Mother who is the ephoros of the monastery, to banish all strife from your thinking soul, and, of course, the devil's envy, [the devil] who hung even the Lord our Creator up on the wood (what a sight!)—I mean at the time when the superior or the steward is to be chosen. I want the candidates to be chosen by an honest judgment, not on the basis of vain partiality or some irrational favoritism, nor out of any fraudulent conscience. For the unswerving judgment of the [man] who is selecting the candidates brings him forward, the judge, to be presented before God and men without blushing, in truth. With the Ruler of all on high, “searching the hearts and reins” (Ps. 7:9), they would henceforth bring constant destruction on themselves by any judgment that is not honest. Those who are responsible for the decisions in [these] matters must not make their choices on the basis of some disagreement or contention among the monks, or elect the candidate in this way, but the monks of the monastery must all make their selection and choice of candidates as joint counselors, in a spirit of cooperation that is free of factionalism, and in harmony, with respect to the good.

[cf. (22) Evergetis [17], ed. lines 801–2]: Hark to my words, O all-spiritual, heaven-guided flock of monks, hark to me, thou [who art] devoted to spiritual salvation! An unworthy [candidate] must not invoke in his favor as a plausible claim to sacred office either his sphere of work or noble birth or the offering of money or of some property. For these things quickly perish and are drawn down groveling as life goes on. For he who suffers in silence is to be preferred, he who excels in all the aforementioned [virtues], even if he was [but] recently successful in shaking off the tumult of the world and [his own worldly] hair, even if he is plain in his speech and without experience in matters of the outside [world], but wise in his thinking and richly endowed with godly virtues. For in no way will this bring harm to the monastery.

43. [cf. (22) Evergetis [16], ed. lines 764–65; 770–75]: Now I should probably direct the following words once again to you, holy fathers, and bring before you, O godly brethren, the following appeal: that you show the superior all affection, all submission, all [p. 43] obedience, [for] he will surely give an account of you to the Lord. But also burn [with affection] toward each other, maintaining peace and harmony, supporting one another, “instructing, comforting, and forbearing one another.”²⁵ “For God is Love” (I John 4:8). He commands it to be spread lavishly among men, and has called us his “disciples, if we have love for one another” (cf. John 13:35). Wherefore we must emulate the Teacher, and guide our life towards his actions, and not disregard a teacher such as [he], who endured an ignominious death on the cross for the sake of our salvation.

44. [cf. (22) Evergetis [17], ed. lines 785–99]: You, then, spiritual shepherd and guide of this holy flock toward more godly routes in the ascent toward our Creator, be moderate with the brothers. Display true spiritual good will, care for them all, patiently concern yourself with them all, as God for a long time has been moderate as a teacher with me. Support them all, instruct, advise and teach, encourage the sick yourself, healing [them] with the therapeutic remedies of [your] words. Encourage the faint hearted, skillfully turn sinners around toward ideal repentance for their sin, and do not delay, but lovingly, and following the voice of the Savior, spread out sympathy seventy-fold (cf. Matt. 18:22), for those who stumble. For it is better that we, who are imitating the Lord himself, be considerate [even though] a little remiss in what we ought to do, than that we be strict judges with regard to the inevitable chastening of the stumblers, as a certain wise man voiced [it] well, and [as] the truly great Basil himself said: “The superior himself, as a father caring for true children, will watch over the needs of each one and will bring them suitable healing and care as far as he can, and will support with love and fatherly affection the member who is truly weak, whether spiritually or physically.”²⁶ The superior, recognizing the power of all these [words] in theory, will not, I know, dispose of them lightly in practice.

45. [cf. (22) Evergetis [19]]: Since all the sacred [vessels] and liturgical cloths of the church and all the immovable properties assigned to it have been acquired with much toil and trouble from the straitened circumstances of my most unfortunate life, I wish [them] to be absolutely inalienable, to be kept completely safe, and as was said elsewhere, never to be given away. For they were dedicated by me as offerings to My Lady and Mother of God, the Kosmosoteira. For whoever removes any of these objects will be liable to the charge of sacrilege—unless the monks are able to cite some entirely reasonable and blameless excuse of the alienation, resulting from a chance occurrence, perhaps one arising from a fire or a raid by some enemies, or an earthquake—[resulting in] the collapse of the monastery, which has been wrecked, perhaps, and requires the restoration of what collapsed during the disastrous calamity. For in this case alienation will have occurred for a good reason; these things will have been lawfully sold to other churches.²⁷ Some things can be disposed of, however, if money is at that time urgently needed, and is lacking. The disposal should not be [p. 44] done by one or two people, but openly, with the superior, the steward, the ecclesiarch and other preeminent monks gathered together for this purpose. The removal of what is necessary should be done in the presence of all these people, with the inventory set in the middle of them and each of the removals signed by the superior. Furthermore, I instruct that there should be a detailed list to indicate the things that have been removed, signed by all those who gathered together and clearly setting out both the types of things removed and the reason for which they were removed; this should be deposited in the sacristy as a record.

46. [cf. (22) Evergetis [20]]: I decree that those officials who collect and disburse the produce of the monastery, such as grain, barley, wine, olive oil and so forth, should write down with great care from where and when come the incomes and to where go the expenditures, collecting and disbursing so that the brotherhood be content and not shocked. I made decrees above concerning the money, and wish for the decrees to remain as true, unbroken throughout.

47. [cf. (22) Evergetis [21]]: Embrace silence at all times; avoid idle chatter. For “by a multitude of words,” he says, “thou shalt not escape sin” (Prov. 10:19). But [if some of them amuse themselves with idle conversations or turn to vain chattering], let them not reject the admonishments of the superior. Anyone who devotes himself to rebuking the brothers will be subject to excommunication and to [some] penalty, if he remains unrepentant. Those who form idle gatherings, or linger together and do not, at the request of the superior, rectify the [situation] by correcting the error, will be liable to punishment. [= (22) Evergetis [22]: So also will those who acquire some possessions contrary to the rule of the monastery, even so much as an obol or a piece of fruit, without the knowledge of the superior. Similar to them is the person who eats and drinks in secret, unless he confesses, and the person who receives messages from friends and relatives, and replies to them. But the person who purloins something from the monastery and does not make amends will be expelled.

48. Now I have already before this decreed²⁸ the number of monks [that are to be] in the monastery. For the absence of decrees generates confusion. In time I want the flock to be subjected to an increase, within the scope of its potential. The piety of the monks, the love and harmony, and the strength of the supply of food and drink, and particularly the revenue from the immovable [properties] will make it easier for the superior to determine at his discretion the number of monks. For it is better to have the monastery consist of a few who are in the highest degree adorned with a conduct pleasing to God, than of many monks leading disorderly lives and scornfully throwing the law of the good out to the birds. [= (22) Evergetis [23]]: “For one doing the will of the Lord is better than ten thousand transgressors” (cf. Sir. 16:3).

TWELFTH CENTURY

49. Young men less than twenty-four years old shall not dwell in the monastery, even if they happen to be relatives or [p. 45] friends or acquaintances of the superior or of [any of] the other monks, or in any way especially dear to them, on the pretext of [their] service or instruction or of some expertise or skill, whether theoretical or practical, or of [their] being reared and educated. I reject entirely this sort of wish and action, as the cause of many scandals and of spiritual harm, antithetical to the laws and spiritual canons—and of course suitable for laymen, but not indeed for monks. For he [the monk] must keep himself apart from every physical craving and fleshly desire, and deny himself such things joyfully, and follow orders without distress. For the Lord says: “Whoever does not renounce all that he has (Luke 14:33), and hate his parents (cf. Luke 14:26) for my sake, cannot be my disciple.” “For no one,” they say, “can serve two masters” (Matt. 6:24). But if someone attempts, in the way described above, to have any sort of child with him, let him, and the [child] as well, be straightaway expelled from the monastery, and be rejected as something corrupt, a limb that is festering and cannot be healed.

50. If the superior of the monastery, [whoever he may be] at that time, should discover some relative, or other [person] familiar to the monks in this monastery, to be deeply desirous of the monastic life, and capable of performing some service, he will admit him without hesitation or hindrance to the monastery, providing he has passed his twenty-sixth year. But in no way should he follow the will of his relative, or serve him exclusively, but abide by the canons, rules and regulations commonly [observed] in the monastery, and obey the will and stipulations of the superior, and never act contrary to his opinion and counsel.

51. [cf. (22) Evergetis [24]]: It is very useful and appropriate for the monks to live two in each cell, and to conduct themselves in it as brothers one in soul, in agreement with each other. But there are certain occasions, that the superior would recognize, when he might want perhaps to have certain monks alone in the cells.

52. [= (22) Evergetis [25]]: I prescribe that garments be bought and deposited in the wardrobe so that when you need them you may receive them; and it is good to take care of your old garments as much as you can and use them. For only a use that is necessary should be sought, and a surplus should be hated as being of the devil. We give the same instruction also in the case of cloaks and vests and shoes, and in short, all necessities. So whenever anyone has a pressing need to receive a new item of these articles, he must bring the old one of course to the storehouse and hand this over and receive another one with the knowledge of the superior. For otherwise, if you do not bring the old garments, we order that you be not given another.

53. [= (22) Evergetis [26]]: In addition to these, we give you this instruction before God and our Lady herself Mother of God the Kosmosoteira, that each of you monks should all have the same food and drink, clothing and footwear, and that there should never be any difference in these things among you. But you will all use the same—I mean the superior, the steward, the ecclesiarch, those who are distinguished in age and virtue and in their exalted station in life, and those who are inferior to them in these matters. For you should only help and take care [p. 46] in every way of those who are clearly afflicted with illness, and for this reason perhaps need more abundant and better food and drink to sustain their unfortunate bodies. For I think that this shows discernment and preserves the conscience of every one else free of offense.

[= (22) Evergetis [27]]: Therefore it is necessary for the superior to enter your cells once a month whenever he wishes, and if any have extra items, he should take them away and deposit them in the wardrobe or give them to those in need.

54. I have now made enough decrees about the living—and I wish these to prevail unbroken under God. Now I would like to address myself a moment to my blessed late parents, and to the monks of the monastery here who have departed from this world. Concerning the thrice most blessed lords, the divine emperors my parents, the Emperor [Alexios Komnenos] my father who met his fate on August 15, and the holy lady my mother [Irene Doukaina] [who met hers] on February 19, I wish them to be commemorated daily, just as is done today, during the hymnodies, at the proper time, in the priests' prayers, [inasmuch as] they have been inscribed in the diptychs, for the sake of the Lord. When the day of their death comes around again, then let the commemorative services be performed by the monastery in a manner befitting them, according to the discretion of the superior. May I, the wretched, not fail [to be included] in their holy prayers!

Concerning the monks who depart in the Lord: even if I may have made provision elsewhere for them to be interred in different places, if within my lifetime I manage to complete for them the cemetery in the place where I ruled that it be restored, then I wish them to be buried in it, in a seemly fashion and with the proper funeral procession. Regarding the form, [namely] the epitaphios hymn, the long experience of the superior knows about such things.

Now I wish that my most faithful and dearest retainer, Leo Kastamonites, be also inscribed in the diptychs, and commemorated without fail. He was raised practically along with me from [our] early youth, and grew old with me. He devoted his whole self to many efforts and to many trials, by my wish and will. He always valued my life over his own both in dangers and in circumstances beyond human [endurance]. For not once—it is true!—did he let down his honor, working tirelessly, somehow, to serve me and to [assure] my complete repose. He surpasses, I am aware, all those in the hands of masters by as much, one might say, as the wide heaven is distant from the earth. This Leo, the hireling full of every spiritual beauty, may thou, O God, number among the souls of the saints, [for] he is reckoned as a steadfast canon of correct faith by all those who encounter him. However, wherever this man, who is still alive, should wish his body to be buried after his death, whether outside the church or in the common cemetery of the monks, I request for him to be buried in a stone coffin, in grand style, [under] a rubble vault with appropriate painting, and for a bread just for him to be offered on his behalf during the commemorations.

55. [cf. (22) Evergetis [37], ed. lines 1127–29; 1137–60]: The superior, therefore, being rich in understanding, should not shear for tonsure those coming from outside right away, but make them put on [novice's] rags and invest them with the [p. 47] monastic headdress, and then watch over them in the execution of their tasks assigned to them according to their abilities, to see whether they remain true to the ideal that had brought them here, and thus whether they should be ton-sured. I decree that the period of their patient endurance should last six months.

Those then who have been judged worthy to be accepted should not be put under any compulsion concerning a renunciation and an entrance offering. For we know that one must not traffic in the grace of God or sell it for money—perish the thought—and may the superior never harbor the unseemly notion, born from such a custom, that someone who makes an offering is more important than someone who does not. Never until the end of all time be it for you to consider or practice such a thing. If someone willingly offers something, let it be accepted. For that is freely chosen and not forced to propitiate God.

If a certain man should wish at some point to retire from the monastery—there are many such examples of fickleness—and would like to take his offering away with him, it should not be given to him, no matter what it might be. For what has once been consecrated to God must not be taken away, and he who takes it away is sacrilegious.

If at some time someone very wealthy should come to the monastery for tonsure, and for the benefit of the monastery wish to contribute and assign to the monastery some of his movable and immovable possessions, and to join the monastic community and to occupy within the monastery dwellings suitable for his own habitation, such a man should obtain satisfaction and should be received by the superior for the strengthening and benefit of the holy monastery, as has been said, even if the individual joining it is a eunuch, prominent on account of his station in life, and his wealth.

56. [cf. (22) Evergetis [38]]: I do not wish for there to be any distribution to women at the gate of the monastery, not because I hate our kindred human beings—far from it!—but because I naturally want to avoid the harm that lies in wait for monks from the arrival of women. Indeed such a habit always represents [something] evil, not good, for the brotherhood. But it is not forbidden to give to women during the general distribution that occurs on the feast of the Mother of God, or at any commemorative rites. For what [occurs] rarely [will] do no harm.

57. [cf. (22) Evergetis [42]]: Moreover, if the monastery should be reduced to the solution of [having only] two or three monks, I wish that there be no change or alteration due to that, or to other circumstances, ever, in its communal organization.²⁹ I thus wish for all the monks in the monastery to be as one body and one breath together, and for all to labor together with one another in everything, as limbs of one body, and not to stir up quarrels nor form improper friendships, [and] to refrain from claiming the seat of honor.

You must banish from yourselves the source of evil—I mean the love of money—which you must renounce, for the sake of the Lord [you must not] make a profit out of the monastery's possessions, nor in any other way at all to set aside and store up anything. However reason has determined that the loss through carelessness of anything [belonging to] the monastery is not exactly the same thing as these aforementioned crimes. We should also avoid improper familiarity.

My brothers, the orders I have handed you are not so hard to accomplish. [p. 48] Everything is made easier by the value of virtue. For we did not abandon the world for luxury and indulgence. If we use a little force on ourselves, the Kingdom of Heaven having suffered violence

(cf. Matt. 11:12), we would gain it. No one has ever gained a triumph by being careless; no one has triumphed over his enemy by sleeping. Crowns are for those who toil, and triumphs for those who survive the labors [such] contests [require]. I hereby beseech you all to succeed in these things, in the name of the Lord, the Ruler of All.

58. In addition to these other things, there is something I wish that is of utmost importance to me. Never should all these things be alienated that were unconditionally assigned to the monastery by me or by someone else for all subsequent time. This holds true as well for those movable and immovable possessions that will in the future be so assigned. Never, through a deed, exchange, gift, or any other form of alienation, should any of these things be alienated, or the ownership of them changed, even if the price or equivalent value offered should be double, triple, or even ten times as much.³⁰

Whoever, therefore, should attempt to overthrow, destroy, alter, or transgress this my wish and decree concerning the question of alienation in any way, by some either convincing or devious argument—even though he be an emperor, or bishop, or high official, or private person, or anyone else, whether superior of the monastery or one of the monks in it—will be classed with the Apostate and the Devil, will be judged with the Betrayer and the crucifiers of the Lord, and will be delivered to the eternal fire. In this life he will have the Mother of God and Kosmosoteira as foe, since she is the mistress of what has been assigned [to the monastery].

59. [= (22) Evergetis [42], ed. lines 1309–11; [43], ed. lines 1313–15]: Brothers, the “appointed time” of our life has grown very short. (cf. I Cor. 7:29) Remember your souls, and do not forget my insignificance in your prayers. You should also read the present typikon at the beginning of each month during your mealtimes, to remind you of your instruction, and for the benefit of your souls.

60. I decree therefore that two treasurers and the steward should be entrusted with guarding the money, with the knowledge of the superior as well. The incoming and outgoing money should be carefully recorded, and the box for it opened and sealed by them. As for the money put aside, if there is on occasion any in the monastery, the superior must do the sealing, with the steward, the sacristan and the two treasurers. If the need arises, [he] should remove the seals again in their presence, so that there shall be no cause for blame or offense.

61. Let there be a competent and proven doctor assigned to the monastery at all times, receiving from it appropriate recompense and a salary. His duty, which he should perform attentively and unceasingly, is to care for the sick to the full extent of his art, and to heal them wholeheartedly—both the monks of the monastery, and those ailing brethren whom, for the appeasement of God, I arranged to be hospitalized in the old age infirmary of this monastery.

The superior is responsible for bringing in medical supplies and storing them [p. 49] every year in the monastery whenever the time is right, in addition to almonds, sugar, and other things benefiting the sick. The superior should not be sparing of money, even if the income of the monastery should be very low, nor should he delay for any reason [the performance of] my will and order concerning the sick. Rather he should devote ten servants to minister to the sick and bedridden, for the brethren who are served by them must always constitute thirty-six. He should display all solicitude always toward them, since those brethren in the monastery [who have been] hospitalized for the sake of the salvation of my soul are in need of—indeed owed—their service and the care and attention of the appointed doctor. If for some reason the superior is careless in the performance of this instruction of mine, he will answer for it to the judge of all on the day of judgment.

TWELFTH CENTURY

62. These then are the things which I have recommended, as an exhortation and a fitting appeal to the monks, and have decreed in the present typikon, before the Mother of God. Now I must set forth and define [what is to constitute] adequate clothing for these monks, so that here too my regulations will find support. So, for example, every monk in the monastery should receive, by way of clothing, one double tunic each year, two undergarments, and two pairs of shoes which are to be repaired with leather once. For the [winter] shoes, one wool fleece.³¹ Every three years they should receive two vests, one [made] of cotton, suitable for winter, the other without cotton, to be used during the summer, and similarly, two cloaks, a summer kind and a winter kind. Every month they should be given one litra of oil for lighting the lamp in their cell, and one litra of soap for washing what is needed.

Let the superior take back from the monks the tunics that have gotten old, and place them in the wardrobe, and give these to the monks who enter the monastery late and are not present when the distribution of the new garments takes place. Each man who tends to the monks' mules, each baker and each farmer should have one double tunic, two undergarments, one pair of shoes, and two pairs of boots, and one fleece to make [winter] shoes and enough goatskin (?)³² for one pair of leggings, and, every two years, two vests, a summer and a winter one. These items, then, which I have prescribed, should completely suffice for the assistants and for the monks.

63. They clearly also require food each day, to satisfy their physical needs. I order therefore that they receive on Mondays, Wednesdays and Fridays the soup called "Holy Broth,"³³ and legumes, and on the other days of the week two dishes each: whatever fish the day may bring, and sufficient cheese, and every day two monastic wine measures—except during Lent, when they should have but one wine measure each day. On the feast days of the Holy Apostles, and on Christmas, and on my commemoration days, let the meals be at the discretion of the superior, with the food set out and [p. 50] drink provided.

Care must be taken that the superior seek out just the right time for purchasing cheaply the oil that is sold at Ainos, and that he buy it [but] once, for the needs of the whole year—and not from any of the agents, but from off the ships that transport the oil and put in at Ainos. The intelligence of the superior will see to it that wine is bought when the time is right—unless the monks should start up vineyards on the monastery grounds, for the area is suitable for this kind of cultivation.

64. As for the commemorative services for my soul, there is no need for me to make any arrangements. Nor do I want to exalt my soul by the foolish illumination of gleaming [objects], nor by any other customs of this world. For it is difficult to conceive how my soul, benighted as it is by the darkness of sin, would be illuminated by the lighting of wicks and lamps. But may God be gracious unto my soul, by the intercession of the Mother of God, and may the light of his ineffable love for mankind shine forth—which light we, unworthy of him, desire to reach. May the judgment of the superior execute in modest style the commemorative services for my soul—whatever is appropriate, according to long custom, for Christians who depart from this life.

65. But let us return a little to my intention concerning the above-mentioned feast of the holy Dormition of the Mother of God and the distribution to the poor that is to take place at the commemorative services for me, at the discretion of the superior. I failed to speak, however much I did say, about the feast of feasts of the holy Dormition of my benefactress the Mother of God. However, since I am never satiated in my longing for an honorable and comprehensive performance with regard to the feast of my benefactress, I wish, over and above all that has been said, for the following: after matins of that day on which we celebrate the Dormition, I wish for a number of priests and deacons to don the priestly vestments. The superior with them should carry in his hands the Gospel, another in line the icon of the Mother of God, and another the great cross which is set at the sanctuary. The appropriate ektenes having been celebrated therein, the priests should come out of the church bearing these objects, with appropriate illumination preceding them, and go out the gate of the enclosure in a procession. They should go down to the cemetery of the monks, and circle thus toward the other entrance [that is] opposite—I mean toward the western part. This progress which encircles the whole enclosure around the outside is for the sanctification and preservation of it and the whole area. Thus they should enter the church and return the sacred objects they have been carrying to their required holy places. The mosaic Dormition that is fixed over the door should, at the time of the feast, have illumination [that is] neither poor nor contemptible, but worthy of note—I mean suitable. Around this representation of the most holy Dormition I wish a sleepless lamp to be lit perpetually throughout the year with mastic oil. For I know it to be highly favored by the grace of divine inspiration.

66. Now the superior should have a boat in [the section of] the river Maritza that belongs to us, and catch fish and bring them back to the [p. 51] monks as food, and transport them frequently from Ainos, according to what is convenient at the time. There being many large fish, as I myself found out, in the river Samia, at the outskirts almost of Neokastron, the superior of the monastery should regulate with an alert mind the guarding of the river and its preservation so that the fish cannot be caught by just anyone happening by—for they are easily taken, and ideal for an easy catch, as I know well.

67. The site of the monastery being a naturally suitable one, and access to it easy and well-trodden, the superior will be sure to take care with such things, and in other ways as well. In his vigorous activity toward the good, he will make plans for maintaining [its] incomes and for adding to what I assigned to the monastery. Also it is necessary [to look after the bridge]—I have been deemed worthy to see, with the help of God, the construction of the bridge completed—this great and easily traversed bridge of massive stones that was constructed by me for my soul's sake, with much sweat and struggle and innovations, for the passage of strangers. This bridge I entrusted, along with my other possessions, to the hands of the Mother of God—stretched across for the passage of strangers, who previously encountered grave dangers, with respect to the marsh and the water spread about with the so-called flag stones, [there] where the bridge [now] stands. Also on it was set up that stone panel with the image of the Mother of God, as an object of worship for those who are passing across, and as the prayer of my wretched soul.

TWELFTH CENTURY

I wish the superior of the monastery to be ready and prepared, so that if perchance sometime or another some calamity befalls this bridge through all-subduing time, or befalls that other one that I established nearby in that place which is commonly called by most people Aeidaropniktes, he will re-erect it from the income of the monastery. He should lay down the expense for this calamity in the full knowledge of the rest of the monks, so that through the prayer of those who cross over it, I myself, I hope, may find easy and unmarshy that future bridge when I come to cross it to the eternal dwellings!

Whereupon, face to face in the presence of my all-immaculate Lady and Mother of God, I entreat and charge the superior of the time and all those with him never, for as long as this earth is in existence, to slacken in this spiritual work, nor to be careless, but to be serious, just as though I was still living and reminding the superior about this good work. For it was for the salvation of many that I established the bridge, with the help of God, in the place that I described above. Therefore, if my present order about the bridge should be overlooked by the superior and the rest of the monks, may they have to look into the face of God, the incorruptible judge, as people who perhaps neglected this work so beneficial to the public, and may they be reckoned by the Mother of God as destroyers of countless Christian people.

68. I have seen in various holy monasteries a considerable—and unbecoming—indifference with regard to the hymnody, on the part of the monks living there. Fearing from such stories lest the monks of this monastery disregard my orders in this present typikon, [p. 52] through laziness or negligence, I am already “taking the next best course”³⁴ out of necessity, and am ordering the monks to be roused from their pallets for the morning hymnodies at the hour called “Of the Third Cockcrow” and “Of the Cuckoo” on winter nights. In the summer [let them be roused] two hours before the break of day. This way the monks can complete the course of this hymnody more alertly and more vigorously.

69. Those of my immovable properties that came to me from family inheritance through imperial decrees and commands, and those that I have assigned to the monastery for its use and ownership from now on, so that it may have them entirely inalienable till the end of time, with all their territory safeguard and tenure, and with all rights and privileges over them, just as I declared above,³⁵ are as follows: Neokastron with its dependent peasants settled both inside and outside, and its houses, mine and those of others; also the rights over the fairs taking place there annually, and over the catch from the rivers Samia and Maritza for a good supply of fish. Also the estates Tou Kanikleiou, Lykochorion and Tou Drachou, and the promontory Banianous. The following estates: the village Sykea, and the estate before it that is called Tou Triphylliou are to be counted, by imperial ordinance, as belonging to Neokastron after the death—and from then on—of Aspeiotos, who at present holds it for his own use. I wish also for it to be relocated close to the monastery, where I also put Lykochorion and Tou Drachou—unless some difficulty arises, due to the length of the road between, for the inhabitants living in the village, in harvesting in summertime of the fruits of the farms, and the transportation of them to their relocated houses.

29. KOSMOSOTEIRA

In addition, all those immovable [properties] belonging to me as their owner both inside and outside of Ainos, which have been disintegrating for such a long time—these I wish to be restored. The estate Neochorion, the estate Kourianis, the estate Tou Choirospaktou, the village Batzinea, the village Tou Chousderi, the estate Tou Sinale, the newly-built estate Beros, Soter ton Blachon, the estate Hagios Nikolaos, the two military villages Tou Dilianou and Dragabasta, the fort Aetos with the village Tzechoba, the estate Sukaragi, the village Branista, the estate Neboselous, the estate Delbotzianous, the estate Tzampe, the estate Raunianous, the village Sophous—if it is not sold in my lifetime—the market Sagoudaous, with the dependent peasants and residents settled in it, with its ships and the rights *tou basilikatou*³⁶ and its warehouse.³⁷ These things [the monastery will gain possession of] after my decease.

After the death of Kastamonites [it will obtain] the estate Tou Galatou, [and] the village Tou Tzernikou. After the death of the pinkernes Constantine, the village Radaboundos. After the death of Niketas Romanites, the village Kerkizos. After the death of Konstitzes my foster-child—if he dies childless—also the village Tou Chatesiou. If he has children, may he have the authority to bequeath it, if [p. 53] he wishes, to them.

Furthermore, I also assign [it] the ownership of the [following places] cited in the confirmation of the other villages of the monastery of Kosmosoteira, my Mother of God: the village Kalosera, the field Tou Tzitze which I bought, and those farms belonging to me in Traianoupolis that have not been given to my secretary Michael. Also the twelve ships that were granted to me with exemption through the imperial decree of the late Lord my father, and which have a capacity of four thousand modioi. The ownership of all these, therefore, I assign to the holy monastery of the Kosmosoteira, my Mother of God and benefactress, just as has been said.

In addition, I want the superior to take up the deeds to these, wherever they are being kept, and to store them away in the sacristy for safekeeping. Nevertheless, he should at the same time have copies of them on hand to exhibit to any of those officials who might appear one of these days and make inquiries into our rights, on behalf of the public treasury and authority—unless I manage [already] during my lifetime to entrust these deeds along with my properties to the superior of the monastery. If perhaps some other of my deeds should refer to several beneficiaries, let the relevant passages be transcribed and given to the owners of these properties, to whom I assigned these, and the rights to ownership, [the deeds having been] signed by a judge.

Moreover, in addition to these I present and assign to the monastery those farms that I own outside Traianoupolis. I pray therefore to all-seeing God to prolong the remainder of my life for the sure fulfillment of these orders, and for the erection [and reclamation] of those dwellings and cultivated areas in Ainos, which, through time and the indifference of superintendents, have already collapsed and gone to seed. If perchance I depart too soon, which I pray will not happen, may the activity of the superior carry through this project for the erection and reclamation of these spots according to my wishes. For they are very necessary and useful to the monastery, constituting as they do an excellent dependency.

70. Having, it seems, almost reached the end of orders concerning these matters, I would like to give some orders regarding one other work of benefit to [my] soul, something that I have [already] begun. I have already built for the sake of God a rest house for the ailing brethren, to receive them and to provide a bed and care for their illnesses. It is actually outside the large monastery enclosure, yet inside the outer periphery wall of the establishment. There ought to be thirty-six brethren from among those which I, the thorough sinner, summoned for the propitiation of God. If I should enjoy, by God's inclination, an extension to my life, I will take responsibility for this matter in the days to come. But if things should turn out differently for me, may this my wish regarding the brethren be [carried out] by the superior of the monastery.

The brethren should lie on beds along both sides of it, and, for the relief of their physical ailment, each of them should have for his bedding, a double Cretan woolen mat³⁸ in place of a mattress,³⁹ and a rush mat, and two small fleece blankets,⁴⁰ and a heavy woolen cover instead of a spread, and a cloth⁴¹ pillow [filled with] wool. All this bedding should be immediately changed by the superior when there is any mishap, so that the brethren [p. 54] may rest undisturbed.

I wish for each of these brethren to receive immediately as [his] daily portion one loaf of bread every day made with one-tenth of a local modios, the loaves being comparable in quality to those of my fathers the monks. Furthermore, to accompany their bread they should each have two dishes—which I have indicated the monks should also have, in the refectory—and in addition one monastic measure of wine. For a special dispensation, and to be used instead of a monthly [allowance], each [of them shall be given] six [nomismata] trachea every month. When, with the help of God and the care of the superior, the sick brethren regain their health, they will leave there voluntarily, and others will be brought in to replace them, so that the exact number of brethren is kept intact—even before those who are departing have gone, so that no bed is left empty and devoid of a brother for even one hour.

For this is my intention and [my] directive at present: that the superior hire a doctor [experienced with] fractures to give careful medical treatment to the brethren in need of treatment. The doctor must always stay in the monastery. The medical supplies will be purchased yearly out of the income of the monastery, and placed in the cabinet by the superior, so that what is needed will be close at hand.

For I set up this particular holy monastery with the help of God not out of some illusion of glory, wasting thereby what was at hand by spending my resources, nor for the sake of some physical need or frivolous pleasure, which has no stability in this [world], but, to get to the point, for the propitiation of God and of his mother. Let him, too, bear witness to the truth of these present words as he looks unflinchingly at the evidence of the events. For not one stone—this I mean was my policy—or sliver of wood, or trace of tile, did I bring to the church without paying for it, always preserving a clear conscience with the help of God. But “with my hands and feet and hair and the soles of my feet,” as the poet says,⁴² I pressed on with the building of the monastery, virtually all day and all night.

I am consumed by a grievous illness that drains away my eagerness, yet I lighten my ailing flesh with a cane, and look all about with an anxious glance, and roam around the construction work—that being completed, I mean—even if my body in its illness compels me to cut short many of the days. Thus the yearning for the Mother of God and the seething desire in my heart's blood compels me toward such a project, whether I am willing or not. Quite naturally I held out as best as I could under the circumstances, remembering the infinite benefactions of the Mother of God in critical times. Wherefore I beseech the superior and all the brethren to hasten and rouse [themselves] to bring my orders to completion with all their hearts and minds, with God's help, and in humility toward the Lord. For it was humility that saved the publicans, and tears of repentance the harlots, while it was the arrogance of vainglory that condemned the Pharisee himself (cf. Matt. 21:31; Luke 18:10–15).

Each one should be provided, for use in his house, with one plate, and one bowl, and also one clay cup. Eight servants should be devoted to them because of the weakness of their condition. May this work never be interrupted, but continue for all time—[p. 55] unless the superior would be judged along with the brethren and with me, the sinner, on the day of the terrible judgment.

If one of these days the superior provides the brethren with a meal of fish as a special dispensation, may he receive from God an appropriate reward—for he should find no dearth of fish. Let the superior present himself once a week, on Sundays, to observe the brethren. [God] will reward him [for this] [lacuna in the text] our Creator crying forth to sinners such as me “When did you see me ailing and tend to me?” (Matt. 25: 43)

On the feasts of the absolutely holy Mother of God, let the superior provide the monks and the brethren with a meal of fish as a special dispensation, and, during the Great Forty [days of Lent], let him honor the monks my brethren who have fallen sick by attending to their human ailment with baths and food suitable to their ailment.

If, therefore, the doctor who will be caring for the bedridden brethren should require for some of them the use of a bath for the benefit of the body, let them bathe, and, to put it simply so as to be brief: the superior must regard the brethren as [though they were] God himself, and cherish them in all ways. However, if some of the brethren have to lie in bed for a long time, let the superior arrange for their bodies to be wrapped in garments [taken from] those old cloaks of the monks.

Since the physical ailments of those who are sick greatly require warmth, I order the superior to see to it that there is always enough kindling wood [gathered] from [sources] that are close at hand, nearby the monastery. Every night a very bright lamp must be lit in the home of the brethren, [for], there being an iconostasis, the lamp in it [must be] lit. If the superior should chance to provide the brethren with a special dispensation of food from the leftovers of the refectory, he would do right, and the reward will be dealt out to him by God.

There must be a church in a suitable place in the house of the [sick] brethren. The superior must arrange for it to have services by the appointment of some ordained monk, so that the brethren can listen to the divine hymnody from nearer by, on account of their ailments. Let the priest perform matins and vesper service, along with the liturgy.

As for the aforementioned brethren who may have to lie in bed for a long time, and do not get better quickly, I propose that they be clad in undershirts as well as in the old cloaks, as I said, of the monks. If they are utterly incurable, let them not be cast out of the home and its care (unless they are either cured by medical attention or die), but let them be clad in sufficient cloaks and undershirts [taken] from the aforementioned old cloaks of the monks. Whenever one of these brethren should die, he should be buried with the appropriate burial service, far from the monastery, at a spot of his own choosing.

TWELFTH CENTURY

The superior is obliged to restore whatever calamities occur in the course of time to the home of the brethren and to their bedding, [to assure] their eternal conservation. Whence also [the roof of] the building must be frequently tiled. But if by complete accident the house totally collapses one of these days, either ignited by fire or demolished by an earthquake, it must be restored [p. 56] by the superior back to its former state and quality, for the eternal conservation and preservation of the enterprise.

Let fermented wine not be given to the brethren, for the Lord's sake, as it is not a therapeutic drink, but one that does harm to the body. For "God is not mocked" (Gal. 6:7). Hark to my words, O my most holy father superior, hark, and do not disregard them, for you have the Mother of God as champion of what is said and done. I, the wretched, have myself appointed her supervisor of the monastery, and ever-present adversary for him who transgresses my decrees concerning these matters.

71. In addition to those, I also decree these: let no representative of yours cause any hardship to the inhabitants of the villages of the monastery under your [control], through injustice caused by greed (which is hateful to God). For through God's help they are not accustomed to unjust collections by me, as he is their witness. In this he should find God gracious, he who said, "Plead for the orphan and obtain justice for the widow" (Is. 1:17). For I have long been in the habit of pitying the poor such as these, which leads me to voice such matters to you before the Mother of God. For it is senseless and unreasonable for a holy monastery such as this to be awarded to the Mother of God yet have the inhabitants who furnish its income be harmed or made miserable, insofar as this is unnecessary. For whatever is dedicated to God must welcome and strengthen the good on all sides, lest what is blessed be defiled, as the saying goes.⁴³

72. What more do I, the unfortunate, need to say to men who take [as much] pride in virtue as in [their] monastic habit? Here again, O Queen and Kosmosoteira, enter my mind and tell me what is best for the undisturbed preservation of the work. Since with thine assistance I have by now already readied this monastery, and, with the skill of workmen, the enclosure surrounding it, [despite my] altogether straitened circumstances, I am, yes, most anxious indeed that everything be brought to a happy conclusion. This [I do] not out of "unrighteous mammon" (Luke 16:9) (far be this from me!), but out of what God originally granted to me, and out of periods of long suffering, struggles of great misfortune, and the natural relationship, the mother of affection, with [my] thrice-fortunate parents—even if the devil, woe is me!, totally begrudged me my position as son from the very first moment of my miserable birth, and all the fame and glory of my parents brought me little enough—plenty, actually, but all of it ill fortune. [All of this] has conspired, up to now, to hurl me into the trap of Hades (cf. Prov. 9:18), so that in addition to all this my tongue is [too] numb to formulate and describe the inexpressible [extent] of thine assistance, and to offer guidance. For silence, rather than speech, will praise the charms of thy greatness, with the mouth keeping still for the telling.

Since, then, it is my honest and inviolable intention that the enterprise of the monastery survive and be preserved secure and indissoluble for all time, not subject to any persons, I enjoin the most holy superior of the day, and all the monks of the monastery, to care for it, and to cling to it as to a most beloved mother, [p. 57] and to take hold on the other buildings in it as grandchildren, and to embrace them piously, and to drink with enjoyment from the soul-benefiting springs of the soul-sustaining hymnodies of the church—and, in short, to restore whatever damage they incur over the course of time.

29. KOSMOSOTEIRA

Now I beseech our bedridden brethren to address at each vesper service, for the mercy of my wretched soul, forty Kyrie eleisons to the Lord, particularly on the feast of the Holy Dormition of the Mother of God, this [being] the feast of feasts and festival, I say, of festivals, and on the day of my commemorative services. May God reward them for [this] work.

73. I have begun to build a cistern within the enclosure of the monastery. If it be finished within my lifetime, the superior and the monks must always care for its conservation and restore whatever damage occurs to it through time so that it may always [serve to] contain the water that I channeled to the monastery. Therefore from the hereditary owners of the source of this water a donation in writing was made to me of the right to it, signed by the metropolitan of Traianoupolis, and this document should be deposited in the sacristy for its eternal safekeeping. For it was only with much toil that I found the water through underground excavation, and for this I spent much of my early livelihood.

It is necessary then that the cistern be always filled with water and covered by a roof made of rubble masonry and tiles to protect it from the sun and dirt. To supply the cistern, the superior should care for the aqueduct and the water pipes that carry the running water sparkling and drinkable to the monastery. For I present this too, as a welcome offering to the Mother of God. Accept this also which I have brought to thee, O Mother of God and Kosmosoteira, accept it. The aqueduct should be built with appropriate forethought by the monastery, that it may use it unceasingly for the continuous preservation of the running water.

74. And so I think that the charms of the monastery and the site will draw many men to them. There is the spot itself—even if previously it was the dwelling of snakes and scorpions—the river Ainos, the sea with its surf and its calms, the pasturage and grazing land of evergreen meadows to nourish horses and cattle. There is the site on the crest of the hill, with its easy access. There is the fine temperance of the currents of air and the power of strong breezes with the everlasting reeds rustling in tune with them about the mouth of the river. There is the immense plain, and the panoramic view, especially in summertime, of corn in flower and in ear, which impresses great gladness on those who direct their gaze there. There is the grove of lovely saplings growing so near the monastery, and bunches of grapes are entwined among them. As a joy to the throats of the thirsty, water gushes forth wonderfully beautiful and cold.

75. Such things as these that delight the five senses will draw all to see and wonder at the monastery. In a site of such God-granted charms, I, the wretched, was led to restore the monastery with much pain and struggle. In the beginning, the lack of building material created difficulties [p. 58] for me, but, as from some prearranged signal again, round about like a treasure for me there sprang forth assistance to me from the Mother of God. A discovery of the necessary material came to light—miraculous to see, this discovery from an unexpected source, of lime in the enclosure, and of a source of water. Thus from a previous lack I arrived at an unexpected supply, and thus saw the material for everything I needed granted by God in abundance. For when they say, God wills, the laws of nature are confounded, and miracles are easily performed.

Worthy of description is something that happened during the construction of the church, foretelling the future entrance of sweet and radiant grace into it. Let me explain what it was. While the walls of the sanctuary were still in the process of completion by the workmen, suddenly, from where no one knew, a bee slipped into the hollow of the sanctuary where priests perform the holy mysteries, and there in some hole hastened to build its nest, along with the humming peculiar to its nature. From this the wise who learned of the event suspected that what had happened was not without cause or reason, but spread abroad the [view that the event indicated the] presence of the most sweet Holy Spirit in the church.

Yet again, not much later, I myself witnessed another miracle at the outside of the church. I was sitting in a low chair—since I was ill—and inspecting what the workmen had done, when the strangest thing happened. I saw a dove with a golden neck unexpectedly sitting peacefully on a stake fixed to one side of the sanctuary, over which at that time the strong roof had already been placed. From where the dove came, I had no idea. I made attempts to shoo it away from there, but it could be seen that it was reluctant to change its position and be shooed away. Thus it was roused a little distance from my chair when I urged it with my hands; it flew back up, but after a short while alighted near it and sat there. To the wise, the evidence from this was clear: the dove was foretelling by anticipation, as it were, the manifestation of the Holy Spirit in the church. Thus what was to take place was symbolically announced to the beholders by the dove nearing the sanctuary, to the enormous astonishment of those who witnessed it.

With tears I, the miserable, entreat the Holy Spirit, through the intercession of the Mother of God, to shine upon the monastery. To her I dedicated this holy monastery, and I entreat her to preserve it. I have faith that in respect to these things I shall not fail with such an appeal and supplication. Therefore let the hymnody be performed for the Lord's sake with attention and fear. For my soul has loved it very much since the days of my childhood, even though I myself have wallowed in the slime of sin.

76. Once again⁴⁴ a pious appeal comes to mind, and again I expound my wish to the most honorable superior of the day. For it is good, and pleasing to God, to proclaim good things over and over, and for me to return to my thoughts about them. For since I have loved the prayer of those peoples who bear the name of Christ⁴⁵ from a tender age, and hated [their] curse, [which is] abominable to God, I beseech the superior and the monks under him that the inhabitants of the villages entrusted to them never encounter any new [p. 59] burden beyond the just recording of the payments they owe, nor any unreasonable extortions. For [it is] with their hands alone and with their [own] hard labor that they procure and gather whatever is provided in the way of food for them and for their wretched wives and children and parents, for the most part—as well as whatever they grant to their managers and masters. For here God, and I too, would require this service of you.

77. What then? To the superior and to those who will succeed him as superiors of the monastery,

29. KOSMOSOTEIRA

I have this advice—and I mention and speak of this before the Mother of God with no doubts in my mind. May they never under any circumstances at any time wish to make an image of me as the unfortunate founder of the monastery—not anywhere here, either outside or inside the enclosure encircling the monastery. To do so would be a condemnation of my wretched soul and in opposition to my will and wish, which is pleasing to God. For I absolutely will not endure any such arrangement or proposal by the monks, and, the moment it happens, as I pray it will not, I am sure of this: that my soul will be ruined. For, to use the words of the prophet David, the revealer of divine things, I do not wish my form or “name to be delineated in the lands” (cf. Ps. 48 [49]:11). Rather I pray the Mother of the creator, through her intercession with the son, to strike out the list of my many errors, and, since I have repented, inscribe in the heavens, O God, my wretched name.

Whoever, therefore, among you superiors or other monks, should paint [my image] in the monastery and should act at any time against my will and instructions, will stand trial along with me on the Day of Judgment, and may be ranked with those who deny the Lord. For one does not want to be benefited against one’s will, nor to receive favors. For this reason no damage, but rather [a benefit] comes to me as I decree these things today. Therefore, I want the souls of the superiors of the day, and all the monks of the monastery, to refrain absolutely from any such intention.

78. Now let the inventory of both the immovable and movable [possessions] that have been assigned to the monastery be deposited in the sacristy by the superior and some other important monks. I wish for the future superior to be nominated from my monastery and not from elsewhere, by all the others in the community, without corruption, and to be selected in a pure manner.

79. Since I arranged, with the help of God, for the church to be adorned as far as possible with gleaming marbles and gold, I wish whoever is superior of the monastery to take every care to retille the roof when in the course of time the lead is ruined by holes, so that storm showers will cause no damage to the adornment of the church, through stain or dirt.

80. Let none of the monks assigned to the choir absent himself from the service, for the Lord’s sake, unless he is ill, lest the superior be condemned for this by God. For the superior must be impartial before [God]. Whence he must chastise the [monk] who, through laziness or neglect, absents [p. 60] himself from the service, with an injunction to endure the work for which God has summoned him. For “the sin of the people,” so he says, “passes to their leaders.”⁴⁶ So let the godly way of life of the superior observe my regulations well, under God. For God is—and let the monks harken—the model, the prototype, I would say, of humility and peace.

81. Let the tares of contentiousness and disorder [sown by] the devil be trampled down. For it is my most pointed intention, that all the monks in the choir always complete the required hymn [service], while the servants complete their required duties to them as a hymn to the Mother of God and for the good appearance of the church. Therefore, the monks should not examine the superior about anything, whoever he might be, nor put under review or investigation or examination his life and conduct. For this is thoroughly improper—unless by some chance he might very clearly and visibly be desiring things that [could lead] to the ruin of the monastery, or think and act in secret.

TWELFTH CENTURY

82. I want then, for the sake of the adornment of the church, that the monks should attend to its pavement with their hands every day, so that no sully of the shining marbles should, through the carelessness of the superior, be apparent to visitors. “I have loved,” the psalmist says, “the habitation of thy house, Lord.” (Ps. 26:8)

Therefore, I do not want the monks of the choir to wear the same shoes that they wear outside the church when they come into the area of the church for service. At that point I want them to put on other ones that are fresh and spotless. For thus, along with this, and in accordance with the value of virtue, I wish and I pray that the feet of the monks who advance for the hymnody of the Mother of God be clean, as a hymn to this very Kosmosoteira.

83. I do not wish anyone except for the monks and their attendants to enter the donkey-driven mills of the monks—whether they be country folk or women, or anyone else—lest contact with laymen cause some unseemly disturbance contrary to my intent, [and lead] to the monks being insulted. [These monks] I have especially loved from my tender years, and have venerated, as God is my witness, and in their pious company I wish to die. For monastic life is alien to the condition and turmoil of the world. For this reason I wish the donkey-driven mill to have no contact with any lay presence, or confusion in the worship of the Kosmosoteira.

84. But as I myself am desirous for the good appearance of the church in every way, I definitely do not wish for women to come into the church too often to worship. [Yet], lest I quench their burning piety toward the Mother of God by completely barring women from worshiping, I decree that women are to be admitted without hindrance, to worship the Mother of God and to pray for my wretched soul, three times a year to venerate the Holy Trinity, on [the day of] her holy Dormition, on the Annunciation and on the Nativity.⁴⁷ On each and every other [p. 61] feast of the year I absolutely forbid women to be admitted, in order that no further abuse of their access takes place.

Let it be the concern of the superior that the women enter with dignity and in proper order for worship in the church, through the door which faces the east, so that they do not mingle with the monks. Rather, let them be escorted by the ecclesiarch or some other God-fearing man to [their] worship after the dismissal of the liturgy, but not on some sinful pretext, nor for food or drink. Under no circumstances do I wish women to tarry within the enclosure of the monastery on their account, unless the superior might happen at some time or other to give permission to one of the monks to speak to a woman because of his apparent kinship [to her].

On the other days of the year there must be absolutely no crowd of women in evidence—though outside the enclosure they may, if they wish, worship at the mosaic image of the Mother of God above the doors of the enclosure. For unhindered and altogether free is the visitation of the Holy Spirit; for it blows where it wills (cf. John 3:8), circumscribed by neither space nor time.

85. Since I, the sinner, have placed my hope of salvation in the divine hands of the Mother of God and in [her] intercession with God, I exhort the superior of the monastery not to permit the priests to bury the Hovies left over on the paten of the Holy Communion, lest he and I be eternally condemned. For it is unnatural and unholy for Christ our God to be buried a thousand times, and by those who are ministering to him. Let attention, then, be paid to the dignified and irreproachable administration of the surplus Hovies.

29. KOSMOSOTEIRA

My own conscience was disturbed when I, at one point, witnessed an unholy sight, [an action] performed by some priests. For I have seen them frequently running off—whether for the sake of food or some other base and worldly need—some of the priests, as I have said, doffing their priestly vestments and handing over the Holies of the Holy Communion to the deacons after the dismissal of the liturgy—altogether out of greed for some necessities. For in this way others could receive the divine mysteries from them, in an improper fashion, coming to them later to share and to partake [of them].

Whence it behooves the superior to pay close heed to this matter that particularly troubles me, (and God as well as me), so that nothing unnatural takes place at a time when he might be occupied with some [other] matters. In fact I wish and pray that such a lawless action be cut out from every single church, as though with a double-edged knife.

86. Since I certainly indicated some time ago⁴⁸ where the remains of the monks should be laid to rest, as well as [those of] all [the people] merely [connected] with the monastery, I do not wish for any dead body to be buried within the enclosure after my death—unless perhaps, as I indicated some time ago, my man Leo Kastamonites should wish to be interred with honor, in the way I specified above, or my secretary Michael, or the protovestiaros Constantine the priest. But I absolutely do not want a single one or more of the other people—unless perhaps someone who is [p. 62] very rich would want to be buried outside the church and [its] narthex, [someone] who, in exchange for burial in the monastery will bring many movable and immovable possessions to [add to] its revenue.

I also wish the boy Konstitzes,⁴⁹ my foster child, to be sure to be buried in the monastery along with the men of mine whom I have mentioned—if when he has reached the legal age, he should wish to be buried in this monastery, according to my will. Also, I wish these men of mine whom I have mentioned to be commemorated in the diptychs.

I do not wish the countryfolk living at Lykochorion or at [what is] called Tou Drachou, those who are merely [living] in the vicinity of the monastery enclosure, to be buried in these villages, but far away from the town, wherever each dying [man] should wish, so that no unhealthy pollution enters the atmosphere through the nearness of graves [containing] bodies.

87. Since, in fact—and the Creator is my fellow witness in this—I have loved protecting others practically from [my] infancy up to now, and have hated evil greed (even though I, alas, the wretched, am wallowing in the mire of sin),—I speak these words not out of arrogance—not for me are the Pharisee’s frivolous bragging words! (Luke 18: 11) But in order to explain what I am about to say: I tearfully beseech all of you who are monks in the monastery, along with the superior of this new monastery of the Kosmosoteira, to do everything without exception for the poor, who are my godly brothers, everything that the regulation here in my typikon elucidates—and not those things alone, but more as well, as much as the means of the monastery can afford for the distribution, and the good conscience of the superior decides.

Hence I would happily throw great thrift to the winds when it comes to distributing to those in need, and heartily welcome the finest distribution which is that furnished by God, as a service above all to him who presides over our own betterment. For if we are to designate him a debtor, he who is the Lord our Creator, by sharing, I say, with one poor man, by how much more [if we share with] many, and especially since this charity will save from death (Tob. 4:11) this man here who is fettered by sins.

For it is said, “When did you see me hungry and feed [me]?” (cf. Matt. 25:37), and so on, including the [phrase] “And they will go away into eternal punishment.” (Matt. 25:46) What more bitter address, my godly brothers, could we then hear than this? None whatsoever! You must not put forward any reasonable-sounding excuse, such as, for example, a lack of income, to avoid making a distribution that is dear to God. For it is said, “Seek and you will find, knock and it will be opened to you.” (Matt. 7:7) Sharing will open the innermost heart of my Lord toward finding plenty of what is needed, and toward salvation. For it is said “God is served by nothing [so well] as by mercy.”⁵⁰

88. Since, then, I have indicated previously⁵¹ to them the number of the monks and of their servants, and am desirous in time to fix the number of monks at a much higher figure, if possible, I request the superior in his Christ-loving conscience to make haste to further increase the [number of] monks, as far as he deems the income of the monastery will allow. For the [p. 63] growth of the good toward the better will increase God’s untold mercy toward us. These then are my orders.

89. It was once my intention to have my humble remains interred in the monastery of Chora, and I set up a tomb there [to contain] them, in accordance with the wishes I expressed to the Chora monks. But now that I have renewed, with God’s help, this holy monastery of my ever pure Mother of God, the Kosmosoteira, another thought has come to mind, namely, to have my remains interred in this one. Indeed, I have begun to [take measures] towards this [end], which I [lay down as] injunctions in the present typikon of mine. Already, I have indicated in other requests and agreements with the Chora [monks] that the slabs of the coffin [that was to contain] my remains should be taken up, and placed here in order to receive my remains—that the [slabs] be taken up, plus whatever I myself joined to the tomb, just as the content of the letter addressed to me by the superior of the monastery of Chora indicates. This very [letter] has been deposited in the sacristy of this holy monastery of my Kosmosoteira the Mother of God.

It is my duty to carry out this plan, just as I wish [to do], with God’s help, if I have time yet to live. But if I pass away, it is the duty of the superior, along with the others, to fulfill this plan of mine and have the marbles of my tomb taken up from the monastery of Chora and to transport them to this newly established monastery (just the way I transported the marbles for the church), and to set up this tomb on the left side of the narthex, there where I made an extension to the building on account of the tomb.

In the center of the lid of my tomb, I wish my enkolpion [of] the Mother of God to be fastened in a prone position in [a setting of] silverwork; [this] has been readied and handed over, and I have just now deposited it in the sacristy. The important [elements] of my tomb at Chora (along with the marbles of the tomb), are the following: a cast bronze railing, and the portraits of my revered holy parents the emperors, and the stand for my mosaic [icon of the] Mother of God. As for the portrait of myself, made in my youth, in the vanity of boyhood, I do not wish for it to be removed from Chora, but to stay where I set it up. For my wretched body, which worms will tear apart, will not need to be honored with a likeness, after its dissolution.

29. KOSMOSOTEIRA

If by chance [the monks of Chora], with a greedy hand or out of willfulness with regard to my orders, balk and do not hand over the things of which I spoke, the superior of my Kosmosoteira the Mother of God, accompanied by some of the monks, must approach the holy emperor and file charges regarding this unjust business. He—for I know well the goodness of his conscience and his character—will not deem me unworthy of such a just appeal, but, for the sake of God, will return with [his] imperial hand the things that are being requested, that have been deposited in Chora for safekeeping.

90. But since the degradation of an unfortunate life has nursed me from infancy, and, in the course and flow of this life of ill-luck, [I have] been separated from my sweet fatherland for most of the years of my existence, a stranger to my kinsmen's renown and [since] of course I did not [p. 64] heedlessly choose the tomb here [to house] my remains, having run through in my mind and reckoned up all the things in life that together turned out badly for me, as I lie on a bed in a dark corner, alas grievously ill, by God's will, and already falling into Lethe, and of the memory

[lacuna in the text]

. instead of any other kind of adornment of fantastic glory for my tomb, [I want] the icon from Rhaidestos of the Mother of God as the Kosmosoteira, [which was] sent down to me from heaven, and which I framed with an ornament of gold and silver. [I want it] to be placed at one end of my tomb in its projected form. It should remain resting in that spot throughout all time, preserved without change, to mediate for my wretched soul. Furthermore, I wish [the icon of] Christ, which is the same size, to rest alongside it, the placement of these icons being appropriate for them, and pleasing as well, and the illumination suitable. Indeed if he fails to carry out this wish of mine, the superior and the rest of the monks will be judged along with me on the Day of Judgment. After my tomb is set up I need no other great expenses for it, as I will be insensible to the sight of the sensible and visual [world].

At any rate, I wish the tomb to be divided from the entire narthex by the bronze railing that I mentioned earlier, but access to the tomb [should be] through [this railing]. Every evening, after the dismissal of vespers, I want the superior and the rest of the monks to enter, and in front of the holy icons standing there, to pronounce the trisagion and say a certain number of Kyrie eleisons for mercy upon my soul. They [must] not fail to make the dismissal in this way, but [must] propitiate God and the Mother of God for me, with these [prayers].

91. I have made the services to commemorate me, and their form, dependent upon the virtuous conduct and the good conscience of the superior, not wishing to burden his freedom of choice by any perverse or compulsory [requirements]. Hark to my words, O my father and superior, and by no means disdain my wretched soul's prayer for mercy. Expect payment for this from the Ruler of All, who is sure to grant better things to good men. For I, the unfortunate and unhappy, who am [but] earth and ashes, dare not because of my series of failures raise my eyes to the heavenly height and the very light source of the divine dispensation. I am blinded in the eyes of the soul. For this reason I, a thorough wretch, am naturally in need of prayer for salvation of those blessed men like you, for the confidence [achieved] from some good deed is not for me [to enjoy]. Therefore, do not overlook, O Mother of God, Kosmosoteira, my wretched appeal for salvation. For what else [can] I say and what speak, from the multitude of my sins?

TWELFTH CENTURY

92. But the documents of the properties I mentioned that I have donated must for sure and without doubt be carefully guarded in a secure storage place of the monastery by the most honorable superior of the monastery of the Kosmosoteira. [He should] take them away from the superior of Chora, if I do not succeed in settling this particular matter before I die.

93. It is necessary for you to reward those who, with God's help, come to us, and to divine baptism, from a foreign religion, with one sort or another of special care. [This must be done] for the propitiation of my soul before God. [p. 65] For this reason I order that those called from the Jewish [faith] to us and to the true faith, Alexios and his wife Irene, [should] receive the following for as long as they live: for Irene, that which has been specified for her in a promissory note, namely three modioi of grain per month, fifteen trachea nomismata and one cloak each year. Her husband Alexios (if he goes on living with her) should receive two modioi of grain and two measures of wine per month, plus two hyperpyra nomismata a year. If someone else too comes forward with a sealed promissory note of mine, let the superior give him forthwith what is written [therein].

94. Out of the totality of my resources, I wish the monastery of the Kosmosoteira to take thirty litrai of hyperpyra and to store them away in the vestry, where they should lie undisturbed, along with whatever is left over of the income from the villages after the payments to the monks, to my brethren who are bedridden, and to their servants. This way if ever some calamity [should] befall the monastery or the houses around the monastery, it can be rectified out of these funds. For it is the duty of the superior and of the monks under him not to neglect this matter, but to keep stored away whatever amount of money would be required in such an eventuality. If God should give me a further measure of life, I will make this [my] great concern, with God's help, and take pains to store away yet more money in the monastery (by the means I mentioned), if my pledge should receive strength in this matter from God.

95. Let those [who inhabit] this particular monastery never fail to commemorate the famous emperors my parents and masters. When the day of their decease comes around, let them then be commemorated by the epitaphios hymn, by a night office and an offering. In short, let their commemorative services be performed following correct liturgical procedure—even though they have been received by God in the eternal dwelling places. In the tomb of my mother the oil has been seen to gush forth—she who (oh the marvel of it!), in the presence of the whole family, closed her eyelids with her own hands at the time of her decease. It was not someone else passing his hands over her eyes at the moment of death. For she departed in a holy way for the Lord during the first indiction, on the 19th day of February, [while] the emperor, my master and father, left life on Thursday the 15th of August, the day of the holy Dormition of the Mother of God.

96. I wish therefore that this administration of these properties of mine [that have been] assigned to the monastery never change throughout all time. I want to keep the [following] wish (along with those other regulations of mine) unaltered and unbroken in all the years to come without break: that the superior care, with his whole heart and mind, for the monastery that I restored with the help of God, and for the old age infirmary, and to strive to [keep] its residents satisfied in life, without delay or postponement, and to provide uncurtailed [what is] prescribed [p. 66] each year for the elderly patients. Since I leave the monastery behind in perpetuity and lacking in nothing, with the help of God, I wish the elderly patients never, whatever happens in the meantime, to suffer any loss or deprivation of that which was prescribed for them. For I wish them to receive these things each year from the superior plentifully, without curtailment or trouble, as much as

29. KOSMOSOTEIRA

[lacuna in the text]

. before God obtaining a resting-place for them and welcome security, and giving it over entirely to the Mother of God [so that she will] intercede for my wretched soul. For God does not allow the deprivation [caused] perhaps by neglect of what is to be given to the brethren, nor [does] his all-immaculate Mother, to whom, along with the brethren, I have dedicated absolutely everything that belongs to me. For the movable and immovable possessions that I, the sinner, brought with the help of God to the monastery of the Kosmosoteira (restored by me) are adequate for a reasonable reinforcement of my injunctions. In any event, this written version here of the typikon and the volume of my Secret Testament should suffice to make entirely clear and evident to the superior [which] immovable [properties I have] assigned to the venerable monastery of the Kosmosoteira.

97. I have already spoken about things that I have recommended above, and will [now] discuss those things that I came to recall today. I have completely restored a bathhouse, made of rubble masonry,⁵² as a favor for [the monks] and of many other Christians, and I have assigned it, along with the other things, to the monastery. It is outside the revered monastery, on the stream that runs alongside the cemetery for the monks. At this same time I put up houses around it [to serve as] a place for rest.

I want this bath to be leased out. I want for women who are in need of the bath to bathe themselves only on Wednesdays and Fridays, not on any other days of the week. On the other days of the year, I want it to be yielded to anyone who wishes [it]. Never, in all the days to come, do I want the bath to be neglected by the superior, as [this] would lead to [its] destruction. For its destruction would constitute a great failing on the part of the superior, and [bring] distress to all the others who [would be] deprived of [the chance to] wash.

I declare that the monks are to bathe twelve times in the entire year, that is, once every month. If the need should arise for some of the monks who are sick [to take] extra baths, let them be allowed by the superior to bathe themselves unhindered, for the sake of [their] physical ailment. The monks who plan to bathe must not be permitted by the superior to bathe in any other place or town except in the monastery bath.

The superior must make it his concern that there be established in the monastery some [of the] craftsmen required to execute the projects needed by the monastery.

98. Since it often happens, as I myself have witnessed, that the wickedness of mortals generally brings contention between them, and for this reason many secretly set fire to the houses of the inhabitants, the [men] doing this terrible thing—this I command, and with God’s help I exhort the superior, [seeing that] these [men] are foolish about [how to] do good: when some inhabitant of the monastery properties stealthily enters someone’s house and sets it afire, let all the residents of that village [p. 67] in which the fire took place be brought together without fail by the superior himself, to rebuild the burned dwelling.

TWELFTH CENTURY

Even if ten happen to be burned, this particular village must concern itself, out of necessity, with rebuilding those that were burned, not at the expense of any of those who lost their houses, but with the effort and zeal of the inhabitants of the village, whom I referred to. Let there be no delaying or any postponement of the work. Instead [let it be] carried out immediately and without fail.

If by chance, through divine justice and foresight, the man setting the fire should be caught in the act, and the superior [deems] his detention, and the disclosure, I mean, of the affair, not subject to question, but instead clear and indisputable, then I recommend [the following as] a fitting disciplinary measure and a punishment for [the man] who did the terrible [deed]. If the man does not have a wife or children, let his entire livelihood be given to those who lost their houses in the fire and to some other poor residents who are without property and are in need of assistance in life. But if the man in question does chance to have a wife and children, one half of his resources will suffice for him who did the harm (after his release from prison and chains), and let one-half be given to those [people] I have recommended, to restrain the wicked and search out the good.

In addition to this, I request the superior with [my] whole heart and soul to rise up without fail to vindicate the wronged residents and to chastise those who did them wrong. In this way God is served, as is his all-holy Mother, who will rise up flawlessly to protect this monastery.

99. Since the original documents for the immovable [properties] assigned to the monastery and to the old age infirmary have been given to the superior, and copies of the originals have been authorized with an indication from the bishop, the superior must not exhibit the originals when they are requested, but their copies. For the originals must be stored in a secure storehouse for all time, along with the original inventory and this typikon. Copies of these should always pass through the hands of the superior and the rest of the monks, for reference. For these are my commands, this is the way I want what must be done to be done.

All the things proposed with the idea of bringing to completion the construction work going on at the monastery, if they are not made ready during my sorely troubled life, if something is still left incomplete for the repose of the monks and of their servants, let it too be completed without hesitation and without fail by the superior, lest the entire project be unfinished.

100. Another crucial thought has now occurred to me, however, that I bring to light and I particularly wish to be followed to the letter. What I mean here is that each and every [bit of] income from the immovable [properties must] be collected with the knowledge not only of the superior but of the steward and the sacristan and of the other notables of the monastery who are responsible for these [matters]. The payments and the deposits must also [proceed] in just this way, for the sake of clarity regarding the income, and [a situation] devoid of scandal for the monks. For their seal must be placed on the income deposited in the treasury, for security and for a more precise knowledge.

29. KOSMOSOTEIRA

[p. 68]

101. Neither the cattle of the monastery, nor any other beasts of burden belonging to it should live within its large enclosure, but outside of it, around the S-shaped wall. Here also the grooms must take care of the horses and the mules, and the farmers must round up the cattle for the rest from labor and from plowing. [In this way] the area of the large enclosure (that encompasses the church and the dwellings situated around it) will remain wholly clear of dung.

102. Should at any time some calamity befall the church due to an earthquake one of these days—which I pray will not be the case—the superior would not grant any delay in its restoration, but rebuild it straightaway keeping its present form, and the quality of its color and material. For I do not wish it to undergo any other alteration, however much cheaper, on account of the calamity, but for its present features and visible characteristics to be preserved forever just as they are.

103. On Easter Day, the day of the Resurrection of Christ my God, there must be a procession like the one proposed⁵³ for the holy Dormition of my ever-pure Lady, the Mother of God. Let candles be given to the monks and lit, one candle to each monk, each candle weighing one and a half ounces.

Let no superior, for the Lord's sake, ever at any time consider moving the villages situated near the monastery, or allow them to be established at some other place. For it is advantageous to the monks and to the monastery that still other [villages] be added, if possible, in this proximity [to it].

104. Therefore, since I have completely renewed the church of St. Prokopios outside the enclosure [for the use of] the countryfolk, I want them to come together there for the hymnody, unless from time to time they should want to come to worship in the large church. I request the superior to pay constant attention to this along with everything else: that he not allow the countryfolk to partake of eggs, cheese or often even meat on Wednesdays and Fridays (as I myself have witnessed in my lifetime), nor ever refuse them [admission] to matins or to the liturgy on Sundays or on the great feast days. Let the semantron summon them all in the usual way to visit their church. For the pastoral authority will lead them willing or not toward the good, and will not suffer them to become prey for wolves of the mind, nor [will it] neglect any calamity [affecting] the church that I built for their sake. But when this one suffers damage, let it be rebuilt by the countryfolk for the preservation of the church.

105. If then the superior should see the party of the monastery of the Pantokrator pacified (after my death, perhaps) with regard to the vineyards of the Gastivilenoi, let Gastivilea continue [to belong] to the monastery under him, as was heretofore confirmed. But if disorders should again follow upon disorders, and troubles grow into legal troubles, the superior of the monastery must remain calm in these matters, and must sell Gastivilea, with all its rights, to the party of Pantokrator, which wants to buy it. Let the money from the [sale of] the village [p. 69] be used in turn to buy another village of benefit to the monastery. I want calm to prevail in every way, in everything—even though I was offered sixteen litrai of hyperpyra by the Pantokratorenoi to sell the village property during my lifetime, I refused, because it was [too small] a sum.

106. I have bequeathed some books to the monastery (how many there are is indicated by [the list of] their titles in the inventory of the monastery). I bequeathed another book in addition to these, one that I composed with great effort. It [contains] heroic, iambic and political verse, as well as various letters and ekphraseis. I do not want this [book] to lie in an obscure place, but to be displayed often as [something to] read (and in memory of me) to those especially industrious men (and they [are the ones who] want to come upon books and pictures). I do not wish these books to be alienated by the monastery but to survive here forever. For what has once been dedicated to God is inalienable. These things, and other such, I thus recommend.

107. Since my secretary Michael, in all respects my dearest retainer (just as I said earlier too)⁵⁴ has labored greatly over the foundation and the rebuilding of this holy monastery and of everything erected around it—indeed in an almost superhuman [way]—and suggested many ideas to me about them, novel arrangements of buildings [that are] essential and useful for the monastery, in many [cases] the clever intentions of a talented nature. In fact, following his advice I myself renovated most of what was being done by the workmen, marveling naturally at the truly marvelous dexterity of the man in such matters. Hence in accordance with my wish, he erected dwellings for his stay, and at his own private expense, within the enclosure of the monastery (there where he is now living). I do not wish the superior of the time, nor the other monks, to hasten to remove him from these [dwellings], for any reason of the monastery, for as long as he is still alive, as this house has been built by him. But he [shall] live in it and rest without being interrupted whenever he so wishes, as [though he were] an internal monk and a ward of the monastery, an integral part of it, or a most beloved child, one might say.

He [shall] be especially cherished by the superior and assisted when there is need. He should receive two fresh loaves of bread a week (of those coming into the monastery), and each [week] the same amount of wine as that given to each of the monks, somewhat as a special dispensation for him, and as an indication of his being a most beloved ward of the monastery, as I say.

When he reaches the end of this life ([for he is] but mortal), and departs from here, at that time (providing he himself goes along with my wish) I want for him to be [treated] magnificently by the superior and the other monks [in his] funeral procession and in his burial, as a service to God and to me. Let him be buried in a coffin of the very best marble and with a rubble vault worthy of his efforts in my service. For I wish this arcosolium to be decorated with painting. Moreover, his tomb should be put together and set up in the right or the left part of the exonarthex after my death.

Here too should be [located] the tomb of my most intimate man [p. 70] Leo Kastamonites, unrivaled in [his] loyalty to his master. I want it to be constructed in the same way, and for both [men] to be inscribed in the diptychs and to be commemorated forever. I therefore wish for [the superior] to cherish Kastamonites himself, too, both during his lifetime and after his death, in the holy monastery, and for him to be reckoned as an integral part [of it] by the superior and the monks under him.

29. KOSMOSOTEIRA

After his death, [the superior] should cherish the immovable [properties] that I gave to him [Leo] as if they were his own and not allow any of his blood relations or strangers to cast a greedy hand on those properties and possessions of his, against the will and ruling of Kastamonites himself, who begged me with tears for this. I require and charge you, O most honorable superior, whoever you might be at the time, in the presence of the Mother of God the Kosmosoteira, not to transgress or disregard anything, small or large, in this matter of these two retainers of mine, unless you wish—as I pray you will not—to have the Mother of God my benefactress as [your] prosecutor both here and on the Day of Judgment.

Then there is the boy Konstitzes, my foster-child, the nephew of my dearest vestiarites Niketas Romanites, [he whom] for the sake of God I reared with so much affection, practically from his swaddling clothes—I have spoken about him already.⁵⁵ I wish this child not to be reckoned as a stranger to the monastery but as an integral part [of it] and [its] ward in every sense. But timidity on the part of the superior should not [result in] his being [buried] in an outsider's grave. Rather [let him] be buried in a special place of honor within the monastery, with appropriate love and kindness, for my sake, and with proper magnanimity. At any rate these are my requests in these matters.

108. Above and beyond the [properties that], with the help of God, I assigned to the monastery, I assign it also the church that is near the *Peribleptos*⁵⁶ in Constantinople, called and referred to as St. Stephen of the Aurelian, to be used, it too, by the holy monastery of the Kosmosoteira as a dependency, a place to stay for the monks when they come to the capital.

In order to construct and rebuild it I have [had to] pour into it myriad payments of gold (as God is my witness), as the church was altogether in ruins, and I [had to] put on a new roof, and to renew totally the rental properties around it, that can be seen even today. I received the church and [the buildings] around it by a patriarchal act, for me to establish a monastic institution, as a fervent hymn to God and to his all-immaculate Mother. I recommend therefore that three monks should be appointed by the superior of the Kosmosoteira in perpetuity to this particular church [to assure] its preservation and perpetual conservation, as a hymn to God and to his Mother.

I wish the proper hymn [service] to be celebrated therein, with appropriate lighting and a liturgical procedure suitable for the monks, and [for them] to restore anything in the church that comes to ruin over the course of time. In short, it should be maintained forever as a monastic institution and a dependency for the monks of the Kosmosoteira. The paper documents for this particular church must be kept safe in the sacristy by the then superior of the Kosmosoteira my Mother of God. For the [p. 71] holy monastery of the Kosmosoteira must, without fail, take this particular dependency in hands as its own, with all the rights attached to it, from today on.

109. As for the holy icons that have been dedicated to stand at my tomb, [that are] renowned as paintings, if ever over time their wooden parts should start to fall apart, the superior of the time must not fail to [employ] a first-rate craftsman to lay the images again on to other boards [fashioned] with skill out of elm wood, and must set the images back up where they were before, at my tomb.

TWELFTH CENTURY

110. Now I introduce another piece of wise counsel and I address the superior of the time as good counselor, with the help of God, and I want the import of the counsel not to be disregarded, [as this would bring] harm and damage to the holy monastery. For since, along with the other immovable [properties] I have also assigned to it these two villages, that of Tou Dilianou and the one referred to as Dragabasta⁵⁷—in these there are some soldiers. [These men] often behave shamelessly toward their neighbors and toward the superintendent of my villages, and are disobedient when it comes to paying the taxes they owe, emboldened, perhaps, by [their] military calling.

It is essential that the superior welcome them cordially with open arms to his table, after I die, and treat them courteously in every way, so that he may have them as friendly allies. With their [support] he should be strong enough to drive off those who have settled themselves around our villages and wish out of greed to attack them with violence—as I see happening in many cases today. For these [soldiers] are capable of being of assistance to the monastery, and of warding off evildoers, and are extremely beneficial. So I wish the villages [belonging to] my secretary Michael, that I gave to him, and [those] of Konstitzes my foster child, to be helped in a friendly manner and in many ways, and to be cherished by the superior of the time, as far as he is able.

111. Now then I wish that every troublesome or insoluble matter that creeps in to disrupt the group of monks or is brought up against the superior, and does not find a ready solution, be referred without fail to the most holy patriarch of Constantinople of the time, and be discussed with him. The decision and solution of the matter should be reached there, under God. Then the monks who, along with the superior, approached the patriarch to consult him on the matter should retire peacefully to their own monastery once again.

For I have not given to the patriarch any other authority or supervision over the monastery, by this my written will, save only the [power to make] a decision in some such troublesome matter that may come up between a group of monks and the superior, as I have said, and [the power] to appease [them] through counsel and recommendation—often [invoking the authority of] an episcopal injunction, in [those] cases where the monks approach him and file charges, and [then] are disobedient about observing the recommendation [that was made to] appease them.

112. But since I am responsible in every way for the conservation of this monastery with the help of God, and for the everlasting preservation of everything that is of advantage to it, [p. 72] I have come up with another thought: I hereby declare that all those men I selected from the episkepsis of Neokastron whom I used in the role of vestiaritai, who worked for me until my death on the construction of this holy monastery from its very foundations, and in other hired jobs and essential services—yes, and those who, after the completion of its construction, were also counted as vestiaritai together with the others, and summoned from the aforementioned episkepsis of Neokastron—these [men] should be altogether immune, after my death and up until their death.

[They must] never be dragged into compulsory service or extra compulsory service or *psomozemia*⁵⁸ by the superintendent of the monastery villages, nor by its superior. Rather [they can] resettle all together, [leaving] the place in which they live today, with their entire household, and live near the God-protected fortress of the monastery, there where both Lykochorion and Tou Drachou, which I resettled, are located.

29. KOSMOSOTEIRA

These particular vestiaritai are at the same time to assist the monastery and ward off those who might try to harm it and ruin its possessions. For I wish and order these vestiaritai to be obedient to such action on the part of the superior, and to be used for dispatch work, whenever the superior will be in need of them. [It is] for such things above all that I have bestowed upon them, as I have said, exemption and immunity from other compulsory services and psomozemiai after my death.

If ever the superior has occasion to make use of one of them for some service, in the city or in another place, he must not fail to give the man being sent a horse to ride (since he is poor and without resources), for use on the prescribed route only, and such payment as corresponds to the distance to the destination.

Should some of these particular vestiaritai wish at some time or another to serve under some other master rather than work for this holy monastery and not to obey the most honorable superior (as I have ordered [them to do]), let them henceforth be deprived of all the privileges to which I entitled them, and be banished from the episkepsis of Neokastron, and sent away to another estate by the superior even if [they are] not willing. For they are at odds with my wishes regarding their benefits.

In any event, both this present typikon of mine and my written order to the aforementioned vestiaritai will make this clear, though the superior can determine their number and names more easily from the [written] order. Their assistance is useful to the monastery, and for this reason the superior must embrace it as much as possible, in fulfillment of my wish and decree.

113. Since I have provided the monastery with water in abundance—it is channeled through the middle of the city to fill its cistern and to provide ample [water] for the refectory as well—the superior must scrub [the cistern] diligently with water, and clean the latrines of the monks as well with [water], frequently, lest the air become ill-smelling and sullied by the excretions piling up in the holes of the latrines and a detrimental illness be introduced among the monks on this account.

Along with [everything] else, I have already erected two baths, [p. 73] [one] outside and [one] inside the monastery. The one that lies outside I built to be freely accessible to [whomever] wishes, and as [a source of] income for the monastery. I want it to be preserved inviolate and in good order for all time. Let the superior never cease to concern himself with its conservation.

As for the one built inside the enclosure of the monastery, since I made it for my seasonal use and enjoyment, I wish and exhort whomever is superior of this particular monastery at the time that I pass away, if this bath and its use becomes a special comfort and a benefit for the monks, that he preserve it for their sake, and keep it going for all time. But if it should appear to be a liability to the monastery and [lead] to the monks being disturbed by powerful individuals passing by outside, [who] have been admitted to the monastery to worship the Mother of God, let it be torn down completely at that time by the superior, and its [building] material used for other houses outside the enclosure for the benefit of the venerable monastery.

[For] the Sleepless Eye on high knows what struggles and efforts I expended on it, I, a greater sinner than all [other] men, as a hymn to him who is our creator, and to my benefactress, the Mother of God. Thus, at any rate, I prescribe these things and such as these, thus I command, thus I exhort the superior and the godly brethren my fathers.

TWELFTH CENTURY

114. This crucial point too I am including into the present text of my will: never at any time shall any stranger traveling along the highway that is near the monastery discover any harm or wrong on the part of the monastery, but rather find it unimpeded, and easy to traverse. Let those in general need of guidance [receive] it, as much as possible. For this reason (which is perfectly obvious to the passerby) I have cut out, as with a double-edged knife, even those tolls that have belonged to me for many years—those, I mean, from the passage of travelers that I received as a paternal inheritance. For the Divine [Being] rejoices, of course, in the kind treatment of the needy and in their protection, and knows how to grant liberal rewards to those who treat [them] kindly.

115. What I outlined some time ago⁵⁹ about the bath inside the monastery I now decree about my own dwelling, which has been built outside [of it]. If the superior should feel that it is [causing] some harm or disturbance to the monastery on account of travelers who may, in their greed, camp inside it, let the house be torn down completely.

116. The Gift and Grant Ordinance of all the properties consigned to the monastery has been rolled up and sealed up with a lead seal and deposited by me in the sacristy, so that its contents shall remain secret until I die. When this occurs, let the superior and the monks with him straight-away lay hold of this particular ordinance as their property, unroll it and follow the intention of what is written [therein]. [Then], in accordance with it, [they should] take charge of the immovable [properties] that I have donated, including, of course, the village of Kalosera and [p. 74] the one called Tou Tzitze and the fields in Traianoupolis that belong to me, just as I have indicated both in my Secret Testament and in the Gift Ordinance.

117. Well now, let me address myself again to certain matters that, with God's help, [may be] of some advantage to the monastery—matters that I have mentioned [already]. I managed at some time before this⁶⁰ to request that Michael, my secretary, and Leo Kastamonites, are to be [held] dear by the superior, [whoever he may be] at the time, and by all the monks under him, and are to be reckoned as wards of the monastery in absolutely every way. But to insist again on this particular idea, I request that they, along with the most honorable superior of the time, be of assistance and every support to the monastery, up until their last breath, with the help of God, and are to look upon it and reckon it as [something] that lives in place of me. The faith and loyal service that they showed me, let them render to this very monastery, before God the Ruler of All, and his ever-pure Mother.

To these two dearest men of mine I have entrusted my foster-child Konstitzes, with the help of God, and [have entrusted] his education to the monastery (as well as to them), in accordance with [my] instructions. I hereby decree that when this boy reaches the age of eighteen, he should take the money and clothing that have been assigned to him and stored in the monastery. I append this also to my decree: in no way should the unstable will of a boy of this age be immediately free to squander, improperly and in places he should not, the things that belong to him, for the sake of some senseless childhood novelty. Rather let the payments be made with the careful attention and counsel of those men of mine whom I appointed to educate him. This must be carried out until the boy turns twenty-four and takes a woman in marriage. So be it.

29. KOSMOSOTEIRA

118. But since, in addition to the instructions above, it was absolutely necessary for me to leave instructions regarding the burial of the monks in the monastery, and to determine a favorable location for it, well then, I will say something on the subject and make my intention clear regarding [matters] as they stand. I did want for these godly men to be interred inside the enclosure of the monastery, out of reverence toward them, and to honor their dead in a more personal [way]. But since its area, that is, [the area within] the circuit wall, is almost completely taken up by the church and the houses needed by the monks, and there is no fitting or agreeable place left over in it for the bodies of the dead, I changed my mind about burying them inside it.⁶¹ [Instead] I have marked out with a trench a spot for the monks to be buried. [It is located] outside the circuit wall that I mentioned [earlier], by the stream near the bathhouse I restored. In the middle of it I have traced out with a spade [the lines of] a small chapel, to appease God and his Mother, and I have myself just now begun to lay the foundations for it and for the stone wall around it. I am very anxious that this particular plan be completed.

If the intercession of the Mother of God to the Son should grant me a further extension to my life, with their [help] I will [see] my wish fulfilled regarding the proper height and breadth of the circuit wall and the construction of the chapel. If not, I leave it to the superior of the day [p. 75] to complete this [undertaking], as well as the mausoleum of rubble masonry at one end of the circuit wall. The spade marks that I made today will certainly elucidate my future plan for the buildings.

I want the entire mausoleum that has been laid out at one end of the circuit wall to be roofed in rubble masonry with a clay core, and for the whole circuit of the wall to be three cubits in height, and interrupted by a door providing access to the chapel for those who wish to enter. May the superior not be negligent about the conservation and maintenance of all of these. The mausoleum must be divided into two [sections] by slabs or by a constructed barrier, and two monks must remain there to sing in the chapel, just as I wish. During the hymnodies of all the monks, at matins and at vespers, they must proclaim unceasingly this theotokion: “Oh more venerable than the Cherubim”⁶² until in the extending power by the ordinance that I wrote, signed and gave to them, and I instruct [them] to be content [to follow] my [ordinance] in these matters without curtailment or alteration.

[lacuna in the text]

119. However, O all-seeing Kosmosoteira, may I not fail here [to receive] thine assistance and thine intercession with thy Son, our creator, and may thou not reject my piteous appeal on the day of God’s terrible judgment. Do not decline my moan, and my tears, but receive graciously into thine undefiled hands that which has been brought to thee today by my unworthy self, in atonement for my multitudinous sins and to redeem me, the one who is accountable for them, and who persists in entreating thee with tears. For I, the unfortunate, have taken refuge in thine assistance and protection, bowing my head at thine immaculate feet, O my benefactress, awaiting release from my crimes through thine intercession. Amen, amen, let it be, let it be.

With the help of Holy God, the end.

Notes on the Translation

Editors' Note: The assistance of our translator, Nancy P. Ševčenko [NPŠ], is gratefully acknowledged for the notes to this document.

1. See below, [65], [84], [89], [90].
2. Unidentified quotation.
3. Gregory Nazianzen, Oratio 14.4, PG 35, col. 861C.
4. Feast of the Dormition, August 15.
5. See H. Follieri, Initia Hymnorum Ecclesiae Graecae, vol. 4 (Rome, 1963), p. 95. [NPŠ]
6. Feast of St. John the Forerunner, June 24; feast of St. Nicholas, December 6.
7. For Isaac's personal secretary, see [107] below; cf. [69], [86], [107], [110], [117].
8. For Isaac's "most faithful and dearest retainer," see [107] below; cf. [54], [69], [86], [107], [117].
9. Prayer attributed to Basil of Caesarea; cf. Horologion to mega, ed. M. Saliveros (Athens, n.d.), p. 118.
10. Cf. Pseudo-Basil, Constitutiones asceticae 12, PG 31, col. 1376AB.
11. Unidentified quotation.
12. Basil of Caesarea, Regulae fusius tractatae ([LR 26]), PG 31, col. 985CD.
13. John Klimakos, Scala Paradisi 4, PG 88, cols. 618B, 705C.
14. Saturday of the first week in Lent.
15. Feast of the Discovery of the Head of St. John the Forerunner, February 24; feast of the Forty Martyrs, March 9.
16. Feast of the Annunciation, March 25.
17. Feast of the Presentation of Christ in the Temple, February 2.
18. Feast of St. Symeon, February 3.
19. Fast of the Holy Apostles, from Monday after the feast of All Saints (Sunday after Pentecost) through the vigil of the feast of Sts. Peter and Paul, June 28.
20. Fast of the Holy Nativity, from November 15 until Christmas.
21. In [12] above.
22. In the first instance, Isaac's nephew Manuel I Komnenos (1143–80).
23. In [12] above.
24. In [4] above.
25. Cf. Rom. 15:14; I Thess. 4:18; Eph. 4:2.
26. Pseudo-Basil, Constitutiones asceticae 28, PG 31, col. 1417C.
27. Cf. (27) Kecharitomene [10].
28. In [3] above; see also [88] below.
29. Cf. (27) Kecharitomene [2], [55].
30. Cf. (27) Kecharitomene [9].
31. pokarion; for which see Demetrakos, Lexikon, s.v. On the "winter" shoes—covers for regular shoes in cold weather—see Demetrakos, s.v. ortarion.
32. lounikion; see (28) Pantokrator, n. 68.
33. hagiozomion; broth made with water, onions, and oil, and served in bowls containing a few pieces of bread. See Koukoules, BBP, vol. 5, pp. 37–38.
34. A proverb; see E. L. Leutsch and F. G. Schneidewin, Corpus Paroemiographorum Graecorum, vol. 2 (Göttingen, 1839–51), p. 362.
35. In [45], cf. [58] above.
36. tou basilikatou; it is not clear whether the reference is to an imperial agent (basilikatos) or to a tax (?) (basilikaton).
37. phoundax; state warehouse for grain and other foodstuffs. See A. Kazhdan, "Phoundax," ODB, p. 1671.
38. kentouklon; for which see Demetrakos, Lexikon, s.v.
39. piloton; see N. Oikonomides, "The Contents of the Byzantine House from the Eleventh to the Fifteenth Century," DOP 44 (1990), p. 209.

29. KOSMOSOTEIRA

40. pokrobion; not in the dictionaries. Probably akin to pokos (“fleece”).
41. branea; according to Demetrakos (Lexikon, s.v.) this word denotes a “striped linen mat.”
42. Euripides, Hecuba 837, ed. N. Wecklein (Leipzig, 1877), p. 58.
43. Aristotle, Ethica Nicomachea 1099b2. [NPŠ]
44. Cf. [71] above.
45. Cf. John Damascene, De imaginibus orationes. 3.42, PG 94, col. 1357D. [NPŠ]
46. Unidentified quotation, possibly patristic.
47. Feast of the Nativity of the Mother of God, September 8.
48. In [54] above; cf. [118] below.
49. For Isaac’s foster child, see also [107], [110], [117] below.
50. Cf. Gregory Nazianzen, Oratio 14.5, PG 35, 864BC. [NPŠ]
51. In [3] above; cf. [48].
52. enchoregon.
53. In [65] above.
54. Cf. earlier references in [12], [69] and [86] above.
55. In [86] above.
56. For this foundation, see Janin, Géographie, vol. 3, pp. 218–22.
57. See [69] above.
58. Lit. “bread penalty.” A secondary tax, probably a requisition for bread for the army. See A. Kazhdan, “psomozemia,” ODB, p. 1755.
59. In [113] above.
60. In [107], cf. [54] above.
61. See [54], [86] above.
62. H. Follieri, Initia Hymnorum Ecclesiae Graecae, vol. 4 (Rome, 1963), p. 95. [NPŠ]

Document Notes

1. Section One: Original Prefatory Materials

- [1] Preamble; relationship to the Secret Testament. See repetitive discussions of the latter in [96] and [116] below, and other such testaments in (14) Ath. Testament [3], (24) Christodoulos [B], (51) Kouloumousi [C11], and (52) Choumnos [A3].
- [2] Foundation history; defense of the source of funding. See other examples of the former in (22) Evergetis [2], [3]; (23) Pakourianos [1]; (24) Christodoulos [A2] ff.; (25) Fragala [A1] ff.; (26) Luke of Messina [1], [2], [3]; (27) Kecharitomene [Preface]; (28) Pantokrator [Preface]; (30) Phoberos [2]; (31) Areia [M1] ff.; (32) Mamas [Prologue]; and (33) Heliou Bomon, Prologue. See repetitive treatment of the latter in [70] below.
- [3] Number of monks. See the different conclusion reached below in [48] and the additional treatment in [88], with similar provisions in (27) Kecharitomene [5], (28) Pantokrator [19], (30) Phoberos [42], (31) Areia [M4], (32) Mamas [5], and (33) Heliou Bomon [5]. The minimum age of 30 set here is lowered to 24 in [49] below and (for relatives of the monks) to 26 in [50].
- [4] Relations with the local prelate and the patriarch. For installation of the superior by the local prelate, see [32] below and similar provisions in (28) Pantokrator [25], (30) Phoberos [35], (32) Mamas [1], (33) Heliou Bomon [1], and (34) Machairas [140]; cf. contrary provision in (31) Areia [M15]. For patriarchal mediation of disputes, see also [111] below.
- [5] Consecration of personal property. See similar treatment in (19) Attaleiates [16], whose author is, however, careful to note [17] the reservation of other properties.
- [6] Requirements of the cenobitic life. See repetitive treatment in [57] below; also subsequent treatments of dietary regulations in [24] through [29] and in [63] below.
- [7] Daily prayers for the founder. See other treatments in [11], [64], [72], and [91] below.
- [8] Typikon of Evergetis authoritative for hymnody and diet. (32) Mamas [46] also forthrightly endorses the liturgical typikon of Evergetis, while its close copy (33) Heliou Bomon [45] prefers the Studite typikon, (4) Stoudios.

TWELFTH CENTURY

- [9] Feasts of the Mother of God. See similar treatments in (27) Kecharitomene [60], (28) Pantokrator [7], and (34) Machairas [28].
- [10] Feast of the Dormition. The author seems to be familiar with (22) Evergetis [11], but does not quote it here. See additional provisions for this feast in [29] and [65] below, and similar treatments in (10) Eleousa [13], (23) Pakourianos [11], (27) Kecharitomene [59], (33) Heliou Bomon [48], and (34) Machairas [27], cf. [29].
- [11] Other feasts; founder's commemoration. See other treatments of the latter in [7] above and in [64], [72], and [91] below.
- [12] Institutional independence; selection of a new superior. See repetitive treatments of institutional independence in [31] below and of the election of the superior in [32] below. See similar provisions for independence in (22) Evergetis and related documents, (23) Pakourianos, (24) Christodoulos [A16], (28) Pantokrator [69], and (31) Areia [M12], [T12]. For the selection of the superior, see similar or alternative provisions in (22) Evergetis [13]; (23) Pakourianos [5]; (24) Christodoulos [A18]; (25) Fragala [A7], [B7]; (26) Luke of Messina [11], [12], [13]; (27) Kecharitomene [11]; (28) Pantokrator [24]; (30) Phoberos [35]; (31) Areia [T10]; (32) Mamas [1]; and (33) Heliou Bomon [1].

2. Section Two: Evergetian Transcriptions

- [13] Office of the first hour. Drawn almost verbatim from (22) Evergetis [4], cf. related documents: (27) Kecharitomene [32]; (30) Phoberos [9], [10]; (32) Mamas [47]; (33) Heliou Bomon [46]; and (34) Machairas [30], [31], [32], [33], [34].
- [14] Guidelines for reception of communion. Drawn almost verbatim from (22) Evergetis [5], cf. related documents: (27) Kecharitomene [33]; (30) Phoberos [11]; (32) Mamas [5]; (33) Heliou Bomon [32]; (34) Machairas [36], [37], [38], [39]; and (58) Menoikeion [16].
- [15] Prescriptions for the ninth hour, vespers, compline, night office, midnight office and matins. Drawn almost verbatim from (22) Evergetis [6], cf. related documents: (27) Kecharitomene [35], [36], [37], [38], [39]; (30) Phoberos [12], [13]; (32) Mamas [47]; (33) Heliou Bomon [46]; (34) Machairas [48], cf. [42], [43], [44], [45], [46].
- [16] Obligation of confession to the superior. Like [17] and [18] below, drawn almost verbatim from (22) Evergetis [7], cf. the related (34) Machairas [50].
- [17] Guidelines for confession. Like [16] above and [18] below, drawn almost verbatim from (22) Evergetis [7], cf. related documents: (30) Phoberos [14], (32) Mamas [30], (33) Heliou Bomon [30], and (34) Machairas [51], [52].
- [18] Daily confession; great confession at tonsure. Like [16] and [17] above, drawn (here verbatim) from (22) Evergetis [7], cf. related documents: (30) Phoberos [15] and (34) Machairas [53].
- [19] Use of the synaxarion for fasts and vigils. Drawn verbatim from (22) Evergetis [8], cf. the related (30) Phoberos [16].
- [20] Importance of both the office and diet. Like [21], [22], [23], and [24] below, drawn verbatim from (22) Evergetis [9], cf. related documents: (30) Phoberos [20], (32) Mamas [17], (33) Heliou Bomon [17]; (34) Machairas [61]; and (58) Menoikeion [8].
- [21] Refectory procedures. Like [20] above and [22], [23], and [24] below, drawn verbatim from (22) Evergetis [9], cf. related documents; (27) Kecharitomene [40], [41]; (30) Phoberos [21]; (32) Mamas [17]; (33) Heliou Bomon [17]; (34) Machairas [62], [63]; and (58) Menoikeion [8]. See also the contemporary treatment in (28) Pantokrator [9].
- [22] No arguments over seating precedence. Like [20] and [21] above and [23] and [24] below, drawn verbatim from (22) Evergetis [9], cf. related documents: (27) Kecharitomene [42], (30) Phoberos [22], (32) Mamas [36], (33) Heliou Bomon [35], and (34) Machairas [64]. See also the contemporary treatment in (28) Pantokrator [9].

29. KOSMOSOTEIRA

- [23] No sharing of food or secret eating. Like [20], [21], and [22] above and [24] below, drawn verbatim from (22) Evergetis [9], cf. related documents: (27) Kecharitomene [43] and (30) Phoberos [22].
- [24] Evening meal. Like [20], [21], [22], and [23] above, drawn verbatim from (22) Evergetis [9], cf. related documents: (30) Phoberos [24], [26], and (34) Machairas [66]. See also the contemporary treatment in (28) Pantokrator [11].
- [25] Diet for the first week of Lent. Like [26], [27], and [28] below, drawn verbatim from (22) Evergetis [10], cf. related documents: (27) Kecharitomene [47], (30) Phoberos [27], [28], (32) Mamas [18], (33) Heliou Bomon [18], and (34) Machairas [67]. See also the contemporary treatment in (28) Pantokrator [12].
- [26] Diet for the rest of Lent. Like [25] above and [27] and [28] below, drawn verbatim from (22) Evergetis [10], cf. related documents: (27) Kecharitomene [47], (30) Phoberos [28], (32) Mamas [18], (33) Heliou Bomon [18], and (34) Machairas [68], [69], [70]. See also the contemporary treatment in (28) Pantokrator [12].
- [27] Feast of the Annunciation. Like [25] and [26] above and [28] below, drawn verbatim from (22) Evergetis [10], cf. related documents: (27) Kecharitomene [47], (30) Phoberos [28], (32) Mamas [18], (33) Heliou Bomon [18], and (34) Machairas [71], [72].
- [28] Fasts of the Holy Apostles and Christmas. Like [25], [26], and [27] above, drawn verbatim from (22) Evergetis [10], cf. related documents: (27) Kecharitomene [47], [48]; (30) Phoberos [29], [30]; (32) Mamas [18], (33) Heliou Bomon [18], and (34) Machairas [76]. See also the contemporary treatment in (28) Pantokrator [12].
- [29] Feasts of Christ and the Mother of God. The feast of the Dormition is also discussed in [10] above and in [65] below. This chapter is drawn almost verbatim from (22) Evergetis [11], cf. the related (30) Phoberos [32]. See also treatments in (27) Kecharitomene [59] and (28) Pantokrator [12].

3. Section Three: Mixed Original and Evergetian Materials

- [30] Founder's special prescriptions. This chapter is meant as a transition from the Evergetian "quotations" to the founder's allegedly original materials, but as will be seen below, the dependence on (22) Evergetis continues.
- [31] Independence of the monastery. The subject has already been treated in [12] above, but here the author makes some use of (22) Evergetis [12], cf. related documents, in the course of this reiteration of his earlier declaration, to which he adds some original provisions.
- [32] Election of the superior; his qualifications and those of the steward; role of the local prelate. See earlier treatments of the superior's selection in [12] above and of the prelate's role in [4] above.
- [33] Installation of the superior. Like [34] below, draws upon (22) Evergetis [13], cf. related documents: (27) Kecharitomene [11], (32) Mamas [1], and (33) Heliou Bomon [1]. See also the similar treatments of the hierarchy's rights in (28) Pantokrator [25] and in (30) Phoberos [35].
- [34] Election and installation of the steward. Even more so than [34] above, this chapter draws on (22) Evergetis [13], cf. related documents: (32) Mamas [7], (33) Heliou Bomon, and (34) Machairas [81].
- [35] Installation ceremony for other officials. Draws almost verbatim on (22) Evergetis [29], cf. related documents: (27) Kecharitomene [18], (30) Phoberos [47], (32) Mamas [6], (33) Heliou Bomon [6], and (34) Machairas [92].
- [36] Duties of the three treasurers. Draws on (22) Evergetis [30], cf. the related (30) Phoberos [36], for this older concept of financial administration. The author draws on a different model when he returns to this subject in [60] below.
- [37] Duties of the disciplinarian and the refectorian. Draws verbatim on (22) Evergetis [31], cf. related documents: (27) Kecharitomene [25] (refectorian only) and (30) Phoberos [48]. (27) Kecharitomene [26] has a different provision for its disciplinarian, as does (34) Machairas [114].
- [38] Tenure of office for officials. Draws verbatim on (22) Evergetis [32], cf. related documents: (30) Phoberos [38] and (34) Machairas [92].

TWELFTH CENTURY

- [39] Exhortation to all officials. Draws verbatim (but with major omissions) on (22) Evergetis [33], cf. related documents: (27) Kecharitomene [25], (30) Phoberos [48], (32) Mamas [23], (33) Heliou Bomon [23], and (58) Kasoulon [10].
- [40] Qualifications of property administrators. Draws almost verbatim on (22) Evergetis [34]. cf. related documents: (30) Phoberos [49] and (34) Machairas [109]. See also the treatments in (27) Kecharitomene [31], (28) Pantokrator [64], and (31) Areia [T8].
- [41] Grounds for deposition of the steward. Extensively utilizes various parts of (22) Evergetis [14], written for a different administrative structure in which the steward generally succeeded the superior in office; cf. related documents: (27) Kecharitomene [12], (30) Phoberos [35], (32) Mamas [2], and (33) Heliou Bomon [2]. As a result of this close utilization, there is this extensive discussion for the steward's but none at all for the superior's removal from office.
- [42] Elections to be impartial. Draws on brief but ideologically significant portions of (22) Evergetis [14] and [17]; cf. related documents: (27) Kecharitomene [12], (30) Phoberos [36], (32) Mamas [45], (33) Heliou Bomon [45], (34) Machairas [148], and (58) Menoikeion [18].
- [43] Obedience to the superior. Paraphrases (22) Evergetis [16], cf. related documents: (27) Kecharitomene [12], (30) Phoberos [36], and (34) Machairas [142]. See also treatments in (28) Pantokrator [14], (32) Mamas [24], and (33) Heliou Bomon [24].
- [44] Exhortation to the superior. Paraphrases (22) Evergetis [17], cf. related documents: (27) Kecharitomene [12], (30) Phoberos [36], (32) Mamas [42], (33) Heliou Bomon [41], (34) Machairas [144], and (58) Menoikeion [19].
- [45] Inalienability of consecrated property. This subject is treated again in [58] below. This chapter paraphrases (22) Evergetis [19], cf. related documents: (27) Kecharitomene [10] and (30) Phoberos [38]. See also treatments in (32) Mamas [37], (33) Heliou Bomon [37], and (34) Machairas [94]. The provision for sale of movable property to other churches suggests an acquaintance with (27) Kecharitomene [10] or perhaps a parallel passage in the lost typikon of the Philanthropos monastery.
- [46] Bookkeeping requirements. These are also discussed below in [100]. This chapter makes some minor use of (22) Evergetis [20], cf. the related (30) Phoberos [46].
- [47] Discipline of idle talkers; no private possessions; no secret eating. Makes use of brief but ideologically significant passages in (22) Evergetis [21] and [22], cf. related documents for discipline of idle talking: (30) Phoberos [39], (32) Mamas [35], (33) Heliou Bomon [34], (34) Machairas [113], (58) Menoikeion [17]; for the ban on secret eating: (30) Phoberos [41]; for the ban on personal possessions: (30) Phoberos [41], (32) Mamas [35], (33) Heliou Bomon [34], and (34) Machairas [87]. (28) Pantokrator [9] also has its own ban on secret eating.
- [48] Number of monks. A return to this subject already addressed in [3] above, with a different conclusion here (!) influenced by the author's reading of (22) Evergetis [23], though only the brief scriptural quotation is shared with the model typikon. See also the later treatment in [88], in which the author changes his mind again.
- [49] Exclusion of youths under the age of 24. See [3] above, in which the minimum age set was 30, and below in [50], in which it is 26. Among the other Evergetian documents, only (30) Phoberos [58] has a similar ban; for exclusion of youths in the earlier Studite and Athonite traditions, see (3) Theodore Studites [18], (12) Tzimiskes [16], (13) Ath. Typikon [34], (15) Constantine IX [1], cf. [15]. The non-Evergetian reform document (23) Pakourianos [17] also bans youths, however.
- [50] Preferential admission of relatives and acquaintances. See also (23) Pakourianos [25] and (27) Kecharitomene [4] for similar admissions preferences. It is unclear whether the author really intended to set a higher age limit set here for relatives than the one set in [49] above.
- [51] Monks to live two to a cell. Paraphrases (22) Evergetis [24], cf. the related document (30) Phoberos [43].
- [52] Communal wardrobe. The author returns to this subject in [62] below. This chapter paraphrases (22) Evergetis [25], cf. related documents: (30) Phoberos [44] and (34) Machairas [102], [103]. See also

29. KOSMOSOTEIRA

- treatments in (10) Eleousa [5], (27) Kecharitomene [52], (28) Pantokrator [22], (31) Areia [T4]. (32) Mamas [28] and (33) Heliou Bomon [28] make different arrangements.
- [53] Equality of food, drink, and clothing; monthly visitation of cells by the superior. The section on equality draws almost verbatim on (22) Evergetis [26], cf. related documents: (27) Kecharitomene [56], (30) Phoberos [45], (32) Mamas [34], (33) Heliou Bomon [33], and (34) Machairas [106], [107]. See also treatments in (10) Eleousa [4], [13], (23) Pakourianos [4], and (31) Areia [M8]. The section on inspections of cells draws on (22) Evergetis [27], cf. the related document (30) Phoberos [45]. (27) Kecharitomene [50], (32) Mamas [20], and (33) Heliou Bomon [20] have even stricter regulations, allowing for inspections at any time.
- [54] Commemoration of the founder's parents; privileges for his associates; burial of deceased monks. For the parental commemorations, see [95] below and similar provisions in (27) Kecharitomene [71] and (28) Pantokrator [8], [32], [44], [72]. For his associates' privileges, see also [107], [117] below. For burial of the monks, see [86], [118] below, as well as similar provisions in (22) Evergetis [36], (27) Kecharitomene [70], (28) Pantokrator [56], (30) Phoberos [50], (32) Mamas [39], (33) Heliou Bomon [39], and (34) Machairas [157].
- [55] The novitiate; no mandatory entrance gifts; voluntary gifts cannot be reclaimed. Paraphrases (22) Evergetis [37], eliminating its two-tiered novitiate for distinguished and ordinary applicants; cf. related documents: (27) Kecharitomene [7]; (30) Phoberos [51], [53A]; (32) Mamas [5], [22]; (33) Heliou Bomon [5], [22]; (34) Machairas [55], [57], [58], [59]. See also treatments in (25) Fragala [A8], [B8]; (27) Kecharitomene [34]; (28) Pantokrator [16], [17]; (31) Areia [T6].
- [56] Exclusion of women from daily charitable distributions. See the author's more lenient treatment on the admission of women to the monastery's church in [84] below. This chapter paraphrases (22) Evergetis [38], cf. related documents: (30) Phoberos [55] and (34) Machairas [118], [119].
- [57] Exhortation to common life. See also [6] above. Paraphrases the final exhortation in (22) Evergetis [42], cf. related documents: (27) Kecharitomene [78]; (30) Phoberos [59]; (32) Mamas [46]; (33) Heliou Bomon [45]; (34) Machairas [163], [166]; and (58) Menoikeion [20]. The instruction to maintain the cenobitic life even in the event that the monks are reduced to two or three suggests an acquaintance with (27) Kecharitomene [2], [55], or perhaps parallel passages in the lost typikon of the Philanthropos monastery.
- [58] No alienation of consecrated properties. See treatment of this subject in [45] above; the regulation here appears stricter. The prohibition of even highly profitable sales or exchanges of consecrated properties suggests an acquaintance with (27) Kecharitomene [9] or perhaps a parallel passage in the lost typikon of the Philanthropos monastery. That exceptions to the general ban on alienations were still possible seems evident from [105] below.
- [59] Reading of the typikon. Draws on (22) Evergetis [43], cf. related documents: (27) Kecharitomene [65], (30) Phoberos [59], and (34) Machairas [167]. See also provisions in (32) Mamas [16] and (33) Heliou Bomon [16].
- [60] Financial officers. The author returns to this subject, discussed earlier in [36] above, drawing inspiration here from (27) Kecharitomene [24] or perhaps a parallel passage in the lost typikon of the Philanthropos monastery. See also similar provisions in (28) Pantokrator [64]; (31) Areia [M9], [T7]; (32) Mamas [10]; (33) Heliou Bomon [10]; and (34) Machairas [100].
- [61] Recruitment of a doctor; care of the sick. See also the treatment in [70] below, and different provisions in (22) Evergetis [41]; (27) Kecharitomene [57]; (28) Pantokrator [10]; (30) Phoberos [55], [56]; (32) Mamas [34], (33) Heliou Bomon [33]; and (34) Machairas [108].

4. Section Four: Idiosyncratic Original Materials

- [62] Items of clothing to be distributed. The author returns to the subject of clothing addressed above in [52] with specifications of the items to be provided not found in that chapter's source, (22) Evergetis [25]; for similar specifications, see (4) Stoudios [A37], [B38]; (11) Ath. Rule [35]; (20) Black Mountain [75].

TWELFTH CENTURY

- [63] General dietary regulation. The author here amends the Evergetian dietary regulation found above in [24] through [29].
- [64] Founder's commemorative services. See other treatments in [7] and [11] above and in [72] and [91] below.
- [65] Procession on the feast of the Dormition. See other provisions for the celebration of this feast in [10] and [29] above.
- [66] Fisheries. See discussions of fisherman monks in (31) Areia, Later Addition, (33) Heliou Bomon [19] and (43) Kasoulon [25].
- [67] Bridges and their repair. See also (18) Nea Gephyra [1], [3].
- [68] Hour of awakening. See also [13] above and [80] below.
- [69] List of consecrated and reserved properties. See the similar distinction made in (19) Attaleiates [16], [17]. The nature of the military villages is discussed in [110] below.
- [70] Old age home for the care of the sick; recruitment of a doctor; defense of the source of funding. See earlier provisions for hiring a doctor and caring for sick monks in [61] above as well as the regulations for other old age homes in (16) Mount Tmolos [1] and (28) Pantokrator [58] ff. The defense of the endowment repeats an assertion made earlier in [2] above.
- [71] Relations with the peasantry. See also [76], cf. [103] below and similar provisions in (9) Galesios [246], (17) Nikon Metanoeite [14], (19) Attaleiates [39], (23) Pakourianos [1], and (24) Christodoulos [A13].
- [72] Exhortation to the superior to take care of the monastery; founder's request for commemoration at verspers. The latter repeats the request made earlier in [7] above; cf. related provisions for the founder's commemoration in [11] and [64] above and in [91] below.
- [73] Maintenance of the cistern. See also [113] below, as well as (27) Kecharitomene [69] for the maintenance of an aqueduct and water pipes at another twelfth-century foundation.
- [74] Charms of the site. An oddly placed chapter featuring a wilderness topos such as one might expect to find at the beginning of a foundation document; cf. (6) Rila [1], (10) Eleousa [3], and (58) Menoikeion [1].
- [75] Difficulties with construction; associated miracles. See similar accounts in the foundation history of (17) Nikon Metanoeite; (13) Ath. Typikon [8] also discusses difficulties with construction.
- [76] Compassion towards the peasantry. Repetitive treatment of concern addressed earlier in [71] above.
- [77] No portrait of the founder to be created. There is, however, an early fourteenth-century donor portrait of Isaac Komnenos in the Chora church in Constantinople; see Underwood, Kariye Djami, vol. 1, pp. 11–13, 45–48; vol. 2, plates, pp. 36–37.
- [78] Storage of the inventory; no outsider to be made superior. The provisions for storage are repeated in [99] below; see also (19) Attaleiates [40], (23) Pakourianos [33], (27) Kecharitomene [77], and (32) Mamas [Second Semeioma]. For the exclusion of outsiders from the superiorship in contemporary documents, see (28) Pantokrator [24] and (31) Areia [T10].
- [79] Retiling of the church roof. See also similar provision in (27) Kecharitomene [73].
- [80] No absences from hymnody except for the sick. See earlier provision in [68] above, and similar provisions in (32) Mamas [21], (33) Heliou Bomon [21], and (34) Machairas [49].
- [81] Superior not accountable to the monks. Recalls the similar provision in (22) Evergetis [18], but is textually independent.
- [82] Care for the pavement of the church. See also generally (27) Kecharitomene [73].
- [83] Donkey-driven mill closed to outsiders. See also monastic mills of this sort in (12) Tzimiskes [23] and (15) Constantine IX [4].
- [84] Women's access restricted. See earlier, more restrictive treatment in [56] above based on the Evergetian model.
- [85] Condemnation of incorrect disposal of eucharistic hosts. See other indications of an increased concern

29. KOSMOSOTEIRA

- with the manufacture and use of the eucharistic elements in (34) Machairas [40], [41], and (36) Blemmydes [4].
- [86] No burials within the enclosure except for benefactors and the founder's associates. See also (27) Kecharitomene [76], which denies this privilege to benefactors; for the burial of the monks, see also [54] above and [118] below; for the burial of Konstitzes, see also [107] below.
- [87] Generosity to the poor. For the disposition shown here to exceed the prior conventions of purely nominal philanthropy in charitable distributions at the gate, see also the contemporary (32) Mamas [13] and (33) Heliou Bomon [13].
- [88] Augmentation of the community. See earlier discussions of this issue in [3] and [48] above. The opposite position is taken in (34) Machairas [164].
- [89] Tomb of the founder. See discussion in Ševčenko, "Tomb," with cross-references.
- [90] Prescriptions for the tomb. See also [109] below. For the icon described here, see Ševčenko, "Tomb," p. 137; it may have been a personal icon for devotional purposes, like those mentioned in (9) Galesios [138], (10) Eleousa [5], and (24) Christodoulos [B10].
- [91] Superior not to neglect commemoration of the founder; see other exhortations to this effect in [7], [11], [64], and [72] above.
- [92] Retrieval of charters from the Chora Monastery. Cf. the efforts of the author of (24) Christodoulos [B7], [C6], [C7] to retrieve books left at his prior foundation and of the author of (33) Heliou Bomon [37] to retrieve books and other artifacts from storage at Hagia Sophia.
- [93] Annuities for Jewish converts. See also provisions for personal maintenance of the author's associates in [107] and [117] below as well as for others in (14) Ath. Testament [17], [18]; (19) Attaleiates [42]; and (24) Christodoulos [B15].
- [94] Special reserve treasury. There are similar provisions in (23) Pakourianos [26] and (27) Kecharitomene [24].
- [95] Founder's parents' anniversaries. See also [54] above.
- [96] Endowment adequate for performance of mandated services; the typikon and the Secret Testament to define consecrated properties. See other discussions of the Secret Testament in [1] above and [116] below.
- [97] Bathhouse; maintenance of craftsmen for projects. For the monks' bath, see also [113] below.
- [98] Measures against arsonists. This subject is not addressed elsewhere in our documents.
- [99] Use of copies instead of originals of important documents; storage of the latter; superior to finish incomplete construction projects. For use of copies, see (19) Attaleiates [40]. For storage of the inventory, see also earlier treatment in [78] above.
- [100] Superior's oversight of receipts and expenditures. See also earlier treatment in [46] above.
- [101] Beasts prohibited from enclosure. Here the concern is hygienic; cf. the earlier regulations in (3) Theodore Studites [4]; (12) Tzimiskes [22], [23]; (13) Ath. Typikon [31], [53]; (15) Constantine IX [3], [4].
- [102] Rebuilding of the church. See similar injunction in (27) Kecharitomene [73].
- [103] Easter procession; maintenance of neighboring villages. See provisions for the Easter procession in (4) Stoudios [A2].
- [104] Church for the use of the peasants; their pastoral care. For the acquisition of diocesan churches as monastic dependencies of independent monasteries, see my Private Religious Foundations, pp. 239–43.
- [105] Dispute over the village of Gastivilea. Note the instructions to sell the disputed village despite the general injunction against such sales in [58] above.
- [106] Books donated by the founder. See records of similar donations in (19) Attaleiates [INV 7], [INV 13]; (23) Pakourianos [33B]; and (24) Christodoulos [B7], [C6], [C7].
- [107] Special privileges for associates of the founder. For the burial of Konstitzes, see also [86] above.
- [108] Dependency of St. Stephen at Constantinople. For this foundation, see Janin, Géographie, vol. 3, pp.

TWELFTH CENTURY

472–73. Many other provincial foundations also had dependencies in the capital city; e.g., (13) Ath. Typikon [34]; (19) Attaleiates [6]; and (33) Heliou Bomon [4].

- [109] Restoration of the icons at the founder's tomb. See also [90] above with cross-references.
- [110] Relations with soldiers in the military villages. See [112] below for other armed personnel useful for the defense of the foundation; see [69] above for the place of military villages in the monastery's endowment.
- [111] Patriarchal mediation of disputes. This is a reiteration of a provision made earlier in [4] above.
- [112] Vestiaritai of Neokastron. These serve a similar function to the soldiers in the military villages mentioned in [110] above.
- [113] Cleaning of the cistern and latrines; use of the two baths. For the cistern, see also [73] above; for use of one of the baths by the monks, see [97] above.
- [114] Abolition of highway tolls. There are no other provisions to this effect in the monastic foundation documents.
- [115] Founder's residence. For founders' residences adjacent to religious foundations in this era, see also (19) Attaleiates [5], (27) Kecharitomene [79], and (28) Pantokrator [65].
- [116] Provision for opening the Gift and Grant Ordinance. See other treatments of the Secret Testament in [1] and [96] above.

5. Section Five: Justifications of Earlier Provisions

- [117] Clarification of the privileges of the founder's associates. See earlier treatments of this issue in [54] and [107] above.
- [118] Plans for a burial chapel for the monks. See earlier provisions for their burial in [54] and [86] above.
- [119] Final invocation of the Kosmosoteira. See similar invocations of heavenly support in (19) Attaleiates [7], [15] and (28) Pantokrator [71].

CHAPTER SIX

Early Reform Monasteries of the Twelfth Century

“Accordingly, I myself, too, even though I have already suffered the death of the body, which is in accord with nature, and am covered by a tombstone, as you see, I am with you through this piece of writing and I use this as a mouthpiece and I offer it as the voice which I owe you.” (32) Mamas [48]

“A commemoration should be held for my worthless self annually on the anniversary of my death, and on the next day for my blessed parents, the monk Nikodemos and the nun Catherine, and for my brothers and sisters in the flesh, the monk Peter, and Helen, and the bishop John, and for my uncles who raised me, lord Constantine Antzas and the monk lord Iakobos . . .” (31) Areia [T12]

“. . . nor do I want a monk or ‘foreign tonsure’ who comes from Nauplia to be promoted to the position of superior, since they are passionately devoted to their relatives, and live indeed ‘according to the flesh’ (Rom. 8:5).” (31) Areia [T10]

This chapter includes four documents that are contemporaries of the five presented in Chapter Five. While the latter were all products of the milieu of imperial or royal patronage, those in this chapter were all composed by private individuals founding constitutionally independent monasteries in the reform tradition. (30) Phoberos was written by a monk and (33) Heliou Bomon by a court official, while another, (31) Areia, was written by a bishop, and (32) Mamas was written by the foundation’s superior. All of the documents employ (22) Evergetis either directly or indirectly, except perhaps for (31) Areia which is nevertheless sympathetic to Evergetian concerns. Therefore, these founders are the inheritors in the third generation of the tradition of Evergetian reform.

A. Typology of the Documents

Three of these documents, (30) Phoberos, (32) Mamas, and (33) Heliou Bomon, are long, complex typika like (22) Evergetis itself and their contemporaries, the imperial typika of Chapter Five, (27) Kecharitome, (28) Pantokrator, and (29) Kosmosoteira. (30) Phoberos is in fact the longest typikon in our entire collection of Byzantine monastic foundation documents. (31) Areia is a shorter document, analogous to (10) Eleousa in the previous century, another text authored by a bishop for a provincial monastery.

Three of the documents refer to associated inventories of landed and movable properties: (30) Phoberos [1], (32) Mamas [37], and (33) Heliou Bomon [37]. All of these have since been lost; (31) Areia includes [T11] a brief surviving inventory of movable properties only.

CHAPTER SIX

Official memoranda (hypomnemata) issued by officials of the ecclesiastical hierarchy served to confirm the independence of all of these foundations. Patriarch Nicholas III Grammatikos (1084–1111) issued the memorandum for (30) Phoberos [33], Patriarch Nicholas IV Muzalon (1147–51) for (32) Mamas [4], and Patriarch Constantine IV Chliarenos (1154–57) for (33) Heliou Bomon [Prologue]; Leo, bishop of Nauplia, simply issued his own memorandum for (31) Areia which survives joined to the typikon (as [M]). All of the patriarchal memoranda have been lost. The authors of (32) Mamas [4] and (33) Heliou Bomon [4] took the added precaution of obtaining imperial chrysobulls from Emperor Manuel I Komnenos (1143–80) to confirm the independence of their foundations. The author of (32) Mamas also refers [Second Semeioma] to a transmissory deed that recalls the gift and grant ordinance mentioned in (29) Kosmosoteira [116].

Several auxiliary documents are preserved as attachments to (32) Mamas. The first Semeioma serves to authenticate the typikon drawn up some five years earlier. It is preceded and introduced by a judicial confirmation. A Second Semeioma from the same year, also preceded by an introductory statement, records the arrangements for the preservation of the foundation's most important documents.

Clearly as the twelfth century progressed, other documents joined the typikon as essential components of the legal underpinnings of certain Byzantine religious foundations. Indeed, the author of (33) Heliou Bomon [48] even cites that foundation's patriarchal memorandum as providing him with the authority to draw up a typikon. The fact that monasteries for which (32) Mamas [First Semeioma], (33) Heliou Bomon [Prologue], and (in all likelihood) also (30) Phoberos [33] were written had been nominally patriarchal institutions before they were all nearly ruined by concessionaires under the charistike must account for the solicitation and careful preservation of these auxiliary documents. Also, although the foundation for which he was legislating in (31) Areia was new, the author, Leo of Nauplia, thought he needed a memorandum as well, probably because he intended to support [M10] this independent monastery with revenues from diocesan monasteries transferred to it under ecclesiastical epidosis. Without a memorandum of independence, the bishop's successors might well be able to assert that this was a diocesan foundation simply on the basis of its endowment.

B. Place of the Documents within the Monastic Reform Movement

By careful examination of the contents of the four typika in this chapter, it is possible to track the course of the monastic reform movement through the better part of the twelfth century. This is true even though not one of the four authors of the documents forthrightly acknowledges his dependence on (22) Evergetis.

1. Reproduction of the Evergetian Canon

John, the author of (30) Phoberos, was a contemporary of Empress Irene Doukaina Komnene, author of (27) Kecharitomene, but whereas the latter text already demonstrates important qualifications of Evergetian reform principles along with intensifications of concern about others, John's typikon reflects the Evergetian ideological tradition virtually unchanged from his model. He even reproduces [35] his source's exceptional provision that a manifestly bad superior should be left in office if the preminent monks cannot agree on a suitable successor, thereby demonstrating a degree of Evergetian fealty his successors in the tradition would not feel obliged to match. This author's preoccupation with supplementing his Evergetian quotations with citations from the canonical and ascetic traditions is indicative, however, of the increased use of these sources by the reform movement, beginning towards the end of the eleventh century and continuing on into the twelfth.¹

2. Evergetian Influence without Textual Dependence

Later on in the twelfth century, (31) Areia, like its contemporary the imperial typikon (28) Pantokrator, illustrates how even a document not actually quoting from (22) Evergetis can nevertheless show convincing evidence of its indebtedness to the reform tradition through its Evergetian-cadenced prescriptions for sacramental life [T2], refectory procedures [T3], consultative government [T10], and institutional independence [T12]. This strongly suggests an alternative route for the dissemination of Evergetian procedures and institutions through synopsis rather than direct quotation.

3. Influence of the Second Generation of Reformers

The Evergetian reform tradition also became more diverse, enriched both conceptually and textually, as the century progressed. One influential contributor to this process of diversification was either (27) Kecharitomene or (more likely) the lost typikon of Empress Irene's companion foundation for monks, Philanthropos. These documents seem to have reflected the concerns of a second generation of monastic reformers who felt more secure about the permanence of their ideological revolution but who sought to consolidate their gains and make Evergetis' ideas more palatable to aristocratic patrons. Although some version of (22) Evergetis continued to circulate independently, being employed as such not only by the author of (30) Phoberos but even as late as 1152 by Isaac Komnenos in (29) Kosmosoteira, the Evergetian tradition was also being represented by sympathetic works of new advocates during the second quarter of the twelfth century.

4. The Maman Summation of the Reform Tradition

Approximately forty years after the composition of (27) Kecharitomene and Philanthropos, Athanasios Philanthropenos, author of (32) Mamas made use of one of these texts, most likely the typikon of the Philanthropos monastery where he had previously served as steward. Careful textual analysis of (32) Mamas reveals no less than six identifiable layers of reform contributions over three generations since the original prototype, (22) Evergetis.² Indeed, Athanasios may not even have set eyes on the venerable prototype. Some ten years later, (33) Heliou Bomon shows that some incremental change had occurred even in that short period of time.

5. Residual Studite Influence

As noted above in Chapter Four, (22) Evergetis represented only one strand of the reform, though

¹ For the use of canon law and ascetic quotations by the reformers, see (20) Black Mountain, Analysis; the scholiast on Semeioma epi te kathairesei tou Chalkedonos, ed. I. Sakkélion, "Décret d'Alexis Comnène portant déposition de Léon métropolitain de Chalcédoine," BCH 2 (1878), p. 123, n. 3, and p. 127, n. 2; and V. Grumel, Les registres des actes du Patriarcat de Constantinople, vol. 1: Les registres de 381 à 715 (Chalcedon, 1932); 2nd ed. (Paris, 1972), nos. 952 (Athens decision) and 1000 (Kyzikos decision).

² See the discussion below in (32) Mamas, Analysis, B: Utility for the History of the Reform Movement.

CHAPTER SIX

to be sure the most influential by far. Indeed, (31) Areia [M8] claims to be drawing on the lost typikon of Meletios the Younger (†1105), and does revive [T9] certain Studite institutions like monastic confinement. The durability of Studite notions of monastic governance, such as the insulation of the superior from the financial management of his monastery (cf. (3) Theodore Studites [22]), is likewise attested by occasional revivals in documents like (32) Mamas [48] that are more clearly in the Evergetian tradition. In (33) Heliou Bomon [8] the author even prescribes a return to the Studite synaxarion in preference to that of Evergetis. The importance the Evergetian reformers placed on the collection and study of the broader ascetic tradition must have made a contribution to the revival of older (and occasionally discordant) institutions and practices.

C. Endorsements and Developments of the Evergetian Canon

Like the authors of the imperial documents discussed above in Chapter Five, the authors of these four documents shared a bedrock commitment to many basic Evergetian principles.

1. Institutional Independence

Despite their diverse backgrounds, all four of our authors provide for the independence of their foundations. John, the author of (30) Phoberos [33], uses the precise language of (22) Evergetis [12] in his declaration, adding a vigorous condemnation of the charistikarioi who had earlier destroyed his foundation. Leo of Nauplia's formula in (31) Areia is similar though not identical to (22) Evergetis [12]. Both (32) Mamas [4] and (33) Heliou Bomon [4] use a more developed post-Evergetian formula³ that specifically mentions the charistike (which (22) Evergetis [12] does not) and rules out participation in it or any of the other official programs for financial exploitation of ecclesiastical institutions.

2. Internal Selection of the Superior

All of our authors also recognized the importance for institutional independence of a free, internal choice of the superior. (30) Phoberos [35] adopts the arrangements of (22) Evergetis [13], [14] under which the superior was to choose the steward, who would become superior himself upon the latter's death unless he should prove unfit for the office and another suitable candidate was at hand. (31) Areia [T10] simply provides for the election of a candidate agreeable to "all or at least the majority" of the monks. (32) Mamas [1] and (33) Heliou Bomon [1] adopt complicated post-Evergetian election procedures that leave the final choice to a chance selection if a consensus candidate could not be identified. These are an adaptation of the procedures first seen in (27) Kecharitomene [11]. The common theme of all of these arrangements was the need to avoid internal disagreements. These were thought to lead inevitably to appeals by the losing party to external authorities, whose intervention could easily compromise a foundation's independence.⁴

3. Inalienability of Consecrated Property

The keen concern of (22) Evergetis [19] to assert the inalienability of an ecclesiastical foundation's property grew out of the reformers' bitter struggle with the imperial government of Alexios I

³ See the discussion below in (32) Mamas, Analysis, B: Utility for the History of the Reform Movement.

⁴ See (22) Evergetis [14], (23) Pakourianos [18], and (29) Kosmosoteira [4].

Kommenos during the first decade of his reign. Being not so far removed from that struggle, the author of (30) Phoberos [38] repeats the precise wording of the Evergetian formulation. Meanwhile, in (27) Kecharitomene the Empress Irene had signaled [9] the Komnenian dynasty's acceptance of the Evergetian position that such an alienation was tantamount to "sacrilege," while also maintaining [10] that emergency alienations of movable property to other ecclesiastical institutions were acceptable. The authors of (32) Mamas [37] and (33) Heliou Bomon [37] implicitly reject this last compromise even though it had been supported by reformers of impeccable credentials.⁵ Instead, both of these authors share an apparently new formulation of the principle of inalienability that emphasized protection of movable property, with immovable property added as an afterthought.

4. Advocacy of Cenobitic Monasticism

These four authors also shared the Evergetian view of the centrality of cenobiticism in the monastic life. As usual, the author of (30) Phoberos is the closest copier of (22) Evergetis, arguably even exceeding it in disciplinary rigor.⁶ The apparent Evergetian influences on (31) Areia are strongest in the latter's provisions for the regulation of cenobitic life.⁷ The determination to insure the permanence of the cenobitic regime, so noticeable in (27) Kecharitomene's post-Evergetian formulations,⁸ had hardened by the time of (32) Mamas's composition into a hostility to the alternative kelliotic form of monasticism. (32) Mamas [25] and (33) Heliou Bomon [25] not only adapt (27) Kecharitomene's position on the permanence of cenobiticism but also condemn [26] the kelliotic alternative. (33) Heliou Bomon [26] even requires the kelliotic monks of its Constantinopolitan dependency to change over to cenobiticism.

5. Honest Financial Administration

The Evergetian reform movement had also insisted that a monastery have independent financial management by conscientious, honest officials. Our twelfth-century authors shared this opinion. As usual, the author of (30) Phoberos [41], [47] provides the most literal endorsement of (22) Evergetis, though his treatment may reflect an earlier version of the text of the latter than we have now. Later, Leo of Nauplia in (31) Areia [M9] foresaw the superior cooperating with his three chief financial officers in the financial administration of his foundation.

Financial administration was one area in which the reform movement insisted on a continual tightening of standards and procedures as the twelfth century progressed. Improvements in financial administration are among the most important concerns of a discrete group of thirteen chapters found in (27) Kecharitomene that may have originated in an earlier post-Evergetian typikon.⁹ (32) Mamas and (33) Heliou Bomon endorse these new institutions and operational procedures by adopting all of these chapters, although (32) Mamas [48] leads the way to a return to the older

⁵ See procedure for permitted alienations in (22) Evergetis [19] and Leo of Chalcedon's endorsement of conversions of ecclesiastical property from one sacred employment to another as noted in Semeioma epi te kathairesei tou Chalkedonos, ed. Sakkélion, "Décret," pp. 123–24.

⁶ (30) Phoberos [44], [46]; cf. (22) Evergetis [25], [28].

⁷ (31) Areia [M8], [T2], [T3], [T4].

⁸ (27) Kecharitomene [2], [51], [55].

⁹ (27) Kecharitomene [2], [3], [19], [20], [23], [24], [29], [45], [46], [49], [50], [53], [55].

Studite model of fiscal administration in which the superior was insulated from direct involvement.

6. No Mandatory Entrance Gifts

(22) Evergetis [37]’s rejection of mandatory entrance gifts from postulants was another characteristic precept of Evergetian ideology endorsed by our authors. (30) Phoberos [51], (32) Mamas [22], and (33) Heliou Bomon [22] employ the actual language of the Evergetian formulation, while (31) Areia [T6] echoes it in its regulation that rejects even free-will donations if the property they consist of is not tax-exempt. (30) Phoberos [51], (32) Mamas [22], and (33) Heliou Bomon [22] also accept the Evergetian probationary novitiate (cf. (22) Evergetis [37]), though the last two documents provide for a considerable lengthening of its term for ordinary applicants from six months to two years.

7. Overall Commitment to Evergetian Principles

Our authors were often truer to Evergetian principles than their imperial counterparts in Chapter Five. The authors of (30) Phoberos and (31) Areia describe foundations that surely would have met the approval of the strictest Evergetian, even those of the first generation that produced (22) Evergetis itself. Also, unlike the author of (29) Kosmosoteira [107], none of our four authors in this chapter shows any willingness to allow resident laymen to be put on the payroll of their foundations or even, like (27) Kecharitomene [4], to bend the rules of cenobitic life to accommodate relatives of the founder. Both (32) Mamas [27] and (33) Heliou Bomon [27] adopt the post-Evergetian formulation found in (27) Kecharitomene [53] to reject “imposed guests” (katapemptoi) sent to monasteries by imperial or patriarchal authority. Moreover, (30) Phoberos [43], (32) Mamas [34], and (33) Heliou Bomon [34] all draw on the textual tradition of (22) Evergetis [24] in banning personal servants, which easily serves to distinguish these institutions from contemporary monasteries under imperial patronage.

D. Fate of Other Evergetian Regulations

The allegiance of our twelfth-century founders to Evergetis, however, was based more on common ideology than on institutional loyalty. Whenever their own contemporary approaches to problems matched the solutions promoted by their Evergetian predecessors, most of them were happy not only to give implicit endorsement to these resolutions but even to quote from (either directly or through intermediaries) the relevant regulatory passages in (22) Evergetis. Whenever they disagreed, however, they had no compunctions about revising the relevant Evergetian texts or even devising entirely new approaches.

1. Sacramental and Liturgical Life

Typically, (30) Phoberos introduces no major changes from its Evergetian model on sacramental and liturgical matters.¹⁰ Leo of Nauplia in (31) Areia [M8], however, enjoins his monks to use the competing typikon of Meletios the Younger for the regulation of their liturgical services. In (32) Mamas [32], Athanasios Philanthropenos adopts Evergetian language but decreases the frequency of the celebration of the holy liturgy and restricts his monks' access to communion. Also, he permits [29] his monks to have a confessor other than the superior, an important divergence from the principle enunciated in (22) Evergetis [15]. A little later, the mystikos Nikephoros reproduces these changes in (33) Heliou Bomon [29], [32] and even substitutes [8] the Studite for the Evergetian synaxarion concerning the regulation of liturgical services.

¹⁰ (30) Phoberos [9], [10], [11], [12], [13], [14], [15], [36]; cf. (22) Evergetis [4], [5], [6], [7], [15].

2. Imposition of Lay Protectorates

There are some features in these documents that are contradictory to the original Evergetian principles. Foremost among these is the imposition of the protectorate (ephoreia), following the example set by (27) Kecharitomene [3], in the monasteries represented by (32) Mamas [3] and (33) Heliou Bomon [3], though not in those represented by the other two documents in this chapter. Certain anonymous contributors to the reform movement had evidently already worked out what they considered to be an acceptable way of reconciling reform ideology to the restoration of the protectorate. The product of their labors, the post-Evergetian source that lies behind both (27) Kecharitomene [3] and (32) Mamas [3], attempted to restrict the protector, the agent of the ephoreia, to a strictly constructive role in patronizing, supporting and defending the foundation assigned to his care. The tendency to associate traditional patronal powers with the protector is noticeable, however, particularly in (32) Mamas [3], cf. [15], where the incumbent protector, the brother of the institution's new founder, is permitted extraordinary powers, including revision of the typikon. Even subsequent protectors seem to have been allowed a more influential role [1] in such matters as the election of the superior than had been the case earlier in (27) Kecharitomene [11].

3. Ameliorations in Lifestyle

The author of (32) Mamas [28], followed by (33) Heliou Bomon [28], takes the lead in reintroducing money into the lives of the monks in their institutions (for bathing and purchases of clothing), though less blatantly than in (28) Pantokrator [31] ff., in which cash payments seem to have been routine. In (31) Areia [T3], Leo of Nauplia permits his monks to bathe weekly—more frequently than in any other twelfth-century foundation—except during Lent. However, in a rare example of disagreement with his source, (22) Evergetis [28], the author of (30) Phoberos [46] was unwilling to allow his monks to bathe at all, except for the sick.

E. Other Concerns of the Authors

Aside from the various issues related to the monastic reform, we find that our authors had a somewhat different set of concerns than their counterparts in Chapter Five. For instance, the concern for the welfare of the dependent peasantry that is prominent in (29) Kosmosoteira and some of the other documents in that chapter simply does not appear in the works of our authors. Neither is there any indication that our authors realized the importance of building maintenance that was so evident to the authors of (27) Kecharitomene and (29) Kosmosoteira. To be fair, neither had been a concern of (22) Evergetis either. Other matters such as a greater concern with manual labor and a corresponding disinclination to pursue large-scale institutional philanthropy may well have been related to the generally smaller resources our authors are likely to have had at their disposal for the support of their foundations compared to their counterparts in Chapter Five.

CHAPTER SIX

1. Institutional Governance

Aside from the revival of the protectorate in (32) Mamas [3] and (33) Heliou Bomon [3], there are only a few institutional innovations in these documents. In (31) Areia [T10], Leo of Nauplia endorses a consultative style of government by the superior in conjunction with the leading monks that parallels the arrangement recommended in (22) Evergetis [14]; as usual, the author of (30) Phoberos [35] lends his endorsement by simply transcribing the Evergetian text. (32) Mamas [24] suggests a more authoritarian model of governance, though the superior's role [48] in financial administration was considerably restricted. In this as in most other matters, (33) Heliou Bomon [24], [47] follows its model's lead. Only (31) Areia [T9] addresses monastic discipline through the confinement of refractory monks. Initiating an important trend for the future, (32) Mamas [18], followed by (33) Heliou Bomon [18], gives the superior discretionary authority to make certain changes in dietary requirements.

2. Private Psalmody

Following the example of (22) Evergetis [4], (30) Phoberos [9], (32) Mamas [47], and (33) Heliou Bomon [46] all provide for a private recitation of the psalter after the conclusion of the common service at matins. Even (31) Areia [T1] endorses this requirement in its own discussion of the performance of the office.

3. Moral Concerns

The author or (more likely) a later editor of (30) Phoberos [57], [58], [59] is alone in his obsession with the protection of the sexual purity of his monks from such threats as homosexuality and even bestiality. This concern far exceeds the hard-hearted but unemotional exclusion of women from charitable distributions at the gate in (22) Evergetis [38], which (30) Phoberos [55] (but not (32) Mamas or (33) Heliou Bomon) also endorses.

4. Increased Role of Manual Labor

The absence of servants in these foundations inevitably led to an increased role of manual labor in the lives of the monks, especially in the second half of the twelfth century. (30) Phoberos, like its Evergetian model, is circumspect on this subject, while (31) Areia [T3] contains a brief allusion to it. In (32) Mamas there are mentions of vine-dressers, gardeners and other outside workers [19] in addition to the usual kitchen staff [11]. To these (33) Heliou Bomon [19] adds fishermen and farmers; its manual workers may have constituted a second ranking order of "brothers," to be distinguished from the "fathers" who served in the church.

5. Performance of Commemorative Services

Memorial services, already attested in (22) Evergetis for the founder [35] and for departed monks and (unnamed) benefactors [36], seem to loom larger in importance as the twelfth century progresses. The author of (30) Phoberos [50], utilizing part of the text of his Evergetian model, makes specific provisions for many lay benefactors, Patriarch Nicholas III Grammatikos, and several of the founder's relatives. As we have seen, the authors of the imperial foundations in (28) Pantokrator [32], cf. [19] and (29) Kosmosoteira [3] devoted most of their monastic personnel to the performance of liturgical services, including commemorative observances. Moreover, in (27) Kecharitomene Empress Irene provides for multiple commemorations [70] for deceased nuns [70] as well as annual commemorations [71] for a long list of her relatives.

In (32) Mamas [5], Athanasios Philanthropenos apparently decided to scale back the monks' liturgical commitment, though he too provides for commemorations for the founder [40] and for deceased monks [39]. The procedures prescribed for the latter are based in part on those found in (27) Kecharitomene [70]. In (31) Areia [T12], Leo of Nauplia makes a modest provision for memorial services for himself, members of his immediate family, and deceased monks. The author of (33) Heliou Bomon imitates his model in provisions for deceased monks [39], but composes new chapters to regulate memorial services for the emperor [49], the monastery's ancient founders [51], and himself [50].

6. Relations with the Ecclesiastical Hierarchy

As far as external relations were concerned, the most vexed question for all of these founders was how to acknowledge the spiritual authority of the ecclesiastical hierarchy while assuring that the independence of their foundations remained unimpaired. Composed as it was at a time when relations between the reformers and the public authorities of the church were particularly bad, (22) Evergetis [12] simply rejects the notion of episcopal rights over the foundation entirely. After the reconciliation of reformers and the traditional ecclesiastical hierarchy at the Synod of Blachernai in 1094, patrons seem to have been more willing to revisit the question with open minds. Accordingly, even the author of (30) Phoberos [35] adds a provision in his transcription of (22) Evergetis [15], cf. [33] that a newly elected superior must be brought to the patriarch for installation. This was probably a requirement of the patriarchal memorandum granting the monastery's independence, as it was in the case of (32) Mamas [1] and (33) Heliou Bomon [1]. Leo of Nauplia was in the advantageous position of writing his own memorandum of independence, however, and in (31) Areia [M15] he denies his episcopal successors at Nauplia any rights in the election or installation of superiors at his foundation.

7. Acceptability of Monks Tonsured Elsewhere

Whether these monks should be welcomed as postulants or even as leaders of reform monasteries was another contentious issue for our authors. The safest course, perceived long ago by Athanasios the Athonite in (13) Ath. Typikon [12], was to make them ineligible for the office of superior, thereby foreclosing the possibility [20] that an external authority could use this means to seize control of an independent foundation. Yet, as we have seen, even Athanasios saw fit [21] to change his mind in order to promote an exceptionally worthy candidate as his successor. (22) Evergetis [37] took a middling position, neither encouraging such monks as applicants nor absolutely forbidding them, but leaving the decision on their admission to the superior. In another rare display of independence from his model, the author of (30) Phoberos [52] disagrees and bans such monks on the grounds that "from this action [i.e., their admission] there will come to you great harm and punishment of both a spiritual and physical kind." Predictably, Leo of Nauplia also takes a conservative approach in (31) Areia [T10], declaring that no outside monk should be chosen superior lest he "come to the monastery and take possession of it through some circumstance and dispensation."

Imperial founders, however, could understandably afford to take a more relaxed attitude. Empress Irene in (27) Kecharitomene [54] actually welcomed pious nuns tonsured elsewhere provided that they were not being imposed on her convent by imperial or patriarchal decree. In (29) Kosmosoteira [16], Isaac Komnenos made the reception of an externally tonsured monk dependent on his receiving the canonically required permission from his current superior. The authors of (32) Mamas [22] and (33) Heliou Bomon [22] evidently could afford to accept these monks, even as superiors [1], without courting future problems because of provisions [26] in their patriarchal memoranda in which the imposition of “imposed guests” (apparently lay or religious) was forsworn. The fact that Athanasios Philanthropenos was himself a “foreign tonsure” likely influenced his tolerant attitude. The author of (32) Mamas [43], followed by (33) Heliou Bomon [42], thought it prudent, however, to exhort any future superior of this sort not to attempt to “pack” the monastery with monks from his former institution or to disdain those monks native to Mamas.

CHAPTER SIX

8. Decline in Institutional Philanthropy

Perhaps the relative scarcity of resources available to these authors accounts for their lesser contribution to institutional philanthropy compared to their imperial counterparts of this era. John, the author of (30) Phoberos [54], is content to reproduce the provisions in (22) Evergetis [38] for charitable distributions and lodging of travelers and the sick. The other foundations did not have philanthropic institutions attached to them, and the authors of (32) Mamas and (33) Heliou Bomon actually depended on external providers for bathing and the purchase of clothing [28], as well as for medical assistance [34].

F. Historical Context

The discussion of Historical Context in Chapter Five is relevant for the documents discussed in this chapter as well, since both they and those of Chapter Five come from roughly the same era of Byzantine history. The discussion below concerns aspects of the historical context that are particularly relevant to the documents presented here in Chapter Six.

1. Fate of the Charistike

The almost total disappearance of the charistike in the course of the twelfth century was certainly a remarkable phenomenon even when one considers the ferocity with which the reform movement attacked that embattled institution. As it happened, the charistike's disappearance from the scene has left few traces in the historical record. The decisions of the patriarchal synods of 1089 and 1116 (for which see Chapter Five above) did authorize the metropolitans of Athens and Kyzikos, respectively, to abolish the charistike within their own jurisdictions, but did not (except possibly implicitly) delegitimize the institution generally.

Patriarch Nicholas III Grammatikos' own goals in the early years of his patriarchate clearly did not include the outright abolition of the charistike, and Emperor Alexios I Komnenos' novel on patriarchal rights (1096), helpful though it was for the reformers, did not authorize such an abolition. The Athens decision in 1089 suggests that at that time the patriarchate hoped to compel charistikarioi to make amends for the damages they had caused to the religious institutions under their supervision. After the reconciliation of the reform party and the patriarchate at the Synod of Blachernai in 1094, the way was open for another more promising possibility: enlisting reform-minded patrons for the restoration of patriarchal monasteries ruined by the charistike.

2. Restoration of Monasteries under Patriarchal Sponsorship

One of the patrons enlisted in this effort was the monk John who wrote the Evergetian typikon (30) Phoberos for the monastery of St. John the Forerunner that he received [33] as an independent foundation from Nicholas III Grammatikos towards the end of the patriarch's reign in 1111. He declares that previously various charistikarioi had "reduced to nothing the monastery which was once great and famous and admired." If we are to believe the author, a foundation which once had 170 ascetics [33] was under his direction now being restored to support [42] a mere twelve monks.

As noted above in Chapter Five, patriarchal support for reformist founders continued under John IX Agapetos (1111–34) and Leo Styppes (1134–43). With remarkable consistency and steadiness of purpose, we find the efforts to undo the damages caused by the charistike continuing also under later patriarchs, including Kosmas II Attikos (1146–47), who enlisted the pious layman George the Cappadocian to help restore the ruined monastery of St. Mamas at Constantinople.¹¹ Ironically, George received his first grant of the institution in charistike as its charistikarios. At that point his unscrupulous predecessors had so abused the property that all the auxiliary buildings had fallen down leaving only a roofless church still standing. Only two non-resident monks were assigned to the foundation, and at some point the church's movable property must have been taken away for safekeeping.¹² George was reluctant, however, to invest money in improvements unless he could be certain that a subsequent charistikarios would not plunder the foundation anew. Therefore he urged Patriarch Nicholas IV Muzalon (1147–51) to grant him the monastery as an independent foundation. Once he obtained the patriarchal memorandum to this effect and other necessary documentation, the patriarchal monastery of Mamas was effectively privatized.

A few years later, another benefactor, the courtier Nikephoros the mystikos, obtained the patriarchal monastery of the Mother of God Heliou Bomon through a similar memorandum of independence issued by Patriarch Constantine IV Chliarenos (1154–56).¹³ Nikephoros claims that at the time of the privatization of the monastery "there was a danger not only that its restoration would be hard to achieve but that it would almost cease to be called simply a dwelling place for monks."

3. Privatization of Restored Patriarchal Monasteries

It can be surmised that these founders drove hard bargains with the patriarchs before being willing to make what the mystikos Nikephoros calls "no moderate expenditures" for such things as rebuilding structures, making capital improvements, and dedicating new furnishings in the churches. While the patriarchs may have preferred to continue to use the charistike since this vehicle preserved patriarchal rights of ownership over the donated institutions, the patrons, inspired perhaps by the example of Evergetis, insisted on outright privatization of these facilities and got it. With privatization came the right to issue typika, leading to (30) Phoberos, (32) Mamas, and (33) Heliou Bomon.

¹¹ For the account of the foundation's privatization, see (32) Mamas, Prologue, and First Semeioma.

¹² (32) Mamas, Prologue; [37] indicates the survival of movable property, including sacred vessels, icons and service books, despite the ruination of the church; see (33) Heliou Bomon [37] for how they likely were preserved.

¹³ For this foundation's privatization, see (33) Heliou Bomon, Prologue.

CHAPTER SIX

4. Hostility towards Alternative Forms of Monasticism

Simultaneously with these relief operations designed to aid institutions damaged by the charistike, the patriarchs and other reform-minded members of the ecclesiastical hierarchy were also working to curtail kelliotic monasticism in favor of the cenobitic form advocated by the Evergetians. As early as the closing years of the eleventh century, Nikon of the Black Mountain, acting as an agent of the patriarch of Antioch, tried to use persuasion and pressure in (21) Roidion to get that institution's kelliotic monks to surrender their property rights. Another approach was for the hierarchy to take advantage of well-endowed kelliotic institutions and simply subordinate them to new reform foundations organized on cenobitic principles. This is what one patriarch, probably Leo Styppes, did with the kelliotic monastery of Satyros in donating it through a patriarchal memorandum to Emperor John II Komnenos' Pantokrator foundation.¹⁴ Perhaps the monasteries with surplus revenues that Leo of Nauplia subordinated to his foundation in (31) Areia [M10] under ecclesiastical epidosis were also kelliotic. Some twenty years later, the mystikos Nikephoros bluntly announces in (33) Heliou Bomon [26] that the monks of the kelliotic dependency of St. Basianos granted to him by Patriarch Constantine IV Chliarenos would have to convert to cenobitic monasticism.

5. Reassertion of Patriarchal Prerogatives

At the conclusion of the period covered by this chapter, we find another patriarch, Luke Chrysoberges (1157–70), taking a different approach to assisting the religious foundations of the empire. He issued a ruling that the patriarchate had the right to appoint a monk tonsured outside a monastery as that institution's superior despite a provision in the typikon to the contrary (e.g., in (30) Phoberos [52] or (31) Areia [T10]) if the monastery was suffering from an acute shortage of monks.¹⁵ Also, and somewhat surprisingly, he declared in an extant synodal decision of 1169 that a charistikarios was not free to use a monastery he held in charistike as a dowry for his daughter (cf. (19) Attaleiates [46]), which indicates both the continued occasional patriarchal employment of that embattled institution and also its undiminished potential for misuse.

6. Manuel I Komnenos and Private Religious Foundations

At the same time, Emperor Manuel I Komnenos (1143–80) was initiating a new government policy towards private foundations with a chrysobull of 1158 that forbade monasteries in Constantinople and its vicinity to acquire any additional landed properties.¹⁶ Moreover, the emperor established a new foundation of his own, the monastery of St. Michael at Kataskepe, that was supported by a cash grant from the imperial treasury rather the usual endowment of landed property.¹⁷ Both George the Cappadocian, the founder of the institution described in (32) Mamas, ¹⁴ (28) Pantokrator [27], cf. [28], [65].

¹⁵ Grumel, Regestes, no. 1091.

¹⁶ Aurea bulla de possessionibus monasteriorum (1158) (JGR 3.450–54) = Franz Dölger, Regesten der Kaiserurkunden des oströmischen Reiches von 565–1453, 5 vols. (Munich-Berlin, 1924–65), no. 1419.

¹⁷ For this foundation, see Niketas Choniates, Historia, ed. J. A. Van Dieten (Berlin, 1975), p. 207; cf. John Kinnamos, Historia, ed. A. Meineke, CSHB (Bonn, 1836), p. 276; Raymond Janin, La géographie ecclésiastique de l'empire byzantin, vol. 2: Les églises et les monastères des grands centres byzantins (Paris, 1975); vol. 3: Les églises et les monastères [de Constantinople], 2nd ed. (Paris, 1969), p. 342.

EARLY REFORM MONASTERIES OF THE TWELFTH CENTURY

and the mystikos Nikephoros, founder of the monastery described in (33) Heliou Bomon, were court officials of Manuel, and their respective foundations were certainly within the geographic scope of the emperor's law. The emperor confirmed the independence of these foundations with chrysobulls of his own,¹⁸ but although he granted one of them an imperial solemnion (gratefully acknowledged in the Prologue to (33) Heliou Bomon) that accorded with his own ideas of how a monastery should be endowed, it appears that both of these institutions also had landed properties.¹⁹

¹⁸ (32) Mamas [4] and (33) Heliou Bomon [4].

¹⁹ See (32) Mamas [5], [37] and (33) Heliou Bomon [5], [37].

30. Phoberos: Rule of John for the Monastery of St. John the Forerunner of Phoberos

Date: First edition, after 1113; re-edited ca. 1144¹

Translator: Robert Jordan

Edition employed: A. I. Papadopoulos-Kerameus, Noctes Petropolitanae (St. Petersburg, 1913), pp. 1–88.

Manuscript: Public Library, St. Petersburg (12th c.)²

Other translations: None

Institutional History

Except for the information contained in the typikon itself, nothing else is known about this foundation. Janin (Géographie, vol. 2, p. 7) was rightly skeptical about the veracity of any of the various accounts of the monastery's creation preserved in [2] and [33] below, though Phoberos may have been an imperial monastery at one time (cf. [49]). Even the various names for the monastery and its location could not be satisfactorily explained [2] by the time the typikon was written in the twelfth century. Janin plausibly located the monastery, however, near the Asiatic shore of the Bosphorus, close to the entrance to the Black Sea. The author John has some better evidence for the foundation's more recent history. He notes [33] that it had been ruined by rapacious charistikarioi, probably in the last half of the eleventh century, though he also blames [2] "foreign attacks," probably by the Seljuk Turks towards the end of the same century. He claims [33] that some surviving monks remembered when the foundation housed as many as 170 of their fellows.

According to his own statement, John himself came [1] to the foundation in October 1113. The requirements [33] to commemorate the patriarch and to allow him to provide the blessing of the monastery's superior (cf. [35]) suggest that Patriarch Nicholas III Grammatikos (1084–1111), who is mentioned [50] later as one of the benefactors of the foundation, granted it to John specifically for its restoration as part of a broader patriarchal program of reviving ruined monasteries.

The foundation's subsequent history is obscure. John did not live to complete the typikon and was dead by the time that a list [50] of benefactors to be commemorated was drawn up in October 1144. Luke, metropolitan of Mesembria, had meanwhile completed his service as superior of the monastery. Several members of the noble Botaneiates family, descended from Emperor Nikephoros III Botaneiates (1078–81), established themselves as patrons of the monastery, including the late emperor's widow Maria of Alania and another Nikephoros Botaneiates, son-in-law of Alexios I Komnenos' brother Isaac the sebastokrator, who may have become a monk at Phoberos under the name Neophytos. The younger Botaneiates' wife Eudokia Komnene, still living in 1144, is hailed as the monastery's "second founder" out of consideration for her many gifts to the foundation, including a very large sum of money for the purchase of landed property. Her son Ioannikios, who predeceased her, may, like his father, have been a monk at this monastery. Finally, there is a note of appreciation [59] at the end of the typikon for the nobleman monk Thomas Eugeniotes, hailed as a “spiritual child” of the founder John, for his work in building the monastery’s church and for other benefactions.

Analysis

A. Model for the Typikon

This is the first of the surviving Byzantine monastic foundation documents likely to have been modeled directly on the typikon of the great reform monastery, (22) Evergetis. Of the present document’s sixty-one chapters, forty-five are indebted textually to (22) Evergetis, even though many of these also have substantial original material.³ However, a close examination of some of these chapters suggests that our author was working from a version of (22) Evergetis that predates our present edition of that document. Seventeen chapters in (30) Phoberos are derived from other sources or else are possibly original to this document.⁴ All told, this typikon uses at least parts of all but four of the forty-three chapters found in (22) Evergetis.⁵ This qualifies him, along with Isaac Komnenos, the author of (29) Kosmosoteira, as a “close copier” of the Evergetian typikon, as opposed to several other authors in the Evergetian tradition, like Irene Doukaina Komnene, author of (27) Kecharitomene, who probably relied on various intermediary texts. Even in a few instances where our author completely disagrees with the thrust of (22) Evergetis, such is his reverence for the text of that document that in these cases he strives to incorporate as much as possible of that document’s language in his new, contrary regulations.⁶ Nevertheless, this massive usage of Evergetis is completely unacknowledged by our author, for there is not a single mention even of the monastery of Evergetis, much less its typikon. Our author typically supplements the Evergetian text he has used with supporting citations of various scriptural, ascetic, patristic, and conciliar authorities, a practice of deference to authoritative precedents that was a characteristic trait of the authors of founders’ typika since the late eleventh century.⁷ All this suggests that (22) Evergetis was respected at Phoberos not so much for its own sake as for its consonance with an ever increasingly valued tradition of precedents.

Like (22) Evergetis itself, this document shows unmistakable evidence of a re-edition after the death of the founder John, its original author, who was deceased in 1144 as [50] was written. He is also spoken of in the past tense in [59]. The unprecedented redundancies in the document’s numeration, with both an [8A] and [8B] as well as a [53A] and [53B], are marks of this hasty re-edition that evidently included some reworking of John’s section of the typikon as well.

B. Other Sources

In the middle of a discussion of fasting requirements, the author straightforwardly declares [16]: “I did not write things of my own choice or wish or devising, but what we have received in writing from our holy fathers and what we have learned from experience itself to be true and immutable and unchangeable . . .” Therefore, even aside from the unattributed quotations from (22) Evergetis, it is likely that the author used additional sources to compose his typikon. The foundation history [2] presents two alternative accounts of the monastery’s foundation. Like [3], an account of a miraculous icon of St. John the Forerunner, it is probably derived from lost hagiographical texts.

The bans on boys and beardless youths [58] and on female animals [57] can be traced back to Studite legislation that probably reached our author through Athonite sources like (13) Ath. Typikon. A long chapter [53B], is a discourse on the value of monastic stability, taken from the Ascetic Constitutions incorrectly attributed to Basil of Caesarea, along with a contemporary commentary. Another long chapter [58] features an unattributed quotation from a late antique ascetic author, Paul Helladikos (see below, “Safeguarding Moral Purity”). Some other chapters in the beginning of the document [4], [5], [6], [7], [8] seem suspiciously polished, and although not presented as quotations may in fact have been adopted from other ascetic literature. The long meditation on death [1] may not be original to this document either.

C. Original Materials

The author’s own thought can most confidently be identified in the many chapters in which he carefully cribs his model (22) Evergetis yet introduces small changes or exercises editorial discretion in deleting certain materials. The evidence is discussed below in the Analysis under the appropriate topical subdivisions. The regulation of diet and fasting (see [16], [17], [18], [19]) and the accumulation of supportive quotations from various authoritative sources to supplement the Evergetian quotations on various topics were the author’s most important personal contributions to the document. He even explains [18] the scope of his research to determine the appropriate use of wine in the monastic diet. But aside from the chapters on diet and fasting, the only ones that appear likely to have been the author’s own work are [10], [24] (except for the unrelated quotation from Evergetis at the end), and [31]. He must have stopped work on the document before [50], which honors him as the deceased founder. There are a few original sections thereafter, such as the conclusion of [53B] and both [57] and the introduction to [58], but they must be the work of a subsequent editor.

D. Lives of the Monks

1. Number of the Monks

Unlike the author of (22) Evergetis [23], who declined to set a fixed number of positions for monks in his institution, our author here provides [42] that there will be 12 monks in his foundation, preferably “educated” ones in implicit accord with the latter’s specifications. This is in contrast to the 170 reported [33] to have been living at the foundation before its properties were dispersed by the charistikarioi. Our author is anxious to use the language of his Evergetian model in this regulation even though he comes to an opposite conclusion. The possibility of a later increase is foreseen, contingent on an increase in the foundation’s resources.

2. Liturgical Duties

As in (22) Evergetis [4], [5], and [6], the celebration of the canonical hours was an important part of the lives of the monks at Phoberos, for these chapters are taken over into this foundation’s typikon as chapters [9], [12], and [13], either verbatim or with small changes. The author adds a new chapter [10] which cites patristic and canonical precedent to justify exemptions from genuflections during Christmas and Pentecost, thereby replacing but not contradicting the last few lines of (22) Evergetis [4]. The author adapts [32] the regulations of (22) Evergetis [32] for the patronal feasts to honor St. John the Forerunner.

30. PHOBEROS

Imposing consistency on his less well organized model, our author's successor utilizes [50] portions of (22) Evergetis [34], [35], and [36] in his discussion of memorial services. These were to be performed annually for the founder John, his spiritual father Luke, metropolitan of Mesembria, who had been the monastery's superior, various members of the Komnenos dynasty, some of whom had become monks in the foundation, Patriarch Nicholas Grammatikos, and other benefactors. Following (22) Evergetis [36], this typikon also orders commemorative services and charitable distributions at the gate in remembrance of the foundation's departed monks.

3. Manual Labor

Although the author reproduces [14] verbatim from (22) Evergetis [7] that document's evidence for a community divided into monks dedicated to liturgical services and a larger number engaged in manual tasks, this may not be an accurate portrayal of conditions at Phoberos since there were only twelve resident monks at this foundation. In the last chapter [59], however, there is an enigmatic command to the monks to "provide your own food from the work of your own hands" which might indicate that the monks were expected to prepare if not actually grow their own food. Self-provision also seems implicit in [57].

4. Sacramental Life

Our author adopts [11], [14] the provisions of (22) Evergetis [5], [7] on communion and confession. He places the discussion of the "Great Confession" offered to the superior at a monk's tensure in a separate chapter [15]. Subsequently, the author obliges [36] the monks to make their confessions exclusively to their superior rather than to some other spiritual father, in this respect following and quoting (22) Evergetis [15].

5. Length of the Novitiate

The author's successor copies [51] the language and procedures of (22) Evergetis [37] on the monks' novitiate, but adds that the typikon is to be read to the postulants (cf. (24) Christodoulos [A26], where portions of the Basilian Rule are to be read) and the term for casual acquaintances is considerably lengthened to three years. A new chapter, [52], utilizes some of the language of (22) Evergetis [37] but, citing canonical tradition, comes to an opposite conclusion in banning outside monks entirely.

6. Cenobitic Lifestyle

Our author follows [41] the stern provisions of (22) Evergetis [22] in prohibiting private possessions, eating in secret, and correspondence with family or friends without the superior's permission. Also, as in (22) Evergetis [27], the superior was to visit [45] cells monthly and confiscate any unauthorized items found there. Following (22) Evergetis [24], monks at Phoberos were not to have [43] personal servants. Since the author thought that "it is harmful for novices to be only one to a cell," he orders [43] monks to be grouped three to a cell (unlike (22) Evergetis [24] with its pairing of older and younger monks). Perhaps Phoberos' arrangement was more effective in curbing the much-feared "special friendships" (cf. [59]) between monks. Our author sees fit to require [45] the foundation's monks to observe equality in food, drink and clothing, following (22) Evergetis [26] verbatim in this respect. In some respects he is even stricter than his model: he forbids [44] the use of locks and keys in the monks' cells, and, unlike (22) Evergetis [28] (at least in that document's present form), he does not allow [46] the monks to bathe except for those who were sick.

TWELFTH CENTURY

As a reminder to the monks of their responsibilities, the author's successor provides [59] for the reading of the typikon at mealtimes, starting at the beginning of the month until the document had been read aloud to its conclusion. This follows the prescription and language of (22) Evergetis [43].

7. Fasting

The author's interest in the subject of fasting far exceeds that of his model (22) Evergetis and ought to be compared to the importance placed on this topic by Nikon, the author of (20) Black Mountain, with whose generally conservative approach to problems he agrees on several points of controversy. Yet chapters [27] through [30] on the dietary regime for fasts copy (22) Evergetis [10] very closely. Following his usual practice, the author produces [28] a long list of canonical, scriptural, and patristic testimonies to support his treatment of the Holy Saturday fast. A chapter not found in (22) Evergetis treats [31] the fast before the feast of the Dormition of the Mother of God, citing old precedents that are identical to those found in (20) Black Mountain [87]. Similarly, the discussion of the fasting requirement on Wednesdays and Fridays in Lent starts off [16] with a quotation from (22) Evergetis [8], but then launches into a lengthy additional discussion based on various ascetic sources including Palladius' Lausiaca History, the Panarion of St. Epiphanius, and the Life of St. Symeon the Wonderworker. Other chapters regulate [17], [18] and [19] fasts that may and may not be broken and set quantities of food and drink. They are not present in (22) Evergetis, but may be taken from another source or sources as the author implies in [18]. A liturgical calendar, similar to but with fewer feasts than its counterpart in (20) Black Mountain [89], is included as part of [19].

8. Care of Sick Monks

Taking his lead from the provisions of (25) Evergetis [41] our author's successor orders [56] that a cell be set aside to serve as an infirmary for sick monks. There were to be four beds in this hospice; at Evergetis, a larger institution, there were eight.

E. Constitutional Matters

1. Independent and Self-Governing Status

Our author follows [33] the lead of Evergetis and other reform monasteries in claiming independent and self-governing status for the foundation. The reform patriarch Nicholas III Grammatikos had granted this status in a now lost memorandum (hypomnema) sometime before his death in 1111. The chapter in question here closely follows the language of (22) Evergetis [12], with an indignant note added that it was the institution's past charistikarioi who had been responsible for ruining this once flourishing foundation, now being reconstituted but at a fraction of its former size.

2. Selection of the Superior

The typikon provides [35] for the superior to direct the foundation as in (22) Evergetis [13] and [14]. As in the latter document, it was envisioned that the steward would advance to the position of superior provided he had carried out his office faultlessly. Our author adds very little new material here except for the requirement that the monks should take their new superior to the patriarch to receive his blessing (cf. [33]). There are, however, three major deletions from the text of Evergetis: the installation ceremonies for the new superior staged internally in that monastery, the explanation of why it might be necessary to remove an unfit steward, and the entreaty to the monks to avoid jealousy, strife and factionalism in their choice of a new superior.

3. Removal of the Superior

Borrowing the language of (22) Evergetis [13], our author instructs [35] the preeminent monks to remove an unfit superior, provided they can agree on a suitable replacement. However, like the author of (22) Evergetis [18], he was unwilling to allow [37] the brothers to demand financial accounts from their superior, but he drops the lengthy justification for this position found in the latter document.

4. Role of the Preeminent Monks

These officials are given [35] the responsibilities of helping the superior choose a steward and of choosing an alternative to a bad steward to promote to the superiorship as in (22) Evergetis [13] and [14]. As in Evergetis, the superior is instructed [35] to use the preeminent monks as his advisors. They were to be among the witnesses [38] of emergency alienations of consecrated property (cf. (22) Evergetis [19]).

F. Financial Matters

1. Financial Officials

As in (22) Evergetis [13], the key financial official was the steward who was also superior-designate. Our author also adopts [47] the three treasurers and the language describing their responsibilities from (22) Evergetis [30]. For some reason, the list of grounds for the steward's deposition that is found in (22) Evergetis [14], mostly related to fiscal misadministration, is omitted in (30) Phoberos. Also missing is (22) Evergetis [20], with its detailed description of how the monetary treasurer was obliged to keep detailed records of the monastery's income and expenditures. The sanction of expulsion found in (22) Evergetis [22] for thieves who fail to make amends is retained, however, in (30) Phoberos [41]. Since it is unlikely that our author wished to hold his financial officials to lesser standards of accountability than their counterparts at Evergetis, this may be an indication that he utilized an older version of that document than the one now extant, before revisions were added to it reflecting the experiences with the government requisitions of the 1080s and 1090s.

2. Provisions against Misconduct

According to [1], there was once an inventory associated with this foundation which described the church and its much improved cells, and made a record of books, sacred vessels, icons, coverings and cloths. In this respect Phoberos follows the pattern established by reform monasteries of the late eleventh century with an eye towards deterring future thefts or at least making them more easily detectable. The author also incorporates [47] the provisions of (22) Evergetis [29] in which the revering of patronal icons of Christ and (here) John the Baptist is associated with the bestowal of keys of office to various officials. However, the use of the typikon in (22) Evergetis [13] as a substitute for the icons and keys in the superior's installation ceremony does not appear in this document.

3. Inalienability of Property

Our author closely follows his model (22) Evergetis [19] in declaring [38] the inalienability of the foundation's movable and immovable properties under ordinary circumstances. Evergetis' assertion that a violation of this rule would be sacrilege is missing in (30) Phoberos. The latter's procedure for handling emergency alienations also omits the use of the monastery's inventory as a checklist as provided for in the Evergetian typikon. This therefore may be another instance in which Phoberos follows an older version of (22) Evergetis before reactions to the imperial requisitions of the Komnenian era had had a chance to make an impact on the final version of that text. Like our existing text of (22) Evergetis [42], however, (30) Phoberos [59] warns even the monks not to pilfer the monastery's possessions.

4. Property Managers

In his brief discussion of the qualifications of property managers [49], the author follows his model (22) Evergetis [34] in requiring that monks chosen as property administrators should be pious and preferably elderly. He adds the particular information that the monastery still possesses some "small worthless pieces" of immovable properties (though most have been "snatched away") donated by the emperor who built the monastery long ago.

5. No Mandatory Entrance Gifts

Following (22) Evergetis [37] closely, the author's successor abandons [53A] the requirement of mandatory entrance gifts while allowing voluntary ones. He faithfully reproduces the assertion of the Evergetian typikon that an attempt by a departing monk to reclaim his entrance gift was be considered as sacrilege.

G. Overall Philosophy

1. Egalitarian Aspects

The author imports [36] some of the language hostile to privilege found in (22) Evergetis [17]. Moreover, he faithfully reproduces [45] the instruction of his model (22) Evergetis [26] that even officials should not be exempt from the required uniformity of food, drink and dress. Elsewhere, he adds [36] that the superior should go into the refectory daily and have the cellarer set out before him the food of the brothers for his inspection. He also closely follows the militantly cenobitic (22) Evergetis [9] in several of its own chapters intended to regulate the refectory, including that document's vehement condemnation of quarrels over seating.⁹ True to form, the author cannot resist adding his own selection of scriptural passages in [23] to support (22) Evergetis [9]'s condemnation of eating in secret.

2. Not Anti-Aristocratic

Like (22) Evergetis, however, this document is hardly anti-aristocratic. As we have seen [50], members of the imperial family both patronized the foundation and joined it as monks, and the author himself prefers [42] educated monks. As in (22) Evergetis [37], "distinguished people" are allowed to be tonsured [51] without serving the novitiate (which was especially long here). Also like (22) Evergetis [39], noblewomen are excepted [55] from the general ban on women visiting the monastery. Moreover, the foundation's beloved "second founder" Eudokia Komnene [50] was a member of the imperial family, and the founder's "spiritual child" who assisted in the building of the church and became a monk in the foundation, was the nobleman Thomas Eugeniotes [59].

30. PHOBEROS

3. Concerns over Safeguarding Morality

As in (22) Evergetis [38], women are excluded [55] from daily distributions at the gate (though not from annual ones) professedly to protect the monks from sexual temptation. But much more so than its model, (30) Phoberos is obsessed with safeguarding the moral purity of its monks and considers threats from all sources. Following the old Studite tradition seen in (3) Theodore Studites [5] and adopted for Athos in (13) Ath. Typikon [31], our author's successor not only bans [59] female animals from inside or outside the monastery, but in [57] there is a long justification of this position. Then there is the document's most remarkable chapter [58], mostly made up of a long unattributed quotation from the late antique ascetic Paul Helladikos. This describes the threat to monastic chastity posed by bestiality and homosexuality.

H. External Relations

1. Relations with the Ecclesiastical Hierarchy

Perhaps in view of its founders' views of the unreformed patriarchs of their times, (22) Evergetis made no mention of any patriarchal rights over that foundation. In different circumstances, with a friendlier patriarch, our author affirms [33] (cf. [35]) the rights of future patriarchs to liturgical commemoration (anaphora) and blessing (sphragis) of new superiors as he was obliged to do by the terms of Nicholas III Grammatikos' memorandum. As noted above, the patriarch was also among those benefactors listed [50] for liturgical commemoration. By demonstrating their continuing commitment to reform activities, Nicholas' immediate successors John IX Agapetos (1111–34) and Leo Styppes (1134–43) must have earned the confidence of our author and his successors at Phoberos.

2. Institutional Philanthropy

Our author's successor simply adopts [54] the charitable provisions of (22) Evergetis [38], including distributions at the gate, hospitality to travelers and the sick, and burial of those who died while lodged at the foundation. Elsewhere in a long chapter that is mostly independent of (22) Evergetis, the original author John warns [24] the monks, however, that the practice of almsgiving was no substitute for a life of poverty. This suggests that the commitment to poverty was wavering, perhaps as some aristocratic monks sought to return to the practice of retaining some of their personal assets after admission as seen earlier in (9) Galesios [192].

Notes on the Introduction

1. The grant of independence through a memorandum of Patriarch Nicholas III Grammatikos (†1111) mentioned in [33] and the date the author John arrived at the site, October 1113, help establish a terminus post quem. The fact that the document borrows from (22) Evergetis is no help for dating it since the latter also cannot be dated precisely. Although they both borrow from (22) Evergetis, there is no apparent relationship between this document and (27) Kecharitomene, itself thought to date to 1110–16, which might otherwise help to date (30) Phoberos. The mention of John as being deceased in [50], in which there is also a record of a donation dated to October 1144, indicates a re-edition took place at that time.

TWELFTH CENTURY

2. See the Foreword by V. Benešević to Papadopoulos-Kerameus' posthumous edition in Noctes Petropolitanae. The manuscript may be an autograph.
3. [1], cf. (22) Evergetis [3]; [9], [10], cf. (22) Evergetis [4]; [11], cf. (22) Evergetis [5]; [12], [13], cf. (22) Evergetis [6]; [14], [15], cf. (22) Evergetis [7]; [16], cf. (22) Evergetis [8]; [20], [21], [22], [23], [24], [26], cf. (22) Evergetis [9]; [27], [28], [29], [30], cf. (22) Evergetis [10]; [32], cf. (22) Evergetis [11]; [33], cf. (22) Evergetis [12]; [34], cf. (22) Evergetis [13]; [35], cf. (22) Evergetis [13], [14], [15]; [36], cf. (22) Evergetis [15], [16], [17]; [37], cf. (22) Evergetis [18]; [38], cf. (22) Evergetis [19]; [39], [40], cf. (22) Evergetis [21]; [41], cf. (22) Evergetis [22]; [42], cf. (22) Evergetis [23]; [43], cf. (22) Evergetis [24]; [44], cf. (22) Evergetis [25]; [45], cf. (22) Evergetis [26], [27]; [46], cf. (22) Evergetis [28]; [47], cf. (22) Evergetis [29], [30]; [48], cf. (22) Evergetis [31], [32], [33]; [49], cf. (22) Evergetis [34]; [50], cf. (22) Evergetis [34], [35], [36]; [51], [52], [53A], cf. (22) Evergetis [37]; [54], cf. (22) Evergetis [38]; [55], cf. (22) Evergetis [38], [39], [41]; [56], cf. (22) Evergetis [41]; [59], cf. (22) Evergetis [42], [43].
4. (30) Phoberos [2], [3], [4], [5], [6], [7], [8A], [8B], [16], [17], [18], [19], [25], [31], [53B], [57], [58].
5. (22) Evergetis [1], [2], [20], [40].
6. See [42], cf. (22) Evergetis [23]; [46], cf. (22) Evergetis [28]; and [52], cf. (22) Evergetis [37].
7. See especially (20) Black Mountain [53], [87], and (24) Christodoulos [18], [26], [28].

Bibliography

- Beck, Hans-Georg, Kirche und theologische Literatur im byzantinischen Reich (Munich, 1959), p. 647.
- Galatariotou, Catia, "Eros and Thanatos: A Byzantine Hermit's Conception of Sexuality," B&MGS 13 (1990), 95–137, esp. 116–17.
- Janin, Raymond, La géographie ecclésiastique de l'empire byzantin, vol. 2: Les églises et les monastères des grands centres byzantins (Paris, 1975), pp. 7–8.
- Talbot, Alice-Mary, "Phoberou Monastery," ODB, p. 1665.
- Volk, Robert, Gesundheitswesen und Wohltätigkeit im Spiegel der byzantinischen Klostertypika (Munich, 1983), pp. 112–20.

As noted above, this document shares substantial portions of the text of (22) Evergetis as well as other ascetic works. In our translation, the borrowings are indicated in boldface type.

Translation

Rule and commentary containing in brief all the monastic life and practice, accurately put together by John, a humble monk, and handed on to his brothers on the mountain of the monastery of [St. John] the venerable Forerunner at Monacheion.

Therefore, holy fathers, you who read this, pray for me the careless sinner, so that I may find God merciful on the fearful day of judgment.

Pronounce a blessing, father.

[1]. "What profit is there in my blood, when I go down to destruction?" (Ps. 29 [30]:9) This David the prophet and king cried out in clear and prophetic language. His words are true and prophetic, and suit the reality of the actual situation. For we human beings have not been made for this purpose, namely to continue in toil, disorder, and the cares of life, by which and through which the innermost part of the sea is investigated and all places on earth, cultivated land, rocks, valleys, and the slopes of mountains are thoroughly searched, so that from them man might have his luxury items. Man was formed and created in God's image (cf. Gen. 1:26–29), and appointed to rule the creatures below him, an earthly angel in bodily form and a clear herald of the majesty of God in him, as it is said and believed that the “wisdom of God is magnified in man” (cf. Ps. 138 [139]:6), because man is really a remarkable creature, as in the same being has been united and is contained an incorporeal nature, immaterial, ever-moving, and an essentially animal one in a very material and carnal body which wastes away and changes, suffers and is altered, is changed and modified through the earthly and [p. 2] dispersed nature of its material and through its crafty nature that is prone to lapse and is changeable and variable.

30. PHOBEROS

Just as the same man is born as a very small creature, so he is enclosed somewhere within his body which is like a very small wall, a very changeable creature and one that seizes on everything by the very swift movements of his mind, not enclosed by places, nor by very solid battlements on walls. So the means of his birth accompany him and live at the same time and are contained within him, a heavenly being that thinks and an earthly one that sees, the same being incorruptible and corruptible, mortal and immortal, controlled by reason and often moved by very irrational desires, honorable at the same time in as much as he has been formed and created by the hands of the creator and in whose image and likeness the elements of his forming came to him. Since this creature is one that is intelligent and possesses free will, it is controlled by thought and reason, yet also at times it is made subject to the laws of disorderliness in proportion to its more irrational and earthly nature, when its material constitution holds sway within it; and according to this part of its nature it is classed with the animals.

David himself, who was approved of by God often in many places, in his writings very often says, “Man that is in honor understands not; he is compared to the senseless cattle and is like them” (Ps. 48 [49]:20), because in reality, my beloved ones, whenever reason rules us we live like God, then we also become beautiful people and are beautiful in our feet in accordance with the declaration about Our Lord and Master (cf. Is. 52:7; Rom. 10:15), for we preach peace, not only outward peace among the mass of mankind but much more so inward and spiritual peace. For there is a kind of war and disagreement in the soul which different passions stir up.

Listen to Paul as he speaks and organizes us for this war of the mind, “Our war is not against flesh and blood, but against principalities, against powers, against the ruler of darkness” (Eph. 6:12), I mean the murderous and wicked serpent. For material and physical warfare is often caused by swarms of foreigners seized by a desire for gain. Swords and breastplates are made ready, by means of which it is planned to overthrow all the enemy forces that resist. There is nothing strange in that. For the people who abide by their earthly nature display the actions of their earthly nature; but then, when the passions make an attack on the spirit, that is a pitiable situation and worthy of many tears, for even now as I think of the excessive amount of my passion and sin, a tear falls from my eyes. You may also experience this, those of you who live devoutly and reverently and for whom the most important end being sought is the salvation of your souls. For it is possible to see man sometimes living a life in accordance with God and carrying about him a kind of peace, but sometimes in the control of the [p. 3] wicked serpent who is preparing war and gathering the passions together against the soul like a swarm of barbarians, and making an attack on the mind. It is [a situation] worthy of many tears, when it is possible to see this man falling, and being killed in a pitiable overthrow, and his decease and death, when the power of his soul is ineffective and fails to stir an impulse towards things that are more divine, when the man who is controlled by reason is viewed like an irrational animal and seems to be without understanding because of the form of his very irrational way of life, when he has a need of many prayers and supplications to see again the light of knowledge kindled within him and find a return to that old form of his way of life. But I have been drawn away by the stream of my discourse, I do not know how, and I am being carried there away from my target.

So then I will bring my discourse back to its purpose, bearing those abiding words of David, my beloved ones, in my inner and spiritual ears, and having Solomon in agreement as to their meaning that everything slips away and vanishes, as he himself instructs—for, he says, “the form of the world passes away” (I Cor. 7:31) and equally pleasures turn into shadows, for “treasures shall not profit the lawless, but righteousness shall deliver from death” (Prov. 10:2)—and on the other side having this word of the Lord which suggests to me the means of salvation, “for what will it profit a man, if he gains the whole world and forfeits his life? Or what shall a man give in return for his life?” (Matt. 16:26) I have dismissed all the things that are subject to decay, having the Lord himself present with me and suggesting to me words of salvation. For really, my beloved ones, what is the equal of soul? For all the attributes of the body and whatever bodily good things anyone might mention, as many as there are of whatever kind, whether beauty or speed or strength or even those outside it and more external, wealth, nobility, acres of land, and the supremacy of one’s country, the many things of this kind by which man gains distinction when he caters to the senses, they all quickly fade and pass away, disappearing in so far as they are not even held in the hand, for no sooner does an eye glance up and comprehend it all, then close and withdraw, than these pass away.

For what is it that abides in possessions whatever they are? Let someone have beauty of body, and the limbs and parts of his body be of a corresponding kind; let the man be made as a creature fashioned on the lathe, let a marvelous complexion bloom appearing in the beauty of his face, part white and part red and mixed; let a mass of hair adorn him, let it be fair in color and let it be moved gently and suitably in a gentle breeze and a peaceful breath [p. 4] of wind; let this man also when so adorned raise eyebrows and let him behave impudently towards his neighbors by raising his eyes beyond the heavenly orbits. [But] let the symptoms of ill health appear in him; let violent fevers seize the man and let him be smitten by disease and remain in bed through the constraints of diseases; then visit this man and see where the pride of him has gone; soon you will shed a tear from your eyes, reckoning up the most pitiable aspect of nature and that he who was lately a man to be admired for his appearance now lies a pitiable ruin and worthy of many tears. If the seeds of his dissolution accompany him and the indescribable bond is likely to be dissolved, then the meaning of the story becomes more clear. The one who lately was using a fine-talking tongue, the swiftly moving creature in tune with his impulses, is a phantom and shadow of a creature, and in truth nothing anywhere. As his eyes are nowhere, neither do the means of his sight operate, as the hands that are on him are hands no longer, and his feet no longer carry his torso, but all the limbs and parts of his body that were lately supple and very easily moved have become lifeless and dead and motionless, and in short exist only in name but nowhere in action.

30. PHOBEROS

Would any man not weep pondering on these things in his mind and flee the vanity of human life, and will he not lament for the living more than for the dead as if they were corpses, since they are carried about by vanity, as Our Savior himself instructed saying, “Leave the dead to bury their own dead” (Matt. 8:22), because men who remain in the confusion of vanity are no better than corpses? For man has been formed by God to be a member of “the heavenly commonwealth” (cf. Phil. 3:20), to reach up to that place and contemplate the beauties there. For this reason he has an upright stance which looks straight upwards and contemplates heaven. For this reason he has the name “man” (anthropos) as one appointed to gaze upwards and behold the beauties there, and able to derive pleasure and banish pain. What is seen [when man contemplates heaven serves] as a model of conduct, while the feet walk and serve as a ministering instrument of walking. For this is what the complex term “man” means, that man is obliged to travel straight along the road that leads to God himself, by whom we have been made and to whom we return.

For this is the end of human life, and the mystery of man’s creation and composition leads us to this. Man has come into being as a formation and creation of God, the hand of God created him; even if dust is part of the material and earthliness and a kind of earthy composition, the end of the creation and its most purposeful aim is the return of the [p. 5] creature to its creator and Lord, the return of the thing made to its maker through the perfecting of his deification. For these reasons there is envy, debate, loss of life, and the means of condemnation which are immediate, terrible and inexorable, death and return to that very dust from which he was formed (Gen. 2:7). But nevertheless the creator brings the creature to life again and conquers death. This is the great mystery of the dispensation, that God becomes man and takes the form of a servant (cf. Phil. 2:7), so that man might be made divine again and regain his ancient status. If anyone considers all these things in his mind, how will he not ignore the visible world and consider it to be like the “grass of the field which today is alive and tomorrow” (Matt. 6:30) withers and dies? For such things are subject to death, appearing for a short time, quickly being refuted and fading away, being dissolved and passing away, and deceiving only the senses. Turning over these and such things in my thoughts, I myself ignored the visible world and chose to live alone with God, as he himself instructed; for he says, “Be still and know” (Ps. 45 [46]:10). For in reality if someone does not keep himself far away from material and earthly confusion, he will no longer understand what is the end of life that is in accordance with God. For where there is disorder and disturbance, a recollection of God cannot be present in any very pure way. Smoke chases away a swarm of bees as men say who occupy themselves with beehives, and disturbance from worldly things chases away the recollection of God from the spirit of each person.

This being my state of mind, I came to this place which was in that small and simple form in the confidence of a very noble and unwavering spirit at the beginning of October of the sixth indiction and the six thousand six hundred and twenty-first year [1113 A.D.]. [cf. (22) Evergetis [3], ed. lines 49–60]: On finding this so small and very insignificant, in its place with the help of God and the intercessions of [St. John] the venerable Forerunner and the prayers of my holy father I worked and raised it to this most imposing and perfect condition from obscurity and simplicity. Furthermore you know and the truth makes clear what kind of a church was built from the very foundations to my Lord the Baptist and Herald of God, and what cells were constructed, much better than the previous ones, and the number and kinds of books that were acquired, similarly the sacred vessels and holy icons, also the holy veils and liturgical cloths, and in short the rest of the adornment of the all-holy church, and in addition the landed property acquired to support and maintain the monastery. It is not necessary for us to talk of these matters and anyone wishing to find out can be instructed more clearly by studying the inventory. [p. 6]

2. The early history concerning the establishment of the monastery of Monacheion.

But now I must return to what I was saying, and I must give the early history of this monastery. It was indeed a small monastery then, or not even a monastery but much more like a hermitage, built perhaps years before in the name of the venerable Forerunner and Baptist, and time and foreign attacks had reduced it to nothing, for this is the report of history unwritten from its beginning that reached our ears. The establishing of the monastery was strange; therefore it is worth committing the details of this to writing, to prevent them being destroyed by time and handed over to the depths of oblivion. Time knows how to destroy and cover over many such things. An unwritten story came to us, which memory has preserved embedded in the souls of those who heard it, that this place which has now been consecrated to God as a monastery happened to be a very dense coppice full of trees, more suitable to be lived in by wild animals but not by men who dedicated the whole of their life to God. For the place is cold, unpleasantly cold, washed all round by the sea, just like a hill and a precipitous place surrounded by water as if in ravines in the valleys of the mountains, untrodden not only by men but also by most wild animals.

But such are the marvels of God. He was about to change what was as it were a wild olive into a cultivated one and make this place which was untrodden even by wild animals a place trodden by the beautiful feet of holy men “whose ways are not crooked nor their paths turned aside” (Prov. 2:15), but their ways are straight and their paths direct in the presence of the Lord Sabaoth. So what is the manner of its establishment and how does the God of miracles manage miraculous deeds that surpass the power of speech often by means of his enemies? For in this even more is the majesty of his glory discovered, the God who manages and controls everything.

A very illustrious man and close friend of the emperor—even though his name has vanished and been forgotten, as time knows how to remove many such things and commit them to the depths of oblivion—is struck by the shafts of envy and is himself slandered in the hearing of the emperor. For envy knows how to creep up on those with great power, since it often mixes a cup of bitterness and prepares death for those who are envied, and the very facts are a true witness to my statement. Such a thing also happened to this man, intrigue, slander, and finally the death penalty, to be thrown down into the waves of the sea, death, and disappearance. For such is envy and such are its wages. So the man was led out walking very slowly and leisurely on the road to death. He was anguished in spirit, he suffered, he trembled. For what else is more terrible than death, and a very violent [p. 7] death from drowning?

But oh, the ineffable decisions of God! For again he performed a miracle in this situation, he who previously quenched that blazing furnace which a barbaric and insolent mind had lit when the raging Nebuchadnezzar was roused up in recklessness. He who changed that to dew and rescued those burning children by extinguishing the blaze as if in refreshing water (cf. Dan. 3:28–50), the same one again performed a miracle in another strange way, because providence which manages things in different ways is truly a complex thing. Pity seized the one who was leading him off [to death]; for what is more sympathetic than human nature? He wept quietly, was in agreement, was well disposed, respected friendship, honored him. The end of the story is that he granted him the full measure of life and recommended that he hide himself in the thickets on the mountains and make his way through trackless places.

30. PHOBEROS

Pursuing the terms of life [granted to him], the man came to this place. The hope of life beguiled him, and since he had already received the pledge of his safety, he hid in the thickly wooded parts of the place. What happened next? One day the man was traveling by himself and suddenly (in fact as I relate the strange happening my hairs rise; for in such situations the spirit concentrates upon itself and withdraws, and is concerned with itself experiencing a contraction like a liquid which flows around a cavity, [but] because the story is strange, it is worth committing to writing) a man long-haired and shaggy, a creature of the wilderness for the apparition looked like that sort of thing, appeared to the man. It appeared to converse with him and preached the good news of salvation, and showed him a chapel and advised him to settle near it.

What happened next? A short time elapsed and the pleasant apparition came again, he, great among the prophets, appeared himself and inquired if he knew the one he saw. When the man answered that he did not, he heard him saying “I am that very one, the one great among prophets, John the Baptist, and the signs are clear. Your [bonds] of fear will be broken and as a pledge of my word the imperial power of the Romans will be entrusted to you, since God is managing your fate. As a reward to me for this prophecy, a chapel will be built in this place to my name.” In connection with this he gave an instruction, such as the Savior himself issued to his disciples. For then he instructed them not to depart from Jerusalem unless the manifestation of divine power came upon them (Acts 1:4), and here there was the same miracle and guarantee and disappearance of the fear that possessed him. The proclamation was amazing because it assured him of imperial power over the empire of the Romans and furthermore a recompense for the prophecy was imposed on him, namely the construction by himself of a chapel in [John the Baptist’s] name.

Only a short time intervened, and the emperor who arranged [p. 8] his death departed this life. He was searched for, inquired after, summoned to the imperial power, and he fulfilled his promise and built the chapel, since it is natural that the indescribable vision and the fulfillment of the prophecy had not left his mind. That was the establishment of the monastery, as we have it from popular report as if from some tradition. But different people have handed down the incidents of the story differently, and I will relate what has been received in this case. For I see rivers running together into the same stream, beginning from different springs but flowing together into one area and ravine; for even if there is a difference between them in their beginning, yet their end is in real harmony and agreement.

A peak rises up above the land and one portion of it is called Peak of Zeus and another, Sanctuary. For this land is high, raised above the plain, sloping towards a peak and reaching the summit of the peak over a long distance. There is one part where it is surrounded both by hills and some precipitous places. In this place many sacrifices were performed by people sailing since the beginning of time and certain rites and vows. It was simply so that their voyage might go with a fair wind with the ship being carried along gently by the wind and that a smooth surge might be seen with a favorable and gentle wind while the waves sweep forward and mock the promontories, and are not whipped up like high mountains by the winds.

There is a large ravine between the mountains. It is a fearful ravine. In it is a hollowing of the mountains and a flooding in of waves. This ravine in the course of time gave its name to the monastery, sometimes the name Chasmadion was attached [to the monastery] from the ravine itself, and sometimes the Machadion or Chamadion was given, distorted in some way by the transposition and rearrangement of the letters. Others bestowed a name as a result of what followed the event, assigning the name Mone Phoberou to the monastery.

For here again—I do not know how—the [story of the] establishment of the monastery is recounted in another way. Do you wish to know this story? [Our] account will describe the establishment of the monastery starting from this point. Recently war was being waged by Theophilus [(829–842)], the impious emperor, against the holy icons of Christ, and he who wielded power over the empire of the Romans was ruled by strange passions, I do not know how, not by righteous indignation but by impiety which throws everything under heaven into confusion. The unrighteous persecuted and the righteous were persecuted. The anger of the impious emperor boiled over and the community of righteous men was burnt down and at that time it was possible to see righteous people being persecuted, starving, and [p. 9] being afflicted by countless excessive acts of ill-treatment. For this is the nature of evil, whenever it is stimulated by more uncontrolled desires. For often storms rouse the sea and as the waves come to a head they froth, and in the case of a soul, when it is often attacked by glory and at the same time by madness, excessive and incomparable evil is found in it. Such was the calamity that happened then. Theodore and Theophanes, the Graptoi,¹ who were condemned to exile at that time, bear witness to the very violent storm that came down on the church of Christ then.

3. Concerning the painter Lazarus who made the icon of [St. John] the venerable Forerunner with his left hand while in exile.

At that time a certain Lazarus, a painter by craft, knowing how to mix colors appropriately and render the figures and forms of icons in proper proportion, was slandered in the hearing of the one who wielded imperial power at that time. For such is envy, it suggests easily fabricated pretexts and excites the shallowest minds and provides the treachery of the plot. For it knows how to start a fire like highly inflammable material which nourishes a fire until it becomes a great blaze, and slanders and plots about certain matters know how to inflame a soul that is fanatical through madness and a love of impiety.

What happened to this man was what happens naturally in such cases. The man was slandered because he painted icons and made well-formed figures. The penalty was exile in this place and a dreadful punishment which is worth committing to writing. Some iron was heated up and flattened into the shape of a square. It was fastened on to his hand, which was bound up with iron and at once lost its use and active function at the same time, since the fire was by now showing its own capability. But some say that the iron was tied to both of his hands, yet one hand was made immobile and incapable of doing anything, suffering the effects of destruction and death, but his left was somehow preserved.

30. PHOBEROS

Then using this and mixing various types of colors, as the Artist Word seemed to suggest, he depicted the figure of the greatest of the prophets on a very small piece of wood. The power of the icon is miraculous, so it is said. For often in many places a stream of miracles has gushed forth from it, and the long story of its miraculous deeds has been preserved up to our times.

But the common old saying seems to be true, that “all-conquering time”² seems to destroy and wear out everything and the more so when there is a combination of some opposing elements. Such indeed was the calamity which happened in this case. For the material has been destroyed even if its grace is not exhausted. Everything of the icon that is destroyed by time has fallen away from it and only the figure has been preserved, displaying [p. 10] grace that gushes up inexhaustibly, because this is recognized as part of the icon’s miracles also, since the image of the figure has been left safe and intact right up to our time.

The fact that when so much time has elapsed the figure has not been destroyed seems to me at least one of its greatest miracles and a miracle worthy of the prophet’s greatness. This figure hunted down by me was kept as a treasure. I handed it to skillful painters and now it radiates in a clearer image, so to speak, its manifestations of grace to those who are fond of [wondrous] sights. So farewell to other things. We know that this icon is an inexhaustible treasure, and the fact that we are alive and glory in our preservation is because we live by this.

4. Beginning of spiritual instruction.

So God cares for everything since he is a common Deliverer and Savior, creating everything and laboring to save mankind, because on account of mankind he “bowed the heavens” (Ps. 17 [18]:9) and “took on the form of a servant” (Phil. 2:7) to deliver mankind oppressed by the deceit of Satan the slayer of mortals. We hear and believe and the report is unimpeachable that there is great “joy in the heavens over one who repents” (Luke 15:7); and if a lamp is lit, being the light of discernment, and the dirt is swept from the house (cf. Luke 15:8) which is our material, earthly, and fleshly garment, to what extent ought we to take pains in working at the means of our salvation? “A voice was heard in Ramah, wailing and loud lamentation” and “Rachel weeps for her children and does not accept consolation” (Matt. 2:18). The statement is true, because when we sin there is wailing in heaven. When the spiritual Rachel, “the church of the first-born” (Heb. 12:23) herself, looks for her children and does not find them, since they have already been consumed by the sword of Herod’s most irrational desire (cf. Matt. 2:16), the mortal-slaying Satan that is, she weeps more intensely.

So in the future, my beloved ones, since the war of the mortal-slaying Satan against us is one that takes many forms, we ought to make war on him spiritually, since we are being attacked also in many ways. But the warfare is not in any way visible or physical. For if it was, the plotting and the struggle would have its end once the battle had been announced and victory was coming to us, but in reality, according to Paul, it is not against flesh and blood, but against the ruler of darkness (cf. Eph. 6:12), [p. 11] the wicked murderer. So then since the plot is different in character, come, we will suggest to you the nature of the struggle. For a man who is a general and commands an army, whenever he leads his army out to war, often makes conjectures about the war, and imagines the killing, the advances of the enemy, the ambushes, the tricks, the intrigues, as he prepares his army to be courageous when facing the clash and struggle of the war. But since the war is not for us one of the senses but is completely spiritual, with the passions sometimes attacking and disturbing the soul itself, and sometimes the mortal-slaying Satan stirring up and preparing war against us, come now, we shall suggest to you the means of this spiritual preparation and struggle in which we show ourselves most noble soldiers, approved by Jesus Christ who calls and will call us.

I pray that my words be clear and effective [and that] my discourse will do its part and contribute to [your benefit] through my prayers. Well then, the means are clear. For arrows and swords and daggers, when they touch earthly bodies, sink into the flesh and produce cuts and the dissolution of the body's binding. As a result, when the wound is very serious, death often follows for the person who is struck. But here in the spiritual struggle a very important weapon that brings death and destruction to the one who makes war on us, namely mortal-slaying Satan, is the power that comes from the singing of psalms itself and from prayer, as the apostle says when writing to Timothy, "First of all, then, I urge that supplications, prayers, intercessions, and thanksgivings be made for all men, for kings and all who are in high positions, that we may lead a quiet and peaceful life, godly and respectful in every way. For this is good, and it is acceptable in the sight of God our Savior, who desires all men to be saved and to come to the knowledge of the truth" (I Tim. 2:1-4).

Because of this, come, as if on a picture and a placard let us sketch the outline itself of the teaching. But since man is made up of two natures, possessing a substance made up from soul and body (for in this is a body liable to the passage of time and death, but also a soul, more divine and higher, transcending the whole passage of time and its own union) we shall suggest to you a twofold kind of teaching, passing on a rule and precept and outline, sometimes concerning the singing of psalms itself, since it strengthens the soul itself and enlightens the mind, but sometimes also concerning diet which enslaves the body and does not allow it to rise up against the soul. However, before the narration of what is said point by point, I add this to my discourse because [p. 12] my discourse aims at a common benefit. Even if these things seem to be defective and fall a little short of very great strictness, that is not at all strange. For since a great inequality divided life up, the result is that some people are ill, others weak, others are strong and noble in the composition of their body, but others as a result of their excessive weakness resemble people who sleep and are motionless. In the cases of those who are unequal in the condition and different composition of their body, the discourse aiming at what is necessary in accordance with what is possible omits to a great extent matters of very great strictness, and making allowances for human weaknesses, it also seems to pass over the excessive and unreasonable periods of fasting which many seem to perform intensely in their own way and by their own wish. For with regard to a rule for a spiritual diet, what concern of mine are the many wishes of this person or that person? For I do not think that I hold back the one who wishes to serve the Lord with a fervent will and adheres more eagerly to the road that leads him to God.

For would a soldier be accused before his general if he rushes out against the enemy too nobly and frightens his opponent with his weapons? Would perhaps a doctor find fault with a patient because the sick man joins him in following the hospital treatment to a great extent, abstaining from the causes of disease and unreasonable desires, and keeping only to those foods and drinks which encourage the patient himself to a state of health? So neither do I myself take a person away—may it not happen—from that fine and beneficial abstinence and more eager devotion. Indeed, I would pray that this man may follow this spiritual road more eagerly, and become for me a crown of exultation.

30. PHOBEROS

[I have made concessions] because I have understood this point, namely that what is easy for some to attain is in no way practical for others. If any one, then, in that way finds the road that leads him to salvation, it is good, beloved ones, and contributes to salvation. Let such a person hear and heed the Savior speaking to him, “You labor and are heavy laden, my beloved brother, you should come to me and receive correspondingly what contributes to your rest” (cf. Matt. 11:28). But this is the object of our search, namely how the strong and the careless will equally be helped, or the powerful and the weak. You endure the scorching heat of the day, but perhaps someone else does not even bear the morning temperature. You think the frost of the night is bearable, but for someone else even a slightly warm temperature is unbearable. It is because I travel this main “royal road”³ that I outline this rule and pattern for the monastery which is brief and appropriate for the weaknesses of the brotherhood. One thing alone I affirm, that what I say comes not from me but from what the divine fathers rightly prescribed for us. [p. 13]

5. Rule concerning true fasting.

Well then, those men have not handed down one rule concerning fasting nor yet one way to partake of food nor the same amount [of food], because of the fact that everyone does not have the same strength or because of a more delicate bodily condition. But they have handed down one aim to all, namely to avoid eating one’s fill and to reject the satisfying of the belly. They called this [not overeating] a daily fast and having tested it they said it was more useful and contributed to purity more than a fast lasting three or four days or even extended to a week. For he says that the one who immoderately extends his fasting beyond moderation, often indulges in food, so that as a result sometimes through the excess of doing without food he weakens his body and it becomes lazy with regard to spiritual services, and sometimes being weighed down by a large amount of food he implants akedia and indolence in his soul. Again they have proved that eating of vegetables does not suit everyone, nor does the eating of legumes suit everyone, nor yet can everyone use dry bread as their food continually. Also they said that one person by eating two litrai of bread can still be hungry, but another by eating a litra or six ounces was satisfying himself. Therefore, as has been said, they hand down to all one definition of abstinence, namely not to be deceived by satisfying one’s belly nor be enticed by the pleasure of the gullet. For not only is it usual for a difference in the quality of the food but also the size of the amount to kindle the “flaming dart” of the enemy (Eph. 6:16). For the stomach when it is filled with food of whatever kind produces the seeds of profligacy. Again, not only is it usual for a headache that comes from wine to befuddle the mind, but also an excessive surfeit of water, and all kinds of food render it sleepy and stupefied. The cause of disaster for the people of Sodom was not the partaking of wine and different foods, but according to the prophet, a surfeit of bread (cf. Ezek. 16:48–50). For weakness of the body is not opposed to purity of the heart, as long as we provide the body with the things that weakness demands and not the things that pleasure wishes.

The use of food is not forbidden, if food is taken in quantities sufficient to supply what is [necessary] for life, but not to the extent of enslaving people to the impulses of desire. The moderate and reasonable eating of food shows care for the health of the body, and does not take away holiness. The exact rule and definition of abstinence handed down by the fathers is the following: he who partakes of food should give it up while his appetite is still active and not wait until he is satisfied. The apostle in saying, "Make no [p. 14] provision for the flesh, to gratify its desires" (Rom. 13:14), did not forbid the necessary conduct of life, but he forbade a concern to seek pleasure. Furthermore, abstinence from food by itself is not strong enough to bring about complete purity of soul, unless the other virtues contribute.

TWELFTH CENTURY

So humility through the act of obedience and the subjugation of the body is of great service to us. Abstinence from the love of money, not only from having money but also from even desiring to possess any, leads the way to purity of soul. Abstinence from anger, grief, vainglory and arrogance, especially restraint and fasting, achieve [the purity of the soul]. For it is impossible for the person who has a surfeit in his stomach to make war on the spirit of impurity in his mind. For, as the fathers say and we have learned from experience itself, the extremes of each side cause harm equally, both excessive fasting and the filling up of the stomach, both extravagance in vigils and one's fill of sleep, and the other excesses. For we have learned that some people have not been defeated by gluttony but have been overthrown by immoderate fasting, having lapsed into the same passion for gluttony through weakness that came from lack of moderation.

I also recall suffering some such thing once after practicing abstinence to such an extent that I lost my appetite for food, and when I remained without food for two or three days and had no desire at all for food, other people roused me to this. Again as a result of a plot by the Devil sleep kept away from me so much that when I continued without sleep for very many nights I besought the Lord that I should receive a little sleep. I was at more serious risk through my immoderate abstinence from food and sleep than through gluttony and the drowsiness of sleep. So your first struggle should be the controlling of the stomach and the subjecting of the body, not only through fasting but also through vigils and toil and reading and bringing your heart to fear Gehenna and desire the kingdom of heaven.

6. Concerning how you must repel the spirit of akedia.

You should struggle continuously against the spirit of akedia which is bound up with and works together with the spirit of grief. This is a dreadful and very oppressive demon always making war on monks. It attacks the monk at the sixth hour, implanting in him slackness and dread, and creating hatred both towards the place itself and the brothers who live with him and towards all work and the reading of the Holy Scriptures itself, suggesting to him thoughts of moving and that if he does not move to other places, all his time and the place will become purposeless for him.⁴ In addition to all this it also puts into his mind the idea of hunger at about [p. 15] the sixth hour which would not happen to him as a result of a three day fast or a very long journey or very heavy toil. Then it puts into his mind thoughts that he will not be able to get rid of this burden and disease in any other way except by going out repeatedly and visiting brothers, for their benefit, of course, and by visitation of the sick. But whenever [the spirit of akedia] is not able to delude him in this way, it plunges him into deep sleep.

[Akedia] then becomes aggravated and can be checked in no other way except by prayer, by abstinence from pleasures and idle chatter, by the study of the Divine Scriptures, and by perseverance [in the face of] temptations.⁵ For if it does not find him protected by these weapons, after shooting him with its own weapons, it proves him unstable and renders him a lazy and idle wanderer and trains him to go round many monasteries and concern himself with nothing else except observing where meals and drinking bouts take place. For the mind of the person affected by akedia imagines nothing except the distractions that arise from these things. Later on, as a result of these, it involves him in secular matters and gradually deludes him with these harmful activities, until it completely drives him out of this monastic profession.

30. PHOBEROS

The divine apostle, understanding that this disease is very serious and wishing to tear from our souls utterly the causes by which it is especially produced, makes it clear when he says this in writing to the Thessalonians, “Now we command you, brethren, in the name of Our Lord Jesus Christ that you keep away from any brother who is living in idleness and not in accord with the tradition that you received from us. For you yourselves know how you ought to imitate us. We were not idle when we were with you, we did not eat anyone’s bread without paying, but with toil and labor we worked night and day, that we might not burden any of you. It was not because we have not that right, but to give you in our conduct an example to imitate. For even when we were with you, we gave you this command: if anyone will not work, let him not eat. For we hear that some of you are living in idleness, not doing any work. Now, such persons we command and exhort in the Lord Jesus Christ to do their work in quietness and earn their own living” (II Thess. 3:6–12).

Let us listen how wisely the apostle points out the causes of akedia; for he calls those who do not work idle, indicating much evil in this one word. For the idle person happens to be irreverent, hasty in speech, and quick to abuse, and then [becomes] unfitted for the submission of a monastery and a slave of akedia. Therefore he commands that we should keep away from him, that is be separated from him as from a pestilential disease. Then what does he say? [p. 16] “And not in accord with the tradition that you received from us,” by that expression indicating that they are arrogant and despise and destroy the apostolic traditions. Again he says, “We did not eat anyone’s bread without paying, but with toil and labor we worked night and day, that we might not burden any of you.” The teacher of nations, the herald of the gospel, the one exalted to the third heaven, the one who said that the Lord has commanded that those who proclaim the gospel should “get their living by the gospel” (I Cor. 9:14), worked night and day with toil and labor so as not to burden anyone.

So then what will we do, we who are careless about our work and seek physical rest, to whom neither the preaching of the gospel nor the care of churches has been entrusted but only concern for our own souls? Then pointing out more clearly the harm that is born of idleness, he adds, “Those not doing any work, mere busybodies.” (II Thess. 3:11) From idleness comes meddlesomeness and from meddlesomeness comes disorderliness and from disorderliness evil of every kind; and again, devising the remedy for them, he adds, “now such persons we command to do their work in quietness and earn their own living.” With more of a rebuke he says, “If anyone will not work, let him not eat.”

The holy fathers in Egypt trained by this apostolic teaching did not allow the monks to be idle for any length of time, especially the younger ones, knowing that by persisting in their work they would drive away akedia and would provide their own food and help those in need. For not only did they work because of their own need, but from their own work they supplied the needs of strangers and the poor and those in prison, being confident that such good deeds were a holy sacrifice acceptable to God. The fathers also say this, that the person who works often fights with one demon and is afflicted by it, but the lazy person is taken prisoner by countless spirits.

In addition to this it is a good thing to remember the words of father Moses, the most renowned among the Fathers, which he spoke to the great [John] Cassian. For the aforementioned divine Cassian after residing in the desert for a short time and being troubled by akedia, visited the holy Moses and said to him, “Yesterday I was severely troubled by akedia and was weakened very much and I could not rid myself of it until I visited father Paul.” Father Moses replied to him and said, “Have courage; you did not free yourself from this, but rather you have surrendered and handed yourself over to it as a slave. So then you should realize that as a deserter you will be attacked more grievously, unless in the future you make an effort to overcome it by persistence and prayer and work with your hands.”⁶

I remind you of all these things, my beloved brothers, because there is a need for [p. 17] much persistence. For it is not the one who has made a beginning in goodness who is blessed, but whoever continues in it to the end. For the snake that creeps on the ground is always watching for our heel (cf. Gen. 3:15), that is, it plots against our going out, and until the end of our life it tries to spring upon us. Because of this to begin well will be of no use nor yet fervor at the beginning of your renunciation, unless it is also there at the end. The humility of Christ which you professed before him just now will not be firmly established in any other way unless you display it to the end [of your life].

Therefore so that you may be able to possess this perfectly and crush the serpent’s head (cf. Gen 3:15), whenever thoughts come to you, make sure that you confess these to the doctor of your souls, your father. For by thus bringing the beginnings of the Devil’s destructive thoughts into the open and by not being ashamed to reveal them, you will crush his head. Wherefore, according to Scripture, if you strive to serve the Lord, make your hearts ready not for freedom from anxiety, nor for relaxation and pleasures but for temptations and for tribulations; “through many tribulations we must enter the kingdom” (Acts 14:22) of heaven, and “narrow and hard is the way that leads to life and those who find it are few” (Matt. 7:14). So then, pay heed to those who are zealous and good, and following their example regulate your own lives. Do not pay attention to those who are lazy and disdainful even though they be many. “For many,” he says, “are called but few are chosen” (Matt. 22:14); and the flock is small to whom the father was pleased to give the kingdom. Do not consider it a small sin to profess perfection and yet follow those who are lazy and very careless, but, so that you may be able to enter upon perfection, use this rule.

7. Concerning perfection of spirit and how you should be brought to it.

The fear of God is the first stage of virtue and a beginning of our assurance of salvation; for through it comes cleansing from sins and protection of virtues and a way to perfection. For whenever the fear of God enters a soul, it persuades it to despise all worldly matters and implants forgetfulness of physical relatives and of the whole world itself. Out of this humility is achieved, the culmination and fulfillment of all good; for humility comes as an addition to the disregard and deprivation of all worldly matters.

30. PHOBEROS

Humility is tested and proved by these characteristics, [namely], if someone keeps his own wishes mortified within him; secondly, if someone not only does not hide any of his own actions but also any of his ideas from his own father; thirdly, if he trusts his own judgment in nothing but in everything trusts the discretion of his own father, always thirsting for his advice and hearing it with pleasure; fourthly, if he is subject to the commands of his father [p. 18] wholeheartedly in everything; fifthly, if he himself not only does not dare to insult anyone but even were to accept with joy the insults hurled on him by others; sixthly, if he does not attempt to do anything too innovatory which neither the common rule nor the traditions of the fathers allow; seventhly, if content with his complete insignificance and grateful for the things that are given him, he thinks himself unworthy even of these; eighthly, if from a sincere heart he thinks himself to be inferior and not superior to anyone; ninthly, if he controls his tongue and is not hasty in speech and harsh of voice; tenthly, if he is not frivolous and prone to laughter.

8 [A]. Concerning humility.

By those signs and signs similar to those humility is recognized which, whenever it has truly been achieved, quickly leads to the height of love in which there is no fear of punishment and because of which everything is no longer maintained by compulsion and weariness but by a fervent desire and longing for goodness. So that you may have the strength to attain to this virtue more easily, a few of the brothers who are standing fast and possess reverence should be set up as examples for you to imitate, not the majority who live too lazily. For from imitating and emulating those who are zealous comes very great assurance for those who wish to attain to perfection.

So then, if you wish to be able to follow all these and endure patiently until the end under this spiritual rule of the community, these words which David said should be made obligatory for you to observe, "But I, as a deaf man, heard not; and was as a dumb man not opening his mouth" (Ps. 37 [38]:13). Do not imitate those of the brothers who are faithless and disobedient and hasty and insolent, but, like people who are deaf and do not hear, disregard these. If someone hurls at you reproofs and reproaches or insults, be unmoved as if silenced and dumb, always saying to yourself this verse of the psalmist, "I said, I will take heed to my ways, that I sin not with my tongue; I set a guard on my mouth while the sinner stood in my presence" (Ps. 38 [39]:1-2).

Yet in addition to that, before everything practice this continuously and keep it, in accordance with the command of the apostle, namely to make yourselves fools and madmen in this life, in order clearly to become wise (cf. I Cor. 3:18), doubting nothing nor being hesitant in whatever you are instructed by your father to do, but practice obedience with all sincerity and faith, considering that instruction given to you by your father to be the only thing that is most holy and [p. 19] believing it to be wise and beneficial. For after strengthening your hearts by such an attitude, you will be able to bear the good yoke of submission to the end, and none of the temptations and tricks of the devil will be able to shake you from the discipline of the community.

Do not expect your forbearance and long suffering to be achieved as a result of other people's virtue, for example, whenever you are provoked by no one or not despised or not dishonored, since this is not a proof of your virtue nor does it lie within your power. But whenever you are abused or dishonored or despised, bear it gently, for this is within your power to choose. Well then, so that I may gather together all these things, which I have said in a very expanded form, and say something briefly which your minds may remember easily, listen again step by step to how you will be able to attain perfection.

8 [B]. Another ladder of spiritual ascent⁷

The beginning of our salvation is the fear of God and from this is born good obedience. From this obedience submission is produced and a disregard for all worldly things, and from this comes humility, and from humility is born the mortification of personal wishes, and as a result of the mortification of wishes the roots of pleasures wither away, and as a result of this all the defects of the soul are cast out. Through the casting out of these, virtues produce fruit and grow, and from the growth of virtues comes purity of heart, that is to say, apostolic perfection. Furthermore, if these words are actively maintained by the souls of those who hear them, and you remain joyfully in the dwelling and solitude of this mountain, I confidently declare that through the intercession of [St. John] the Baptist and great herald of the truth and the intercessions of the most pure virgin Mother of God these will become easy for all the brotherhood and will lead them up to the kingdom of heaven itself.

But O God and Lord of all, O ever-praised Mother of Our Lord God and Savior Jesus Christ, O Forerunner and Baptizer of Christ Our True God, I pray these instructions may be effective and productive for both us and those after us until the end of the present age through the valuable prayers of your servant, our holy father.

[= (22) Evergetis [3], ed. lines 67–70]: So now we must turn our attention to the subjects of our discourse and since I wish to begin from a preferable place, it is preferable to begin with the hour that brings the light, that is the first hour of the day, and I think it absolutely necessary that those who are going to give a description of the works of light should begin following the light.

9. Concerning good order during the psalm singing and concerning genuflections.

[= (22) Evergetis [4], ed. lines 75–141]: So, after the worship of matins, the office of the first hour should be sung by us following on immediately, as is customary, and at the end of this the prayer [p. 20] should be recited which begins, “Thou who at all times and all hours” and what follows. After the prayer the customary genuflections should be performed, by the able-bodied on the bare floor but the weak should have some low supports. Three of them should be completed in a more leisurely manner in as much as while we are standing we should say three times to ourselves with hands stretched out “God, be merciful to me the sinner” (Luke 18:13), then when we are kneeling down with our heads resting on the ground, we should say three times in the same way “I have sinned against thee, Lord, forgive me.” But the remaining twelve should be carried out more quickly so as to utter the aforementioned supplicatory phrases at each genuflection and each time we stand, but yet in unison and with fitting good order, not with some getting ahead and others falling behind, but all following the lead of the ecclesiarch or the priest on duty that day as he stands near the holy screen and indicates the successive movements.

This should take place when “God is the Lord” (Ps. 117 [118]:27) is not sung during the matins; but if it is, the performing of these genuflections in the church should be omitted but the deep bows should be performed while at each of them, as has been mentioned, the aforesaid supplicatory phrases should be said to ourselves three times. Then after these genuflections or bows the mesorion of the first hour should be sung to follow on, then immediately the short catechesis from the words of the Fathers should take place, read by the superior, just as we received it from our most blessed father, and this should never be omitted unless set aside by the synaxarion. At this point after the reading, the trisagion for our holy father and founder, which is prescribed for us, should take place.

All the prayers should be said with hands held up in accordance with the following, “Lift up your hands in the sanctuaries, and bless the Lord” (Ps. 133 [134]:2), and “The lifting of my hands as an evening sacrifice” (Ps. 140 [141]:2), and “In every place lifting holy hands without anger or quarreling” (I Tim. 2:8). When the aforementioned prayer has been said and the priest has spoken his customary one also, all of you should immediately fall down on your faces and hearing the superior asking for your prayers like this, “Brothers, pray for me in the Lord that I may be delivered from passions and the snares of the Evil One,” you should answer, “May God save you, honored father, and you, pray for us, holy father, that we may be delivered from the passions and the snares of the Evil One.” Then again the superior praying should say, “May God through the prayers of our fathers save us all.”

Then we should stand up and depart to our cells, avoiding all meeting together and foolish distraction, idle [p. 21] chatter, and disorderly laughter. For what comes of such things? Clearly, the lapsing into disgraceful talk, abuse, and condemnations because our mind is relaxed by this and we forget what is really good, and reaching our cells in a dilatory and lazy form of mind we sink at once into a sleep of akedia and pass almost all the day in idleness without engaging in any beneficial activity whatever, as the great Basil also says, “To lapse from a fitting spiritual state is easy when the soul indulges in unrestrained laughter, and it is easier for a concern for goodness to be dissipated and lapse into disgraceful talk.”⁸

May this not be the case with my fathers and brothers, but let each go away to his cell in a sober frame of mind very quickly, always doing what is pleasing to God. But if perhaps some are discovered to be at fault in this matter, whether they are young or old, advanced in the monastic life or novices, they are to be admonished with the laws of love by the disciplinary official. Those who do not mend their ways are to be punished. For it is not fitting that novices who behave carelessly should be punished, but rather those who have spent many years in the monastic way of life but are careless and lazy, as [John Klimakos] the author of the Ladder says somewhere concerning this.⁹ Going away to your cells you should carry out the canonical procedure from the Psalter together with genuflections according to the command given to each one by the superior, if such people do not have important offices. You must sing the third and sixth and ninth hour together in the church with their mesoria, according to custom, when the semantron is struck. For genuflections should not be carried out in the church only when “God is the Lord” (Ps. 117 [118]: 27) is sung, so when you pray in your cells you should always kneel down.

10. Concerning the fact that it is not necessary to carry out genuflections during the twelve days of Christmas or at Pentecost.

[cf. (22) Evergetis [4], ed. lines 141–43]: We will avoid this even in our cells whenever there is a vigil because of the weariness that comes from that, also during the twelve days of Christmas and during the whole of Pentecost. For the great Athanasios says as follows, “Do not let anyone lead you astray so as to observe a complete fast at all on a Sunday, nor to genuflect on a Sunday nor during Pentecost; for it is not a law of the church.”¹⁰ Again it is written, “And after Pentecost we celebrate the feast for one more week.”

There is also the twentieth canon of the [First] Council of Nicaea which says the following, “Since some people are genuflecting on Sunday and on the days of Pentecost, the Holy Council decided that prayers should be offered to God standing in order to have everything observed in the same way in every diocese.”¹¹ The ninetieth canon [p. 22] of the sixth Council [of Constantinople] discusses the matter as follows, “We received it as a rule from our inspired fathers not to genuflect on Sundays when we honor the resurrection of Christ. So that we may not be ignorant therefore of the clear-cut nature of the observance in this matter, we make it clear to the faithful, that after the entry of the clergy into the sanctuary during vespers on Saturday in accordance with prevailing custom no one is to genuflect until the following evening on Sunday when, after the entrance during the office of lamplighting, again bending our knees we thus bring our prayers to the Lord. For taking the night after Saturday as a precursor of the resurrection of our Savior, from then we begin the hymns in a spiritual manner, ending the feast in the daylight after the darkness, so that as a result we celebrate the feast of the resurrection during a whole night and a day.”¹²

So then, my brothers, pay heed to the exact detail of this rule, and as at Pentecost and Easter Sunday and the twelve days of Christmas and the other feast days you observe a rest from genuflections following the sacred rules, so learn from this rule carefully that you do not neglect these ever again without good reason, so that you may not be condemned. [= (22) Evergetis [4], ed. lines 145–47]: Therefore, the ritual of the first and third and sixth and ninth hours on days of the year that are free of fasting should be observed in this way.

11. Concerning the holy communion.

[= (22) Evergetis [5]]: It is necessary now also to speak about the divine mystery, which must of necessity be celebrated in the church each day, but you yourselves must be sure to take care in this, my brothers, because what is performed there is divine and fearful, and because there, more than in anything else, the fearful and very great mystery of our orthodox faith is accomplished, I mean the most divine and most precious sacrifice of the completely undefiled body and blood of our Lord God and Savior Jesus Christ. So during it, as has been said, you must pay strict attention, and chase from you every thought that is impure, sown by the devil, and unworthy of that fearful celebration, and purify yourselves in every way. Then as many as have been allowed by the superior to partake of communion should partake of the divine elements; for it will not be possible for any of you to partake freely and in a thoughtless manner, nor yet each day. This we would indeed wish, for to partake often of the divine elements is often to share in life, as Christ himself says, “He who eats my flesh and drinks my blood abides in me, and I in him,” (John 6:56) and again, “Unless you eat my flesh and drink my blood, you have no life in you” (John 6:53), and as the divine apostle says “He who is united to the Lord becomes one” body (I Cor. 6:17) and as the most gentle David says conversely “Those that remove themselves from thee shall perish” (Ps. 72 [73]:27).

Therefore we would indeed wish this, as has been said, but because of human weakness and the danger of the action we do not allow it, for “Whoever eats the body and drinks the blood of the Lord unworthily is guilty of His body and blood” (I Cor. 11:27) says Paul, the divine and inspired speaker and leader of the apostles. [p. 23] This statement is frightening, my brothers, and causes not only sinners like me but also those who are very confident in themselves to fear partaking. So then as many as are sure that they are pure and free from disgraceful thoughts and submission to them, from anger and grumbling, grief and denigration, deceit and disorderly laughter, furthermore the bearing of a grudge and irritation, disgraceful talk and such things, should partake of communion three times a week. But those who fall prey to the aforementioned passions and hasten to a renunciation of them through confession and repentance should partake of communion once a week or not at all at the discretion of the superior of course, for he should be in charge of such matters. But for someone to consider himself unworthy of communion without his knowledge cannot be approved. For he who does this will be condemned as someone fulfilling his own wish. However it is permitted that those who should partake of communion sing the office laid down for the partaking, make a common genuflection to one another, and grant each other forgiveness, and thus gratefully partake of the life-giving elements. So let these things be carried out thus.

12. Concerning the office of the ninth hour, vespers, and compline.

[= (22) Evergetis [6], ed. lines 195–219]: The ninth hour should be sung in the same way as the preceding hours; and the regulation in the synaxarion sets out very clearly how the office of vespers should be carried out, with the night office immediately next, as well as compline after the supper. During these you should genuflect in accordance with the rule whenever you are not to celebrate a feast, and by feast we mean a Tuesday and Thursday on which we have to sing “God is the Lord” (Ps. 117 [118]: 27) at matins, that is, alternating with Monday and Wednesday and Friday when the Alleluia is sung. When compline has been sung and the priest has said his customary prayer also, you should fall on your knees just as at the end of the [p. 24] first hour and incline your ear well to the superior as he says, “Forgive me in the Lord, brothers, for I have sinned in word, deed, and in thought,” and you should grant him forgiveness saying, “May God forgive you, father.” But you also should immediately beg this from him by adding, “Forgive us also yourself, honored father, for we have sinned in deed, word, and in thought,” then again he should pray for us and say, “May God through the prayers of our fathers forgive us all.” Then standing up and according him the required obeisance, you should go away to your cells and carry out your night office in accordance with the regulation, and then full of gratitude and spiritual joy you should turn to sleep until the one who is in charge of the clock learns from it the appropriate hour [and goes to] the superior, and receiving from him the required blessing then shouts out with a loud voice in a rhythmic fashion, “Bless me, oh saints.” Then when he has struck the semantron in the customary way and distributed lights to all, he will rouse you for the celebration of the midnight office which is sung in your cells—and there are three kathismata, the ninth, the sixteenth, and the eighteenth—and this he himself will also sing all the time as he carries out the prescribed lighting of the church.

13. Concerning the office of matins.

[= (22) Evergetis [6], ed. lines 219–240]: Then when he has sounded the great semantron and the bronze one also, he will call you all for the dawn worship. The preliminary part of which you must carry out as follows. For after the completion of the Psalm “Blameless” [(Ps. 118 [119])], the dismissal should be said outside in the narthex of the church by the priest who has the duty for the day, then, as we enter into the church we should sing at once a trisagion with the usual troparia , “May the Lord hear you,” and, “Kyrie eleison,” taking care to keep together as far as is reasonable while these are being sung. The priest himself should go round all the divine church and cense everyone, and then, standing before the holy screen, when he has once more made the sign of the venerable cross with the censer, with the censuring he should offer up praise to the all-holy Trinity, speaking audibly as follows, “Glory to the holy and consubstantial and life-giving Trinity always, now and always and for ever and ever.” After replying “Amen” the ecclesiarch should at once begin the six psalms, saying the words of the psalms in a low voice slowly, quietly, and carefully so that all may then be able to recite them without error or stumbling. Then after the completion of the six psalms, the whole office of matins should next be celebrated as the synaxarion describes. That therefore constitutes the pattern of your daily office.

[= (22) Evergetis [7], ed. lines 242–43]: We must also speak to you about life-preserving confession and the discourse about the [p. 25] table must wait for a while.

14. Concerning confession.

[= (22) Evergetis [7], ed. lines 243–314]: Well then, the superior must sit in a private place twice a day, and leaving aside all other work whatsoever and all the trouble of managing and directing, must take most diligent care to hear those who wish to make confession and set for each one the appropriate healing. We specify that after the second reading at matins has begun should be one time when he will bring healing to those who live continuously in the monastery and are not employed in any ministries; and after compline he will bring healing to those ministering inside or outside. He is to be allowed, if perhaps he does not have the time since the brotherhood is numerous, to authorize whichever priests and deacons he wishes, and even some of the more reverent brothers, to hear the thoughts of the more uneducated majority, the thoughts that trouble us day by day and hour by hour which must always be easy to absolve and not have caused more deep-seated trouble, and to remit them and grant forgiveness. But the thoughts that require some healing and care must be referred to the superior by those who hear them, and he is to bring about the appropriate healing. So then, those who confess will conceal nothing, though perhaps hesitant if they know their thoughts need care, but they will uncover everything completely to their confessor; also it is right that we should tell them what is expected of them.

So then you, my brothers, seeing the superior hurrying off to this good ministry which is very beneficial to your souls, you should run, and running reach with eagerness this very calm harbor that is safe for your souls, and reveal completely without any covering up every stirring of your mind and every thought that harms your soul, as though you are making your confession in the presence of God and not a man. But the one who sets out to lie to God will always get his punishment. For the psalmist says “Thou wilt destroy all that speak falsehood” (Ps. 5:6). So then, by confessing without deceit and ridding your minds of all wrangling, all impurity, all confusion and trouble, you may be happy and rejoice, having gained this good hope namely that you will not fail to gain salvation. But make your confession without accusing each other when perhaps a violent dispute or some other argument occurs. Do not make your confession if you consider yourselves blameless and you are looking really for condemnations, nor should [p. 26] you speak about the bodily needs which afflict you. For there is always a time for them, but this is a time for making confession and obtaining healing for spiritual passions. If you must speak of some violent dispute, be keen to ascribe and assign to yourselves all the blame and reason for the fault, whatever it is. But if you speak about some other passions, reveal these completely so that you can gain double benefit from this, by both attaining sound health of soul and clothing yourself in exalting humility, for possessing this we will actually be like God who says, “Learn from me that I am gentle and lowly in heart” (Matt. 11:29) What else would be a clearer proof of gentleness and humility in heart than clearly to bear all affliction nobly and blame oneself in everything? The true confession without which I do not think anyone gains salvation is the cause of so many good things.

Then we order that a person who does not make confession should be excommunicated from the Lord God Ruler of All until, coming to his senses and thinking of higher things, he confesses all his faulty and harmful thoughts. Thus it would be necessary also to expel such a person from the monastery and cut him off like a rotten limb, and as a wound that is hard to heal or completely incurable to remove him and cast him away, but the uncertainty of the future and the expectation that perhaps one day he may come to his senses held us back from this purpose. However for him to be liable to the penalty of excommunication is very useful since it is very effective. Indeed, what benefit does he obtain from remaining at the monastery? What benefit comes from not making confession? Or rather, does not harm and ruin follow, and a continued practice of evil and everything whatsoever that brings destruction to the soul? So then, as it is difficult for someone who is sick or has wounds to return to health when he hides these from the doctor, so it is much more difficult for the person who does not make confession ever to gain health of soul. The divine Basil is witness of this when he speaks as follows “If a monk is going to show proper progress and come into a state of life in accordance with the command of the Lord, he must keep no stirring of his soul hidden, but offer to his superior all the secrets of his heart stripped bare.”¹³ So then, by acting in this way, my brothers, we will not only be rescued from our own faults but we will possess later on something that is more sure; for [John Klimakos] the author of The Ladder says “Stripes that are exposed will not become worse,” and again, “A soul that thinks about confession is held back by it from sinning as if by a rein.”¹⁴ So the revelation of one’s own faults is very useful. In future let us all run eagerly to it.

Therefore we prescribe that confession should be held like this every day, by the superior himself clearly, and by as many as seem to him to be suitable people to hear thoughts.

15. Concerning confession at the time of tonsuring.

[= (22) Evergetis [7], ed. lines 314–17]: But the first and great confession which we should make when casting off the hair of this world must be offered to the superior alone and not to anyone else so that he can know everyone himself and mix the medicine suitable for each one. [p. 27] These things should be so.

16. Concerning fasting in Lent and on Wednesdays and Fridays.

[cf. (22) Evergetis [8], ed. lines 319–20]: Concerning the procedure for the holy fasts and for Wednesday and Friday, as the rules of the Holy Apostles and of the holy inspired fathers handed it down, the synaxarion will inform us most precisely, and we should carry them out always in accordance with it. We must genuflect as for the holy period of Lent and the diet will be similar, made up of legumes soaked in water or fruits and fresh vegetables, and for our drink, water or hot water flavored with cumin, taken at the beginning of the ninth hour. For the most wise and divine teachers speak as follows in their rules setting it out in detail, “If any bishop or priest or deacon or reader or singer does not fast during the holy period of Lent or on Wednesday or Friday, unless he is prevented from doing so by some bodily weakness, he should be deposed; but if he is a lay person, he should be excommunicated.”¹⁵

In the regulations of the holy fathers, after prescribing rules for the fast of the Holy Apostles,¹⁶ they say “After this fast we instruct you to fast every Wednesday and Friday and donate your excess food to the poor.” Also in the Lausiac History it has been written that St. Apollo said, “It is not possible to break the universal fasts except under the utmost necessity. For on Wednesday Christ was betrayed and on Friday he was crucified. Therefore the person who breaks these fasts joins in betraying the Savior and crucifying him.”¹⁷ The twelfth canon of the Council of Gangra is as follows, “If anyone of those practicing the religious life behaves disdainfully and without any bodily necessity breaks the fasts that have been handed down and are commonly observed by the church, because a perfectly evil desire lurks within him, let him be anathema.”¹⁸ Also in the discourse on faith in the Panarion of St. Epiphanius this is written, “Throughout the whole year fasting is observed in the holy catholic church, I mean on Wednesday and before Saturday until the ninth hour, except only at Pentecost.”¹⁹ The wise and great Athanasios says this very clearly in his book: “Do not break a fast of the Lord, [p. 28] that is Wednesday and Friday, unless you are in some way oppressed by some disease, except only at Pentecost and Epiphany.” Again a little further on he says the following, “Break your fast whenever a brother visits you, but not a fast that has been prescribed, that is a Wednesday and Friday, but one of your own choice, that is a Monday and Tuesday and Thursday; and the period of the fasting on Wednesday and Friday has been laid down as until the ninth hour.”²⁰

Many such things have been set down in divine Scripture not only for monks, but also lay people, which those of you who are willing to search for will discover. But there is a different strictness for monks, as also St. Symeon the Wonderworker of miracles says in his life, “The monk should fast until the ninth hour at least.”²¹ All our holy fathers say the same thing, that fasting should always take place apart from the fasts of Our Lord.

30. PHOBEROS

I have gathered these things together and set them out clearly for you in the present rule, my brothers, for this reason that you may strive to carry out with enthusiasm and by your wholehearted choice what has been prescribed for you. For I did not write things of my own choice or wish or devising, but what we have received in writing from our holy fathers and what we have learned from experience itself to be true and immutable and unchangeable and without which it is impossible to follow the path of the monastic life.

17. Concerning when the fast should be broken.

Unless it happens to be a great feast of Our Lord, or a commemoration for one of the twelve Holy Apostles, or some other one of the great and illustrious saints, on these days of fasting, that is on Wednesday and on Friday, [everyone should fast] except brothers who are weak and ill. For we instruct the superior to care especially for such [brothers] with all his heart and assist the sick on fast days with both wine and cooked food and with all his heart be anxious about their comfort and recovery of strength. For it is impossible to break these fasts otherwise, for those who break them will be judged by God as transgressors.

18. Concerning the amount of food and drink, the time for them, and their quality.

Since it is necessary to pass on to you also the differences in the feasts, which of them must be celebrated and which not, and concerning the difference in the food, see, I also give this instruction. If before the letters [of the names] of saints whose commemorations have fallen on the days of fasting, that is Wednesday and Friday, you find kentemata, we fast according to the tradition in the divine rules. But if you find crosses, we break the fast with cooked legumes, vegetables and olive oil and nothing more. Concerning wine, as I have discovered by searching all the synaxaria of the saints and the rules of monasteries, both those on the Holy Mountain²² and the [p. 29] rest, they say that three [measures] should be drunk at the midday meal and two at the evening meal whenever they drink it.

It is necessary also to make arrangements concerning our officials who provide us with no small help, that the important officials who carry out onerous offices, when those who are not working eat once in the day, should be given a second meal when they are carrying out their offices and are working hard. But whenever they are not working, they too should be treated the same as the rest. For a monk who fasts is like the flower of the palm tree, called halation, because on the outside it is dingy but on the inside it is the color of snow and is very fruitful; in the same way he who fasts is outwardly gloomy but inwardly he is radiant. Therefore fasting not only consists in eating slowly but also eating small amounts, and this is how to practice it, not to eat two courses and avoid eating a variety of food. For practicing it is to have a table reduced to one form of food, whereas unreasonable fasting is that which waits for the appointed time and at the time for food rushes without any control to the table and through the flesh binds the mind to the pleasure of what has been set out.

I know for certain that many of you, and especially the careless, receive such instructions with disgust saying, "You labor for nothing and to no purpose, no one will carry out these instructions when you have died." Behold, I say to you that the word of the apostle forces me to do and say these things. For it has been written, "Obey your leaders and submit to them; for they are keeping watch over your souls, as men who will have to give account" (Heb. 13:17). Even if I said it before, yet I will not be silent now. For the fear of that threat continually disturbs my soul, for if it is better for the person who has caused only one very little person to sin to have a millstone hung around his neck and be drowned in the sea (Matt. 18:6), what on earth will they all suffer and what penalty will they receive who sin against Christ himself wounding the consciences of the brothers (I Cor. 8:12), having brought about the destruction not just of one or two or three, but of so many multitudes? For it is not possible to blame inexperience, nor have recourse to ignorance, nor put forward compulsion and force as an excuse, but if it were possible, one of the subordinates would sooner have used that recourse in the case of his own sins than the superior in the case of those of other people.

TWELFTH CENTURY

Why is this? Because since he has been appointed to correct the ignorance of other people and forewarn them of the approach of danger from the devil, he will not be able to put forward ignorance as an excuse nor say, "I did not hear the trumpet nor did I know there was a war." For this reason Ezekiel took up residence, he says, to sound the trumpet for others and foretell the distressing things that were to come, and because of this punishment is inevitable even if one person happens to perish; "for if when the sword comes the [p. 30] watchman does not blow the trumpet for the people," he says, "nor gives a signal, and the sword comes and takes away a life, his blood I will require at the watchman's hand, but that man was taken away in his iniquity" (cf. Ezek. 33:6).

For this reason, even if those who are being instructed after the exhortation remain in fact without any benefit from their instruction, yet even so we will not give up our advice to them. For fountains still flow, even if no one fetches water, and springs still bubble up, even if no one draws water, and rivers still run, even if no one drinks. So then, the one who speaks must fulfill his role, even if no one pays any heed. For the law for us who have been entrusted by the merciful God with the ministry of the word is never to neglect any of our duties, nor be silent, whether someone listens or passes by unheeding.

Jeremiah indeed, when he was issuing many threats to the Jews and prophesying the terrible things that were going to come, and was mocked by his hearers and laughed at throughout the whole day, once decided to cease that prophecy, experiencing a human feeling and not putting up with the jibes and the abuse, and he says, "I have become a laughing stock all the day. I said I will not speak nor will I mention the name of the Lord, but it was as burning fire flaming in my bones, and I am utterly weakened on all sides and cannot even bear up" (cf. Jer. 20:7-9). What he means is this: I decided to cease my prophecy, he says, since the Jews were not listening, and at the time that I made my decision the force of the Spirit fell on my soul like a fire and burnt up all my internal organs, consuming and eating up my bones in such a way that I was not able to endure the conflagration. But if the man who was mocked and derided and abused each day endured such great retribution when he decided to be silent, what pardon would we deserve when we have not suffered any such thing yet, but have lost heart through some people's laziness and ceased from teaching everyone else, and more so whenever the majority are paying heed?

I say these things not as encouragement for myself nor as an exhortation, for I have convinced my own soul to fulfill this service, while I breathe and God decides that we should be in this life, and to do what I have been ordered whether anyone pays heed or not. But since there are some people who make the hands of the many feeble, and in addition to bringing nothing useful into our lives weaken the zeal of others and deride and ridicule saying, [p. 31] “Cease your advice, stop exhorting; they do not wish to heed you; have nothing to do with them”—since there are some people who say that, I am extending my discourse, wishing to cut from the souls of the many this unmerciful opinion and plot of the devil. For I know that many have said these words, since I have seen some of you not receiving my teaching with enthusiasm, but laughing and deriding it, saying to me, “They were completely persuaded, no one scorns your instructions; all were chastened.” Why do you say this, man? Did we promise to make everyone a captive in one day? For if only ten were persuaded, if five, if one, is it not enough as a consolation? But I now put an extreme case; let it be assumed that no one has been persuaded by our words, which is impossible. If we sow a word in so many ears, is it possible for it never to bear fruit? But let it be assumed that it is so, not even then is the word fruitless. For if they do not receive it with enthusiasm and if perhaps they break the rules laid down for their meals, which I am not persuaded happens, however not with the same shamelessness, yet at the table itself they will remember our words, the censure and the rebuke, and when they have remembered they will grow ashamed, they will blush in their minds, and will do what they have been accustomed to do, but not with the same recklessness. This is the beginning of salvation, even just to condemn what is being done.

30. PHOBEROS

In addition to this there will be another gain and one no less great. What is this? The making of those who behave prudently more venerable and persuading them through what has been said that they have made the best decision of all in many ways. I did not raise up those who were sick but I made the healthy more secure. The word did not lead people away from wickedness, but made those who live in virtue more scrupulous.

Let me say a third thing in addition to these; I did not persuade anyone today, but perhaps I will be able to persuade someone tomorrow, but nor even tomorrow or the day after. Perhaps the person who heard it today and rejected it will hear tomorrow and receive it, and the one who despised it today and tomorrow, perhaps after some more days will pay heed to what is said. For a fisherman often after drawing up his net empty throughout the whole day, in the evening when he wished to leave went away having caught the fish that eluded him all day. If we were to cease our ministry because of misfortunes which always occur, and give up all our work, our whole life would be ruined and it is not only spiritual qualities that would be lost. For if the farmer were to turn from his farming because of unevenness in the weather occurring once or twice or often, we would all quickly perish with famine. If a helmsman were to flee from the sea because a storm occurred once or twice or often, we would not sail the sea and life would become useless, everything would be utterly ruined, and the earth uninhabited. Therefore, knowing all these things, whether they happen once, or [p. 32] twice, or often in the course of the activities in which they are involved and spend their time, they undertake them again with enthusiasm for them.

Therefore, let us not utter this and say that though so many words are scattered by us there will be no benefit from these words. For the husbandman who sowed the same piece of land once or twice or often and failed to reach his goal, worked it again and often in one year he recovered the loss of a [life]time. A trader who often suffered shipwrecks did not forsake the harbor, but even launched a ship and hired sailors and borrowed money and applied himself to the same activities, and yet the future was equally uncertain. Each of those who go in search of anything, are accustomed to act in that way, like the farmer and the trader. They then would show such zeal concerning worldly things, but will we give up at once if we are not listened to when we have spoken? What excuse will we have or what defense? Yet in their failures there is no one who relieves their loss.

TWELFTH CENTURY

For example, if the sea overwhelms the ship, no one will make good the poverty of those who are shipwrecked. If rain pours down on the piece of land and suffocates the seed, the farmers are forced to go away empty-handed. But in the case of us speaking and exhorting, it is not so, but if I scatter the seed and you do not accept it or bear the fruit of obedience, I will gain from God the reward of my advice and will receive as much of a recompense as I would have received if you had listened. For I have fulfilled the whole of my task.

For we are not responsible for not persuading those who listen but only for advising them. For our task is to advise, yours is to be persuaded. Just as in the case that we did not advise, if you perform countless good deeds, the reward will be yours alone, and there will be no gain for us since we did not advise. So supposing we did advise, if you did not pay any heed the whole retribution will seize you and no blame will be attached to us, also great will be the reward that will come from God; for I fulfilled my whole task. For we are ordered to invest our money with the bankers (cf. Matt. 25:27).

Also John Chrysostom says, "Speak, exhort; but did they not listen? But you have your reward completed. Do not give up until you breathe your last. Let the end of your advice be the obedience of the one who receives the advice. So whenever you see your brother obdurate and obstinate, not paying any heed, say to yourself, 'I wonder if we may be able to persuade him in time?' Paul also gave this command, 'The Lord's servant must not be quarrelsome but kindly to everyone, correcting his opponents with gentleness, in case God may perhaps grant them true repentance (II Tim. 2:24–25).'"²³ [p. 33]

The same Chrysostom in one of his homilies says again, "The wounds that are inflamed do not bear any application of a hand or endure too rough a touch; therefore doctors who are wise wipe such wounds with a soft sponge. Therefore, since people who sin have an inflamed wound in their souls, so by pouring all our words over them as if we were applying soothing and fresh water with a soft sponge, let us try to reduce their swelling and take away the whole tumor. Do not abandon your cure, my loved one, whether they become insolent or spit or kick out or no matter what they do. For those who treat a crazy person must put up with many such things, nevertheless not even then must you give up."²⁴ That [is enough] about those matters.

But it should be known that, with regard to those feasts of the great saints prescribed previously,²⁵ whenever you find a cross preceding the letters, there are no fasts at all, but we break the fast. If one of the days concerned happens to be one of the days for fasting, that is Wednesday and Friday, we break the fast with cooked food only, that is legumes and vegetable prepared with olive oil.

19. Concerning the fact that fasting on Wednesdays or Fridays should not be broken.

We do not eat cheese or fish or eggs, even if the birth of Christ our God should occur. This applies on the first day of the feast; and if the day after the feast [falls on a Wednesday or Friday] the same fast is observed. So then, we fast every Wednesday and Friday, abstaining from cheese and eggs and fish. This applies also on those Wednesdays and Fridays during Pentecost and Christmas, and in the week before Meatfare and during Cheesefare because of the rule of the Holy Apostles mentioned above, and because of the rule laid down by the martyr St. Peter, archbishop of Alexandria. For in his fifteenth rule he says this, “No one will bring an accusation against us if we observe Wednesday and Friday, on which it has been laid down with good reason according to tradition that we should fast, on Wednesday because of the evil counsel entered into by the Jews in the matter of Our Lord’s betrayal, and on Friday because he suffered for us.”²⁶ Therefore, strive to carry that out both because of the exhortations of the saints and because of the bodily weakness and temptations of the flesh which are present in us who strive.

30. PHOBEROS

For those who abstain from these through a religious life and are eager to subdue the flesh to the spirit, do well. For the great apostle Paul says, “For the kingdom of God is not food and drink but righteousness” (Rom. 14:17) and a religious life and sanctity. Again it has been written, [p. 34] “Fasting is useful all the time, and the person who strives practices abstinence in everything; for those who serve God in this way are pleasing to him.” The rule of the holy and blessed apostles instructs us to fast every Wednesday and Friday, and not to fast on one and not on another, but on every one.

This rule is observed not only by monks but also by lay people; and if lay people fast in this way, what more is being asked of you than of them? For believe me, my beloved brothers, when I say truly, that if someone is obliged to put into practice the sense of the holy rules strictly, he will never concede that any Christian should break the fast on Wednesday or Friday during the whole year even just with a cooked dish, except for some physical weakness. But I have judged myself in advance to be condemned by God because of your weakness and suggest to you that you break the fast with a cooked dish when it is the day of a great feast; but if it is not a great feast, observe the fasts that have been handed down to you because of the Lord. But anyone of you who wishes not to touch even a cooked dish on any Wednesday or Friday throughout the whole year, even on the great feasts themselves, should not be prevented, but he should have the blessing of me the sinner also as his helper in this. But if afterwards the heresies of the Armenians and of Jacob²⁷ and the Tetraditai arose, why do they concern us, when we happen by the grace of Christ our God to be orthodox and obey the rules that have been handed down by the Holy Apostles and the Holy Fathers to the holy catholic and apostolic church of God?²⁸

But if anyone visits our monastery on the days before Meatfare week or during Cheesefare and disagrees about this matter, eat a little cheese, all of you, for the apostle says, “If I partake with thankfulness, why should my liberty be determined by another man’s scruples?” (I Cor. 10:29–30). This has been written in the life of Symeon, our father and the worker of miracles, in these very words, “The holy man explained to his disciples what had been revealed to him concerning the holy period of Lent, speaking as follows: ‘When I was young and was standing in the first place of my standing, I heard that people were not observing the holy period of Lent, but were eating cheese and eggs, and when I fell into a trance at this, an angel of God appeared to me holding a bowl and a kid and a knife. Taking it he killed it in front of me and caught its blood in the bowl, and I looked and behold, the blood had coagulated and became cheese as if it had been milk. He said to me, ‘Behold the cheese which people eat during the holy period of Lent, it is the blood of kids. [p. 35] Therefore, when settling this matter lay it down for the assembled brotherhood that no one should eat cheese or an egg during the holy period of Lent or on Wednesday or Friday. For these are like the product of snakes and serpents, formed from all uncleanness.’ Coming to myself, I remembered the prophet Isaiah saying, ‘He broke viper’s eggs and a web of the weaving spider, and the man who was going to eat some of their eggs when he crushed them found a wind-egg and inside it a viper’ (Is. 59:5). I was compelled to say these things, not classifying ‘as common objects which God has cleansed’ (cf. Acts 11:9)—for you must not consider them common in any way, since they are sanctified by those who partake of them faithfully, when they should, through the word of God and prayer—but I have explained these things for your benefit as if to monks, so that you would increase your sanctity very much more on the days of the holy fasts, just as I trained those who lived with me before you to be on their guard.’²⁹ These are the words of the worker of miracles.

TWELFTH CENTURY

This also is written in the Gerontikon, “A dead body was being carried along the road, and when father Pachomios met it, he saw two angels following the corpse behind the bier, and thinking about this he begged God to reveal to him what had happened. The two angels came, and he said to them, ‘Why do you, who are angels, follow the corpse?’ The angels said to him, ‘One of us is the angel of Wednesday and the other of Friday, and since this soul did not cease from fasting on Wednesday and Friday until he died, for that reason we followed its body because until its death it observed the fast. So for that reason we honored it, since it strove in the Lord.’”³⁰

Did you hear, my brothers, how even lay people fast? What suffering are you obliged to endure if you abstain from cheese and fish and eggs on all the Wednesdays and Fridays only of the whole year, when you must break your fast? Are you not perfectly aware that we often abstain from these even on the holy days of Sunday themselves, as a result of not having these articles? What loss is it? Does not God, Our Master and the Lord of all, nourish us with other food and we thank him?

For these reasons, therefore, my fathers and brothers, I, the least, the insignificant one, “who owes ten thousand talents” (Matt. 18:24), the one more sinful than any sinner, beg you, trust in this very fine advice; heed this as it is blameless in every way, so that you may not be ashamed. “Take note of those who create dissensions and difficulties, in opposition to the doctrine which you have been taught; avoid them. For such persons do not serve Our Lord Christ, [p. 36] but their own appetites, and by fair and flattering words they deceive the hearts of the simple-minded” (Rom. 16:17–18). Let me pluck up courage and speak in the words of the apostle, “Let not him who abstains despise or pass judgment on him who eats; for God has welcomed him. Who are you to pass judgment on the servant of another? It is before his own master that he stands or falls” (Rom. 14:3–4). Let each of you be assured in his own mind that, “as in one body we have many members, and all the members do not have the same function, so we, though many, are one body in Christ, and individually members one of another” (Rom. 12:4–5). Because of this strive to edify each other, and if anyone should ever turn away from the things that have been handed on to you here, hasten to correct him. Cast far from you vain enquiries and disputations which come to you from outside, for by doing this, you will appear reliable in this present age, and will not be cast out of the kingdom of heaven in the age to come.

In the month of September is the beginning of the indiction and [the commemoration] of St. Symeon; + [the commemoration of] the commander of the heavenly armies [St. Michael] on the 6th; + the Birth of the Mother of God;³¹ + the Exaltation of the Venerable Cross;³² + [the commemoration of] St. John the Theologian on the 26th.

30. PHOBEROS

In the month of October is [the commemoration of] the holy apostle Thomas on the 6th; + [the commemoration of] St. James, the brother of God, on the 9th; + [the commemoration of] St. Demetrios on the 26th; + [the commemoration of] the holy apostle Luke on the 18th.

In the month of November is [the commemoration of] the Holy Anargyroi on the 1st; + [the commemoration of] the Incorporeal Ones [the Archangels, Michael and Gabriel] on the 8th; + [the commemoration of] [St. John] Chrysostom on the 13th; + [the commemoration of] the holy apostle Philip on the 14th; [the commemoration of] the holy apostle Matthew;³³ + the Entry of the Mother of God [in the Temple];³⁴ + and [the commemoration of] the holy apostle Andrew.³⁵

In the month of December is [the commemoration of] St. Nicholas on the 6th; + the Conception of St. Anne, the mother of the Mother of God;³⁶ + [the commemoration of] St. Ignatios;³⁷ + the Birth of Christ Our God.

Until the Holy Epiphany no fasting or genuflections at all take place either in the church or in your cells.

+ The Holy Epiphany; + [the commemoration of] [St. John] the Forerunner; + [the commemoration of] St. Gregory the Theologian; + the Presentation of Our Lord in the Temple; + [the commemoration of] St. Symeon the Receiver of God; + the Discovery of the Venerable Head of [St. John] the Forerunner; + [the commemoration of] the Forty Saints; + the Annunciation of the Mother of God; + [the commemoration of] St. George; + [the commemoration of] the holy apostle Mark; + [the commemoration of] the holy apostle James, the son of Zebedee; + [the commemoration of] St. John the Theologian; + [the commemoration of] St. Symeon the Wonderworker; + [the commemoration of] the holy apostles Bartholomew and Barnabas; + the Birth of the Venerable [St. John the] Forerunner; + [the commemoration of] the holy all-blessed apostles Peter and Paul; + [the commemoration of] the Twelve Apostles; + [the commemoration of] the Holy Anargyroi; + the [adoration] of the venerable Robe of the Mother of God; + [the commemoration of] Gabriel, the commander of the heavenly armies; + [the commemoration of] the holy prophet Elijah; + [the commemoration of] St. Panteleemon.³⁸

In the month of August is the [p. 37] feast of the Transfiguration;³⁹ + the Dormition of the Holy Mother of God;⁴⁰ + and the Beheading of [St. John] the Venerable Forerunner.⁴¹

In the week before Meatfare, during which the Armenians fast [in honor of] Artzibourios, there is no fast whatsoever with us, neither on Wednesday nor on Friday, neither as regards eggs nor anything else, since we reject the teaching of the Armenians, as some people hand it down. Similarly on Wednesday and Friday during the week of Cheesefare, in accordance with the tradition of the holy fathers, after the liturgy of the Presanctified [Gifts], cheese and eggs are eaten. This is likewise done because of the decree of Jacob and the heresy of the Tetraditai.⁴² For [our practice] rejects such heresies, as are contained in the canon of St. Nikephoros of Constantinople.⁴³ We do not eat dry food on those days, but we eat a cooked dish only, and we do not eat cheese and eggs and fish, as we said above.

If the vigil of Christmas or the Epiphany should happen to occur on a Saturday or a Sunday, we celebrate the customary liturgy early in the day as always and then partake of a collation in the church. But in the evening we eat legumes and vegetables prepared with olive oil, and we drink wine, because we received [the instruction] from the Address of Theophilos the most holy archbishop of Alexandria, speaking as follows in his own words: "Custom and propriety demands that we should honor every Sunday and rejoice on that day, since on that day Our Lord Jesus Christ brought about resurrection from the dead. Therefore, in the Holy Scriptures it is called the first day, since it is the beginning of life for us, and the eighth, because it has transcended the sabbath observance of the Jews. Therefore, since it has turned out that the day of Holy Epiphany is a fast day, let us act with discretion and advance knowingly in both directions, so that by eating a few dates we may at the same time shun the heresies that do not honor the day of Our Lord Jesus Christ's resurrection and render what is due to the fast day by waiting for the evening service."⁴⁴

We are obliged to perform the vigils in accordance with the rule both on every Sunday and feast of Our Lord and at any commemorations for the other saints, which we will learn from the synaxarion. During these I exhort your devotion to do this also; after the completion of the canons of the night office stand in the middle of the church and sing the following stichera: in honor of [St. John] the Holy Forerunner, [the sticheron] "Light incarnate" in the second plagal mode; in honor of St. Symeon, "Father worthy of admiration" in the same mode; and another in the same mode "On the wood of the cross, she"; and another in the same mode "Good Father, I was separated from thee"; [p. 38] and another in the same mode "O, what a time and day it will be then." At the "Gloria" [you must sing] in the same mode "Fearful art thou, Lord, and who shall stand"; [and at the] "And now" [you must sing] in the same mode "Lord, enmeshed by sins."

20. Rule for the quantity and nature of the food.

[= (22) Evergetis [9], ed. lines 325–36]: It should be the right time now to mention the table and food and the other things that supply nourishment to the body. For as we are made up of two parts, I mean soul and body, so also are the activities of the monastery. The whole daily divine office expressed in the singing of psalms could reasonably be thought of as the soul of the monastery, whereas the monastery itself and all the things that benefit our bodies could be considered its body. So then, since with God's help we have said enough already about its soul, it is right that we should also speak about matters which concern its body, by prescribing the diet and setting out for you more precisely all the other things that secure a more lasting continuance of the monastery, as the one who wishes to be concerned about the salvation and comfort of his brothers must be no less concerned about these things. So then, these things also should be said and should of course be imparted to my dear fathers and brothers.

21. Concerning good order in the refectory.

[= (22) Evergetis [9], ed. lines 337–64]: After the customary collation has taken place in the narthex, when the divine liturgy has already been completed, all the monks should sit together there waiting for the summons to the table which is given by the striking of the refectory semantron. When the semantron has been struck, going out at once with the priest who officiated at the liturgy, you should make obeisance to the superior and then beginning to recite audibly the customary psalm, walk to the refectory, that is the superior himself and all those without exception who have been instructed to sit down at the table during the first sitting. Then entering the refectory and completing the above-mentioned psalm and the short prayer that accompanies it, you should sit down in the order laid down by the superior and gratefully partake of what has been set before you. Then anyone who was late for the psalm and the thanksgiving should be reported by the refectorian to the superior, and he should enquire the reason for his lateness and grant him pardon if it seems reasonable, but if not, he is to perform as many genuflections as the superior wishes.

Moreover, the traditional reading must take place during the sittings in the customary way, with no one making a noise or causing a disturbance or destroying the benefit which comes from that, with worldly conversations and idle chatter. The superior only may speak sparingly [p. 39] if he wishes, and perhaps the one asked by him may answer similarly with some words and brief phrases, if possible. But if someone causes a disturbance or is disturbed, is noisy or causes a noise, and ruins the reading by untimely and improper conversation, he is to be silenced by the refectorian. But if, something I hope does not happen, when he silences him the noisy person pays no attention, he is to be removed from the refectory even if he is unwilling, and subjected to the penalty of going without his food or made to learn self-control in another way as the superior wishes.

22. Concerning the fact that there must be no quarreling in the refectory about precedence in seating, but they should sit down in the order in which they happen to be.

[= (22) Evergetis [9], ed. lines 364–403]: So we completely refuse to speak about seating. For how could this be acceptable, that men who are living according to God’s will should quarrel at all about seating, like those who are keen to show themselves in a worldly way superior to everyone else in this, as those who are excited by glory that is vain and hated by God? For “Everyone that is proud in heart is an abomination to the Lord” (Prov. 16:5) says Holy Scripture, “And the Lord resists the proud but he gives grace to the humble” (Prov. 3:34). So this will not happen among you, it will not. For if you are in your right minds, you would never choose to be an abomination to the Lord rather than to receive favor from him and have him near you, as those who are of a contrite heart, (Ps. 33 [34]:18) or, to speak truly, to be his dwelling and beloved of him. But if any of you is found, alas, causing annoyance in this matter, putting forward as an excuse perhaps age or sphere of work, and does not abide by the command of the superior nor is satisfied with the place allocated to him, I command in the Lord that he be allocated the last place and taught to leave the world and the habits of the world. But if, something that is in every way detestable and disorderly, he still disagrees and objects, persisting after the second and third admonition in being totally incorrigible and completely incurable, he is to be driven out of the monastery, and like some cancer be thrown out somewhere far away from you, so that he may not also infect the rest of you with his filth: for, as some wise man said, “taking part in evil is much easier than in virtue.”

When you are eating a meal you must not share with each other any food or drink, even as much as a small drop to cool the wine [mixed with water], but the person who at the time is in need of any of these things should raise himself a little very respectfully and ask the superior reverently, speaking as follows, “Bless me, father, I need this.” So if the superior gives permission, he is to receive what he needs, but if not, he is to sit down again and sit thankfully in silence. We do this indeed not through any meanness and stinginess, as some people think—for we will not be so wrapped up in things that are transient as to prefer them to the comfort of our brothers; for why should we, my brothers, be keen to possess these things if they do not contribute to [p. 40] our service, as has been said? But we do this securing for ourselves reverence and orderliness in this also, that the laxity of the majority may not find an opportunity from this to ruin the whole orderliness of the table, and we become no better than those who are undisciplined and irreligious, who are indulgent, and entertain each other by drinking toasts and replying to toasts. Not only are we curbing the inclination of the will but furthermore we are rooting out the lack of self-control of the majority, and teaching them to be satisfied with a few necessities and thereby at the same time plaiting for you crowns for self-restraint. Also we are keeping you away from committing unintentionally a secret deed of darkness, not to say one of stealth.

23. Concerning the fact that there must be no eating in secret.

[= (22) Evergetis [9], ed. lines 403–16]: Well then, is not something done in secret a deed of darkness? This is of course very obvious and the divine gospel of John makes it clear as follows, “Everyone who does evil does not come to the light, lest his evil deeds should be exposed by the light” (John 3:20). The apostle also says, “Anything that is exposed is light” (Eph. 5:13), the statement showing that what is not exposed is complete darkness. So for what purpose do you reject the deed of light and do the deed of darkness, my brother? “I am ashamed to ask,” he says. So while you do the opposite and something which God hates you are not ashamed and you hesitate about what is good. Do not, I beg you. However I know that many do this, trampling their consciences underfoot, and think that they are not noticed, which touches me to the depths of my heart, and I do not cease from weeping over them because they neither realize that they are in that evil plight, alas, nor acknowledge their passion. May the Lord have pity on them and guide them for their good as he manages all things for our good.

Since I have been reminded of this, come, I will explain to you briefly how you must conquer the wickedness of this demon, who does not allow us to follow the way of truth in purity. I heard some of you wrongly interpreting what was rightly said in divine Scripture, “It is [more] blessed to give than to receive” (Acts 20:35), and distorting it for your own deception and with a deceitful desire for covetousness misrepresenting the meaning of the statement and the teaching of the Lord, which says, “If you would be perfect, go, sell what you possess and give to the poor, and you will have treasure in heaven; and come, follow me” (Matt. 19:21). They judge that it is more blessed to exercise control over one’s wealth and give to those in need from the abundance of this than to live in poverty. [p. 41]

24. Concerning the fact that exercising control over one’s own wealth for almsgiving must not be considered better than a life of poverty.

So then such people should be known as those who have not yet renounced the world, nor reached monastic perfection, in so far as they are ashamed to accept glorious poverty along with the apostle on behalf of Christ, and by the work of their hands serve each other and those in need. But if they really desire to fulfill the monastic way of life and be glorified with the apostle, after scattering their old wealth, let them fight the good fight with Paul “in hunger and thirst and cold and exposure” (I Tim. 6:12; II Cor. 11:27). For if the possession of old wealth had been more necessary for perfection, the same apostle would not have despised his first rank, for he says that he is distinguished and a Roman citizen (cf. Acts 21:39; 22:27–28). Also those in Jerusalem, who sold their houses and lands and placed [the money] at the feet of the apostles (cf. Acts 4:34), would not have done that if they knew it had not been decided by the apostles that people should be fed by their own money and not by their own toil and the almsgiving of gentiles.

30. PHOBEROS

The aforementioned Paul explains these matters more clearly in the things he wrote to the Romans, when he says the following, “At present, however, I am going to Jerusalem to aid the saints; for Macedonia and Achaia have been pleased to make some contribution for the poor among the saints at Jerusalem; they were pleased to do it, and indeed they are in debt to them” (Rom. 15:25–27). Also, when he himself was often afflicted with bonds and imprisonments and the effort of his journeying, and was hindered as a result of this, as it seems, from providing for himself by his own hands, he explains that he received these necessities from the brethren who came to him from Macedonia, as he says, “For my needs were supplied by the brethren who came from Macedonia” (II Cor. 11:9). When writing to the Philippians he says this, “For you know, Philippians, that when I left Macedonia no church entered into partnership with me in giving and receiving except you only; for even in Thessalonica you sent me help once and again for my need” (Phil. 4:15–16).

So then according to the opinion of the covetous, these people should be more blessed than the apostles, since they supplied his needs from their own substance; but no one will be so utterly foolish as to dare to say this. So then, if we wish to follow the commandment of the gospel and of the apostle and of that whole church founded in the beginning on the apostles, let us not obey our own thoughts nor distort what has been well said, but throwing away the lukewarm and untrustworthy [p. 42] opinion, let us accept the exact sense of the gospel. For in that way we will be able to follow in the footsteps of the fathers and never stray from a knowledge of community life and truly renounce this world.

It is right to mention some holy fathers at this point in the discourse. The following remark is reported of our holy father Basil to some senator who had renounced the world in a lukewarm fashion and withheld some of his own money, “Though you have destroyed the senator you have not made a monk.”⁴⁵ So then we need to cut out of our souls with all zeal the root of all evil, which is the love of money, knowing for certain that if the root remains the branches grow readily, and that is difficult for those who do not live in a community to achieve that virtue. For in it we are free from anxiety even concerning necessary needs themselves. So keeping before our eyes the condemnation of Ananias and Sapphira, let us shudder to leave behind any of our old wealth for ourselves (Acts 5:1–5). Similarly let us fear the example of Gehazi, who through his love of money was handed over to everlasting leprosy (II Kings 5:20–27), and let us be on our guard against gathering up money for ourselves, which often we did not have even in the world, taking into consideration as well Judas’ death by hanging (Matt. 27:5). So let us fear something which we despised when we were renouncing the world. In all these things let us keep before our eyes the uncertainty of death, lest Our Lord should come one day at a time when we do not expect him, and find our consciences stained by the love of money, and say to us the words that were said in the gospel to the rich man, “Your soul is taken from you; and the things you have prepared, whose will they be?” (Luke 12:20)

[= (22) Evergetis [9], ed. lines 418–29]: We must now return to the point from which we digressed. So after you have eaten and said the customary grace and risen, you should sing the specified office with the prayer and then go away to your own cells. At supper also, if someone who wishes to have supper arrives after grace, he will incur the same penalty as he who was late at lunch time, if of course he does not have a reasonable excuse when he is asked. However, the one who because of abstinence does not come to the supper incurs no blame. Then when you are at supper, bread will be set before you and that in small quantities; but if there are some small fruits, you should gratefully partake of these also by the decision of the superior. Drink, moreover, will be distributed to you with the larger wine measure as is prescribed. But if a feast happens to be celebrated by one of the brothers, with the knowledge of the superior this regulation should not be observed at supper, but you should act in whatever way the one celebrating the feast wishes. [p. 43]

25. Concerning the fact that they must not spend time or talk with chance people in an unguarded way.

It is good and very useful for you to know this, just as we have learnt it from the saints and experience itself has taught us, that you should not pass time with any people in an unguarded way nor sit with them at your meals, neither inside nor outside the monastery, wherever you happen to be. The wise and great Basil bears witness to my words and this teaching by saying the following, “It is fitting that you should neither confide in any people nor disclose things nor reveal them in an unguarded way. For the man who lives in accordance with God has many enemies lying in wait for him and often [they are] the closest observers of his life.

So then it is fitting not to have untested meetings with people from outside. For if the Savior, as the gospel says, did not trust himself to everyone (cf. John 2:24)—for the Just One himself [the gospel says], he who is complete virtue—how will we sinners, who easily slip, who are not always guided by the aim, partly because of physical weakness and partly because of the one who wrestles wickedly and unceasingly against us, not bring upon ourselves wicked slanders and set up for ourselves occasions for sin, if we entrust ourselves to inquisitive people? For often wicked people attempt to slander what is being carried out well and they refuse to leave even the smallest of faults unreviled.

So then it is necessary that conversations with people from outside should be guarded against. For a different emotion comes over them through inexperience of the thoughts of those who have retreated from life. For they suppose that the mind of those who have changed their way of life was not changed, but their human nature has been changed. They do not discern that those who practice the religious life live with the same passions but control them through the power of their soul and the fact that they have cut themselves off from pleasures, but they think that the natural passions of their bodies have been completely removed. As a result, if the spiritual man fails in what is good even by a small amount, at once all those former most ardent supporters and admirers become bitter accusers and they prove that they did not confer true praise even previously. For just as when some athlete has slipped, at once his opponent rises up against him striking him down, so they, whenever they see the one who is living by the practice of virtue has failed a little in goodness, they attack him with abuse and slanders as if they were striking him with arrows, not thinking that they themselves are wounded each day by the countless darts of their passions, but the champions of piety, although they are besieged by the same passions, are often injured by them to little or no extent, and that too [p. 44] though they accept a more vehement opponent than they do, since they agreed to fight against him and it is a great thing for the Wicked One to gain a victory against them; but on the contrary his defeat has given him a mortal wound, so completely has he been defeated by all kinds of virtue. But the war is scorned [by him] in the case of those who have dedicated themselves to this life, partly because most of them spontaneously run to their defeat, enticed into sin by various pleasures and desires and providing him with an effortless victory against them, and partly because though they seem to be putting up a small resistance to the various temptations to sin, they are easily distracted from the struggle, and turning their backs and being struck unceasingly they bear many disgraceful marks of their defeat.

If some people somewhere, being compelled to face the forceful temptations of this world, have plunged into the war against evil, yet not even these people have endured such struggles as those endured by people practicing the religious life, but ones to a great and infinite degree inferior. For the one is eager to have control over his own property and ambitiously strives to settle the disputes concerning the things of this life; but the other yields even what is rightfully his own to those who dispute it, fulfilling the command, 'Of him who takes away your goods do not ask them again' (Luke 6:30). The one when struck has struck back and when wronged has done wrong in return, and in that way supposes that he has equality; but the other endures until he grants his fill to the one wronging and striking him. The one is eager to gain control over all bodily pleasures; but the other lives with his fill of pleasures. So how could the man of this world be considered a combatant when compared with the man practicing the religious life?

Consider another thing also which those who devote themselves to this present life customarily experience whenever they examine the life of those practicing the religious life; for whenever the man practicing the religious life thinks it right to support his body with food after a long period of hunger, either they do not wish him to partake of food or just the smallest amount, as if he were something spiritual and immaterial. Whenever they see the man who practices the religious life not disregarding his body in every way but supplying his existing need for something, they abuse and slander [ascetic men], calling them well-fed and greedy people, extending their insults and abuse of one man to all, not considering that they themselves twice a day, and some of them three times, feed on the grossest and richest of food, filling themselves with an infinite amount of meat and pouring for themselves a boundless amount of wine, and even so they gape at their tables like dogs released from confinement after a long period of hunger. But those who truly practice the religious life use the driest of food having in its weakness little nourishment and [eat] once during the whole day. They know how to live in an orderly way, feeding themselves with moderation and understanding, and they supply the need of their bodies at the time for food in a reasonable manner with a confident conscience.

For this reason it is [p. 45] fitting that our freedom should not be judged by someone else's conscience. For 'if we partake with thankfulness, why should we be denounced because of that for which we give thanks,' (I Cor. 10:30–31) for choosing hunger and inferior food with such gladness as they do not even have for the very sumptuous and varied provision of their luxurious table?"⁴⁶ So much concerning not spending time with lay people. Let us speak now about the condition of the refectory.

26. Concerning good order in the refectory.

[= (22) Evergetis [9], ed. lines 430–36]: The disciplinary official should go in during the second sitting and, if there are some who should have eaten at the first but missed it, he should enquire the reason for their absence. If their excuse is reasonable, they are excused, but if it is unreasonable, we instruct him not to allow them to eat. For to be late for meals for no reasonable cause is not something to be approved of, and therefore this practice must always be punished and discouraged as much as possible. This is the procedure on the ordinary days of the year, but not the procedure during the holy fast days.

27. That on Monday of the first week they should not take any care at all with their table.

[= (22) Evergetis [10], ed. lines 437–42]: Especially during the first and greatest fast, on the first day, that is Monday of the first week, the liturgy should not be celebrated nor should care be taken with the table or food. However on the subsequent days of the same week after the conclusion of the whole liturgy, attention should be paid to the table, and whoever chooses should partake of food.

28. Concerning how they must regulate their diet during Lent.

[= (22) Evergetis [10], ed. lines 442–502]: This will be composed of legumes soaked in water and perhaps some raw vegetables and fruits, and the drink will be hot water seasoned with cumin. But those who are engaged in the struggle, fast either until Wednesday or even Friday as each one has the strength. For this medicine greatly benefits sinners like me. This applies until Saturday, but on this day you should eat two dishes of food cooked with olive oil, and drink a better wine distributed in the larger measure because of the feast of the great martyr St. Theodore,⁴⁷ which the superior must celebrate as a duty and give you refreshment. But if someone else of you wishes to celebrate this feast, we give him permission to feed the brotherhood with some shellfish on the Saturday, but we will not eat fish. You should carry out the first week of the great and holy fast of Lent in that way. [p. 46]

On all Saturdays and Sundays of the same holy fast two cooked dishes containing olive oil should be set out for you and for your drink the customary large measure of wine should be distributed. The same thing should take place also on Thursday of the great canon. But on Tuesdays and on the other Thursdays two cooked dishes will be set out for you, but only one not both of them will have olive oil; and wine will be measured out with the smaller measure, that is half of the larger one.

This is because of your weakness and the toil you have both in the church and from your manual tasks, since the fiftieth canon of the Council at Laodicea in its own very words says this, "That in Lent they must not break the fast on the Thursday of the last week and dishonor the whole of Lent, but must fast for the whole of Lent by eating dry food.”⁴⁸ Blessed is that one of you who will be eager to fulfill this canon; for he will have born fruit a hundredfold and be shown to be one who fulfills the commands of God. Let the man who wishes to, fast like that, not hindered by anyone, having the blessing of me, the sinner, as his helper.

Then on the rest of the days, I mean Mondays, Wednesdays, and Fridays, you should not partake of anything cooked nor wine but only boiled beans and some small fruits, if there are any, and hot water flavored with cumin. But if the commemoration of the discovery of the precious head of the Forerunner or the remembrance of the Forty Saints⁴⁹ should happen to fall on one of these days, then you should celebrate it and have as a refreshment not that of the aforementioned days, but only wine of the larger measure and gruel. But on all the other days of the holy fast you are not allowed to eat fish at all, not even if perhaps some refreshment is sent you by someone. If, however, the person who is providing you with the refreshment should come himself to eat with you, then the fast should be broken on this occasion because of this special treat. On Saturday and Sunday we eat shellfish, but not on other days.

When the feast of the Annunciation falls,⁵⁰ you should celebrate it as splendidly as possible, partaking of fish provided by the monastery and drinking wine of the larger measure. Furthermore on the next day (if it is not a Monday or Wednesday or Friday) you should eat anything left from the table of the previous day, and in the same way drink the wine. If no fish has been left, then you will have two dishes with olive oil. The procedure of the feast should be carried out as for days free from fasting. We will eat fish during this holy [p. 47] feast, as has been said, if it does not fall during the great holy week. For at that time we will use shellfish, rather we will receive a refreshment because of the feast, because it is fitting that we should pass the whole of that holy week in the same way as the days of the first week, content with some legumes soaked in water, raw vegetables, fruits that happen to be at hand, and hot water flavored with cumin. Those who are able fast completely. If the aforementioned holy feast should fall on those days, we shall not partake of fish but of shellfish, as we said, and we shall drink wine of the larger measure, and we will do everything appropriate for the feast even if it should fall on Holy Thursday, or Good Friday. However, on Good Friday those who are able should not eat at all,⁵¹ and likewise on Holy Saturday, even if the commemoration of the Mother of God should occur. But all anxiety that produces distraction in us must be avoided, and there should only be a collation, as is customary, in the holy church after the holy communion, at the sixth hour of the night on Holy Saturday. For that is the hour which the holy fathers have handed down to us.

For there is a canon of the sixth Ecumenical Council, the eighty-ninth, which says this, “The faithful must spend the days of the Savior’s passion in fasting and prayers and heart-searching, and break their fast about the middle hour of the night on holy Saturday, as the divine writers of the gospels, Matthew and Luke, assure us that it is late in the night, the one with the phrase ‘after the Sabbath’ (Matt. 28:1) and the other with the phrase ‘at early dawn’” (Luke 24:1).⁵² That is the way the holy Ecumenical Council and the other holy councils and other different fathers have spoken about this matter.

One of these is Dionysios the archbishop of Alexandria of blessed memory. For he, when writing to Basileides his beloved brother and fellow minister explains to him about when he should break his fast, since Basileides was inquiring about the exact time, and among other things he says the following, “This being so, we reveal this to those who are making precise enquiries as to what hour or even what half hour or quarter hour it is fitting to begin rejoicing for the resurrection of Our Lord. We censure as neglectful and lacking self-control those who are too hasty and cease before the night is already halfway through, bringing the race to an end a little too soon, for a wise man says ‘The least thing is not little in life.’⁵³ We will commend as noble and conscientious those who wait until later, continuing for a very long time and persevering until the fourth watch, at which [p. 48] time Our Savior appeared walking on the sea to those who were sailing. (Matt. 14:25) We are not very troubled by those who ceased at an intermediate time as they were impelled or lost their strength. Since all perhaps do not endure the six days of the fast equally, but some continuing without food go beyond all the days, others [fast for] two days, others three days, others four days, others none, a too-hasty tasting of food is pardonable in the case of those who have toiled very much prolonging the fast and then are very weary and almost fainting. But if there are some who far from prolonging the fast did not even fast at all, but fared sumptuously for the four preceding days, then when they come to the final two days, the Friday and the Saturday, and try to go beyond these, only think that they achieve something great and glorious if they continue until dawn. I do not think that they have engaged in the same struggle as those who have competed for the greater number or days.”⁵⁴ That is what Dionysios says.

TWELFTH CENTURY

The holy apostles in the Constitutions prescribe that fasting should last until cockcrow. For among other things they also say this, “Observe the feast days of Our Lord, firstly his birth and after it his epiphany, then the fast of Lent which includes a commemoration of Our Lord’s way of life and lawgiving. This fast should be completed before the fast of Easter. It begins on Monday and is completed on Friday [of the first week of Lent]. After you have finished this fast, you begin fasting [again] during the Holy Week before Easter, fasting for the Jews who are lost. For thus Our Lord exhorted us to fast for these six days because of the Jews’ lawbreaking, commanding them to mourn for their destruction; for he himself wept for them. Fast during the days [before] Easter beginning from Monday for six days until Saturday, using only bread and vegetables and water; for they are days of grief and not a feast. Fast also on Saturday itself, not because we must fast on Saturday since there was [on that day] a rest from creation, but because we ought to fast since on that day the creator is still under ground. For they detained Our Lord during their own feast, so that the statement might be fulfilled, ‘Their signs were set up in the middle of their feast and they did not recognize them’ (cf. Ps. 73 [74]:4–5). Moreover, fast for the whole of Friday and Saturday until cockcrow. But if someone is not able to observe both of the two days, he should just observe the Saturday. For the Lord also speaks about this, ‘Whenever the bridegroom is taken away [p. 49] from them, then they will fast in those days’ (Luke 5:35). Therefore, on those days he was taken away from us by the lawless Jews and nailed on the cross; wherefore we exhort you to fast during those days, as we fast. On the remaining days before Friday each person should eat in the evening or in whatever way he can from Monday [through Saturday] until cockcrow, breaking the fast as the first hour of the Sabbath dawns, which is Sunday, keeping a vigil and praying and reading the law and the prophets and the psalms until the cockcrow. When you have ceased from your grief, beg God that Israel may be converted and receive him, the means of repentance and forgiveness for their ungodliness. For Pilate when he had washed his hands said, 'I am innocent of this righteous man's blood; see to it yourselves.' Israel shouted, 'His blood be on us and on our children' (Matt. 27:24–25), and 'We have no king but Caesar' (John 19:15). When the Lord has risen, offer your sacrifice, about which he gave you an instruction through us saying, 'Do this in remembrance of me' (Luke 22:19). Then break your fast, happily celebrating the feast, because the pledge of our resurrection, Jesus Christ, has risen from the dead. This is for you an everlasting ordinance until the consummation, until the Lord comes."⁵⁵

30. PHOBEROS

Again, counting from the first Sunday, celebrate the feast of the Resurrection of the Lord for forty days, and ten days after the [feast of the] Ascension, on the sixth [Sunday] after the first Sunday is the [feast of] Pentecost, which should be a great feast for you, for on it at the third hour the Lord sent to us the gift of his Holy Spirit.⁵⁶ After you have celebrated the feast of Pentecost, keep the feast for a week, and after that, fast. For it is right that you should be glad at the gift from God and that you should fast after the refreshment. For both Moses and Elijah fasted for forty days⁵⁷ and for three weeks Daniel "ate no pleasant bread, and no flesh or wine entered into my mouth" (cf. Dan. 10:2–3). After that fast, we instruct you to fast on every Wednesday and Friday and to distribute your surplus [food] to the poor, as has been said.

[= (22) Evergetis [9], ed. lines 503–5]: In this manner your diet for the great and holy period of Lent must be kept, though care should be shown to the sick at the discretion of the superior. The procedure for the fast of the Holy Apostles will be laid down immediately next.

29. Concerning the fast of the Holy Apostles.

[= (22) Evergetis [10], ed. lines 509–17]: After the completion of the whole canonical office of the hours and the divine liturgy as the synaxarion prescribes in detail, you should be summoned to the refectory [p. 50] at the seventh hour in accordance with the rule laid down above, and there you should eat two dishes cooked with olive oil on Tuesday and Thursday and drink wine of the larger measure at the midday meal. However, we will not eat fish provided by the monastery; but if some were to come as a refreshment, then we should partake of it gratefully, for it is not right to forbid this during these two lesser fasts.

30. Concerning the fast of the Holy Nativity.⁵⁸

[= (22) Evergetis [10], ed. lines 518–25]: The fast of the Holy Nativity will be similar to that of the Holy Apostles in both food and drink, after the completion of course of the whole canonical office according to the synaxarion. It will differ from it in these two points only—in not performing the divine liturgy each day during the period of the fast, for the day being short does not provide enough time, and in eating once. For your food should be set out for you at the ninth hour during the period of a fast, as has been said; and it will always be a fast on Monday and Wednesday and Friday, when we sing "Alleluia."

31. Concerning the fast of the Dormition of the most holy Mother of God.

In the same way we must also speak about the fast of the Dormition of the most holy Mother of God, because we have received [the regulation] that this fast should last from the beginning of August until the very day of the holy Mother of God,⁵⁹ with neither cheese nor eggs nor fish being eaten, from the *Tome of Union*⁶⁰ in its rebuke of the three-times married, and similarly also from the discourse of John the Metropolitan of Nicaea against the Armenians.⁶¹ For he counts up all the fasts and this one is included with the other fasts that were handed down by the holy fathers. However you, during this fast, break the fast on Saturdays and Sundays because of your weakness [but] only with fish. So these rules should be kept in this way.

32. That all the feasts of [St. John] the Holy Forerunner must be celebrated in a splendid manner, but [that for] his beheading more splendidly.

[= (22) Evergetis [11], ed. lines 528–35]: So all the divine patronal feasts of our patron, John the venerable Forerunner and Baptist, should be celebrated by you in a manner which surpasses the others, in the lighting of lamps, I mean, and the singing of psalms and in your own meals. But the feast of his death, which we in fact call his beheading, should be celebrated by you in a splendid and sumptuous manner. For it will be the feast of feasts and the festival of festivals, during which we order a distribution to be made at the gate of as much as we are able, and may our hand be generous. But not only do I give my beloved brothers this instruction, but also [order] the whole brotherhood during [p. 51] this feast to sing the psalm “Blameless” [(Ps. 118 [119]) with heads uncovered, holding lighted candles with great care and in the fear of God, as if [St. John] the glorious Forerunner and baptizer of Our Savior were present with you himself as you give him glory and praise. I exhort you to sing the liturgy of this feast until the fifth of September.

33. Concerning the fact that the monastery is to be under its own control.

[= (22) Evergetis [12], ed. lines 538–57]: We instruct all in the name of Our Lord God the Ruler of All that this holy monastery is to be independent, free of everyone’s control, and self-governing, and not subject to any rights, be they imperial or ecclesiastic or of a private person, but it should be watched over, steered, governed and directed only by John, the all-holy Forerunner and Baptist, by the prayer of our most blessed and holy father, and by the one acting as superior in it. If anyone ever at any time and in any way wishes to gain control over this monastery or place it under someone’s power, whether he be an emperor or a patriarch or some other member of the clergy or of the senate or even the superior of this monastery himself or its steward or simply one of its brothers, prompted by an attack of the devil, not only will he be held responsible for the divine body and blood of Our Lord God and Savior Jesus Christ and to St. John, his baptizer and our patron, but also “Let him be accursed” (Gal. 1.8) as the Holy Apostle says, and let him inherit the curse of the 318 holy inspired fathers and share the lot of the traitor Judas and be counted with those who shouted “away with him, away with him, crucify him” (John 19:15), and “his blood be on us and our children” (Matt. 27:25), because the various charistikarioi reduced to nothing the monastery which was once great and famous and admired, for as many as 170 monks, as we have learned from those who know accurately and were practicing the religious life here at that time.

From among these came two patriarchs at different times, Menas and Eutychios,⁶² and many other luminaries blazed out from their number here, whose honored relics have been pouring forth healing of all kinds to this day. For this monastery was built at the time of Leo [I (457–474)] the great emperor, the father-in-law of Zeno [(474–491)] and Anastasios [I (491–518)]. But you, maintain strictly just the commemoration of the patriarch at the time and the sphragis [by him] of the superior, as the memorandum by the famous and holy patriarch lord Nicholas⁶³ on our independence describes. [p. 52]

34. Concerning the installation of the officials.

[= (22) Evergetis [13], ed. lines 572–74]: It will be useful now to mention the installation of officials, of which the most important will always be the most important, I mean that of the superior. But a description of how he should be installed is necessary.

35. Concerning the appointment of the superior.

[= (22) Evergetis [13], ed. lines 605–10, 624–31]: After I have completed this mortal life, the one who is left by me as superior should consult with a few of you, those, that is, who always surpass the others in their conduct, manners, intellect, character, discipline, and their spiritual state and way of life, and he should choose the one who surpasses everyone in all these points and install him as steward; and he should install him in the following way.

If this steward carries out his office faultlessly, proving to be reliable in the sight of God and you, and being judged by you as fitting for the office of superior, should the superior know in advance of his own departure from here to the Lord, he should appoint him to leadership over you, since his faultless actions as steward have already been enough to act as a test and selection and, as has been mentioned before, his mode of life has been spiritual in every way. But if the superior should die without knowing in advance, then you, that is those who are preeminent and the most devout, will install this man. Then again he and you should choose the one who surpasses you all in virtue and appoint him as steward.

[= (22) Evergetis [14], ed. lines 661–87, 694–707]: So if the steward continues unchanged, properly maintaining his virtue through which he was thought worthy of that rank, he will not be removed from his office but remain firm. Furthermore, he will rise to the office of superior since he is worthy of it. But if time proves him to be unqualified and unsuitable, then another person should be found, someone who abounds in all goodness and is superior to him in virtue and is unimpeachable. He will be preferred to the other in every way and will be promoted to the office of steward and even that of superior; the other will be removed and made subordinate again.

That applies then while the superior is alive and is peacefully guiding your devotion. But should the superior suddenly die and has not removed this bad steward, if there is someone who surpasses him in good qualities and is pleasing to you preeminent ones, whom we have told the superior to use as advisers, and if you agree on him and are all unanimous, then he should be selected by you and immediately raised to the office of superior, and with him you should take thought about another better steward. But if, something I pray God does not [p. 53] allow, you yourselves resort to strife and discord, the bad steward himself will become your superior to avoid uproar and dissension. For when two evils lie before us then the less bad one is preferable. If he should ever take stock of himself and give up his evil ways that were clear to all, and embark on the road that leads to higher things and salvation, let him stay and be your superior even if he is not completely satisfactory. But should this same man still not give up his evil ways but in fact indulge in them more widely, if you were unanimously agreed on one man, someone clearly better, then we instruct you to remove that worthless man from leadership over you and raise the one you have selected to the position of superior.

The one removed from office may, if he wishes, reside in a cell of the monastery and be accorded the rank and seat of second to the superior, in the refectory I mean, and at the other gatherings, being content with the food and drink and all the rest of the community's way of life. However, we do not allow him to leave the monastery and following his own inclinations go where he wishes, but this matter will be for the superior to consider.

[= (22) Evergetis [15], ed. lines 737–49]: I plainly instruct you all, my brothers, that as soon as your superior has been appointed, you should take him to the most holy patriarch and he is to receive from him the sphragis as has been said.⁶⁴ Then you should hurry to confide to him all the stirrings of your souls and confess the thoughts that harm your souls, so that he may form an idea of the quality of your attitude and relationship with him. By thoughts we mean not those that have been confessed to preceding superiors but those that trouble you day by day and hour by hour. For it is not possible, no, it is not possible that we, being human, should not think something wicked at some time. Do not put off something that is good, a thing you should not do, but run to it with all eagerness and speed, so that you all may be “one” (John 17:21) “being of the same mind” (Phil. 2:2), thinking the same thing, shepherded and guided by one and the same shepherd, attached and bound to one another like a chain of gold, and “fitted together into one body under one head” (cf. Eph. 4:16), as the holy apostle says, with the Spirit as the master builder.

36. Concerning the fact that the monks in the monastery must not make their confession to anyone else except their own superior.

[= (22) Evergetis [15], ed. lines 749–60]: But if there should be someone who is obdurate and implacable, stubborn and obstinate, who follows his own will and does not wish to make confession to his superior but would acknowledge someone else and not this man as his spiritual father [p. 54] and would endeavor to confide his thoughts to him, he should be put out far away from our flock. He should be chased out at once, receiving neither mercy nor pity but as someone who removes himself by his own evil—O eyes of God “that behold all things” (cf. Sir. 15:19)—evil and very dangerous decisions, he should be utterly rejected from the monastery and removed and counted a stranger to our group and community, our way of life and fellowship, as being the cause of dissension and discord and all other kinds of instability, disorder, and serious harm. That man should be treated thus.

[= (22) Evergetis [16], ed. lines 763–65, 770–71, 772–77]: You, that I may turn my attention on you again, should reserve, I beg you, for your superior all honor, all affection, all reverence and unwavering submission, and all obedience obeying the holy apostle when he says, “Let every person be subject to the governing authorities. For there is no authority except from God, and those that exist have been instituted by God. Therefore he who resists the authorities resists what God has appointed, and those who resist will incur judgment. For rulers are not a terror to good conduct, but to bad. Would you have no fear of him who is in authority? Then do what is good, and you will receive his approval, for his is God's servant for your good. But if you do wrong, be afraid, for he does not bear the sword in vain. He is the servant of God to exercise his wrath on the wrongdoer. Therefore, one must be subject, not only to avoid God's wrath, but also for the sake of conscience" (Rom. 13:1–6). Again he says, "But we beseech you, brethren, to respect those who labor among you and are over you in the Lord and admonish you, and to esteem them very highly in love because of their work" (I Thess. 5:12–13). Again, the same writer says, "Obey your leaders and submit to them; for they are keeping watch over your souls, as men who will have to give account" (Heb. 13:17).

30. PHOBEROS

Do you hear, brothers, how those who are over you are obliged to render account to God for each one of you? Therefore, wholeheartedly and with all eagerness show your obedience to them and you will have a good defense at the fearful judgment seat of Christ. Also maintain love, peace, and harmony in your dealings with one another, burn with a tender affection for one another, supporting one another, "instructing, comforting, and forbearing one another" (Rom. 15:14), and, to put it simply, exerting yourselves strongly to establish whatever is good, praiseworthy, virtuous or brings salvation.

"Rejoice in the Lord, rejoice. Let all men know your forbearance. The Lord is at hand. Have no anxiety about anything, but in everything by prayer and supplication with thanksgiving let your requests be made known to God, and the peace of God which passes all understanding will keep your hearts in Christ [p. 55] Jesus. Finally, brethren, whatever is true, whatever is honorable, whatever is just, whatever is pure, whatever is lovely, whatever is gracious, if there is any excellence, if there is anything worthy of praise, think about these things. What you have learned and received and heard and seen in me, do; and the God of peace will be with you" (Phil. 4.4–9).

[= (22) Evergetis [17], ed. lines 785–99]: You, spiritual father and guide of this holy flock, be moderate with the brothers, and in your concern maintain in everything a spiritual affection for them. I entreat you, care for them all, have concern for them all, forebear with them all, support them instructing, comforting, teaching, advising, healing the sick, supporting the weak, encouraging the faint-hearted, restoring those who sin, forgiving "seventy times seven" (Matt. 18:22) in accordance with the word of Our Lord. For it is better that you, who are imitating the Lord himself, be judged considerate [even though] a little remiss perhaps in what you ought to do, than by maintaining utmost righteousness you be condemned as heartless and haters of your brothers. Also, to omit the rest, the great Basil says, "And the superior himself, as a father caring for true children, will watch over the needs of each one and will bring them suitable healing and care as far as he can, and will support with love and fatherly affection the member who is truly weak whether spiritually or physically."⁶⁵

I give you this instruction also, spiritual father, to go into the refectory each day and for the cellarer to set out the food of the brothers in your presence, and you should observe carefully what is set out for the brothers and look after those of the brothers who are weak as if they were a limb of your own that is hard to cure. When you do this, you will realize the reason for this instruction, for it is very necessary and beneficial.

[= (22) Evergetis [17], ed. lines 800–814]: If you always live like that, there will be no one who will usurp unworthily the office of superior or steward, making a display perhaps of his seniority or his sphere of work or his noble birth or rank or his offering of property or money, but that man should be preferred in these offices who has been selected by all of you who have been chosen to consider and advise the superior, and by the superior himself, even if he has been recently tonsured, or is unlearned and without experience in worldly things. For not one bit of harm will come to the monastery through this. For “God is able from these stones to raise up children to Abraham” (Matt. 3:9) and to give wisdom to the blind and to supply reason to those without reason, he who takes more pleasure in these people than in those who glory in their own wisdom and power and [p. 56] wealth and nobility. As a witness of this the truly divine and great apostle St. Paul clearly expresses it in the following words, “God chose what is foolish in the world and weak and despised to shame the wise and strong and lofty, and things which are not to bring to nothing things that are” (I Cor. 1:27–28).

37. Concerning the fact that the superior must not be questioned by the monks about the income or expenditure of the monastery.

[= (22) Evergetis [18], ed. lines 823–28]: The brothers will not question their superiors, nor yet will they ever demand from them an account of the things for which they take in and pay out money. For this is unworthy and harmful, breeding a great deal of mistrust and producing discord, instability, and every other cause for sin. But neither will the superiors themselves spend the wealth of the monastery in doing favors for their own relations and friends. For by acting in that way they will not be taking part in the divine mysteries “in the Holy Spirit” (Rom. 9:1), until they refrain from such an action.

38. Concerning the fact that everything that has been dedicated to the monastery is to be inalienable.

[= (22) Evergetis [19], ed. lines 841–60]: We wish the sacred vessels and liturgical cloths, the holy icons and books acquired by us to be inalienable—for it is unnecessary to speak about the immovable property—and not only inalienable but also completely safe from theft and removal by anyone at all, because they were dedicated as offerings to John the venerable Forerunner and Baptist. For neither you nor any other sensible person could define any reasonable excuse for removing these objects or handing them over, except a calamity resulting from a chance occurrence, perhaps one arising from a fire or a raid by some enemies who have perhaps burnt down the monastery or destroyed it to the foundations again as before or even a destruction caused by an earthquake, and then because a great deal of expense is needed to save it or even to rebuild it. For then they will be removed or handed over with good reason. They will be removed if perhaps there is not sufficient money to save what should be saved. This is not all, but it should not be done secretly or by one man and without reference to anyone, but openly and publicly when the superior, the steward, the ecclesiarch, and the other preeminent officials have gathered together for this purpose, and the removal of what is necessary should be done in the presence of all these people by the one who is managing the income and the expenditure at the time, if he intends to avoid reproach to himself and to inform everyone.

39. Concerning the fact that there must be no idle chatter.

[= (22) Evergetis [21], ed. lines 877–88]: If any of your number should gather on some manual task or other service and amuse themselves with idle conversations—for this is usual at gatherings—and then turn to obscene talk—for “By a multitude of words,” he says, “thou shalt not [p. 57] escape sin” (Prov. 10:19)—they should not reject the admonition of the superior. For we instruct him to do this very thing in love and persuade them to give up topics which harm the soul, and either discuss matters from Holy Scripture that help the soul or be silent. “For,” the author of the Book of Proverbs says, “if thou refrain thy lips thou wilt be prudent” (Prov. 10:19). Also those who happen to be on a journey and are afflicted in the same way should be cured by the same method. For these people especially must take care to guard their mind at that time, knowing how easy it is of course for the adversary [the devil] to attack them and make them fall, which I pray may not happen, seeing that they are separated from their sheepfold, flock, and shepherd.

40. Concerning the fact that they should not spar with each other verbally.

[= (22) Evergetis [21], ed. lines 888–96]: Furthermore they are not to resort to mutual rebuking or verbal sparring. For he who does such a thing will be liable to excommunication, and if he does not repent and beg for forgiveness “with a contrite heart” (Ps. 50 (51):17), he will be punished. For we prefer that you should always be loving and peaceful towards one another and, instead of something that provokes quarrels, learn to say “Bless and forgive me, brother.” Those who form idle gatherings and visit people’s cells with no good reason, without any pressing cause, or the knowledge of the superior, when they are admonished and do not desist from their evil behavior, they will be punished.

41. Concerning the fact that no one should possess anything in contravention of the rule of the monastery, and should not eat in secret or receive messages from anybody.

[= (22) Evergetis [22]]: Those who acquire some possessions contrary to the rule of the monastery, even so much as an obol or a piece of fruit, without the knowledge of the superior, will be liable to punishment. Similar to them is the person who eats and drinks in secret, unless he confesses, and the person who receives messages from friends and relatives, and replies to them. But the person who purloins something from the monastery and does not make amends will be expelled completely.

42. Concerning the number of the monks.

[cf. (22) Evergetis [23], ed. lines 908, 911–15]: This also should be added to what has been said. I wish your number to be up to twelve who are educated in accordance with the description in our report, both because to live with a few good people is good and beneficial for souls which are striving and because poverty is more easily achieved among a few educated people than among the uneducated majority who do not fear the Lord “but serve their own appetites” (Rom. 16:18). But if the Lord will wish for this monastery to be enlarged, you will number as many as you have sufficient food for, and as many of you as promote the strict observance of this rule, and as many of you as think that love, reverence, and [p. 58] harmony should be preferred to everything else, and obey your superiors “in all patience” (II Cor. 12:12) and lowliness of heart, and are keen to carry out their instructions devoutly. The rest should be sent away, even if you have to be reduced to small numbers. For “one person doing the will of the Lord is better than ten thousand transgressors” (cf. Sir. 16:3).

43. Concerning the fact that they should not have servants.

[= (22) Evergetis [24]]: It will not be possible for you to have servants, but it is very good and beneficial in many ways that in the cells there should be three of you, being of one and the same mind. For it is harmful for novices to be only one in a cell, whereas it is helpful that in the cells there should be three of you, being of one and the same mind and united by the law of spiritual love, really living together as brothers in harmony, bearing the same yoke of the Lord wholeheartedly, being subservient to one another in peace, proper care and reverence.

But even in this matter also, it is necessary to make specific distinctions, namely, that the novice should defer to the one who is more advanced, the more unlearned to the more educated, the more uncouth to the more sophisticated, and the younger to the older. But if the superior should decide that some should be alone in their cells, he himself may sanction the arrangement.

44. Concerning the fact that the cells of the monks should not be locked.

Keys should never be hung in your cells, for this is not fitting in the case of monks. For the things that are locked up are all secret and their owner does not wish them to be revealed. But all your possessions are in common and are open, and therefore there will be no need among you for the use of keys. It should be recognized by everyone that the person who does this is a thief and does not wish what is hidden by him to be revealed and for this reason he uses a lock. This [instruction] should be observed among you for the Lord’s sake, and if you live like that, none of you will be overpowered by this passion.

[= (22) Evergetis [25]]: We prescribe that garments be bought and deposited in the storehouse so that when you need them you may receive them; and it is good to take care of your old garments as much as you can and use them. For only a use that is necessary should be sought, and a surplus should be hated as being of the devil. We give the same instruction also in the case of cloaks and vests and shoes, and in short, all necessities. So whenever anyone has a pressing need to receive a new item of these articles, he must bring the old one of course to the storehouse and hand this over and receive another one with the knowledge of the superior. For otherwise, if you do not bring the old garments, we order that you be not given any. [p. 59]

45. Concerning the fact that everyone should have the same food and drink and clothing.

[= (22) Evergetis [26]]: In addition to these we give you this instruction before God and our patron himself, the venerable Forerunner, that you should all have the same food and drink, clothing and footwear, and that there should never be any difference in these things among you. But you will all use the same—I mean the superior, the steward, the ecclesiarch, those who are distinguished in age and virtue and in their exalted station in life, and those who are inferior to them in these matters. For you should only help and take care in every way of those who are clearly afflicted with illness, and for this reason perhaps need better food and drink to sustain their unfortunate bodies. For I think that this shows discernment and preserves the conscience of everyone else free of offense.

[= (22) Evergetis [27]]: The superior must do this also, that is, he should enter your cells once a month whenever he wishes, and if any have extra items, he should take them away and deposit them in the storehouse or give them to those in need.

46. Concerning the fact that they must not bathe.

[cf. (22) Evergetis [28]]: You should live completely without bathing, and the sick only must be comforted in this way.

47. Concerning how the officials must be installed.

[= (22) Evergetis [29]]: The installation of officials must take place in the manner of the steward's installation, that is, the keys should be placed before Christ or [St. John] the venerable Forerunner, and after a trisagion, the one who is being installed after the three required genuflections should take the keys from there with his own hands, then bow his head to the superior, and receive from him the blessing in the following words, "The favor of John, the venerable Forerunner and Baptist, through the prayers of the holy fathers appoints you steward" or this or that. However for the installations which do not involve keys, the kissing of the divine icon and the sphragis of the superior will be sufficient for the installation.

[= (22) Evergetis [30]]: It is fitting therefore that there should be three treasurers, of whom one should look after the sacred vessels and liturgical cloths and in short anything that is important, and he should be called the sacristan, the second should keep the money for expenditure, and the other one should distribute to the brothers necessities from the storehouse, I mean clothing and footwear etc., and see to the comfort of visiting brothers in their bedrooms as far as he is able. The common table of course will minister to their need for food to meet the occasion and the person.

48. Concerning the fact that there must be a disciplinary official in the monastery.

[= (22) Evergetis [31]]: It is necessary that there should be [p. 60] a disciplinary official observing the brothers both as they enter the church for the singing of psalms and as they gather for meals, and in the same way at every hour correcting any who sit down together without good reason and chatter idly or do nothing or do something improper and foolish, persuading them to go to their cells and devote themselves to prayer and handiwork.

Furthermore, there should also be a refectorian, attending to whatever the cellarer supplies him with, and going round the refectory at meal times reminding those brothers who are noisy perhaps or are whispering of the need for silence and that each of them should be reciting the fiftieth psalm in his mind. Also he should question visitors and sit them down at the table in a fitting position, and he should observe the entry of the brothers into the refectory and note which of them was absent during grace and which during the meal and report these to the superior. For he who does not do this will be punished as one who is not carrying out his office wholeheartedly.

[= (22) Evergetis [32]]: Naturally it is just to leave unchanged those who have been appointed to each of the offices while they are performing them in a careful and devout manner, but those who neglect or despise them and perhaps even behave deceitfully in them should be removed and others appointed. If one of these people were to appropriate something, anything at all, he will be answerable to our Lord Jesus Christ and his all-pure mother and to our lord, John the venerable Forerunner and Baptist, from whom in fact he received his keys, promising to carry out his office eagerly and without deceit.

[= (22) Evergetis [33]]: So I entreat the cellarers, the bakers, the cooks, those who look after the mules, those responsible for the dependencies, those acting as stewards in the monastery's properties, those sent to the City [of Constantinople], those going away elsewhere on the instruction of the superior or the steward, in short all those carrying out offices, to apply themselves to their offices wholeheartedly since they expect no small recompense from them. As regards those among them who are unlettered, the diligence and care they show in their office will be totally sufficient as their defense before God and us, but we exhort those who are educated but are perhaps prevented by the busy nature of their office from carrying out the daily cycle of prayers and from meeting with the brothers in the services not to be neglectful or despairing, as if they had lost the benefit to themselves, but be more cheerful and joyful because the Lord has given them the strength to serve their brothers in imitation of him, who says, "I came not to be served but to serve and to give my life as a ransom for many" (Matt. 20:28). [p. 61]

You see, my brothers, what work you perform? You see whom you imitate? You see that you are putting into practice the greatest of all good, love? Why then do you grieve and are sorrowful when you miss the service? Do you not think that you "are laying down your lives" (John 10:11, 15) for many like my Master, Christ, so that of course you may bring comfort to your brothers? So, you should be happy and rejoice because you yourselves are accomplishing each day by your work what could scarcely be achieved by those who devote themselves to prayer. You are blessed in that occupation and to be envied. For prayer is indeed a fine thing, a very fine thing, bringing us into contact with God and raising us from earth to heaven, but love is of course greater and much more important. For the former is a part of virtue and an element and section of the whole body of sanctification that brings perfection, but love is its crown and consummation. For joined to itself it displays humility that exalts (Matt. 23:12), mercy, and love of mankind, because of which God indeed became man and is called God, and through which man is revealed as God and like the Heavenly Father (cf. Matt. 5:48). So why do you give up the treasure house and culmination of all these good things and run to what is inferior and to the possession of one thing, when thus having reached the summit easily you should hold on to it securely and do everything so as not to be thrown down from it? "We are afraid," they say, "because of our failure to carry out the rule;" but do not be afraid, for sincere confession will make up to your failure in this, justly granting you pardon. Only let it not be a failure caused by indolence. Fear this, be on your guard against this; but if this is not the case, then rejoice, I beg you, attending to your offices wholeheartedly and eagerly. Those with offices who have been sufficiently advised by this will be devoted to their office and will carry it out well.

49. Concerning the sort of people who must be sent out to the properties of the monastery.

[= (22) Evergetis [34], ed. lines 1063–67]: Since then as a consequence of our weakness the emperor who long ago built this monastery also gained possession of some pieces of immovable property, some small worthless pieces of which are still left since many of them have previously been snatched away by different people, the superior must have concern for them also, and he should be as careful as he can as to what sort of people are sent to have the oversight of them, that is they should always be reverent and discreet, and elderly if possible, unaffected by passions because of the attacks of Belial (II Cor. 6:15).

50. Concerning the dead.

[= (22) Evergetis [34], ed. lines 1068–69]: Since we have now dealt in a fitting manner and at sufficient length about matters that concern the monastery, we will discuss therefore our fathers and brothers who have died. [= (22) Evergetis [35]]: It is fitting that we should celebrate with a feast the remembrance of our thrice-blessed and glorious father and founder Lord John⁶⁶ in a [p. 62] splendid manner and with the chanting of psalms all night. This falls on the 16th of December, and it will of course be celebrated without delay on that very day on which it falls, unless it is a Sunday. The sequence of psalms that will be sung will be that which you will find drawn up in the paper book.

In the same way [we will celebrate] the commemoration for the all-holy lord Luke, who was metropolitan of Mesembria and superior of this monastery, my holy father and sponsor.⁶⁷ If you wish to learn of the reward of his spiritual labor, endurance, humility, and infinite tears, approach his honored and holy relic in your sickness, and anointing yourselves with the oil from his lamp, you will realize the sweet fragrance and grace of healing which was given to him by God.

Furthermore, commemorations should take place every year for all those who have accomplished for the monastery something worthy of remembrance and have specified that they should be remembered by you, namely, those for sebastos lord Nikephoros Botaneiates⁶⁸ of blessed memory, who was son-in-law of the glorious lord Isaac Sebastokrator,⁶⁹ and when he put on the divine and angelic habit, changed his name to Neophytos. Similarly, those for sebaste lady Eudokia Komnene,⁷⁰ his wife, and their children, that is, their son and our fellow-brother the monk Ioannikios.⁷¹ Similarly, the commemoration for the holy despoina Lady Maria.⁷² Similarly, that for the most holy and ecumenical patriarch lord Nicholas [Grammatikos]. Along with him the commemoration for our benefactor lord Leo, son of Hikanatos, and his wife Anna and their children. Along with them, that for our beloved brother the chartouliarios lord Constantine, the nephew of the [metropolitan] of Zikchia. In addition to these also the commemoration for [the grandparents] and parents of me, the sinner. Their names are these, Nikephoros and the nun Theodoule, Christophoros and my sanctified mother the nun Maria, so that along with me they may find pity on the fearful day of judgment.

I instruct you in the Lord to carry out the commemorations of these people once a year, that is on the twenty-fourth of September. But then a second founder after God appeared for us, lady Eudokia Komnene, sebaste among sebastai and nun among nuns, the daughter of the glorious sebastokrator lord Isaac, who changed her name to Xene and often bestowed many gifts and acts of kindness on us and our monastery.

Furthermore just now, that is in the month of October of the seventh indiction and the six thousand six hundred and fifty-second year [1144 A.D.], she had given us and our monastery gold nomismata of [Constantine IX] Monomachos bearing crosses, weighing four litrai, for the [p. 63] acquisition by purchase of some immovable property, and we agreed to carry out each year on the first of January a personal night office and liturgy on behalf of her husband of blessed memory, and in the same way to carry out a personal night office and liturgy on the second of June on behalf of her son of blessed memory, the monk lord Ioannikios, and furthermore, in the case of herself, while she is still alive, to carry out a night office of intercession and liturgy on the twenty-second of November, and after her death to carry out the same things on the date of her death. In addition to this, [we agreed] to carry out a night office and liturgy on the Thursday of Meatfare week on behalf of all those who died before them, always at our own expense, [that is], the expenditure of our monastery.

I exhort you, brothers, those of you alive now and those who will come after us, that as long as our monastery exists they observe these instructions in such a way that they do not fall into condemnation as a result of transgression.

[= (22) Evergetis [36]]: [These things should be] equally [done] for those brothers whose names were and will be inscribed on the diptychs. In addition, whenever one of our brothers has recently died, he should be remembered during each service, and I mean during matins and the liturgy and vespers, in ekteneis until his commemoration on the fortieth day, during which also every day an offering will be made on his behalf. In addition to this the ecclesiarch must note down the commemorations of those who die so that you may not forget them and may perform them without fail.

Yet on this matter I must prescribe something more practical: for as the numbers of brothers dying increases, it is possible that sometimes the commemorations for three or four or even more will fall in the same week and it is necessary always to carry out the commemoration for each brother during the night offices, which are an obligatory duty for you each day, and chant the canon for the deceased. So that this may not happen, we command that, if some of the brothers should prefer to go away and chant the funeral canon, while the rest carry out that laid down for the night office of intercession, that should be carried out and is acceptable to us and, I think, to God. But if perhaps because of winter or even illness, that I may not mention laziness, you would not want to do this, then you must observe all the commemorations that you know occur together in one and the same week, and carry them all out for all of the people at the same time during one night office, unless there is a commemoration for one of your former superiors. For his commemoration must be carried out on its own, since he will be rendering account on behalf of you all. In that way you are satisfying your obligation to commemorate your brothers and you are not failing in the canon. So in both the night offices, and in the liturgies on their behalf, it is fine that commemorations should take place [p. 64] at the same time during one service as long as offerings are made for each one, and they should be carried out either as the priest officiating that day wishes or rather as he is able.

As regards the distributions at the gate on behalf of certain person, who as has been mentioned has left or will leave something worthy of remembrance to the monastery, on behalf of whom it has been or will be agreed that something be distributed for their commemoration, we urge that these be carried out generously.

However as regards the diptychs we command in the Lord both the priests themselves and the deacons to consult them at every liturgy in order to commemorate those who are listed on them, so that they themselves may not bear the accusation of having forgotten and neglected them. Enough has now been said also about these matters.

51. Concerning how those who are tonsured must be tonsured.

[= (22) Evergetis [37], ed. lines 1123–35]: I must speak also about those who are tonsured. If they are distinguished people or of people known to us for a long time and have a close knowledge of our way of life, when they have first read the procedure in this rule and have promised to observe everything drawn up in it without infringement, they should be tonsured within the customary period of time, if perhaps they themselves ask for this and are accepted. But if they are common and unknown, after an interval of seven days after their arrival here they should assume the [novice's] rags and put on the monastic headdress, and they should be appointed to tasks according to their abilities and observed to see if they carry out these with perseverance and humility. If they persevere in this attitude for three years, then they should be enrolled among the brothers after being tonsured and should receive the pledge of the divine and angelic habit. But if they perhaps appear to have grown tired, grumbling and being negligent about instructions, it will be the responsibility of the superior whether they should be accepted or not.

52. Concerning not receiving any monks from another monastery.

[= (22) Evergetis [37], ed. lines 1135–36]: Furthermore, you must take care that you do not in any circumstances accept any monks or unknown people coming from a different [monastery], observing also in this the tradition of the holy canons. But if you disregard this, you will suffer much grief and from this action there will come to you great harm and punishment of both a spiritual and physical kind.

53 [A]. Concerning the fact that no entrance offerings or renunciation offerings should be demanded from those being tonsured.⁷³

[= (22) Evergetis [37], ed. lines 1137–61]: Then those who have been judged worthy to be accepted should not be put under any compulsion concerning a renunciation and an entrance offering. For one must not [p. 65] traffic in the grace of God or sell it for money, lest shame and reproach is caused thereby to those among us who have been tonsured without payment, and lest that evil and accursed expression is introduced, that is, mine and yours and greater and smaller, and that the one who has made an offering is thought to be more important than the one who has not. May it not happen, may that not happen among you ever. But if the one who is to be tonsured himself willingly chooses to offer something, it should be accepted; for that is freely chosen and not forced, being the action of a pious mind in the category of almsgiving and doing good, and in exchange for God's recompense is to atone for his sins, and moreover that we might speak the truth, is brought as an offering to God and John our venerable patron, the Forerunner and Baptizer of God. For a renunciation and an entrance offering are one thing and a gift another, whether an act of almsgiving or an offering; for the former has within it the repayment of expectation and, like some necessity that has to be bought, is paid in advance for some agreements and exchanges perhaps stated, but the other is offered freely with heavenly hopes and recompenses.

Therefore the person who offers it must not suppose that he has any preference over the rest of the brothers because of this, but should be treated in the same way as every one and according to the rule of the monastery then in force. If someone who has made an offering is ever tempted by demons—there are many such examples of fickleness!—and tries to leave the monastery and would like to take his offering away with him, that should not be given him, whatever it happens to be. For what has once been consecrated to God must not be taken away, and he who takes it away is sacrilegious and everyone knows the sort of punishment that committing sacrilege brings, even if we do not say it.

Since we have mentioned parting and leaving caused by the devil, come now, let us say a few words to you, my beloved, about it, not words that come from our weak understanding, but those which our wise and great teacher spoke, Basil the revealer of heaven, in his own words as follows.⁷⁴

53 [B]. Concerning the fact that no one should depart from the monastery because of a chance difficulty.

Furthermore, it is necessary to be clearly convinced of this also, that the person who has once entered into a bond and relationship of a spiritual brotherhood could not cut himself free and separate himself from those with whom he was united. For in many instances if a person entered into an association in the material world, he would not be able to withdraw from it in contravention of the agreements, or if he did so, he would be liable to stated penalties. For the person who has entered into an agreement of spiritual companionship with those who have an eternal and unbreakable relationship, it would be much more impossible to separate and cut himself off from those with whom he was united, or if he did so, he would be subjected to the most serious divine penalties. For if a woman forming an association with a man and having a physical relationship with him is caught plotting against him, she is condemned to death, he who was united in a spiritual association (before the Spirit himself as witness and mediator) is much more liable in the case of separation.

As the limbs of the body which have been united together by a bond of nature could not be broken off from the body, and if they were broken, that broken piece would become dead, so also one practicing the religious life, being bound to a brotherhood by a bond stronger than that of nature and being held fast by a union of the spirit, would not have the power to cut himself free from those to whom he was united, or if he did so, he would be dead in his soul and would be deprived of the providence of the Spirit, as one who violated his agreement with him.

But if someone says that some of the brothers are worthless, since they render goodness ineffectual by negligence and disregard propriety and neglect the proper ascetic discipline, and for this reason it is fitting to separate oneself from such people, that reason for separation that he has thought [p. 66] up is not sufficient. For neither did Peter or Andrew or John break away from the rest of the band of the apostles because of the wickedness of Judas, nor did any other of the apostles make that a pretext for defection, nor was anyone hindered by [Judas'] wickedness in obeying Christ, but obeying the instructions of the Lord, they were zealous in their devotion and virtue, being in no way converted to [Judas'] wickedness. So he who says 'because of worthless people I am compelled to separate myself from the spiritual community' has not found a reasonable excuse for his own fickleness, but is himself rocky ground unable to nourish the word of truth through a very fickle mind, and, because of a small attack by some temptation or a loss of control over passions, he does not abide in a life of moderation, and the newly sprung-up shoot of instruction is immediately withered by the heat of his passions (cf. Matt. 13:5).

The pretexts he has mentioned are not sufficient as a defense at the judgment seat of Christ, since he [only] thinks in terms of his own satisfaction and is easily put off. For nothing is easier than to deceive oneself, since each judge favors himself, judging what is pleasant to be beneficial. So then such a person should be condemned by the judgment of the truth as being the cause of more people falling into sin, that is by his wicked example constantly provoking them to imitate him with equally outrageous actions. Being an heir to woe, "it would be better for him to have a great millstone fastened around his neck and be drowned in the depth of the sea" (Matt. 18:6). For if a soul becomes accustomed to defection, it becomes filled with a great lack of self-control, covetousness and gluttony, falsehood and all wickedness, and finally it brings itself to the abyss of wickedness being [p. 67] experienced in the worst evils.

So then, he who is the leader of such [temptations] should consider the destruction of how many souls he is responsible for, since he is not even able to render adequate accounts for his own soul (cf. Matt. 18:7). For why does such a person not rather imitate the great Peter and become an example for the rest of a secure faith and persistence in goodness, so that as the light of his achievements shines out, those who live in the darkness of wickedness may be guided to the higher life? Then Noah, the righteous man, did not say to God, 'I must leave the world since they are all wicked,' but persevered, struggling more nobly, and maintained an undisturbed devotion amid the depths of wickedness, and by endurance and patience amid the waves of impiety and lawlessness preserved an incorruptible virtue and was in no way caught by evils and plots, but amid people who murdered strangers and among much insolence and licentiousness, in accordance with the law of nature that was current, he hath kept his holiness unstained himself and instructed the rest of them by his actions, as was possible, rather than his words by demonstrating goodness.

But you put forward as an excuse your brothers' neglect of duty, whether real or invented by you, intending departure and devising the rejection of the Spirit and you make the slander of your brothers a veil for your own wickedness and reluctance to labor for virtue. So such a person should be brought to his senses by examples and be content with spiritual concord which he attached to himself in the first swaddling clothes of his heavenly conception. For if it were to happen that one of the fingers on your hand should suffer something painful now, the other one will not be anxious to be cut off, but it will at first beware of the pain from the cut, and then persevere firmly so as to offer to the body the use of the one which is at risk and that the hand should not be totally deprived of its natural branch and robbed of its own natural adornment.

So then, apply the example to the one practicing the religious life and observe how much disorder and pollution a separation causes to sensitive souls and how it proves the man himself to be a lifeless corpse. That the superior would not choose to lead his disciple into wickedness, with the result that the wicked conduct of his teacher is a reason for the disciple to depart and leave, to see if this is so, let us consider what a father and what a trainer [does]. Each of them prays and is zealous, the one for his boy and the other for his disciple. For it is natural for fathers to pray that their sons should become better people and very intelligent, very modest and well behaved, so that the boys may gain a good reputation and their fathers more honor, as their boys' good deeds reflect in them. Trainers are also keen that those who train under them should become very strong and skillful, so that with strength and experience [p. 68] they might compete expertly and be proved illustrious victors over their opponents, and their lawful competing might bring clear glory to their superiors.

It is natural for everyone who has chosen to teach to wish that his pupils reach the most accurate understanding of his teachings. So then since the nature of affairs has this basic principle, how would he who trains in holiness not pray that the one being trained by him might be shown to be most free of malice and prudent in terms of spiritual wisdom, although clearly knowing that, if his pupil is like that, then he will be honored among men and will receive glorious crowns from Christ, who made his servants, or rather his brothers, since he chose even this [relationship with us] (cf. Luke 8:21), worthy of fellowship with him through his care?

Consider another thing: if the pupil becomes bad because of his conduct, [the teacher] is disconsolately ashamed in the world and at the time of judgment and in the assembly and gathering of all peoples in the heavens. Not only is he ashamed, but he will be punished also. So how will it happen that the superior does not wish his own disciple to become well-behaved and gentle? In other ways also the wickedness of the pupil is unprofitable for the teacher. For since they each choose to live with each other, whatever wickedness the disciple takes part in he will give some of the fruits of this to his teacher first, as poisonous snakes which inject their poison first into those who annoy them, so that from every consideration it is clear to the trainer—both from the nature of things and from what is profitable—that he will pray and in every way take pains that the one who has been trained under him should be gentle and well-behaved. For if a trainer were a man of evil and wickedness, he would take pains to lead by every means those who are training with him to this end; but if a trainer is a man of virtue and righteousness, he would not choose, I think, that the goal for his disciple should turn out to be opposite to his own zealous efforts.

So then every pretext which the man has who wishes to cut himself off from a spiritual community is unreasonable, as has been said, and his reason for this decision has been revealed as his lack of control over his passions and his unsound and unstable judgment. For did he not hear from the prophet, "Blessed are they that keep justice" (Ps. 105 [106]:3), not they who are destroying it? These are the ones who are likened to fools [in the Gospel], who place the foundation of their spiritual dwelling on the sand of their mental instability, when a few showers of temptations and a short torrent of evil will undermine its basis breaking it up and scattering it (cf. Matt. 7:26–27).

Tell me, my brother, where is there no affliction? Where is there no toil? Do people in [p. 69] the world not toil? Do sailors who sail across the open sea not suffer shipwreck? Do soldiers not run risks in wars? How are we discouraged as if we are the only ones suffering affliction? People in the world toil in worldly matters, and again spiritual people are afflicted in spiritual actions; but “the grief of the world causes death,” (II Cor. 7:10) whereas grief concerning God causes repentance leading to everlasting life. So let us not be discouraged if we are afflicted. Our affliction will be turned into joy. Did you endure so many things and are now discouraged? Recollect that you renounced the world and your own wishes and [yet] you do not suffer words [of advice]. So are we slaves to our own bellies and our own wishes, and for this reason do you wish to depart from the monastery? Is this praiseworthy in us? Surely the enemy has not taken away the argument for humility of mind, and because of this he is rousing up the passions again strongly?

Do not be angry with me as I speak to you the words of truth; for I speak these things because I suffer for you. Where does the reason come from? In every case it is through food or through drink or through not suffering words [of advice]. You forfeited so much and you thought it dirt that you might gain Christ, and do you go on to sink your mind in your old passions again? Do you not hear what the apostle says, “Who shall separate us from the love of Christ? Shall tribulation, or distress, or persecution, or nakedness, or peril, or sword? As it is written, ‘For thy sake we are being killed all day long; we are regarded as sheep to be slaughtered.’ No, in all these things we are more than conquerors through him who called us. For I am sure that neither death, nor life, nor angels, nor principalities, nor powers, nor things present, nor things to come, nor height, nor depth, nor anything else in all creation will be able to separate us from the love of God in Christ Jesus Our Lord” (Rom. 8:35–39).

So then, my brother, consider the meaning of what has been said. For if we do not love self-control and we do not endure affliction and we do not cut out our own will, it is not possible for us to say with boldness, “Lo, we have left everything and followed you” (Matt. 19:27). Recollect what sort of person you were, when you arrived at the door of the monastery, fervent in the Spirit and in the fear of the Lord. But perhaps you wish to say, “These men destroyed my way of thinking.” Do you wish me to show to you that this reason arises from laziness? Lot was living among the people of Sodom and was not destroyed along with them, and Gehazi ministered to the prophet Elisha and he sinned. Similarly Samuel lodged with Eli and was reared with his children, and they fell into sin, but he was saved because he loved the Lord in truth.⁷⁵ Judas Iscariot followed the Lord with the disciples and yet he betrayed his Master and the “Lord of Glory” (I Cor. 2:8) into the hands of lawless men. Therefore let us not yield to the purpose of the enemy [p. 70] who is really putting forward specious excuses for the destruction of our souls. For we have models drawn from divine scripture for each of us to apply to ourselves whether we are living with righteous people or sinners. So then, if we live with righteous people, we will live in a righteous and holy way, but if with sinners, we will live so as not to imitate their deeds, but so that they may be drawn by us to the way of salvation, with grace as our fellow-worker. But if you wish to say, “I am weak and negligent,” let us listen to the divine scriptures and imitate the way of life of the divine fathers, so that our souls may be cured and we may not just feel compunction as we hear and a short time later act in a worse way. For the one who receives the word like that, will never bear fruit; for they have no root in themselves (cf. Matt. 13:21). “Every tree that does not bear good fruit is cut down and thrown into the fire” (Matt. 3:10).

TWELFTH CENTURY

As we are weak, let us listen to men who fear the Lord, who guide the soul to health, and let us not be like those who only wish to hear what matches their own wishes, so that we may not be miserable adhering to the argument of perversity. If you see a younger person trying to climb by his own wishes to heaven, detain him, for it is not to his benefit. This is true also with regard to a man who is old in years but juvenile in mind. For he says in Proverbs, “The ways of fools are right in their own eyes, but a wise man harkens to counsels” (Prov. 12:15). Let us listen also to the one who says, “You that are younger, be subject to the elders. Clothe yourselves, all of you, in humility, being subject to one another, for God opposes the proud, but gives grace to the humble” (I Pet. 5:5). For there are some who think that they are wise and do not think it right to be subject to those who are really wise and have a knowledge of God, whom the apostle calls empty talkers and deceivers saying, “there are subordinate men, empty talkers and deceivers” (Tit. 1:10).

Reason often suggests something secretly to a man, saying, “You are too young, you repent in your old age.” If he reaches old age, again it offers to him arguments, “Now that you are old, you need comfort.” As a result it is necessary, my beloved, to serve the Lord each day “with fear and trembling” (I Cor. 2:3). For who would tell us that we will grow old and that we will discover the correct way of thinking, if thereafter we neglect our own salvation? Let us listen to the Lord as he says, “Watch and pray, that you may not enter into temptation, for you know neither the day nor the hour” (Matt. 26:41; 25:13). We reckon the easy yoke of the Lord is heavy because of our laziness.

How many people in the world, my brother, do you think are deprived and have pledged their own children as securities? The [p. 71] children of other powerful people have fallen into captivity and have been sold into slavery and serve low-class people in a foreign land. Others are cast out as naked beggars in the squares and alleys of the city, afflicted by both the cold and the heat, and is it not a great thing for us that we have this shelter, which the Lord has bestowed on us, and freedom from anxiety about worldly matters? Let us remember these things and not reject the grace of God and his benefits, because he thought us worthy of his easy yoke (cf. Matt. 11:30).

But we also sought and he did not give to us; and who knows that this was not for our benefit? Let us say that. Is anyone of us not aware that he disobeyed the Lord himself and saw that the Lord was long-suffering? We will leave to the Lord the matter of the superiors. For we shall all stand at the judgment seat of Christ; for God does not pay deference to any man (cf. Luke 20:21). So get up and gird yourself, and do not cave in to arguments. Listen to the one who says, “Do not be overcome by evil but overcome evil with good” (Rom. 12:21). Woe to the sinner, my beloved ones. The “Lord of Glory” (I Cor. 2:8) endured so much for us, what can we offer to him in return for the sufferings which he endured for us?

Therefore let us fall down before him with the whole of our hearts, begging for patience from his loving-kindness, [for] “through many tribulations we must enter the kingdom” (Acts 14:22) of heaven. For the Savior said to his disciples, “You will be sorrowful but your sorrow will turn into joy. When a woman is in travail she has sorrow, because her hour has come; but when she is delivered of the child, she no longer remembers that hour, for joy that a child is born into the world. So you have affliction now, but I will see you again and your hearts will rejoice, and no one will take your joy from you” (John 16:20–22).

30. PHOBEROS

Therefore, my brothers, let us be patient, “bearing one another’s burdens” (Eph. 6:2). For what soldier seeing his comrade seized by the enemy does not struggle and fight against the enemy to rescue his comrade from the hands of those who have taken him prisoner? Whenever he is not able to rescue him, then he weeps and beats himself remembering his comrade. Are we not under a much greater obligation to lay down our lives for each other, since Our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ said, “Greater love has no man than this, that a man lay down his life for his friends?” (John 15:13)

My brothers, did you not promise to please Christ? If you do not bear the temptations and afflictions which are brought upon you by your enemies, and do not accept the admonitions and training from your superior or endure nobly, your promise has been proven false, as the apostle says, “If you are left without discipline, you are illegitimate children [p. 72] and not sons” (Heb. 12:8). Were you rebuked, were you reproached? Rejoice that you were rebuked, but also correct your error. Were you rebuked unjustly? Your reward is greater. For the apostles also when they were proclaiming salvation to the world city by city, when they were beaten as criminals they did not get angry, they did not become annoyed, but they rejoiced because they were thought worthy to suffer dishonor for the name of Christ. So you also rejoice, because you were thought worthy to suffer dishonor for the name of Christ.

But perhaps one of the more careless will say to me, “I am grieved because this has happened to me after so many labors.” Does this grieve you, O servant of the Lord? Then examine yourself to see whether you really conquered your passions after so many years, and whether you rejoiced when dishonor came upon you and whether you were not proud when glory came to you. “For if any one thinks he is something, when he is nothing, he deceives himself” (Gal. 6:3). For the test of the helmsman comes at the time of the storm. For the man who boasts and says, “I have lived the monastic life for so many years” and does not show his profession in operation or reveal the characteristics of the devout life as a result of his way of life, that man is carrying about the tools but has not yet learned the skill to use them.

Have you grown old in the [monastic] habit? Since you are experienced in the aforementioned life, be a model for the young and inexperienced. But if you are a neophyte, be subject to your elders. For the soldiers of the earthly emperor are subject to their superiors and leaders; ought you not be subject much more, not only because of envy but also for conscience’s sake? For if they who serve in a physical army show the utmost eagerness to serve their superiors, how is it that we, who rejected life itself, continue to be subject to these passions and to repudiate the discipline in Christ, and demand the glory and praise of perfect anchorites, but run away from the labors from which honors come? Why do we allow all this tranquility and struggle to be destroyed in one hour? For if we kill ourselves, who is going to pity us? Is this our praise? This is our test, so that when a small affliction comes, are we to be compelled nearly to renounce the habit itself and disown the angelic life and through our laziness arm the enemy against us?

Do not, my brothers, do not offer your backs to the enemy, but resist and wage the war and he will flee from you. For I reckon that the one who undertook your leadership does not rejoice at your disgrace, since he is going to render account to the Lord on your behalf. So come to yourselves, beloved ones, and “return to your rest” (Ps. 114 [116]:7). Put on the breastplate of faith and the helmet of salvation, and take up the sword of the Holy [p. 73] Spirit, which is the word of God (cf. Eph. 6:14–17).

Be a model of gentleness to your brothers who are of the same spirit. Your senior brothers will admire your endurance. Let the Holy Spirit which dwells within you rejoice at your bravery. But if you do not put up with a small temptation, how will you endure a great one? If you do not defeat a child, how will you overthrow a grown man? If you do not endure a word, how are you to bear a blow? If you do not bear a slap in the face, how will you endure the cross of Christ? If you do not endure the cross of Christ, how will you become joint heirs of heavenly glory with those who say, “All this has come upon us, though we have not forgotten thee, or been false to the covenant” (Ps. 43 [44]:17), and again, “For thy sake we are being killed all day long; we are regarded as sheep to be slaughtered” (Rom. 8:36). If you did not strive with these people nor share in their labor, how will you enjoy the everlasting life with them? Run, my brothers, run [the race]. Hurry, that you may be crowned by Christ Our God and live forever and ever with him in the kingdom of heaven. So much concerning those who try to leave the monastery and the brotherhood and put forward vain and false excuses.

54. Concerning the fact that a distribution must take place at the gate, and that strangers and sick people must be visited.

[= (22) Evergetis [38], ed. lines 1164–84]: You must observe closely what we will say since it will bestow on you much benefit and salvation. What is this? It is the distribution at the gate and the comforting and visiting of strangers and the sick in which we recommend therefore that you comfort stranger brothers and provide whatever care you can to those among them that are sick and confined to bed. As you know that I do this, so you do it also. Clothe and give footwear to those who are naked and unshod using your old tunics and footwear, distributed not by you yourselves—for we do not permit that—but by the superior. I say that you should feed the hungry and refresh them, as we said, with bread and wine and some legumes, those that are excess to your needs. For then you will have a much greater reward whenever you do this from your lack, for what a person can do is dear to God, and you should bury those who die. But you should not bury them simply nor in any haphazard fashion but first the burial chants are to be sung by you and they should receive the other care, to put it simply, to show our stranger brothers complete joyfulness so that we may receive from God joyful and abundant mercy on their behalf. [p. 74]

55. Concerning the fact that women must not visit the monastery unless they are people well known for their way of life and virtue.

[= (22) Evergetis [38], ed. lines 1184–91]: For we do not wish anyone to return from our gate empty-handed, except a woman. For they should not receive a share, not that we hate our fellow human beings, certainly not, but we fear harm from that quarter, in case if a habit was generally accepted they would visit the gate more frequently and would be found to be the cause of evil rather than good to those ministering. If however there is a general distribution, as at the feast of the Beheading of our patron, the venerable Forerunner, and at different commemorations of the dead, giving also to women should not be prevented. For this occurs rarely and does not cause any harm.

[= (22) Evergetis [39]]: We wished and desired the monastery not to be entered and to be completely impassable to women, but the nobility of many and the fact that it was not possible to send them away easily prevented us giving this order. Therefore, as many as are well known for their way of life and virtue, their nobility and eminence, may come in but very rarely and carefully and, if possible, unexpectedly, so that in that way we may be able to preserve our respect for them and maintain freedom from harm for ourselves.

[= (22) Evergetis [41], ed. lines 1248–50]: Seeing that I have already spoken a few things before about our sick brothers assigning all their care to the discretion of the superior, I must discuss them at greater length.

56. Concerning the comfort of sick brothers.

[= (22) Evergetis [41], ed. lines 1250–69]: Therefore we order that a cell be set aside for the sick as an infirmary, and four beds for their rest and comfort, and one brother to minister to them in every way. There should also be a large stove on which their food should be cooked, hot drinks prepared and everything else required for their comfort. Their care should not be carried out in a perfunctory manner but as well as possible with regard to food and drink and other necessities. For I know from the benefits conferred on me by God that he will never overlook the request of his servants who beseech him night and day, but he will hear and send a doctor who will bring them relief. The Holy God provides them with healing and a remedy through the intercessions of our lord and patron, John the venerable Forerunner and Baptist, and through the mediation of our benefactor, St. Symeon the Wonderworker.

The superior should call at the infirmary neither rarely nor as an extra, but should visit the brothers, if he is able, almost every hour and in a wholehearted manner, and bring the things that each one needs. But our sick brothers emboldened by this should not cast off self-restraint by seeking for extra things and things which perhaps they have never even heard of much less seen [p. 75] and eaten, but they should restrain and control themselves, being satisfied only with those things which the circumstance of the season and the resources of the monastery provide for them. For if we command that they be cared for because of the [divine] commandment, yet we do not allow them to give themselves airs but live in a more restrained manner, and as monks ought, so that they may receive from God the reward of their endurance, which the deprivation of their desires and the unpleasantness of their sickness is going to secure for them.

Therefore when I have mentioned one thing I will cease my discourse. What is this thing? It is something which is greater than all evils and their chief, and one which causes great harm to our souls, or to put it more strongly, also to our bodies, and throws the whole brotherhood into confusion both as regards our wonderful way of life and the tranquility of our souls dwelling on this mountain.

TWELFTH CENTURY

57. Concerning the fact that they should have no female animals at all.

We give this instruction from the Lord God, that you should never possess female animals inside or outside the monastery, neither oxen, nor sheep, nor anything else of that kind. For [this] has been forbidden to all those who conduct their lives in God's way and renounce the affairs of [this] life. Moreover you should only have male animals for the grinding of your bread, and very few of these, and two male oxen, that is one yoke, and no more, to work for you. For since I have had experience of the harm and damage, both spiritual and physical, that come from them, I am arranging for you to escape from their error and deceit, so that you may not be grieved as I was, and incur great damage and no benefit because of them. But if you disobey me, then you will remember and against your will you will call me blessed whenever you do not reap any benefit from them, but rather physical and spiritual damage, disturbances and confusion.

For I trust in God and in our founder, John the venerable Forerunner and baptizer of God, that if you adhere to poverty and monastic destitution and dwelling on this holy mountain and serve God properly according to his commands and as I have ordered you, you will never grieve for any of your necessities, but you will enjoy from the merciful God whatever you need for the maintenance of your miserable bodies richly and to a greater degree than all those who possess vain and wealthy possessions, as my Savior himself says through the holy gospel, "Therefore do not be anxious saying, 'What shall we eat?' or 'What shall we drink' or 'What shall we wear?'" For the [p. 76] gentiles seek all these things, and your heavenly father knows that you need them all. But seek first the kingdom of God and his righteousness, and all these things will be yours as well. Therefore do not be anxious about tomorrow, for tomorrow will be anxious for itself" (Matt. 6:31-34).

These things are true and happen, my beloved brothers, to those who trust wholeheartedly and are not lacking in faith, who offer their souls and bodies to God who formed them and seek him night and day, as I the sinner have realized from actions themselves and have been convinced by the countless benefits that come to me every day from God. For have confidence in me as someone deranged and yet telling the truth, that often when I, the [most] unworthy one in heaven and earth, was wandering on this mountain and beseeching the mercy of the Lord to find some small drop of salvation and pardon for my many and innumerable sins which I committed in both ignorance and full knowledge, great consolation, or rather, if I must speak more truly, divine illumination and fearful miracles were granted to my weakness by John, my Lord and the venerable Forerunner and wonderful Baptizer of Christ our God.

Therefore, I exhort and beg you not to reside in vain on this mountain, because this mountain is very beneficial for those who wish to be saved. For if someone calls this mountain Horeb (Ex. 3:1-4:18) and Mount Carmel (3 Kings 18:19-39) or Mount Sinai (Ex. 19:3-20:26), mountain of miracles, or Tabor, the mountain on which Christ my God revealed to his holy disciples and apostles the surpassing splendor of his divinity (Matt. 17:1-9), he will not fall short of what is proper. If you reside on this holy and wonderful mountain and lay to heart what has been said, you will bear fruit thirty-fold and sixty-fold and a hundred-fold (Matt. 13:8), being far away from the crafty serpent, fornication and the other foul passions, which it is disgraceful [for me] to mention in detail and for you to hear.

Through the Lord do not grow weary in carrying out, each Saturday or at the time of leavening [the dough for the bread], the holy command of our divine father the miracle-worker which was handed on to you concerning the trisagion of the grain and leaven, when the priest must say in the granary, “Lord Jesus Christ, our God, who blessed the five loaves and fed the five thousand (Matt. 14:19–21), bless this corn and increase it in this thy holy monastery and for thy whole world, because all our hope is in thee and we entreat thee hoping for our daily bread from thee. Do not overlook us sinners. For thou hast said, ‘Whatever you [p. 77] ask in my name, you will receive’ (John 14:14; 16:24). Thy word is ‘Be fruitful and multiply’ (Gen. 1:28). Therefore having confidence in the mercy of thy compassion we entreat thee, do not abandon us, but look from thy holy dwelling, from the glorious throne of thy kingdom and give to us sinners and thy servants our daily bread, by the intercessions of our all-pure Lady, the Mother of God and ever-virgin Mary, and of the holy and glorious prophet, [St. John] the Forerunner and Baptist, and of our holy father, Symeon the miracle-worker, and of all thy saints, because thou art the one who blesseth and halloweth everything, and we offer up glory to thee, the Father and the Son and the Holy Spirit, now and always and for ever and ever. Amen.”

30. PHOBEROS

58. Concerning whether boys are to be accepted into the monastery or not.

Since it is necessary to make a regulation for you about whether boys or beardless youths are to be accepted into this monastery or not, I considered it important to commend to you on this subject all the things I have received from experience itself and from our luminaries, the holy fathers. So then it is my wish and is in accordance with the instructions of the saints that beardless youths should not be accepted, so that you may be free and untroubled by the harm that comes upon you from them.

But if the superior is obliged from time to time either for service or for the comfort of the old to accept some such person, when perhaps the brothers are hard pressed and do not have people to minister to them, I give you the instruction that these should reside on the estate of the monastery, which is called St. Peter and surnamed Chalkeion, but called locally Panteichion, and minister to the brothers until they grow a beard, and then they should be accepted into the monastery along with the fathers.⁷⁶ For otherwise it is not a good thing that such persons should spend their time with the old men inside the monastery, but it is very harmful in many ways.

If there are some who disagree and say that such persons do not cause harm especially in the mountains, they talk foolishly. For whatever [reason] they put forward is invalid and feeble. If they wish to say something to them for their help and study and instruction when the spiritual war caused by those persons begins and for support and protection of those who are obliged to live with such persons, come now, let us set out something for them.⁷⁷

Those who say that they associate with women and children [p. 78] and are not harmed in their souls by this pleasure but are greatly strengthened and face with resistance the temptations of fornication and the titillations of the flesh are entirely possessed by the deceit of demons.

For the stratagems and devices of the devil are many, as the blessed apostle Paul says (cf. Eph. 6:11), and one of two explanations apply. Either such people are foolish and inexperienced in the evil and devious nature of our unseen enemies, or in reality they are fond of pleasure and are subject to their passions, and with an appearance of reverence and chastity they satisfy their vanity and desire for popularity, while they secretly engage in much evil and lawless pleasure, and will be counted with fornicators and adulterers and sodomites and will be punished with them on the day of judgment, even if, as they say, they carry out nothing shameful that causes harm to their bodies. For if he who has looked on a woman to desire her has committed adultery already with her in his heart (cf. Matt. 5:28), it is much more the case with the one who associates with younger males, whether he is an old man or a younger man in the prime of life and at the height of his powers and seething with fleshly passion.

For we have known some who were really faithful men and powerful warriors in spiritual action, poor and strong and vigorous, knowing how to wrestle and box with demons that opposed them, keeping vigils and fasting and drinking [only] water and being satisfied with only a mat to sleep on, having many accomplishments and praying constantly, and because they were tempted regarding their own mothers and sisters and brothers and their own young sons, they were compelled by the pleasure loving spirits of impurity to carry out the madness of their evil desire and after this they confessed these actions openly with tears, striking themselves and shouting, “We have sinned, we have transgressed, we were possessed by demons.” For the desire of the flesh is truly a mighty and lawless demon and pleasure is bitter and destructive.

We have known and seen monks because of this renounce the holy habit and wreck themselves in countless disgraceful actions. History also has handed down monks of Mesopotamia suffering this and Cilicians and monks from Asia and Pontos and Egypt and Thessalians and Greeks and Arabians and Persians and so forth. But be aware of the cleverness, but more so of the wickedness of the demon of fornication. For it goes away for a time and deadens the body so that it is not tested by fire, and it stops [p. 79] the stirrings of passion and makes the one who is being deceived to think that he has reached the heights of tranquility and that he was thought worthy of the rank of the apostles and that he will be taken up to the heavens in the future like Elijah in a fiery chariot (4 Kings 2:11–12).

They also make him instruct many people and boast and speak proudly and reproach those who lapse into pleasures, and condemn those who commit fornication, and be arrogant and boast of the great deeds of his religious devotion, and scorn his brothers as soft and feeble with no act of spiritual excellence. But after all that, when some time has gone by, suddenly the demon of fornication attacks the brother who has gone astray, even if he has kept himself chaste, and alters his mind inclining it to disgraceful pleasure, compelling his lower nature to boil as if for an abominable action that brings harm to his soul, and slackens the cords of his purpose and inflames his limbs with the impure fire of passion and destroys all the strength of the man and turns his whole disposition towards what is blameworthy and worse, and shows that the man who previously seemed to be righteous and holy and a follower of the life of devotion is like a pig rolling in mud and clearly is worse than the people who openly and publicly commit fornication in the market place.

Then he realizes from where and to where he has fallen, and so he says, “‘I am come into the depths of the sea and the storm’ of my passion ‘has overwhelmed me’ (Ps. 68 [69]:2–3); ‘my wounds grow foul and fester because of my foolishness’ (Ps. 37 [38]:5). Now I truly know that I am not perfect or intelligent nor am I experienced in the tricks of the devil and demons, but foolish and senseless and simple-minded.” Therefore he cries out, “‘Oh God, thou knowest my foolishness; my transgressions are not hidden from thee’ (Ps. 68 [69]:5). For what was considered my righteousness has in my folly been counted as the rag of a menstrous woman” (cf. Is. 64:6).

I say these things not as one who is righteous or virtuous but as a sinner who has been instructed by the holy fathers, men of great experience able to resist the devices of the enemy. Since the devil knows that the monk embraces piety and purity of life above everything and wishes to live always in purity and the fear of God, for this reason Satan, opposing and resisting this inclination of the monk, troubles and confuses and defiles him in wicked desires and in unhealthy and strange pleasures— not only when the faces of people are seen [p. 80] in the flesh but also when they are not seen—by an invisible disturbance in the soul and by the action of the bodily emotions, tempting and afflicting and defiling the person who is striving with filthy dreams at night and during the day in his thought and through the temptations of the flesh and the mad desire for wickedness.

Sometimes the demon of blasphemy also runs to join the fray alongside the demon of impurity, so that it throws the one practicing the religious life into a state of hopelessness and despair. Therefore we should be on our guard against the devices and stratagems of the crafty and cunning demon. Let us instruct ourselves that whenever we meet a handsome face, whether they are our brothers or members of our own family, not to look clearly at the handsome face, but to speak looking down at the ground and in that way answer those who speak with us. For the eye of a man is like a shameless dog running in a frenzy over the faces of those it sees, and always the demons use this weapon against us as they also use the hand. For in the beginning Eve first saw the beauty of the tree, then in her desire grasped in her hand and ate of the forbidden fruit, and after that she was stripped of innocence and righteousness and was cast down to death and destruction.

So that you may appreciate and understand what is being said more precisely, take heed of what will now be said. For a number of years ago a certain eunuch named Eutropios, a secretary of Jouliane of Plakis,⁷⁸ the wife of Areobindos the general,⁷⁹ renounced the world and became a monk, and taking the second tower which was built by Elias the archbishop of Jerusalem,⁸⁰ he lived in it and gathered together a community of eunuch monks not far from Jericho. So then this Eutropios after many years made confession with repentance and in affliction said, “A certain man of Jericho, noble and wealthy, became my friend and brought offerings to my monastery and often ate with me. When a son was born he begged me,” he said, “to act as his sponsor at holy baptism; and this I did. So the man always brought the child to me, and I used to receive the infant happily with joy and a pure heart in the sincerity of my soul, and I kissed it and embraced it as a child given to me by God through the holy baptism in the Holy Spirit. But when the child had grown and was about ten years old, my thoughts changed for the worse and my state of mind changed to evil. I suffered distress and was driven to a loathsome [p. 81] desire and the ferocity of the wicked desire and pleasure in my heart was burning me up.”

It is not an amazing thing that a eunuch should feel desire. For Scripture says, “It is the lust of a eunuch to deflower a virgin” (Sir. 20:4). For not only does a eunuch feel desire, but he can also sleep with a woman and have intercourse and produce an emission, except however the eunuch produces weak seed and cannot beget children. Do not be shocked as you hear about the eunuch. For Satan often encourages a woman to desire a woman, and for that reason reverent mothers superior of communities instruct the nuns under them not to gaze at each other's faces simply and naturally, lest through the act of seeing they should slip into passion and harm, but to lower their eyes and look at the ground and in that way speak virgin to virgin.

"So then," said Eutropios, "I, having changed in appearance and becoming completely obsessed with my filthy passion, wished to have intercourse with the child and be united with him to my personal disgrace. But I beseeched God to hinder me and I said, 'Lord My God, send instead fire from above and burn me up and do not allow me to carry out this foul deed.' God granted that I should come to my senses a little and raise myself from the mud and darkness of my irrational desire. I said to the father of the child, 'Take him and go away to your house and do not bring him to my monastery anymore.'

So from that moment I never saw the boy. But when the enemy realized that, he attacked me more vigorously and more intensely and more bitterly and impressed on my mind the form of the boy and stuck his likeness and appearance and image on my heart. Under the constraint I did not have the power to tear myself away and cut myself off from the utterly foul and serpent-like passion, but even while I was praying and singing and keeping vigil and reading I had the wicked one who binds hand and foot working inside me, the demon of disgraceful desire plundering me and torturing me with passion and subduing me utterly.

I fasted, I was austere with my wretched body. I wept, I groaned, I gnashed my teeth as I howled, I struck my head with my fists. I beat my feet with a rod in anger and the evil did not go away, but the part of my body was even more inflamed and rose up and let fall drops of filth so that my thighs were [p. 82] defiled with impure moisture.

Therefore, after a long time had passed like this, when I was in despair and thought I no longer found mercy, against expectation the God of all stooped to have mercy on me. He looked with favor on the humility of my soul and removed from me that dark cloud, and released me from the pernicious temptation. Gaining refreshment in that way, I thanked and [still] thank and until my death will thank Christ our God."

Therefore let what happened to Eutropios the eunuch, the priest and superior, be instruction for those who say, "We sleep with women and live with children and are not harmed."

With women and children! What am I saying? Sometimes we are tempted with regard to irrational animals themselves, and this we know from many who have made confession to us and from the story which will now be told.

Once the priest of [the monastery] of Kellia⁸¹ traveled from the mountain of Nitria riding on a female donkey and sent it back again with his own disciple, and along the way the devil tempted him with regard to the female donkey and seven times tempted him to sin with it. The brother in his struggle prayed and was uplifted and by doing so he gave back the donkey and returned to his father with a disturbed face. But the old man had second sight and saw seven crowns on his head. The brother prostrated himself to the old man saying, "Pray for me because I have fallen into immorality," and he reported to him how the devil tempted him with regard to the female donkey on the road. The old man said to him, “Have courage, my child, because I saw seven crowns on your head when you came. For you were not defeated in so far as you did not accomplish the sin but rather were victorious. For the struggle is great whenever a man has a good opportunity and [yet] practices self-restraint, and this action carries a great reward, as in the case of the great champion, Joseph of blessed memory.”⁸²

Therefore hearing all these things, my fathers and brothers, let us pay close attention to how we walk our road following God and how we live with our younger brothers, lest we find ourselves instead in the harbor of the devil, a prey and delight to our enemies, the demons I mean, who never cease tempting us. “We know that our old self was crucified with him, so that the sinful body might be destroyed, and we might no longer be enslaved to sin. For he who has died is freed from sin. But if we have died with Christ, we believe that we shall also live [p. 83] with him. For we know that Christ being raised from the dead will never die again. Death no longer has dominion over him. The death he died he died to sin, once for all, but the life he lives he lives to God. So you also must consider yourselves dead to sin and alive to God in Christ Jesus Our Lord. Let not sin therefore reign in our mortal bodies, to make us obey their passions. Do not yield your members to sin as instruments of wickedness, but yield yourselves to God as men who have been brought from death to life, and your members to God as instruments of righteousness. For sin will have no dominion over you” (Rom. 6:6–14).

“Do you not know that if you yield yourselves to anyone as obedient slaves, you are the slaves of the one whom you obey, either of sin, which leads to death, or of obedience, which leads to righteousness?” (Rom. 6:16) “For just as you once yielded your members” as slaves “to impurity, so now yield your members” as slaves “to righteousness for sanctification” (Rom. 6:19). The end of sin is death, but the free gift of God is eternal life (cf. Rom. 6:21–22). “For God has not called us for uncleanness, but in holiness” (I Thess. 4:7–8). So then the one who rejects does not reject man but God, who gave his Holy Spirit to us. So then these are our wishes and are acceptable to John the venerable Forerunner and Baptist and to God, and they are greatly beneficial for your help.

59. Summary in abridged form of everything that has been said above.

[= (22) Evergetis [42], ed. lines 1272–91]: In the future it will be your concern to maintain them unbroken and unchanged always. By this I mean:

1. To carry out completely in all the services the canonical procedure handed on to you.
2. To preserve the fasts that have been handed on to you, as we have received them from the holy fathers and as they are set out here, with much eagerness and a fervent heart, and
3. To preserve loyalty and honor which is due your superiors.
4. To love one another, to be keen each of you to surpass each other in humility, to labor with one another in everything as the limbs of one body and “to complete what is lacking” (Col. 1:24) in one another.

5. Not to stir up quarrels nor form improper friendships nor cause schisms and breakaway services.

6. To refrain from claiming the seat of honor and worldly preferments, from feasting and sitting together and meetings and conversations, but to look to one thing only, that is to live and conduct yourselves virtuously and breathe in nothing else, if possible, than the word of salvation and everything that is for the edification and benefit of your soul. [p. 84]

7. Furthermore, to banish from you the source of all evils, I mean the love of money, and the filching of the monastery's possessions or in any other way at all to set aside and store up anything whatsoever which the superior has not approved nor the rule given you has allowed, not only that but as a result of carelessness or some other act of disregard to allow something belonging to the monastery to disappear. For that is the same as the former case, even if it seems to be somewhat different, and brings the same liability in the presence of God.

8. Similarly you must root out familiarity as much as possible and, that I may be brief, banish everything that does not lead to salvation. If you are wronged by someone, never go to court but flee from this as one flees from a snake, observing in this matter the command of Our Lord which says, "If anyone strikes you on the right cheek, turn to him the other also; and if anyone would sue you and take your coat, let him have your cloak as well; and if anyone forces you to go one mile, go with him two miles" (Matt. 5:39–41). Again he says, "Love your enemies, bless those who curse you, treat well those who hate you and pray for those who abuse and persecute you, so that you may be sons of our Father who is in heaven" (Matt. 5:44–45). But in humility approach the one who is doing wrong and beseech him saying what is proper, and if he ceases from his wrongdoing, thanks is due to God; but if not, refer this matter to God and he will do what is beneficial to you and "He will not let you be tempted beyond your strength" (I Cor. 10:13).

But observe this also, [namely] not to possess female animals either inside or outside the monastery, but maintain a life of poverty and quiet and in that action strive to toil in a pursuit in which you enjoy tranquility not disturbances and distractions.

You should be eager to serve everyone as far as you are able and provide your own food from the work of your hands, and do not refuse to minister to each other both in the cooking of your food and in the refectory in imitation of Christ.

As each of you has the strength and upbringing and way of life and education and as you choose in your heart, carry out what is beneficial to your souls. Do not grow weary. Let the weak [among you] serve on fast days, and the strong ones on the remainder. For God loves a cheerful and eager servant, (cf. II Cor. 9:7) but he turns away from the servant who is lazy and slothful and does not serve with wholehearted eagerness, and in his work is not pleasing either to God or men.

[= (22) Evergetis [42], ed. lines 1292–1305]: So, my children and brothers, let us in no way prefer the things that harm, and pass by those that bring salvation; for nothing of what has been handed on to you is impossible or hard [p. 85] to accomplish. But if one of these [instructions] were to be thought of as such, yet let us strive, let us persevere, let us endure, let us bear it nobly, let us force ourselves a little. For we did not abandon the world for indulgence and luxury, but for exertion and to strive as much as we could to gain the good things that were promised.

Therefore let us force ourselves, let us force ourselves, as has been said, “for the kingdom of heaven has suffered violence, and men of violence take it by force” (Matt. 11:12). No one has ever gained a triumph by being careless, no one has triumphed over his enemy by sleeping and dreaming. Crowns and triumphs belong to those who run well, strive, toil, persevere in the labors of battles. “Through many tribulations,” the Lord says. “you must enter the kingdom” of heaven (Acts 14:23). “If anyone of you teaches otherwise and does not agree with these sound words of Our Lord Jesus Christ and the teaching which accords with godliness,” according to the apostle he is to be called antichrist by you. For such a man “is puffed up with conceit, he knows nothing; he has a morbid craving for controversy and for disputes about words, which produce envy, dissension, slander, base suspicions, and wrangling among men who are depraved in mind and bereft of the truth, imagining that godliness is a means of gain. There is great gain in godliness with contentment. For we brought nothing into the world, and it is certain that we cannot take anything out of the world. But if we have food and clothing, with these we shall be content. But those who desire to be rich fall into temptation, into a snare, into many senseless and hurtful desires that plunge men into ruin and destruction. For the love of money is the root of all evils. It is through this craving that many have wandered away from the faith” and their profession “and pierced their hearts with many pangs. But as for you,” my brothers, “shun all this; aim at righteousness, godliness, faith, love, steadfastness, gentleness. Fight the good fight of faith; take hold of the eternal life to which you were called when you made the good confession in the presence of many witnesses” (I Tim. 6:7–12).

For “I know” this, that after my departure from the body, “fierce wolves will come in among you, not sparing the flock; and from among your own selves will arise some speaking perverse things, to draw away” the weaker ones among you “after them. Therefore be alert, remembering that I did not cease night or day to admonish every one” of you “with tears. And now I commend you,” my brothers, “to God and to the word of his grace, which is able to build you up and to give you inheritance among all those who are sanctified. [p. 86] I coveted no one’s silver or gold or apparel” (Acts 20:29–34). The Lord God is my witness, nor [did I covet] this or that, as you yourselves know. But instead of all the corruptible and earthly things, I preferred what was heavenly, and I chose to have you as my consolation and crown and boast, knowing clearly that through your holy prayers I will find a small relief and pardon for my many and innumerable sins on the fearful day of judgment.

For this reason I endured all affliction and confinement living on this mountain, and “I have shown you all that by so toiling you must help the weak and remember the words of the Lord, which he said, ‘It is more blessed to give than to receive’” (Acts 20:35). Behold, “in the presence of God who gives life to all things, and of Christ Jesus who in his testimony before Pontius Pilate made the good confession, I charge you to keep the commandments” and the traditions set out here and handed on to you “unstained and free from reproach until the appearing of your Lord Jesus Christ; and this will be made manifest at the proper time by the blessed and only sovereign, the King of Kings, the Lord of Lords, who alone has immortality and dwells in unapproachable light” (I Tim. 6:13–16).

[= (22) Evergetis [42], ed. lines 1305–11]: Yes, I beseech you all to “lead a life worthy of your calling” (Eph. 4:1), “present your bodies holy to the Lord” (cf. Rom. 12:1), “love one another” (John 15:12), “run well the race that is set before you” (cf. Heb. 12:1). Whatsoever is good, whatsoever is beloved of God, consider these things (cf. Phil. 4:8). Do not fail to do the things “you have heard and learned” (Phil. 4:9). My brothers, “the appointed time has grown very short” (I Cor. 7:29). Remember your souls and our insignificance, do not forget us in your prayers.

[= (22) Evergetis [43]]: I instruct you to read the present typikon at the beginning of each month during your mealtimes, until it is finished, to remind you of your instructions and for the benefit of your souls. For in that way you will be convinced about your own salvation, if you have kept well what you received from our fathers and are paying back to me in the Lord my wages for rearing you with this spiritual upbringing and instruction.

“The God of peace who called us to his eternal life and glory” (Heb. 13:20–21) through his great and unspeakable goodness confirm and strengthen you in his holy will through his only-begotten Son Our Lord God and Savior Jesus Christ and the All-Holy Life-giving Spirit, to whom belong all glory, honor, worship, and majesty now and always and for ever and ever. Amen.

+ Since among all those who joined in working and toiling in our monastery the most illustrious benefactor lord Thomas Eugeniotes established and completed a great deal in it, both in the building of the church and in all kinds of other matters in our monastery and still even now does not cease working and ministering each day as one of the monks in the monastery, and seeing that he was counted as the spiritual child of our glorious father and founder, it is reasonable that this man’s name has been inscribed on the present typikon of the monastery, so that he may be numbered with the others who have been inscribed here and those set out on the holy diptychs of the monastery, and may be remembered with God’s help for as long as this monastery of ours is preserved.+

+ Makaria + Nicholas and Anna
[may also be remembered]

Notes on the Translation

1. Theodore (†844) and Theophanes (†845) Graptos; see Theophanes Continuatus, Chronographia, ed. I. Bekker, CSHB (Bonn, 1838), pp. 104–6, and Theodore’s Vita in PG 116, cols. 653–84.
2. Simonides, Fr. 5 [4]:5.
3. Cf. Pseudo-Basil, Constitutiones asceticae 4.2, PG 31, col. 1349B.
4. Cf. Pseudo-Nilos, De octo vitiosis cogitationibus, PG 79, col. 1456D.
5. Pseudo-Nilos, De octo vitiosis cogitationibus, PG 79, col. 1457B.
6. Pseudo-Athanasios, Epist. ad Castorem II, PG 28, cols. 900C, 900D–901A.
7. There are two Chapters Eight due to a mistake in numeration; they are distinguished here as [A] and [B].
8. Pseudo-Basil, Constitutiones asceticae 12, PG 31, col. 1376AB.
9. Unidentified quotation.
10. Pseudo-Athanasios, Syntagma doctrinae ad monachos, PG 28, col. 840A.
11. C. Nicaen. I, c. 20 (R&P 2.162–63).

30. PHOBEROS

12. C. Trull. (692), c. 90.
13. Basil of Caesarea, Regulae fusius tractatae 26 ([LR 26]), PG 31, col. 985CD.
14. John Klimakos, Scala paradisi 4, PG 88, cols. 681B, 705C.
15. Canones Apostolorum 69 (R&P 2.88).
16. Fast of the Holy Apostles: from Monday after the feast of All Saints (Sunday after Pentecost) through the vigil of the feast of Sts. Peter and Paul, June 28.
17. Palladios, Historia Lausiaca, PG 34, col. 1148B.
18. C. Gangra, c. 12 (R&P 3.115).
19. Epiphanius, Adversus haereses 3.22, PG 42, col. 828A.
20. Pseudo-Athanasios, Syntagma doctrinae ad monachos, PG 28, col. 837C.
21. P. van den Ven, La vie ancienne de S. Syméon le jeune, vol. 1 (Brussels, 1962), p. 26, lines 102–3.
22. (11) Ath. Rule [22], [24].
23. John Chrysostom, De Lazaro concio I, PG 48, cols. 966–67.
24. John Chrysostom, De incomprehensibili dei natura II, PG 48, col. 718.
25. In [17] above; cf. liturgical calendar in [19] below.
26. Peter of Alexandria, Epistula canonica 15 (R&P 4.43).
27. See (20) Black Mountain [55] with notes 66 and 68.
28. Cf. Can. Apost. 69 (R&P 2.88), which prescribes fasting on Wednesdays and Fridays.
29. Van den Ven, La vie ancienne de S. Syméon, vol. 1, p. 148, lines 1–24.
30. Unidentified quotation.
31. Feast of the Birth of the Mother of God, September 8.
32. Feast of the Exaltation, September 14.
33. Feast of the Apostle Matthew, November 16.
34. Feast of the Entry into the Temple (Presentation of the Virgin in the Temple), November 21.
35. Feast of the Apostle Andrew, November 30.
36. Feast of the Conception of St. Anne, December 9.
37. Feast of St. Ignatios, December 20.
38. Feasts of the Epiphany, January 6; of the Commemoration of St. John the Baptist, January 7; of the Presentation of the Lord, February 2; of St. Symeon, February 3; of the Discovery of the Head of St. John the Baptist, February 24; of the Forty Martyrs, March 9; of the Annunciation, March 25; of St. George, April 23; of St. Mark, April 25; of St. James, April 30; of St. John the Theologian, May 8; of St. Symeon the Wonderworker, May 24; of Sts. Bartholomew and Barnabas, June 11; of the Birth of St. John the Forerunner, June 24; of Sts. Peter and Paul, June 29; of the Twelve Apostles, June 30; of Sts. Kosmas and Damian, July 1; of the [venerable] Robe of the Mother of God, July 2; of St. Gabriel, July 13; of the prophet Elijah, July 20; of St. Panteleemon, July 27.
39. Feast of the Transfiguration, August 6.
40. Feast of the Dormition, August 15.
41. Feast of the Beheading of St. John the Forerunner, August 29.
42. Possibly a later interpolation, for it contradicts the preceding arguments advanced previously in favor of fasting on Wednesdays and Fridays throughout the year; for the “fast of Artzibourios,” see the discussion in (20) Black Mountain [55] with note.
43. Nikephoros I, patriarch of Constantinople, Kanon 79, ed. J. B. Pitra, Spicilegium Solesmense, vol. 4 (Paris, 1858; repr. Graz, 1963), p. 398.
44. Theophilus of Alexandria, Prosphonesis, c. 1 (R&P 4.342).
45. Cassian, Apophthegmata patrum, Apophth. 4, PG 65, col. 245C.
46. Pseudo-Basil, Constitutiones asceticae 6, PG 31, cols. 1360D–65A.
47. Saturday of the first week in Lent.
48. C. Laod., c. 50 (R&P 3.217); see the citation of the same rule in (20) Black Mountain [63].
49. Feast of the Discovery of the Head of St. John the Forerunner, February 24; feast of the Forty Martyrs, March 9.

TWELFTH CENTURY

50. Feast of the Annunciation, March 25.
51. Cf. (20) Black Mountain [64].
52. C. Trull. (692), c. 89 (R&P 2.512–13).
53. Unidentified quotation.
54. Dionysios of Alexandria, Epistula ad Basileidem (R&P 4.3–4).
55. Constitutiones Apostolorum 5.13, 15, 18–20, ed. F. X. Funk, Didascalica et Constitutiones Apostolorum (Paderborn, 1905), pp. 269–71, 281–83, 289–301.
56. Actually, the feast of Pentecost (fifty days after Easter) occurs on the seventh Sunday after Easter Sunday.
57. Cf. Exod. 34:28 and III Kings 19:8.
58. Fast of the Holy Nativity, from November 15 until Christmas.
59. The feast of the Dormition, August 15.
60. Tomus unionis of the Council of Constantinople (920) = Grumel, Regestes, no. 669, ed. L. G. Westerink, Nicholas I Patriarch of Constantinople: Miscellaneous Writings (Washington, D.C., 1981), p. 66, lines 114–16.
61. Actually Euthymios of Peribleptos, Oratio seu invectivus contra Armenios 1, PG 132, col. 1200; for the attribution, see Beck, KTL, pp. 533, 598, with V. Grumel, “Les invectives contre les Arméniens du ‘Catholicos Isaac,’” REB 14 (1956), 174–94.
62. Menas (536–52) and Eutychios (552–65; 577–582), patriarchs of Constantinople.
63. Nicholas III Grammatikos (1084–1111), patriarch of Constantinople.
64. In [33] above.
65. Pseudo-Basil, Constitutiones asceticae 28, PG 31, col. 1417C.
66. The founder of the monastery and primary author of the typikon, now deceased; cf. [59] below.
67. Probably John’s successor.
68. Relationship to the Emperor Nikephoros III Botaneiates (1078–81) uncertain; see Alexander Kazhdan, “Botaneiates,” ODB, pp. 314–15; his son?
69. Older brother of Alexios I Komnenos, for whom see B. Skoulatos, Les personnages byzantins de l’Alexiade (Louvain, 1980), pp. 124–30, and K. Varzos, He Genealogia ton Komnenon, vol. 1 (Thessaloniki, 1984), pp. 67–79. He is commemorated in (28) Pantokrator [8].
70. Daughter of Isaac Komnenos the sebastokrator and niece of Alexios I Komnenos.
71. Probably his monastic name; not otherwise known.
72. Maria of Alania, Georgian princess and wife of Michael VII Doukas (1071–78) and Nikephoros III. Her cousin Irene was the spouse of Isaac Komnenos the sebastokrator and the mother of six children, including the Eudokia Komnene mentioned in this chapter (cf. Skoulatos, Personnages, p. 125).
73. There are two Chapters Fifty-Three due to another mistake in numeration; they are distinguished here as [A] and [B].
74. A long quotation from Pseudo-Basil, Constitutiones asceticae 21, PG 31, cols. 1393–1401 initiates the next chapter; borrowed sections are in bold type.
75. On Lot, see Gen. 19:1–24; Gehazi, IV Kings 5:25–27; Samuel, I Kings 1–3.
76. Cf. the boys’ school in (23) Pakourianos [31].
77. According to this document’s editor (Papadopoulos-Kerameus, Noctes, p. 77), this remarkable quotation is from the Epistole of Paul Helladikos, superior of the Elusa monastery in Idumaea, ed. V. Lundström, Anecdota byzantina e codicibus Upsaliensibus cum aliis collatis (Uppsala, 1902), pp. 15–23, which dates to the first quarter of the sixth century. Its extraordinary content was noted by J. B. Bury, History of the Later Roman Empire from the Death of Theodosios I to the Death of Justinian, vol. 2 (London, 1923), p. 412, n. 5, who describes it as “one of the most unsavoury documents of Christian monasticism.” See also Beck, KTL, p. 406, and C. Galatariotou, “Eros and Thanatos: A Byzantine Hermit’s Conception of Sexuality,” B&MGS 13 (1989), pp. 116–17.
78. Anicia Juliana, for whom see Walter Kaegi, “Anicia Juliana,” ODB, pp. 99–100.

30. PHOBEROS

79. Flavius Dagalaiphus Areobindus, who married Anicia Juliana in 478/79; see Timothy Gregory, "Areobindus," ODB, p. 162.
80. Elias I, patriarch of Jerusalem (494–516), for whom see Aristeides Papadakis, "Elias I," ODB, pp. 685–86.
81. The largest Early Christian monastic settlement in Egypt near the Western edge of the Nile Delta, built from the sixth to the eighth century; see Peter Grossmann, "Kellia," ODB, pp. 1119–20. The source of this chapter on bestiality has not been identified.
82. The reference is probably to the early ascetic, Joseph, who boasted of having fought successfully against passions. See his apophthegma 10 in Apophthegmata patrum, PG 65, col. 232B.

Document Notes

- [1] Introductory discourse; meditation on death. See other such meditations in (5) Euthymios [3]; (6) Rila [2]; (7) Latros Introduction; (10) Eleousa [1]; (24) Christodoulos [B1]; (25) Fragala [A6], [B6]; (41) Docheiariou [1]; (45) Neophytos [2]; (48) Prodromos [1]; (49) Geromeri [2] ff.; (50) Gerasimos [1]; and (51) Koutloumoussi [A1], [C1]. The author makes some use of the text of (22) Evergetis [3] towards the end of this chapter to describe his contributions to the foundation.
- [2] Early history of the foundation. The various accounts here are purely legendary; cf. the small amount of factual material in [33] and [50] below.
- [3] Miraculous icon of the St. John the Forerunner. For references to icons and their uses elsewhere in our documents, see (9) Galesios [138]; (19) Attaleiates [INV 5], [INV 18]; (22) Evergetis [29]; (23) Pakourianos [12], [33B]; (24) Christodoulos [B10]; (28) Pantokrator [2], [7], [25], [29], [34], [35]; (29) Kosmosoteira [7], [12], [35], [65], [89], [90]; (31) Areia [T10]; (34) Machairas [92], [150]; (38) Kellibara I [13]; (39) Lips [7], [25], [37]; (45) Neophytos [24]; (46) Akropolites [5]; (57) Bebaia Elpis [74], [137], [140], [142], [143], [156]; (61) Eleousa Inv. [2]. (19) Attaleiates [INV 5] mentions a bronze icon of St. John the Forerunner.
- [4] Beginning of the spiritual instruction. The author's partiality to military analogies may provide a hint as to his background.
- [5] Discussion of fasting. Provides a philosophical justification of the author's approach to fasting, which rejects extreme asceticism yet is somewhat stricter than the rest of the documents in the Evergetian tradition; cf. the general discussion in (20) Black Mountain, with whose author our author here is often in agreement on particular issues.
- [6] How to repel akedia. See also (27) Kecharitomene [26] and the general discussion in Gustave Bardy, "Akedia," DS, vol. 1 (Paris, 1937), cols. 166–69.
- [7] Ten steps to perfection of the spirit. See also [8B] below.
- [8A] Concerning humility. See also the Evergetian formulations in [36] below.
- [8B] Another ladder of spiritual ascent. Makes some use of (22) Evergetis [3] towards the end; this part of the Evergetian text shared later with (32) Mamas [47], (33) Heliou Bomon [46], and (34) Machairas [30].
- [9] Office of the first hour. Drawn almost verbatim from (22) Evergetis [4]; text shared with (27) Kecharitomene [32], (29) Kosmosoteira [13], (32) Mamas [47], (33) Heliou Bomon [46], and (34) Machairas [31], [32], [33], [34].
- [10] Exemptions from genuflections during Christmas and Pentecost; offices of the third, sixth and ninth hours. Makes some minor use of (22) Evergetis [4] at the beginning and the end; text shared with (27) Kecharitomene [33], (29) Kosmosoteira [13], (34) Machairas.
- [11] Guidelines for the reception of communion. Drawn almost verbatim from (22) Evergetis [5]; text shared with (27) Kecharitomene [33], (29) Kosmosoteira [14], (32) Mamas [32], (33) Heliou Bomon [32], and (34) Machairas [36], [37], [38], [39].
- [12] Prescriptions for the ninth hour, vespers, compline, the night office, and the midnight office. Like [13] below, drawn almost verbatim from (22) Evergetis [6]; text shared with (27) Kecharitomene [35], [36],

TWELFTH CENTURY

- [37], [38]; (29) Kosmosoteira [15]; (32) Mamas [47]; and (33) Heliou Bomon [46]. (34) Machairas [42], [43], [44], [45], [46] provides a different treatment. The first gloss explains the association of the recitation of “God the Lord” with non-fast and the “Alleluia” with fast days.
- [13] Office of matins. Like [12] above, drawn almost verbatim from (22) Evergetis [6]; text shared with (27) Kecharitomene [39], (29) Kosmosoteira [15], (32) Mamas [47], (33) Heliou Bomon [46], and (34) Machairas [48]. The transition at the end is drawn from (22) Evergetis [7], whose text continues into [14] below.
- [14] Daily confession. Like [15] below, drawn almost verbatim from (22) Evergetis [7]; text shared with (29) Kosmosoteira [16], [17]; (32) Mamas [30], (33) Heliou Bomon [30], and (34) Machairas [51], [52].
- [15] First and great confession at tonsure. Like [14] above, drawn almost verbatim from (22) Evergetis [7]; text shared with (29) Kosmosoteira [18] and (34) Machairas [53].
- [16] Authorities for the Lenten fast and Wednesday and Friday fast days. Makes minor use of (22) Evergetis [8] at the beginning to refer to the liturgical typikon for the regulation of fasts; text shared with (29) Kosmosoteira [19].
- [17] Feast days for which fasts may be broken. See the similar provision in (20) Black Mountain [48].
- [18] Diet when other feasts and fast days coincide. See the similar provisions in (20) Black Mountain [49], [50].
- [19] General rules for fasting on Wednesdays and Fridays; liturgical calendar. See the similar provision in (20) Black Mountain [38] and the liturgical calendar in [89]. For the consumption of cheese and eggs before Meatfare Week and during Cheesefare Week to spite the Artzibourians, see (20) Black Mountain [55], [90]; (32) Mamas [19]; (33) Heliou Bomon [19]; (34) Machairas [78]; and (36) Blemmydes [11].
- [20] Importance of both the office and diet. Like [21], [22], [23], [24], and [26] below, makes extensive use of (22) Evergetis [9]; text shared with (29) Kosmosoteira [20], (32) Mamas [17], (33) Heliou Bomon [17], (34) Machairas [61], and (58) Menoikeon [8].
- [21] Refectory procedures. Like [20] above and [22], [23], [24], [26] below, makes extensive use of (22) Evergetis [9]; text shared with (27) Kecharitomene [40], [41]; (29) Kosmosoteira [21]; (32) Mamas [17]; (33) Heliou Bomon [17], and (34) Machairas [62], [63].
- [22] No arguments over seating precedence; no sharing of food. Like [20], [21] above and [23], [24], [26] below, makes extensive use of (22) Evergetis [9]; text shared with (27) Kecharitomene [42], [43]; (29) Kosmosoteira [22], [23]; (32) Mamas [36], (33) Heliou Bomon [35], and (34) Machairas [64].
- [23] No secret eating. Like [20], [21], [22] above and [24], [26] below, makes extensive use of (22) Evergetis [9]; text shared with (29) Kosmosoteira [23], (27) Kecharitomene [49], (32) Mamas [20], and (33) Heliou Bomon [20]. As in the model typikon, the injunction against secret eating is repeated, found here in [41] below. The author’s concluding comment in this chapter is continued as a chapter-length discussion in [24] below.
- [24] Almsgiving not a substitute for a life of poverty; regulations for the evening meal. The discussion of the latter, like [20], [21], [22], [23] above and [26] below, makes extensive use of (22) Evergetis [9]; text shared with (29) Kosmosoteira [24] and (34) Machairas [66].
- [25] Regulations for relations with people outside the monastery. See also [39] below. Possibly influenced by Studite legislation on the subject; see (3) Theodore Studites [8], [10], [15], [17].
- [26] Role of the disciplinarian in the refectory. Like [20], [21], [22], [23], and [24] above, makes extensive use of (22) Evergetis [9]; text shared also with (29) Kosmosoteira [24].
- [27] Diet for the first week in Lent. Like [28], [29], and [30] below, makes extensive use of (22) Evergetis [10]; text shared with (27) Kecharitomene [47], (29) Kosmosoteira [25], (32) Mamas [18], (33) Heliou Bomon [18], and (34) Machairas [67].
- [28] Lenten diet. Like [27] above and [29], [30] below, makes extensive use of (22) Evergetis [10]; text shared with (27) Kecharitomene [47]; (29) Kosmosoteira [25], [26], [27], [28]; (32) Mamas [18]; (33) Heliou Bomon [18]; and (34) Machairas [67], [68], [69], [70], [71], [72], [73]. The author adds extensive canonical citations relevant to the subject.

30. PHOBEROS

- [29] Fast of the Holy Apostles. Like [27], [28] above and [30] below, makes extensive use of (22) Evergetis [10]; text shared with (27) Kecharitomene [48], (29) Kosmosoteira [28], (32) Mamas [18], (33) Heliou Bomon [18], and (34) Machairas [76].
- [30] Fast of the Holy Nativity. Like [27], [28], and [29] above, makes extensive use of (22) Evergetis [10]; text shared with (27) Kecharitomene [48], (29) Kosmosoteira [28], (32) Mamas [18], (33) Heliou Bomon [18], and (34) Machairas [76].
- [31] Fast of the Dormition of the Mother of God. Not an Evergetian fast, but see (20) Black Mountain [87], [88], cf. (60) Charsianeites [C17], where this fast is defended with reference to the same authorities.
- [32] Feast of the Forerunner. Utilizes the text of (22) Evergetis [11] originally intended to regulate the feast of the Dormition; text shared also with (29) Kosmosoteira [29].
- [33] Independent and self-governing status. Makes extensive use of (22) Evergetis [12], the classic reform movement formulation; text shared with (27) Kecharitomene [1], (29) Kosmosoteira [31], (32) Mamas [4], (33) Heliou Bomon [4], and (34) Machairas [21]. The author adds a historical note and a requirement that the superior seek the sphragis by the patriarch—repeated in [35] below.
- [34] The superior the most important official. Like [35] below, draws on (22) Evergetis [34].
- [35] Necessary personal qualifications; promotion of the steward; steward's tenure of office; retention of a bad superior; honors for a deposed superior; patriarchal sphragis; exclusive confession to the superior. An awkward chapter, the result of close textual dependency on the idiosyncratic provisions of (22) Evergetis [13], [14], and [15]. Some text also shared with (27) Kecharitomene [13]; (29) Kosmosoteira [41]; (32) Mamas [2]; (33) Heliou Bomon [2]; and (34) Machairas [89], [90], [141], whose authors (wisely) bind themselves less closely to the original Evergetian provisions. The interpolation of the requirement of obtaining patriarchal blessing, a repetition of an earlier provision in [33] above, is particularly awkward in the context of the Evergetian quotation here, but significant as an indication of a changed relationship between the founders and the patriarchate under Nicholas III Grammatikos.
- [36] Expulsion of non-confessants; necessity of obedience to the superior; monks' mutual affection for one another; exhortation to the superior; expression of hostility to privilege. Another multi-purpose chapter, utilizing key portions of (22) Evergetis [15], [16], and [17]; parts of the text also shared with (27) Kecharitomene [12]; (29) Kosmosoteira [42], [43], [44]; (32) Mamas [42], [45]; (33) Heliou Bomon [41], [44]; (34) Machairas [54], [142], [143], [144], [148]; and (58) Menoikeion [18], [19].
- [37] Superior not accountable to the monks; not to do favors for friends and relatives. Drawn almost verbatim from (22) Evergetis [18]; text shared with (27) Kecharitomene [12], (32) Mamas [44], (33) Heliou Bomon [43], and (34) Machairas [145], [146].
- [38] Inalienability of sacred objects; exception for fiscal emergencies. Drawn almost verbatim from (22) Evergetis [19]; text shared with (27) Kecharitomene [10] and (29) Kosmosoteira [45]; cf. (32) Mamas [37], (33) Heliou Bomon [37], and (34) Machairas [94].
- [39] No idle talking. See also [25] above. Like [40] below, drawn almost verbatim from (22) Evergetis [21]; text shared with (29) Kosmosoteira [47], (32) Mamas [35], (33) Heliou Bomon [34], (34) Machairas [113], and (58) Menoikeion [17].
- [40] No verbal sparring. Like [39] above, drawn almost verbatim from (22) Evergetis [21]; text shared also with (29) Kosmosoteira [47].
- [41] No secret eating or private possessions. Drawn verbatim from the classic reform formulation of (22) Evergetis [22]; text shared with (29) Kosmosoteira [41]; some textual sharing also with (32) Mamas [35], (33) Heliou Bomon [34], and (34) Machairas [87] for the ban on personal possessions.
- [42] Number of monks. Like [46] and [52], this chapter utilizes its Evergetian counterpart, here (22) Evergetis [23], but reaches a conclusion opposite to that of the model (at least in our present edition of that text); text also shared with (29) Kosmosoteira [48].
- [43] Servants not permitted; assignment of monks to cells. Makes extensive use of (22) Evergetis [24], but increases the number of monks in each cell from two to three; text shared with (32) Mamas [35], (33)

TWELFTH CENTURY

- Heliou Bomon* [33], and (34) Machairas [87] for the ban on servants, and with (29) Kosmosoteira [51] for the cell assignments.
- [44] Cells to be unlocked; communal wardrobe. The former is an original provision; the latter is drawn verbatim from (22) Evergetis [25]; text on the wardrobe shared with (29) Kosmosoteira [52] and (34) Machairas [102], [103].
- [45] Equality of food, drink and clothing; exception for the sick; superior's monthly inspection of the cells. Drawn almost verbatim from (22) Evergetis [29] and [30]; text shared with (29) Kosmosoteira [53]; text on equality only shared with (27) Kecharitomene [56], (32) Mamas [34], (33) Heliou Bomon [33], and (34) Machairas [106], [107].
- [46] Ban on bathing, except for the sick. Like [42] above and [52] below, utilizes its Evergetian counterpart, here (22) Evergetis [28], but reaches a conclusion opposite to the reading of at least our present edition of that text. See also different, more lenient treatments of this issue in (27) Kecharitomene [58], (29) Kosmosoteira [97], (32) Mamas [28], (33) Heliou Bomon [28], and (58) Menoikeion [15].
- [47] Installation ceremony for officials; duties of the three treasurers. Drawn almost verbatim from (22) Evergetis [29] and [30]; text shared for the installation ceremony with (27) Kecharitomene [18], (29) Kosmosoteira [35], (32) Mamas [6], (33) Heliou Bomon [6], and (34) Machairas [92]; only (29) Kosmosoteira [36] shares the three treasurers with Phoberos and Evergetis.
- [48] Duties of the disciplinary official and refectorian; tenure of office for officials; exhortation of officials. Drawn almost verbatim from (22) Evergetis [31], [32], and [33]; text shared for all these subjects only with (29) Kosmosoteira [37], [38], [39]; for the refectorian also with (27) Kecharitomene [25]; for tenure of office also with (34) Machairas [92]; the officials' exhortation is found also in (27) Kecharitomene [25], (32) Mamas [23], (33) Heliou Bomon [23], and (58) Menoikeion [10].
- [49] Qualifications of property administrators. Drawn almost verbatim, with the interpolation of an ironic historical note, from (22) Evergetis [34]; text shared with (29) Kosmosoteira [40] and (34) Machairas [109].
- [50] Commemorations of the founder, benefactors, and departed monks. Utilizes (22) Evergetis [34] and [35] partially and [36] extensively, with substantial interpolations after the author's death particular to Phoberos; text for the benefactors' and monks' commemorations shared with (27) Kecharitomene [70]; (32) Mamas [39], [40]; (33) Heliou Bomon [39]; and (34) Machairas [156], [157].
- [51] Length of the novitiate. Like [53A] below, drawn almost verbatim from (22) Evergetis [37]; text shared with (29) Kosmosoteira [55], (32) Mamas [22], (33) Heliou Bomon [22], and (34) Machairas [55], [56].
- [52] No admission of monks tonsured in other monasteries. Like [42] and [46] above, utilizes its Evergetian counterpart, here (22) Evergetis [37], but reaches a conclusion opposite to the reading of at least our present edition of that text. (31) Areia [T10] and (34) Machairas [148] exclude these monks from election to the superiorship, as does, apparently, (28) Pantokrator [24], but none of these documents bans them entirely.
- [53A] No mandatory entrance gifts; voluntary gifts cannot be reclaimed. Like [51] above, drawn almost verbatim from (22) Evergetis [37]; the text of this classic Evergetian formulation is shared with (27) Kecharitomene [7] (in part); (29) Kosmosoteira [55]; (32) Mamas [5], [22]; (33) Heliou Bomon [5], [22]; and (34) Machairas [57], [58], [59].
- [53B] Exhortation not to abandon the monastery. This is the longest quotation in our documents from the Basilian Ascetic Treatises.
- [54] Charitable distributions; hospitality to visitors and care of the sick; burial of the dead. Like [55] below, draws on (22) Evergetis [38]; text shared with (27) Kecharitomene [64]. (29) Kosmosoteira [6], (32) Mamas [13], (33) Heliou Bomon [13], and (34) Machairas [118] have different provisions.
- [55] Entry to most women prohibited. Like [54] above, draws on (22) Evergetis [38] and also [39], and (for a transition to [42]) [41]; text shared with (29) Kosmosoteira [56] (part only) and (34) Machairas [118], [119]. (27) Kecharitomene [17], (28) Pantokrator [18], (29) Kosmosoteira [84], (32) Mamas

30. PHOBEROS

- [27], (33) Heliou Bomon [27], and (34) Machairas [115] also have their own provisions for the exclusion of the opposite sex.
- [56] Care of sick monks. Continues the quotation begun in [55] above of (22) Evergetis [41], which is utilized here almost verbatim, but with an interpolation and a transition to [57] below; text shared with (27) Kecharitomene [57], (32) Mamas [34], (33) Heliou Bomon [33], and (34) Machairas [108]. (28) Pantokrator [10] and (29) Kosmosoteira [61] have their own provisions.
- [57] Ban on female animals; blessing of the grain. The ban is not present in (22) Evergetis or other Evergetian documents, but see similar provisions in the earlier Studite and Athonite traditions: (3) Theodore Studites [5], (13) Ath. Typikon [31]; cf. (12) Tzimiskes [22], [23], and (15) Constantine IX [3], [4].
- [58] No boys or beardless youths as monks. A similar ban is found in (29) Kosmosoteira [49] but not elsewhere in the Evergetian documents; cf. earlier bans in (3) Theodore Studites [18], (12) Tzimiskes [16], (13) Ath. Typikon [34], (15) Constantine IX [1], cf. [5], and (23) Pakourianos [17].
- [59] Final instructions; reading of the typikon; scriptural blessing. Makes extensive use of (22) Evergetis [42] for the instructions and [43] for the reading and blessing. Text of the final instructions shared with (27) Kecharitomene [78]; (29) Kosmosoteira [57]; (32) Mamas [46]; (33) Heliou Bomon [45]; (34) Machairas [163], [166], [167], [168]; and (58) Menoikeion [20]. Text for the reading of the typikon shared with (27) Kecharitomene [65], (29) Kosmosoteira [59], and (34) Machairas [168]; cf. (32) Mamas [16] and (33) Heliou Bomon [16] with their own provisions. Text of the scriptural blessing shared with (27) Kecharitomene [78], (32) Mamas [46], (33) Heliou Bomon [45], and (34) Machairas [167].

31. Areia: Memorandum and Typikon of Leo, Bishop of Nauplia, for the Monastery of the Mother of God in Areia

Date: Memorandum: October 1143; Typikon: ca. 1149¹ Translator: Alice-Mary Talbot Edition employed: G. A. Choras, He "hagia mone" Areias (Athens, 1975), pp. 239–52.

Manuscript: Codex graecus bibliothecae Taurinensis 326 (16th c.)

Other translations: Modern Greek (Memorandum only), by S. Papadopoulos, Epistemonika Analekta (Athens, 1967), pp. 220–30.

Institutional History

A. Foundation of the Monastery

The author of this document, Leo the bishop of Argos and Nauplia, was a member of the noble family of the Antzades.² He originally intended to found a convent at Areia, just a few miles inland to the east from his see at Nauplia in the Argolid. He drew up an official memorandum granting the convent an independent constitution and sufficient properties to support thirty-six nuns.³ Later, fearing that the nuns might fall prey to pirates in a location so close to the coast, he relocated them to another site at Bouze, presumably further inland.⁴ Leo then resolved to install a community of the same number of monks in the former convent. He drew up another memorandum, preserved as part of the present document [M], dated to October 1143. Later, he also composed a brief Typikon [T], which forms the second part of our document as translated below. These texts affirm that the monastery, like the convent, was to be an independent institution in which the rights of Leo's episcopal successors and their agents were to be severely limited.⁵ A donor inscription on a marble plaque which survives in the facade of the monastery church records the completion of Leo's construction of this building in April 1149.⁶ The Typikon, which is different in some particulars of regulation from the Memorandum and hence was likely to have been issued a little later than the latter document, may have been composed about the time of the erection of the church. Leo himself makes a brief appearance in an external source as a participant in the synod at Constantinople in 1157 that condemned the heresy of Soterichos Panteugenos.⁷

B. Subsequent History

Areia was just one of four ecclesiastical sites in this region of Greece marked by surviving churches from the twelfth or thirteenth centuries.⁸ The monastery, along with neighboring Nauplia, became part of the Latin Duchy of Athens in 1212.⁹ Frankish rule of the Argolid lasted until 1388, when the area came under Venetian administration for the first time. The monastery continued to be populated by Greek monks, but in the fifteenth century, Bartholomew, the Latin bishop of Argos and Nauplia, made an attempt to appoint Areia's superior. The Venetian doge Francesco Foscari (1423–57) resisted this initiative and upheld the monastery's independence in 1437.¹⁰

31. AREIA

After a brief restoration of Byzantine power, the Ottoman Turks conquered the area in 1458.¹¹ The monks thought it prudent to find an influential protector, and accordingly arranged for their monastery to become a dependency of the Holy Sepulcher in Jerusalem in 1679.¹² This relationship continued down to the abandonment of the monastery in the early eighteenth century. The Venetians returned to the Argolid in 1686 and controlled it for a generation down to 1715.¹³ Not long after the Ottomans returned, the monastery was finally abandoned, according to a report of Chrysanthos, patriarch of Jerusalem (1707–31).¹⁴ Ottoman rule lasted in this part of Greece down to 1822. The monastery was claimed by the new Greek government, but sold to Emmanuel Xenos, a private individual, in 1826.¹⁵ It then became part of a private estate owned by a noble family of Nauplia until 1868 or 1875, when monastic life was finally restored on the site.¹⁶ Areia currently functions as a convent, certainly an ironic outcome in view of the circumstances of its foundation in the twelfth century.

Analysis

Despite its relative brevity, this document is of considerable interest for what it reveals about the concerns of an episcopal patron organizing a foundation in his private capacity. It is made up of two parts, the author's Memorandum [M] and his Typikon [T], which, judging from the considerable overlap¹⁷ between them in the topics covered and a few inconsistencies,¹⁸ must have been composed separately. Similar memoranda issued by members of the ecclesiastical hierarchy are attested as free-standing documents for such purposes as transferring ownership of a religious foundation (for which see (27) Kecharitomene [70]) or, as here, proclaiming its independence (see (30) Phoberos [33]).

A. Model Typikon

The author instructs [M8] his monks that they are to use the typikon of lord Meletios “in all matters” with regard to their liturgical services and dietary regime. The latter was the ascetic Meletios the Younger (†1105), of whom hagiographic lives by Nicholas of Methone and Theodore Prodromos survive.¹⁹ Meletios' typikon, which does not survive, was probably structurally like (4) Stoudios or (13) Ath. Typikon, that is to say, a document closer to a liturgical than a founder's typikon like (22) Evergetis. Indeed, if we are not to interpret Leo's instruction in the typikon that liturgical services should be conducted [T1] according to the Studite synaxarion as a contradiction of [M8], the implication is that Meletios' lost typikon, like (13) Ath. Typikon, was itself based on a Studite model. In that event, Leo's own materials would have served as a supplement on administrative matters unique to his own foundation.

To be sure, certain Studite institutions and customs, most notably involuntary confinement [T9], re-emerge in this document after a long absence. Nevertheless, topical treatments and approaches to issues that are usually attributable to Evergetian influence are even more noticeable, particularly in the Typikon.²⁰ Since the author does not incontrovertibly reveal his dependence on (22) Evergetis by using literal transcriptions as the author of (30) Phoberos did, we must leave open the possibility that he was drawing upon an earlier or parallel reform tradition with which the Evergetian typikon shared much of its content. Yet (28) Pantokrator, a contemporary document, is an example of a Evergetian-influenced typikon which nevertheless refrains from copying its model verbatim (probably out of a desire for stylistic brevity), and this document may be another.

B. Lives of the Monks

1. Number of Monks

The founder provides [M4] that there were to be no less than thirty-six monks at the foundation, making it somewhat larger than (27) Kecharitomene [5] but smaller than (29) Kosmosoteira [3]. Compared to other, non-imperial foundations, however, Leo's monastery was large for its time, being three times the size of the monastery described in (30) Phoberos [47] and easily exceeding the twenty monks provided for in (32) Mamas [5] and in (33) Heliou Bomon [5]. Moreover, the founder's resources at this location were also being used [M1], cf. [M4] to support thirty-six nuns in a separate facility.

2. Liturgical Duties

Observing [T1] the Studite synaxarion, possibly as mediated [M8] by the lost typikon of Meletios the Younger, the monks were to conduct both common and private liturgical services.

3. Sacramental Life

A discussion of confession promised in the title to [T1] is not actually supplied in the chapter. In [T2], the superior is designated, as in (22) Evergetis [15], to be the monks' sole confessor. The divine liturgy was to be celebrated [T2] on Saturdays, Sundays and feast days, but not daily as in (22) Evergetis [5]. The superior would make [T2] the determination for his monks of how frequently they should receive communion (so also (22) Evergetis [5], which is possibly being summarized here).

4. Cenobitic Lifestyle

For our author, communal performance of the doxology [T1] and common meals in the refectory [T3], [M8] constituted the essence of the cenobitic life. Although he refers [T3], [T5] his monks to the Studite typikon (i.e., (4) Stoudios or some contemporary version thereof) for the determination of quantities of food (moderated by the superior's discretion), the regulations he offers [T3] for the refectory and other aspects of the common life echo (22) Evergetis [9], [22]: no quarreling over seating, absences from meals should be noted, no eating in the cells (except for the sick), and no private possessions. There is a brief allusion [T3] to manual labor. His ban [T9] on monks visiting one another in their cells also has an Evergetian counterpart in (22) Evergetis [21].

The author claims to be following the typikon of Meletios the Younger in providing [M8] that his monks should all share the same food and drink in the refectory, though this was also an important precept of (22) Evergetis [26]. The omission of clothing from this regulation for equality may be significant. As in (22) Evergetis [25], there is a provision [T4] for communal purchase and storage of clothes.

5. Monastic Discipline

Although the disciplining of refractory monks had been part of the Studite tradition in the ninth century (see (4) Studios [25]) which had then been passed down to Mount Athos in the tenth century (see (11) Ath. Rule [19]), it does not seem to have been a part of the monastic reform program in the eleventh century. Here our author revives [T9] it, perhaps through the medium of Meletios the Younger's typikon, and provides that after a second or third warning, a troublemaking or disobedient monk was to be locked up in a cell, then expelled if incorrigible. The propensity to punish does have a more recent parallel, however, in (10) Eleousa [12], [16], another monastery founded by a bishop, which alludes to physical punishment and permits expulsion.

6. Bathing

The author allowed [T3] his monks to bathe weekly, except during Lent. This is much more frequently than other founders were disposed to permit, e.g., (22) Evergetis [28], which allows baths three times a year, or even the contemporary (28) Pantokrator [15] which permits it twice a month.

C. Constitutional Matters

1. Independent and Self-Governing Status

The author was extraordinarily concerned to establish the independent status of his foundation, perhaps because, he being a prelate, there was a fair chance that it would be mistaken or misrepresented as an episcopal (i.e., diocesan) monastery after his death. As noted above, Leo had earlier issued [M1] a memorandum declaring the perpetual freedom of the convent originally planned for this site from all ecclesiastical and civil authority. Subsequently, he issued [M11] the present Memorandum granting independence and inalienability to the monastery as well, specifically exempting it from the imposition of a protector or a charistikarios. The monks were to enjoy [M12] freedom from episcopal interference as well. Later, in the typikon he makes [T12] a formal reiteration of the foundation's independence that follows the formula, with the customary curse of the 318 Nicene fathers, found also in (22) Evergetis [12].

2. Leadership

As in other independent foundations, the superior perforce was the effective leader of the monastery. The first superior may have been an appointee of the founder; after his death the latter instructs [T10] that the monks are to choose the most worthy monk ([M7] cites "age and virtue" as qualifications) among themselves who is "agreeable and acceptable to all or at least the majority." A monk tonsured elsewhere (a xenokourites) was ineligible [T10] for election, lest he exploit his election to take possession of the monastery. The prescribed installation ceremony [M7], cf. [T10] was designed to make clear that the superior's authority to rule came from the founder himself, symbolized by the former's reception of the typikon and pastoral staff. The ecclesiarch was responsible for enthroning the new superior; the author boldly asserts "such an installation requires no other confirmation" (e.g., that of the local bishop).

The superior was to appoint [T7] the monastery's treasurer, ecclesiarch and cellarer "with the approval and confirmation of the other monks." Elsewhere our author states [M9] that the superior was also to appoint the steward. The author also exhorts [M6] the superior to "be like a protector" (an ephoros) towards the nuns of the convent at Bouze, visiting the superior for consultations once or twice a year.

3. Consultative Government

As noted above, the community at large played at least some role in the selection of not only the superior but also the monastery's other officials. In [T10], the monks' obligation to show obedience to the superior is rationalized on the basis that he should be doing "nothing without their approval and knowledge" anyway. The author further obliges him to govern with the "knowledge, advice and consent” of the leading monks (presumably including the officials cited above), which parallels the requirement of (22) Evergetis [14]. The more nearly contemporary (29) Kosmosoteira [41] also assigns important responsibilities to these monks. The requirement for consultative government here is justified by a curious extension of the reform critique of idiorhythmic monasticism to condemn also arbitrary, autocratic rule.

4. Patronal Privileges

The author claims [T12] only the privilege of commemorative services for himself on the anniversary of his death and on the next day for members of his immediate family. Monks from neighboring monasteries in Nauplia were to be invited to participate in the founder’s commemoration.

D. Financial Matters

1. Financial Administration

The author obliges [M9] the superior to cooperate with the steward, ecclesiarch and treasurer in administering the finances of the foundation: “we forbid the superior to do anything without these three, or for them to do anything without the superior.” In (28) Pantokrator [64], Emperor John II Komnenos also requires the superior to consult with his financial officials before making important decisions. Deposits and withdrawals into the monastery’s treasury were to take place in the presence of the superior and the other monks. The precautions taken reflect the heightened concerns for fiscal probity characteristic of the second generation of the reform movement and are comparable to what appears in (23) Pakourianos [26] and (27) Kecharitomene [25]; cf. the less specific provisions of (22) Evergetis [20].

The foundation was evidently supported [M10] largely by revenues derived from certain monasteries that the author had subordinated perpetually to his foundation under ecclesiastical epidosis.

Like (22) Evergetis [34], the author provides [T8] that the superior should choose an elderly monk to administer the foundation’s landed properties; the authors of some other twelfth-century typika preferred to use laymen as property managers.²¹ A brief inventory (brevion) of movable property is included [T11] within the document. The superior was also to [M6] supervise the steward of the founder’s convent, provided that the superior and the nuns were agreeable, and assure that they received all the produce of their endowed properties.

2. Acceptability of Entrance Gifts and Other Benefactions

In a provision that is unique in this collection of monastic foundation documents, our author states [M10] his determination to refuse any gifts of landed property that were not immune from taxation, professedly to keep the monks from being harassed by tax collectors. The author applies [T6] the same principle of selectivity to the entrance donations of postulants in a chapter that otherwise recalls the language of the comparable regulation in (22) Evergetis [37].

E. External Relations

1. Denial of Episcopal Rights over the Foundation

Probably to prevent his monastery from being confused with a diocesan foundation, the author adopts an uncompromising stance towards any claims of ownership his episcopal successors might subsequently assert. In his discussion of the foundation's independence, he limits [M11] future bishops to commemoration (anaphora) in the liturgy and investigation of spiritual faults, which is in accord (unacknowledged) with the legislation of Alexios Komnenos on comparable patriarchal rights issued in 1096.²² The author explicitly denies [M15] his successors any rights to participate in the election of the foundation's superior or to install him in office, to convey the monastery to someone else as a grant (i.e., in charistike), or to send outside monks as imposed guests (katapemptoi) to it. Not content with these denials, the author also bans [M15] representatives of future bishops from the premises of his foundation (cf. [18] Nea Gephyra [2]) unless perchance they wished to come to the monastery to worship. Leo of Nauplia's late eleventh century counterpart, Manuel of Stroumitza was similarly skeptical of the good will of his episcopal successors, though in (10) Eleousa [16] he was willing to allow them the right of blessing the superior which our author here denies to his successors.

2. Other Threats to Institutional Autonomy

Curiously, Leo seems to have worried little about potential threats to his foundation from private individuals, who had posed the greatest concern to the early reformers in the late eleventh century. This despite the fact that Leo himself came from a clerical-monastic family (cf. [T12]: his father, one brother and uncle were monks, his mother a nun, and another brother was a bishop) of the type known in this era for a proclivity to privatize ecclesiastical property.²³

Notes on the Introduction

1. The Typikon, unlike the Memorandum, is undated, but probably postdates the latter by a little and may well have been composed around the time of the dedicatory inscription of the monastery church, which is dated to April 1149.
2. Choras, Hagia Mone, p. 312.
3. (31) Areia [M1], [M4], [M5].
4. (31) Areia [M4].
5. (31) Areia [M11], [M15], [T12].
6. Published in Choras, Hagia Mone, p. 51, and in Struck, "Vier Kirchen," p. 229.
7. Choras, Hagia Mone, pp. 57–60; see also the note in Codex Parisinus, supplément grec 1090, with Choras' discussion, pp. 60–61.
8. The others are at Argos, Chonika, and Merbaka; see Mary Lee Coulson, "Re: Protomaiolica in 12th Century Corinth," BSC 18 (1992), 75; Megaw, "Chronology"; Savvas, "Quatre églises"; and Struck, "Vier Kirchen."
9. Timothy Gregory, "Argolid," ODB, pp. 164–65, and "Nauplia," ODB, p. 1443.
10. For the first period of Venetian rule, see Choras, Hagia Mone, pp. 103–10, cf. 312–13.
11. Following Gregory, "Argolid," p. 164; cf. Choras, Hagia Mone, p. 111, who dates the Ottoman conquest to 1540.
12. For the relationship with the Holy Sepulcher, see Choras, Hagia Mone, pp. 114–23, cf. 313–14.
13. For the second period of Venetian rule, see Choras, Hagia Mone, pp. 125–36, cf. 314.
14. For the this era of Ottoman rule, see Choras, Hagia Mone, pp. 137–44, cf. 313–15.
15. For the fate of the monastery after the recovery of Greek independence, see Choras, Hagia Mone, pp. 145–94, cf. 315–18.
16. For the monastery's revival, see Choras, Hagia Mone, pp. 195–214, cf. 318–19.

TWELFTH CENTURY

17. Overlap between the two parts of the document: [M7] and [T10]; [M8] and [T1], [T3]; [M9] and [T7]; [M10] and [T6]; [M11] and [T12].
18. Cf. [M7] with [T10] and [M8] with [T1].
19. Halkin, BHG 1247, 1248; cf. Beck, KTL, pp. 625, 629; for this individual, see Alexander Kazhdan, "Meletios the Younger," ODB, pp. 1333–34, and Ch. Papadopoulos, "Ho Hosios Meletios ho Neos (1035–1105)," Theologia 13 (1935), 97–125.
20. Chapters with close Evergetian parallels: [M8], cf. (22) Evergetis [26]; [T1], cf. (22) Evergetis [4]; [T2], cf. (22) Evergetis [5], [7]; [T3], cf. (22) Evergetis [9], [22]; [T4], cf. (22) Evergetis [25]; [T9], cf. (22) Evergetis [21]; [T10], cf. (22) Evergetis [14], [17]; [T12], cf. (22) Evergetis [12].
21. (27) Kecharitomene [31]; (28) Pantokrator [19].
22. Alexios Komnenos, De jure patriarchae circa monasteria (JGR 3.408).
23. Cf. Grumel, Regestes, no. 1000, ed. Th. Uspensky, "Mneniya i postanovleniya konstantinopolskikh pomestnikh soborov XI i XII vv. o razdache tserkovnikh imuschestv (Charistikarii)," IRAİK 5 (1900), 1–48, at 15–29; see also the author's condemnation [T10] of the monks of his own diocese of Nauplia as "passionately devoted to their relatives."

Bibliography

- Beck, Hans-Georg, Kirche und theologische Literatur im byzantinischen Reich (Munich, 1959), p. 648.
- Lampros, Spyridon, "Ho katalogos ton archaioteron hierarchon Naupliou kai Argous," NH 12 (1915), 122–23.
- Lamprynides, M. G., He Nauplia apo ton archaiotaton chronon mechri ton kath'hemas, historike melete, 2nd ed. (Athens, 1950).
- Megaw, H., "The Chronology of Some Middle-Byzantine Churches," ABSA 32 (1931–32), 90–130.
- Papadopoulos, Ch., "Ho Hosios Meletios ho Neos (1035–1105)," Theologia 13 (1935), 97–125.
- Savvas, S., "Étude de quatre églises du XIIe siècle se trouvant en Argolide," Theologia 29 (1958), 368–76, 559–67.
- Struck, Adolph, "Vier byzantinischen Kirchen der Argolis," MDAI Athens 34 (1909), 189–236.
- Talbot, Alice-Mary, and Cutler, Anthony, "Areia, Monastery of," ODB, p. 162.
- Volk, Robert, Gesundheitswesen und Wohltätigkeit im Spiegel der byzantinischen Klostertypika (Munich, 1983), pp. 199–200.

Translation

Memorandum [M]

Memorandum of the humble Leo, the lowly bishop of Argos and Nauplia, for the new convent constructed by him at Areia in the name of the exceedingly holy Mother of God.

[M1] My humble self first built a monastery in the name of our exceedingly pure Lady, the Mother of God, at Areia, and he ordained that thirty-six women, who choose to submit to the yoke of Christ our God, should lead the solitary life therein. In addition to the repose of their habitation, he also prescribed for them the necessities of life, so that they would continually have the wherewithal to obtain them, lest through the lack of these things, on account of pressing physical needs, they follow the monastic path in a feeble manner. By means of a memorandum to them he ordained that this monastery was to be free of all ecclesiastical and civil authority in perpetuity.

31. AREIA

[M2] What happened subsequently? Not long afterwards, just as gardeners and farmers use their special skills, first to place a plant cutting in the ground and tend it for a while, and then to dig it up and transplant it elsewhere, so that thereby the plant may be more firmly rooted and grow better and bear earlier, I did something similar with regard to this monastery. Even though in the end the affair [p. 240] turned out contrary to the original purpose of myself, the founder, still the final result resembles the above-mentioned procedure of gardeners.

[M3] For throughout the year our coastal waters have been swarming with pirates, who plunder everything with total license, and commit any outrage they wish against anyone who falls into their hands. Thus a not ignoble fear has disturbed me, lest this convent, which is vulnerable to attack by the pirates because of its proximity to the sea, be destroyed by them, and lest, in addition to the loss of monastic property, the nuns be the victims of rape, which is a special delight for men who once and for all have cast aside their fear of God and embraced the life of a pirate.

[M4] Therefore, lest something of this sort occur, with the cooperation of Satan, who hates the good, and lest this zealous undertaking, which seemed pious to me, have contrary results, I stripped for a second endeavor and constructed another monastery from the very foundations. It is located further from the sea, at a place called Bouze,¹ and is also established in the name of our exceedingly pure Lady, the Mother of God. I built therein cells for the repose of the nuns and other necessities for this convent, and also donated to the convent [enough property] to provide for the total physical needs of the nuns in perpetuity. I assured that it remain forever completely free and independent of any authority by means of a memorandum drafted by myself, the humble founder. Here I collected and assembled the nuns, and appointed their superior. As for their previous convent, after transforming it into a male monastery, I assembled sufficient monks, and installed them there. I wish their number to be thirty-six in perpetuity, or more, but never fewer, and I appointed a superior for them with an [episcopal] sphragis.

[M5] Therefore for the above reasons the nuns were transferred from their original convent to another, which I have just constructed from the foundations, and I changed the former nunnery into a male monastery. So that God may be glorified in both places, and the souls of men and women may be saved in like manner, by means of the present Memorandum I ordain that all the property dedicated by me to the former nunnery at Areia (which was [p. 241] subsequently transformed into a male monastery, for the above-mentioned reasons) belong irrevocably and without diminution and in perpetuity to the present nunnery at Bouze. [I also ordain] that no change or alteration whatsoever be made with regard to any of the contents of the memorandum issued by me for the convent,² so that the nuns will seem to be back again at the nunnery of Areia, even though they are actually residing and pursuing the ascetic life in the nunnery of Bouze.

[M6] We also permit the superior of the male monastery to be free to supervise the steward of the nunnery, if the superior and the other nuns are willing. I want him to be like an *ephoros*³ and to exert himself on behalf of the nuns, when he is summoned by them in cases of difficulty. I ordain that he should go to the convent once or twice a year to pay his respects and to speak publicly with the superior and other nuns. But he should not go frequently, on the pretext of business, lest they become a scandal to the lay people. It is my wish that he should exert absolutely every effort for the prosperity of the convent, and with honesty so as not to touch even a modios of grain or a measure of wine or an animal that belongs to the convent. For I condemn to perpetual anathema any superior who would wish to do this.

TWELFTH CENTURY

[M7] These are the rules and instructions for the nunnery, but the rules for the male monastery should originate from the top. It is my command that the superior of this monastery should be one who on account of age and virtue is respected by this community and is approved by all the monks, so that he may be a model of every virtue for the others, not adorning himself with the rank of superior, but rather adorning the rank through the propriety of his behavior. His installation should proceed as follows: the episcopal staff of your servant, the humble founder of the monastery, should be placed at the doors of the holy sanctuary, and the superior-designate should first kneel down in this place and then be entrusted with the staff by the priest with the appropriate prayer and blessing. Then he should hear “worthy” repeated three times by the monks, and the priest should make an ektenes, and after the commemoration of the name of myself, the founder, the priest should also mention his name, and thus he will obtain the future leadership [of the monastery].

[M8] I command [the monks] to follow unerringly in all matters the typikon of the monastery of lord Meletios, with regard both to [p. 242] ecclesiastical services and their meals in the refectory, eating the same food, partaking of the same drink, and not introducing any different foods at the refectory table, unless perhaps someone should require a special diet on account of illness. For if a monk should happen to fall ill, and be afflicted with bodily weakness, and perhaps not be strong enough to walk to the refectory, in that case the superior should offer him every attention, and visit the cell of the ailing monk, and order prepared for him such food as is conducive to good health.

[M9] Furthermore I command that one of the monks be appointed and established as steward by the superior, and another as ecclesiarch to be in charge of the books and documents of the monastery and the other sacred objects. In addition there should be a treasurer and a treasury in the monastery, and every deposit and withdrawal of any sort should occur in full sight of the superior and the other monks, and the treasury should also be sealed by the superior. In short, we forbid the superior to do anything without these three [officials], or for them to do anything without the superior.

[M10] If a piece of immovable property should be offered and presented to the monastery by a pious soul, it should be accepted if it is free of any fiscal obligation; but if it is liable to taxation, then it should be refused. For I want to cast far away from the monks every such distraction once and for all . . . let them worship the Lord, and not get themselves involved in fiscal services so as to be disturbed by tax collectors, but they should be satisfied with the aforementioned monasteries⁴ given to them in perpetuity as epidosis.

31. AREIA

[M11] These are my instructions, and by means of the present Memorandum I grant independence and inalienability to the monastery, and ordain that it never come under the control of an ephoros or charistikarios or anyone else. Nor should anyone, in the guise perhaps of administration of the monastery's affairs, or aid and assistance, lay hands on anything in the monastery and thus ravage and despoil it. I do not even permit the most holy bishops who succeed me to interfere with the monastery or monastic affairs or have any authority over it, but I withdraw it completely from their control, reserving for them only the commemoration of their name in the divine liturgies and the investigation of spiritual [p. 243] faults.

[M12] Therefore no primate or legal representative or archimandrite or steward or anyone else appointed by the bishops for these services⁵ will ever have permission to enter within the monastery, but will be driven from the very forecourts, unless they come for the sake of a prayer. If any of these officials should dare anything of this sort, and should act contrary to my orders, he will be subject to the indissoluble censure of the lifegiving Trinity, which I, its unworthy worshiper, will impose. Therefore, in the Holy Spirit, let us commend to our brethren in the Lord and successor bishops to accept this arrangement of mine, and not contrive any innovations which might harm or corrupt this monastery in any way; but rather for all eternity they should pass their lives and be guided according to my will, and the monks in this autonomous and independent monastery should lead an ascetic life free from outside interference.

[M13] For I know well and am convinced that, if we have such concern for their training in virtue and there is no obstacle to pleasing God, as long as they are not negligent in their pursuit of the good on account of their own vanity, but gaze intensely and totally towards the ascetic ideal, they will appear as a blessed "generation of the upright" (Ps. 111 [112]:2), in the words of Solomon; and they will have plentiful abundance of gifts from heaven, and "their garner will be full, bursting with all manner of store" (Ps. 143 [144]:13), in the words of the psalmist, and "their streets will be streaming with butter, and the mountains with milk" (Job 29:6). For if they should light the gleaming lamps of the soul through pure health, and with the vigilant eyes of the soul should be well prepared to meet Christ the immaculate Bridegroom, they would obtain most abundantly the Lord's generous bestowal of earthly blessings, like a pledge and guarantee for their immediate and glorious arrival within the spiritual bridal chamber, "seeking the kingdom" (Matt. 6:33) of heaven, and acquiring everything else in addition.

[M14] But may it come to pass, O Christ the King, that this holy and spiritual husbandry of mine, with thee as cultivator and guardian of the immortal plants, may bring forth fruit at thirty-fold, at sixty-fold, and finally one hundred-fold (cf. Matt. 13:8), and therefrom [p. 244] may a spiritual ear of corn be produced that is beautiful and ripe, and worthy of the heavenly storerooms. For I made it full clear that it should be well guarded by the all-holy Virgin who gave birth to thee in an ineffable manner. Thus I have appointed her as guide and protector of this newly assembled flock, and I decided to have this holy sheepfold [i.e., the monastery] distinguished with her name, so that, as a dedication to thy Mother, it might receive thine aid more abundantly, and be preserved in a holy condition in perpetuity.

TWELFTH CENTURY

[M15] Therefore again I beg my successors as most holy bishops, my brethren and fellow ministers, to be satisfied with their commemoration alone, and not to acquire any other privileges at the aforementioned monastery, whether that of installation, or election of the superior, or conveying this monastery to other people as a grant, or sending and assigning a monk, whether he be a relative of theirs or a stranger, to have any authority in the monastery except for that of commemoration, as has already been stated. Therefore I adjure them, in the most awesome name of the Holy Trinity, never to consider the [fiscal] abuse or destruction or enslavement of the aforementioned monastery. For I ordain once and for all that it is to be free of any episcopal and official authority.

Thereto this [Memorandum] of mine has been confirmed with my signature and secured with a lead seal, depicting the exceedingly holy Mother of God on one side, and St. Theodore on the other. It was entrusted to the monks for safekeeping in October of the seventh indiction, in the year 6652 [= 1143 A.D.].

Typikon [T]

Typikon of the holy monastery composed by the founder of the same monastery.

Typikon of the humble Leo, lowly bishop of Argos and Nauplia, for the new monastery built by him at Areia in the name of the exceedingly holy Mother of God.

We thank thee, Christ the King, eternal and beyond all ages, cause and perfecter of every action and thought, because thou hast deemed thy humble [p. 245] and weak servant worthy to establish a holy monastery to the glory of thy most honored and magnificent name, as a dwelling place for the grace of our Lady, the Mother of God, who gave birth to thee in a manner beyond our powers of understanding and speech, as a training facility for ascetic men who worship thee, servants of thy Mother, lovers of virtue who are concerned for their own salvation. This is the desire of thine undefiled Mother, and the consequence of thy true power. For where and how and whence would we be able to carry out and accomplish this pious deed, if thy most powerful hand did not assist us? For without it the builder cannot build, nor can the guardian guard.

[T] 1. Concerning holy confession and the office in the cells

I ordain that on each occasion every doxology be celebrated zealously and without any omissions, and with the fitting attention and sobriety in accordance with the Studite *synaxarion*⁶ of the ecclesiastical office. It should be celebrated communally by all the brethren, since their life is communal. The other [office] should take place daily in their private cells, as each one [wishes] and is able, except for Saturdays and Sundays and the feast days of our Lord and the Virgin. For on these days alone they are to have a respite from their ascetic labors. I ordain, however, that a vigil should begin each Sunday evening, and on important feast days and all the feast days of the all-pure Mother of God.

31. AREIA

[T] 2. Concerning the divine liturgy and illumination, and the lighting of lamps in the divine sanctuary, and concerning the feast days

The divine and bloodless⁷ sacrifice should be celebrated each week, without fail on Saturday and Sunday, and there should also be a liturgy on any other day which happens to be a feast day of Our Lord or the Virgin or one of the more important saints; otherwise [the liturgy should be celebrated] once during these five days. [The monks] should exert care in each celebration of the eucharist; for in this [ceremony] the awesome mystery of our salvation is celebrated, and they should be purified in every way, and indeed of wicked thoughts (and by wicked thoughts I mean those tainted with any sort of passion). Those [monks] who are permitted by their confessor should [p. 246] take communion reverently and in awe of the divine sacraments, and they should remain until the completion [of the ceremony]. For no one is permitted to take communion of his own accord without the permission of the monk who is concerned for his soul, that is, the superior. For I want the monks to reveal their thoughts to him alone. Those who are going to take communion should sing the obligatory office at communion, in accordance with the rule. The so-called collation⁸ should take place at each eucharist, in accordance with the wishes of the superior, and the illumination should be more lavish.

[T] 3. Concerning the meals in the refectory and the number of monks

After the conclusion of the divine eucharist, or, if it is not celebrated, after the office of the customary hours, the monks should assemble in the narthex of the church. The semantron should be struck [as a signal] for mealtime. Then the monks should walk to the refectory singing aloud the customary psalm,⁹ with the superior leading the way, and following behind him the others who are going to eat at the first sitting. When they have thus entered and concluded the psalm, the superior should bless their food, and they should sit down in an orderly fashion, young and old mixed together, so that every idle word and any inappropriate behavior or bearing or gesture may be restrained. Each monk should yield his seat to another, or sit where bidden by the superior who is seated at the head of table. For no one who has taken the vows of monastic life should argue over precedence, or quarrel in a worldly fashion; and anyone who, without good cause, is absent from the communal entrance procession [into the refectory] . . . when the leftovers have been handed in . . . and the usual thanksgiving has been said, all the monks should rise together, singing the prescribed office. After grace is said by the superior as is customary, each monk should go to his own cell, and then engage in handiwork.

No monk is to have permission to eat by himself in his own cell, unless he is confined to bed by illness, or this is permitted by the superior as a dispensation. Nor is he to have any private possession in his cell. As for the quantity of food, you should follow the rule of the Studite typikon concerning meals in the refectory,¹⁰ as well as the discretion of the superior. You should follow the same procedure at suppertime. I, your unworthy founder, ordain that you eat three dishes daily on non-fast days and days for eating dry foods, but on feast days and memorial services you should eat up to five [dishes]. You should bathe on Saturday, except during Lent. For then all the monks, including the superior, should bathe on the Saturday of St. Lazarus,¹¹ and eat fish, and in the same way they should eat fish on the holy feast day of the Annunciation¹² in honor of the undefiled Mother of God. [p. 247]

TWELFTH CENTURY

[T] 4. Concerning the clothes of the monks

In accordance with the financial resources of the monastery haircloth tunics should be purchased and placed in the storeroom, for the monks to take when they need them, and furthermore the old tunics should be mended and used again. The same procedure should be followed with the cloaks and vests and footwear, in short all their garments, that whenever a monk needs something new, he should take the old garment to the storeroom, with the knowledge of the superior, and receive a new one in exchange. Let need be the measure for all the garments, thereby fulfilling the words of the Apostolic saying. "And distribution was made to each, as any had need" (Acts 4:35).

[T] 5. Concerning the Lenten fast

The typikon of Stoudios sets forth rules for the fast of Great Lent, as well as that of St. Philip,¹³ and its provisions should be followed on those days; but during the fast before the feast day of the Holy Apostles, let the monks eat twice a day if they wish, since the days are long at that time of year. For this fast differs from the non-fast days only in reciting the psalms at the third and sixth hours and then eating, and in abstaining from cheese and eggs.

[T] 6. Concerning the so-called "entrance gift"

I forbid the so-called "entrance gift," if it is of immovable property which is liable to taxation. But if someone offers to the Mother of God property not thus encumbered, it may be accepted as a dedication and gift and propitiation of sins. For I prefer the obedience of the new monk to any other entrance gift, especially if it is accompanied by some other effects which profit the ministries of the monastery.

[T] 7. Concerning the appointment of officials

There should also be [three] officials appointed by the superior with the approval and confirmation of the other monks, the treasurer, ecclesiarch and cellarer. They should be pious and energetic monks, who have led a blameless life and are irreproachable in every respect. At the appropriate times the officials should be admonished by the superior, both publicly and in private, to be careful and have fear of God, and to serve earnestly and with all love and honesty, since they have our immaculate Lady the Mother of God as their supervisor, and receive from her a reward for their accomplishments, but criticism for any improprieties. They also have an obligation to attend the [p. 248] services of prayer, when they can, and of their own accord to be concerned with psalmody, and not use their official duties as an excuse to be lazy and neglect the more important part.

[T] 8. Concerning the management of immovable properties

Since [the monastery] has acquired immovable properties, the superior must look after them, and make responsible for them an elderly and revered monk, who has led a blameless life, so that as a result of his proper management [the monks] may obtain therefrom the necessary foodstuffs from time to time.

31. AREIA

[T] 9. Concerning trouble-makers

If certain of the more negligent monks should stir up any kind of trouble, through the instigation of the devil, and if they should continue to argue and quarrel, even after a second and third admonition (cf. Tim. 3:10), and should disturb the peaceful monastic life, they should first of all be shut up in a cell for the sake of quiet and humility. If they should mend their ways, this is an accomplishment of the superior and the other monks; if they do not, they should be expelled as incorrigible, lest they infect the healthy monks with their corruption and cause even greater scandals. The same punishment is to be imposed on any monk who frequently disobeys the superior, and is shameless and incorrigible. I also forbid the monks to visit each other's cells without good reason, since this is a cause of idle chatter and suspicion, and those who cannot refrain from these superfluous conversations and idle talk should be subject to punishment.

[T] 10. Concerning the election of the superior.

After the death of the superior you should choose the most worthy monk, one who is best suited to rule a spiritual flock, a man who is agreeable and acceptable to all the monks, or at least the majority. [I do not want] any monk from another monastery, a so-called foreign tonsure to come to the holy monastery and take possession of it through some circumstance and dispensation. For I do not want him to be promoted to the position of superior, or to celebrate the liturgy in the church of our altogether glorious Mother of God, nor do I want a monk¹⁴ or "foreign tonsure"¹⁵ who comes from Nauplia to be promoted to the position of superior, since they are passionately devoted to their relatives, and live indeed "according to the flesh" (Rom. 8:5).

Then he should be led to the altogether glorious icon of our undefiled Lady, the Mother of God, to receive this typikon and the pastoral staff which [p. 249] are placed at that time in front of the icon. After the trisagion and supplicatory doxology, and after [the superior] has received these [objects] in the aforesaid manner, he should be enthroned by the ecclesiarch, and be embraced by the preeminent monks, and assume his duties of leadership from that time on. This is the procedure for the election of the superior, and it should continue this way in the future, since such an installation requires no other confirmation.

Therefore when the superior has been elected and installed in his position of authority, the monks should offer him in the future every honor, every service, every obedience, being guided and led by his gesture almost, and eagerly carrying out his orders without any opposition, since the superior ought to do nothing without their approval and knowledge, but with the knowledge and advice and consent of the preeminent monks. For the idiorhythmic and uncounseled life is perilous. For in the words of Proverbs, "Do everything with counsel" (Prov. 31:4), for to have authority over and lord it over affairs is alien to the monastic way of life, since it is tyrannical and compulsory. Therefore I ordain, as has been said, that the superior should use the preeminent monks as advisors. Their advice should not only be about what must be done, but also about costs and expenses. For the superior should always be mindful of the apostle who said, "All things are lawful for me, but not all things are helpful" (I Cor. 6:12). Therefore trying to avoid blame on all sides, I order that the officials be in charge of everything, collecting and disbursing and being accountable to the superior for the management of objects entrusted to them.

As for you, O superior (for my words are addressed to you), you need to love and cherish all the monks in your charge, and deem each one worthy of the appropriate care, spiritual and physical alike, as the opportunity provides, like a doting father always caring for your own children, and being “all things to all men, that you may save all” (I Cor. 9:22), in the words of the great apostle. For thus the bond of love will be unbreakable, and the law of obedience will be maintained and fulfilled among them.

TWELFTH CENTURY

[T] 11. Concerning the sacred vessels

A silver chalice with paten and two matching spoons, all together weighing 4 litrai, 3 ounces. A little silver cross. Other bronze chalices with paten, two pairs. Two silken cloths with letters. [p. 250]

[T] 12. That the monastery should remain independent, and concerning the commemorations to be held from time to time

Since with the aid of God I have ordained and disposed of the regulations and rules of the other chapters, I should now discuss briefly the independence of the monastery. For it is my will and desire that this aforementioned monastery remain independent until the end of the world, and free and unenslaved by emperors and patriarchs and monasteries and metropolitans and archbishops and bishops, by archimandrites and superiors, in short, by all men. For my memoranda provide sufficient guidance for the monastery, with the assistance of this commandment which, as worthless founder, I enjoin and ordain. Anyone whosoever who attempts in any way to rearrange these [regulations] and introduce a partial or complete change in them, I subject to the most abominable curses, and sentence to anathema, and pray that every “divine misfortune”¹⁶ and “wrath and indignation and distress” may befall this person, “a mission executed by evil angels” (Ps. 77 [78]:49), in the words of the great David.

Lord Jesus Christ, kind ruler, who puts in order large flocks and small, and magnifies them through thy grace, if anyone at all should attempt to oppose in any way my regulations and instructions, or to make subject to another this monastery which has been stipulated to be free and independent and completely autonomous, or to bring it under his own authority, or in any way or for any reason alter or impair its independence, whether it be an emperor or empress, whether patriarch or archbishop, or bishop, or metropolitan, or archimandrite, or superior of a monastery or any other ecclesiastic or civil official, or any man who is incited by the devil, whoever he may be, he will not only be considered liable for thy undefiled body, and honorable and life-giving blood, and will be alienated from thy portion, but will also inherit the curse of the three hundred and eighteen holy and divinely inspired fathers, and will cast his lot with the traitor [Judas], and will be associated and numbered with those who “cried out, ‘Away with him, away with him, crucify him!’” (John 19:15). I make the same curses against any monk of our monastery who attempts anything of this sort, whether he be the superior or another.

A commemoration should be held for my worthless self annually on the anniversary of my death, and on the next day for my blessed parents, [p. 251] the monk Nikodemos and nun Catherine, and for my brothers and sisters in the flesh, the monk Peter, and Helen, and the bishop John, and for my uncles who raised me, lord Constantine Antzas and the monk lord Iakobos, and together with them the deceased superiors, to the extent of the financial resources of the monastery. On the following day should be commemorated all the monks who have passed away, and all the monks in Nauplia should be invited to my commemoration.

[T] 13. Epilogue and exhortation and valedictory prayer

It is time now, my dearest and most ardently desired children, for me to make my final exhortation to you, my beloved and reverend monks, and to deliver my parting words. I will utter these words with tears and fervent exhortation. Therefore bend toward me the ears of understanding, and devote every attention to my words, and let each of you carry them forever in the storeroom of his soul, after inscribing them indelibly “on the tablets of the heart” (II Cor. 3:3). Strive above all to preserve this typon unaltered in all respects, take heed for the salvation of your souls, take care with regard to the church services and the office in your cells, “obey your leaders and submit to them” (Heb. 13:17), in accordance with the exhortation of the great Paul, be at peace with one another, maintain with all men love and “the holiness, without which no one will see the Lord” (Heb. 12:14), be humble, yield the chief offices to each other, be of one mind concerning the offices of the monastery, and be unified with regard to its prosperity and benefit, and to mention the most important point last, fear lest you not fear God; for in the words of Proverbs, “The fear of the Lord is the beginning of wisdom” (Prov. 1:7). Again I will make the final point last, fear to fear anything before God. For as the Scripture say, “Hear the end of the matter. The whole sum. Fear God, and keep his commandments; for this is the whole duty of man” (Eccl. 12:13). For it is truly fearful, brethren, “it is a fearful thing to fall into the hands of the living God” (Heb. 10:31), and fearful is “the face of the Lord against evil-doers” (Ps. 33 [34]:16), and it makes wickedness to disappear with total destruction.

I should have liked to say even more to you, but you have the books of the holy fathers which resound in your ears and explain everything [p. 252] in detail on each occasion. However, O Lady and Mistress of all, O servant and Mother of Christ the King, our true God, O bridge which crosses over to the blessed and passionless life, and ladder which rises up to heaven, O God-containing sanctuary, in whom Christ dwelt and on account of his compassion wrought the great mystery of our salvation, destroying the barrier of enmity, and uniting earthly to heavenly objects, O place of propitiation for the whole world to God! To thee this monastery is devoted and dedicated, and it is honored and glorified by thy magnificent name. Accept our many and long toils and labors which we lay down as a foundation for its prosperity, and may thou reward thy unworthy servants with a dwelling place in the monasteries of heaven, preserving this modest flock against harm. May the divine grace of thy visitation assist the incumbent shepherd with his flock, and may it raise an abundant and plentiful flock and make it fat and worthy of Christ the Chief Shepherd. May both shepherds and flock appear together before him, pure and radiant and not unworthy of the heavenly sheepfold.

Children, remember my love for you and my paternal attitude, and pray for your wretched servant, so that I may receive the portion of those who are saved, having found some confidence and moderate grace, through the intercession of the Mother of God and as a result of your¹⁷ labors and holy prayers, before the awesome tribunal of our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ, to whom be glory and power together with the Father and Holy Spirit, for generations to come, Amen.

TWELFTH CENTURY

[Later addition]

Since the monastery also has fishing boats, it is my wish that each Sunday, when a vigil is performed, the monks eat five or six dishes of fish, or as much as they wish, and also when your worthless servant is commemorated, and the others, and on the feast day of [St. John] the Forerunner, the Holy Apostles, the holy prophets Daniel, Elijah and Elisha, St. Andrew, St. John the Theologian, [St. John] Chrysostom, St. Basil, St. . . .¹⁸

Notes on the Translation

Editors' note: The assistance of our translator, Alice-Mary Talbot [AMT], is gratefully acknowledged for the notes to this document.

1. For this locality and the possible identity of the convent with the monastery of Merbaka, see Choras, Hagia Mone, p. 55, n. 4.
2. See [M1], [M4] above.
3. protector, guardian.
4. The referent is probably lost in the lacuna in this chapter.
5. Read diakonias. [AMT]
6. Some contemporary variant of (4) Stoudios.
7. Read anaimaktos. [AMT]
8. Read diaklysmos. [AMT]
9. Ps. 144 [145], as in (27) Kecharitomene [40] and (28) Pantokrator [9].
10. (4) Stoudios [29].
11. Saturday before Palm Sunday.
12. Feast of the Annunciation, March 25.
13. Fast of St. Philip, from November 15 until Christmas, as regulated in (4) Stoudios [29].
14. Read apobion. [AMT]
15. xenokouriten. [AMT]
16. Euripides, Orestes 2.
17. Read hymeteron. [AMT]
18. Feast of St. John the Forerunner, June 24; feast of the Holy Apostles Peter and Paul, June 29; feast of the prophet Daniel, December 17; feast of the prophet Elijah, July 20; feast of the prophet Elisha, June 14; feast of St. Andrew, November 30; feast of St. John the Theologian, May 8; feast of St. John Chrysostom, November 13; feast of St. Basil, January 1.

Document Notes

1. Memorandum [M]

- [M1] Prior foundation of a convent on the site. The author employed a memorandum like the present document to establish the convent's independence; cf. parallel provisions in [M11], [M15] below. This document is mentioned again in [M4] and [M5] below.
- [M2], [M3] Nuns moved for fear of pirates. For the unsettled conditions in the Aegean in the Komnenian era, see also (24) Christodoulos Institutional History, C-D.
- [M4] Relocation of convent to Bouze; establishment of a male monastery on the previous site at Areia. Note that the author provides the episcopal blessing (sphragis) to the superior that he denies as a right to his successors in [M15] below.
- [M5] The convent to retain its consecrated properties at Areia. The author has not issued a new memorandum for the convent at Bouze; the earlier one, for which see [M1], [M4] above, will remain valid.

31. AREIA

- [M6] Relationship of the superior to the nunnery. See also (40) Anargyroi [7] and discussion of the canonical authorities on double monasteries in (54) Neilos Damilas [8]. Typically, though not always, a man was chosen to administer the properties of a convent; see (27) Kecharitomene [15], (39) Lips [25]; cf. (57) Bebaia Elpis [54], where, as here at Bouze, there was a female steward.
- [M7] Qualifications of the superior; installation ceremony. See more detailed provisions in [T10] below; cf. (22) Evergetis [13] and related documents.
- [M8] Recommendation of the typikon of Meletios for liturgy and diet; equality in food and drink, except for the sick. See also [T1] and [T3] below. For dietary equality, see (10) Eleousa [4], [11]; (22) Evergetis [26] and related documents; and (23) Pakourianos [4].
- [M9] Appointment of the steward, ecclesiarch, and treasurer. See also [T7] below; these three officials evidently fulfill the governing role of the “preminent” monks in other institutions, for which see (10) Eleousa [16] and (22) Evergetis [14] and related documents; cf. (23) Pakourianos [5], [19] and (24) Christodoulos [A20].
- [M10] Only tax-free gifts of immovable property acceptable. See also [T6] below, which places the same restriction on voluntary entrance gifts. (24) Christodoulos [A9], [A10] documents another founder’s efforts to secure an endowment of entirely tax-free properties.
- [M11] Independence of the monastery; no protectors (ephoroi) or charistikarioi; freedom from episcopal control. See also [T12] below for institutional independence, and [M15] for the limitation of episcopal rights.
- [M12] Episcopal representatives barred from premises. This is, of course, a provision of dubious legality, but see the similarly emphatic declaration in (18) Nea Gephyra [2].
- [M14] Appointment of the Mother of God as protector. For other appeals to heavenly protection, see (19) Attaleiates [7], [15]; (28) Pantokrator [71]; and (29) Kosmosoteira [119].
- [M15] Limitation of privileges of the bishops. See [M11] above and the similar discussion by the author of (10) Eleousa [16], another bishop, who permitted the episcopal blessing (sphragis) forbidden here.

2. Typikon [T]

- [T1] Studite synaxarion to regulate the office; daily private office in the cells. See also [M8] above. For other recommendations of the Studite liturgical typikon, see (20) Black Mountain [23], (26) Luke of Messina [10], and (33) Heliou Bomon [8], [46]. Note that this apparently contradicts [M8] above, which recommends the typikon of Meletios, unless the latter itself was a Studite typikon. For the private celebration of the office, see (22) Evergetis [4] and related documents.
- [T2] Celebration of the liturgy; frequency of communion; exclusive confession to the superior. See analogous provisions in (22) Evergetis [5], [7], cf. [15], and related documents.
- [T3] Refectory procedures; no arguments over seating precedence; no secret eating; no private possessions; Studite typikon to regulate diet; weekly bathing. See also [M8] above. This chapter shows the influence of (22) Evergetis [9], cf. [22] and related documents as well as (4) Stoudios [28]. For the regulation of bathing, see (22) Evergetis [28]; (27) Kecharitomene [58]; (29) Kosmosoteira [97], [113]; (32) Mamas [28]; (33) Heliou Bomon [28]; and (58) Menoikeion [15]. This is by far the most generous provision; (30) Phoberos [46] prohibits bathing entirely except for the sick.
- [T4] Communal wardrobe. See similar provisions in (22) Evergetis [25] and related documents, (10) Eleousa [5], (27) Kecharitomene [52], and (28) Pantokrator [22].
- [T5] Diet for fasts to be governed by the Studite typikon. See (4) Stoudios [29], [30], [31]; cf. parallel provisions of (22) Evergetis [10] and related documents.
- [T6] Taxable entrance donations forbidden. See also [M10] above, putting the same restriction on donations of property; cf. (22) Evergetis [37] and related documents.
- [T7] Appointment of the treasurer, ecclesiarch, and cellarer. See [M9] above; cf. the somewhat different composition of the three treasurers in (22) Evergetis [30], (29) Kosmosoteira [36], and (30) Phoberos [47].

TWELFTH CENTURY

- [T8] Qualifications of the property administrator. See the similar provisions in (22) Evergetis [34] and related documents. Officials of this sort are also discussed in (9) Galesios [221], [244] and (27) Kecharitomene [31].
- [T9] Disciplinary procedures. For the monastic prison, see earlier provisions in (4) Stoudios [25] and (11) Ath. Rule [19]; for a similar rule against visiting in cells, see (22) Evergetis [21] and related documents.
- [T10] Election and installation of the superior; governance in consultation with the preeminent monks; exhortation to the superior. See [M7] above; this chapter shows the strong imprint of (22) Evergetis [13], [17], cf. related documents.
- [T11] Inventory of sacred vessels. See the more substantial inventories of movable property in (19) Attaleiates [INV 6], [INV 8], [INV 11], and (23) Pakourianos [33B].
- [T12] Independence of the monastery; commemorations for the founder's family and departed superiors and monks. See [M11] above, and similar provisions for independence in (22) Evergetis [12] and related documents, and (28) Pantokrator [69].
- [T13] Final exhortation. Cf. analogous chapters in (22) Evergetis [42] and related documents.
- [Later addition] Consumption of fish on feast days. For evidence of fishing by monks to supplement their diet in other documents, see (29) Kosmosoteira [66], (33) Heliou Bomon [19], and (43) Kasoulon [25].

32. Mamas: Typikon of Athanasios Philanthropenos for the Monastery of St. Mamas in Constantinople

Date: November 1158

Translator: Anastasius Bandy

Edition employed: S. Eustratiades, “Typikon tes en Konstantinoupolei mones tou hagiou megalomartyros Mamantos,” Hellenika 1 (1928), 256–314, with text at 256–311. See also corrections by V. Laurent, “Remarques critiques sur le texte du typikon du monastère de Saint-Mamas,” EO 30 (1931), 233–42, and by A. Sigalas, EEBS 7 (1930), 399–405.

Manuscripts: Parisinus, supplément grec 92 (late 12th–13th c.); supplemented by Codex 85, nunc 79, Theological School, Halki, now in the Patriarchal Library, Istanbul (1761).¹

Other translations: None

Institutional History

A. Prior History of the Foundation

The early history of the foundation is dependent on unreliable sources and therefore remains highly conjectural. The church of St. Mamas, which was located in southwestern Constantinople near the Xylokerkos (modern Belgrad-Kapou) Gate, may have been founded by Pharasmanes, the chamberlain (epi tou koitonos) of Justinian (527–565), then perhaps restored a generation later by Gordia, sister of Maurice (582–602), who may have been responsible also for adding the monastery.² Maurice, his wife Constantina, and their children were buried there.³

Mamas had likely become an imperial monastery by the early ninth century, when it served as a place of confinement in 809 for Theodore the Studite, his uncle Plato, and his brother Joseph at the orders of Nikephoros I (802–811).⁴ Its status is confirmed by an order of Romanos I Lekapenos (920–944) in 922 to move the tombs of Maurice and his family to that emperor’s own monastery of Myrelaion.⁵

Perhaps Mamas had become a patriarchal responsibility by the time Patriarch Nicholas II Chrysoberges (979–991) appointed Symeon the Theologian as its superior, either in 980 or 984.⁶ This monk, the greatest mystic of the middle Byzantine period, had begun his career, circa 977, at the Stoudios monastery, from which, however, he was soon expelled. He then joined the Mamas monastery, then under the direction of a certain Antony, where he lived for several years before his designation as the foundation’s leader. The monastery was in a state of decay. Neighbors had been using part of the site as a cemetery. Symeon removed the obstructions, restored the facilities, and replaced the furnishings in the monastery’s church. Symeon served as superior for more than two decades, down to his resignation under pressure from the patriarchal chancellor Stephen of Nikomedeia in 1005, having survived a revolt by some thirty of his monks a few years before with the support of Patriarch Sisinnios II (996–998).

TWELFTH CENTURY

Symeon's designated successor was the eunuch monk Arsenios. Symeon himself died at the monastery of St. Marina at Chrysopolis in the capital city's Asiatic suburbs in 1022. His remains were not returned to Mamas for burial until 1053. After Symeon's death, the monastery came under the control of various charistikarioi, very soon thereafter if our foundation is identical to the monastery dedicated to St. Mamas that is mentioned in the Peira of Eustathios Rhomaios (†1034) as the subject of a charistike.⁷

*B. Revival under George the Cappadocian and His Brother Theocharistos*⁸

According to our typikon, the depredations of the charistikarioi brought the foundation to near total ruin. George the Cappadocian, steward of the imperial treasury under Manuel I Komnenos (1143–80), became interested in the foundation early in that emperor's reign, perhaps because the dedicatee St. Mamas was a popular martyr of the third century from George's ancestral homeland. The monastic buildings had collapsed, there were only two non-resident monks, and the church stood roofless. Since the monastery was at that time under patriarchal jurisdiction, George sought and obtained its concession to himself (and his legal heir) as charistikarios from Kosmas II Attikos (1146–47) in a patriarchal memorandum. First, he had to persuade squatters to abandon the property, then he began work on the restoration. Later, fearing that subsequent charistikarioi might lack his own personal piety, George obtained a grant of institutional independence for Mamas from a later patriarch, Nicholas IV Muzalon (1147–51), evidently to take effect upon the expiration of the charistike.

More substantial renovations and repairs followed. The patron recruited our author Athanasios Philanthropenos, then steward of the imperial monastery of Christ Philanthropos founded at the beginning of the twelfth century by Emperor Alexios I Komnenos and his wife Irene to serve as the superior of the rebuilt monastery. At the end of his life, George himself became a monk at the monastery under the name Gregory. The work was not yet complete at his death.

George had named his brother Theocharistos as his successor. The new patron then built the monastery's refectory and bath. For his part, the superior Athanasios obtained a patriarchal concession⁹ that made the foundation's formerly contingent independence effective immediately. The protector Theocharistos was still alive in November 1158 to sign the foundation's typikon, along with Athanasios and all of the monks of the community.

Some five years later, the First Semeioma was drawn up to establish a record of the historical circumstances leading to the re-establishment of the monastery and to authenticate the typikon. The nomophylax Theodore Pantechnes granted a judicial confirmation of this document on January 5, 1164, by which time the patron Theocharistos was already dead. His successor was likely Nikephoros the mystikos, author of (33) Heliou Bomon.¹⁰

Finally, Athanasios took the precaution in 1171 of depositing the original typikon, the inventory, and the various privileges of the foundation in the monastery of Christ Philanthropos for safekeeping. The Second Semeioma of March 15, 1171, was drawn up to provide a record of the deposition.

C. Subsequent History of the Foundation

Emperor Isaac II Angelos (1185–95) restored the monastery, at which time an especially appropriate relic, the head of St. Mamas, was brought from Cappadocia to Constantinople for deposit at the foundation.¹¹ The monastery and its relics are mentioned by the Russian traveler Antony of Novgorod on his visit to Constantinople shortly before 1204.¹² After the Latin conquest of Constantinople, the monastery lost its prized relic of St. Mamas, which was taken away to the cathedral of Langres in France in 1209, but evidently Greek monks were still resident in 1236–40, when the monastery was visited by Dominican monks in an effort to compel the priest Luke to assent to Latin liturgical usages.¹³

The foundation reappears in the historical record in the fourteenth century. In 1350 or 1351, John VI Kantakouzenos (1347–54) contemplated retiring from the throne to Mamas.¹⁴ Shortly thereafter, Patriarch Kallistos I (1350–53, 1355–63) actually did seek refuge at Mamas for several years when he was compelled to abandon the patriarchal palace after refusing to recognize the elevation of John VI's son Matthew Kantakouzenos (1353–57) to the co-emperorship in 1353.¹⁵ The last record of the monastery's existence is in 1399, when Patriarch Matthew (1397–1410) judged a case before his synod in which Mamas was represented by its ktetor or "owner" Nicholas Sophianos.¹⁶ It is not known, therefore, whether the foundation survived till the fall of Constantinople to the Turks in 1453, and no remains of the foundation have been identified in modern Istanbul.

Analysis

This remarkable typikon assimilates nearly a century of the Evergetian reform tradition and sums up the work of three generations of monastic reformers. Although it is undeniably a member of the Evergetian family of monastic typika, the frankly more aristocratic biases of its author, a former steward of the imperial monastery of Philanthropos in Constantinople, are evident in its willing acceptance of the protectorate (ephoreia) and its many relaxations of monastic discipline. The stern Evergetian vision of cenobiticism was clearly becoming an ever more distant memory in calmer and more stable times, though the typikon of the author's contemporary Isaac Komnenos, (29) Kosmosoteira, shows that it was still possible to found a monastery based on more pristine (if also increasingly archaic) Evergetian principles.

Annexed to the typikon are several documents: 1) a judicial confirmation dated January 1164, which serves to introduce 2) the First Semeioma, dated to January 5, 1164; 3) an "Addition," dated April 1171, introduces 4) the Second Semeioma. The First Semeioma serves as a history of the foundation and as an authentication of the typikon. The Second Semeioma makes an arrangement for the preservation of the typikon and other essential documents in the sacristy of the Philanthropos monastery.

A. Sources for the Typikon

1. Relationship to (22) Evergetis

At several places in the typikon the author mentions the use of the synaxarion of the Evergetis monastery by his monks for the regulation of ecclesiastical services.¹⁷ By this he means the liturgical typikon of that foundation. Unlike Isaac Komnenos in (29) Kosmosoteira [8], however, the author of this document does not acknowledge the indebtedness of the actual wording of his typikon to (22) Evergetis, the founder's typikon of the great reform monastery. This may be because he evidently employed at least one other post-Evergetian text even if he did also have direct access to (22) Evergetis. By way of contrast, as recently as 1152 Isaac Komnenos appears to have been able to excerpt directly from a copy of (22) Evergetis even if his version of that text was somewhat different from the text that has come down to us today.

2. Analytic Chapter Groups¹⁸

Subjected to a careful analysis, the chapters of (32) Mamas can be divided into four groups. Group A is made up of sixteen chapters of what appears to be entirely new material.¹⁹ There are some parallel treatments for the topics covered in these chapters in (22) Evergetis and (27) Kecharitomene, but there is no textual sharing between these two earlier documents and (32) Mamas. Group B is made up of twenty chapters for which (32) Mamas has textual links with both (22) Evergetis and (27) Kecharitomene.²⁰ Group C includes the four chapters that (32) Mamas shares only with (22) Evergetis.²¹ Finally, Group D includes eight chapters from a post-Evergetian source that (32) Mamas shares only with (27) Kecharitomene.²²

Group B, the Maman chapters linked with both (22) Evergetis and (27) Kecharitomene, is amenable to additional division into three subgroups. In Subgroup B.1 are thirteen Maman chapters that utilize a source clearly closer to (22) Evergetis than (27) Kecharitomene though there is in every case a parallel treatment in the latter document as well.²³ On the other hand, in Subgroup B.2 there are five Maman chapters that utilize (27) Kecharitomene or some source like it, while there are parallel treatments in (22) Evergetis.²⁴ Finally, in Subgroup B.3. there are two chapters in which (32) Mamas appears to be drawing simultaneously on the textual traditions of (22) Evergetis and (27) Kecharitomene.²⁵

3. Interpretation of the Analytic Chapter Groups

The simplest way to interpret the evidence of this source analysis is to suppose that our author had before him the texts as we have them of (27) Kecharitomene and (22) Evergetis. The former he would have used as a model for the eight chapters in Group D and the five in Subgroup B.2, while the latter he would have employed to write the four chapters in Group C and the thirteen chapters in Subgroup B.1; then both documents for the two chapters in Subgroup B.3.

However, because of the large number of chapters (28) linked in some way to (27) Kecharitomene (those in Groups B and D) as opposed to those few (4) (in Group C) that can be traced only to (22) Evergetis, it seems rather unlikely that the author of (32) Mamas actually had the Evergetian typikon in front of him as John, the author of (30) Phoberos and Isaac Komnenos, the author of (29) Kosmosoteira, surely did. On the other hand, the existence of the chapters in Group C are a convincing indication that (27) Kecharitomene could not have been the author's only model whether he in fact drew directly upon it or not.

The close, trusting relationship between Mamas and the imperial monastery of Philanthropos (for which see below, D.7) suggests another possibility, namely that the typikon of that monastery, rather than that of its companion foundation, Kecharitomene, was the actual model for (32) Mamas. As a monastery co-founded by Empress Irene Doukaina Komnena along with the convent of Kecharitomene, it is possible that its now lost typikon would have been similar but not identical to (27) Kecharitomene. It would also have been an easier matter for our author to adopt the typikon of a monastery for his purposes than that of a convent. The fact that our author was himself the steward in Philanthropos before being recruited by Mamas' patron George the Cappadocian to serve as superior of the latter institution also supports the thesis that, as a self-admitted procrastinator (see the Prologue), he simply turned to an existing typikon he knew intimately well when he finally got around to composing one for Mamas.

If this thesis is accepted, the four Evergetian chapters in Mamas' Group C can be explained as importations from (22) Evergetis into the lost typikon of Philanthropos that for various reasons were not appropriate borrowings for (27) Kecharitomene.²⁶ The use of Philanthropos as a model rather than (27) Kecharitomene would also help explain the composite character of the twenty Maman chapters in Group B, with some chapters (Subgroup B.1) closer to (22) Evergetis than others (Subgroup B.2).

The radical discrepancies in the numeration and order of comparable chapters in (32) Mamas and (27) Kecharitomene make it unlikely that our author simply transcribed the Philanthropos typikon for his new monastery unless Philanthropos itself was very considerably different in these aspects from (27) Kecharitomene.

B. Utility for the History of the Reform Movement

Just as (27) Kecharitomene provides us with a convenient update on the course of the Byzantine monastic reform movement, specifically for the forty years or so between the early reform era circa 1070 and the second decade of the twelfth century when that typikon was composed, so also does (32) Mamas, serving the same purpose for the next forty years or so until its composition in 1158. As a matter of fact, the text of (32) Mamas contains embedded within itself several layers of monastic institutions and practices that stretch over three generations of the monastic reform movement.

The most purely Evergetian materials, dating back to the last quarter of the eleventh century or earlier, are to be found in the four chapters of Group C. These were revived by our author or his source after they had failed to find favor with the author of (27) Kecharitomene. Next are the thirteen primarily Evergetian-based chapters in Subgroup B.1, which include a good deal of the more egalitarian ideology in the model typikon that was acceptable to the authors of both (27) Kecharitomene and (32) Mamas. The content of these chapters may be as old as that of those in Group C but it had remained in continuous favor.

The five chapters in Subgroup B.2 form the first layer in (32) Mamas from the creative work of the second generation of the reform movement. They have deep Evergetian institutional and ideological roots, but were heavily reworked at the time of (27) Kecharitomene's composition. Included are procedures for the election of the superior [1], the regulation of entrance gifts [5], the investiture of officials [6], a ban on secret eating [20], and instructions for commemoration of deceased monks [39]. They show the work of the second generation of reformers as they sought to remedy deficiencies in (22) Evergetis and to elaborate on matters that were by then of greater concern.

The two chapters in Subgroup B.3, the declaration of the independence of the monastery [4] in a more developed form than in (22) Evergetis [12] and a revision of the Evergetian dietary provisions for non-fast days [17], are composites of materials shared with both (22) Evergetis and (27) Kecharitomene. Although dating in their original Evergetian form to some time in the late eleventh century, these two chapters had been reformulated by the time (27) Kecharitomene was composed in the second decade of the twelfth century or perhaps a little later.

The eight non-Evergetian chapters in Group D are the last and most original part of the contributions of the second generation. They include a careful formulation of the rights and responsibilities of the protector [3], a distinctly non-Evergetian institution, a series of descriptions of the duties of other monastic officials [8] through [12], a militant defense of the cenobitic life [25], and a ban on kelliotic monks and imposed guests (katapemptoi) [26]. This group of chapters, textually independent of (22) Evergetis, must have been composed well after the triumph of the reform movement had been assured. We see through them the concerns of the second generation as its members turned their attention to such matters as curbing financial irregularities from within the monastery and attempting to reformulate the protectorate as a benign and useful institution.

The last layer of (32) Mamas is made up of the chapters in Group A, our author's apparently original contributions, to which must be added also all the many changes he introduced in the chapters of the other groups. Most of these chapters are more "original" textually than conceptually, however. His freshly written provisions for the reading of the typikon [16], the admonition to show respect to the superior [24], the ban on access for women [27], the obligation to make confession to the superior [29], and the prescriptions for the canonical hours [31] all have parallel treatments in (22) Evergetis even though there is no textual dependency. But even in these chapters the author introduces some substantive changes (see the detailed topical discussions below) that reflect the concerns of his, the third generation of monastic reformers.

C. Lives of the Monks

1. Number of Monks

The typikon sets [5] the number of monks at twenty, with the possibility of a later increase made possible by better financial management or additional donations from benefactors, provided sufficient cells were available to house the new monks. Such an increase in fact seems to have happened, judging from the list of twenty-eight monks' names (plus the author and the monastery's protector) at the end of the document, yet as was the case for the monastery for which (30) Phoberos was written, the size of the foundation remained considerably smaller than it had been before the charistike.

2. Liturgical Duties

Two to three priests and two deacons were to be assigned [5] to the church to attend to services performed there. Almost as an afterthought towards the end of the document, the author provides [47] a summary of the required liturgical services that has been written up from (22) Evergetis [3], [4], [6]. The service of the third and sixth hours had been discussed [31] earlier in the typikon. As in the contemporary (29) Kosmosoteira [80], only illness could excuse [21] a monk from participation in the services of the canonical hours or vigils; the author promises a diet of dry food and water as a punishment for repeat offenders.

This somewhat casual treatment of liturgical duties, combined with an incidental observation [18] that "those who chant are very few" (perhaps the ecclesiarch along with the four priests and the deacon who have signed the typikon), might be taken to indicate that at this foundation (unlike (28) Pantokrator [32] or (29) Kosmosoteira [3]) the performance of the canonical hours was not the most important of the responsibilities of its monks.

3. Manual Labor

The description [47] of the canonical hours amends its source (22) Evergetis [4] by indicating that some monks will go “to their tasks” after the performance of the service of the first hour. We know from descriptions of their duties that the monastery had [11] a cellarer, an assistant, and a cook in the kitchen; there was also [12] a gatekeeper. The monks’ signatures at the end of the document include those of two vine-dressers, a groom, a baker, and a gardener as well as the above-mentioned gatekeeper. The author also repeats [23] the exhortation found in (22) Evergetis [33] that was intended to reassure those engaged in responsibilities outside the church of the value of their work. He specifically provides [19] that vine-dressers, gardeners and others working outside the monastery should take meals along with the other monks in order that “the name ‘brotherhood’ may not be just a name.”

4. Length of the Novitiate

In a regulation based on (22) Evergetis [37], the author provides [22] for a novitiate of two years, except for “distinguished people” and those already well known to the monks, who were to receive tonsure after six months. The distinction was known even to reform monasteries, with (22) Evergetis [37] providing tonsure for the privileged “within the customary period of time,” and (27) Kecharitomene [30] “when the superior judges it beneficial.” The author here has considerably lengthened the novitiate for ordinary postulants that (22) Evergetis [37] and the contemporary (29) Kosmosoteira [55] had set at only six months. Applicants who had been tonsured at other monasteries were also eligible [22] for admission.

5. Sacramental Life

The author’s prescriptions [32] for the holy liturgy and the reception of communion follow his model (22) Evergetis [5], with some small changes. The liturgy was to be celebrated at least four times a week and on feasts of the Lord, i.e., less frequently than the daily liturgies at Evergetis but more frequently than the twice-weekly liturgies prescribed in (31) Areia [T2]. As in (22) Evergetis, the superior was to regulate the monks’ frequency of reception of communion, but the guidelines offered both for monks “free from passions” and others are considerably more strict than in that earlier typikon.

The author incorporates [30] the exhortation to confession found in (22) Evergetis [7], but devises his own regulation [29] providing for confession to the superior “even if he happens to be unordained” because of a special permission the latter has to hear confessions that has been obtained from the patriarch. He breaks [29] with Evergetian precedent in permitting a monk who did not want to have his superior as his confessor to be assigned an alternative confessor by the superior.

6. Cenobitic Lifestyle

In a chapter shared with (27) Kecharitomene [2], the author proclaims [25] that the cenobitic order should be permanent and unalterable. Later on in the typikon in a chapter of his own composition, he asserts [41] that the essential purpose of drawing up a typikon in the first place was to assure the continuance of cenobiticism. For specific details of the cenobitic regime, he defers in part to basic principles set forth in (22) Evergetis [9], [26], including equality [34] in food and drink (but not clothing) for all, and a ban [36] on arguments over precedence at table. For other Evergetian regulations like the ban on secret eating and the provision for the superior to visit cells to confiscate unauthorized possessions, he prefers to use language shared with (27) Kecharitomene [22], [27]. He also adopts [46] the Evergetian overview²⁷ of how harmonious relations among the monks should be preserved in a cenobitic institution. He adds [35] his own regulation against idle talking during manual labor or while traveling outside the monastery.

In some important particulars, however, the author dilutes the stern Evergetian version of cenobitic life. His regulation on refectory seating significantly changes [36] the overall effect of the Evergetian passage on which it is modeled by providing instructions for seating by order of precedence and by deleting the earlier typikon's harsh characterization of monks who questioned the superior's arrangements. In the matter of the monks' clothing the author also makes a significant innovation. He decides [28] to abandon the communal provision of clothing and substitute for it the payment of a twice-yearly cash allowance. He evidently thought [28] it would be necessary to provide a cash allowance to the monks to buy soap and pay the fee to use a bathhouse outside the monastery.

7. Servants Not Permitted

The author is an exception from the trend seen in other twelfth-century monasteries to provide a few servants to tend to the needs of a larger number of monks or nuns.²⁸ Instead, in [34] he follows (22) Evergetis [24]'s ban on personal servants, to which he adds also domestic workers. He prefers that the monks should help one another, the younger the older, the stronger the weaker, the novice the experienced monk, etc., at the superior's discretion. This suggests a pattern of cohabitation as found in the Evergetian typikon (as well as in the contemporary (29) Kosmosoteira [51]) though the author does not specifically endorse it.

8. Diet

The author draws [17] upon a source in the post-Evergetian tradition for his account of refectory procedures and diet on ordinary days. This includes a second sitting at the noon meal for servers, as in (27) Kecharitomene [45]. He allows the steward or the ecclesiarch to stand in for the superior to relieve him of the duty of presiding over meals personally. While keeping to the received tradition, the author also feels compelled "for the sake of the canons" to supply additional guidance for special situations, such as when a feast of the Lord should happen to occur on a fast day.

As usual, changes in the traditional monastic diet were evolutionary. The author gives [18] the superior discretionary authority to make changes in the dietary prescriptions during the fast of the Holy Apostles. He himself provides for a substitution of wine for water during the first week of the Lenten fast "since those who chant the office are very few and the office is long." The need to refute certain heresies (the so-called Artzibourians and others) also led to an insistence [19] on dietary practices opposed to those of the sectaries.

9. Bathing

As noted, the founder originally expected [28] that his monks would need to use a bath outside the monastery. This they were to be allowed to do on a monthly basis, that is, at the same frequency as provided for in the contemporary (29) Kosmosoteira [97] though not as often as in (28) Pantokrator [15]. Later, as noted in the First Semeioma, the founder's brother Theocharistos was able to build a bath for the monks' use at the foundation.

10. Care of Sick and Elderly Monks

The superior was to designate [33] someone to take care of the monastery's elderly monks, both men of learning and the illiterate. They would be released from work but continue to receive the same food and drink as young and healthy monks.

Unlike many other foundations that were equipping themselves to care for sick monks on their own premises,²⁹ the author of this typikon prefers to rely [34] on the medical services available from one or the other of two hospices (xenones) in the neighborhood of his monastery. As also in (22) Evergetis [41], sick monks were to receive [34], at the superior's discretion, extra food and drink and other necessities. Food was to be brought to these monks if they were admitted to one of the hospices.

11. Burial

The author provides [39] that monks were to be buried on the right side of the church. His prescriptions for their funerals and memorial services are shared with (27) Kecharitomene [70], in that kollyba would be prepared and distributed in honor of the deceased at the third, ninth and fortieth-day memorial services (cf. (27) Kecharitomene [71] and (28) Pantokrator [8]), and likewise stauria on the traditional annual days for remembering the dead, the Saturdays of Meatfare, Cheesefare and Pentecost. Departed superiors were to be the beneficiaries of especially generous memorial services.

D. Constitutional Matters

1. Independent and Self-Governing Status

The author asserts [4] the independence of his foundation based on the authority of a patriarchal memorandum (hypomnema) and an imperial chrysobull. He adopts mostly post-Evergetian language shared with (27) Kecharitomene [1] to reject the possibility that the foundation should come under the charistike, epidosis, ephoreia, or any of the other traditional vehicles for exploiting monastic property. According to the First Semeioma, the "new builder" George the Cappadocian obtained the memorandum recognizing the monastery's independence from Patriarch Nicholas IV Muzalon (1147–51); the confirming chrysobull was granted by Emperor Manuel I Komnenos (1143–80). According to the typikon's prologue, the monastery's independence did not take effect immediately with the issuance of these documents. This independence was to be postponed until George's death, at which time our author Athanasios was able to complete the process of conversion of this former patriarchal monastery into an independent foundation.

2. Responsibilities of the Protector

This monastery, like the imperial foundations (27) Kecharitomene [3] and (28) Pantokrator [70], had had a protectorate established [3] over it. The incumbent, Theocharistos, was the brother of George the Cappadocian who had entrusted him with the protectorate (see First Semeioma). Theocharistos may also have been the second person designated in his brother's grant when, according to the typikon's Prologue, an unnamed patriarch (identified in the First Semeioma as Kosmas II Attikos [1146–47]) awarded George the then ruined monastery under the charistike. Theocharistos, like his brother before him, was to patronize the foundation, defend its interests, and prevent violations of the typikon (cf. also [38]). He also had the exceptional right to add or delete anything he wished in the document since, as the author declares [15] later, “to the latter alone we have given license to do whatever at all he wishes that contributes to the benefit and support of the monastery.”

Theocharistos was to be succeeded [3] in office by whoever happened to be serving as the imperial mystikos at the time of his death. In a formulaic post-Evergetian regulation shared with (27) Kecharitomene [3], the typikon specifically forbids [3] future protectors from exercising authority, changing the typikon (so also [15]), removing the superior, enrolling or expelling monks, holding the superior or the steward fiscally accountable, demanding financial information, or appropriating any of the foundation’s possessions. These are the very things that the monastic reformers condemned the former charistikarioi—who ruined this and many other foundations—for doing.

This approach to scaling back a protector’s powers in the second generation amounts to a gradual phasing out of arbitrary patronal authority. It recalls provisions in other documents, e.g., (10) Eleousa [16] and (19) Attaleiates [26], [33], under which only the first successor of the founder was allowed to exercise certain extraordinary rights.

3. The Election of the Superior

The author’s provisions [1] for the election of the superior draw heavily on a post-Evergetian source shared with (27) Kecharitomene [11], but produce an independent and not completely consistent result. His precise intentions as to how the election was to take place under various contingencies and what roles the various actors, particularly the protector, were to play in it, are not clear. The difficulty seems to have arisen out of the author’s desire to preserve as much of the precise wording of his model as possible while proposing a very different set of roles and procedures. In disagreement with his model, he wanted the superior alone to be responsible for nominating three candidates for the succession before his own death. However, he also clearly disliked leaving such an important matter as the determination of a new superior to a selection by chance from among the three names (as in his model). Therefore, he rules that the selection by lots will not have to take place if the entire community of monks can agree on one of the names proposed by the late superior, or, should he have died suddenly without making nominations, they are able to make their own unanimous choice. The protector was to intervene, if necessary, with “the prompting and consent of the monks,” to select an outsider (i.e., a xenokourites) as the new superior. Monks from other monasteries were also eligible for consideration under other circumstances.

Later, the author returns [45] to the subject and, quoting directly or indirectly from (22) Evergetis [14] this time on avoiding strife in elections, adds that the choices should be made “with the counsel and judgment of the protector.”

4. Role of the Superior

In the typikon’s Prologue, the author describes the original division of responsibility between himself as superior and the patron George the Cappadocian: “To himself he assigned the subsidizing but to me the management.” This presumably remained the ideal model for relations between future superiors and the monastery’s protectors.

In an apparently original chapter, the author obliges [24] the monks to conform themselves to the will of the superior: “[They] must do nothing at all without the knowledge and consent of the superior but in all things follow his orders.” His consent was required even for the performance of duties, and the monks were not to pass him (or each other) without bowing as a sign of respect. Therefore the author happily imports [44] into his own typikon the provision of (22) Evergetis [18] exempting the superior from any accountability to his monks.

For balance, however, he also includes [42] the formulaic Evergetian exhortation to the superior to show paternal affection to his monks (reinforced by his own [48]) and also [44] the injunction that the superior should not exploit his position to do favors for his friends and relatives (cf. (22) Evergetis [17], [18]). He thought it necessary to make [43] a special appeal to a future superior who, as he himself did, might have transferred to Mamas from another monastery (i.e., a xenokourites): he should bring only one disciple with him and not discriminate against Mamas’ own monks.

For his procedure governing the removal of an unworthy superior the author relies [2] on the treatment of this issue in (22) Evergetis [13], [14]. He adds a role for the protector, who is to be consulted by the monks before they attempt the removal of the unfit superior. Like the author of the Evergetian typikon, our author was willing to allow the deposed superior to stay in the monastery, but he was to be allowed to leave too, “especially if he happens to be from those who come from outside” (i.e., a xenokourites).

5. Other Officials of the Monastery

This typikon shares with (27) *Kecharitomene*³⁰ a number of detailed descriptions of the officers of the monastery and their responsibilities that are derived from an unidentified post-Evergetian source. The officials so described are: [8] the ecclesiarch (along with his assistant); [9] the sacristan and archivist; [10] the treasurer; [11] the cellarer (and his assistant); and [12] the gatekeeper. There is also a chapter [7] on the installation of the steward but no description of duties. The superior had the right to appoint all of these officials. For good measure, however, the author also adds [14] a provision, analogous to that in (22) Evergetis [39], permitting the superior to appoint other officials as well “if the monastery should expand and there is a pressing need.”

6. Patronal Privileges

In accordance with an accepted patronal privilege, the founder George the Cappadocian was admitted into the monastery before his death under the monastic name of Gregory.³¹ According to the author’s account in the typikon’s Prologue, George had asked him to compose the typikon, but the author demurred at that time because, he says “I revered him.” Only after George’s death did the author accept this important delegation of a patronal prerogative. The late founder George the Cappadocian was to receive [40] both daily memorial services and a perpetual lamp burning at his grave, and also an annual commemorative service marked by a feast for the monks. In the due course of time, the founder’s brother Theocharistos and his wife Zoe Dalassena would be the recipients of commemorations also, to be carried out in accordance with the instructions they were expected to provide.

Future protectors were to serve [3] without pay, receiving only the benefit of commemoration three times daily, posthumous commemoration, and the privilege of being buried in the monastery without making a donation.

7. Reading of the Typikon and Security of Documents

In a chapter apparently of his own composition, the author provides [16] for the reading of the typikon at mealtimes every three months (i.e., four times a year) and on the commemorations of George the Cappadocian, Theocharistos, and himself “so that by the continuous reading of it the things that have been prescribed may be more permanent and indelible.” The author adds that the provisions of the typikon should not be considered as his own ordinances but rather as divine laws “that are inviolable and unchangeable.” A judicial confirmation attached at the end of the typikon and dated to 1164 confirms it as valid and durable for all time.

The author, who himself had once been a steward, certainly shared the concern of his predecessors, the authors of (19) Attaleiates [40] and (23) Pakourianos [33], for the physical security of the typikon and the monastery’s other important documents. Three identical sets of the typikon and the inventory (now lost) were prepared. The originals were placed in the imperial monastery of Philanthropos for safekeeping. The Second Semeioma records the transmission of the box containing these two documents, the originals of the imperial chrysobull and of the patriarchal documents granting the monastery’s independence, and the first Semeioma to the sacristan of Philanthropos. None of them could be borrowed without first securing the permission from both the Mamas monastery and the foundation’s protector. Even a representative of the Mamas monastery could not borrow one of them without surrendering the monastery’s transmissory deed to its properties to Philanthropos as a security deposit.

E. Financial Matters

1. Financial Administration

The author in effect returns [48] to the old Studite principle (cf. (3) Theodore Studites [22]) of separating the superior from direct involvement in the financial administration of the monastery, “for this is unworthy of a director of monks and a spiritual leader of souls.” He is to assure, however, that “all income and disbursement and payment be made openly and with the consent of the community and through the hands of others in accordance with his own instruction.”

For the balance of his treatment of financial administration, the author relies on earlier sources. The prescriptions for the investiture of the steward [7] and other officials [6] derive ultimately from Evergetian models.³² The descriptions of the duties of the ecclesiarch [8], the sacristan [9] and the treasurer [10], however, are all from a post-Evergetian source shared with (27) Kecharitomene [20], [19], [24].

The key official among these was the sacristan [9] who also served as archivist. The description of his duties is taken almost entirely from the characteristically post-Evergetian model with its elaborate security precautions, use of written inventories (praktika), and reminders to borrowers of documents. The author adds a provision for a cabinet (harmarion) intended for the protection of documents which was opened by two keys kept by the sacristan and the superior.

The ecclesiarch [8] likewise received an inventory from the sacristan listing the movable property in his charge. As in the post-Evergetian model, he was to be assisted by an assistant ecclesiarch. The author adds that this individual will be responsible for maintaining the monastery’s cash box.

The treasurer [10] was in this monastery evidently to be this same assistant ecclesiarch. In the description of his duties the author adopts the stringent post-Evergetian security provisions (use of receipts, ledger book, witnesses, etc.) found in (27) Kecharitomene [24] but his language is different.

It is curious, especially considering the author's own background, that his typikon lacks a discussion of the duties of the steward, the monastery's chief financial officer. The thorough treatment in (27) Kecharitomene [14] then was either missing from the source he was relying upon, or was overlooked for some reason.

2. Inalienability of Property

Theft of movable property was a greater concern to the author than the alienation of landed property. Perhaps this is an indication of greater confidence that any new government confiscations of landed property were unlikely and that the founders' own administrative precautions had reduced the threat of misconduct by the monastery's officials. In an apparently new chapter the author asserts [37], cf. [5] the inalienability of the sacred vessels and other consecrated objects listed in the inventory. These included not only recent donations, mostly by George the Cappadocian (see Prologue), but also some older possessions that somehow managed to survive the charistike. The author menaces magnates, government officials as well as the monastery's protector, superior and monks with the charge of sacrilege and the threat of eternal punishment should any of them disregard his prohibition. As an aside, he notes that the prohibition also applied to the monastery's immovable (i.e., landed) property. Unlike (27) Kecharitomene [10] and even (22) Evergetis [19], there is no provision for emergency alienation of movable property.

3. Entrance Gifts Not Mandatory

The author adopts [22] the Evergetian provision that entrance gifts are not to be required of postulants, but that free-will gifts are acceptable. He draws here on the text of (22) Evergetis [37], the locus classicus. Elsewhere, adopting language shared with (27) Kecharitomene [7], the author makes [5] the usual declaration that monks cannot reclaim these voluntary donations if they later choose to leave the monastery.

4. Other Sources of Income

Overall, the author maintains a hopeful attitude towards the future growth and prosperity of this foundation. He looks forward [5] to an increase in the monastery's revenues through additional donations of landed property or even through better fiscal management of its existing properties. He also expects [37] supplements and further dedications to the monastery's stock of movable property. The author alludes to the performance of commemorative services [40] and the right of burial [27] in the monastery, presumably in return for outside benefactions, but does not provide details.

F. Overall Philosophy

Like other twelfth-century founders and authors whose aristocratic backgrounds shaped their patronal attitudes, our author exhibits a profound ambivalence over the ideological legacy of Evergetis. As noted above, he amends [36] the latter's prescriptions on seating arrangements in the refectory, basically to assure the superior that he can honor members of the clergy as well as those monks “advanced in years” or “preeminent in the world.” On the other hand, his warning against strife and partiality in the election of the superior reproduces [45] the language and argument of (22) Evergetis [17] urging that the monks not uncritically prefer the nobly born or those who have donated considerable property to the monastery. As we have seen, in another passage adopted from (22) Evergetis [18], he warns [44] the superior not to spend the monastery’s wealth to do favors for his family and friends. Also, despite the fact that the monastery was to be in principle “absolutely inaccessible to women” except for funerals and commemorations, the author, like (22) Evergetis [39], is happy to make [27] rare exceptions for those “famed for virtue, nobility and prominence.”

Perhaps the fairest comparison is to his contemporary, Isaac Komnenos, the author of (29) Kosmosoteira. Our author’s ban [26], cf. [27] on kelliotic monks and imposed guests, which he shares with (27) Kecharitomene [53], certainly contrasts with the latter’s willingness in (29) Kosmosoteira to bend [55], [86] his own rules in exchange for large donations and to require [107] the monastery to maintain several of his favorites.

G. External Relations

1. Relations with the Ecclesiastical Hierarchy

Since his foundation had once been a patriarchal monastery (see First Semeioma) and owed its independent status to a recent patriarchal memorandum issued by Nicholas IV Muzalon, our author was necessarily obliged more than many of his counterparts to respect patriarchal rights. Therefore, he instructs [1] that the monks must take a newly chosen superior to the patriarch in order to receive “the sphragis and benediction of the office of superior.” The author also had to be careful to get [29] explicit permission from the patriarch for the superior to hear the monks’ confessions should the monastery’s leader chance to be unordained.

2. Institutional Philanthropy

This was a relatively weak component of the foundation’s program. There were no philanthropic institutions associated with the monastery; indeed the monastery itself was dependent upon neighboring facilities for bathing [28] and medical services [34]. There were charitable contributions [13], cf. [39] at the gate to poor monks and laymen at the gate, including leftover cooked food. The author declares [13] “It is our preference that not even any beggar turn away from the gate with empty hands.” Suppliant monks, however, were to be fed more amply than ordinary beggars.

H. Composition of the Typikon

Athanasios Philanthropenos composed one of the best-edited of the Byzantine monastic typika. Despite the fact that he was drawing on what by his day was a diverse, complex tradition of Evergetian reform institutions and customs, our author produced an exceptionally well ordered document that leaves few clues to its composition. For the first twelve chapters of his typikon, Athanasios drew upon an Evergetian reform typikon, probably that of the Philanthropos monastery, as argued above (in A.3). Though Athanasios appears to have made some extensive changes to the chapters in this first section, at least insofar as we are able to judge from the lack of identifiable borrowings from extant documents, aside from the Prologue, he did not introduce any completely new (Group A) chapters of his own until [13]. Thereafter, new chapters alternate with those that contain identifiable borrowings down to the end of the document.

Athanasios' sequence of chapters in no way observes those of (22) Evergetis, (27) Kecharitomene, or (presumably) the lost typikon of Philanthropos. Generally speaking, he has reordered the materials in his model in a logical way, integrating his own interpolations and new chapters seamlessly in the new document. One redundant treatment of the necessity of maintaining the cenobitic life [5], cf. [25], is found also in (27) Kecharitomene [2], cf. [55] and doubtless also his model; it somehow escaped Athanasios' editorial vigilance.

The last two chapters of the document are clearly later additions. The Evergetian final exhortation [46] does not in fact mark the end of the document. A lengthy summary of the canonical hours [47], written up from several chapters in (22) Evergetis supersedes Athanasios' earlier intent to rely on an endorsement [8] of the Evergetian liturgical typikon, supplemented by a discussion [31] of the offices of the third and sixth hours. Also, Athanasios ultimately decided not to rely upon just the Evergetian boilerplate instructions to the superior [42] but to compose his own exhortation [48], which is the document's actual last chapter.

I. Subsequent Utilization by Later Authors

Although some later authors, like Neilos of Tamasia, author of (34) Machairas, evidently continued to draw directly on the text of (22) Evergetis,³³ Athanasios' (32) Mamas established a congenial, authoritative model for subsequent typika in the monastic reform tradition. The mystikos Nikephoros, author of (33) Heliou Bomon, utilized virtually the whole of (32) Mamas for his own typikon, composed four years later in 1162. Remarkably, the sequence of the Maman chapters and even their numeration are largely preserved in this document. Even Neilos of Tamasia, despite his apparent use of (22) Evergetis, could hardly be said to have ignored (32) Mamas, since he borrows from the latter document portions of twenty-eight of its forty-eight chapters even though he subdivides and reorders them extensively.³⁴ (32) Mamas remained influential at least down to the first third of the fourteenth century, when Joachim of Zichna employed thirteen Maman chapters in his (58) Menoikeion, generally preserving the original ordering for those chapters he chose to borrow.³⁵

Notes on the Introduction

1. For the manuscript, see Laurent, "Remarques," pp. 233–35, who believed it might be an autograph although this possibility was rejected by Siglas, EEBS 7 (1930), 399–405.
2. John Zonaras, Epitome historiarum 4.14, ed. L. Dindorf, vol. 3 (Leipzig, 1868–75), pp. 300–301; Synopsis Chronike, ed. Sathas, MB, vol. 7, p. 101; Patria Konstantinoupoleos 3.185, ed. Th. Preger, Scriptores originum Constantinopolitanarum (Leipzig, 1907), p. 274. This reconciliation of the divergent accounts of the foundation was proposed by Pargoire, "Saint-Mamas," p. 305, followed by Janin, Géographie, vol. 3, p. 314.
3. The epigram in honor of Constantina from her tomb is reproduced in Pargoire, "Saint-Mamas," pp. 305–6.

TWELFTH CENTURY

4. Theodore the Studite, Laudatio sancti Platonis hegumeni, PG 99, col. 841C.
5. Theophanes Continuatus, Chronographia, ed. I. Bekker, CSHB (Bonn, 1838), pp. 403–4.
6. Niketas Stethatos, Vita Symeonis novi theologi, chaps. 30, 34, ed. Irénée Hausherr, OC 12 (1928), pp. 40–42, 46; see also Basil Krivocheine, “The Most Enthusiastic Zealot: St. Symeon the New Theologian as Abbot and Spiritual Instructor,” OS 4 (1955), 108–28.
7. Eustathios Rhomaios, Peira 15.16 (JGR 1.48).
8. See (32) Mamas Prologue and First Semeioma below.
9. Possibly from Constantine IV Chliarenos (1154–57).
10. So Janin, Géographie, vol. 3, p. 317.
11. P. E. D. Riant, Exuviae sacrae Constantinopolitanae, vol. 2 (Geneva, 1878), p. 72; Historia translationum S. Mamantis 16, AASS, August, vol. 3, p. 444.
12. Janin, Géographie, vol. 3, p. 317.
13. See Janin, Géographie, vol. 3, p. 318, based on Codex Athos Iviron 381.
14. John Kantakouzenos, Historiarum libri IV, ed. L. Schopen, CSHB (Bonn, 1828), pp. 107–8.
15. Kantakouzenos, Historiarum libri IV, ed. Schopen, pp. 259, 270, 275; Nikephoros Gregoras, Byzantina historia, ed. L. Schopen and I. Bekker, CSHB, vol. 3 (Bonn, 1855), p. 188.
16. Darrouzès, Regestes, no. 3076, ed. MM 2.304–12.
17. (32) Mamas [8], [46], [47].
18. See Chart Two: Analytic Chapter Groups of (32) Mamas.
19. Group A: Chapters (16) new to (32) Mamas: [13], [15], [16], [19], [21], [24], [27], [28], [29], [31], [33], [37], [38], [41], [43], [48].
20. Group B: Chapters (21) shared with both (22) Evergetis and (27) Kecharitomene: [1], [2], [4], [5], [6], [7], [17], [18], [20], [22], [23], [32], [34], [36], [39], [40], [42], [45], [46], [47].
21. Group C: Chapters (4) shared with (22) Evergetis but not (27) Kecharitomene: [14], minor sharing with (22) Evergetis [39]; [30] = (22) Evergetis [7]; [35] = (22) Evergetis [21], [22]; [44] = (22) Evergetis [18].
22. Group D: Chapters (8) derived from a post-Evergetian source shared only with (27) Kecharitomene: [3], minor sharing with (27) Kecharitomene [3]; [8], shared with (27) Kecharitomene [20]; [9], shared with (27) Kecharitomene [19]; [10], minor sharing with (27) Kecharitomene [24]; [11], minor sharing with (27) Kecharitomene [23]; [12], shared with (27) Kecharitomene [29]; [25], shared with (27) Kecharitomene [2]; [26], mostly new, but cf. (27) Kecharitomene [53].
23. Subgroup B.1: Chapters (13) derived from (22) Evergetis with parallel treatment in (27) Kecharitomene: [2] = (22) Evergetis [13], [14]; cf. (27) Kecharitomene [13]; [7] = (22) Evergetis [13]; cf. (27) Kecharitomene [14]; [18] = (22) Evergetis [10]; cf. (27) Kecharitomene [47]; [22] = (22) Evergetis [37]; cf. (27) Kecharitomene [30]; [23] = (22) Evergetis [33]; cf. (27) Kecharitomene [25]; [32] = (22) Evergetis [5]; cf. (27) Kecharitomene [33]; [34], uses (22) Evergetis [24], [26], [41]; cf. (27) Kecharitomene [56], [57]; [36] = (22) Evergetis [9]; cf. (27) Kecharitomene [42]; [40] = (22) Evergetis [36], cf. (27) Kecharitomene [70]; [42] = (22) Evergetis [17], cf. (27) Kecharitomene [12]; [45] = (22) Evergetis [14], [17]; cf. (27) Kecharitomene [12]; [46] = mostly (22) Evergetis [42], [43]; cf. (27) Kecharitomene [78]; [47] = (22) Evergetis [3], [4], [6]; cf. (27) Kecharitomene [32], [35], [36], [37], [38], [39].
24. Subgroup B.2: Chapters (5) shared with (27) Kecharitomene; parallel treatment in (22) Evergetis: [1], shared with (27) Kecharitomene [11], cf. (22) Evergetis [13]; [5], shared with (27) Kecharitomene [2], [7], cf. (22) Evergetis [37]; [6], shared with (27) Kecharitomene [18], cf. (22) Evergetis [29]; [20], shared with (27) Kecharitomene [49], [50], cf. (22) Evergetis [22], [27]; [39], shared with (27) Kecharitomene [70], cf. (22) Evergetis [36].
25. Subgroup B.3: Composite chapters (2) shared with both (22) Evergetis and (27) Kecharitomene: [4] = (22) Evergetis [12] and (27) Kecharitomene [1]; [17] = (22) Evergetis [9] and (27) Kecharitomene [45], [46].

32. MAMAS

26. Superior may appoint other officials [14], superfluous in (27) Kecharitomene which has detailed provisions for individuals offices; exhortation to confession [30], since the superior could not hear confessions in Kecharitomene; no idle talking [35], unnecessary for a cloistered community of nuns. The omission of [44] is harder to explain.
27. (22) Evergetis [42], [43]; cf. (27) Kecharitomene [78].
28. E.g., (27) Kecharitomene [4], [5]; (28) Pantokrator [19], [28]; (29) Kosmosoteira [3].
29. E.g., (22) Evergetis [41]; (26) Luke of Messina [8]; (27) Kecharitomene [44]; (28) Pantokrator [10]; (28) Kosmosoteira [61]; (30) Phoberos [56].
30. Cf. (27) Kecharitomene [19], [20], [23], [24], [29].
31. See Athanasios' note with his signature at the end of the typikon.
32. [6], cf. (27) Kecharitomene [18], which is itself based on (22) Evergetis [29]; [7], cf. (22) Evergetis [13] with (27) Kecharitomene [14].
33. See the Group C chapters of (34) Machairas as discussed in Chapter Seven below.
34. (32) Mamas [2], [4], [5], [6], [7], [11], [15], [17], [18], [19], [21], [22], [24], [30], [31], [32], [34], [35], [36], [37], [38], [39], [40], [41], [42], [44], [46], [47].
35. (32) Mamas [8], [9], [12], [13], [16], [17], [23], [25], [29], [32], [35], 42, [45].

Bibliography

- Beck, Hans-Georg, Kirche und theologische Literatur im byzantinischen Reich (Munich, 1959), p. 648.
- Eustratiades, S., "Diorthoseis paroramaton eis to typikon tou Hagiou Mamantos," Hellenika 2 (1929), 443.
- Janin, Raymond, La géographie ecclésiastique de l'empire byzantin, vol. 3: Les églises et les monastères [de Constantinople], 2nd ed. (Paris, 1969), pp. 314–19.
- Krausmüller, Dirk, "The Monastic Communities of Stoudios and St Mamas in the Second Half of the Tenth Century," in M. Mullett and A. Kirby, eds., The Theotokos Evergetis and Eleventh-Century Monasticism (Belfast, 1994), pp. 67–85.
- Macridy, Th., "To byzantinon Hebdomon. Hai en Byzantio monai tou hagiou Mamantos," Thrakika 12 (1939), 73–80.
- Pargoire, Jules, "Les Saint-Mamas de Constantinople," IRAİK 9 (1904), 261–316, esp. 304–12.
- Talbot, Alice-Mary, "Mamas, Monastery of Saint," ODB, p. 1278.
- Volk, Robert, Gesundheitswesen und Wohltätigkeit im Spiegel der byzantinischen Klostertypika (Munich, 1983), pp. 215–21.

Chart Two: Analytic Chapter Groups of (32) Mamas

As noted above, this document shares, probably through intermediaries, substantial portions of the texts of (22) Evergetis and (27) Kecharitomene. In our translation, the borrowings are indicated in boldface type.

Translation

Prologue

Concerning [George the Cappadocian] the *mystikos*¹ of blessed memory and new builder [of the monastery]

An extraordinarily great and divine and precious thing is a God-loving and charitable soul. For, since the latter has grasped all the virtues, in reality it bears them in itself because it conceives the fountainhead of these (virtues, namely), love. For what is greater and loftier than love towards God and one's neighbor? For surely the Master of the universe, too, publicly declared that on these two commandments both the prophets and the whole law depend (Matt. 22:40). Accordingly, blessed and many times so is he who has beautified his own soul all round with these (virtues) as if with small golden cords. For what good things is such a person not able to do from that source, and what path of salvation is he not able to cut, just like a very thirsty deer that longs for springs of waters and ardently and totally gives itself up to them?

The ever-memorable mystikos, lord George the Cappadocian, had the good fortune to be endowed with just this sort of God-loving, charitable and altogether benevolent soul. When the most noble of emperors ever and the most valiant of brave men in action, the purple-born emperor Lord Manuel Komnenos, was still a young man, his father, the celebrated emperor [John II Komnenos]—he who appointed [Manuel I] emperor—assigned lord George to serve especially [Manuel].

When this wholly great emperor [Manuel] passed from adolescence to manhood, the imperial office fell in love with him and fixed its eyes fully on him, after his father the emperor [John] had closed his eyes for the last time. [Then] this illustrious and sagacious man [the mystikos George] received as a pledge of [imperial] munificence a commanding position in the palace, he became, that is, the guardian and steward of the imperial treasury. In his loyalty to the emperor and the vigor of his mind, he dramatically surpassed all others. Among his other excellent qualities—and there were many—the one that should be admired the most is that he did not frown upon humility when he was raised to great glory and prominence by our mighty emperor, and he did not darken the grace that shines forth from [humility] with the vanity of glory. In fact, if we must say the truth, he made [humility] shine even more through glory; for he mixed them well, just as a good painter mixes naturally contrasting colors.

Consequently the man's love of God and the virtue of his uprightness adorned him no less than his spirit of humility. Yet what need is there to recount in detail most of this man's spiritual accomplishments when it is possible to embrace all of them in one statement, which, in fact, we presented at the beginning of this whole account, having fashioned not an improbable and false presentation but one which still at the present time lies on the lips of all. The truth of this [statement] can be shown by the fine conclusion that he added to his previous accomplishments, which is the following:

TWELFTH CENTURY

The monastery of Mamas, who had nobly shone forth among martyrs, had flourished in former times and bloomed and abounded in many properties and things and appeared beautiful all around and flanked, so to speak, by favors, but in the long course of time had grown old and slipped away, and for this very reason it was running the risk of priding itself on the name alone of the martyr, because its fortunes had abandoned it altogether on account of the greed and shamelessness of the charistikarioi at various times, who gaped at it like wolves. When that man who loved God and goodness saw that [the monastery] was situated in a favorable environment, but the convenience of the location was rendered useless by the disorderly conditions, he was seized by a godly love and fired with the desire to restore it to its former graceful appearance which was hinted at and faintly outlined, so to speak, from some small remnants.

So he approaches him who was at that time patriarch² of this great city of cities and tells the tragic tale of the monastery's collapse and desolation and fervently beseeches him to extend his own hand to help it and thereby to raise it up and have it rebuilt because it was already sagging and giving at the knees, and on the other, also to rebuild some of the buildings from their very foundations and generously to let it make further acquisitions. For he considered it a terrible thing and unworthy of a God-loving soul to overlook the fact that a large church, and one not inferior to others of its kind, as far as construction is concerned, was standing empty and otherwise unadorned, running the risk of being shortly deprived of even this [form of existence] and, as they say, falling on its face; and that, while he was himself anxious for a long time to show his love of God and his generosity. Thereupon he asked—or to put it more precisely, he was asked—and received for himself and his legal heir, by means of a [patriarchal] memorandum, the venerable monastery of our holy great martyr Mamas which was then under the jurisdiction of the holy bureau of the sakelle of the Great Church. As soon, then, as he had received this, [p. 258] he became, as the saying goes, a torch set on fire or water being borne downhill with a mighty rush.

First of all, because he had intermingled his power partly with bribes and partly with persuasion, he cajoled some of those who reckoned the possessions of the monastery as booty even up to its documentary rights themselves, even though envy did not abandon all of them, to lay down and to give back again everything to the monastery. Next he devoted himself to deeds and applied such zeal as cannot be expressed. But what was the next thing? When he saw that the monastery was being renovated by many and very great expenditures, of which he himself was the bestower, but that nevertheless it still needed greater and more ample generosity and resolve, he realized that perhaps some drones, men who are destroyers, may grow upon the toils of others (for, in fact, he was shrewd, more than anyone else, and most resourceful at grasping readily what was necessary). Putting this in mind, therefore, that perhaps some men, after the grant given to him and his legal heir will have expired, may sit upon the lavish abundance of the things that had been previously acquired by the monastery and dedicated to it, and, having eaten everything, may leave behind only whitewashed walls, as the scripture says (Acts 23:31), and even savagely lay hands on these, too, and drag down the monastery again to its former collapse, what does he do? O, what sagacity and high-mindedness! He approaches the then patriarch³ again and demands that this monastery be honored with an independence that is continuous and not subject to any time limits in order that it may exist by itself, never to be given to any person for reason of ephoreia or as epidosis, or to be placed under the control of anyone for any other management whatsoever; nor to be subjected even to the holy bureau of the great sakelle to which it was previously subject, in any way whatsoever, reasonable or specious, and that it may be governed and administered by the monks alone in it.

Accordingly, the patriarch, after he had closely examined by himself the purpose of the man's request and had found it concordant with the things that had been done for the monastery up to that time by him and, besides, pleasing to God, gave in writing a memorandum of the monastery's independence. The latter is most clearly proved by both the petition of that greatly preeminent man that was presented at that time and the lysis of the most holy patriarch regarding this and by the patriarchal memorandum following the preceding [petition and lysis], [and] furthermore, by the chrysobull issued regarding these matters by our God-crowned emperor and purple-born Lord Manuel Komnenos, which was set like a crown upon the aforesaid documents.

Consequently, then, after he had accomplished everything and had put the monastery beyond all human agency so as not to be subjected ever to any yoke of bondage, he was able thereafter to care for it in a more relaxed manner. Not that his hand was held back, stricken by niggardly numbness. On the contrary, as the saying goes, he added fire to the fire [p. 259] and kindled his zeal. So, that fiery lover of the Almighty proceeded to seek also someone who was to direct the monastery spiritually and be its superior, and he found me (I do not know whence and how he was moved to this), entrusted as I was at that point of time with the office of steward of the renowned and imperial monastery of the Philanthopos Savior,⁴ in which I had also been reared and tonsured and educated. As soon as he handed me the leadership and government of the monastery, that God-loving soul and liberal and generous hand immediately poured in like a stream the things needed for the maintenance of the monastery with even greater munificence and generosity than before. Everything was there: the lavishness of subsidy for the buildings, the munificence for the latter, the love for their beauty, the assembling of monks, the supplying of the necessities of life to the latter and all the other care and management; for to himself he assigned the subsidizing but to me the management.

This monastery of ours, accordingly, began to grow and to become strong and to get back again its former dignity, with regard to sacred vessels made of the purest silver inlaid with gold all round; sacred veils, these, too, embroidered with gold; holy icons and their very lavishly fashioned decoration; books, some not basely embellished; and with regard to the interior as well as the exterior of buildings. One could see the force of time that long ago had prevailed against the monastery and a God-loving and liberal spirit fighting against each other, opposing and forcing [each other], the former in order to make the man hesitate to spend continually for embellishments and the latter in order to accomplish everything lavishly and magnificently out of the love of God, this is clear from the following. For, since water from a spring was not yet being channeled to the monastery, that magnanimous and munificent man supplied us with the abundance of water by the multitude of hands of skilled workmen and by the abundance of expenditures so that the water surpassed even the need of the monastery, flowing continuously and extending beyond it everywhere.⁵

Yet what need is there to speak of his very many munificent deeds and to recount them individually? It is possible for anyone who so wishes to go over the particulars of the monastery's inventory,⁶ composed by me after his departure to the Lord, and discover the man's fiery love for the monastery from the prefatory account written therein. If, however, I myself, too, have contributed anything to the man's love and deeds, thank him, who chose and made me his own fellow worker in his undertaking. But we were engaged in these things for a brief period of time, during which the monastery manifestly got the better of all extraneous control and under my agency became self-governing, when that lofty fellow and wholly a man of God disappeared from the ranks of men and ceased, albeit unwillingly, to care for the monastery.

For my part, I hesitate to discuss what happened next, lest I appear to talk about myself, but for those who are not envious the sight and condition [p. 260] of things are just as much of a mouthpiece. Yet, if there was someone else who did not hesitate to speak freely, he might have said openly that, with the exception of the lavish expenditures, he had supplemented the blessed man's deficiency. For those who are acquainted with the facts know how much was the zeal which we displayed so as to take over this monastery from the sakelle of the Great Church, to which it was previously subject. For, even if, while the blessed man was still living, the monastery had been honored with independence, as doubtless the patriarchal memorandum distinctly states, yet [its independence] did not take effect as soon as [the memorandum] was issued, a thing which we, God granting, brought to completion, as the inventory which was made at that time proves.

Since, however, along with other things I ought to have set forth also a typikon because it had not already been done while that divine man was still around, inasmuch as in this matter also I am already fulfilling his wish, I am composing this, too. Furthermore, that really pious man who was also very quick at grasping what was necessary, while he was still living, insisted on imposing upon me the composition of the typikon and kept both urging and inciting me to this because he had in fact entrusted to me both the monastery itself and everything under its jurisdiction, and that while he was still carrying the dust, even though I myself, partly because I revered him and partly because I was given to procrastination, kept putting off the fulfillment of the injunction.

At any rate, either for this reason I would have a right to prescribe the things that relate to the monastery, or (but let there be no divine retribution) because of the fact that I, too, nevertheless, have made some small contribution to this God-loved work, even though that wonderful man laid down the foundation stones and almost everything. At any rate, whichever of the two [reasons] one should consider, he would entrust the whole thing to me. For even the expression of eagerness is often considered as a deed. Therefore, not only he who himself completes the labors but also he, too, who arranges the contest and anoints the athlete must be accepted. First of all, then, we order the following concerning the appointment of the superior.

Chapter 1

Concerning the installation of a superior

[= (27) Kecharitomene [11]]: The choosing and installation of the superior must be discussed first. If the death of the superior then in office is expected and known in advance, all the community should go to him with all respect and reverence and the appropriate demeanor and to remind him to give thought to who should rule the monastery after him in a manner pleasing to God. He, on the other hand, like an affectionate father should by all means take care to leave behind to them as a paternal inheritance one who is worthy of exercising leadership since he has knowledge of the conduct and way of life of each of the monks. For he shall select by himself impartially, dispassionately and as though God, “Who searches the hearts and reins” (Ps. 7:9), were invisibly watching over his judgment [p. 261] three [members] from the whole brotherhood who more than the others are adorned with intellect and virtue and are recognized and acknowledged as wiser and more experienced for the governance of souls, such as may be found among all the officials or even the rest of the monks.

After he has both written down their names with his own hand on a paper and has sealed the latter in the presence of the leading men of the brotherhood, without the knowledge of those who have been selected, he shall deposit the paper in the sacristy; and after the departure to the Lord of him who holds the office of superior the paper shall be brought out and opened, and, when those who have been selected are made known to the brotherhood, the appointment of him who will hold the office of superior shall take place, just as the account will show more clearly, as it proceeds.

But if the superior should happen to depart from this life unexpectedly without giving any consideration to his successor or making anything known, then when the whole community has gathered by itself, it should make its choice; and, if all of them agree and are unanimous with regard to one, who is surely superior in both virtue and activity and reputation, there will be no need for the decision of the protector of the monastery except only that he, too, be informed of the matter. Furthermore, if all [the brothers] agree and are altogether pleased with one of the three [candidates] already selected by the superior, as stated above, the depositing of the pieces of paper on the holy altar is superfluous.

But if a rift should occur and a dispute arise among them concerning the choice, which I pray does not happen, with some [members] proposing this one, while others that one, in that case the selection concerning the three and the depositing of the pieces of paper on the holy altar will take place. Let the protector of the monastery have the liberty to resolve the arguments, favoring the judgment of the group that excels in virtue and spiritual life. But he shall always be careful to make his decision freely and dispassionately unless he wishes to see the Judge and Master of all creation perversely influenced against him and [have] the holy great martyr Mamas as an opponent and antagonist on account of the fact that he, too, perhaps perverted justice by an unjust decision, which I pray may not happen.

Both the choice of the three [candidates] who are about to be selected and their installation will be carried out in this manner. On three pieces of paper of the same size the following words will be written:

“Master, Lord Jesus Christ, our God, thou who knowest the hearts [of men], by the intercessions of our all-pure Lady, the Mother of God, and of the holy celebrated among martyrs Mamas, reveal to us sinners whether thou hast judged our brother so-and-so worthy of the position of our superior.”

The same words [will] be written again on the other pieces of paper and the names of the three [candidates] inscribed on them.⁷ When the papers have been stamped with a seal—that of the protector if he is present, and in case he does not want to be or is somehow unable to be, by the seal of [a representative] whom the [protector] will assign by means of a written and signed statement—they will be placed [p. 262] on the holy table during vespers on Saturday or that of a feast of the Lord or that of the holy great martyr Mamas, if it should occur at that time. A vigil shall be performed and a whole-hearted supplication with a contrite heart shall be made by you, my most venerable fathers, because the matter for which we make the supplication is important. On this hangs the maintenance of the monastery and, equally, its destruction, which I pray does not happen, and the hope of your salvation.

On the next day, after the divine liturgy has been celebrated and after its completion, while the priest is still dressed in his priestly vestments, a trisagion will be performed by you and these troparia will be sung: “Have mercy on us, O Lord, have mercy”; “Lord, turn to us from heaven and behold” (Ps. 79 [80].14); “Glory”; “By your God-given staff, Holy One”; “And now”; [and] “Only-begotten One, of the same substance.” The deacon will make an ektenes declaiming this after the other petitions: “We again beg that the Lord Our God reveal to us the one worthy of our leadership.” You will respond, “Kyrie eleison,” thirty times and perform fifteen deep bows, saying this also to yourselves, while you raise your hands to God: “God, thou who knowest the hearts [of men], show to us sinners the one worthy of our leadership.” After these bows when the priest himself has performed three similar bows before the holy table, and while still dressed in his priestly vestments, as we said, is repeating the same invocation, he will lift up one of the three pieces of paper. When it has been offered in the presence of the whole community by the priest himself to the one who placed his own seal upon it, he will recognize his own seal and the piece of paper will be opened, as all watch, and the owner of the name written on it will enter with the priest into the holy sanctuary with his head uncovered. Then as our typikon and the staff are lying in the place before the holy altar, he [the superior-elect], after making three bows will take them, pondering and considering with himself from where he takes them and to whom he promises to protect them, and that angels are recording his promise, who are going to lead him to that fearful place of judgment to give account of the fulfillment of his promises.

After the whole brotherhood has responded three times “worthy,” he shall come out and stand in the place assigned to the superior, and everyone will offer him the divine greeting [with a kiss], and glory will be offered to God, [p. 263] and the dismissal will follow with the customary prayer of the priest. He will be your superior thereafter, whom you are to revere as a father, and have an obedient attitude towards him as the one appointed by God.

After this let all the brothers, taking him along, go up to the most holy ecumenical patriarch so that he may receive from the latter’s holy right hand the sphragis and benediction of the office of superior in accordance with the contents of the memoranda that belong to the monastery. Let the same procedure be followed as well in the case of [a candidate] elected by common consent.

I pray, therefore, that there always be among you yourselves an abundance of those worthy of leadership, and that there will never fail to be such men in our monastery, but, a need arises whenever a need to appoint a superior arises, the selection can take place from the monks themselves who practice the religious life here. If, however, the wicked enemy, the originator of evil, who always envies the salvation of mankind, shall overpower your souls so much and make you so neglect your own salvation that no one may be found among you of attested virtue and learning and experience for the governance and leadership of souls—I trust by the mercy of my Christ who loves mankind that such a thing may not ever occur—in that case of course we give permission to the protector of the monastery at the time with also the prompting and consent of the monks to discover from outside someone from another monastery, a man who is devout and approved for the office of superior and to install him in this office.

It is our wish, however, that he be appointed thus. If, indeed, two alone from the entire brotherhood in the monastery are found such as ought to be selected, in accordance with what has been said, and a third is missing, one [candidate] alone must be brought in from outside. Thus, after the three [names] have been recorded on the papers and the aforementioned procedure followed, he whom God should approve and reveal is to be preferred. If, on the other hand, one alone of all of you is manifestly worthy of selection, it is surely fitting to find the other two from elsewhere and to have them recorded and to have again the same procedure take place. If, however, the monastery lacks even the three—a thing which I pray may not happen—it is certainly necessary, even if the three are likewise selected from other monasteries and recorded, that you make the prescribed supplications and entreaties to God and the saint and thus appoint to the office of superior him who, in the former's discretion, is revealed as worthy.

Chapter 2

Concerning the removal of an unsuitable holder of the office of superior

[= (22) Evergetis [13], ed. lines 644–58]: So much for that. The following matters, however, that are about to be discussed concerning him who, after our passing away, will be holding the office of superior and those who will be holding the office of superior after him, [p. 264] I did not wish to commit to writing, for it should not be necessary to remove from his position and rank someone who has previously been selected for it. This would be a pleasing and agreeable state of affairs if in fact our nature remained unchanged and unmoved, but that is impossible, for we repeatedly change and alter, such is human nature, and when we are thought worthy of honor we grow weaker with regard to the performance of good deeds, giving way to laziness in most cases, since authority has a habit of weakening those who have been elevated to it whereas they ought to demonstrate a greater struggle and diligence. We feign virtue at the start through the desire for the authority and the success it brings, then when we have gained it we are found to be still exactly what we were, like octopuses which when pursued by bigger fish take a tight hold of the rocks nearby and simply pretend that they are a rock, but whenever they escape the danger, they are recognizable as octopuses again, which in fact they were. For these reasons the matter must be committed to writing and punishment given as strongly as possible.

[= (22) Evergetis [14], ed. lines 661–73]: So, if the superior should continue unchanged, properly maintaining his virtue through which he was thought worthy of that rank, he will not be removed from his leadership but remain firm. But if time proves him to be unqualified and unsuitable, either because he has carried out his leadership of the brothers in a careless and indifferent manner or because he has been doing favors for his relatives or has been appropriating some of the monastery's property or has been betraying or subjecting the monastery's property to anyone's control or has been totally disregarding any of the instructions in the present rule and following his own wishes or clearly been involved in bodily passions then for these reasons, he has been proved unsuitable for the guiding of souls.

[cf. (22) Evergetis [14], lines 694–700]: If, then, though living so wickedly, he should ever take stock of himself and give up his evil ways and embark on the road that leads to higher things and salvation, let him stay and be your superior. But should he remain the same, and still not give up his evil ways but in fact indulge in them more widely, if you were unanimously agreed, having deliberated with the protector of the monastery concerning him, it is our wish that you remove that worthless man from the leadership over you, and that a selection and another vote and an appointment of another superior again be made in accordance with what has been prescribed above.⁸

[cf. (22) Evergetis [14], lines 701–4]: If, however, the one removed from the office of superior should wish to stay in the monastery as one of the brothers, accorded the rank and seat of second to the superior, in the refectory I mean, and at the other gatherings, and to be submissive to the superior in all things and not to destroy the monastery's good order by being both troubled and troubling, let him be again in the monastery. If not, however, let him leave the latter and depart where, in fact, he wishes, especially if he happens to be from those who come from outside, in order that he may not become a cause of offense to the rest also. [p. 265]

Chapter 3

Concerning those who have been appointed for the protection of the monastery, that is, the protectors

Since one of the indispensable things is for the monastery to have its protector in order that it may not become booty to those who wish to pillage other people's property, inasmuch as it is not being protected under some kind of shelter and security,—a thing which, in fact, it has suffered even before—this is exactly what we have done for reason of the best management. It is our wish, therefore, that above all the supremely glorious, most noble lord Theocharistos the Cappadocian and genuine full brother of our master of blessed memory and new builder, serve as its protector and patron so as to look after and assist and defend it and to repel those who attempt to misuse it in various ways, and, when perhaps any of the things that have been prescribed in the present typikon incurs the danger of being violated, to prevent it and simply to have such jurisdiction over the monastery, as long as he lives just as our celebrated master of blessed memory did, for he knows his [brother's] wish and is like him in all good accomplishments and greatly loves the monastery and cooperates with it as much as possible and guides it. But, even if he wishes to add or even remove anything in the present typikon, let him have this, too, within his purview.

Yet what need is there to say many things and prolong the discussion? If anything should seem to him absolutely pleasing to God and helpful to the monastery, let him effect and accept it as though it had been effected by our master of blessed memory himself. After, however, his departure to the Lord (for, since he is a human being, he expects to die and pay the common debt of nature) the supremely glorious mystikos at the time, whoever, in fact, he may be, will undertake the protection of the monastery, at the earnest supplication of the superior and the monks of the monastery, being called to this soul-beneficial service freely [and] without pay, for the sake of his soul's salvation and that alone, as we said. For what would he even want from it, being as it is utterly poor and almost resourceless, except only an eternal commemoration?

[cf. (27) Kecharitomene [3], ed. lines 275–82, 289–90]: With the exception of the aforesaid full brother of the mystikos [George] of blessed memory, for to him and him alone it has been permitted, as we said above,⁹ to do whatever he wishes, none of those who have been entrusted with the protection of the monastery should use this as a reason for having control over any property in it, or pervert any of the provisions in this rule to the detriment of the monastery, or remove the superior, or enroll monks or introduce or expel them, or demand any accounts either of the superior or the steward or one of the monks in the matters they manage and look after, [p.266] or demand knowledge of the income and the expenditure, or try to get anything at all from the monastery, or appropriate anything whatsoever.

He is obliged only to set right the harmful things that are sometimes done contrary to the tenor of the typikon and even to drive off, as much as he can, those who are wont to display any insolent behavior in the monastery and to reconcile the monks and the superior whenever they happen to be at variance. For the foregoing reasons it will be enough for them [the protectors] to be commemorated in the monastery three times each day and after their deaths for their names to be inscribed in the diptychs and to be buried in the monastery, if they should wish, without any donation whatsoever.

Chapter 4

Concerning the fact that the monastery is self-governing

[= (27) Kecharitomene [1], ed. lines 180–91]: Since the monastery received the good fortune of independence of all kinds through a patriarchal memorandum and through a divine and imperial chrysobull,¹⁰ it should be, in accordance with their contents, independent and under its own control and above all mastery and lordship, and no one at all should have any right or privilege in respect of it, but it should remain independent in every way, separate and in control of itself, and be administered in accordance with the regulations that have been expressly laid down in the present typikon, being subjected neither to imperial or ecclesiastic or personal rights nor assigned as a gift or epidosis or for reasons of ephoreia, stewardship or superintendence or for any other reason to any kind of person whatsoever or monastery or holy house or some other bureau, but it is to remain forever only under the authority of the mankind-loving God alone and the holy great martyr Mamas, to whom it has in fact been dedicated, and it should be governed by the superior in it at the time and to be administered in accordance with the regulation of the present typikon.

[= (27) Kecharitomene [1], ed. lines 201–9]: But if anyone ever at any time and in any way wishes to gain control over it and to set it under the authority of someone else, whether he be an emperor, or a patriarch, or some other member of the clergy or of the senate, or the superior himself, or its steward, or simply anyone of the brothers in it, prompted by an attack of the devil, not only will he be held responsible for the divine body and blood of our God and Savior Jesus Christ, but he will be also accursed, just as the holy apostle says (Gal. 1:8), and subject to the curse of the three hundred and eighteen Holy Fathers [= (22) Evergetis [12], ed. lines 556–58]: and share the lot of the betrayer Judas and be numbered along with those who cried aloud “Away with him, away with him, crucify him” (John 19:15) and “His blood upon us and upon our children” (Matt. 27:25).

Chapter 5

Concerning the fact that the monks must pursue a cenobitic way of life; and concerning their number; and that they must be tonsured gratuitously; and that [p. 267] all the monastery's movable and immovable possessions must be inalienable; and concerning the fact that it must accept the things that are offered to it with a purpose dear to God

[Cf. (27) Kecharitomene [2], ed. lines 218–19]: It is right that something be said more clearly and briefly next concerning the way of life and the number of the monks and their whole organization in the monastery. Accordingly, the monks of the monastery of the holy great martyr Mamas shall be twenty in number. They ought continually to attend to the service of the church and to the duties inside and outside the monastery. Of them, however, let there be of necessity two or even three priests and two deacons, but, if there should be even more, thanks be to God. Yet, if—a thing for which we pray—the Lord God should grant that others, too, come to the monastery on account of the moral excellence of those who practice asceticism in it and the observance of the cenobitic way of life, and if he should supply also the necessary things for self-sufficiency either from the things that the monastery now possesses, through the superior's careful management, or also from the things that some Christ-loving individuals will dedicate to it, as we believe [that they will], so as to be sufficient for even more, a larger number of monks shall not be prohibited as long as the superior should wish it and there should be a capacity of cells in the monastery.

[= (27) Kecharitomene [7]]: We wish that those who enter should be accepted and have their hair cut and be counted in the aforesaid number of monks without any gift. If one of them were to wish of his own free will to offer something of his own possessions, whether the offering is of movable or immovable property, it will be accepted. For what is offered in faith as a dedication to God and the holy great martyr Mamas is going to be for the maintenance of the monastery and to commemorate and help the soul of the giver and ought not to be rejected.

But if, tempted by demons, he ever tries to leave the monastery—there are many examples of fickleness—and wishes to take back what he has given, it must not be given to him whatever it happens to be. For what has once been dedicated to God cannot be taken away, and the person who takes it away is sacrilegious and everyone knows, even if we do not say it, what sort of penalty sacrilege carries.

So whoever makes an offering of private movable or immovable property should read the preceding words here, and if he makes his offering with a free motive pleasing to God, with no intention of getting it back later, then indeed his gift should be accepted and dedicated to God and the Saint, by whom he will be indeed properly recompensed with the reward of his faith. All the things that have been set apart or will be set apart for the monastery or in any way whatsoever will accrue to it, not only immovable but also movable, are to remain with it inalienable. They are not to be given away as gifts, not to be exchanged, not to be alienated in any way whatsoever.

For it is downright sacrilege to do any such thing or to accept it when it has been done, and he who has done such a thing or has tolerated it will render an account for this on the frightful day of judgment, finding also Christ himself, the master of the things that are alienated, an unsympathetic and just Judge, and the great [p. 268] martyr Mamas a formidable adversary in both the present and the future life, even if two-fold or three-fold is that which is given in place of the thing that is alienated. Thus let the alienation of the things that have been dedicated be altogether forbidden.

Chapter 6

Concerning how the installations of the officials must be made

[= (27) Kecharitomene [18]]: The superior will be the one carrying out both the selection and the installation of all the officials of the monastery, selecting and installing by his own decision. For he shall appoint by all means those who excel the rest in both virtue and competence for the performance of their office. Whenever it is necessary for anyone to be installed to whatever sort of office, the keys will be placed in front of the holy sanctuary, and, after the trisagion has been completed, the one set apart for the office will approach, genuflect three times, receive the keys, and after this will bow his bared head to the superior, and the latter shall make the sign of the cross over him, saying, “The grace of our Lord Jesus Christ installs you.” However, in the case of the offices for which there are no keys, the sphragis by the superior and the words spoken in connection with it will be enough for the installation so that [each] may know from where he is receiving his office and in what way he promises to manage it.

Chapter 7

Concerning the installation of the steward

[cf. (22) Evergetis [13], ed. lines 615–22]: The steward of the monastery also shall be installed by the superior, one who is superior in virtue and activity and esteem. He who has been selected, as I have stated, having approached the superior and having performed the proper obeisance to him, shall offer him his head uncovered and he should make the sign of the cross over him with his hand and say, “The grace of our Lord Jesus Christ, through the intercessions of the saint, installs you steward of this monastery.” Then, when he has given him the sacred kiss, he is to set him in the [appropriate] place for the steward, and all the brotherhood, one after the other, will kiss him. After the kiss, the priest shall recite the customary prayer, and the dismissal of the congregation will take place. He, indeed, who has been appointed for the purpose of executing the function of steward shall carry out all the affairs of the monastery, just as he should be instructed by the superior, and he shall do nothing without the latter’s knowledge and order.

Chapter 8

Concerning the ecclesiarch

[= (27) Kecharitomene [20]]: The ecclesiarch moreover, being appointed by the superior, will be whoever seems to him fit and [p. 269] suitable for this office, receiving from the sacristan at the time of his appointment with an inventory everything that should be used in the church of the monastery, and at the proper time other things suitable for daily use or for use during the feasts. He will look after the customary decoration of the church, and he should look after the orderly condition of the church during the singing of psalms as is customary for ecclesiarchs. The office, however, ought to be sung in accordance with the synaxarion of the monastery of *Evergetis*¹¹ following the traditional form and the practice. The ecclesiarch at the time ought always to have an assistant ecclesiarch working with him and ministering and assisting in the office assigned to him. The aforesaid person ought to keep also the box with the nomismata that are received and paid out, as will be made clear later on in fuller detail.

Chapter 9

Concerning the appointment of the sacristan and at the same time keeper of archives and his office

[= (27) Kecharitomene [19]]: We wish there to be a sacristan in the monastery who must guard the sacred vessels and liturgical cloths, and think worthy of every kind of care the things handed to him in a written and reliable inventory of transfer. This official must hand over to the ecclesiarch for the service of the church both the things for daily use and the things used in the feasts, and when it is time, receive these back again from him and guard them; and the things surplus to requirements he must keep in the sacristy shut up and sealed by the superior, and he is required to hand back everything that has been entrusted to him whenever he is moved from this office according to the inventory of transfer made out for it. For it is within the power of the superior to remove and change those who hold office in the manner described. For it is just to leave unchanged those who have been appointed to each of the offices while they are performing them in a careful and devout manner, but those who neglect or despise them, and perhaps even behave deceitfully in them, should be removed and others appointed. If one of these people were to appropriate something, anything at all, he will be responsible to God and the holy great martyr Mamas, from whom in fact he received his keys.

The same person will not only be sacristan but also archivist, receiving all the papers containing the rights of ownership of the monastery, and will guard these, thinking them worthy of every kind of care and when a need for some document occurs, on the instruction of the superior he will bring out the required document and hand it over. When a few days have passed after this, he will remind [p. 270] the superior, and recall the document that was taken out, as has been described, and will not allow it to be lost. Since, however, the cabinet made for the protection of these [documents] is safeguarded by two keys, the superior ought constantly to keep one of them, while the sacristan keeps the other, both of them using a wax seal so that the one may not be able to open the aforesaid cabinet without the other.

Chapter 10

Concerning the treasurer of the nomismata

[cf. (27) Kecharitomene [24], ed. lines 884–85]: We must speak about the keeping and listing of monetary income and expenditure. For it is our wish that there be a box that is secured, in which ought to be deposited the nomismata that are collected from any source whatsoever and of whatever quality they may be, as well as the notes that are issued for their receipt and disbursement, in the presence of the superior, the steward, the ecclesiarch, and the sacristan. After these have been deposited, let this box be sealed by the superior and the aforesaid [officials]. The superior, however, shall take out from it a sum of nomismata in the presence of the aforesaid monks and shall hand this over to the treasurer for the monastery's daily expenses, and they should note this sum in the ledger of disbursement that should always be in the box. The treasurer, however, shall make another detailed note of the disbursement of the nomismata, which note, the one issued by the treasurer, that is, ought to be shown twice a week to the superior and recorded in order that he may keep fresh in mind the disbursement as it proceeds.

After all of the nomismata that he will already have received have been spent, let the total disbursement be read from the beginning in the presence of the superior and the aforesaid monks and let it be computed by the superior. Then in the same manner other nomismata shall be turned over to him, the box being opened in accordance with the aforesaid observance, and thus it shall be done continuously. Other nomismata, however, shall not be taken out of the box unless beforehand the treasurer hands over the account-book of disbursement and gives an account of what he received and spent.

Chapter 11

Concerning the official who takes in and issues the food, that is, the cellarer

[cf. (27) Kecharitomene [21] and [23]]: Likewise [it is our wish that there be] also an official who takes in and issues all food and drink in the monastery, whom, in fact, we call cellarer. [p. 271] Besides that, he must receive all the crops and legumes and issue them on the instruction of the superior, and take care of these in every way, so that they are not perhaps ruined by neglect. The aforesaid ought to see also to the preparation and care of the table of the monks, as well as the kitchen, being obliged to have under his authority both an assistant cellarer and a cook.

The food shall be served to the brothers one dish and one bowl at a time, for we do not wish that they eat two portions at a time, especially of cooked food and legumes, for reasons of suitable thrift. The olive oil he ought to get, of course, every month from him who closely guards it. For no one even from the ranks of all the officials ought to lay claim to the olive oil, the wax, and the incense under the pretext that these belong to his office, but he shall be authorized to guard them whom the superior should commission either from the ranks of the officials or from the ranks of the ordinary [monks]. If, however, [the superior] himself wishes to have control of them by himself, there is no one who can prevent him.

Chapter 12

Concerning the gatekeeper

[= (27) Kecharitomene [29]]: Furthermore the superior must appoint the one who is to hold the keys of the gate, whom we call the gatekeeper, whose responsibility it will be not to open the gate at all without the permission of the superior and to see to it that people do not enter or leave the monastery without the knowledge of the superior. The one appointed to this office must be devout and already inclining towards old age and by the testimony of the whole community a person of godly life. Each evening he will bring the keys to the superior, and he will not see those who have come to see him [personally] without the permission of the superior, but with his permission he will see them in whatever way he is permitted.

Chapter 13

Concerning the poor, both monks and laymen, who come to the gate of the monastery

It is also likely that some of our brothers in Christ, the poor, will come to the gate of the monastery because of want. Since it is impossible for all of them to be brought in within the monastery, let the gatekeeper at the time, who ought to be altogether devout and blameless, as we said above, have it in his power to go to the cellarer and get bread and give it to the beggar without hesitation and complaint in order that he himself may not suffer judgment. If, however, the beggar is a monk, let also wine be given to him, as well as [p. 272] fish or cheese or anything else. But also, after the brothers have taken their meal, let the leftover cooked food be given, also, by the aforesaid gatekeeper, to the poor who are found at the gate in order that, through your cheerful charity to our brothers and sharing, you, too, may receive in return cheerful and abundant mercy from God. For it is our preference that not even one beggar turn away from the gate with empty hands, and we enjoin in the Holy Spirit the gatekeeper at the time to observe this continually. In fact, the requirements of hospitality and charity will be observed thus forever both inviolate and immutable.

Chapter 14

Concerning the fact that the superior has it in his power to appoint also other officials

[cf. (22) Evergetis [39], ed. lines 1201–3]: Regarding other offices, too, which the other monasteries usually have, I wish people to be appointed to them in the monastery as the occasion demands, if the monastery should perhaps expand by the will of God and there is urgent need. Our wish concerning these matters, and our approbation and counsel and injunction, must be inviolate and immutable, since they are for your advantage and soul's salvation and security and everyone's tranquility, and let me say also for my spirit's boast and adornment in the presence of the Lord.

Chapter 15

Concerning the fact that all the things that have been explicitly stated in the present typikon must remain immutable and unchangeable forever

For surely the present typikon shall remain permanent and inviolate forever, not admitting of any addition, or subtraction, or of alteration. For it is our wish that any of the things that have been prescribed in it never be transgressed by you or admit of any alteration or change by anyone whatsoever, even if far better ordinances and regulations should be introduced either by the superior himself or by the protector of the monastery, an exception being made only in the case of the genuine brother of the mystikos [George], as we said above.¹² For to the latter and the latter alone we have given license to do whatever at all, in fact, he wishes that contributes certainly to the benefit and support of the monastery.

Chapter 16

Concerning the reading of the present typikon at the refectory for all to hear

In addition to everything this, too, must be observed no less than the other things, if not even more, as both the source and reason for the unabated observance of the things that have been prescribed [p. 273] and utter strengthening of the monastery. Let the typikon be read, therefore, so as to be listened to by all the members of the monastery four times a year, that is, every three months. Beyond the four times let it be read also on the commemoration of the mystikos [George] of blessed memory on the fifteenth of the month of July, and on my commemoration on the day on which I shall depart from the body, and besides on the commemoration of the genuine brother of the mystikos, lord Theocharistos, in order that, by the continuous reading of it, the things that have been prescribed may be more permanent and indelible.

This, of course, you must observe most carefully, not as our legislations, but as divine laws that are inviolable and unchangeable, and not only must you not be disheartened or vexed with such precepts and admonitions but reasonably even rejoice and exult because, having been relieved from all concern, you will have one undistracted occupation, [namely], the concern and care for your soul's salvation.

Chapter 17

Concerning the procedure and order to be followed at the refectory and concerning the food of the monks on the ordinary days and concerning the three fasts

[= (22) Evergetis [9], lines 325–26, 337–48, 352–57]: It should be the right time to mention the table and food and the other things that supply nourishment to the body. For neither will the soul ever be well without the latter's suitable nourishments, I mean prayer and chanting and reading of the sacred scriptures, nor, indeed, will the body be sustained or would render assistance to the [soul's] divine ministrations without the things that are of necessity useful to it. Therefore, after the customary collation has taken place, all should gather and sit waiting for the summons to the table which is given by the striking of the semantron. When the semantron has been struck, then beginning [to recite] the customary psalm audibly, walk to the refectory, that is the superior and all those without exception who have been instructed to sit down at the table during the first sitting. Then entering the refectory and completing the aforementioned psalm and the short prayer that accompanies it, they should sit down in the order laid down by the superior and gratefully partake of what has been set before them.

Moreover the reading, from the sacred scriptures must take place during the meals, as ordered by the superior, with no one making a noise or causing a disturbance or destroying the benefit which comes from that with worldly conversations and idle chatter. The superior only may speak sparingly if he wishes and perhaps the one asked by him may answer similarly in a few brief phrases, if possible. [p. 274] When, however, the superior is not present, prevented perhaps by weakness of the body or even some other reason, the steward in his stead shall fulfill the things that ought to be done by him. If the latter is not present, the ecclesiarch shall fulfill these duties.

[= (27) Kecharitomene [45], ed. lines 1314–16]: So then, after the monks have got up from the table, there should be a second sitting of loaves and courses set out, whatever has been set out for the first sitting, and those who served should eat.

[= (27) Kecharitomene [46], ed. lines 1322–27]: At the midday meal on the ordinary day your food will be on Tuesday, Thursday, Saturday and Sunday two dishes, and sometimes even three, of fish and cheese and legumes, as the superior should order; while on Monday two [dishes] of legumes cooked with olive oil, and on Wednesday and Friday two dishes of legumes, also cooked with olive oil, and similar vegetables, as the superior should order.

If, however, they wish, for the sake of [strict adherence] to the canons let them eat dry food these two days, especially, if not “God is the Lord” (Ps. 117 [118]:27) but “Alleluia” should be sung. Let them also drink wine, because of their weakness, [distributed] with the customary measure of wine. If, on the other hand, a feast of the Lord occurs also on these [days], I mean Wednesday and Friday, let them eat fish, too, and unless there should be a refreshment [of-fered] by others, the superior himself should take care of this. Your drink on all the ordinary days will be of the larger measure. Whenever the superior decides and especially on the feast days and the commemorations, let also the customary blessing [treat of wine] be given. However, at supper on the same days bread and vegetables and fruits that are in season or any other thing will be set out for you at the discretion of the superior; and the drink will be distributed with the larger measure in accordance with the rule.

Chapter 18

Concerning the food of the monks during the three fasts

[= (22) Evergetis [10]]: While such is the case on the ordinary days of the year, that is not the procedure during the holy fast days and especially during the first and greatest fast, on the first day of which, that is, Monday of the first week, the liturgy should not be celebrated nor should care be taken with the table or food. However, on the subsequent days of the same week attention should be paid to the table, and whoever chooses should partake of food. This will be composed of legumes soaked in water and perhaps some raw vegetables and fruits, and the drink will be wine, distributed with the half measure. For, since those who chant are very few and the office is long, if they drink water only, they would be able neither to chant more sonorously nor, indeed, perform more easily the continuous bending of the knees, and for this reason there is need [p. 275] for a moderate concession even if it is contrary to the standards of the sacred canons. This shall be the case up to Saturday; for on this [day] one must eat boiled vegetables and shellfish, even twice a day, and drink with the customary large measure of wine. But if a refreshment is provided by someone of the Christ-loving persons, you shall be feasted also with fish.

That way you should carry out the first week of the holy and great Lent, whereas on all Saturdays and Sundays of the same holy fast two or three cooked dishes containing olive oil should be set out for you and for your drink the customary large measure of wine should be distributed. The same thing should take place also on Wednesday in the middle of Lent and on the Thursday of the great canon. But on Tuesdays, however, [you must eat] boiled beans, black olives, and other such things; and on Thursdays two cooked dishes, both containing olive oil, will be set out for you. Whereas on Mondays, Wednesdays and Fridays, [you shall eat] legumes soaked in water and raw vegetables, and, moreover, walnuts and dried figs and other such things; the drink, certainly, throughout the whole week, apart from Saturday and Sunday, ought to be given with the customary two-thirds.

But if the commemoration of the discovery of the precious head of [St. John the] Forerunner or of the feast of the Annunciation¹³ should happen to fall on Tuesday or Thursday or Saturday or Sunday [you] should eat fish and be given a share of wine measured out with the larger measure.

If, on the other hand, the commemoration of the holy Forty Martyrs¹⁴ should happen to fall on the aforementioned days, you should eat shellfish and the wine shall be [distributed] with the larger measure. Therefore, throughout all the other days of the holy Lent you will not be allowed at all to eat fish, unless a refreshment perhaps should be sent by some Christ-loving person on Saturday or Sunday.

When the feast of the Annunciation falls, you should celebrate it as splendidly as possible, partaking of fish provided by the monastery and drinking wine of the larger measure. You will eat fish during this holy feast, as has been said, if it does not fall during the great holy week. For at that time you will use only shellfish, and receive a refreshment because of the feast since for three days of that week—that is Monday, Tuesday, and Wednesday—it is right to live content with some legumes soaked in water, raw vegetables, fruits that happen to be at hand, and you shall drink also half a measure of wine on account of your fatigue.

If, however, [it should fall] either on Holy Wednesday or on Good Friday or even on Holy Saturday itself, on Holy Wednesday and on Good Friday you shall be satisfied with boiled legumes and vegetables with olive oil and you shall partake also of wine with the larger measure, but, if on Holy Saturday, all anxiety that produces distraction must be avoided; for you shall not break the fast of Holy Saturday because of the feast [of the Annunciation].

In accordance with the ecclesiastical canons, we have been taught to fast from everything on [Holy Saturday] alone, and we must especially observe the regulations of the divine fathers. On Holy Thursday, therefore, when we do not celebrate the Annunciation, [p. 276] eating will be as on Thursdays of the other weeks of Lent and the wine shall be [given out] with the larger measure.

On Good Friday, however, unless the aforementioned feast occurs (on it), no cooking is to be done at all, but you are to partake of some raw vegetables and fruits, and wine distributed with the larger measure because of your weariness from the vigil.

On Holy and great Saturday there should be only a collation in accordance with the traditional custom. [The monks], however, will enter the refectory for the sake of quietude and have a collation there in accordance with the traditional form and custom, even if the feast of our wholly undefiled Mistress and Mother of God should occur (on it).

In this manner your diet for the period of the holy and great Lent should be kept, though care should be shown to the sick at the discretion of the superior. On the aforesaid holy great Lent, however, apart from a great emergency, the monks should not go out of the monastery at all except the officials alone.

The procedure for the fast of the Holy Apostles¹⁵ will be laid down immediately next.

After the completion of the whole canonical office of the hours and the divine liturgy as the synaxarion prescribes in detail, you should be summoned to the refectory at the seventh hour in accordance with the rule laid down above, at which on Tuesday and Thursday two or three dishes cooked with olive oil shall be served and wine will be drunk of the larger measure. On Mondays, Wednesdays, and Fridays let them eat dry food and let wine be given with the larger measure. Let the superior, however, have it in his power to provide refreshments and concessions whenever, in fact, he wishes. On Saturdays and Sundays, on the other hand, let them partake also of fish supplied from the house, unless a refreshment should be provided by someone, and on all these days, even on Wednesdays and Fridays themselves, the wine, too, shall be [served] with the larger measure. But on all of them let also a supper be served of bread and raw vegetables and fruits that are in season and wine with the larger measure, because of the heat and dryness of the season. But, if there should be any refreshment even on another day apart from Wednesday and Friday, they must partake even then of fish, thanking God.

The fast of the Holy Nativity of Christ¹⁶ will be similar to that of the Holy Apostles in both food and drink, after the completion of course of the whole canonical office according to the synaxarion. It will differ from it in one thing only, [namely], that you eat once. For your food should be set out for you at the ninth hour during the period of a fast, as has been said; and it will always be a fast when “God is the Lord” (Ps. 117[118]:27) is not sung at matins but “Alleluia.” [p. 277]

Chapter 19

Concerning the fact that without reservations one is to eat cheese and eggs during the entire week prior to the week of Meatfare on account of the heresy of the Artzibourians,¹⁷ and that even every day the gardeners, the vine-dressers, and simply all, apart from those who habitually are in attendance, are to come together at the refectory

But a specific thing which I almost bypassed, must be committed to writing because it is necessary and it separates us from the loathsome tradition of the Artzibourians. Since in the week before the Meatfare week the Artzibourians received the tradition to eat nothing else except bread and water, we, in order that we may be differentiated from their heresy, unhesitatingly eat both cheese and eggs throughout this entire week, and we likewise observe this during the entire week of Cheesefare because of another heresy.¹⁸

However, both our fellow-brethren who take care of the vineyards and the gardens and all the other ministrants, apart from those who are in attendance, ought without fail to come also to the first table sitting each day and in common to enjoy the bounties of God in order that the name “brotherhood” may not be just a name, but that it may become a reality through deeds. If however, some of the brothers, because they have been sent for service or have gone off even on some personal business with the knowledge of the father [superior], delay thereupon, and return perhaps after the midday meal or even supper, whatever was distributed to the other brothers during the day at the table must be given without diminution to them, too.

We have the tradition that on the holy and venerable Dormition of our supremely holy Mistress, the Mother of God,¹⁹ when the brothers are having their meal at the refectory, they eat also grapes previously blessed at the church by the priest who holds the daily service. This tradition also must be observed. If, in fact, anyone of the brothers should be detected as having taken a taste of grapes before this feast, he shall suffer in consequence the penalty of disobedience and shall not partake of them at all until the Exaltation of the precious Cross.²⁰ Liable, however, to the same penalty shall be also anyone of the brothers working in the vineyards who shall disregard this commandment.²¹ At the refectory, however, twice or even three times a week after the feast, grapes shall be served up until the time of the vintage; but when figs and melons are in season, they shall partake of them also almost every day, if they have any.

Chapter 20

Concerning the fact that the monks are not to eat secretly, and concerning poverty

[= (27) Kecharitomene [49], ed. lines 1444–53]: But we introduce the matter concerning abstinence from secret eating and drinking. Avoid this to the utmost of your power, continually keeping [p. 278] in mind the fact that in the beginning disobedient eating made us subject to death and deprived us of life in paradise when the devil, the wicked author of evil, introduced it, who from that time right up to the present has not ceased suggesting to those who take up war against him like an ancient weapon the secret and forbidden tasting of some food or drink. Not only does he suggest it but advocates secret tasting saying that it is a natural action and blameless. But you, do not be ignorant of his intentions, looking away to the result of his advice namely the transgression of a command.

[= (27) Kecharitomene [50]]: So that you may easily surmount this trap of the Evil One, we are imposing on you the poverty which can be of the greatest service, and preserving this you would without effort escape the danger of secret eating. For what would the person who has nothing taste? So then, practice poverty not only in unattainable and superfluous things but also in food and drink even to the smallest amount.

For this reason, accordingly, we instruct also the superior to enter into your cells, whenever he wishes, and to examine them and to allow you to have nothing more than the things allowed by the cenobitic rule.

Chapter 21

Concerning the fact that one is not to be absent, except for illness or other reasonable cause, from the ecclesiastical office

But above all I entreat you, my spiritual fathers and brothers, that no one be absent from the ecclesiastical office either during the daytime and nighttime doxologies or during the vigils that are usually performed. For, if, in fact, anyone should be absent in consequence of sloth and negligence and not because of illness, which, of course can attract forgiveness, let such a person know that, if after a first and second and third admonition he abides in his sloth, he shall have in consequence as his just penalty the eating of dry food and the drinking of water only on the day on which this offense should be committed by him. Those, however, who perhaps are occupied with certain tasks or wrestle with bodily illnesses, as I have stated, shall not be subjected to the censure of this sort. For it is necessary to show consideration for the illnesses and the labors of men.

Chapter 22

Concerning how those who enter must be tonsured and after how much time

[= (22) Evergetis [37]]: We must, moreover, speak in fuller detail about those who come to the monastery for the purpose of being tonsured. If they are distinguished people or people known to you for a long time and have close knowledge of the monastery's way of life and regime [p. 279] they should be tonsured after a period of six months if perhaps they themselves ask for this and are accepted. But if they are common and unknown, after an interval of seven days after their arrival at the monastery, they should assume the [novice's] rags and put on the monastic headdress, and they should be appointed to proper tasks and observed to see if they carry out these with perseverance eagerness and humility. If they persevere in this attitude for up to a period of two years, then they should receive the pledge of the divine and angelic habit, that is to say, the cloak. But if they perhaps appear to have grown tired, grumbling and being negligent about instructions, it will be the responsibility of the superior [to decide about them].

Those who have been judged worthy to be accepted should not be put under any compulsion concerning a renunciation and an entrance offering. But if the one who is to be tonsured himself willingly chooses to offer something to God and the saint, it should be accepted, as we said above. But so much concerning those who are tonsured in the monastery.

One, however, should consider also those who come from a different [monastery] for the purpose of making a beginning in it. Let him, therefore, who has been chosen by the monastery to be admitted as a monk spend only eight days in it for the purpose of seeing it and its regimen. If, indeed, he is obviously pleased, let him make a confession to the superior. Then, while the trisagion is being performed in the church, he must present his head to the superior, bowed and uncovered, and, as the superior makes the sign of the precious cross over it, he reverently says approximately the following, "May the grace of the all-Holy Spirit, brother, through the prayers of our fathers, grant you power and strength to complete well and pleasingly to God the beginning which you made for the edification and salvation of your soul." Thereupon let the superior give him the kiss in the Lord and successively likewise all the brothers. Let him, however, make a prostration to the brothers, saying, "Pray for me, fathers and brothers, that God may grant me perseverance," and, after the brothers have answered, "May God grant you, brother, perseverance in every good work," he shall be enrolled in the brotherhood. For in no other way shall anyone be numbered among the brothers of our monastery unless, along with the confession, this ceremony takes place in exactly the same way.

Chapter 23

Exhortation concerning the fact that all those who serve are to apply themselves thoroughly to their services and not to despise them in any way

[= (22) Evergetis [33]]: I entreat all those who carry out offices in the monastery, from the first down to even the last, to apply themselves to their offices wholeheartedly since they expect no small recompense from them. As regards those among them who are unlettered, the diligence and care they show in their office will be totally sufficient as their defense before

God and us, but we exhort those who are educated but are perhaps prevented [p. 280] by the busy nature of their office from carrying out the daily cycle of prayers and from meeting with the brothers in the services not to be neglectful or despairing, as if they had lost the benefit to themselves, but be more cheerful and joyful because the Lord has given them the strength to serve their brothers in imitation of him, who says, “I came not to be served but to serve and to lay down my life as a ransom for many” (Matt. 20:28).

You see, my brothers, what work you perform, you see whom you imitate. You see that you are putting into practice the greatest of all good, love. Why then do you grieve and are sorrowful when you miss the service? Do you not think that you are laying down your own lives for many like my Master, Christ, so that you may bring comfort to your brothers? So, you should be happy and rejoice because you yourselves are accomplishing each day by your work what could scarcely be achieved by those who devote themselves to prayer. You are blessed in that occupation and to be envied. For prayer is indeed a fine thing, a very fine thing, bringing us into contact with God and raising us from earth to heaven, but love is of course greater and much more important. For the former is a part of virtue and an element and section of the whole body of sanctification that brings perfection, but love is its crown and consummation. For joined to itself it displays humility that exalts (cf. Matt. 23:12), mercy, and love of mankind, because of which God indeed became man and, through which man is revealed as God.

So why do you give up the treasure house and culmination of all these good things [and run to what is inferior when thus having reached to the summit] easily you should hold on to it securely and do everything so as not to be thrown down from it? “We are afraid,” they say, “because of our failure to carry out the rule;” but do not be afraid, for sincere confession will make up to your failure, justly granting you pardon. Fear this, be on your guard against this; but if this is not the case, then rejoice, I beg you attending to your offices eagerly.

Chapter 24

Concerning respect to the superior and deference, that is, bowing [to him]

When one is about (for even these precepts are necessary to those who live in a cenobitic monastery) to go out of the monastery at all either for the sake of some task or because of personal need, let him not go out of the monastery before he receives a blessing from the superior. Likewise let him neither depart to the bath without an obeisance [to the superior], nor, indeed, have his hair cut or his vein opened.²² Let him also who is about to sound the semantron and those who have been chosen to perform the sacred rites and the chanters and the precentors and simply everyone before [he starts] his work receive a blessing from him. For he who wishes to obey the apostolic regulations must do nothing at all without the knowledge and consent of the superior but in all things [p. 281] follow his orders, nay rather also render to him the honor that befits him, so as never to pass him by without bowing to him, whether one shall meet him on the road or should see him emerging.²³ Whether one is summoned by him or even of one’s own accord should go to him for the sake of a request regarding some need, let him beforehand make an obeisance and, folding his hands together, let him stand thus. It is fitting that, you too, render the same respect to one another inasmuch as there is peace on all sides and concord directs your relationship with one another.

Chapter 25

A broader exhortation concerning the fact that those who live the monastic life in the monastery of the holy great martyr Mamas must pursue the cenobitic way of life even if it happens that the entire income of the monastery is reduced to the sufficiency of two monks [= (27) Kecharitomene [55]]: Although the way of life of the monks and the whole organization of life in the monastery was already discussed above²⁴ briefly, it will be discussed again, compatible with what has been clearly stated and declared by the divine fathers with regard to those who have renounced the world. For they decided and laid it down that those who fled from the very stormy world and took refuge in the calm harbor of monastic life should enter upon a cenobitic way of life, and renouncing their own will give themselves up to a life of submission, seeing that they need a helmsman and guide as they direct the blind eye of their soul this way and that and are not able to help themselves through their ignorance of goodness.

Therefore obeying these men, we wish that the monks in our monastery of the holy great martyr Mamas live in a cenobitic constitution and way of life and that the rule of this constitution should always be in force in it unaltered and unbroken, not perverted or altered in any way, nor altered for any reason or pretext whatsoever, neither because of wealth or poverty, neither because of shortage or abundance, nor any other specious reason or pretext whatsoever, but the cenobitic constitution and way of life should be completely preserved in every way unbroken for ever, even if the whole revenue of the monastery should be reduced to being sufficient for two monks—which I pray will not happen.

If one of the superiors wishes the opposite, the monks are to oppose him; but, if the monks wish the opposite, the superior should resist them. If they all were to agree, the protector of the monastery should defend what I have laid down; and if he also were to consort with them, we grant permission to anyone who wishes, to strive for a pious matter and go to court on behalf of goodness itself and the reward for it, and seek to make our instructions effective [p. 282] and drive from the monastery those responsible for the abolition of the cenobitic way of life, and not to think this is a small achievement but a very great one that brings salvation.

Chapter 26

Concerning the fact that there must neither be kelliotai nor imposed guests in the monastery

[cf. (27) Kecharitomene [53], line 1494]: We wish that there should be neither kelliotai nor imposed guests at all within the monastery. In fact we forbid this completely. [= (27) Kecharitomene [4]. ed. lines 340–49; 305–12] If, however, anyone who is from a more exalted station in life shall wish to come to the monastery and to cast off his worldly hair in it, or perhaps should enter as one who has already been tonsured, and if he should be unable to change suddenly from the more luxurious way of life to the more harsh and should perhaps have need of a servant and some small modification and concession so that neither the regimen of the cenobitic monastery may be relaxed completely, nor, indeed, anyone who comes to it be sent away, the superior shall be permitted, if he wishes, to make concessions to the one who enters the [monastery] and to allow the latter even to have a servant and a comfort such as [the superior's] sagacity should determine, especially if the one who enters it benefits the monastery either through his rank or an offering or even both.

They, too, however, ought to maintain the cenobitic way of life; for in no way whatsoever is it our wish that the appellation of “kelliotēs” be used in the monastery, nor that there be external monks,²⁵ whether one should be of a distinguished station in life or should abound in much wealth and in consequence present an offering that is both lavish and prodigious or make a promise with reference to bringing in certain specified provisions from outside the monastery. For this is appalling to the patristic regulations and to our wish.

[cf. (27) Kecharitomene [53], lines 1504–8]: Who would send an imposed guest to a monastery that is independent and is ruled by the mighty hand alone of the Lord and the great martyr Mamas, who is honored therein, as the most inviolable documents belonging to [the monastery] prove? No one, would ever wish this, he would not be so foolish as to violate the promulgated written decrees of [the monastery’s] independence, unless he wishes altogether to render God, who is “mighty in wars” (Sir. 46:1), openly hostile to himself.

Chapter 27

Concerning the fact that women are not to come into the monastery nor laymen dwell within it

This, too, is one of the indispensable things, that the monastery never be entered by women, except perchance rarely for the sake of the burial or commemoration of those who are close relatives by blood to our master [George] of blessed memory and new builder or even of some other magnates who may be buried later. But they, too, as soon as [p. 283] they will have completed the rites for the commemoration of the deceased, shall depart immediately from the monastery in the course of the same day.

[= (22) Evergetis [39]], ed. lines 1197–1200]: Let, however, also for the sake of worship, as many women as are well known for their way of life and virtue, as well as nobility and eminence, come in but very rarely and carefully and, if possible, unexpectedly so that in that way we may be able to preserve our respect for them and maintain freedom from harm for ourselves. However all other women will absolutely not enter the monastery, even if they be known kinswomen of either the superior or of any of the monks; but surely neither during the days of Eastertide nor on the commemoration of the saint shall entrance in the monastery be permitted to them.

Indeed we prefer that not even any laymen at all have their residences within the monastery, but that the area within the monastery be allotted as a kind of God-planted paradise to those alone who practice asceticism, so that any cause for offense may not arise therefrom.

Chapter 28

Concerning the clothing of the monks and concerning the price of a bath and soap

Concerning, indeed, clothes and footwear and various other bodily coverings of the monks it is our wish that there be given to each of them anything he needs in accordance with the cenobitic pursuit and regimen which has been traditional from long ago. Inasmuch, however, as contention accompanies, as it often does, the distributions of this sort, and it is one of the most troublesome things to satisfy the pleasure and wish of each, we considered it better that the items of clothing be supplied to each of the brothers through the use of money, putting an end to contentions and grumblings even in this matter.

Therefore, there shall be given to each of the brothers, from the highest to the lowest, to all of them equally, except for the old men who do not toil, for the latter ought to be subject to the discretion of the superior, at the present time two hyperpyra each and two old trikephala each; that is, at the beginning of September one hyperpyron each and one trikephalon each and at the beginning of March similarly one each. But, if, indeed, as time progresses, the monastery should prosper, as I hope and pray, it is our wish that even three hyperpyra be given them for the whole year.

Beyond these there ought to be given each year one thick outer garment to each of those who carry out the offices, in the category of whom ought to be included also those who attend to vine-dressing, for the latter even more than all the others tear apart their clothing by the use of the spade. Every month a sum that is adequate for soap and the price of a bath ought to be given to all the brothers for the sake of one bath, if, that is, a bath is not attached to the monastery.²⁶ [p. 284]

Chapter 29

Concerning the confession of the monks, and concerning the fact that all are to have the superior as a spiritual father

Our common enemy and foe, who, according to the great apostle (I Pet. 5:8; Ps. 21 [22]:13), “goes about like a lion seeking whom he should devour,” knowing precisely that confession snatches away from the middle of his throat those who are about to be devoured, sets in motion all his wiles and contrivances so as to strip whomever he can from this great and noble aid, inserting in the practice [of confession] humiliation and shame. But this shame, says the theologian Gregory, is part of the punishment for the sins we confess.²⁷ Let us hasten, therefore, as much as we can, to pull ourselves away from under the punishment in the other world through this salutary and noble aid, I mean, of course, confession. For no one at all should fail to understand how much more painless it is to declare one’s secret to a person, and him a shepherd who is both sympathetic and of like nature, than to be convicted in the presence of the angels and the whole race of mankind and God himself.

It is our wish, therefore, that the whole assembly of brothers disclose to the superior the bruises of the soul they have suffered or the foul thoughts themselves that spring up in them as human beings, and that all have him as a common and spiritual father, even if perhaps he happens to be unordained, because he has assuredly the permission from the most holy and ecumenical patriarch, having been empowered to apply also the remedy that is suitable to each illness. For thoughts are wounds of the soul that are inflicted by the evil demon, who ensnares our life. A wound, however, when it is revealed immediately and receives the medical treatment that is suitable and appropriate, is easily healed; but, when it is kept concealed and becomes chronic, it causes putrefaction and generates a stench and becomes difficult to heal.

It is, therefore, exceedingly helpful to have the physician close by. But, if it is disagreeable to anyone, a thing which seems to me unreasonable, to have one’s own father also as a physician, let him tell his father in secret his own purpose and the latter will take care to send him off to whom-ever the superior himself wishes or even to one of the priests of the monastery, who is both more devout and more aged. I made a great concession in writing this since the subordinate [monk] has no right at all on the basis of the patristic traditions not to have the superior as a spiritual father.

Chapter 30

Exhortation regarding the fact that the brothers are to confess unhesitatingly and honestly

[= (22) Evergetis [7], ed. lines 263–87]: It is good to say even to you yourselves what is proper. So then you, my brothers, seeing the superior hurrying off to this good ministry which is very beneficial to your souls, you should run, [p. 285] and reach with eagerness this calm harbor that is safe for your souls, and reveal completely without any covering up every stirring of your mind and every thought that harms your soul, as though you are making your confession in the presence of God and not a man. But the one who sets out to lie to God will always get his punishment. For the psalmist says, “Thou wilt destroy all that speak falsehood” (Ps. 5:6). So then, by confessing without deceit and ridding your minds of all wrangling, all confusion and trouble, you may be happy and rejoice, having gained this good hope namely that you will not fail to gain salvation. But make your confession without accusing each other when perhaps a violent dispute or some other argument occurs. Do not make your confession if you consider yourselves blameless and you are looking really for condemnations, nor should you speak about the bodily needs which afflict you. If you must speak of some violent dispute, be keen to ascribe and assign to yourselves all the blame and reason for the fault, whatever it is. But if you speak about some other passions, reveal these completely so that you can gain double benefit from this, by both attaining sound health of soul and clothing yourself in exalting humility, for possessing this we will actually be like God who says, “Learn from me that I am gentle and lowly in heart” (Matt. 11:29). What else would be a clearer proof of gentleness and humility in heart than clearly to bear all affliction nobly and blame oneself in everything? The true confession without which I do not think anyone gains salvation is the cause of so many good things.

Chapter 31

Concerning the third and the sixth hour and their office

When the semantron then, is struck at the time that is proper, all must assemble in the narthex and sing together the third and sixth hours along with the prayers that accompany them. At the beginning, however, of the sixth hour both the priest and the deacon who have the priestly duties of the day and the assistant ecclesiarch along with them must make a genuflection to the superior, and, while the former must enter into the holy sanctuary to prepare this divine oblation, the latter must go off to strike the large semantron. So much about the third and the sixth hour.

Chapter 32

Concerning the divine mystery and which of the brothers and how and when they ought to partake of the divine elements

[= (22) Evergetis [5]]: It is necessary now also to speak about the divine mystery, which must of necessity be celebrated, if not every day, at least four times [p. 286] weekly without postponement, apart from the feasts of the Lord. But you yourselves must be sure to take care in this, my brothers, because what is performed there is divine and fearful, and because there more than in anything else the fearful and very great mystery of our orthodox faith is accomplished, I mean the most divine and most precious sacrifice of the completely undefiled body and blood of our Lord and God and Savior Jesus Christ.

So during it, my brothers, as has been said, you must pay strict attention, and as far as possible chase from you every thought that is sown by the devil, impure, and unworthy of that fearful celebration, and purify yourselves in every way. Then as many as allowed by the superior should partake of the divine elements. For it will not be possible for any of you to partake freely and in a thoughtless manner, nor yet each day.

This we would indeed wish, for to partake often of the divine elements is to share in life, as Christ himself says, “He who eats my flesh and drinks my blood abides in me, and I in him” (John 6:56) and again, “Unless you eat my flesh and drink my blood, you have no life in you” (John 6:53), and as the divine apostle says, “He who is united to the Lord becomes one spirit” (I Cor. 6:17), and as the most gentle David says conversely, “They that remove themselves far from thee shall perish” (Ps. 72 [73]: 27).

Therefore we would indeed wish this, as has been said, but because of human weakness and the danger of the action we do not allow it, for “Whoever eats the body and drinks the blood of the Lord unworthily is guilty of his body and blood” (I Cor. 11:27) says Paul, the divine and inspired speaker and leader of the apostles. This statement is frightening, my brothers, and causes not only sinners like me but also those who are very confident in themselves to fear partaking.

So then as many as are sure that they are pure and free from disgraceful thoughts and submission to them, from anger and grumbling, grief and denigration, deceit and disorderly laughter, furthermore, bearing of grudge and irritation, disgraceful talk and such things, should partake of communion once a week. But those who fall prey to the aforementioned passions and hasten to a renunciation of them through confession and repentance should partake of communion once a month or even once in two months at the discretion of the superior of course, for he should be in charge of such matters.

But for someone to consider himself unworthy of communion without his knowledge cannot be approved. For he who does this will be condemned as someone fulfilling his own wish. However, those who should partake of communion must to the best of their ability read more attentively the prayers laid down for the partaking, make a common genuflection together to one another to grant forgiveness, and thus to partake gratefully of the life-giving elements. So let these things be carried out in this way. [p. 287]

Chapter 33

Concerning those who have grown old in the monastery

Yet this, too, we both formulate and declare, and I believe not without reason and better purpose, that those who have grown old in the monastery or have otherwise done hard work and undergone some harm or mutilation of the body so as not to be able as a result of this to render service, be they men of learning or, indeed, even illiterate, even if they should be found not to have lived in the monastery for a long time, it is our wish not only that they not be expelled from the monastery but rather that they be taken care of in their old age and be absolved from work, so far as it is possible, by someone of their fellow brothers in the monastery, whomsoever its superior selects. Their food and drink should be equal to that of those who are young and healthy.

I enjoin, for the sake of such a purpose and such a service, all those who are destined to administer in any way whatsoever the affairs of the monastery, both superiors and others, never to set aside or violate or alter this God-loved regulation, so long as, God granting, the monastery exists and monks live in it, unless he who shall attempt such a thing wishes to provoke against himself the statement “As you did it not to one of the least of these my brothers, you did it not to me” (Matt. 25:45).

Chapter 34

Precise instruction concerning the fact that all are to have the same food and drink, with reference also to the care of the sick and to the fact that the [monks] are not permitted to have servants or domestics

[= (22) Evergetis [26], ed. lines 941–43, 947–51]: Before God and the holy great martyr Mamas, we give you this instruction, that you should all have the same food and drink and that there should never be any difference in anything ever for anyone, but you will all, those who are advanced in age and virtue and celebrity of life and those who are inferior to the latter in these qualities, use for food the same things.

For you should only help and take care as is possible of those who are clearly afflicted with illness, and for this reason perhaps need better food and drink to sustain our weak and unfortunate bodies. For I think that this shows discernment and preserves the conscience of everyone else free of offense.

[= (22) Evergetis [41], lines 1256, 1259–63, 1257–58]: We must, therefore, allow, with the knowledge of the superior, those who are weary because of illness that has fallen upon them, to rest in their own cells and there to partake of nourishment that is suitable and appropriate for their illness, to whom the one who would be ordered by the superior will render service in all things, both food and drink and the other necessities. But [p. 288] our sick brothers emboldened by this should not cast off self-restraint by seeking for extra things, even those which perhaps they have never even heard of, much less seen and eaten, but they should restrain and control themselves, being satisfied only with those things which the circumstances of the season and the resources of the monastery and superior’s lenient judgment provide for them.

Since, however, two hospitals are near us, if, as I hope and pray, the monastery is ever able, the superior ought to see to it that someone of the neighboring physicians visit the ailing brothers every day and offer the appropriate medical treatments and deem them worthy of every sort of care. If, however, the monastery is unable—a thing which I pray will not happen—he who needs medical care must go to those who share [authority in] the hospitals and request to be given a bed. Whenever a brother has been given a bed there and is being treated medically, his food must be provided by the monastery in order that he may not defame it because he is distressed in some respect, as [he would] if the things that are being given him in the hospitals are not adequate.

[= (22) Evergetis [24], ed. line 917]: It will not be possible for you to have servants nor domestics who render services, but each shall serve himself and, in turn, one another, the young one him who is advanced [in age], and the novice him who entered the arena earlier, and the stronger one him who is weaker, according, of course, to the superior's orders. For thus the Master's commandment will be fulfilled and the law of love will be observed unimpaired.

Chapter 35

Concerning the fact that those who come together in manual labors are not to talk idly and concerning the fact that they are not to have acquisitions and concerning the fact that they are not to steal from the monastery

[= (22) Evergetis [21], ed. lines 877–84, 889–96]: If any of your number should gather on some manual task or other service and amuse themselves with idle conversations—for this is usual at gatherings—and then turn to disgraceful talk—for “by a multitude of words,” he says, “thou shalt not escape sin” (Prov. 10:19)—they should not reject the admonition of the superior. For we instruct him to do this in love and persuade them to give up topics which harm the soul, and either discuss matters from Holy Scripture or be silent. “For,” the author of the Book of Proverbs says, “If thou refrain thy lips, thou wilt be prudent” (Prov. 10:19) and discreet.

Also those who happen to be on a journey and are afflicted in the same way should be cured with the same medicine by the [superior]. Furthermore, they are not to resort to mutual rebuking or verbal sparring. For he who does such a thing will be liable to excommunication, and if he does not repent and beg for forgiveness “with a contrite heart” (Ps. 50 [51]:17) he will be punished—for we prefer that you should always be loving and peaceful towards one another and, instead of anything that provokes quarrels, learn to say [p. 289] “Bless and forgive [me], brother.”

Furthermore, those who form idle gatherings and visit one another with no good reason, without any pressing cause, or the knowledge of the superior, especially after compline, when they are admonished and do not desist, they will be punished.

[= (22) Evergetis [22], ed. lines 899–904]: Those who acquire some possessions contrary to the rule of the monastery, without the knowledge of the superior, will be liable to punishment. But the person who purloins anything from the monastery and does not make amends after a first and second admonition and up to the seventh will be expelled completely.

Chapter 36

Concerning the fact that one is not to seek at all a seat of honor

[= (22) Evergetis [9], ed. lines 364–78]: We refuse even to hear at all that someone of his own accord seeks after a loftier seat or the ensuing honor. For how could this be acceptable, that men who are living according to God's will should quarrel at all about seating, like those who are keen to show themselves in a worldly way superior to everyone else in this, as those who are excited by glory that is vain and hated by God? For “Everyone that is proud in heart is an abomination to the Lord” (Prov. 16:5), says Holy Scripture, and “The Lord resists the proud, but he gives grace to the humble” (Prov. 3:34).

So this will not happen among you, it will not. But if any of you is found, causing annoyance in this matter, putting forward as an excuse perhaps age or sphere of work, and does not abide by the command of the superior nor is satisfied with the place allocated to him, I command in the Lord that he be allocated the last place and be taught to leave to the world the habits of the world.

But those who have been entrusted with these two primary offices, [namely], the steward and the ecclesiarch, shall sit ahead of all of them on the one side, while on the other [side] the priests according to their rank of seniority and after the latter, in turn, the deacons, unless, the superior should prefer some who are advanced in years or old age or even some who are preeminent in the world, worthy of respect and honor, to sit ahead of the latter, the deacons, that is. After they are seated, however, there shall not be a preference in respect to seating but thereafter the seating will be assigned suitably to each at the discretion of the superior.

Chapter 37

That all the things that have been registered in the inventory must be inalienable; so must also be the things that have been acquired in any way whatsoever at any time whatsoever

Since the monastery had need of sacred vessels, divine offerings and books for the praise of God and the Saint and the illumination of those who practice asceticism in it, as many things as were necessary were dedicated to it by the grace of God through the intercessions [p. 290] of the Saint and through our master the mystikos [George] of blessed dormition, who has been mentioned many times;²⁸ all the silver vessels, [that is], and revered icons and veils and books and bronze items that are seen.

An inventory has been made by us, in which are compiled both the things that belong to the monastery from long ago and the things that have been made lately, which inventory, was, in fact, signed by my own hand. Concerning these [things], furthermore, we command that they be absolutely both inalienable and irremovable. He who shall dare to remove from them anything of whatever kind shall be considered sacrilegious and along with Judas shall be referred to eternal punishments, and before the [punishments] may he also inherit [Judas'] noose.

But may no one, whether potentate or magistrate or protector or anyone of those in the monastery, whether superior or subordinate, even think of removing or alienating any of the divine offerings or of the books in it, either large or small, or any other thing whatsoever. Instead let there be more eagerness to make additions and further dedications for the glory of God and for their own considerable benefit. Let, in fact, this very [rule] be observed also for the things that will be acquired at any time whatsoever, both movable and immovable.

Chapter 38

Sworn exhortation to the protector of the monastery at the time

But really the zealous concern for my fathers and brothers, always lying couched in my soul, persuades me to collect from all quarters the things that are for their benefit. In order, therefore, that they might not be abused by some abusers, as though bereft of human assistance, I adjure by our Lord Jesus Christ the protectors of the monastery at the time, since they can readily help it, that, if, the monks should come to them and present the present simple regulations of the typikon and say that they are being unjustly treated by some, especially regarding the bringing in of water by pipes from the outside, for which I toiled very much and often, that they proceed against the injustice in accordance with their power and check its impetus and rescue the flock of Christ and the Saint from the hand of quite cruel men, and not to ignore it but support and defend it in accordance with the dictates of law and justice, in order that thus they may procure a reward for themselves and have the divine favor because they graciously received the monks and deemed them worthy of the proper assistance. For this reason, in fact, we have prescribed that they even be commemorated both while alive and after death. [p. 291]

Chapter 39

Concerning the monks who depart to the Lord

[= (27) Kecharitomene [70], lines 1713–16, 1733–35, 1737–38, 1742–46, 1750–52]: Since we must take thought for the monks, not only when they are alive but also when they depart to the Lord, it is necessary to prescribe at this time also about matters concerning the latter. Whenever, then, anyone of the monks should depart from this world, let the customary things done for the dead monk be carried out in the exonarthex, I mean both the singing of psalms and all the clothing of the remains. Then it should be transported to the burial-place with the bier and be buried in the tombs of the monks on the right side, that is, of the church, in which the brothers alone must be buried, no one of those from the outside being buried with them.

The commemorations on the third, ninth, and fortieth days for the one who has died should be sung in the narthex of the church, and kollyba prepared on those days on his behalf, and let an offering [of eucharistic bread] be made for each liturgy on his behalf until the fortieth-day commemoration and let him be commemorated. But he should also be remembered at matins and vespers until the aforesaid fortieth day.

His name also must be written on the diptychs and he, too, must be commemorated [in the future] along with the rest. So that a common commemoration of all the monks may take place, on each Friday after the office of lamp-lighting, unless a feast prevents it, they must sing a canon for the dead in the exonarthex and an ektenes should be made for all those who have already departed. Moreover, we urge both the priests and the deacons to consult the diptychs during every liturgy in order to remember those listed on them, so that they may not bear the responsibility for forgetting and omitting them.

Certainly on the Saturday of Meatfare, the Saturday of Cheesefare, and the Saturday of Pentecost let stauria also be made on their behalf and let four of those who have already passed away be commemorated at each staurion. But, if they should be superiors, let individual offerings [of eucharistic bread] be made and let them, too, be commemorated. Likewise in the commemorations of each one of [the monks] let a liturgy and offering [of Eucharistic bread] be made on his behalf.

Let, however, the memorial rites for the superiors be made more generously, especially if some of them should happen to have conducted themselves in a manner worthy of their calling so as to leave behind to their successors certain good advantages. The surviving monks ought to receive on both the Saturday of Meatfare, the Saturday of Cheesefare, and the Saturday of Pentecost one staurion as an offering for the commemoration of their parents, and, after the stauria have been offered, they should be assembled by the gatekeeper and a distribution should take place at the gate. [p. 292]

Chapter 40

Injunction to the brothers and the superior concerning how the annual commemoration of our master of blessed memory [George] mystikos and new builder ought to be held

In the prefatory statement of our present typikon concerning our master [George] of blessed memory, the mystikos, we have rendered to him our full gratitude for his bounty and [ascribed to him] also the establishment and advancement of this holy monastery. Or, to put it better, he himself painstakingly has given us his favors, having displayed his intrinsic goodness and at the same time his soul's graciousness and love for God. [Therefore] we ourselves, too, have decided that it is necessary, even if we are not able to do so in a manner worthy of him, to render to that God-revering man, so far as it is possible, a reward within our present means. For this, too, is not a small thing that we too return his kindness as we can, giving back eagerly what is possible but ceding the repayment he deserves to the Almighty, who alone knows how to mete out to the worthy their rewards proportionately.

For this very reason I leave to you, oh fathers and brothers, also a paternal injunction as a final admonition that you consider him rather as the primary and true founder of the monastery. Whenever you offer an ektenes on his behalf at every office of the divine ritual, say aloud six times “Kyrie eleison” at both vespers and matins, and the liturgy, and, after the dismissal of vespers and matins on every day that is free of fasting, apart from Sundays and feasts of the Lord, sing at his grave the customary parastasimon and “Among the spirits of the righteous,” and the rest, and let also an ektenes be made on his behalf, the “Kyrie eleison” being sung fifteen times; and at each liturgy let one offering [of eucharistic bread] be offered on his behalf. So much for the daily services.

Let also his commemoration be celebrated annually with two candelabra with twelve candleholders and four tapers lit within the church, and let also the illumination of the church be done more lavishly than usual, as well as the provisioning of the monks with fresh fish up to three dishes, the customary treat [of an extra serving of wine] also being given. The lamp, too, at his grave shall be perpetually lighted, and a candle will burn for him in every office.

[= (22) Evergetis [36], ed. lines 1083–89]: The commemoration, however, of his full brother, lord Theocharistos, and of the latter's wife, Zoe Dalassena, ought to be held just as they themselves shall direct in writing. Furthermore, commemorations should take place every year for all those who have accomplished something worthy of remembrance in accordance with the tenor of their agreements, and [p. 293] equally for those brothers whose names will be inscribed on the diptychs, the death of each of these, too, being made positively clear from the recording into the record-book. In addition, the commemoration also of a brother who has recently died is to be made in the ektenes every day in every service until his fortieth-day commemoration, just as has been discussed above in fuller detail.

Chapter 41

Reasons for which the present rule of the typikon was set forth, and a prayer concerning the fact that the items in it are to be preserved inviolate, and a most horrible curse against him who shall attempt to proceed towards the annulment of the present rule

The things, then, that I have previously stated have presented quite clearly the circumstances that made the composition of the present rule of the typikon necessary. For the rule and constitution of the cenobitic monasteries, if they should be left unexamined and not be guided by the proper control of reason, would collapse not before long. May the Triune God keep preserving inviolable up to the end of the present world all the things that have been formulated in order that thus the flock of Christ may be called light, in accordance with the statements of the gospels, and through it yet others also might be brought to edification.

May it be a truly chosen flock that heeds the voice of him who calls to life and by its examples be able to instruct many souls of men that see its correct way of life as a marvelous example. Let him, however, who shall even attempt to proceed towards the annulment of the present lifesaving rule of the typikon, in addition to not being listened to, be also alien to the hope of the Christians, because he has wanted to overturn and violently shake this peace-loving rule that has been established for the benefit of my fathers and brothers.

Chapter 42

Instruction to the superior: how he ought to be disposed towards the brotherhood

[= (22) Evergetis [17], ed. lines 785–99]: You, spiritual father and guide of this holy flock, be moderate and fair with the brothers, and in your concern maintain in everything a fatherly affection for them. Yes, I entreat you, care for them all, have concern for them all, forebear with them all, support them instructing, advising, teaching, comforting, healing the sick, supporting the weak, encouraging the faint-hearted, restoring those who sin, forgiving “seventy times [p. 294] seven” (Matt. 18:22) in accordance with the word of Our Lord. For it is better that we, who are imitating the Lord himself, be judged considerate [even though] a little remiss in what we ought to do, than by maintaining utmost righteousness we be condemned as heartless and haters of our brothers. Also, to omit the rest, St. Basil says “And the superior himself, as a father caring for true children, will watch over the needs of each one and will bring them suitable healing as far as he can, and will support with love and fatherly affection the member who is truly weak whether spiritually or physically.”²⁹

Chapter 43

Sworn order to one from a different [monastery] who is about to hold the office of superior

I adjure, by the Lord God and by the great martyr Mamas, him from a different monastery who is about to hold the office of superior in accordance with what has been prescribed above in our monastery not to bring into the monastery with himself more than one brother, and him in the role of a disciple, as it were, from either intimates or acquaintances which he has. For, if he brings over more, many are the improprieties that will spring up from this. For it is inferred from this that those whom he himself will bring in from the outside he considers as genuine sons, while those whom he will find in the monastery he views as illegitimate, which is one of the most improper things. From this, offense and distrust is caused. But those rather he ought to consider as genuine and exceedingly beloved whom he will find in the monastery, who will both receive and honor him. These [brothers] he himself, too, has the obligation to honor and relieve in accordance with his ability, even if perhaps as human beings they have acquired certain small defects such as the length of life is disposed by nature to engender, that is to say, idle chatter, coarse jesting, license of tongue and other such things, in order that in him, too, the statement, “he who brings forth the worthy out of the worthless” (cf. Jer. 15:19) and so forth, will be fulfilled.

Chapter 44

Exhortation to the monks concerning the fact that they are not to question the superior in the things that he does as he is going to give to God an account of the sins he dared to commit, and that he is to be excommunicated if he does not correct himself

[= (22) Evergetis [18]]: If, then, your superior, brothers, conducts himself thus, as we said above, being both paternally disposed towards you and devoutly and piously tending the flock of Christ, you will not question him in any way nor will you demand an account of how he handles the affairs of the monastery. For this is unworthy and harmful, breeding a great deal of mistrust and producing discord, instability and every other cause for sin.

Neither will the superior himself spend the wealth of the monastery in doing favors for his own relations and friends. [p. 295] For by acting in that way, he will not be taking part in the divine mysteries.³⁰ For if we have judged that he should not be subject to the brothers in an examination of his actions, yet he will not really escape the unerring judge and the reproof of his conscience. Therefore, he should take care not to “fall into the hands of the living God” (Heb. 10:31). For even though we are not capable of imposing on him a penalty appropriate for making unjustifiable and unnecessary payments and bringing about changes in the affairs and property of the monastery, yet he will not escape the fearful judgment of God, which we confer upon him in writing this. But if he is seen to be so fearless and utterly shameless that he does not even fear the condemnation of God, but spends the wealth of this wholly poor monastery improperly, he will be excommunicated until he refrains from this unlawful action; but, if he corrects himself, he shall be forgiven by God the Ruler of All.

Chapter 45

Another exhortation to all the brothers and to the protector himself concerning the fact that they are not in any blameworthy way to make both the choice and selection of the superiors, including the fact that one is not to spring upon such an office by his personal rashness and audacity

[= (22) Evergetis [14], ed. lines 708–27]: Having, then, sufficiently treated of both the superior and all the other officials, we must turn our discussion to you, O beloved children in the Lord, and to the protector. I entreat you, therefore, or rather, I instruct you and I call on God as witness of my instructions, and overseer of its carrying out, that when you are selecting and choosing the superiors there should be no strife, there should be no jealousy, there should be no pointless partiality and irrational favoritism, but correct judgment, an accurate aim and the strict yardstick of justice and truth should come together, and, as if he was observing you, he the eye itself “that beholds all things” (Sir. 15:19) and “searches hearts and reins” (Ps. 7:9). Your selection should take place in that way.

For, if, suffering from some human failing, you were to produce a faulty judgment, consider how far the evil would spread and calculate how many harmful effects would follow and if the “righteous” (2 Tim. 4:8) and unerring Judge were to require from you a just account for them, I do not know what defense you would make to secure your escape from condemnation. You, who have, alas, with evil and ruinous judgment selected the unworthy persons and brought such great harm not only on them but also on yourselves seeing that you have secured perdition for them as well as yourselves.

So then you will not resort to quarreling and dissension in your selection, but in unanimity and agreement you should choose the persons you select and with the counsel and judgment [p. 296] of the protector you should effect their selection and choice.

[= (22) Evergetis [17], ed. lines 800–814]: If you always live like that, there will be no one who will usurp this office rashly and by one’s own judgment, making a display perhaps of his seniority or knowledge or sphere of work or noble birth or rank or offering of property or money, but that man should be preferred in this office who has been selected by you after perfect scrutiny, even if he has been recently tonsured or is unlearned and without experience in worldly things, for no harm will come to the monastery from the latter.

For “God is able even from stones to raise up children to Abraham” (Matt. 3:9) and to give wisdom to the blind and to supply reason to those without reason, he who takes more pleasure in these people than in those who glory in their own wisdom and power, and wealth and nobility. As a witness to this the truly divine and great apostle clearly expresses it in the following words, “God chose what is foolish in the world and weak and despised to shame the wise and strong and lofty; and things which are not to bring to nothing things that are” (I Cor. 1:27).

Chapter 46

More detailed instruction to the brotherhood on how they ought to conduct themselves

[= (22) Evergetis [42]]: So then all that we wish and is acceptable to God—in my opinion at least—and to our fervent patron and helper, the holy great martyr Mamas, and greatly beneficial for your help has been discussed sufficiently; in the future it will be your concern to maintain them unbroken and unchanged always. By this I mean, to carry out completely in all the services the canonical procedure handed on to you, in accordance with the synaxarion of the monastery of Evergetis which is in effect today with you, to preserve loyalty and honor which is due to your superiors, to love one another, to be keen each of you to surpass each other in humility in every way, to labor in all kinds of ways with one another in everything as the limbs of one body and “to complete what is lacking” (Col. 1:24) in one another, not to stir up quarrels nor form improper friendships or cause schisms and breakaway services, to refrain from claiming the seat of honor and worldly preferments, but look to one thing only, that is to live and conduct yourselves virtuously and breathe in nothing else, if possible, than the word of salvation and everything that is for the edification and benefit of your soul; furthermore to banish from you the source of all evils, I mean the love of money, and the filching of the monastery's possessions or in any other way in which the superior has not approved nor the rule given to you has allowed, not only that but as a result of carelessness or some other act of disregard to allow something belonging to the monastery to disappear. For that is the same as the former case, even if it seems to be somewhat different, and brings the same liability in the presence of God. [p. 297] You must root out familiarity as much as possible and, that I may be brief, banish everything that does not lead to salvation.

So, my children and brothers, let us in no way prefer the things that harm, and pass by those that bring salvation; for nothing of what has been handed on to you is impossible or hard to accomplish. But if one of these [instructions] were to be thought of as such perhaps, yet let us strive, let us persevere, let us endure, let us bear it nobly, let us force ourselves a little. For we did not abandon the world for indulgence and luxury, but for exertion and to strive as much as we could to gain the good things that were promised. Therefore let us force ourselves, let us force ourselves, as has been said; "for the kingdom of heaven has suffered violence, and men of violence take it by force" (Matt. 11:12). No one has ever gained a triumph by being careless, no one has triumphed over his enemy by sleeping and carelessness. Crowns and triumphs belong to those who run well, toil, strive, persevere in the labors of battles. "Through many tribulations," the Lord says, "we must enter the kingdom of heaven" (Acts 14:22). So then I beseech you all, "lead a life worthy of your calling" (Eph. 4:1), "present your bodies holy to the Lord" (cf. Rom. 12:1), "love one another" (John 15:12), "run well the race that is set before you" (cf. Heb. 12:1). Whatsoever is good, whatsoever is beloved of God, consider these things (cf. Phil 4:8). Do not fail to do the things "you have heard and learned" (Phil. 4:9). My brothers, "the appointed time has grown very short" (I Cor. 7:29). Remember your souls and our insignificance and lowliness, do not forget us in your prayers.

[= (22) Evergetis [43], ed. lines 1318–24]: "The God of peace who called us to his eternal glory" (Heb. 13:20–21), through his great and unspeakable goodness confirm and strengthen you in his holy will through his only-begotten Son Our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ and the All-holy and Life-giving Spirit, to whom belong all glory, honor, worship, now and always and for ever and ever, Amen.

Chapter 47

Partial explanation concerning the ecclesiastical order and other conduct

[The brothers] are to be content with all the chapters that have been written above, as they have been written. Now it is necessary to speak briefly also concerning the ecclesiastical order that ought to be observed, as we have written in many places, in accordance with the synaxarion of the Monastery of Evergetis, which is in effect at the present time, without failure and omission.

[= (22) Evergetis [3], ed. lines 67–70]: So now we must turn our attention to the subjects of our discourse and since we wish to begin from a preferable place, it is preferable to begin with the hour that brings us light, that is the first hour of the day, and I think it absolutely necessary that those who are going to give a description of the works of light should begin following the light.

[= (22) Evergetis [4], ed. lines 75–95]: So after the worship of matins, [p. 298] the office of the first hour should be sung by you following on immediately, as is customary, and at the end of this the following prayer should next be recited, “Thou who at all times and all hours.” After the prayer the customary fifteen genuflections should be performed by the able bodied on the bare floor. Three of them should be completed in a more leisurely manner inasmuch as while you are standing you should say three times to yourselves with hands stretched out “God, be merciful to me the sinner” (Luke 18:13), then when you are kneeling down with your heads resting on the ground, you should say once “I have sinned against thee, Lord, forgive me.” But the remaining twelve should be carried out more quickly so as to utter the aforementioned supplicatory phrases once at each genuflection and each time you stand, but yet in unison and with fitting good order, not with some getting ahead and others falling behind, but all following the lead of the ecclesiarch.

That should take place when “God is the Lord” (Ps. 117 [118]:27) is not sung during matins; but if it is, the performing of these genuflections should be omitted but three deep bows should be performed while at each of them the aforesaid supplicatory phrases should be said to yourselves. Then after these genuflections or bows all should repeat the following prayer aloud with hands raised, “O eternal God” and “Thou who sendest out the light.” If, however, the superior should wish, let also the short catechesis from the words of the fathers be presented and let it be read by him before the three prayers, that is, or after the completion of the troparion.

All the prayers should be said with hands held up in accordance with the following, “Lift up your hands in the sanctuaries, and bless the Lord” (Ps. 133 [134]:2) and “The lifting of my hands as an evening sacrifice” (Ps. 140 [141]:2) and “In every place lifting holy hands without anger and quarreling” (I Tim. 2:8). When the first hour has been completed, as we said, and the priest has spoken his customary prayer, all of you should immediately fall on your faces and hearing the superior asking for your prayers like this, “Brothers, pray for me in the Lord that I may be delivered from passions and the snares of the Evil One,” you should answer, “May God save you, honored father, and you pray for us, holy father, that we may be delivered from passions and the snares of the Evil One.” Then again the superior should say, “May God through the prayers of our fathers save you all.” Then rising, some must depart to their tasks, while others (will go) to their own cells, avoiding all meeting together and foolish distraction, idle chatter, and disorderly laughter.

Let each go away to his cell in a sober frame of mind and at the same time most vigilant, doing what is pleasing to God. But if some are discovered to be conducting themselves in a disorderly manner, whether they are young or old and advanced in the monastic life, they are to be admonished with the laws of love by the more devout or even by the superior himself. But, if they do not mend their ways they are to be punished. Going away to your cells you should carry out the whole canonical procedure, with the customary prayers and genuflections. [p.

299] For genuflections should not be carried out in the church when “God is the Lord” (Ps. 117 [118]:27) is sung, as we have said.

In your cells, however, you should always kneel down when you pray, but we will avoid this also in our cells whenever there is a vigil because of the weariness that comes from that, also during the twelve days of Christmas, during Easter week, or even the entire Pentecost. Let, however, those who so choose genuflect after the Easter week. So the ritual of the first hour should be like that on the days of the year that are free from fasting.

[cf. (22) Evergetis [6], lines 195–96]: The details concerning the third [hour] and sixth [hour] have been described earlier in the chapter concerning the divine mystery [of the Eucharist]. Consequently, we must speak also concerning the ninth [hour] and the lamplighting office. The ninth [hour], must be sung in the narthex in the same way as the preceding hours, the small semantron being struck for this [hour] and calling us, as is usual. By the holy great martyr Mamas I adjure the ecclesiarch at the time and the priest who has the priestly duties of the day not to delay the time of the striking of the semantron, I mean both that of the night and that of the day, but, as soon as this is struck, immediately they must begin the singing of the hymns. For the delaying, as I have learned by experience itself, is wont to produce many things that are harmful.

[= (22) Evergetis [6], ed. lines 196–240]: The regulation in the synaxarion sets out very clearly how the office of vespers should be carried out, as well as compline after the supper. When compline has been sung and the priest has said his customary prayer also, you should fall on your knees just as at the end of the first hour and incline your ear to the superior as he says, “Forgive me in the Lord, brothers, for I have sinned in deed, word and in thought.” You should grant him forgiveness, saying, “May God forgive you, father.” But you also should beg this from him by adding, “Forgive us also yourself, honored father, for we have sinned in deed, word, and in thought,” then again he should pray for you and say, “May God through the prayers of our fathers forgive you all.”

Then standing up and according him the required obeisance, you should go away to your cells and carry out your night office in accordance with the regulation, and then full of gratitude and spiritual joy you should turn to sleep until the one who is in charge of the clock learns from it the appropriate hour and goes to the superior, receiving from him the required blessing, and then striking the small semantron in the customary way, he will rouse you to sing the celebration of the midnight office in the narthex which he himself will also sing all the time as he carries out the prescribed lighting of the church, and then when he has sounded the great semantron and the [p. 300] bronze one also, he will call you all for the dawn worship. The preliminary part of which you must carry out as follows.

For after the striking of the bronze semantron praise should be ascribed to God by the priest who has the duty for the day, and as he praises God he should at once make the sign of the venerable cross with the censer in front of the holy table; and you replying “Amen,” should immediately [sing] a trisagion together with the twentieth psalm and the usual troparia and the Kyrie eleison, taking care to keep together as far as is reasonable while these are being sung. The priest himself should go round all the divine church and cense everyone, and then, standing before the holy screen, when he has once more made the sign of the venerable cross with the censer, with the censuring he should offer up praise to the all-holy Trinity, speaking as follows, “Glory to the holy and consubstantial and life-giving Trinity always, now and always and for ever and ever.” After replying “Amen” the ecclesiarch should at once begin the six psalms, saying the words of the psalms in a low voice slowly, quietly, and carefully so that all may then be able to recite them without error or stumbling. Then after the completion of the six psalms, the whole office of matins should be celebrated as the synaxarion describes.

Such, then, is our pattern for your daily office which, moreover, ought to be performed with the admittance of neither addition, nor, in fact, subtraction of any sort. The hours of the great Lent, however, ought to be sung melodiously within the church, with the customary “Alleluia” and the readings.

Chapter 48

Advice and exhortation and soul-beneficial counsel to the superior at the time

Our spiritual father and brother in the Lord. The Word of God the Father, in addition to the other things with which he has benefited us, granted us this, too, [namely,] to be near the living even after death, and, though mortal by nature, to be almost immortal by the power of the spirit. In this respect writing certainly works wonders. Accordingly, I myself, too, even though I have already suffered death of the body, which is in accord with nature, and am covered by a tombstone, as you see, I am with you through this piece of writing and I use this as a mouthpiece and I offer it as the voice which I owe you. For I am not even left alone by the scripturally celebrated moth of the bones (Job 4:19, Is. 50:9, Matt. 6:19, Luke 12:33) that continuously stirs and incites me so as to write in brotherly manner once more in fuller detail and to suggest to you sincerely and affectionately some of the things that help [us] to please God.

I, the most pitiable of all men, am nudged to write not because [p. 301] I consider myself as knowing the ordinance of God more than you, whoever, in fact, you may be, but because I have been urged to this, that is to say, ordered, even if I am unworthy, by our master, the famed mystikos [George] of blessed memory, who has been mentioned in many places.³¹

Beloved one, truly great is the dignity of the guidance of souls and difficult to bear is the weight of the leadership of the brothers. For this reason it is necessary for him who has shouldered this to be continually sober and vigilant that he may not, having dozed a little while, be weighed down with the burden itself and be cast quickly to the very pit of destruction. For narrow and precipitous (cf. Matt. 7:14) is the road of life and the slight deviation from the center produces a destruction that is pitiable. For, according to one of the wise men, vices are annexed to virtues and are somehow very near.

It is necessary, therefore, inasmuch as the divine grace summoned you to this greatest and awesome and very rewarding ministry and rightly and fittingly has appointed you to the leadership of the brothers of our monastery of the famed among saints, holy Mamas, for you to arise and earnestly to entreat the Divinity by night and day to grant you pastoral skill and freedom from passions of soul and body and to clothe you with the breastplate of righteousness and truth in order that you may neither say nor, in fact, do anything in the state of passion.

For you must be angry without anger and dissemble the passions dispassionately for the amelioration and benefaction of souls that are ill, and take up unto yourself the wars that invisibly come against the brothers from the Evil One, and have patience with their small-mindedness and weakness, and endure nobly their aberrations and their grumblings, and urge them with love and tender-heartedness to abstain from the soul-destroying deeds and the irregular and coarse habits, and most of all to live together with devoutness and discretion.

Even if, however, you see that some are disobedient to your words and choose to live indifferently, do not be discouraged or become remiss, but reprove and exhort and teach them the things that contribute to salvation. With genuine understanding do not give up admonishing some privately, each one individually, while others even openly. Do not think lightly of the things over which they perhaps demur and become angry whenever you give counsel; for double is the crown that you will receive in return, for teaching and advising the things that are proper and certainly also for not being distressed and irascibly disturbed over the things that they complain about loudly and are displeased. But if ever it will be necessary to be harsh, dispassionately you shall discipline and use astringent remedies, sometimes through punishments, sometimes through rather severe words, and sometimes by pretending to turn away and overlook.

For according to the variety of the passions and the degree of the faults you ought to apply also the correction, knowing this clearly that neither are all the ages equal, nor, indeed, the minds, and not the same bodily constitutions or habits or dispositions exist in all of them in the same manner. [p. 302] But neither are all the wars equal, but of those who practice asceticism one is tempted in this way while another in another way by the desires or the demons. Your good understanding must display paternal compassion equally to all and show mercy to all with an ardent and compassionate heart.

Let the lamp of discretion precede every injunction and order of yours to the brothers, and let everything that you ought to manage and accomplish and prescribe publicly or privately and recommend be adorned with discretion, and work at the thoughts of your soul which are for the general benefit with unerring scrutiny and thoughtful study and considerate judgment, not following your own will but rather in every way seeking after the common good. For, if you consider yourself entirely sagacious and abhor the advice of prudent men, you will easily be deceived and by the successive conflicting winds of the travails of self-reliance you will be like a reed being swung about here and there by violent winds.

Your piety must not make with your own hand the more particular payments, that is to say, disbursements, for the financial administration of the monastery and the brothers, for this is unworthy of a director of monks and a spiritual leader of souls.³² It befits us, according to the apostolic exhortation (cf. I Cor. 10:32), to “give no offense” to those on the outside and to remove, as it is possible, all excuse from which fault-seekers are able to find occasions for the calumination of our way of life, whom let us endeavor in all kinds of ways to ward off through our own irreproachable behavior. For from the latter we shall prove that we fulfill the Lord’s statement in the gospels, for he says, “Let your light shine before men” (that is to say, the shepherds and superiors) “that they may see your good works and glorify your Father who is in heaven” (Matt. 5:16).

For it is not possible, it is not possible for the superior’s reputation to be preserved unsullied in any other way unless he sees to it that all income and disbursement and payment be made openly and with the consent of the community and through the hands of others in accordance with his [own] instruction. For this reason, in fact, we suggest to you that the disbursements of the monastery no longer be made through yourself but that you count the sum of nomismata and give them to someone of the more devout brothers in order that all disbursement might be made by him with both your knowledge and order, as we have shown with fuller detail in the chapter concerning the treasurer of nomismata.³³

TWELFTH CENTURY

These things, as the time permitted, we have suggested to your piety, projecting our love to you in brotherly manner and in every way working at both your irreproachability and the brothers' peaceful way of life and progress towards virtue. As for you, most honorable father, having received a small reminder from us, proceed to add from your part the things that are lacking, but [do so] appropriately as well as continuously. For "Give to a wise man an opportunity and he will be wiser" (Prov. 9:9); and I, for my part, call wise one who has in his heart the fear of God, since, in fact, "The beginning of wisdom is the fear of the Lord" (Prov. 1:7).

These things are enough [p. 303] for your piety. Pray, however, for the sake of the Lord for me, who am in the darkness, who, have written, but not done. May the grace of our mankind-loving God and Savior, Jesus Christ, through the intercessions of our supremely holy Mistress, the Mother of God, and of the holy and glorious great martyr of Christ, Mamas, be with you and with us. Amen.

+ The Signatures

+ The present typikon, after it had been produced with our knowledge at the behest of the celebrated master of blessed memory and my full brother, the mystikos, lord George, by the most honorable superior of the venerable monastery of the holy great martyr Mamas, lord Athanasios, monk of the monastery of [Christ] Philanthropos, was signed also by me, as I am accustomed to sign, in the month of November, of the seventh indiction, in the year 6667 [= 1158 A.D.].

+ the doulos of the emperor, Theocharistos the Cappadocian.

+ I, Athanasios, the humble monk of the monastery of [Christ] Philanthropos, and lowly superior of the monastery of the holy great martyr Mamas, after I had set forth the present typikon by order of our celebrated, supremely glorious master of blessed memory and new builder of our monastery, lord George the Cappadocian, who through the monastic habit was renamed Gregory, as well as by the will of his now surviving supremely distinguished full brother, lord Theocharistos, who also has affixed his signature on it above with his own hand, signed it in the month of November of the seventh indiction, in the year 6667 [= 1158 A.D.].+

+ the lowly monk and steward from the same monastery, Gregory.

+ the lowly monk and ecclesiarch from the same monastery of the holy great martyr Mamas, Theodoretos.

+ the monk and priest from the same monastery of the holy great martyr Mamas, Sabbas.

+ the monk and priest from the same monastery, Kallinikos.

+ the other monk and priest Kallinikos.

32. MAMAS

- + the monk and priest from the same monastery, Leontios.
 - + the monk and lowly deacon from the same holy monastery of the holy great martyr Mamas, Athanasios. [p. 304]
 - + I, Basil, the lowly monk and treasurer from the same monastery, affixed my signature with my own hand.
 - + the monk from the same monastery, Isaias.
 - + the monk and sacristan from the same monastery, Joseph.
 - + the lowly monk from the same monastery of Saint Mamas, Kyrillos.
 - + the lowly monk from the same monastery, Klemes.
 - + the lowly monk from the same monastery, Symeon.
 - + the lowly monk from the same monastery, Neophytos.
 - + the lowly monk, Antony, from the same monastery.
 - + the lowly monk, Nikephoros, from the same monastery.
 - + the lowly monk from the same monastery, George.
- Those who signed by the sign [of a cross]³⁴
- + Sign of the monk, Luke, from the same monastery.
 - + Sign of the monk, Hilarion, from the same monastery.
 - + Sign of Theodosios, monk from the same monastery.
 - + Sign of Meletios, monk, the vine-dresser from the same monastery.
 - + Sign of Basil, monk, the vine-dresser from the same monastery.
 - + Sign of Gerasimos, monk from the same monastery.
 - + Sign of Ioannikios, monk, the groom, from the same monastery.
 - + Sign of Meletios, monk, the baker, from the same monastery.
 - + Sign of Sabbas, monk, the gatekeeper, from the same monastery.
 - + Sign of the monk, Hilarion, the gardener, from the same monastery.
 - + The humble monk of the same monastery of the great holy martyr Mamas, Kyrillos, signed last.

[Judicial Confirmation]

It has also juridical confirmation which runs somewhat thus:

- + The present typikon ought to have validity and durability for all time and not to be altered or nullified by anyone, since we have made also a semeioma upon it in the month of January, of the twelfth indiction, in the year 6672 [= 1164 A.D.].

TWELFTH CENTURY

+ The quaestor and nomophylax Theodore Pantechnes. [p. 305]

Two bulls, which contain under them all the quires, have been suspended also outside the book sideways on the binding of the quires. Of these one belonged to the judge and reads as follows:

Seal of the writings of Theodore Pantechnes

While the other belonged to the most honorable monk, who is indicated within, lord Athanasios of the monastery of [Christ] Philanthropos and superior of the monastery, [of St. Mamas] and reads as follows:

Seal of the writings of monk Athanasios

This book, that is, the typikon, is covered with silk cloth and has nine silver clasps, eight almond-shaped studs and sixteen round bulls. Both of the latter are silver.+

[First Semeioma]

The semeioma that has been made for its confirmation reads as follows:

On Sunday, January fifth of the twelfth indiction, in the presence of lord Theophylaktos, the all-honorable archimandrite and superior of the venerable monastery of Stoudios; of lord John Dithetes, the supremely distinguished secretary of our mighty and holy emperor; of lord John Maurikas, the kouropalates; of lord Theodosios, the most honorable monk and steward of the monastery of Stoudios; of the monk Paul and priest [?] of the venerable monastery of the Peribleptos;³⁵ of the monk Theodoulos from the same monastery; of Akakios priest, Barnabas priest, Philaretos, Michael and Kyrillos, [monks] from the venerable monastery of Stoudios.

Having been summoned today to the venerable monastery of the renowned holy martyr Mamas, which is situated immediately opposite the cenobitic nunnery of Aristenai³⁶ and near the venerable monastery of Iasites,³⁷ we found assembled in the main church the most honorable monk and superior of the same monastery, lord Athanasios of the monastery of [Christ] Philanthropos and the monks under him, who also will be successively indicated by name.

The monks of the aforesaid monastery said, in the presence of their most honorable superior, that the monastery of Saint Mamas, which formerly was under the patriarchal jurisdiction, used to be given by the patriarchs at various times to various charistikarioi, the greater number of whom used to abuse the monastery as landed property and to seek nothing else but what they were going to gain from it, and there was no concern for the monastery and its affairs. For this reason, in fact, the fortunes of the monastery were reduced to naught. For not only had all of the monastery's buildings fallen down, the church alone having been left standing, and that even without a roof, but even the monks were reduced to two [p. 306] and the latter did not reside at the monastery but went about searching for their daily sustenance.

Finally the same monastery was entrusted to the celebrated mystikos of blessed memory, lord George the Cappadocian, as charistikarios, by the late celebrated patriarch, lord Kosmas [II Attikos (1146–47)]. Accordingly, when the mystikos had taken over the monastery's affairs and seen that it had been reduced to complete desolation and that the monastery had almost lost its very being, he became moved by a divinely inspired zeal and desired to set right the monastery's affairs and to bring it to its former condition or even better.

Because, however, he had a suspicion, which was not an unreasonable fear, that perhaps after his death or even after that of his successor in the management of the monastery, the latter may fall again into the hands of a charistikarios like the former ones who would use the monastery as they did, seeking after its revenues but taking no care of the monastery, and might destroy the outlays that will be made by him, he went to the late patriarch, lord Nicholas [IV] Mouzalon [(1147–51)],³⁸ and sought to have the monastery made independent and released from the patriarchal rights, which, in fact, was done at the request of the supremely distinguished mystikos—the late patriarch having listened to him—and a memorandum was made for the independence of the monastery.

This foundation of its independence aroused the eagerness of the mystikos. Having, therefore, taken courage that from now on he was not going to spend in vain and that the improvements made by him were not going to come to naught, he proceeded with a more lavish hand to lay down almost his entire wealth for the restoration of the monastery and of the monastery's affairs, having used as a fellow-worker for this purpose also the present-day most honored superior of the same monastery. For he undertook the whole burden and did not spare himself, pressing himself with relentless toils for the monastery's preservation. Whereas the expense was being furnished by the mystikos, the care for its affairs and each particular concern was exerted through the agency of the superior. He supervised the affairs, not permitting the expenditures to be laid down in vain, but for each of the things that were being done the best was to be accomplished.

While, however, the buildings were being constructed and the monastery had not yet been completed, the celebrated mystikos of blessed memory died, having entrusted the monastery to God and to his celebrated, supremely distinguished full brother, lord Theocharistos the Cappadocian, and to the superior himself, and having prescribed that for the future its way of life and preservation and the typikon of the monastery (in conformity with which the affairs of the monastery and the monks in it are going to be administered) be established through the agency of the same superior.

After, however, the death of the mystikos more buildings than the previous ones were built and were more splendid. For both the refectory was erected from its foundations, a bath was constructed both for the comfort of the monks but also for producing an income for the monastery,³⁹ and not a few other new buildings were erected, [p. 307] worthy of wonder and sufficing to prove that God accepted the purpose and offering of the celebrated mystikos of blessed memory. For [otherwise] he would not have entrusted to such a man his affairs after his death.

The typikon too, accordingly, was made in the month of November of the seventh indiction, in the year 6667 [= 1158 A.D.], on which both the celebrated lord Theocharistos of blessed memory and the superior himself affixed their signatures. This typikon, therefore, was put into our hands by the monks, the superior himself, too, being present and acknowledging his personal signature. This typikon ran thus in its beginning: “An extraordinarily great and divine thing is a God-loving and charitable soul,” while at the end thus: “These things are enough for your piety. Pray, however, for the sake of the Lord for me, who am in the darkness, who, have written, but not done. May the grace of our mankind-loving God and Savior, Jesus Christ, through the intercessions of our supremely pure Mistress, the Mother of God, and of the holy and glorious great martyr, Mamas, be with you and with us. Amen.” All of the typikon's folia were sixty-one.

TWELFTH CENTURY

At the end of the completed [typikon] the following was written:

The present typikon, after it had been produced with our knowledge at the behest of the celebrated master of blessed memory and my full brother mystikos, lord George, by the most honorable superior of the venerable monastery of the holy great martyr Mamas, the monk lord Athanasios of the monastery of [Christ] Philanthropos, was signed by me, as I am accustomed to sign, in the month of November of the seventh indiction, in the year 6667 [= 1158 A.D.].

+ the doulos of the emperor, Theocharistos the Cappadocian.

After his there is the signature of the superior which reads as follows:

I, Athanasios, the humble monk of the monastery of [Christ] Philanthropos and lowly superior [of the monastery] of the holy great martyr Mamas, after I had set forth the present typikon by order of our celebrated, most glorious master of blessed memory and new builder of our monastery, lord George the Cappadocian, who through the monastic habit was renamed Gregory, as well as by the wishes of his now surviving supremely distinguished full brother, lord Theocharistos, who also has affixed his signature above with his own hand, signed it in the month of November of the seventh indiction, in the year 6667 [= 1158 A.D.].

After them the monks from the same monastery signed it (the names of the monks who signed it are presented as they were written above).

This book was sealed with a leaden bull of the same superior, which has letters on each side, reading: Seal of the writings of monk Athanasios. [p. 308] Which typikon we, too, have sealed with our leaden seal, which reads on each side: Seal of the writings of Theodore Pantechnes. We signed also after the signature of the last monk, having confirmed this typikon in order that for the future, too, it may have inherent credibility, and having written before the signature that such a typikon ought to have validity and durability for all time and not to be altered or nullified by anyone, since we have made also a semeioma upon it.

Jointly all the monks along with the superior himself proclaimed that they wished this typikon to be preserved firm and immovable in perpetuity, and, as long as the universe exists, the affairs of the monastery are to be managed by [this typikon]. Those who, during the existence of the universe, would be superiors, stewards, and the rest of the monks are to conduct themselves in conformity with it. Whosoever should attempt to subvert any of the prescriptions of the typikon and proceed to oppose the latter is to be thenceforth expelled from the monastery, having recourse to no help on account of the fact that he opposed the decree of the founders; inasmuch as the typikon had been made by the aforesaid monk and superior at the behest of the mystikos [George], who, indeed, had urged that it be made through the agency of the superior, and with the consent of the supremely distinguished lord Theocharistos, who, indeed, had affixed his signature upon it. To this lord Theocharistos, the mystikos himself, too, of blessed memory⁴⁰ had entrusted the care and ephoreia of the monastery. Since, in fact, two of the monks of the monastery, the monk Isaias and the monk Kyrillos, were missing, a place was left for them according to their appropriate rank so that they might affix their signatures, after they had returned, and none of the brothers might be left without having approved this typikon and having affixed their signatures.

After these things had been compiled and confirmed according to custom, they were delivered on the aforementioned month and indiction, in the year 6672 [= 1164 A.D.]. The signature:

+ the quaestor and nomophylax, Theodore Pantechnes. His customary leaden bull, too, was suspended.

+ I, the protonotarios and megas logariastes, signed the present copies of both the original typikon and the semeioma made according to the wishes of both the superior and the rest of the monks by the supremely distinguished quaestor after they had been collated with the original. +

+ I, Theodore Pantechnes, the quaestor and nomophylax, signed the present copies of both the typikon and the semeioma made by me, having at the same time collated them with the originals and having found them to be identical. + [p. 309]

+ I, John Manoutes, the judge of the Velum, signed the present copies of the original typikon and of the semeioma made according to the wishes of both the superior and the rest of the monks by the supremely distinguished quaestor after they were collated with the original. +

+ I, Thomas Aploucheir, the judge of the Velum and epi ton hippodromon, signed the present copies of both the original typikon and the semeioma made according to the wishes of both the most honorable superior and the rest of the monks by the supremely glorious quaestor after they were collated with the original. +

+ I, Leo Monasteriotes, the judge of the Velum and tou hippodromou, signed the present copies of both the original typikon and the semeioma made according to the wishes of both the most honorable superior and the rest of the monks by the supremely glorious quaestor after they had been collated with the originals. +

[Addition]

Addition after the deposition in the monastery of [Christ] Philanthropos of the original typikon and the original inventory.

Already some years ago I did set forth three identical copies of the typikon and three of the inventory, the latter also identical, of which the two originals, both the typikon and the inventory, I deposited together with the original rights of independence of the monastery at the venerable monastery of [Christ] Philanthropos. [I did this] with the knowledge of the protector of the monastery⁴¹ and the wishes of the superior and all the monks. A juridical semeioma also was produced at the time of their deposition, made by the kouropalates and judge, lord Basil Liparites, on the fifteenth of the month of March, in the present fourth indiction, which semeioma, of course, ought also to be appended to the present typikon.

I, therefore, advise and enjoin the fathers at the time and my brothers, both the superiors and the rest, to insist that the things that are contained in it which contribute to the advantage of the monastery and to its preservation be by all means done in accordance with the contents of the aforesaid semeioma. Let him however, who does not wish to do so, whoever, in fact, he may be, be subject to the curses that have been recorded in the typikon. For it is for this reason that the present addition also has been set forth by me in the month of April of the fourth indiction

TWELFTH CENTURY

[= 1171 A.D.]. +

+ I, Athanasios, the humble monk of the monastery of [Christ] Philanthropos and former superior of the monastery of the holy great martyr, Mamas, having set forth also the present addition, signed it. [p. 310]

[Second Semeioma]

+ Monday, the fifteenth of March of the fourth indiction. In the presence of lord George Pantechnes, Nicholas Exarchopoulos, and Eutybios Iberopoulos, the most honorable superior of the venerable monastery of Saint Mamas, lord Athanasios, accompanied by the monk and steward of the same monastery, lord Theophilos, and the monk and keeper of the store-houses, lord Isaias, summoned us today also to the venerable monastery of Christ Philanthropos, and in our presence and in the presence and hearing of the most saintly superior and treasurer of the same monastery, lord Isaias, the monk and priest, lord Theoktistos, the ecclesiarch lord Maximos, and the monk, lord Nikodemos, he [lord Athanasios] said that on the eighth day of this month, at the same monastery [of Christ Philanthropos], in our presence and in the presence of the most learned deacon of the Great Church of God, lord Constantine Ophrydas—representing the preeminent and panyoikeiotatos with our mighty and holy emperor, the mystikos,⁴² who is also the ephoros of his monastery of Saint Mamas—he gave to the sacristan of the same monastery of Philanthropos a box containing a chrysobull of our God-protected, most powerful and holy emperor, confirming the independence of the same monastery [of Saint Mamas]; a patriarchal lysis, pertaining to [the monastery's] independence, written in response to a memorandum by the mystikos of blessed memory, the lord George the Cappadocian; a patriarchal memorandum in favor of this independence; the inventory of the monastery and the typikon (both in book form) as well as a semeioma issued for this typikon by the now most glorious judge who was a quaestor at the time.⁴³

He gave this box to the same sacristan closed and sealed with a lead seal imprinted with the name of the same superior [Athanasios]. Upon giving this box to the [sacristan], [Athanasios] said that it must be deposited in the sacristy of the monastery [of Philanthropos] and that at no time at all should any or all of the enclosed titles be given either to the ephoros or to another party⁴⁴ from his monastery [of Saint Mamas], unless both parties representing the monastery and the ephoros were present. If, in an exigency, they are given out to either party in the presence of the other, as stated, after the elapse of three days they must be returned to the same monastery [of Philanthropos] and he who had taken them must not be permitted to retain them for more days.

At present [Athanasios] notifies also about this the most saintly superior and the aforementioned monks and through them the rest of the monks. For the security of the documents which were deposited, as stated, he adds the following, inasmuch as both the [superior] himself and the entire party of his monastery [of Saint Mamas] can be influenced:⁴⁵ [p. 311] even in the presence of the ephoros, the party of his monastery [of Saint Mamas] cannot otherwise take out one or several of the deposited documents, unless previously and in the presence of a judge, it hands over to the party of the monastery of Philanthropos the first and most important document pertaining to the properties of the monastery of Saint Mamas.

This document must remain in the aforementioned monastery [of Philanthropos] until that of the aforementioned documents which was taken out has been returned and deposited again in the presence of the same judge. When this will be done, when this [document] will be returned and deposited, the party of the monastery of Saint Mamas will be permitted again to take back the document of the same monastery which, as stated, had been given [as a guarantee] to the monastery of Philanthropos.

Notes on the Translation

Editors' note: The corrections of A. Sigalas (EEBS 7 [1930], pp. 399–405) and V. Laurent (EO 30 [1931], pp. 233–42) to S. Eustratiades' edition of the typikon have been tacitly incorporated in the translation.

1. For this office, see Paul Magdalino, "The Not-So-Secret Functions of the Mystikos," REB 42 (1984), 229–40.
2. Kosmas II Attikos (1146–47), identified below in the First Semeioma.
3. Nicholas IV Muzalon (1147–51), identified below in the First Semeioma.
4. For this foundation, see also Addition and Second Semeioma below, and Janin, Géographie, vol. 3, pp. 527–29.
5. Cf. (27) Kecharitomene [69].
6. Cf. [37] below.
7. (27) Kecharitomene [11] has "with only the names changed," which makes better sense.
8. In [1] above.
9. As stated above in this chapter; so also in [15] below.
10. For these documents, see the Prologue above and the First Semeioma below.
11. The liturgical typikon of the Evergetis monastery, ed. Dmitrievsky, Opisanie, vol. 1, pt. 1, pp. 256–614, also endorsed below in [46], [47].
12. In [3] above.
13. Feast of the Annunciation, March 25.
14. Feast of the Discovery of the Head of St. John the Forerunner, February 24; feast of the Forty Martyrs, March 9.
15. Fast of the Holy Apostles, from Monday after the feast of All Saints (Sunday after Pentecost) through the vigil of the feast of Sts. Peter and Paul, June 28.
16. Fast of the Holy Nativity, from November 15 until Christmas.
17. On the Artzibourians, see (20) Black Mountain [55] and note.
18. The reference is to the heresy of the Tetraditai: see (20) Black Mountain and n. 68.
19. Feast of the Dormition of the Mother of God, August 15.
20. Feast of the Exaltation of the Holy Cross, September 14.
21. See also (34) Machairas [132] and the Pachomian Praecepta [73], [75], ed. A. Boon, Pachomiana Latina (Louvain, 1932), pp. 34–35.
22. (34) Machairas [133] is similar; see also the Pachomian Praecepta [97], ed. Boon, Pachomiana Latina, p. 40.
23. (28) Pantokrator [14] is similar.
24. In [5] above.
25. exomonitai; cf. (27) Kecharitomene [53].
26. In the First Semeioma below, there is a record of just such a bath having been constructed for the foundation.
27. Thesaurus Sancti Gregorii Nazianzeni, ed. J. Mossay (Turnhout, 1990–91), p. 11.

TWELFTH CENTURY

28. In the Prologue, [16] above and [40], [48], First Semeioma below.
29. Pseudo-Basil, Constitutiones asceticae 28, PG 31, col. 1417C.
30. (22) Evergetis [18] adds here “in the Holy Spirit,” completing a scriptural quotation from Rom. 9:1. This is important to the understanding of the text, which does not refer to excommunication but to the superior’s sinful participation in the liturgy. The subsequent statement (ed. p. 295, lines 9–11) supports this interpretation.
31. In the Prologue, [16], [37], [40] above and the First Semeioma below.
32. See also (3) Theodore Studites [22] and (13) Ath. Typikon [32].
33. In [10] above.
34. These are the illiterate monks.
35. The edition has tou monachou Paulou kai monachou Papa tes sebasmiias mones tes Peribleptou, which appears suspect. For the monastery of Peribleptos, see Janin, Géographie, vol. 3, pp. 51–52.
36. For this foundation, see Janin, Géographie, vol. 3, pp. 218–22; it is also mentioned in passing in (29) Kosmosoteira [108].
37. For this foundation, see Janin, Géographie, vol. 3, pp. 255–56.
38. For this patriarch, see Alexander Kazhdan, “Nicholas IV Mouzalon,” ODB, pp. 1467–68.
39. See [28] above.
40. Theocharistos has evidently died in the interval between the completion of the typikon, which he signed in November 1158 and the present document, dated to January 5, 1164.
41. Presumably a successor to Theocharistos the Cappadocian, who was deceased before 1164; possibly the mystikos Nikephoros, author of (33) Heliou Bomon if he was still alive in 1171.
42. As in the Addition above, this is a reference to an unknown successor of Theocharistos the Cappadocian.
43. For these documents, see the Prologue and the First Semeioma above.
44. Meros: a “party” in a legal transaction.
45. The edition has hair[etos], while Sigalas (EEBS 7 [1930], p. 405) reads haireit(ai). The alternative translation, “for both [the superior] himself and the entire party of his monastery are elected,” does not make sense in the present context. By taking extra precautions for the safety of the documents, Athanasios clearly shows in this case his fear that the monks of Saint Mamas might succumb in the future to pressure by the protector or any other authority seeking to deprive the monastery of its independence.

Document Notes

Prologue. The historical references to the monastery’s foundation are treated again with more specificity in the First Semeioma below.

- [1] Choice of the superior. A Subgroup B.2 chapter, shared previously with (27) Kecharitomene [11], cf. parallel treatment in (22) Evergetis [13]. Copied later by (33) Heliou Bomon [1].
- [2] Removal of the superior. A Subgroup B.1 chapter, derived from (22) Evergetis [13], [14], cf. (27) Kecharitomene [13]. Copied later by (33) Heliou Bomon [2] and (34) Machairas [88], [89], [90].
- [3] Role of the protector. A Group D chapter; minor sharing with only (27) Kecharitomene [3]. Copied later by (33) Heliou Bomon [3].
- [4] Independent and self-governing status. A Subgroup B.3 chapter, shared previously with both (22) Evergetis [12] and (27) Kecharitomene [1]. Copied later by (33) Heliou Bomon [4] and (34) Machairas [21].
- [5] Number of monks; voluntary entrance gifts inalienable. A Subgroup B.2 chapter, shared previously with (27) Kecharitomene [2], [7], cf. (22) Evergetis [37]. Copied later by (33) Heliou Bomon [5] and (34) Machairas [59].
- [6] Installation ceremony for officials. A Subgroup B.2 chapter, shared previously with (27) Kecharitomene [18], cf. (22) Evergetis [29]. Copied later by (33) Heliou Bomon [6] and (34) Machairas [92].
- [7] Installation of the steward. A Subgroup B.1 chapter, derived from (22) Evergetis [13], cf. (27) Kecharitomene [14]. Copied later by (33) Heliou Bomon [7] and (34) Machairas [81].

32. MAMAS

- [8] Duties of the ecclesiarch. A Group D chapter, shared previously only with (27) Kecharitomene [20]. Copied later by (33) Heliou Bomon [8] and (58) Menoikeion [4].
- [9] Duties of the sacristan and archivist. A Group D chapter, shared previously only with (27) Kecharitomene [19]. Copied later by (33) Heliou Bomon [9] and (58) Menoikeion [5].
- [10] Duties of the treasurer. A Group D chapter; minor sharing with only (27) Kecharitomene [24]. Copied later by (33) Heliou Bomon [10].
- [11] Duties of the cellarer. A Group D chapter; minor sharing with only (27) Kecharitomene [23]. Copied later by (33) Heliou Bomon [11] and (34) Machairas [96].
- [12] Duties of the gatekeeper. A Group D chapter, shared previously only with (27) Kecharitomene [29]. Copied later by (33) Heliou Bomon [12] and (58) Menoikeion [7].
- [13] Charity for poor monks and laymen. A Group A chapter, copied by (33) Heliou Bomon [13] and (58) Menoikeion [7].
- [14] Superior may appoint other officials. A Group C chapter, derived from (22) Evergetis [39]. Copied later by (33) Heliou Bomon [14].
- [15] Preservation of the typikon. A Group A chapter, copied later by (33) Heliou Bomon [15].
- [16] Reading of the typikon. A Group A chapter, copied later by (33) Heliou Bomon [16] and (58) Menoikeion [9]. See also earlier treatments in (22) Evergetis [43] and related documents.
- [17] Diet for non-fast days. A Subgroup B.3 chapter, shared previously with both (22) Evergetis [9] and (27) Kecharitomene [45], [46]. Copied later by (33) Heliou Bomon [17], (34) Machairas [61], [62] and (58) Menoikeion [8].
- [18] Diet during fasts. A Subgroup B.1 chapter, derived from (22) Evergetis [10], cf. (27) Kecharitomene [47]. Copied later by (33) Heliou Bomon [18] and (34) Machairas [67], [68], [69], [70], [71], [72], [73], [76].
- [19] Diet to spite the Artzibourians; fellow-brethren to eat with other monks; blessing of the grapes. A Group A chapter, copied later by (33) Heliou Bomon [19] and (34) Machairas [78], [79] (except for blessing). See other treatments of this diet in (20) Black Mountain [55], [90]; (28) Pantokrator [12]; (30) Phoberos [19]; and (36) Blemmydes [11].
- [20] No secret eating; superior's inspection of cells. A Subgroup B.2 chapter, shared previously with (27) Kecharitomene [49], [50], cf. (22) Evergetis [22], [27]. Copied later by (33) Heliou Bomon [20].
- [21] No absences from the office. A Group A chapter, copied later by (33) Heliou Bomon [21] and (34) Machairas [49]. See similar provision in (29) Kosmosoteira [80].
- [22] Length of the novitiate. A Subgroup B.1 chapter, derived from (22) Evergetis [37], cf. (27) Kecharitomene [30]. Copied later by (33) Heliou Bomon [22] and (34) Machairas [55], [56], [57], [58], [60].
- [23] Exhortation to the officials. A Subgroup B.1 chapter, derived from (22) Evergetis [33], cf. (27) Kecharitomene [25]. Copied later by (33) Heliou Bomon [23] and (58) Menoikeion [10].
- [24] Demonstration of respect for the superior. A Group A chapter, copied later by (33) Heliou Bomon [24]. (28) Pantokrator [14] is very similar; see different treatments in (22) Evergetis [16] and related documents.
- [25] Maintenance of cenobitic life. See also [5] above. A Group D chapter, shared previously only with (27) Kecharitomene [55]. Copied later by (33) Heliou Bomon [25] and (34) Machairas [11].
- [26] No kelliotic monks or imposed guests. A Group D chapter; minor sharing with only (27) Kecharitomene [53]. Copied later by (33) Heliou Bomon [26] and (58) Menoikeion [11].
- [27] No access for women or resident laymen. A Group A chapter, copied later by (33) Heliou Bomon [27]. See different treatments in (22) Evergetis [39] and related documents and in (28) Pantokrator [18].
- [28] Clothing and bathing allowances. A Group A chapter, copied later by (34) Heliou Bomon [28]. See different treatments in (22) Evergetis [25], [28] and related documents; (28) Pantokrator [15], [22]; and (31) Areia [T3], [T4].
- [29] Confession to the superior; exception. A Group A chapter, copied later by (34) Heliou Bomon [29]

TWELFTH CENTURY

- and (58) Menoikeion [13]. See different treatment in (22) Evergetis [7], [15] and related documents, and in (28) Pantokrator [20].
- [30] Exhortation to confession. A Group C chapter, shared previously with (22) Evergetis [7]. Copied later by (33) Heliou Bomon [30] and (34) Machairas [51].
- [31] Offices of the third and sixth hours. See also [47] below. A Group A chapter, copied later by (33) Heliou Bomon [31] and (34) Machairas [35].
- [32] Reception of communion. A Subgroup B.1 chapter, derived from (22) Evergetis [5], cf. (27) Kecharitomene [33]. Copied later by (33) Heliou Bomon [32], (34) Machairas [36], [37], [38], [39] and (58) Menoikeion [16].
- [33] Maintenance of elderly monks. A Group A chapter, copied later by (33) Heliou Bomon [36]. See also the subsequent treatment of this issue in (55) Athanasios I [7].
- [34] Equality in food and drink; care of the sick; ban on servants. A Subgroup B.1 chapter, derived from (22) Evergetis [26], [41], [24]; cf. (27) Kecharitomene [56], [57]. Copied later by (33) Heliou Bomon [33] and (34) Machairas [87], [106], [107], [108].
- [35] No idle talking; no private possessions. A Group C chapter, shared with (22) Evergetis [21], [22]; (29) Kosmosoteira [27]; and (30) Phoberos [39], [40], [41]. Copied later by (33) Heliou Bomon [34]; (34) Machairas [87], [113]; and (58) Menoikeion [17].
- [36] No arguments over precedence. A Subgroup B.1 chapter, derived from (22) Evergetis [9], cf. (27) Kecharitomene [42]. Copied later by (33) Heliou Bomon [35] and (34) Machairas [64].
- [37] Purpose of the inventory. A Group A chapter, copied later by (33) Heliou Bomon [37] and (34) Machairas [94].
- [38] Exhortation to the protector. A Group A chapter, copied later by (33) Heliou Bomon [38] and (34) Machairas [161].
- [39] Commemoration of deceased monks. A Subgroup B.2 chapter, shared with (27) Kecharitomene [70]; cf. (22) Evergetis [36]. Copied later by (33) Heliou Bomon [39] and (34) Machairas [157].
- [40] Commemoration of the founder and benefactors. A Subgroup B.1 chapter, derived from (22) Evergetis [36]; cf. (27) Kecharitomene [70]. Copied later by (34) Machairas [156]; see also the analogous provision in (33) Heliou Bomon [50].
- [41] Why the typikon was composed. A Group A chapter, copied later by (33) Heliou Bomon [40] and (34) Machairas [162].
- [42] Instructions to the superior. See also [48] below. A Subgroup B.1 chapter, derived from (22) Evergetis [17]; cf. (27) Kecharitomene [12]. Copied later by (33) Heliou Bomon [41], (34) Machairas [144] and (58) Menoikeion [19].
- [43] Instructions for a superior from another monastery. A Group A chapter, copied later by (33) Heliou Bomon [42]. See also the later treatment in (37) Auxentios [3].
- [44] Monks not to question superior; superior not to spend the monastery's wealth for friends or relatives. A Subgroup B.1 chapter, derived from (22) Evergetis [18]; cf. (27) Kecharitomene [12]. Copied later by (33) Heliou Bomon [43] and (34) Machairas [145], [146].
- [45] No partiality in elections; hostility to privilege. A Subgroup B.1 chapter, derived from (22) Evergetis [14], [17]; cf. (27) Kecharitomene [12]. Copied later by (33) Heliou Bomon [44] and (58) Menoikeion [18].
- [46] Final exhortation. A Subgroup B.1 chapter, derived from (22) Evergetis [42], [43]; cf. (27) Kecharitomene [78]. Copied later by (33) Heliou Bomon [45] and (34) Machairas [163], [166], [168].
- [47] Summary of the canonical hours. A Subgroup B.1 chapter, judging from the content of [46] above, an apparent later addition to the document, derived from (22) Evergetis [3], [4], [6], cf. (27) Kecharitomene [32], [33], [35], [36], [37], [38], [39]. Copied later by (33) Heliou Bomon [46] and (34) Machairas [30], [31], [32], [33], [34], [48].
- [48] Message to the superior. See also [42] above. A Group A chapter, copied later by (33) Heliou Bomon [47].

32. MAMAS

Judicial Confirmation. This document of the quaestor and nomophylax Theodore Pantechnes is dated to January 1164, more than four years after the typikon, which is itself dated to November 1158.

First Semeioma. This document, referred to in the Judicial Confirmation above, is dated to January 5, 1164. It contains a more specific history of the foundation than that found in the Prologue above. It also describes the typikon itself, the signatures to it, and the seal of the author Athanasios Philanthropenos.

Addition. This brief document, dated to April 1171, serves to introduce the Second Semeioma below.

Second Semeioma. This document, dated to March 15, 1171, is a record of the provisions taken to assure the safekeeping of the typikon, the inventory, and the foundation's other important charters. See also other security provisions in (19) Attaleiates [40], (27) Kecharitomene [77], and (29) Kosmosoteira [78].

33. Heliou Bomon: Typikon of Nikephoros Mystikos for the Monastery of the Mother of God ton Heliou Bomon or Elegmon

Date: 1162

Translator: Anastasius Bandy

Edition employed: Aleksei Dmitrievsky, Opisanie liturgicheskikh rykopisei, vol. 1: Typika, pt. 1 (Kiev, 1895), pp. 715–69.

Manuscript: Patmos 265 (autograph)¹

Other translations: None

Institutional History

A. Prior History of the Foundation

The foundation was located just to the east of what is now the Turkish village of Kurşunlu on the south shore of the gulf of Gemlik, an extension of the Sea of Marmara, about 15 miles to the north of Bursa. Its curious attribute ton Heliou Bomon or “Altars of the Sun” may indicate a pagan use of the site in antiquity.² As Janin noted (Géographie, vol. 2, p. 142), the monastery’s double name in its twelfth-century typikon, Heliou Bomon / ton Elegmon, may indicate that there were two predecessor institutions. A monastery of Elegmoi is attested as early as 826, at which time its superior Antony and steward Basil make an appearance in the Life of St. Joannikios.³ The association of the monastery with Patriarch Methodios (843–847) is questionable, however.⁴ A certain Nicholas, brother of St. Eustratios, was the monastery’s director during the reign of Basil I (867–886). According to his Life, the saint was buried here for a time until his remains were removed to his own monastery on Mount Olympos.⁵ Patriarch Nicholas I Mystikos (901–907, 912–925) wrote a letter to one of its superiors.⁶

In the tenth and eleventh centuries, Elegmoi was used by the emperors as a place of imprisonment, often a sign that a particular foundation had become an imperial monastery. The individuals recorded as having been imprisoned here are the treasurer Anastasios, exiled there in 921 by Romanos I Lekapenos, and the deposed Emperor Michael V (1041–1042) in 1042.⁷ In between, Romanos Saronites, son-in-law of Romanos I, prudently retired here in 961 after the exposure of the conspiracy of Basil Peteinos against Romanos II (959–963).⁸ This suggests that Elegmoi was at one time the property of the Lekapenos family, and thereafter became an imperial foundation for the duration of the Macedonian dynasty.

B. Revival under Nikephoros the mystikos

This monastery was likely another of the many victims of the charistike. According to the Prologue of the monastery’s typikon, the foundation had lost its endowed properties and was in danger of becoming extinct when the document’s author, Nikephoros the mystikos, a courtier of Manuel

33. HELIOU BOMON

I Komnenos, obtained Heliou Bomon as a grant through a patriarchal memorandum issued by Constantine IV Chliarinos (1154–57), countersigned by the emperor himself (cf. [4]). Nikephoros acquired [4], cf. [26] for Heliou Bomon the kelliotic monastery of St. Basianos in the Deuteron section of Constantinople. Books and sacred vessels belonging to the foundation that had been placed in Hagia Sophia for safekeeping were released [37] to Nikephoros. The emperor then contributed an imperial solemnion for the foundation's financial support. After undertaking considerable building on the site, likely including the surviving Komnenian church, Nikephoros surrounded the foundation with a perimeter wall for its security.

The patriarchal memorandum permitted Nikephoros to issue a typikon for the foundation, the present document, of which the autograph is preserved. As discussed below, the typikon is an exceptionally close copy of (32) Mamas. This suggests that Nikephoros was the protector of the Constantinopolitan monastery for which the latter document was written. Also, as at that foundation, the protectorate here is vested [2] in the office of the imperial mystikos. At a much later date, the typikon passed into the collection of the library of the monastery of Petra in Constantinople.⁹ It is now in the Patmos monastery. There is also a nineteenth-century copy in the Athonite monastery of Panteleemon.¹⁰

C. Subsequent History of the Foundation

A brief epitaphal inscription of Joachim, superior of Elegmoi, dated December 30, 1196, survived down to the late nineteenth century, when it was found by a peasant in the local cemetery.¹¹ In it, this superior is described as being archimandrite of the confederation of monasteries on Mount Olympos. Another epitaph, also now lost, was of Andronikos Kontostephanos, a Komnenian noble, dated February 23, 1209, who died as a monk at Elegmoi under the monastic name Antony.¹² In Palaiologan times, it had become a dependency of the monastery of the Mother of God Peribleptos in Constantinople. Hilarion, a monk of the latter foundation, was based at Elegmoi when, circa 1306, he undertook his noteworthy (and controversial) military defense of the local community against the Ottoman Turks.¹³

Perhaps the monastery was abandoned after the Ottoman occupation of neighboring Prousa (Bursa) in 1306, for it is unattested again until the seventeenth century, when Patriarch Paisios I granted it a patriarchal stauropegion or “charter of foundation” in 1652.¹⁴ By that time, an exclusively Greek village called Ligmous or Ligoumous, evidently recalling the Elegmoi monastery, had developed on an adjacent site. In 1803 and 1838, this community was prosperous enough to erect two additional churches utilizing many medieval spolia. Meanwhile, the monastery church was rededicated to St. Aberkios, and Chrysanthos Notaras, the orthodox patriarch of Jerusalem, met Meletios, the revived monastery's superior, in 1724.¹⁵ All these structures passed out of use in 1922, when the Greek community was forced to leave the area. The monastery church, in a ruined condition, survives, as do the two eighteenth-century churches, one of which is now employed as a private residence.¹⁶

Analysis

This document is another typikon for an independent monastery in the Evergetian reform tradition, as mediated by (32) Mamas, its model.

A. Model Typikon

The author of this document, Nikephoros Mystikos, may have been either a blood relative or a successor in office to the brothers George the Cappadocian and Theocharistos who served respectively as the new founder and first protector of the Mamas monastery. If so, this would explain the choice of that institution's typikon, (32) Mamas, as his model. In fact, (33) Heliou Bomon follows the text of (32) Mamas so closely that this typikon can serve as a witness in the manuscript tradition of the earlier document.¹⁷ Along with (11) Ath. Rule, it is the least original monastic typikon among our documents professedly by different authors.

Despite this very close textual dependence on (32) Mamas, our author provides no acknowledgement of his source. So stubborn is his reluctance that on several occasions [19], [29], [48] he feels compelled to allege his acquaintance with independent sources for matters he has actually learned about from (32) Mamas. Moreover, his dependence on (32) Mamas was not only literal but also structural. John, the author of (30) Phoberos, another close copier of an earlier model typikon, was careful to follow the structural order of (22) Evergetis as we know it today, though he readily interrupts it to insert his own or other materials. Other authors who utilized (22) Evergetis either directly or indirectly, such as Empress Irene Doukaina Komnene, the author of (27) Kecharitomene, Isaac Komnenos, the author of (29) Kosmosoteira, and Athanasios Philanthropenos, the author of (32) Mamas, happily rearranged materials found in their model to suit the order of their own typika. Our author here, however, preserves not only the order of his model (32) Mamas but even to a large extent the numeration of the model's chapters. He disturbs the parallelism in the numeration of the chapters only twice, once when he overlooks (32) Mamas [33], only to insert its content in his own [36], then a second time when he omits (32) Mamas [40] which is particular to its own document.

B. Value for the History of the Reform Movement

In addition to serving as a useful control on the minimal amount of changes that one might expect a new author to introduce into his own work from such a recent model, this typikon provides a view of the incremental development of the late reform tradition. For this purpose, both our author's additions to and subtractions from (32) Mamas need to be noted carefully.

Among the changes of note are: the restriction [1] of internal succession to the superiorship to officials and the "more eminent" monks; a willingness to consider [1] external candidates for the superiorship from a restricted geographical area; the substitution (in [8] and elsewhere) of the Studite synaxarion for that of Evergetis; a division (in [16] and elsewhere) of the community into "fathers" and "brothers," an unwillingness to tolerate [26] kelliotic monks, even in the dependency; an acknowledgement [49], cf. [45] of the increasing role of the emperor in providing financial support for this reformed institution; and a recognition [51] of the honors still due the original founders of revived institutions even after the long passage of time. These are less momentous changes than those between, say (22) Evergetis and (27) Kecharitomene, or between the latter and (32) Mamas, but they serve to show that certain changes were possible between two ideologically consistent typika separated in composition by no more than a decade.

C. Lives of the Monks

1. Number of Monks

As in (32) Mamas [5], there were to be [5] twenty monks in this foundation. This figure included, however, both monks at the main monastery and those at the dependency of St. Basianos ([4], cf. [48]), in Constantinople. As in the model typikon, the author welcomes the prospect of an increase in the number of monks due to better management or additional endowment of property. The author also alludes [16], [30], [44] to a division of the community into “fathers” and “brothers.” The latter may include the manual laborers [19] discussed below.

2. Liturgical Duties

As in (32) Mamas [5], two to three priests and two deacons were assigned [5] to the church for the performance of liturgical services. The prescriptions [31], [46] for services follow those in (32) Mamas [31], [47]. The one change of significance is the author’s requirement that his monks follow [8], cf. [45], [46] the Studite synaxarion (as opposed to that of Evergetis). There is also an original chapter [48] towards the end of the typikon that serves to regulate the patronal feast of the Dormition of the Mother of God as well as the feast of St. Basianos in the dependency.

3. Manual Labor

The incidental indications in (32) Mamas [23], [47] that manual labor was practiced reappear [23], [46] here. As in the model typikon, several of the monastery’s officials, a cellarer and an assistant (but no cook), are assigned to work in the kitchen [11] or at the gate [12]. Here at Heliou Bomon, fishermen and farmers (georgoi) are found [19] on the list of those who are entitled to eat meals with the rest of the monks in the refectory along with the gardeners and vine-dressers mentioned in (32) Mamas [19].

4. Length of the Novitiate

The author follows (32) Mamas [22] in setting [22] a novitiate of six months for “distinguished people” and two years for all others.

5. Sacramental Life

The provision [32] for the celebration of the liturgy four times a week and on feasts of the Lord follows (32) Mamas. As in the model typikon, the superior was to determine the appropriate frequency for his monks to receive communion. The author also endorses (32) Mamas [29]’s willingness to allow the monks to have a confessor other than their superior.

6. Cenobitic Lifestyle

In most particulars, the author endorses the Maman vision of cenobitic life, e.g., the unalterability of the cenobitic order [25], equality in food and drink [33], the bans on idle talking [34] and quarrels over seating [35]. He even retains [28] the cash payments for the monks’ baths and in lieu of communal distribution of clothing that are found in (32) Mamas [28], though he is careful to make the monastery’s farmers and fishermen eligible for the clothing allowance.

7. Servants Not Permitted

As in (32) Mamas [34], the monks are not permitted [33] to have personal servants or domestic workers.

8. Diet

The typikon's dietary regulations [17], [18], [19] follow those in the equivalent chapters of (32) Mamas without significant changes.

9. Bathing

The author follows his model (32) Mamas [28] in providing and paying for [28] a once-a-month bath for his monks at a facility outside the monastery.

10. Care of Sick and Elderly Monks

The author includes (32) Mamas [33] in his typikon which provides [36] for the superior to designate someone to take care of the monastery's elderly monks. In including [33] the provision of (32) Mamas [34] for the admission of seriously ill monks to outside medical facilities, he makes this the responsibility of the superior himself.

11. Burial

The provisions for the burial of the monastery's monks and for their memorial services closely follow [39] those found in (32) Mamas [39], but allow for the performance of the canon for the dead at a monk's grave as well as in the outer narthex.

D. Constitutional Matters

1. Independent and Self-Governing Status

Like (32) Mamas [4], our author asserts [4] the independence of his foundation based on a patriarchal memorandum of Patriarch Constantine IV Chliarinos (1154–57) and an imperial chrysobull of Emperor Manuel I Komnenos (1143–80). Either the patriarch or the emperor, most likely the former, granted the author the church of St. Basianos at Constantinople to serve as a dependency for the newly restored foundation. According to the typikon's Prologue, the patriarchal memorandum also specifically authorized the author to issue a typikon that “treats of both the number of monks and the management and administration appropriate to them, and of all matters concerning the monastery.”

2. Responsibilities of the Protector

The author of this typikon followed the example of his model in instituting [3] a protective ephoreia for his foundation. The author implies that he himself is currently serving as the foundation's protector (antilambanomenos). After his death, the office would be inherited by the mystikos “whoever, in fact, he may be.” The description of the responsibilities of the protector indicates, as in (32) Mamas [3], that a role limited to lending assistance to the foundation was foreseen; his rights were also severely curtailed as in the model typikon.

3. The Election of the Superior

The prescriptions [1] for the election of the superior follow those in (32) Mamas [1] with only a few small changes. The superior is directed to make his nominations for the succession from among the officials and the “more eminent monks,” the latter a change of some significance from the model, which made any monk eligible. In the event that outside candidates were needed, the protector was to consider monks from institutions located on Mount Olympos, at the straits [the Hellespont], or at Constantinople.

33. HELIOU BOMON

4. Role of the Superior

The author imports [24], [43] the authoritarian model for the monastery's superior found in (32) Mamas [24], [44], balanced by injunctions from the same source exhorting the superior to show paternal affection [41], [48] and not to use [43] the monastery's resources to do favors for friends and relatives. The sworn order to the superior from a different monastery (a xenokourites) found in (32) Mamas [43] is also reproduced [42], virtually verbatim. Likewise, the procedures [2] for the removal of the superior follow the model, (32) Mamas [2], with only the slightest changes, none of them consequential.

5. Other Officials of the Monastery

The officials here are the ecclesiarch [8], the sacristan and archivist [9], the treasurer [10], the cellarer and his assistant [11], and the gatekeeper [12], precisely as in the parallel chapters of (32) Mamas. The author follows (32) Mamas [14] in permitting [14] the superior to appoint monks to additional offices.

6. Patronal Privileges

As in (32) Mamas [3], the protector was to serve [3] without pay, receiving only daily liturgical commemoration while living and a listing in the diptychs after his death. The author omits the prescriptions for the founder's memorial rights found in (32) Mamas [40] and substitutes three chapters at the end of the document. These provide for commemoration for: the Emperor Manuel I Komnenos [49], the author himself [50], and the original founders of the monastery [51].

7. Reading of the Typikon and Security of Documents

The typikon was to be read every two months at mealtime as well as on the day of the author's commemoration, thus more frequently than in (32) Mamas [16]. In place of the elaborate precautions taken by Athanasios Philanthropenos for the preservation of the typikon, inventory, and other essential documents of the Mamas monastery (see (32) Mamas, Second Semeioma), our author here provides [37] that the originals of these documents were not to be taken from an unidentified depository monastery "without pressing need," and even then only after the issuance of a receipt from the borrowing authority. There is also a reference [9] to a cabinet to which both the superior and sacristan had keys (as in (32) Mamas [9]) in which copies of these documents were to be kept (cf. [37]).

E. Financial Matters

1. Financial Administration

The author simply adopts the procedures of (32) Mamas for financial administration, including endorsing the Studite separation of the superior from direct financial control [47], the prescriptions for installation of the steward [7] and other officials [6], and the post-Evergetian descriptions of duties for the ecclesiarch [8], sacristan [9], and treasurer [10], with only inconsequential changes.

2. Inalienability of Property

According to the typikon's Prologue, the Emperor Manuel I Komnenos had assisted the author in recovering the foundation's movable and immovable properties after they had "become an object of robbery” (perhaps by charistikarioi). The emperor then donated an imperial solemnion of a hundred nomismata to provide an additional dependable source of income. The author’s assertion [37] of the inalienability of the foundation’s movable and immovable properties follows his model in (32) Mamas [37].

3. Entrance Gift Not Mandatory

The author faithfully reproduces the language of his model (32) Mamas [22] in banning [22] the requirement of compulsory gifts from postulants and yet prohibiting [5] as “sacrilege” the removal of free-will gifts by monks who should later wish to leave the monastery.

4. Use of the Inventory

According to the prologue of the typikon, an inventory had been drawn up at the time the foundation was awarded to the author. Various sacred vessels, liturgical books, and other consecrated objects were among those listed [37] in this original inventory. At some point, this surviving movable property had been moved to the sacristy of the cathedral church of Hagia Sophia for safekeeping (cf. (24) Christodoulos [C6]). Upon the author’s assumption of the leadership of the foundation, these were returned to Heliou Bomon. Later, the author drew up [37] a new inventory, presumably including both the original objects and any additional donations of movable property (cf. (32) Mamas [37]) at the main monastery and at its dependency.

5. Other Sources of Income

The author adopts [5], [37] the optimistic attitude of his model (32) Mamas [5], [37] on the future growth of his foundation through additional donations of landed property and better management of existing assets. The omission of references to the burial of laymen within the monastery and the performance of commemorative services for them (cf. (32) Mamas [40], [27]), however, may signify a different attitude towards these common devices for increasing a foundation’s revenues.

F. Overall Philosophy

The author faithfully reproduces the results of his model’s refinements of the ideological legacy of (22) Evergetis on this subject: the superior can honor [35] clergymen as well as elderly and distinguished monks with preferential seating in the refectory; nobly born candidates and generous donors were not to rank [44] above other worthy candidates in elections for the superiorship; and the superior was not to spend [43] the monastery’s money to do favors for friends and relatives. To justify the penalty of excommunication employed to enforce this last provision the author cites the authority of “the divine and patristic decrees,” another testimony to the use of canon law to support a reformist ideology. He apparently declined, however, to consider granting [27] (cf. (32) Mamas [27]) prominent noblewomen exceptions from the usual ban on female access to the monastery.

The author endorses [26] the post-Evergetian hostility towards “imposed guests” (katapemptoi) and kelliotic monks (cf. (32) Mamas [26]). The author explicitly cites the authority of the patriarchal memorandum for his foundation’s exemption from the obligation to accept imposed guests. Unlike John II Komnenos, who in (28) Pantokrator [28] was willing to leave the kelliotic constitutions of his foundation’s dependent monasteries undisturbed, our author here some twenty-five years later insists [26] that the kelliotic monks of his dependency at St. Basianos “change over to the cenobitic way of life for many reasons.”

G. External Relations

1. Relations with the Ecclesiastical Hierarchy

Apparently the memorandum the author obtained from Patriarch Constantine IV Chliarinos establishing his foundation’s independence contained provisions similar to those in the memorandum issued by Patriarch Nicholas IV Muzalon a decade earlier for the Mamas monastery. As the author of (32) Mamas [1], [29] did earlier, our author here recognizes [1] the right of the patriarch to bless a new superior and acknowledges [29] the need for the patriarch’s permission for an unordained superior to hear the monks’ confessions. Also, unlike the author of (32) Mamas who cites authority conceded to him by the new founder, our author [47] credits the patriarch with giving him permission to draw up this typikon.

2. Institutional Philanthropy

This foundation does not exceed its model’s modest commitment to institutional philanthropy, which is essentially limited [13] to charitable distributions to monks and beggars at the monastery’s gate (cf. [39], [50]).

Notes on the Introduction

1. See Komines, Patmian Codices, p. 24, pl. 13.
2. See Mango, “St. Abercius,” pp. 173–74.
3. Halkin, BHG 935 and 936, ed. AASS, November, vol. 2, pt. 1, pp. 360A, 406A.
4. See Janin, Géographie, vol. 2, p. 144, and Mango, “St. Abercius,” pp. 174–75.
5. Halkin, BHG 645, ed. A. Papadopoulos-Kerameus, Analekta Hierosolymitikes Stachyologias, vol. 4 (St. Petersburg, 1899), pp. 390, 397.
6. Epistola 141, ed. R. J. H. Jenkins and L. G. Westerink, Nicholas I Patriarch of Constantinople: Letters (Washington, D.C., 1973), pp. 452–55 (with a different interpretation of the name of the monastery).
7. Theophanes Continuatus, Chronographia, ed. I. Bekker, CShB (Bonn, 1838), p. 400; John Skylitzes, Synopsis historiarum, ed. J. Thurn (Berlin, 1973), p. 421.
8. Skylitzes, Synopsis historiarum, ed. Thurn, p. 251.
9. See Janin, Géographie, vol. 2, p. 145, n. 6.
10. See Mango, “St. Abercius,” p. 172, n. 12.
11. Pargoire, “Notes d’épigraphie,” pp. 357–58, with Mango, “St. Abercius,” pp. 175–76.
12. Grégoire, “Kontostéphanes,” pp. 159–61; with Mango, “St. Abercius,” p. 176.
13. Pachymeres, De Andronico Palaeologo, ed. I. Bekker, CShB, vol. 2 (Bonn, 1835), p. 596.
14. Sathas, MB, vol. 3, p. 587.
15. A. Papadopoulos-Kerameus, Hierosolymitike Bibliotheke, vol. 4 (St. Petersburg, 1899), p. 202.
16. For details, see Mango, “St. Abercius,” pp. 169–72, with a ground plan of the monastic church.
17. Vitalien Laurent, “Remarques critiques sur le typikon de Saint-Mamas,” EO 30 (1931), p. 234.

Bibliography

Beck, Hans-Georg, Kirche und theologische Literatur im byzantinischen Reich (Munich, 1959), pp. 210, 648.

TWELFTH CENTURY

- Dmitrievsky, Aleksei, "Maloaziiskii bogorodichnii monastir 'Ton Heliou Bomon' XII veka i ego Tipik, khranyaschiisya v bibliotek Patmoskago," TKDA (October 1895), 309–11.
- , Opisanie liturgicheskikh rykopisei, vol. 1: Typika, pt. 1 (Kiev, 1895), pp. xciv–xcix.
- Grégoire, Henri, "Notes épigraphiques. XII. La famille des Kontostéphanes et le monastère d'Elegmi," Revue de l'Instruction publique en Belgique 52 (1909), 152–60.
- Janin, Raymond, La géographie ecclésiastique de l'empire byzantin, vol. 2: Les églises et les monastères des grands centres byzantins (Paris, 1975), pp. 144–48.
- Komines, A., Facsimiles of Dated Patmian Codices (Athens, 1970), p. 24, pl. 13.
- Mango, Cyril, "The Monastery of St. Abercius at Kursunlu (Elegmi) in Bithynia," DOP 22 (1968), 169–76.
- Pargoire, Jules, "Notes d'épigraphie," EO 4 (1900–1901), 356–59.
- Talbot, Alice-Mary, "Heliou Bomon Monastery," ODB, pp. 910–11.
- Volk, Robert, Gesundheitswesen und Wohltätigkeit im Spiegel der byzantinischen Klostertypika (Munich, 1983), pp. 222–24.

As noted above, this document utilizes very substantial portions of the text of (32) Mamas. Since (33) Heliou Bomon is such a highly derivative document, we have reversed our usual convention for bolding of shared text. For this document only, the author's original materials are presented in boldface type.

Translation

[Prologue]

Typikon* of the venerable monastery of the supremely holy Mother of God of Heliou Bomon, that is to say, of Elegmon, which is situated in the regions of the East, in the theme of Opsikion, in the district of Katabolion. This [monastery] was formerly under the authority of the most holy Great Church but was made independent through a patriarchal memorandum, which was also confirmed on the reverse side by the imperial and divine hand and wax seal.

This [typikon] was set forth at the will and pleasure of me, Nikephoros, who also obtained the [monastery's] independence and have been a mystikos, during the reign of the most devout and most fortunate and most valiant and God-crowned emperor, Lord Manuel Komnenos [(1143–1180)], who was Born-in-the-Purple. It presents a rule of conduct for those who are going to live in [the monastery] as monks and for all other conduct and way of life, so that both the principal monastery of Elegmon itself and its dependency, which is in the imperial city, and everything in it and under its jurisdiction may be governed and administered in accordance with the typikon, which was made in the month . . . , of the indiction . . . , in the year 6670 [= 1162 A.D.]. [p. 716]

Since this is not one of the things that are rejected in the sight of God, (namely), if anyone is found expressing gratitude before him and offers this acknowledgement as a painless gift in return for the great benefits he received, behold, I myself, too, with contrition of heart fall before him. I magnify his mighty deeds and am overwhelmed at the depths of his compassion. I glorify his goodness, I sing of the majesty of his glory, and in return for having shown me mercy, I give him a grateful mind and this a sacrifice better than a young calf, and better than any other thing. I offer myself as a whole burnt-sacrifice in his presence.

For what of all things could anyone offer him, since all things are of his ownership and there is nothing that does not recognize it? Through my gratitude, therefore, I seek to obtain his mercy, and through my good-will, I invoke his love of humanity, and in return for the things that he has given me I demonstrate the fervor of my zeal by what is better and holier. For having chosen the most precious of all my possessions, I forthwith divest myself of it and dedicate it to the wholly laudable and ever-Virgin Mother of my Lord, Jesus Christ, on the one hand, for the eternal memorial of my masters and emperors, and, on the other, for the atonement and alleviation of the weight of my crimes. But to what end are these things and what does the preface of my account wish [to say]? The following will make this known.

This venerable monastery, which had been established in the name of the supremely pure Mistress and Mother of God and had been called by the surnames of Heliou Bomon, that is to say, of Elegmon, which is situated in this region of the East and in [the theme of] Opsikion, and in the district of Katabolion, long ago was renowned and distinguished; but in the course of time it grew old and was not only running the risk of giving at the knees but was about to fall on its face not before long, stricken with a blow affecting the whole body. Because of this there was a danger not only that its restoration would be hard to achieve but that it would almost cease to be called simply a dwelling place for monks, just as the inventory¹ that was made at the time of the delivery of its independence proves very clearly.

Because our soul grieved not slightly at its fall, we, too, decided to do everything in our power so as to help and restore [the monastery]. First of all, we procured for [the monastery], which was formerly subject to the most holy Great Church of God, its complete independence, like a secure foundation, through a memorandum of the late most holy and ecumenical patriarch, lord Constantine [IV] Chliarinos [(1154–57)],² which memorandum the imperial and [p. 717] divine hand also confirmed on the outside with the recording of the date in red letters and his customary wax seal. Then, after we had thus restored to it with the help and good-will of my master and emperor all of its movable and immovable possessions that had become an object of robbery by those who carry off other people's possessions, we added to it through an imperial and divine edict an annual solemnion of a hundred trikephala nomismata and rebuilt its parts that had collapsed and some we straightened.

But what is more, we raised up from their foundations, with no moderate expenditures, many other and very beautiful [buildings], and we placed around the principal monastery a very secure fence, by means of which we shut the side-entrances to the monastery that were easily accessible to those who wanted to pass through it with no good intent. [We] made a secure dwelling-place for monastic men out of this monastery that until our day remained well-nigh uninhabitable by men who were holy and served the Lord, but lay instead exposed to be trampled on by men who so willed and those who are not to be permitted. We also acquired its dependency in the imperial city and simply, by the good will of God, all the monastery's possessions underwent an alteration for the better, almost everything having become new in place of the old, and having had the wrinkle scraped off that had attached itself to them from time and neglect.

Since, however, we have been permitted by the patriarchal memorandum to set forth also a typikon in accordance with our pleasure that treats of both the number of the monks who are going to lead a monastic life in this monastery and the management and administration appropriate to them, and all the order, and simply of all matters concerning the monastery, behold, we declare this, too, and clearly present both our will and wish. It is as follows.

Chapter 1

[Borrowed from (32) Mamas [1]; differences in boldface]

Concerning the installation of a superior

The choosing and installation of the superior must be discussed first. If the death of the superior then in office is expected and known in advance, all the community should go to him with all respect and reverence and the appropriate demeanor and to remind him to give thought to who should rule the monastery after him in a manner pleasing to God. He, on the other hand, like an affectionate father should by all means take care to leave behind to them as a paternal inheritance one who is worthy of exercising leadership since he has knowledge of the conduct and way of life of each of the monks. For he shall select by himself impartially, dispassionately and as though God, "Who searches the hearts and reins" (Ps. 7:9), were invisibly watching over his judgment three [members] from the whole brotherhood who more than the others are adorned with intellect and virtue [p. 718] and are recognized and acknowledged as wiser and more experienced for the governance of souls, such as may be found among all the officials or even the more eminent monks.

After he has both written down their names with his own hand on a paper and has sealed the latter in the presence of the leading men of the brotherhood, without the knowledge of those who have been selected, he shall deposit the paper in the sacristy or another safe place. After the departure to the Lord of him who holds the office of superior the paper shall be brought out and opened, and, when those who have been selected are made known to the brotherhood, the appointment of him who will hold the office of superior shall take place, just as the account will show more clearly, as it proceeds.

But if the superior should happen to depart from this life unexpectedly without giving any consideration to his successor or making anything known, then when the whole community has gathered by itself, it should make its choice; and, if all of them agree and are unanimous with regard to one, who is surely superior in both virtue and activity and reputation, there will be no need for the decision of the protector of the monastery except only that he, too, be informed of the matter. Furthermore, if all [the brothers] agree and are altogether pleased with one of the three [candidates] already selected by the superior, as stated above, the depositing of the pieces of paper on the holy altar is superfluous.

But if a rift should occur and a dispute arise among them concerning the choice, which I pray does not happen, with some [members] proposing this one, while others that one, in that case the selection concerning the three and the depositing of the pieces of paper on the holy altar will take place. Let the protector of the monastery have the liberty to resolve the arguments, favoring the judgment of the group that excels in virtue and spiritual life. But he shall always be careful to make his decision freely and dispassionately unless he wishes to see the Judge and Master of all creation perversely influenced against him and [have] the wholly undefiled and all-holy Mother and ever-Virgin Mother of God as an opponent and antagonist on account of the fact that he, too, perhaps perverted justice by an unjust decision, a thing which I pray may not happen.

Both the choice of the three [candidates] who are about to be selected and their installation will be carried out in this manner. On three pieces of paper of the same size the following words will be written: [p. 719]

“Master, Lord Jesus Christ, our God, thou who knowest the hearts [of men], by the intercessions of our all-pure Lady, the Mother of God, reveal to us sinners whether thou hast judged our brother so-and-so worthy of the position of our superior.”

The same words [will] be written again on the other pieces of paper and the names of the three [candidates] inscribed on them.³ After the papers have been stamped with a seal—that of the protector if he is present, and in case he does not want to be or is somehow unable to be, by the seal of [a representative] whom the [protector] will assign by means of a written and signed statement—they will be placed on the holy table during vespers on Saturday or that of a feast of the Lord or that of the feast of the Mother of God, if it should occur at that time. A vigil shall be performed and a whole-hearted supplication with a contrite heart shall be made by you, my most venerable fathers, because the matter for which we make the supplication is important. On this hangs the maintenance of the monastery and, equally, its destruction, which I pray does not happen, and the hope of your salvation.

On the next day, after the divine liturgy has been celebrated and after its completion, while the priest is still clothed in his priestly vestments, the “trisagion” will be performed by you and these troparia will be sung: “Have mercy on us, Lord, have mercy,” “Glory,” “O Lord, have mercy on us, for we trust in thee,” “Lord, Lord, turn [to us] from heaven and behold and visit this vine” (Ps. 79 [80]:14), “Both now,” [and] “Let us now fervently run to the Mother of God.” The deacon will make an ektenes, declaiming after the other petitions this: “Again we beg that the Lord our God reveal to us the one worthy of our leadership.” You will respond, “Kyrie eleison,” thirty times and perform fifteen deep bows, saying to yourselves this also, while you raise your hands to God: “God, thou who knowest the hearts [of men], show to us sinners the one worthy of our leadership.” After these bows, when the priest himself has performed three similar bows before the holy table, and while still dressed in his priestly vestments, as we said, is repeating the same invocation, he will lift up one of the three pieces of paper. When it has been offered by the priest himself in the presence of the whole [p. 720] community to the one who placed his own seal upon it, he will recognize his own seal and the piece of paper will be opened, as all watch, and the owner of the name written on it will enter with the priest into the holy sanctuary with his head uncovered. Then, as our typikon and the staff are lying in the place before the holy altar, he [the superior-elect], after making three bows will take them, pondering and considering with himself from where he takes them and to whom he promises to protect them, and that angels are recording his promise, who are going to lead him to that fearful place of judgment to give account of the fulfillment of his promises.

After the whole brotherhood has responded “worthy,” he shall come out and stand in the place assigned to the superior, and everyone will offer him the divine greeting [with a kiss], and glory will be offered to God, and the dismissal will follow with the customary prayer of the priest.

TWELFTH CENTURY

He will be your superior thereafter, whom you are to revere as a father, and have an obedient attitude towards him as the one appointed by God.

After this let all the brothers, taking him along, go up to the most holy ecumenical patriarch so that he may receive from the latter's holy right hand the sphragis and benediction of the office of superior in accordance with the contents of the memoranda that belong to the monastery. Let the same procedure be followed as well in the case of [a candidate] elected by common consent.

I pray, therefore, that there always be among you yourselves an abundance of those worthy of leadership, and that there will never fail to be such men in our monastery, but, whenever a need arises to appoint a superior, the selection can take place from the monks themselves who practice the religious life here. If, however, the wicked enemy, the originator of evil, who always envies the salvation of mankind, shall overpower your souls so much and make you so neglect your own salvation that no one may be found among you of attested virtue and learning and experience for the governance and leadership of souls—I trust by the mercy of my Christ who loves mankind and of my literally and truly supremely holy Mistress and Mother of God [p. 721] that such a thing may not ever occur—in that case of course we give permission to the protector of the monastery at the time with also the prompting and consent of the monks to discover from outside someone from another monastery, either from those of Olympos or from those who are settled at the straits [the Hellespont] or even from the Queen of Cities [Constantinople] itself, a man who is devout and approved for the office of superior and to install him in this office.

It is our wish, however, that he be appointed thus. If, indeed, two alone from the entire brotherhood in the monastery are found such as ought to be selected, in accordance with what has been said, and a third is missing, one [candidate] alone must be brought in from outside. Thus, after the three [names] have been recorded on the papers and the aforementioned procedure followed, he whom God should approve and reveal is to be preferred. If, on the other hand, one alone of all of you is manifestly worthy of selection, it is surely fitting to find the other two from elsewhere and to have them recorded and to have again the same procedure take place. If, however, the monastery lacks even the three—a thing which I pray may not happen—it is certainly necessary, even if the three are likewise selected from other monasteries and recorded, that you make the prescribed supplications and entreaties to God who loves mankind and his all holy Mother and thus appoint to the office of superior him who, in the former's discretion, is revealed as worthy.

Chapter 2

[Borrowed from (32) Mamas [2]; differences in boldface]

Concerning the removal of an unsuitable holder of the office of superior

So much for that. The following matters, however, that are about to be discussed concerning him who, after our passing away, will be holding the office of superior in the venerable monastery of my supremely holy Mother of God that is under our [authority], I did not wish to commit to writing, for it should not be necessary to remove from his position and rank someone who has previously been selected for it. This would be a pleasing and agreeable state of affairs if in fact our nature remained unchanged and unmoved, but that is impossible, for we repeatedly change and alter, such is human nature, and when we are thought worthy of honor we grow weaker with regard to the performance of good deeds, giving way to laziness in most cases, since authority has a habit of weakening those who have been elevated [p. 722] to it whereas they ought to demonstrate a greater struggle and diligence. We feign virtue at the start through the desire for the authority and the success it brings, then when we have gained it we are found to be still exactly what we were, like octopuses which when pursued by bigger fish take a tight hold of the rocks nearby and simply pretend that they are a rock, but whenever they escape the danger, they are recognizable as octopuses again, which in fact they were. For these reasons the matter must be committed to writing and punishment given as strongly as possible.

33. HELIOU BOMON

So, if the superior should continue unchanged, properly maintaining his virtue through which he was thought worthy of that rank, he will not be removed from his leadership but remain firm and permanent. But if time proves him to be unqualified and unsuitable, either because he has carried out his leadership of the brothers in a careless and indifferent manner or because he has been doing favors for his relatives or has been appropriating some of the monastery's property or has been betraying or subjecting the monastery's property to anyone's control or has been totally disregarding any of the instructions in the present rule and following his own wishes or clearly been involved in bodily passions, then for these reasons he has been proved unsuitable for the guiding of souls

If, then, though living so wickedly, he should ever take stock of himself and give up his evil ways and embark on the road that leads to higher things and salvation, let him stay and be your superior. But should he remain the same, and still not give up his evil ways but in fact indulge in them more widely, if you were unanimously agreed, having deliberated with the protector of the monastery concerning him, it is our wish that you remove that worthless man from the leadership over you, and that a selection and another vote and an appointment of another superior again be made in accordance with what has been prescribed above.⁴

If, however, the one removed from the office of superior should wish to stay in the monastery as one of the brothers, accorded the rank and seat of second to the superior, in the refectory I mean, and at the other gatherings, and to be submissive to the superior in all things and not to destroy the monastery's good order by being both troubled and troubling, let him be again in the monastery. If not, however, let him leave the latter and depart where, in fact, he wishes, especially if he happens to be from those who come from outside, in order that he may not become a cause of offense to the rest also.

Chapter 3

[Borrowed from (32) Mamas [3]; differences in boldface]

Concerning those who have been appointed for the [monastery's] protection, that is, the protectors

Since one of the indispensable things after my departure from life, is for the monastery to have its [p. 723] protector in order that it may not become booty to those who wish to pillage other people's property, inasmuch as it is not being protected under some kind of shelter and security—a thing which, in fact, it has suffered even before—this is exactly what we have done for reason of the best management. It is my wish, therefore, after my decease, as I said (for, since I am a human being, I expect to die and pay the common debt of nature) that the supremely glorious mystikos, whoever in fact, he may be, will undertake the protection and patronage of the monastery, at the earnest supplication of the superior and the monks of the monastery, being called to this soul-beneficial service freely [and] without pay, for the sake of his soul's salvation and that alone, as we said. For what would he even want from it, except only an eternal commemoration?

TWELFTH CENTURY

None of those who have been entrusted with the protection of the monastery should use this as a reason for having control over any property in it, or pervert any of the provisions in this rule to the detriment of the monastery, or remove the superior, or enroll monks or introduce or expel them, or demand any accounts from either the superior or the steward or one of the monks in the matters they manage and look after or demand knowledge of the income and the expenditures, [p. 724] or try to get anything at all from the monastery or appropriate anything whatsoever.

He is only obliged to set right the harmful things that are sometimes done contrary to the tenor of our present *typikon and, even to drive off, as much as he can those who are wont to display any insolent behavior in the monastery and to reconcile the monks and the superior whenever they happen to be at variance. For the foregoing reasons it will be enough for them [the protectors] to be commemorated in the monastery three times each day and after their deaths for their names to be inscribed in the sacred diptychs.

Chapter 4

[Borrowed from (32) Mamas [4]; differences in boldface]

Concerning the fact that the monastery is self-governing

Since the monastery received the good fortune of independence of all kinds through a patriarchal memorandum and through a divine and imperial chrysobull,⁵ which was also confirmed on its reverse side by the imperial divine hand, it should be, in accordance with their contents, independent and under its own control and above all mastery and lordship, and no one at all should have any right or privilege in respect of it, but it should remain independent in every way, separate and in control of itself, and be administered in accordance with the regulations that have been expressly laid down in the present typikon, being subjected neither to imperial or ecclesiastic or personal rights nor assigned as a gift or epidosis or for reasons of ephoreia, stewardship or superintendence or for any other reason to any kind of person whatsoever or monastery or holy house or some other bureau but it is to remain forever only under the authority of the mankind-loving God alone and her who conceived him without human seed, our wholly unblemished Mistress, Holy Virgin and Mother of God, to whom it has in fact been dedicated, and it should be governed by the superior in it at the time and to be administered in accordance with the regulation of the present typikon.

It shall rule itself and acknowledge as master the Virgin and Mother of God, who is more glorious than the cherubim, and in no way have anyone control it but rather it shall itself have authority over its dependency of St. Basianos,⁶ which is in the Great City, and all the things that are both in it and under its authority.

But if anyone ever at any time and in any way wishes to gain control of it [p. 725] and to set it under the authority of someone else, whether he be an emperor, or a patriarch, or some other member of the clergy or of the senate, or the superior himself, or its steward, or simply anyone of the brothers in it, prompted by an attack of the devil, not only will he be held responsible for the divine body and blood of our God and Savior Jesus Christ, but he will be also accursed, just as the holy apostle says (Gal. 1:8), and subject to the curse of the three hundred and eighteen holy fathers and share the lot of the betrayer Judas and be numbered along with those who cried aloud “Away with him, away with him, crucify him” (John 19:15) and “His blood upon us and upon our children” (Matt. 27:25).

Chapter 5

[Borrowed from (32) Mamas [5]; differences in boldface]

Concerning the fact that the monks must pursue a cenobitic way of life; and concerning their number; and that they must be tonsured gratuitously; and that all the monastery’s movable and immovable possessions must be inalienable; and concerning the fact that it must accept the things that are offered to it with a purpose dear to God

It is right that something be said more clearly and briefly next concerning the way of life and the number of the monks and their whole organization in the monastery. Accordingly, the monks in both the principal monastery, which is honored in the name of our supremely glorious Mistress and Mother of God, and its dependency in the imperial city, shall be twenty in number. They ought continually to attend to the service of the church and to the duties inside and outside the monastery. Of them, however, let there be of necessity two or even three priests and two deacons, but, if there should be even more, thanks be to God. Yet, if—a thing for which we pray—the Lord God should grant that others, too, come to the monastery on account of the moral excellence of those who practice asceticism in it and the observance of the cenobitic way of life, and if he should supply also the necessary things for self-sufficiency either from the things that the monastery possesses, through the superiors’ careful management, or also from the things that some Christ-loving individuals will dedicate to it, as we believe [that they will], so as to be sufficient for even more, a larger number of monks shall not be prohibited as long as the superior should wish it and there should be a capacity of cells in the monastery.

We wish that those who enter should be accepted and have their hair cut [p. 726] and be counted in the aforesaid number of monks without any gift. If one of them were to wish of his own free will to offer something of his own possessions, whether the offering is of movable or immovable property, it will be accepted. For what is offered in faith as a dedication to God and his wholly unblemished Mother, is going to be for the maintenance of the monastery and to commemorate and help the soul of the giver ought not to be rejected.

But if, tempted by demons, he ever tries to leave the monastery—there are many examples of fickleness—and wishes to take back what he has given, it must not be given to him whatever it happens to be. For what has once been dedicated to God cannot be taken away, and the person who takes it away is sacrilegious and everyone knows, even if we do not say it, what sort of penalty sacrilege carries.

So whoever makes an offering of private movable or immovable property should read the preceding words here, and if he makes his offering with a free motive pleasing to God, with no intention of getting it back later, then indeed his gift should be accepted and dedicated to God and his wholly undefiled Mother, by whom he will be indeed properly recompensed with the reward of his faith. All the things that have been set apart or will be set apart for the monastery or in any way whatsoever will accrue to it, not only immovable but also movable, are to remain with it inalienable. They are not to be given away as gifts, not to be exchanged, not to be alienated in any way whatsoever.

TWELFTH CENTURY

For it is downright sacrilege to do any such thing or to accept it when it has been done, and he who has done such a thing or has tolerated it will render an account for this on the frightful day of judgment, finding also Christ himself, the master of the things that are alienated, an unsympathetic and just Judge, and his supremely glorious Mother, and Mother of God, a formidable adversary in both the present and the future life, even if twofold or threefold is that which is given in place of the thing that is alienated. Thus the alienation of the things that have been dedicated will be altogether forbidden.

Chapter 6

[Borrowed from (32) Mamas [6]; differences in boldface]

Concerning how the installations of the officials must be made

The superior will be the one carrying out both the selection and the installation of all the officials of the monastery, selecting and installing by his own decision. For he shall install by all means those who excel the rest in both virtue and [p. 727] competence for the performance of their office. Whenever it is necessary for anyone to be installed to whatever sort of office, the keys will be placed in front of the holy sanctuary, and, after the trisaqion has been completed, the one set apart for the office will approach, genuflect three times, receive the keys, and after this will bow his bared head to the superior, and the latter shall make the sign of the cross over him, saying, “The grace of our Lord Jesus Christ, through the intercessions of the supremely holy Mother of God, installs you.” However, in the case of the offices for which there are no keys, the sphragis by the superior and the words that are spoken in connection with it will be enough for the installation so that [each] may know from where he is receiving his office and in what way he promises to manage it.

Chapter 7

[Borrowed from (32) Mamas [7]; differences in boldface]

Concerning the installation of the steward

The steward of the monastery also shall be installed by the superior, one who is superior in virtue and activity and esteem. He who has been selected, as I have stated, having approached the superior and having performed the proper obeisance to him, shall offer him his head uncovered; and he, should make the sign of the cross over him with his hand and say, “The grace of our Lord Jesus Christ, through the intercessions of the supremely holy Mother of God, installs you steward of this monastery.” Then, when he has given him the sacred kiss, he is to set him up in the [appropriate] place for the steward, and all the brotherhood, one after the other, will kiss him. After the kiss, the priest shall recite the customary prayer, and the dismissal of the congregation will take place. He, indeed, who has been installed for the purpose of executing the function of steward shall carry out all the affairs of the monastery, just as he should be instructed by the superior, and he shall do nothing without the latter’s knowledge and order.

33. HELIOU BOMON

Chapter 8

[Borrowed from (32) Mamas [8]; differences in boldface]

Concerning the ecclesiarch

The ecclesiarch moreover, being appointed by the superior, will be whoever seems to him fit and suitable for this office, receiving from the sacristan at the time of his appointment an inventory with everything that should be used in the church of the monastery, and at the proper time other things suitable for daily use or for use during the feasts. He will look after the customary decoration of the church, and he should look after the orderly condition of the church during the singing of psalms as is customary for [p. 728] ecclesiarchs. The office, however, ought to be sung in accordance with the Studite synaxarion,⁷ which is sung at the present time. The aforesaid person ought to keep also the box with the nomismata that are received and paid out, as will be made clear later on in fuller detail.

Chapter 9

[Borrowed from (32) Mamas [9]; differences in boldface]

Concerning the appointment of the sacristan and keeper of archives and his office

I wish there to be a sacristan in the monastery who must guard the sacred vessels and liturgical cloths, and think worthy of every kind of care the things handed to him in a written and reliable inventory of transfer. This official must hand over to the ecclesiarch for the service of the church both the things for daily use and the things used in the feasts, and when it is time, receive these back again from him and guard them; and the things surplus to requirements he must keep in the sacristy shut up and sealed by the superior, and he is required to hand back everything that has been entrusted to him whenever he is moved from this office according to the inventory of transfer made out for it. For it is within the power of the superior to remove and change those who hold office in the manner described. For it is just to leave unchanged those who have been appointed to each of the offices while they are performing them in a careful and devout manner, but those who neglect or despise them, and perhaps even behave deceitfully in them, should be removed and others appointed. If one of these people happens to appropriate something, anything at all, he will be responsible to God and his wholly undefiled Mother, from whom in fact he received the keys of office.

The same person will not only be sacristan but also archivist, receiving all the papers containing the rights of ownership of the monastery, and will guard these, thinking them worthy of every kind of care and when a need for some document occurs, on the instruction of the superior he will bring out the required document and hand it over. When a few days have passed after this, he will remind the superior, and recall the document that was taken out, as [p. 729] has been described, and will not allow it to be lost. [The cabinet], however, in which the documents pertaining to the rights [of the monastery] are deposited must also be kept closed and sealed by both the superior and [the sacristan], as I have stated above, so that the one may not be able to open it without the other.

TWELFTH CENTURY

Chapter 10

[Borrowed from (32) Mamas [10]; differences in boldface]

Concerning the treasurer of the nomismata

We must speak about the keeping and listing of monetary income and expenditure. For it is our wish that there be a box that is secured, in which ought to be deposited the nomismata that are collected from any source whatsoever and of whatever quality they may be, as well as the notes that are issued for their receipt and disbursement, in the presence of the superior, the steward, the ecclesiarch, and the sacristan. After these have been deposited, let this box be sealed by the superior and the aforesaid [officials]. The superior, however, shall take out from it a sum of nomismata in the presence of the aforesaid monks and shall hand this over to the treasurer for the monastery's daily expenses, and they should note this sum in the ledger of disbursement that should always be in the box. The treasurer, however, shall make another detailed note of the disbursement of the nomismata, which note, the one issued by the treasurer that is, ought to be shown twice a week to the superior and recorded in order that he may keep fresh in mind the disbursement as it proceeds. After all of the nomismata that he will already have received have been spent, let the total disbursement be read from the beginning in the presence of the superior and the aforesaid monks and let it be computed by the superior. Then in the same manner other nomismata shall be turned over to him, the box being opened in accordance with the aforesaid observance, and thus it shall be done continuously. Other nomismata, however, shall not be taken out of the box unless beforehand the treasurer hands over the account-book of disbursement and gives an account of what he received and spent.

Chapter 11

[Borrowed from (32) Mamas [11]; differences in boldface]

Concerning the official who takes in and issues the food, that is, the cellarer

Likewise [it is our wish that there be] also [p. 730] an official who takes in and issues all food and drink in the monastery, whom, in fact, we call cellarer. Besides that, he must receive all the crops and legumes and issue them on the instruction of the superior, and take care of these in every way, so that they are not perhaps ruined by neglect. The aforesaid ought to see also to the preparation and care of the table of the monks, as well as the kitchen, being obliged to have under his authority also another [monk] working along with him.

All the food shall be served to the brothers equally, from the first down to the last. The olive oil he ought to get, of course, every month from him who closely guards it. For no one even from the ranks of all the officials ought to lay claim to the olive oil, the wax, and the incense under the pretext that these belong to his office, but he shall be authorized to guard them whom the superior should commission either from the ranks of the officials or from the ranks of the ordinary [monks].

Chapter 12

[Borrowed from (32) Mamas [12]; differences in boldface]

Concerning the gatekeeper

Furthermore, the superior must appoint the one who is to hold the keys of the gate, whom we call the gatekeeper, whose responsibility it will be not to open the gate at all without the permission of the superior and to see to it that people do not enter or leave the monastery without the knowledge of the superior. The one appointed to this office must be devout and already inclining towards old age and by the testimony of the whole community a person of godly life. Each evening he will bring the keys to the superior, and he will not see those who have come to see him [personally] without the permission of the superior, but with his permission he will see them in whatever way is permitted.

33. HELIOU BOMON

Chapter 13

[Borrowed from (32) Mamas [13]; differences in boldface]

Concerning the poor, both monks and laymen, who come to the gate of the monastery

It is also likely that some of our brothers in Christ, the poor, will come to the gate of the monastery because of want. Since it is impossible for all of them to be brought in within the monastery, let the gatekeeper at the time, [p. 731] who ought to be altogether devout and blameless, as we said above, have it in his power to go to the cellarer and get bread and give it to the beggar without hesitation and complaint in order that he himself may not suffer judgment. If, however, the beggar is a monk, let also wine be given to him, as well as fish or cheese or anything else. But also, after the brothers have taken their meal, let the leftover cooked food be given, also, by the aforesaid gatekeeper, to the poor who are found at the gate in order that, through your cheerful charity to our brothers and sharing, you, too, may receive in return cheerful and abundant mercy from God. For it is our preference that not even one beggar turn away from the gate with empty hands, and it is my wish that the gatekeeper at the time observe this continually in order that he may not bear the judgment, as I have said.

Chapter 14

[Borrowed from (32) Mamas [14]; differences in boldface]

Concerning the fact that the superior has it in his power to appoint also other officials

Regarding other offices, too, which the other monasteries usually have, I wish people to be appointed to them in the monastery as the occasion demands, if the monastery should perhaps expand by the will of God and there is an urgent need. Our wish concerning these matters, and our approbation and counsel and injunction, must be inviolate and immutable, since they are for your advantage and soul's salvation and security and everyone's tranquility.

Chapter 15

[Borrowed from (32) Mamas [15]; differences in boldface]

Concerning the fact that all the things that have been explicitly stated in the present typikon must remain immutable and unchangeable forever

For surely the present typikon shall remain permanent and inviolate forever, not admitting of any addition, or subtraction, or of alteration. For it is our wish that any of the things that have been prescribed in it never be transgressed by you or admit of any alteration or change by anyone whatsoever, even if far better ordinances and regulations should be introduced either by the superior himself or by the protector of the monastery, even if they perhaps seem to have in view the [monastery's] benefit. [p. 732]

Chapter 16

[Borrowed from (32) Mamas [16]; differences in boldface]

Concerning the reading of the present typikon at the refectory for all to hear

In addition to everything this, too, must be observed no less than the other things, if not even more, as both the source and reason for the unabated observance of the things that have been prescribed and utter strengthening of the monastery. Let the typikon be read, therefore, so as to be listened to by all the members of the monastery six times a year, that is, every two months. Beyond these let it be read also on my commemoration on the day on which I shall depart from the body, in order that, by the continuous reading of it, the things that have been prescribed may be more permanent and indelible.

This, of course, you must observe most carefully, not as our legislations, but as divine laws that are inviolable and unchangeable, and not only must you, my fathers and brothers, not be disheartened or vexed with such precepts and admonitions but reasonably even rejoice and exult because, having been relieved from all concern, you will have one undistracted occupation, [namely,] the concern and care for your soul's salvation.

Chapter 17

[Borrowed from (32) Mamas [17]; differences in boldface]

Concerning the procedure and order to be followed at the refectory and concerning the food of the monks on the ordinary days and concerning the three fasts

It should be the right time to mention the table and food and the other things that supply nourishment to the body. For neither will the soul ever be well without the latter's suitable nourishments, I mean prayer and chanting and reading of the sacred scriptures, nor, indeed, will the body be sustained or would render assistance to the [soul's] divine ministrations without the things that are of necessity useful to it. Therefore, after the customary collation has taken place in the holy church, after completion of the divine liturgy, all should gather and sit waiting for the summons to the table which is given by the striking of the semantron. When the semantron has been struck, then beginning [to recite] the customary psalm audibly, walk to the refectory, [p. 733] that is the superior and all those without exception who have been instructed to sit down at the table during the first sitting. Then entering the refectory and completing the aforementioned psalm and the short prayer that accompanies it, they should sit down in the order laid down by the superior and gratefully partake of what has been set before them.

Moreover, the reading from the sacred scriptures must take place during the meals, as ordered by the superior, with no one making a noise nor causing a disturbance nor destroying the benefit which comes from that with worldly conversations and idle chatter. The superior only may speak sparingly if he wishes and perhaps the one asked by him may answer similarly in a few brief phrases, if possible. When, however, the superior is not present, prevented perhaps by weakness of the body or even some other reason, the steward in his stead shall fulfill the things that ought to be done by him. If the latter is not present, the ecclesiarch shall fulfill these duties.

33. HELIOU BOMON

So then, after the monks have got up from the table, there should be a second sitting of loaves and courses set out, whatever has been set out for the first sitting, and those who served should eat.

At the midday meal on the ordinary day your food will be on Tuesday, Thursday, Saturday and Sunday two dishes, and sometimes even three, of fish and cheese and legumes, as the superior should order; while on Monday two [dishes] of legumes cooked with olive oil, and on Wednesday and Friday two dishes of legumes, also cooked with olive oil, and similar vegetables, as the superior should order.

If, however, they wish to keep [the fast] for the sake of [strict adherence] to the canons let them eat dry food these two days, especially, if not “God is the Lord” (Ps. 117 [118]:27) but “Alleluia” should be sung. Let them also drink wine, because of their weakness, [distributed] with the customary measure of wine. If, on the other hand, a feast of the Lord or even that of the supremely holy Mother of God occurs also on these [days], I mean Wednesday and Friday, let them eat fish, too, and unless there should be a refreshment [offered] by others, the superior himself should take care of this. Your drink on all the ordinary days will be of the larger measure. Whenever the superior decides and especially on the feast days and the commemorations, let also the customary blessing [treat of wine] be given. [p. 734] However, at supper on the same days bread and vegetables and fruits that are in season or any other thing will be set out for you at the discretion of the superior; and the drink will be distributed with the larger measure in accordance with the rule.

Chapter 18

[Borrowed from (32) Mamas [18]; differences in boldface]

Concerning the food of the monks during the three fasts

While such is the case on the ordinary days of the year, that is not the procedure during the holy fast days and especially during the first and greatest fast, on the first day of which, that is, the Monday of the first week, the liturgy should not be celebrated nor should care be taken with the table or food. However, on the subsequent days of the same week attention should be paid to the table, and whoever chooses should partake of food. This will be composed of legumes soaked in water and perhaps some raw vegetables and fruits, and the drink will be wine, distributed with the half measure. For, since those who chant are very few and the office is long, if they drink water only, they would be able neither to chant more sonorously nor, indeed, perform more easily the continuous bending of the knees and for this reason there is need for a moderate concession even if it is contrary to the standards of the sacred canons. This shall be the case up to Saturday; for on this [day] one must eat boiled vegetables and shellfish, even twice a day, and drink with the customary large measure of wine. But if a refreshment is provided by someone of the Christ-loving persons, you shall be feasted also with fish.⁸

That way you should carry out the first week of the holy and great Lent, whereas on all the Saturdays and the Sundays of the same holy fast two or three cooked dishes with olive oil should be set out for you and for your drink the customary large measure of wine should be distributed. The same thing should take place also on Wednesday in the middle of Lent and on the Thursday of the great canon. But on Tuesdays, however, [you must eat] boiled beans, black olives, and other such things; and on Thursdays two cooked dishes, both containing olive oil, will be set out for you. Whereas on Mondays, Wednesdays, and Fridays, [you shall eat] legumes soaked in water and raw vegetables, and, moreover, walnuts and dried figs and other such things; [p. 735] the drink, certainly, throughout the whole week, apart from Saturday and Sunday, ought to be given with the customary two-thirds.

But if the commemoration of the discovery of the precious head of [St. John the] Forerunner or of the feast of the Annunciation⁹ should happen to fall on Tuesday or Thursday or Saturday or Sunday [you] must be feasted with fish and be given a share of wine measured out with the larger measure.

If, on the other hand, the commemoration of the holy Forty Martyrs¹⁰ should happen to fall on the aforementioned days, you shall be feasted with shellfish and the wine shall be [distributed] with the larger measure. Therefore, throughout all the other days of the holy Lent you will not be allowed at all to eat fish, unless a refreshment perhaps should be sent by some Christ-loving person on Saturday or Sunday.

When the feast of the Annunciation falls, you should celebrate it as splendidly as possible, partaking of fish provided by the monastery and drinking wine of the larger measure. You will eat fish during this holy feast, as has been said, if it does not fall during the great holy week. For at that time you will use only shellfish, and receive a refreshment because of the feast since for three days of that week—that is Monday, Tuesday, and Wednesday—it is right to live content with some legumes soaked in water, raw vegetables, fruits that happen to be at hand, and you shall drink also half a measure of wine on account of your fatigue.

If, however, [it should fall] either on Holy Wednesday or on Good Friday or even on Holy Saturday itself, on Holy Wednesday and on Good Friday you shall be satisfied with boiled legumes and vegetables with olive oil and you shall partake also of wine with the greater measure, but, if on Holy Saturday, let all anxiety that produces distraction be absent; for you shall not break the fast of Holy Saturday because of the feast [of the Annunciation].

In accordance with the ecclesiastical canons, we have been taught to fast from everything on [Holy Saturday] alone, and we must especially observe the regulations of the divine fathers. On Holy Thursday, therefore, when we do not celebrate the Annunciation, eating will be as on Thursdays of the other weeks of Lent and the wine shall be [given out] with the larger measure.

On Good Friday, however, unless the aforementioned feast occurs [on it], no cooking is to be done at all, but you are to partake of some raw vegetables and fruits, and wine distributed with the larger measure because of your weariness from the vigil.

On Holy and great Saturday there should be only a collation in accordance with the traditional custom. [The monks], however, will enter the refectory for the sake of quietude and have a collation there in accordance with the traditional form and custom, even if [p. 736] the feast of our wholly undefiled Mistress and Mother of God should occur [on it].

In this manner your diet for the period of the holy and great Lent should be kept, though care should be shown to the sick at the discretion of the superior. On the aforesaid holy great fast, however, apart from a great emergency, the monks should not go out of the monastery at all except the officials alone.

The procedure for the fast of the Holy Apostles¹¹ will be laid down immediately next. After the completion of the whole canonical office of the hours and the divine liturgy as the synaxarion prescribes in detail, you should be summoned to the refectory at the seventh hour in accordance with the rule laid down above, at which on Tuesday and Thursday two or three dishes cooked with olive oil shall be served and wine will be drunk of the larger measure. On Mondays, Wednesdays, and Fridays let them eat dry food and let wine be given with the larger measure. Let the superior, however, have it in his power to provide refreshments and concessions whenever, in fact, he wishes. On Saturdays and Sundays, on the other hand, let them partake also of fish supplied from the house, unless a refreshment should be provided by someone, and on all these days, even on Wednesdays and Fridays themselves, the wine, too, shall be [served] with the larger measure. But on all of them let also a supper be served of bread and raw vegetables and fruits that are in season and wine with the larger measure on account of the burning heat and dryness of the season. But, if there should be any refreshment even on another day apart from Wednesday and Friday, they must partake even then of fish, thanking God.

33. HELIOU BOMON

The fast of the Holy Nativity of Christ¹² will be similar to that of the Holy Apostles in both food and drink, after the completion of the course of the whole canonical office according to the synaxarion. It will differ from it in one thing only, [namely], that you eat once. For your food should be set out for you at the ninth hour during the period of the fast, as has been said; and it will always be a fast when “God is the Lord” (Ps. 117 [118]:27) is not sung at matins but “Alleluia.”

Chapter 19

[Borrowed from (32) Mamas [19]; differences in boldface]

Concerning the fact that without reservations one is to eat cheese and eggs during the entire week prior to the week of Meatfare on account of the heresy of the Artzibourians, and that even every day the farmers, [p. 737] the gardeners, the vine-dressers, and simply all, apart from those who habitually are in attendance, are to come together at the refectory

But a specific thing which I almost bypassed, must be committed to writing because it is necessary and it separates us from the loathsome tradition of the Artzibourians.¹³ Since in the week before the Meatfare week the Artzibourians received the tradition to eat nothing else except bread and water, we, in order that we may be differentiated from their heresy, unhesitatingly eat both cheese and eggs throughout this entire week, and we likewise observe this, during the entire week of Cheesefare because of another heresy.¹⁴

However, both the farmers and our fellow-brethren who take care of the vineyards and the gardens and the brothers who pursue the art of fishing ought without fail to come also to the first table sitting each day, likewise all the other ministrants, apart from those in attendance, and in common to enjoy the bounties of God in order that the name “brotherhood” may not be just a name, but that it may become a reality through deeds. If however, some of the brothers, because they have been sent for service or have gone off even on some personal business with the knowledge of the father [superior], delay thereupon, and return perhaps after the midday meal or even supper, whatever, was distributed to the other brothers during the day at the table must be given without diminution to them, too.

The monasteries have a tradition, as we learn, that on the holy and venerable Dormition of our supremely holy Mistress,¹⁵ the Mother of God, when the brothers are having their meal at the refectory, they eat also grapes previously blessed at the church by the priest who holds the daily service. This tradition also must be observed. If, in fact, anyone of the brothers should be detected as having taken a taste of grapes before this feast, he shall suffer in consequence the penalty of disobedience and shall not partake of them at all until the Exaltation of the precious Cross.¹⁶ Liable, however, to the same penalty shall be also anyone of the brothers working in the vineyards who shall disregard this a commandment.¹⁷ At the refectory, however, twice or even three times a week after the feast, grapes shall be served up until the time of the vintage; [p. 738] but when figs and melons and other fruits are in season, they shall partake of them also almost every day, if they have any.

TWELFTH CENTURY

Chapter 20

[Borrowed from (32) Mamas [20]; differences in boldface]

Concerning the fact that the monks are not to eat secretly, and concerning poverty

But I introduce the matter concerning abstinence from secret eating and drinking. Avoid this to the utmost of your power, continually keeping in mind the fact that in the beginning disobedient eating made us subject to death and deprived us of life in paradise when the devil, the wicked author of evil, introduced it, who from that time right up to the present has not ceased suggesting to those who take up war against him like an ancient weapon the secret and forbidden tasting of some food or drink. Not only does he suggest it but advocates secret tasting saying that it is a natural action and blameless. But you, my brothers and fathers, do not be ignorant of his intentions, looking away to the result of his advice namely the transgression of a command.

So that you may easily surmount this trap of the Evil One, we are imposing on you the poverty which can be of the greatest service, and preserving this you would without effort escape the danger of secret eating. For what would the person who has nothing taste? So then, practice poverty not only in unattainable and superfluous things but also in food and drink to the smallest amount.

For this reason, accordingly, we instruct also the superior to enter into your cells, whenever he wishes, and to examine them and to allow you to have nothing more than the things allowed by the cenobitic rule.

Chapter 21

[Borrowed from (32) Mamas [21]; differences in boldface]

Concerning the fact that one is not to be absent, except for illness or other reasonable cause, from the ecclesiastical office

But above all I entreat you, my spiritual fathers and brothers, that no one be absent from the ecclesiastical office either during the daytime and night time doxologies or during the vigils that are usually performed. For, if, in fact, anyone should be absent in consequence of sloth and negligence and not because of illness, which, of course can attract forgiveness, let such a person know that, if after a first and second and third admonition he abides in his sloth, he shall have in consequence as his just penalty the eating of dry food and the drinking of water only on the day on which this offense should be committed by him. Those, however, who perhaps are occupied with certain [p. 739] tasks or wrestle with bodily illnesses, as I have stated, shall not be subjected to the censure of this sort. For it is necessary to show consideration for the illnesses and the labors of men.

33. HELIOU BOMON

Chapter 22

[Borrowed from (32) Mamas [22]; differences in boldface]

Concerning how those who enter must be tonsured and after how much time

We must, moreover, speak in fuller detail about those who come to the monastery for the purpose of being tonsured. If they are distinguished people or people known to you for a long time and have close knowledge of the monastery's way of life and regime they should be tonsured after a period of six months if perhaps they themselves ask for this and are accepted. But if they are common and unknown, after an interval of seven days after their arrival at the monastery, they should assume the [novice's] rags and put on the monastic headdress, and they should be appointed to proper tasks and observed to see if they carry out these with perseverance, eagerness and humility. If they persevere in this attitude for up to a period of two years, then they should receive the pledge of the divine and angelic habit, that is to say, the cloak. But if they perhaps appear to have grown tired, grumbling and being negligent about instructions, it will be the responsibility of the superior [to decide about them].

Those who have been judged worthy to be accepted should not be put under any compulsion concerning a renunciation and an entrance offering. But if the one who is to be tonsured himself willingly chooses to offer something to God and his wholly undefiled Mother, it should be accepted, as we said above. But so much concerning those who are tonsured in the monastery.

One should, however, consider also those who come from a different [monastery] for the purpose of making a beginning in it. Let him, therefore, who has been chosen by the monastery to be admitted as a monk spend only eight days in it for the purpose of seeing it and its regimen. If, indeed, he is obviously pleased, let him make a confession to the superior. Then, while the trisagion is being performed in the church, he must present his head to the superior, bowed and uncovered, and, as the superior makes the sign of the precious cross over it, he reverently says approximately the following, "May the grace of the all-Holy Spirit, brother, through the prayers of our fathers, grant you power and strength to complete well and pleasingly to God the beginning which you made for the edification and salvation of your soul." Thereupon let the superior give him the kiss in the Lord and successively likewise all the brothers. Let him, however, make a prostration to the brothers, saying, "Pray for me, fathers and brothers, that God may grant me perseverance," and, after the brothers have answered, [p. 740] "May God grant you, brother, perseverance in every good work," he shall be enrolled in the brotherhood. For in no other way shall anyone be numbered among the brothers of our monastery unless, along with the confession, this ceremony takes place in exactly the same way.

Chapter 23

[Borrowed from (32) Mamas [23]]

Exhortation concerning the fact that all those who serve are to apply themselves thoroughly to their services and not to despise them in any way

TWELFTH CENTURY

I entreat all those who carry out offices in the monastery, from the first down to even the last, to apply themselves to their offices wholeheartedly since they expect no small recompense from them. As regards those among them who are unlettered, the diligence and care they show in their office will be totally sufficient as their defense before God and us, but we exhort those who are educated but are perhaps prevented by the busy nature of their office from carrying out the daily cycle of prayers and from meeting with the brothers in the services not to be neglectful or despairing, as if they had lost the benefit to themselves, but be more cheerful and joyful because the Lord has given them the strength to serve their brothers in imitation of him, who said, "I came not to be served but to serve and to lay down my life as a ransom for many" (Matt. 20:28).

You see, my friends, what work you perform, you see whom you imitate. You see that you are putting into practice the greatest of all good, love. Why then do you grieve and are sorrowful when you miss the service? Do you not think that you are laying down your own lives for many like my Master, Christ, so that you may bring comfort to your brothers? So, you should be happy and rejoice because you yourselves are accomplishing each day by your work what could scarcely be achieved by those who devote themselves to prayer. You are blessed in that occupation and to be envied. For prayer is indeed a fine thing, a very fine thing, bringing us into contact with God and raising us from earth to heaven, but love is of course greater and much more important. For the former is a part of virtue and an element and section of the whole body of sanctification that brings perfection, but love is its crown and consummation. For joined to itself it displays humility that exalts (cf. Matt. 23:12), mercy, and love of mankind, because of which God indeed became man and through which man is revealed as God.

So why do you give up the treasure house and culmination of all these good things [and run to what is inferior when thus having reached to the summit] easily you should hold on to it [p. 741] securely and do everything so as not to be thrown down from it? "We are afraid", they say, "because of our failure to carry out the rule;" but do not be afraid, for sincere confession will make up to your failure in this, justly granting you pardon. Fear this, be on your guard against this; but if this is not the case, then rejoice, I beg you attending to your offices eagerly.

Chapter 24

[Borrowed from (32) Mamas [24]]

Concerning respect to the superior and deference, that is, bowing [to him]

When one is about (for even these precepts are necessary to those who live in a cenobitic monastery) to go out of the monastery at all either for the sake of some task or because of personal need, let him not go out of the monastery before he receives a blessing from the superior. Likewise let him neither depart to the bath without an obeisance [to the superior], nor, indeed, have his hair cut or his vein opened.¹⁸ Let him also who is about to sound the semantron [for prayers] and those who have been chosen to perform the sacred rites and the chanters and the precentors and simply everyone before [he starts] his work receive a blessing from him. For he who wishes to obey the apostolic regulations must do nothing at all without the knowledge and consent of the superior but in all things follow his orders, nay rather also render to him the honor that befits him, so as never to pass him by without bowing to him, whether one shall meet him on the road or should see him emerging.¹⁹ Whether one is summoned by him or even of one's own accord should go to him for the sake of a request regarding some need, let him beforehand make an obeisance and, folding his hands together, let him stand thus.

33. HELIOU BOMON

Chapter 25

[Borrowed from (32) Mamas [25]; differences in boldface]

A broader exhortation concerning the fact that those who live the monastic life in the monastery of my supremely holy Mother of God must pursue the cenobitic way of life even if it happens that the entire income of the monastery is reduced to the sufficiency of two monks

Although the way of life of the monks and the whole organization of life in the monastery was already discussed above briefly,²⁰ it will be discussed again, compatible with what has been clearly stated and declared by the divine fathers with regard to those who have renounced the world. For they decided and laid it down that [p. 742] those who fled from the very stormy world and took refuge in the calm harbor of monastic life should enter upon a cenobitic way of life, and renouncing their own will give themselves up to a life of submission, seeing that they need a helmsman and guide as they direct the blind eye of their soul this way and that and are not able to help themselves through their ignorance of goodness.

Therefore obeying these men, we wish that the monks under [our authority] in the venerable monastery of my supremely holy Mother of God live in a cenobitic constitution and way of life and that the rule of this constitution should always be in force in it unaltered and unbroken, not perverted or altered in any way, nor altered for any reason or pretext whatsoever, neither because of wealth or poverty, neither because of shortage or abundance, nor any other specious reason or pretext whatsoever, but the cenobitic constitution and way of life should be completely preserved in every way unbroken for ever, even if the whole revenue of the monastery should be reduced to being sufficient for two monks—which I pray will not happen.

If one of the superiors wishes the opposite, the monks are to oppose him; but, if the monks wish the opposite, the superior should resist them. If they all were to agree, the protector of the monastery should defend what I have laid down; and if he also were to consort with them, we grant permission to anyone who wishes, to strive for a pious matter and go to court on behalf of goodness itself and the reward for it, and seek to make our instructions effective and drive from the monastery those responsible for the abolition of the cenobitic way of life, and not to think this a small achievement but a very great one that brings salvation.

Chapter 26

[Borrowed from (32) Mamas [26]; differences in boldface]

Concerning the fact that there must neither be kelliotai nor imposed guests in the monastery

It is my wish that there should be neither kelliotai nor imposed guests at all within the original monastery of my supremely holy Mother of God. In fact we forbid this completely. But it is my wish that even those who are now living as kelliotai in its dependency in the imperial city [of Constantinople] also change over to the cenobitic way of life for many reasons. If, however, anyone who is from a more exalted station in life shall wish to come to the monastery and to cast off his worldly hair in it or perhaps [p. 743] should enter as one who has already been ton-sured and if he should be unable to change suddenly from the more luxurious way of life to the more harsh and should perhaps have need of a servant and some small modification and concession so that neither the regimen of the cenobitic monastery may be relaxed completely, nor, indeed, anyone who comes to it be sent away, the superior shall be permitted, if he wishes, to make concessions to the one who enters the [monastery] and to allow the latter even to have a servant, who is a monk, and a comfort such as [the superior's] sagacity should determine, especially if the one who enters it benefits the monastery either through his rank or an offering or even both.

TWELFTH CENTURY

They, too, however, ought to maintain the cenobitic way of life; for in no way whatsoever is it our wish that the appellation of "kelliotēs" be used in the monastery, whether one should be of a distinguished station in life or should abound in much wealth and in consequence present an offering that is both lavish and prodigious or make a promise with reference to bringing in certain specified provisions from outside the monastery. For this is appalling to the patristic regulations and to our wish.

Who would send an imposed guest to a monastery that is independent and is ruled by the mighty hand alone of the Lord and his wholly unblemished Mother, who ineffably and beyond reason had conceived him, the holy Virgin and Mother of God, as the inviolate patriarchal memorandum²¹ belonging to it proves? No one would ever wish this, he would not be so foolish as to violate the promulgated written decrees of [the monastery's] independence, unless he wishes altogether to render God, "who is mighty in wars," (Sir. 46:1) openly hostile to himself.

Chapter 27

[Borrowed from (32) Mamas [27]; differences in boldface]

Concerning the fact that women are not to come into the monastery nor laymen dwell within it

This, too, is one of the indispensable things, that the monastery never be entered by women, except perchance rarely for the sake of the burial or commemoration of those who are close relatives by blood to them. But they, too, as soon as they will have completed the funeral or the annual [p. 744] rites for the deceased, shall depart immediately from the monastery in the course of the same day.

But surely neither during the days of Eastertide, nor on the other feasts of God, except only of the Dormition shall entrance in the monastery be permitted to them. Indeed we prefer that not even any laymen at all have their residences within the monastery, but that the area within the monastery be allotted as a kind of God-planted paradise to those alone who practice asceticism, so that any cause for offense may not arise therefrom.

Chapter 28

[Borrowed from (32) Mamas [28]; differences in boldface]

Concerning the clothing of the monks and concerning the price of a bath and soap

Concerning, indeed, clothes and footwear and various other bodily cover of the monks it is my wish that there be given to each of them anything he needs in accordance with the cenobitic pursuit and regimen which has been traditional from long ago. Inasmuch, however, as contention accompanies, as it often does, the distributions of this sort, and it is one of the most troublesome things to satisfy the pleasure and wish of each, I considered it better that the items of clothing be supplied to each of the brothers through the use of money, putting an end to contentions and grumblings even in this matter.

33. HELIOU BOMON

Therefore, there shall be given to each of the brothers, from the highest to the lowest, to all of them equally, except for the old men who do not toil, for the latter ought to be subject to the discretion of the superior, a hyperpyron and a half each in each six-month period for everything except the commemorations. Beyond these there ought to be given each year one thick outer garment to each of those who carry out offices, in the category of whom ought to be included also those who attend to farming and fishing. Every [p. 745] month a sum that is adequate for soap and the price of a bath ought to be given to all of them for the sake of one bath.

Chapter 29

[Borrowed from (32) Mamas [29]; differences in boldface]

Concerning the confession of the monks, and concerning the fact that all are to have the superior as a spiritual father

Our common enemy and foe, who, according to the great apostle (1 Pet. 5:8; Ps. 21[22]:13), “goes about like a lion seeking whom he should devour,” knowing precisely that confession snatches away from the middle of his throat those who are about to be devoured, sets in motion all his wiles and contrivances so as to strip whomever he can from this great and noble aid, inserting in the practice [of confession] humiliation and shame. But this shame, says the theologian Gregory, is part of the punishment for the sins we confess.²² Let us hasten, therefore, as much as we can, to pull ourselves away from under the punishment in the other world through this salutary and noble aid, I mean, of course, confession. For no one at all should fail to understand how much more painless it is to declare one’s secret to a person, and him a shepherd who is both sympathetic and of like nature, than to be convicted in the presence of the angels and the whole race of mankind and God himself.

It is our wish, therefore, that the whole assembly of brothers disclose to the superior the bruises of the soul they have suffered or the foul thoughts themselves that spring up in them as human beings, and that all have him as a common and spiritual father, even if perhaps he happens to be unordained, because he has assuredly the permission from the most holy and ecumenical patriarch, having been empowered to apply also the remedy that is suitable to each illness. For thoughts are wounds of the soul that are inflicted by the evil demon, who ensnares our life. A wound, however, when it is revealed immediately and receives the medical treatment that is suitable and appropriate, is easily healed; but, when it is kept concealed and becomes chronic, it causes putrefaction and generates a stench and becomes difficult to heal.

It is, therefore, exceedingly helpful to have the physician close by. But, if it is disagreeable to anyone, a thing which seems to me unreasonable, to have one’s own father also as a physician, let him tell his father in secret his own purpose [p. 746] and the latter will take care to send him off to whomever the superior himself wishes or even to one of the priests of the monastery, who is both more devout and more aged. I made a great concession in writing this since the subordinate [monk] has no right at all as I learn from the patristic traditions not to have the superior as a spiritual father.

TWELFTH CENTURY

Chapter 30

[Borrowed from (32) Mamas [30]; differences in boldface]

Exhortation regarding the fact that the brothers are to confess unhesitatingly and honestly

It is good to say even to you yourselves what is proper. So then you, my brothers and fathers, seeing the superior hurrying off to this good ministry which is very beneficial to your souls, you should run, and running reach with eagerness this very calm harbor that is safe for your souls, and reveal completely without any covering up every stirring of your mind and every thought that harms your soul, as though you are making your confession in the presence of God and not a man. But the one who sets out to lie to God will always get his punishment. For the psalmist says “Thou wilt destroy all that speak falsehood” (Ps. 5:6). So then, by confessing without deceit and ridding your minds of all wrangling, all confusion and trouble, you may be happy and rejoice, having gained this good hope namely that you will not fail to gain salvation. But make your confession without accusing each other when perhaps a violent dispute or some other argument occurs. Do not make your confession if you consider yourselves blameless and you are looking really for condemnations, nor should you speak about the bodily needs which afflict you. If you must speak of some violent dispute, be keen to ascribe and assign to yourselves all the blame and reason for the fault, whatever it is. But if you speak about some other passions, reveal these completely so that you can gain double benefit from this, by both attaining sound health of soul and clothing yourself in exalting humility, for possessing this we will actually be like God who says, “Learn from me that I am gentle and lowly in heart” (Matt. 11:29). What else would be a clearer proof of gentleness and humility in heart than clearly to bear all affliction nobly and blame oneself in everything? The true confession without which I do not think anyone gains salvation is the cause of so many good things.

Chapter 31

[Borrowed from (32) Mamas [31]; differences in boldface]

Concerning the third and the sixth hour and their office

When the semantron then, is struck at the time [p. 747] that is proper, all must assemble in the narthex and there sing together the third and sixth hours. At the beginning, however, of the sixth hour the priest who has priestly duties of the day must make a genuflection to the superior, and enter into the holy sanctuary to prepare this divine oblation. So much about the third and the sixth hour.

Chapter 32

[Borrowed from (32) Mamas [32]; differences in boldface]

Concerning the divine mystery and which of the brothers and how and when they ought to partake of the divine elements

It is necessary now also to speak about the divine mystery, which must of necessity be celebrated, if not every day, at least four times weekly without postponement, apart from the feasts of the Lord. But you yourselves must be sure to take care in this, my brothers, because what is performed there is divine and fearful, and because there more than in anything else the fearful and very great mystery of our orthodox faith is accomplished; I mean the most divine and most precious sacrifice of the completely undefiled body and blood of our Lord and God and Savior Jesus Christ.

33. HELIOU BOMON

So during it, my brothers, as has been said, you must pay strict attention, and as far as possible chase from you every thought that is sown by the devil, impure, and unworthy of that fearful celebration, and purify yourselves in every way. Then as many as allowed by the superior should partake of the divine elements. For it will not be possible for any of you to partake freely and in a thoughtless manner, nor during every consecration.

This we would indeed wish, for to partake often of the divine elements is to share in life, as Christ himself says, "He who eats my flesh and drinks my blood abides in me, and I in him" (John 6:56) and again, "Unless you eat my flesh and drink my blood, you have no life in you" (John 6:53), and as the divine apostle says, "He who is united to the Lord becomes one spirit" (I Cor. 6:17), and as the most gentle David says conversely "They that remove themselves far from thee shall perish" (Ps. 72 [73]: 27).

Therefore we would indeed wish this, [p. 748] as has been said, but because of human weakness and the danger of the action we do not allow it, for "Whoever eats the body and drinks the blood of the Lord unworthily is guilty of his body and blood" (I Cor. 11:27) says Paul, the divine apostle. This statement is frightening, my brothers, and causes not only sinners like me but also those who are very confident in themselves to fear partaking.

So then as many as are sure that they are pure and free from disgraceful thoughts and submission to them, from anger and grumbling, grief and denigration, deceit and disorderly laughter, furthermore, bearing of grudge and irritation, disgraceful talk and such things, should partake of communion once a week. But those who fall prey to the aforementioned passions and hasten to a renunciation of them through confession and repentance should partake of communion once a month or even once in two months at the discretion of the superior of course, for he should be in charge of such matters.

But for someone to consider himself unworthy of communion without his knowledge cannot be approved. For he who does this will be condemned as someone fulfilling his own wish. However, those who should partake of communion must to the best of their ability read more attentively the prayers laid down for the partaking, make a common genuflection together to one another to grant forgiveness, and thus to partake gratefully of the life-giving consecrated elements. So let these things be carried out in this way.

Chapter 33

[Borrowed from (32) Mamas [34]; differences in boldface]

Precise instruction concerning the fact that all are to have the same food and drink, with reference also to the care of the sick, and to the fact that the [monks] are not permitted to have servants or domestics

Before God and the supremely holy Mistress and Mother of God, we give you this instruction that you should all have the same food and drink and that there should never be any difference in anything ever for anyone, but you will all, those who are advanced in age and virtue and celebrity of life and those who are inferior to the latter in these qualities, use for food the same things.

TWELFTH CENTURY

For you should only help and take care as is possible of those who are clearly afflicted with illness, and for this reason perhaps need better food and drink to sustain their weak and unfortunate bodies. For I think that this shows discernment and preserves the conscience of everyone else free of offense. [p. 749]

We must, therefore, allow, with the knowledge of the superior, those who are weary because of illness that has fallen upon them, to rest in their own cells and there to partake of nourishment that is suitable and appropriate for their illness, to whom, the one who would be ordered by the superior will render service in all things, both food and drink and the other necessities. But our sick brothers emboldened by this should not cast off self-restraint by seeking for extra things, but they should restrain and control themselves, being satisfied only with those things which the circumstances of the season and the resources of the monastery and superior's lenient judgment provide for them.

If, however, the illness is serious and lasts for many days, let the superior in the face of necessity be free to go to those who share [authority] in the hospitals with the request that he who needs medical care be given a bed. Whenever a brother has been given a bed there and is being treated medically, his food must be provided by the monastery in order that he may not defame it because he is distressed in some respect, because what is given him in the hospital is not adequate.

It will not be possible for you to have servants nor domestics who render services, but each shall serve himself and, in turn, one another, the young one him who is advanced [in age], and the novice him who entered the arena earlier, and the stronger one him who is weaker, according, of course, to the superior's orders. For thus the Master's commandment will be fulfilled and the law of love will be observed unimpaired.

Chapter 34

[Borrowed from (32) Mamas [35]]

Concerning the fact that those who come together in manual labors are not to talk idly and concerning the fact that they are not to have acquisitions and concerning the fact that they are not to steal from the monastery

If any of your number should gather on some manual task or other service and amuse themselves with idle conversations—for this is usual at gatherings—and then turn to disgraceful talk—for “by a multitude [p. 750] of words,” he says, “thou shalt not escape sin” (Prov. 10:19)—they should not reject the admonition of the superior. For we instruct him to do this in love and persuade them to give up topics which harm the soul, and either discuss matters from Holy Scripture or be silent. “For,” the author of the Book of Proverbs says, “If thou refrain thy lips, thou wilt be prudent” (Prov. 10:19) and discreet.

Also those who happen to be on a journey whether [by land] or sea and are afflicted in the same way should be cured with the same medicine by the [superior]. Furthermore, they are not to resort to mutual rebuking or verbal sparring. For he who does such a thing will be liable to excommunication, and if he does not repent and beg for forgiveness “with a contrite heart” (Ps. 50 [51]:17) he will be punished—for we prefer that you should always be loving and peaceful towards one another and, instead of anything that provokes quarrels, learn to say “Bless and forgive [me], brother.”

33. HELIOU BOMON

Furthermore, those who form idle gatherings and visit one another with no good reason, without any pressing cause, or the knowledge of the superior, especially after compline, when they are admonished and do not desist, they will be punished.

Those who acquire some possessions contrary to the rule of the monastery, without the knowledge of the superior, will be liable to punishment. But the person who purloins anything from the monastery and does not make amends after a first and second admonition and up to the seventh will be expelled completely.

Chapter 35

[Borrowed from (32) Mamas [36]]

Concerning the fact that one is not to seek at all a seat of honor

We refuse even to hear at all that someone of his own accord seeks after a loftier seat or the ensuing honor. For how could this be acceptable, that men who are living according to God’s will should quarrel at all about seating, like those who are keen to show themselves in a worldly way superior to everyone else in this, as those who are excited by glory that is vain and hated by God? For “Everyone that is proud in heart is an abomination to the Lord” (Prov. 16:5), says Holy Scripture, and “The Lord resists the proud, but he gives grace to the humble” (Prov. 3:34).

So this will not happen among you, it will not. But if any of you is found causing annoyance in this matter, putting forward as an excuse perhaps age or sphere of work, and does not abide by the command of the superior nor is satisfied with the place allocated to him, I command to him that he be allocated the last place and be taught [p. 751] to leave to the world the habits of the world.

But those who have been entrusted with these two primary offices, [namely,] the steward and the ecclesiarch, shall sit ahead of all of them on the one side, while on the other [side] the priests according to their rank of seniority and after the latter, in turn, the deacons, unless the superior should prefer some who are advanced in years or old age or even some who are preeminent in the world, worthy of respect and honor, to sit ahead of the latter, the deacons, that is. After they are seated, however, there shall not be a preference in respect to seating but thereafter the seating will be assigned suitably to each at the discretion of the superior.

Chapter 36

[Borrowed from (32) Mamas [33]; differences in boldface]

Concerning those who have grown old in the monastery or have even undergone some harm

Yet this, too, we both formulate and declare, and I believe not without reason and better purpose, that those who have grown old in the monastery or have otherwise done hard work and undergone some harm or mutilation of the body so as not to be able as a result of this to render service, be they men of learning or, indeed, even illiterate, even if they should be found not to have lived in the monastery for a long time, it is our wish not only that they not be expelled from the monastery but rather that they be taken care of in their old age and be absolved from work, so far as it is possible, by someone of their fellow brothers in the monastery, whomsoever its superior selects. Their food and drink should be equal to that of those who are young and healthy.

I enjoin, for the sake of such a purpose and such a service, all those who are destined to administer in any way whatsoever the affairs of the monastery, both superiors and others, never to set aside or violate or alter this God-loved regulation, so long as, God granting, the monastery exists and monks live in it, unless he who shall attempt such a thing wishes to provoke against himself the statement “As you did it not to one of the least of these my brothers, you did it not to me” (Matt. 25:45).

Chapter 37

[Borrowed from (32) Mamas [37]; differences in boldface]

That all the things that have been registered in the inventory made by us are to be inalienable; so must also be the things that will be acquired in any way whatsoever at any time whatsoever

Since in fact the monastery from the beginning had the good fortune to be endowed with sacred vessels, divine offerings and [p. 752] books for the praise of God and of the Mother of God and the illumination of those who practice asceticism in it, all the silver vessels and revered icons and veils and books and bronze items that are seen, an inventory has been made by us, in which are compiled all the things that belong to it from long ago and the things that have been removed from the sacred sacristy of the Great Church [of Hagia Sophia] by me as a representative of the same monastery and have again been deposited through me for the sake of protection in the venerable monastery . . . and the things that are now in the principal monastery and the things that are in its dependency, this inventory²³ was confirmed by me through my customary signature and sealing-instrument and was deposited with our present typikon in the venerable monastery . . . , copies of these [documents] to be produced and remain for ever at the monastery.

Their originals are not to be taken out of the monastery in which they are deposited, without pressing need. When, however, there is a pressing need, these too shall be taken with a receipt, and, after they have been quickly returned, they shall again be deposited in the [monastery] from which they were taken.

Concerning these (things), furthermore, we command that they be absolutely both inalienable and irremovable. He who shall dare to remove from them anything of whatever kind shall be considered sacrilegious and along with Judas shall be referred to eternal punishments, and before [these punishments] may he also inherit [Judas'] noose.

But may no one, whether potentate or magistrate or protector or anyone of those in the monastery, whether superior or subordinate, even think of removing or alienating any of the divine offerings or of the books in it, either large or small, or any other thing whatsoever. Instead let there be more eagerness to make additions and further dedications for the glory of God and for their own considerable benefit. Let this very [rule] be observed also for the things that will be acquired at any time whatsoever, both movable and immovable. [p. 753]

33. HELIOU BOMON

Chapter 38

[Borrowed from (32) Mamas [38]; differences in boldface]

Sworn exhortation to the protector of the monastery at the time

But really care for this my monastery of my supremely holy Mother of God and concern also for the monks who live in it, always lying couched in my soul, persuades me to collect from all quarters the things that are for their benefit. In order, therefore, that they might not be abused by some abusers, as though bereft of human assistance, I adjure by our Lord Jesus Christ the protectors of the monastery at the time, since they can readily help it, that, if, the monks should come to them and present the present simple regulations of the typikon and say that they are being unjustly treated by some, that they proceed against the injustice in accordance with their power and check its impetus and rescue the flock of Christ and the supremely holy Mother of God from the hand of quite cruel men and not to ignore it but support and defend it in accordance with the dictates of law and justice in order that thus they may procure a reward for themselves and have the divine favor because they graciously received the monastery and the monks and deemed them worthy of the proper assistance. For this reason, in fact, we have prescribed that they even be commemorated both while alive and after death.

Chapter 39

[Borrowed from (32) Mamas [39]; differences in boldface]

Concerning the monks who depart to the Lord

Since we must take thought for the monks, not only when they are alive but also when they depart to the Lord, it is necessary to prescribe at this time also about matters concerning the latter. Whenever, then, anyone of the monks should depart from this world, let the customary things done for the dead monk be carried out in the exonarthex, I mean both the singing of psalms and all the clothing of the remains. Then it should be transported to the burial place with the bier and let it be buried in the tombs of the monks on the right side, that is, of the church, in which the brothers alone must be buried, no one of those from the outside being buried with them.

The commemorations on the third, ninth, and fortieth days for the one who has died should be sung in the narthex of the church, and kollyba prepared on those days on his behalf, [p. 754] and let an offering [of Eucharistic bread] be made for each liturgy on his behalf until the fortieth-day commemoration and let him be commemorated. But he should also be remembered at matins and vespers until the aforesaid fortieth day.

His name also must be written on the diptychs and he, too, must be commemorated [in the future] along with the rest. So that a common commemoration of all the brothers may take place, on each Friday after the office of lamp-lighting, unless a feast prevents it, they must sing a canon for the dead in the exonarthex or at the grave and an ektenes should be made for all those who have already departed. Moreover, we urge both the priests and the deacons to consult the diptychs during every liturgy in order to remember those listed on them, so that they may not bear the responsibility for forgetting and omitting them.

Certainly on the Saturday of Meatfare, the Saturday of Cheese fare, and the Saturday of Pentecost let stauria also be made on their behalf and let four of those who have already passed away be commemorated at each staurion. But, if they should be superiors, let individual offerings [of Eucharistic bread] be made and let them, too, be commemorated. Likewise in the commemorations of each one of [the monks] let a liturgy and offering [of Eucharistic bread] be made on his behalf.

TWELFTH CENTURY

Let, however, the commemorations for the superiors be made more generously, especially if some of them should happen to have conducted themselves in a manner worthy of their calling so as to leave behind to their successors certain good advantages. The surviving monks ought to receive on the three Saturdays that have been indicated, that is, of Meatfare week, Cheesefare week, and the Saturday before Pentecost, each one of them one staurion apiece for the commemoration of their own parents and relatives, and, after the stauria have been offered, they should be assembled by the gatekeeper and a distribution should take place at the gate.

Chapter 40

[Borrowed from (32) Mamas [41]]

Reasons for which the present rule of the typikon was set forth, and a prayer concerning the fact that the items in it are to be preserved inviolate, and a most horrible curse against him who shall attempt to proceed towards the annulment of the present rule

The things, then, that I have previously stated have presented quite clearly the circumstances that made necessary the composition of the present typikon. For the rule and constitution of the cenobitic monasteries, if they should be left unexamined [p. 755] and not be guided by the proper control of reason, would collapse not before long. May the Triune God keep preserving inviolable up to the end of the present world all the things that have been formulated in order that thus the flock of Christ may be called light, in accordance with the statements of the gospels, (Matt. 5:14) and through it yet others also might be brought to edification.

May it be a truly chosen flock that heeds the voice of him who calls to life and by its examples be able to instruct many souls of men that see its correct way of life as a marvelous example. Let him, however, who shall even attempt to proceed towards the annulment of the present lifesaving rule of the typikon in addition to not being listened to, be also alien to the hope of the Christians, because he has wanted to overturn and violently shake this peace-loving rule that has been established for the benefit of my fathers and brothers.

Chapter 41

[Borrowed from (32) Mamas [42]; differences in boldface]

Instruction to the superior: how he ought to be disposed towards the brotherhood

You, spiritual father and guide of this holy flock of my Mother of God, be moderate and fair with the brothers, and in your concern maintain in everything a fatherly affection for them. And I entreat you, care for them all, have concern for them all, forbear with them all, support them instructing, advising, teaching, comforting, healing the sick, supporting the weak, encouraging the faint-hearted, restoring those who sin, forgiving “seventy times seven” (Matt. 18:22) in accordance with the word of Our Lord. For it is better that we, who are imitating the Lord himself, be judged considerate [even though] a little remiss in what we ought to do, than by maintaining utmost righteousness we be condemned as heartless and haters of our brothers. Also, to omit the rest, St. Basil says “And the superior himself, as a father caring for true children, will watch over the needs of each one and will bring them suitable healing as far as he can, and will support with love and fatherly affection the member who is truly weak whether spiritually or physically.”²⁴

33. HELIOU BOMON

Chapter 42

[Borrowed from (32) Mamas [43]; differences in boldface]

Sworn order to him from a different [monastery] who is perhaps about to hold the office of superior

I adjure, by the Lord God and by my supremely holy Mistress and Mother of God, [p. 756] you who from a different monastery are about to hold the office of superior in accordance with what has been prescribed above in our monastery not to bring into the monastery with yourself more than one brother, and him in the role of a disciple, as it were, from either intimates or acquaintances which you have. For, if [the new superior] brings over more, many are the improprieties that will spring up from this. For it is inferred from this that those whom he himself will bring in from the outside he considers as genuine sons, while those whom he will find in the monastery he views as illegitimate, which is one of the most improper things. From this, offense and distrust is caused. But those rather he ought to consider as genuine and exceedingly beloved whom he will find in the monastery, who will both receive and honor him. [These brothers] he himself, too, has the obligation to honor and relieve in accordance with his ability, even if perhaps as human beings they have acquired certain small defects such as the length of life is disposed by nature to engender, that is to say, idle chatter, coarse jesting, license of tongue and other such things, in order that in him, too, the statement, “He who brings forth the worthy out of the worthless” (cf. Jer. 15:19) and so forth, will be fulfilled.

Chapter 43

[Borrowed from (32) Mamas [44]; differences in boldface]

Exhortation to the monks concerning the fact that they are not to question the superior in the things that he does as he is going to give to God an account of the sins he dared to commit, and that he is to be excommunicated if he does not correct himself

If, then, your superior, brothers, conducts himself thus, as we said above, being both paternally disposed towards you and devoutly and piously tending the flock of my Mother of God, you will not question him in any way nor will you demand an account of how he handles the affairs of the monastery. For this is unworthy and harmful, breeding a great deal of mistrust and producing discord, instability and every other cause for sin.

Neither will the superior himself spend the wealth of the monastery in doing favors for his own relations and friends. For by acting in this way, he will not be taking part in the divine mysteries.²⁵ But if we have judged that he should not be subject to the brothers in an examination of his actions, yet he will not really escape the unerring judge and the reproof of his conscience. Therefore, he should take care not to “fall into the hands of the living God” (Heb. 10:31). For even though we are not capable of imposing on him a penalty appropriate for making unjustifiable and unnecessary payments and bringing about changes in the affairs and property of the monastery, yet he will not escape the fearful judgment of God, which we confer upon him in writing this. But if he is seen to be so fearless and utterly shameless that he does not even fear the condemnation of God, [p. 757] but spends the wealth of the monastery improperly, he will be excommunicated in accordance with the divine and patristic decrees until he refrains from this unlawful action; but, if he corrects himself, he shall be forgiven by God the Ruler of All.

TWELFTH CENTURY

Chapter 44

[Borrowed from (32) Mamas [45]; differences in boldface]

Another exhortation to all the brothers and to the protector himself concerning the fact that they are [not] in any blameworthy way to make both the choice and selection of the superiors, including the fact that one is not to spring upon such an office by his personal rashness and audacity

Having, then, sufficiently treated of both the superior and all the other officials, we must turn our discussion to you, oh my beloved fathers and brothers in the Lord, and to the protector of the flock of the Mother of God and of the monastery itself. I entreat you, therefore, or rather, I instruct you and I call on God and the supremely holy Mother of God as witness of my instructions and overseer of its carrying out that when you are selecting and choosing the superiors there should be no strife, there should be no jealousy, there should be no pointless partiality and irrational favoritism, but correct judgment, an accurate aim and the strict yardstick of justice and truth should come together, and, as if he was observing, he the eye “That beholds all things” (Sir. 15:19) and “searches hearts and reins” (Ps. 7:9). Your selection should take place in that way.

For, if suffering some human failing, you were to produce a faulty judgment, you must consider how far the evil would spread and calculate how many harmful effects would follow. If the “righteous” (2 Tim. 4:8) and unerring Judge were to require from you a just account for them, I do not know what defense you would make to secure your escape from condemnation. You, who have, alas, with evil and ruinous judgment selected the unworthy [persons] and brought such great harm not only on them but also on yourselves seeing that you have secured perdition for them as well as yourselves.

So then you will not resort to quarreling and dissension in your selection, but [p. 758] in unanimity and agreement you should choose the persons you select and with the counsel and judgment of the protector you should effect their selection and choice.

If you always live like that, there will be no one who will usurp this office rashly and by one’s own judgment, making a display perhaps of his seniority or knowledge or sphere of work or noble birth or rank or offering of property or money, but that man should be preferred in this [office] who has been selected by you after perfect scrutiny, even if he has been recently tonsured or is unlearned and without experience of worldly things, for no harm will come to the monastery from the latter.

For “God is able even from stones to raise up children to Abraham” (Matt. 3:9) and to give wisdom to the blind and to supply reason to those without reason, he who takes more pleasure in these people than in those who glory in their own wisdom and power, and wealth and nobility. As a witness to this the truly divine and great apostle clearly expresses it in the following words, “God chose what is foolish in the world and weak and despised to shame the wise and strong and lofty; and even things which are not to bring to nothing things that are” (I Cor. 1:27).

33. HELIOU BOMON

Chapter 45

[Borrowed from (32) Mamas [46]; differences in boldface]

More detailed instruction to the brotherhood on how they ought to conduct themselves

So then all that we wish and is acceptable to God—in my opinion at least—and to my all-pure Mistress and Mother of God, and greatly beneficial for your help has been discussed sufficiently; in the future it will be your concern to maintain them unbroken and unchanged always. By this I mean, to carry out completely in all the services the canonical procedure handed on to you, in accordance with the Studite synaxarion which is in effect today with you, to preserve loyalty and honor which is due to your superiors, to love one another, to be keen each of you to surpass each other in humility, to labor in all kinds of ways with one another in everything as the limbs of one body and “to complete what is lacking” (Col. 1:24) in one another, not to stir up quarrels nor form improper friendships or cause schisms and breakaway services, to refrain from claiming the seat of honor and worldly preferments, but look to one thing only, that is to live and conduct yourselves virtuously and breathe in nothing else, if possible, than the word of salvation and everything that is for the edification and benefit of your soul; furthermore [p. 759] to banish from you the source of all evils, I mean the love of money, and the filching of the monastery’s possessions or in any other way which the superior has not approved nor the rule given to you has allowed, not only that but as a result of carelessness or some other act of disregard to allow something belonging to the monastery to disappear. For that is the same as the former case, even if it seems to be somewhat different, and brings the same liability in the presence of God. You must root out familiarity as much as possible and, that I may be brief, banish everything that does not lead to salvation.

So, my fathers and brothers, let us in no way prefer the things that harm, and pass by those that bring salvation; for nothing of what has been handed on to you is impossible or hard to accomplish. But if one of these [instructions] were to be thought of as such perhaps, yet let us strive, let us persevere, let us endure, let us bear it nobly, let us force ourselves a little. For you did not abandon the world for indulgence and luxury, but for exertion and to strive as much as you could to gain the good things that were promised. Therefore let us force ourselves, let us force ourselves, as has been said; “for the kingdom of heaven has suffered violence, and men of violence take it by force” (Matt. 11:12). No one has ever gained a triumph by being careless, no one has triumphed over his enemy by sleeping and carelessness. Crowns and triumphs belong to those who run well, toil, strive, persevere in the labors of battles. “Through many tribulations,” the Lord says, “we must enter the kingdom of heaven” (Acts 14:22). So then I beseech you all, “lead a life worthy of your calling” (Eph. 4:1), “present your bodies holy to the Lord” (cf. Rom. 12:1), “love one another” (John 15:12), “run well the race that is set before you” (cf. Heb. 12:1). Whatsoever is good, whatsoever is beloved of God, consider these things (cf. Phil. 4:8). Do not fail to do the things “you have heard and learned” (Phil. 4:9). My brothers, “the appointed time has grown very short” (I Cor. 7:29). Remember your souls; pray fervently also for the preservation, might, and permanence of my holy masters, autokratores and emperors; and do not forget in your prayers our wretchedness and insignificance.

“The God of peace who called us to his eternal glory” (Heb. 13:20–21), through his great and unspeakable goodness confirm and strengthen you in his holy will through his only-begotten Son Our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ and the [p. 760] All-holy and Life-giving Spirit, to whom belong all glory, honor, worship, now and always and for ever and ever, Amen.

Chapter 46

[Borrowed from (32) Mamas [47]; differences in boldface]

Partial explanation concerning the ecclesiastical order and other conduct

[The brothers] are to be content with all the chapters that have been written above, as they have been written. Now it is necessary to speak briefly also concerning the ecclesiastical order and office that ought to be observed, as we have written in many places,²⁶ in accordance with the Studite *synaxarion, which is in effect at the present time, without failure and omission.

So now we must turn our attention to the subjects of our discourse and since I wish to begin from a preferable place, it is preferable to begin with the hour that brings us light, that is the first hour of the day, and I think it absolutely necessary that those who are going to give a description of the works of light should begin following the light.

So after the worship of matins, the office of the first hour should be sung, as is customary, along with the customary prayers, and the customary genuflections, too, should be performed by the able-bodied on the bare floor. Three of them should be completed in a more leisurely manner inasmuch as while you are standing you should say three times to yourselves with hands stretched out “God, be merciful to me the sinner” (Luke 18:13), then when you are kneeling down with your heads resting on the ground, you should say once “I have sinned against thee, Lord, forgive me.” But the remaining twelve should be carried out more quickly so as to utter the aforementioned supplicatory phrases once at each genuflection and each time you stand, but yet in unison and with fitting good order, not with some getting ahead and others falling behind, but all following the lead of the ecclesiarch.

That should take place when “God is the Lord” (Ps. 117 [118]:27) is not sung during matins; but if it is, the performing of these genuflections should be omitted but three deep bows should be performed and say while doing them the customary prayers. If, however, the superior should wish, let also the short catechesis from the words of the fathers be presented and let it be read by [p. 761] him, that is, after the completion of the troparion.

When the first hour has been completed, as we said, and the priest has spoken his customary prayer, all of you should immediately fall on your faces and hearing the superior asking for your prayers like this, “Brothers, pray for me in the Lord that I may be delivered from passions and the snares of the Evil One,” you should answer, “May God save you, honored father, and you pray for us, holy father, that we may be delivered from passions and the snares of the Evil One.” Then again the superior should say, “May God through the prayers of our fathers save you all.” Then rising, some must depart to your tasks, while others [will go] to your own cells, avoiding all meeting together and foolish distraction, idle chatter, and disorderly laughter.

33. HELIOU BOMON

Let each go away to his cell in a sober frame of mind and at the same time most vigilant, doing what is pleasing to God. But if some are discovered to be conducting themselves in a disorderly manner, whether they are young or old and advanced in the monastic life, they are to be admonished with the laws of love by the more devout or even by the superior himself. But, if they do not mend their ways they are to be punished. Going away to your cells you should carry out the whole canonical procedure. For genuflections should not be carried out in the church when “God is the Lord” (Ps. 117 [118]:27) is sung, as we have said.

In your cells, however, you should always kneel down when you pray, but we will avoid this also in our cells whenever there is a vigil because of the weariness that comes from that, also during the twelve days of Christmas, during Easter week, or even the entire Pentecost. Let, however, those who so choose genuflect after the Easter [week]. So the ritual of the first hour should be like that on the days of the year that are free of fasting.

The details concerning the third [hour] and sixth [hour] have been described earlier in the chapter concerning the divine mystery [of the Eucharist]. Consequently, we must speak also concerning the ninth [hour] and the lamp-lighting office. The ninth [hour], must be sung in the narthex in the same way as the preceding hours, the small semantron being struck for this [hour] and calling us, as is usual.

The regulation in the synaxarion sets out very clearly how the office of vespers [p. 762] should be carried out, as well as compline after the supper. When compline has been sung and the priest has said his customary prayer also, you should fall on your knees just as at the end of the first hour and incline your ear to the superior as he says, “Forgive me in the Lord, brothers, for I have sinned in deed, word and in thought.” You should grant him forgiveness, saying, “May God forgive you, father. Forgive us also yourself, honored father, for we have sinned in deed, word, and in thought,” then again he should pray for you and say, “May God through the prayers of our fathers forgive you all.”

Then standing up and according him the required obeisance, you should go away to your cells and carry out your night office in accordance with the regulation, and then full of gratitude and spiritual joy you should turn to sleep until the one who is in charge of matins learns from [the clock] the appropriate hour and goes to the superior, receiving from him the required blessing, and then striking the small semantron in the customary way, he will rouse you to sing the midnight office in the narthex. And then when he has sounded the great semantron and the bronze one also, he will call all for the dawn worship, the preliminary part of which must be carried out in this way.

Praise should be ascribed to God by the priest who has the duty for the day, and as he praises God he should at once make the sign of the venerable cross with the censer in front of the holy table; [p. 763] and you replying “Amen,” should immediately [sing] a trisagion together with the nineteenth psalm and the twentieth, then the trisagion, and the troparion “Save, Lord, thy people,” “Glory,” “Thou who wert lifted on the cross,” “Both now,” “Let [thy mercies] quickly go before us,” and the Kyrie eleison fifteen times.

The priest himself should go round all the divine church and cense everyone, and then, standing before the holy screen, when he has once more made the sign of the venerable cross with the censer, with the censuring he should offer up praise to the all-holy Trinity, speaking as follows,

TWELFTH CENTURY

“Glory to the holy and consubstantial and life-giving Trinity always, now and always and for ever and ever.” After replying “Amen” the ecclesiarch should at once begin the six psalms, saying the words of the psalms in a low voice slowly, quietly, and carefully, then after its completion, the whole office of matins should be celebrated as the synaxarion describes.

Such, then, is our pattern for your daily office, in the form of summary, as it were. The hours of the great Lent, however, ought to be sung melodiously within the church, with the customary “Alleluia” and the readings.

Chapter 47

[Borrowed from (32) Mamas [48]; differences in boldface]

Advice and soul-beneficial counsel to the superior at the time

Our spiritual father and brother in the Lord. The Word of God the Father, in addition to the other things with which he has benefited us, granted us this, too, [namely,] to be near the living even after death, and, though mortal by nature, to be almost immortal by the power of the spirit. In this respect writing certainly works wonders. Accordingly, I myself, too, being mortal and being about to undergo the death which is in accord with nature, I am with you through this piece of writing and I use this as a mouthpiece and I offer it as the voice which I owe you. For I am not even left alone by [p. 764] the scripturally celebrated moth of the bones (Job 4:19; Is. 50:9; Matt. 6:19; Luke 12:33) that continuously stirs and incites me so as to write in brotherly manner once more in fuller detail and to suggest to you sincerely and affectionately some of the things that help [us] to please God.

I, am nudged to write not because I know more than you, whoever, in fact, you may be, but because I have been assigned to this by the patriarchal and divine majesty.²⁷

Beloved one, truly great is the dignity of the guidance of souls and difficult to bear is the weight of the leadership of the brothers. For this reason it is necessary for him who has shouldered this to be continually sober and vigilant that he may not, having dozed a little while, be weighed down with the burden itself and be cast quickly to the very pit of destruction. For narrow and precipitous (cf. Matt. 7:14) is the road of life and the slight deviation from the center produces a destruction that is pitiable. For, according to one of the wise men, vices are annexed to virtues and are somehow very near.

It is necessary, therefore, inasmuch as the divine grace chose you for this greatest and awesome and very rewarding ministry and rightly and fittingly has appointed you to the leadership of the brothers of our monastery, or rather of my wholly undefiled, holy Virgin and Mother of God, who is mistress in it, for you to arise and earnestly to entreat the Divinity by night and day to grant you pastoral skill and freedom from passions of soul and body and to clothe you with the breastplate of righteousness and truth in order that you may neither say nor, in fact, do anything in the state of passion.

For you must be angry without anger and dissemble the passions dispassionately for the amelioration and benefaction of souls that are ill, and take up unto yourself the wars that invisibly come against the brothers from the Evil One, and have patience with their small-mindedness and weakness, and endure nobly their aberrations and their grumblings, and urge them with love and tender-heartedness to abstain from the soul-destroying deeds and the irregular and coarse habits, and most of all to live together with devoutness and discretion.

33. HELIOU BOMON

Even if, however, you see that some are disobedient to your words and choose to live indifferently, do not be discouraged or become remiss, but reprove [p. 765] and exhort and teach them the things that contribute to salvation. With genuine understanding do not give up admonishing some privately, while others even openly. Do not think lightly of the things over which they perhaps demur and become angry whenever you give counsel; for double is the crown that you will receive in return, for teaching and advising the things that are proper and certainly also for not being distressed and irascibly disturbed over the things that they complain about loudly and are displeased. But if ever it will be necessary to be harsh, dispassionately you shall discipline and use astringent remedies, sometimes through punishments, sometimes through rather severe words, and sometimes by pretending to turn away and overlook.

For according to the variety of character and the degree of fault you ought to apply also the correction, knowing this clearly that neither are all the ages equal, nor, indeed, the minds, and not the same bodily constitutions or habits or dispositions exist in all of them in the same manner. But neither are all the wars equal, but of those who practice asceticism one is tempted in this way while another in another way by the desires or the demons, as I at least precisely have heard from many ascetics. Your good understanding must display paternal compassion equally to all and show mercy to all with an ardent and compassionate heart.

Let the lamp of discretion precede every injunction and order of yours to the brothers, and let everything that you ought to manage and accomplish and prescribe publicly or privately and recommend be adorned with discretion, and work at the thoughts of your soul which are for the general benefit with unerring scrutiny and thoughtful study and considerate judgment, not following your own will but rather in every way seeking after the common good. For, if you consider yourself entirely sagacious and abhor the advice of prudent men, you will easily be deceived and by the successive conflicting winds of the travails of self-reliance you will be like a reed being swung about here and there by violent winds.

Your piety must not make with your own hand the more particular payments, that is to say, disbursements, for the financial administration of the monastery and the brothers, for this is unworthy of a director of monks and a spiritual leader of souls.²⁸ It befits us, according to the apostolic exhortation (I Cor. 10:32), to “give no offense” to those on the outside and to remove, as it is possible, all excuse from which fault-seekers are able to find occasions for the calumination of our way of life, [p. 766] whom let us endeavor in all kinds of ways to ward off through our own irreproachable behavior. For from the latter we shall prove that we fulfill the Lord’s statement in the gospels, for he says, “Let your light shine before men” (that is to say, the shepherds and superiors) “that they may see your good works and glorify your Father who is in heaven” (Matt. 5:16).

For it is not possible, it is not possible for the superior’s reputation to be preserved unsullied in any other way unless he sees to it that all income and disbursement and payment be made openly and with the consent of the community and through the hands of others in accordance with his [own] instruction. For this reason, in fact, we suggest to you that the disbursements of the monastery no longer be made through yourself but that you count the sum of nomismata and give them to someone of the more devout brothers in order that all disbursement might be made by him with both your knowledge and order, as we have shown with fuller detail in the chapter concerning the treasurer of nomismata.²⁹

These things, as the time permitted, we have suggested to your piety, projecting our love to you in brotherly manner and in every way working at both your irreproachability and the brothers' peaceful way of life and progress towards virtue. As for you, most honorable father, having received a small reminder from us, proceed to add from your part as a wise and sensible man the things that are lacking, but [do so] appropriately as well as continuously. For "Give to a wise man an opportunity and he will be wiser" (Prov. 9:9); and I, for my part, call wise one who carries in his heart the fear of God, since, in fact, "The beginning of wisdom is the fear of the Lord" (Prov. 1:7).

These things are enough for your piety. Pray, however, for the sake of the Lord, I implore [you], first for my holy masters and emperors, for the army and the entire world, but also for my wretchedness in your fervent supplications to God. May you, the small flock of the Mother of God, be saved for me, and may we all be saved by her entreaties to God which cannot be put to shame. May the grace of our mankind-loving God and Savior, Jesus Christ, be with you and with us. Amen.[p. 767]

Chapter 48

Concerning the feast of the Dormition of our supremely holy Mistress and Mother of God

In distinction from all the other feasts of my supremely holy Mother of God, the feast of her holy Dormition surely ought to be celebrated very radiantly and lavishly and with all kinds of adornment of her divine church, that is to say, sacred vessels, silk cloths, extraordinary illumination, and all other splendor, with an all-night vigil and sweet-voiced chanters. The fare of the table, too, ought to be more elegant with both fresh and preserved fish up to four dishes, or even more, as the superior at the time is able and chooses [to provide], and a treat [of two extra servings of wine],³⁰ also, ought to be given for the glory and honor of my supremely holy Mother of God.

At this commemoration of the Mother of God as many visitors as the superior wishes, if not all, will be guests at the table. But let also the nearby women enter on the day of the feast proper, and that alone, for the sake of worship, and let them depart immediately.

This feast, namely, of the Dormition of my supremely holy Mother of God, shall be celebrated radiantly not only in the monastery but also in the dependency itself, as the superior is able and chooses to do. I believe, however, that he will not wish to pass over any of the things that are possible and fitting for the honor of my supremely holy Mother of God. But let also the annual commemoration of Saint Basianos³¹ be celebrated in the dependency without failure, as the superior is both able and willing to do in order that he himself might not bear the guilt.

Chapter 49

Concerning the commemoration of my master and emperor

Let the commemoration of my master and emperor, Lord Manuel [Komnenos], Born-in-the-Purple, be performed, so long as, God approving, he is among the living, in accordance with the traditional custom, but after his departure to the Lord, in the following manner. In the evening the lights must be lit in the church just as on the feasts, and a prolonged night office is to be held, and the “Kyrie eleison” must be said a hundred times. While on the morrow a special liturgy is to be celebrated with kollyba, and a refreshment [provided] for the monks with fresh fish up to three dishes and the customary extra [serving of wine] that is, the [so-called] blessing. At the gate, the following must be distributed: three maritime modioi of bread, three like measures of wine, and tetartera to the value of two trikephala nomismata. He is also to be commemorated every day at [p. 768] matins, the liturgy, and vespers. The “Kyrie eleison” is to be said in sets of six.

Chapter 50

Concerning how I am to be commemorated both now and after my departure to the Lord

The things then that I procured and achieved by my personal labors and relentless efforts for the support of the frequently mentioned monastery of my supremely holy Mother of God have been stated quite clearly in the prefatory account of my present typikon. Since, however, according to the divine statement in the gospels, “The laborer deserves his wages” (Luke 10:7; cf. I Tim. 5:18), and those who toil over good deeds must be treated kindly with fitting repayments, I, too, supplicate and beseech both you who are found in the monastery today and those after you to grant me repayment for the deeds over which, in accordance with my ability, I have toiled and zealously pursued the things pertaining to your sustenance and the things pertaining to the support of the monastery, by observing the following [instructions] intact and inviolate.

At the present time, so long as I am among the living, my commemoration ought to be done in such a way that in every canonical office of the day and night an ektenes may be made on my behalf, and the “Kyrie eleison” be said six times at a time, at vespers as well as during matins and the liturgy. During matins, after the completion of the sixth ode, let also a supplicatory trisagion be performed with the troparia: “Have mercy on us, Lord, have mercy on us,” “Glory,” “Lord, have mercy on us, for in you we trust,” “Both now,” [and] “The gate of compassion.” Next an ektenes [is to be made] by the priest, and the “Kyrie eleison” must be said fifteen times. At vespers every Sunday, after the dismissal of the lamp-lighting office, let the canon of supplication to the supremely holy Mother of God be sung, and on the morrow a very special liturgy. In all the liturgies that are performed in the church, one offering [of eucharistic bread] ought to be offered in my name.

Let the same things, however, be done also after my departure to the Lord, that is to say, at the end of the sixth ode on each [Sunday], [you must sing] the trisagion and the [following] customary funerary troparia, “Thou who with the depth of wisdom and love of mankind,” “Glory,” “With the saints give rest,” “Both now,” “Thou who art both rampart and harbor,” and the ektenes. In the same manner also after the dismissal of vespers each Sunday the funeral canon is to be sung and on the morrow the liturgy.

At the time of my annual commemoration, however, [p. 769] the lights in the church must be lit just as on the feasts, and a prolonged night office [must take place] with two candelabra with twelve candleholders and four tapers, and [on] the morrow most specially a liturgy. At the table three dishes of fresh fish must be served and the customary treat [of an extra serving of wine] [must] be given with a very fine wine. As soon as the liturgy is dismissed, to each of the brothers is given without delay for the sake of a small consolation a trikephalon, . . . one to all of them equally. Let there also be a distribution at the gate to my brothers in Christ, the poor, of four maritime modioi of bread, four like measures of wine, and tetartera to the value of two trikephala. The same procedure ought to be followed in exactly the same way also in the dependency which is within the imperial city [of Constantinople], both in my lifetime and at my departure to the Lord without the distribution at the gate.

Chapter 51

Concerning the commemorations of the original founders

Let also the commemorations of those original and blessed founders be performed without failure and without any excuse whatsoever both in the principal monastery and in its dependency with both a night office and a liturgy. They [must] be mentioned in every office, the trisagion [must] also be sung every day on their behalf, and they [must] be commemorated.

The doulos of our mighty and holy emperor the mystikos Nikephoros.

Notes on the Translation

1. See [37] below.
2. Grumel, Regestes, no. 1044.
3. (27) Kecharitomene [11] has “with only the names changed,” which makes better sense.
4. In [1] above.
5. See Prologue above and [26], [37] below.
6. For this foundation, see [5], [26], [37], [48], and [50] below, with Janin, Géographie, vol. 3, pp. 60–61.
7. Perhaps (4) Stoudios or a contemporary version of same; see also [18], [45], [46] below.
8. Reading ichthyas (fish), as in (32) Mamas [18], for the edition’s ischadas (dry figs).
9. Feast of the Discovery of the Head of St. John the Forerunner, February 24; feast of the Annunciation, March 25.
10. Feast of the Forty Martyrs, March 9.
11. Fast of the Holy Apostles, from Monday after the feast of All Saints (Sunday after Pentecost) through the vigil of the feast of Sts. Peter and Paul, June 28.
12. Fast of the Holy Nativity, from November 15 until Christmas.
13. For the Artzibourians, see (20) Black Mountain [55] with note.
14. The heresy of the Tetraditai; cf. (20) Black Mountain [55], n. 68.
15. Feast of the Dormition of the Mother of God, August 15.
16. Feast of the Exaltation of the Holy Cross, September 14.
17. See also (34) Machairas [132] and the Pachomian Praecepta [73], [75], ed. A. Boon, Pachomiana Latina (Louvain, 1932), pp. 34–35.
18. (34) Machairas [133] is similar; see also the Pachomian Praecepta [97], ed. Boon, p. 40.
19. (28) Pantokrator [14] is similar.

33. HELIOU BOMON

20. In [5] above.
21. See Prologue and [4] above.
22. Thesaurus Sancti Gregorii Nazianzeni, ed. J. Mossay (Turnhout, 1990–91), p. 11.
23. See Prologue above.
24. Pseudo-Basil, Constitutiones asceticae 28, PG 31, col. 1417C.
25. (22) Evergetis [18] adds here “in the Holy Spirit,” completing a scriptural quotation from Rom. 9:1. This is important to the understanding of the text, which does not refer to excommunication but to the superior’s sinful participation in the liturgy. The subsequent statement (ed. p. 756, lines 35 ff.) supports this interpretation.
26. In [8], [18], and [45] above.
27. Cf. Prologue above.
28. See also (3) Theodore Studites [22] and (13) Ath. Typikon [32].
29. In [10] above.
30. Eulogiai: the reference is to extra servings of wine. See chapters [49] and [50].
31. October 10.

Document Notes

- [1] Choice of the superior. Copied from (32) Mamas [1]. See also earlier treatments in (22) Evergetis [13] and related documents. Our author adds “the more eminent” monks to the officials as preferred candidates for the superiorship; the protector is told to find additional candidates, if necessary, from among the monks of Mount Olympos, the Hellespont, or Constantinople.
- [2] Removal of the superior. Copied from (32) Mamas [2]; shared later with (34) Machairas [88], [89]. [90]. See also earlier treatments in (22) Evergetis [13], [14] and related documents.
- [3] Role of the protector. Copied from (32) Mamas [3]. See also earlier treatment in (27) Kecharitomene [3].
- [4] Independent and self-governing status. Copied from (32) Mamas [4]; shared later with (34) Machairas [21]. See also earlier treatments in (22) Evergetis [12] and related documents.
- [5] Number of monks; voluntary entrance gifts inalienable. Copied from (32) Mamas [5]; shared later with (34) Machairas [59]. See also earlier treatments in (22) Evergetis [23], [37] and related documents.
- [6] Installation ceremony for officials. Copied from (32) Mamas [6]; shared later with (34) Machairas [92]. See also earlier treatments in (22) Evergetis [29] and related documents.
- [7] Installation of the steward. Copied from (32) Mamas [7]; shared later with (34) Machairas [81]. See also earlier treatments in (22) Evergetis [13] and related documents.
- [8] Duties of the ecclesiarch. Copied from (32) Mamas [8]; shared later with (58) Menoikeion [4]. See also earlier treatment in (27) Kecharitomene [20]. Our author substitutes the Studite synxarion for that of Evergetis here and in [45], [46] below.
- [9] Duties of the sacristan and archivist. Copied from (32) Mamas [9]; shared later with (58) Menoikeion [5]. See also earlier treatment in (27) Kecharitomene [19].
- [10] Duties of the treasurer. Copied from (32) Mamas [10]. See also earlier treatment in (27) Kecharitomene [24].
- [11] Duties of the cellarer. Copied from (32) Mamas [11] with an abridgement; shared later with (34) Machairas [96]. Our author omits the reference to the cook and the instruction to serve only one dish at a time found in (32) Mamas [11]. See also earlier treatment in (27) Kecharitomene [23].
- [12] Duties of the gatekeeper. Copied from (32) Mamas [12]; shared later with (58) Menoikeion [7]. See also earlier treatment in (27) Kecharitomene [29].
- [13] Charity for poor monks and laymen. Copied from (32) Mamas [13]; shared later with (58) Menoikeion [7].
- [14] Superior may appoint other officials. Copied from (32) Mamas [14]. See also earlier treatments in (22) Evergetis [39] and related documents.
- [15] Preservation of the typikon. Copied from (32) Mamas [15].

TWELFTH CENTURY

- [16] Reading of the typikon. Copied from (32) Mamas [16]; shared later with (58) Menoikeion [9]. See also earlier treatments in (22) Evergetis [43] and related documents. Note the clear distinction our author makes between “monks” and “brothers” here and elsewhere in this document.
- [17] Diet for non-fast days. Copied from (32) Mamas [17]; shared later with (34) Machairas [61], [62], and (58) Menoikeion [8]. See also earlier treatments in (22) Evergetis [9].
- [18] Diet during fasts. Copied from (32) Mamas [18]; shared later with (34) Machairas [67], [68], [69], [70], [71], [72], [73], [76]. See also earlier treatments in (22) Evergetis [10] and related documents.
- [19] Diet to spite the Artzibourians; fellow-brethren to eat with other monks; blessing of the grapes. Copied from (32) Mamas [19]; shared later with (34) Machairas [78], [79] (except for the blessing). See other treatments of this diet in (20) Black Mountain [55], [90]; (28) Pantokrator [12]; (30) Phoberos [19]; and (36) Blemmydes [11]. Our author adds farmers and fishermen to the list of the fellow-brethren found in (32) Mamas [19].
- [20] No secret eating; superior’s inspection of cells. Copied from (32) Mamas [20]. See also earlier treatments in (22) Evergetis [22], [27] and related documents.
- [21] No absences from the office. Copied from (32) Mamas [21]; shared later with (34) Machairas [49]. See similar provision in (29) Kosmosoteira [80].
- [22] Length of the novitiate. Copied from (32) Mamas [22]; shared later with (34) Machairas [55], [56], [57], [58], [60]. See also earlier treatments in (22) Evergetis [37] and related documents.
- [23] Exhortation to the officials. Copied from (32) Mamas [23]; shared later with (58) Menoikeion [10]. See also earlier treatments in (22) Evergetis [33].
- [24] Demonstration of respect for the superior. Copied from (32) Mamas [24], with an abridgement. Our author omits the requirement in his model that the monks show respect for one another. (28) Pantokrator [14] is very similar to this chapter; see different treatments in (22) Evergetis [16] and related documents.
- [25] Maintenance of cenobitic life. See also [5] above. Copied from (32) Mamas [25]; shared later with (34) Machairas [11]; earlier treatment in (27) Kecharitomene [55].
- [26] No kelliotic monks or imposed guests. Copied from (32) Mamas [26]; shared later with (58) Menoikeion [11]. See also earlier treatment in (27) Kecharitomene [53]. Note our author’s intense hostility to kelliotic monasticism.
- [27] No access for women or resident laymen. Copied from (32) Mamas [27], with abridgements. Our author omits the partial exception for noblewomen found in his model. See different treatments in (22) Evergetis [39] and related documents and in (28) Pantokrator [18].
- [28] Clothing and bathing allowances. Copied from (32) Mamas [28], with an abridgement. Our author omits the more complicated schedule of payments in his model. See different treatments in (22) Evergetis [25], [28] and related documents; (28) Pantokrator [15], [22]; and (31) Areia [T3], [T4].
- [29] Confession to the superior; exception. Copied from (32) Mamas [29]; shared later with (58) Menoikeion [13]. See different treatments in (22) Evergetis [7], [15] and related documents, and in (28) Pantokrator [20].
- [30] Exhortation to confession. Copied from (32) Mamas [30]; shared later with (34) Machairas [51]. See also earlier treatments in (22) Evergetis [7] and related documents.
- [31] Offices of the third and sixth hours. See also [46] below. Copied from (32) Mamas [31]; shared later with (34) Machairas [35].
- [32] Reception of communion. Copied from (32) Mamas [32]; shared later with (34) Machairas [36], [37], [38], [39] and (58) Menoikeion [16]. See also earlier treatments in (22) Evergetis [5] and related documents.
- [33] Equality in food and drink; care of the sick; ban on servants. Copied from (32) Mamas [34]; shared later with (34) Machairas [87], [106], [107], [108]. See also earlier treatments in (22) Evergetis [24], [26], [41] and related documents. Our author assigns the superior (rather than just any monk) the responsibility of seeking admission for a sick monk at a hospice.

33. HELIOU BOMON

- [34] No idle talking; no private possessions. Copied from (32) Mamas [35]; shared later with (34) Machairas [87], [113] and (58) Menoikeion [17]. See also earlier treatments in (22) Evergetis [21], [22] and related documents.
- [35] No arguments over precedence. Copied from (32) Mamas [36]; shared later with (34) Machairas [64]. See also earlier treatments in (22) Evergetis [9] and related documents.
- [36] Maintenance of elderly monks. Copied from (32) Mamas [33]. See also the subsequent treatment of this issue in (55) Athanasios I [7].
- [37] Purpose of the inventory. Copied from (32) Mamas [37]; shared later with (34) Machairas [94]. Note important information on the return of sacred vessels, books, etc. from Hagia Sophia; cf. the books discussed in (24) Christodoulos [C6], [C7].
- [38] Exhortation to the protector. Copied from (32) Mamas [38]; shared later with (34) Machairas [161].
- [39] Commemoration of deceased monks. Copied from (32) Mamas [39]; shared later with (34) Machairas [157]. See also earlier treatments in (22) Evergetis [36] and related documents. Our author provides an alternative location for the commemoration “at the grave.”
- [40] Why the typikon was composed. Copied from (32) Mamas [41]; shared later with (34) Machairas [162].
- [41] Instructions to the superior. See also [47] below. Copied from (32) Mamas [42]; shared later with (34) Machairas [144] and (58) Menoikeion [19]; earlier treatments in (22) Evergetis [17] and related documents.
- [42] Instructions for a superior from another monastery. Copied from (32) Mamas [43]. See also the later treatment in (37) Auxentios [3].
- [43] Monks not to question superior; superior not to spend the monastery’s wealth for friends or relatives. Copied from (32) Mamas [44]; shared later with (34) Machairas [145], [146]. See also earlier treatments in (22) Evergetis [18] and related documents.
- [44] No partiality in elections; hostility to privilege. Copied from (32) Mamas [45]; shared later with (58) Menoikeion [18]. See also earlier treatments in (22) Evergetis [14], [17] and related documents.
- [45] Final exhortation. Copied from (32) Mamas [46]; shared later with (34) Machairas [163], [166], [168]. See also earlier treatments in (22) Evergetis [42], [43] and related documents, and in (31) Areia [T13].
- [46] Summary of the canonical hours. Copied from (32) Mamas [47], with an abridgement; shared later by (34) Machairas [30], [31], [32], [33], [34], [48]. Our author shortens the discussion of the night and the midnight offices in his model.
- [47] Message to the superior. See also [41] above. Copied from (32) Mamas [48].
- [48] Feast of the Dormition. See other provisions for this feast in (10) Eleousa [13]; (22) Evergetis [11]; (23) Pakourianos [11]; (29) Kosmosoteira [10], [29], [65]; and (34) Machairas [27], cf. [29].
- [49] Commemoration of the emperor. See also earlier requests for prayers for the emperors in [45], [47] above, and comparable provisions in (25) Fragala [C3], [C5]; (27) Kecharitomene [34], [71]; (28) Pantokrator [3]; and (34) Machairas [24].
- [50] Founder’s commemoration. See other provisions in (22) Evergetis [35], Appendix; (23) Pakourianos [12]; (28) Pantokrator [8], [44], [72]; (29) Kosmosoteira [7], [11], [64], [72], [91]; (32) Mamas [40]; and (37) Auxentios [13].
- [51] Commemoration of the original founders. See also the provision in (40) Anargyroi [6].

CHAPTER SEVEN

Independent and Self-Governing Monasteries of the Thirteenth Century

“Monasteries that are self-governing are more flourishing and self-sufficient than those that are subject to various individuals. For these enjoy what they possess without any diminution, whereas the others receive little or nothing of their revenues.” (37) Auxentios [2]

“This is my wish, and I bid you as a mother, so to speak, or rather I command it as your mistress. For I am permitted to decree my wishes in my own affairs, especially since I happen to be a despoina by the mercy of my all-powerful God.” (39) Lips [11]

“As an overall principle there should never be any investigation or correction of the spiritual failings here by an outsider, but I ordain that all the care for this brotherhood should be borne solely by their leader.” (34) Blemmydes [1]

This chapter includes seven thirteenth-century documents composed by their authors for independent monasteries. The documents represent a broad spectrum of authorship: (34) Machairas was authored by a bishop, (35) Skoteine by a monk of very modest social origin, (36) Blemmydes by a monk from a middle-class background, and (37) Auxentios, (38) Kellibara I, (39) Lips, and (40) Anargyroi by members of the imperial family. The last two were composed for convents, while all the rest were written for men’s monasteries.

Chronologically, the documents are spread throughout the century, with (34) Machairas coming near the beginning in 1210, followed by (35) Skoteine and (36) Blemmydes at mid-century in 1247 and 1248, respectively, then with (37) Auxentios and (38) Kellibara I towards the end of the reign of their author, Michael VIII Palaiologos, in 1280/81 and 1282 respectively. Theodora Palaiologina’s (39) Lips and (40) Anargyroi date from the last few years of the thirteenth century or, just possibly, the early years of the next.

A. Typology of the Documents

One of the documents, (35) Skoteine, is described by its author as a testament, while the rest are founders’ typika. Of the latter, the texts of (36) Blemmydes and (38) Kellibara I are substantially incomplete. (34) Machairas reflects a complex textual background rooted in the twelfth-century milieu of reform monasteries. None of the other documents shows evidence of the direct textual dependence on typika of the reform tradition as it does, although the author of (39) Lips apparently utilized (27) Kecharitomene or some similar text as a structural model. The other documents in this chapter are essentially original compositions, like those typika and testaments drawn up before (22) Evergetis began to serve as a model for reform-minded founders in the twelfth century. After (34) Machairas, the determination to break out of the mold of Evergetian textual dependency became general, even though most of the later documents continue to reflect a considerable number of Evergetian institutions and customs that had been assimilated into the mainstream of Byzantine monasticism.

CHAPTER SEVEN

Although aside from (34) Machairas, textual fidelity to documents of the reform tradition was not a concern for the authors of the documents in this chapter, many were written nevertheless with other documents in mind. The authors of (35) Skoteine [12], [24], (37) Auxentios [8], [10], and (39) Lips [30] are able to omit detailed regulation of liturgical matters by acknowledging external typika, usually the liturgical typikon of St. Sabas, as being authoritative for their own foundations. The author of (40) Anargyroi [5] was able to dispense almost entirely with the writing of a new typikon by incorporating (39) Lips by reference. (40) Anargyroi [6] also acknowledges the validity of an earlier typikon written for this foundation. Finally, in addition to utilizing the Evergetian textual tradition, the author of (34) Machairas [12], also refers [12], [18] to the testament of his predecessor Ignatios and incorporates ([121] through [131]), some pseudo-Basilian disciplinary canons.

Reflecting the continued concern for the security of their foundations' assets that the founders in this chapter inherited from their twelfth-century predecessors, the majority of their foundation documents incorporated inventories of property. The most detailed are (35) Skoteine [22] ff. and (39) Lips [43] ff. The inventory once in (37) Auxentios [17] is now lost, while the one in (40) Anargyroi [4] is incomplete due to a gap in the text. It is reasonable to suppose that the now incomplete texts of (36) Blemmydes and (38) Kellibara I also once included inventories.

B. Relation of the Documents to the Monastic Reform Tradition

Among these documents, arguably only (34) Machairas, on the strength of its textual links to (22) Evergetis, can be considered a tentative member of the Evergetian family of reform monasteries. Although its author certainly utilized a version of (32) Mamas as well, he made a conspicuous return to several Evergetian institutions and usages absent from the Maman recension.¹ Among other results, these Evergetian revivals strengthened the cenobitic character of his foundation. The other authors were not oblivious to the influence of the monastic reform tradition, however. The author of (35) Skoteine was especially keen to strengthen cenobitic institutions, and to this end endorsed practices dear (though not exclusive) to most reform founders such as eating in common, sharing the same food, and banning personal possessions. The fragments of (36) Blemmydes show some evidence of influence both from the early Evergetian tradition, including the rejection of episcopal oversight and a use of canon law and patristic precedent, as well as from later developments in the reform tradition such as the institutionalization of monastic ranks.² On the whole, however, (36) Blemmydes must be considered a strongly idiosyncratic document, at least in the form in which it has come down to us.

¹ (34) Machairas [50], [51], [52], [54], [87A], [102], [103], [109], [118], [141].

² (36) Blemmydes [1], [9], [11].

INDEPENDENT AND SELF-SERVING MONASTERIES

More specifically Evergetian influence is apparent in most of the documents of imperial authorship. (37) Auxentios shares many institutions and even some use of diction with (22) Evergetis.³ Evergetian usages are even more obvious and numerous in (39) Lips, whose author may have used (directly or indirectly) the strongly Evergetian (27) Kecharitomene.⁴ Both by virtue of its authoritative citation [5] of (39) Lips and on its own, e.g., the requirement [5] of keeping a register of accounts, (40) Anargyroi likewise shows the influence of the monastic reform tradition in the twelfth century.

Finally, despite the diversity of background among them, all of the authors of these documents endorse (at least nominally) for their foundations the institutional independence which is itself one of the most important legacies of the reform movement.⁵

C. Other Concerns of the Authors

1. Fixed Assignments to Liturgical and Service Duties

The division of the authors' monastic communities into monks assigned to liturgical duties and those with service functions, which is anticipated in the twelfth century by (29) Kosmosoteira [3], is still ambiguous in the semi-Evergetian (34) Machairas [165]. Thereafter, our authors recognize a formal division, as in (35) Skoteine [14], with the possible exception of the fragmentary (36) Blemmydes.

The imperial founders were very careful to specify the precise numbers of monks or nuns that could be supported in their respective foundations; they also specified how the positions available should be allocated between liturgical and service assignments.⁶ In her foundations, Empress Theodora Palaiologina preferred to allocate a larger percentage (60%) of her nuns to hymnody than her husband Emperor Michael VIII did (40%) in his monasteries, possibly because his monks handled more administrative responsibilities directly than her nuns did. Our other founders either relied on gifts from benefactors and postulants, like the author of (35) Skoteine,⁷ or mandated a one-to-one replacement of existing monks, like the author of (34) Machairas [164]. Overall, the total numbers of monks ranged from the twenty reported at one time to have been at the ascetic Maximos' foundation in (35) Skoteine [8] to the fifty nuns provided for in (39) Lips [4].

2. Revival of Manual Labor

The development of a separate class of monks formally freed of liturgical responsibilities signals the revival of the practice of manual labor by these monks. As (32) Mamas [19] and (33) Heliou

³ See (37) Auxentios Analysis, A-2.

⁴ See (39) Lips Analysis, A.

⁵ (34) Machairas [21], (35) Skoteine [20], (36) Blemmydes [1], (37) Auxentios [2], (38) Kellibara I [15], (39) Lips [1], and (40) Anargyroi [3]. Epigraphic evidence confirms the diversity of benefactors; see Sophia Kalopissi-Verti, Dedicatory Inscriptions and Donor Portraits in Thirteenth-Century Churches of Greece (Vienna, 1992), esp. pp. 28–46.

⁶ (37) Auxentios [6]: not more than 40 monks (split 16/24); (38) Kellibara I [17]: 36 monks (split 15/21); (39) Lips [4]: 50 nuns (split 30/20); and (40) Anargyroi [6]: 30 nuns (split 18/12).

⁷ (35) Skoteine [9], [10], [36], [41], [45] (benefactors' gifts), [33], [38], [39] (postulants' gifts, i.e., prosenexeis).

CHAPTER SEVEN

Bomon [19] show, a start had been made in the second half of the twelfth century. There are incidental references to manual labor in (34) Machairas.⁸ In (35) Skoteine, some monks practiced [41] viticulture while others manufactured [23] clothing. In (37) Auxentios [6] some of the monks worked in the fields, while postulants were rotated [7] through all of the service functions of the monastery. In both (39) Lips [4] and (40) Anargyroi [6] nuns were assigned to household duties.

3. Importance of Liturgical Responsibilities

There can be no question that for founders the performance of hymnody and the liturgy remained of paramount importance, reflected in the allocations of monastic personnel to these tasks and the careful provisions for stationing clergy at each church where commemorations were to take place.⁹ In the previous century, founders had quickly lapsed from the standard of a daily celebration of the liturgy provided in (22) Evergetis [5], and celebrations became less frequent. In the thirteenth century, (34) Machairas [36] returns to the daily liturgy, while (39) Lips [30] provides for it five times and (40) Anargyroi [5] four times during the week. (34) Machairas [40], [41] and (36) Blemmydes [4] add a new concern for the purity of the ingredients of the eucharistic bread.

4. More Lenient Requirements for Tonsure

Twelfth-century founders in the reform tradition had generally followed (22) Evergetis [37] in allowing an accelerated novitiate of six months for notables while holding all others to a longer term of a year that subsequent founders sought to lengthen to two or three years. Alone among the documents in this chapter, (34) Machairas [55], [56] upholds the double-tracked novitiate with the original Evergetian terms of service. The attempt by the author of (36) Blemmydes [9] to make all adult candidates serve a three-year novitiate did not find favor among the rest of our authors. Generally they preferred shorter novitiates: six months in (37) Auxentios [12], one year in (39) Lips [18] (six months for “mature” women) and (presumably) (40) Anargyroi. Our authors shared their twelfth-century counterparts’ increasingly relaxed attitudes towards the admission of monks tonsured elsewhere. (34) Machairas [60], (35) Skoteine [17], and (39) Lips [20] welcome worthy ascetics (though in (34) Machairas [148] not as superior), while a xenokourites became the first superior of the Skoteine monastery.

5. Increasing Tolerance for Alternative Forms of Monasticism

Some of our thirteenth-century founders subscribed to a more tolerant view of alternative forms of monastic life than was typical in some twelfth-century documents such as (33) Heliou Bomon [26]. (34) Machairas, for instance, generally endorses the principles of Evergetian cenobiticism, but [152] provides for the settlement of solitaries as well. So does its contemporary, (45) Neophytos [17], written for a private foundation (see below, Chapter Eight). Towards the end of the century, (37) Auxentios [11] permits the coexistence of solitary and hesychastic forms of monasticism. Yet earlier, (35) Skoteine [13] is strongly pro-cenobitic, rejecting solitary and kelliotic alternatives. (38) Kellibara I [17] might also be interpreted as being anti-kelliotic in so far as it provides for the extension of the main monastery’s cenobitic rule in the foundation’s small dependencies. For the cloistered nunneries, alternatives to cenobiticism were usually not at issue. The regulations for the common life in (39) Lips [25] are lost in a gap in text, but the [29] refectory procedures are Evergetian. (40) Anargyroi [5] was ordered to follow Lips in the practice of cenobiticism.

⁸ (34) Machairas [32], [33], [86], [120].

⁹ Cf. (34) Machairas [49], (35) Skoteine [14], (36) Blemmydes [13], (37) Auxentios [6], (38) Kellibara I [17], (39) Lips [30], [52], and (40) Anargyroi [6].

6. Attenuation of the Concept of Institutional Independence

Institutional independence, one of the more enduring features of the monastic reform, is contrasted favorably to private ownership of religious foundations in (37) Auxentios [2] on the practical grounds that “monasteries which are self-governing are more flourishing and self-sufficient than those which are subject to various individuals.” Nevertheless, some founders chose to impose protectorates on their foundations as their predecessors had done to many reform monasteries in the twelfth century:¹⁰ (34) Machairas [147] alludes to a protector, and appeals [161] to local Frankish magistrates on the island of Cyprus to help uphold the typikon; in (38) Kellibara I [16] the emperor designates himself as the foundation’s guardian, while in (37) Auxentios [3], [5] he functions like one without holding the actual title; in (39) Lips [3] the emperor and his successors are designated to serve as the foundation’s protectors and guardians. As we have seen, a protectorate, if carefully and strictly limited, was not thought to be incompatible with a degree of institutional independence.

Although all the authors in this chapter assert the independence of their foundations, the precise meaning of independence must have varied from institution to institution. The blood relationships of many of the monks in (35) Skoteine [4] as well as the extensive network of supportive local patronage must have made the institution for which that document was written more like a private or communal monastery. We know from the historian Pachymeres that the institutional independence claimed by the author of (36) Blemmydes [1] was not successfully maintained since his monastery was confiscated after his death and subordinated instead to the Galesios monastery.¹¹ Then there is the unique relationship between the institutions represented by (39) Lips and (40) Anargyroi, which are described by their author as being “separate in unity.” Although the institutions for which they were written were nominally independent, their founder saw no incompatibility in asserting ownership over both of them: see (40) Anargyroi [3], “[Lips is] considered mine no less than this one [Anargyroi]” (cf. (39) Lips [11]). Indeed, not only in the case of these two institutions but also in those represented by (37) Auxentios and (38) Kellibara I we find that institutional independence in reality may have been no more than a thin overlay of ideological rectitude placed upon the bedrock of traditional institutions of imperial patronage.

7. Contemporary Threats to Institutional Independence

In the case of all these thirteenth-century foundations, the critical question is “independent of what?” The catalogue of perceived threats to independence is instructive. (34) Machairas [21] follows the original but vague formulation of (22) Evergetis [12] closely and warns off both ecclesiastical and imperial authorities as well as private individuals. The author of (35) Skoteine [20] was worried about ecclesiastical officials and (appropriately for a foundation of private origins) private individuals. The author of (36) Blemmydes [1] was concerned exclusively about the ecclesiastical hierarchy and their representatives. The Emperor Michael VIII was not particularly concerned that any private individual would dare to seize an imperial foundation. In (37) Auxentios [2] he adds to the traditional twelfth-century prohibitions on the establishment of an (external) protectorate or donation under epidosis to another monastery a proviso that his monastery should not be united (through henosis) to another ecclesiastical foundation either. Similarly, in (38) Kellibara I [15], he provides that the foundation for which this document was written should not be added or joined to any monastery, church or philanthropic institution. The fact that the emperor himself used henosis in a good cause in (38) Kellibara I [14] suggests that he was aware of the potential for its misuse by others.

¹⁰ (27) Kecharitomene [3], (28) Pantokrator [70], (32) Mamas [3], and (33) Heliou Bomon [3].

¹¹ Pachymeres, De Michaele Palaeologo 5.2, ed. I. Bekker, CSHB, vol. 1 (Bonn, 1835), p. 342.

Michael VIII was even more worried that one of his successors might be tempted to reclaim the assets he had consecrated to the support of the imperial monastery described in (37) Auxentios. To forestall this, the emperor advances a novel argument in (37) Auxentios [15] that his successors should feel bound to confirm his benefactions to ecclesiastical institutions just as he himself has felt obliged to confirm the dispositions of his predecessors to religious foundations and other beneficiaries of imperial largess. Empress Theodora Palaiologina makes her own argument for the sanctity of testamentary provisions in (40) Anargyroi [1]. Clearly we are moving into the final phase of Byzantine history during which the hard-pressed public authorities, both lay and ecclesiastical, were once again losing their scruples about disregarding the wishes of private benefactors, either out of concern for the interests of state or alleged “solicitude” (kedemonia) for the welfare of the institutions in question.

Therefore, it appears that in their essentially reactive conceptualization of the term, “independence” for our thirteenth century founders meant immunity for their religious foundations from subordination to external authority or, in extremis, secularization. The original reform notion that “independence” meant also institutional self-governance, that is, independence also from arbitrary rule by the founder and his heirs, was less self-evident to the founders of this era, though (37) Auxentios [2] admits with amazing candor that foundations subject to individuals were liable to see their supposed benefactors dispose of institutional assets as if they were personal property.

8. Institutional Self-Governance

The key to institutional independence in the positive sense of the term, i.e., genuine self-governance, was a superior permitted to be elected and then to govern his foundation without routine interference by founders, patrons, or public officials. All of our authors who address the issue provide for internal selection of the superior by the monks themselves,¹² though for a time at the foundation for which (34) Machairas [12], [140] was written, the superior chose his own successor. The extent of the superior’s authority and the style of rule recommended to him varied from institution to institution. In (34) Machairas [91] the superior apparently appointed all the monastery’s officials, was intimately involved [82] in its financial administration, and generally ruled with an iron hand. In (35) Skoteine, the author indicates [15] his preference that the superior consider himself “of equal station” with the rest of the monks, who were obliged [16] to report their superior to the local metropolitan if he neglected the foundation's financial affairs. In (36) Blemmydes [1] the superior could be indicted for heresy by the monastery's educated monks and removed from office if condemned by the (patriarchal) synod. In (37) Auxentios [2] Michael VIII also prefers that the superior rule jointly with the "leading monks," especially where financial matters were concerned [7]. In a more general way in (38) Kellibara I [15] he affirms the competence of the superior and rest of the community to administer all material and spiritual matters in the foundation for which that document was written. In (39) Lips Theodora Palaiologina obliges the superior to consult with the foundation's spiritual father as well as the leading nuns on a number of important administrative and procedural matters.¹³ Upon being reported to the spiritual father by the leading nuns, she might also be removed [10] by him. Although the superior was to rule by consensus [27], her stance towards ordinary nuns tended to be authoritarian [9].

¹² (34) Machairas [17]; (37) Auxentios [3]; (38) Kellibara I [18]; (39) Lips [5]; (40) Anargyroi [5].

9. Continued Restriction of Patronal Privileges

The curtailment of patronal rights was another area in which the Byzantine monastic reform movement had an impact that endured throughout the thirteenth century. In (34) Machairas, the twelfth-century practice [12], [140] of the superior designating his own successor evidently was abandoned in the thirteenth century for a community-wide election [17]. In (37) Auxentios [3] Michael VIII reserves for himself the right to choose a new superior, but only if the monks cannot reach a unanimous decision on their own; he also claims [3] the right to install the new superior in office and to mediate [5] disputes between the superior and the leading monks. In (38) Kellibara I [16], however, he limits himself and his successors as protectors to the reward of assistance from the Almighty and the patron St. Demetrios. Also, in what is probably the most expansive claim for patronal privilege seen in this chapter's documents, (39) Lips [40], [41] decrees extensive preferential admission privileges for Theodora Palaiologina's family, relatives, and other noble ladies. Otherwise, the patronal privileges claimed by our authors fall well within the restricted parameters permitted by the reform movement since the late eleventh century: principally, prayers and liturgical commemorations,¹⁴ and (occasionally) burial within the foundation's church.¹⁵

10. Financial Management

Insofar as can be determined, the foundations represented by these documents generally supported themselves with the revenues derived from their landed endowments, with the possible exception of one of Michael VIII's two foundations (see (37) Auxentios [1]). In (34) Machairas [85] property managers were responsible for the cultivation of these lands, and, contrary to the reform tradition, alienation of distant properties was permitted [111] if their management posed a threat of spiritual harm to the monks. In (35) Skoteine [10] monks administered and may have even worked on lands attached to the foundation's dependencies. Both (40) Anargyroi [2] and (39) Lips [44] ff. were supported by endowed properties, in these cases worked by dependent peasants. (39) Lips [43] bans the alienation of landed properties but permits the pawning of sacred vessels in fiscal emergencies.

¹³ (39) Lips [10], [12], [23], [32], [38], [39].

¹⁴ (34) Machairas [31], [44], [150], [154]; (35) Skoteine [10], [19]; (39) Lips [30], [42], [52]; and (40) Anargyroi [6].

¹⁵ (35) Skoteine [9] and (39) Lips [42].

CHAPTER SEVEN

The treatment of entrance gifts suggests a slight softening of the position advocated previously by the reform tradition. (34) Machairas [57] typically endorses the Evergetian position that postulants should not be required to pay entrance gifts, though voluntary donations were acceptable [58]. There is no discussion of the issue in either of the documents associated with Michael VIII's foundations, nor does (35) Skoteine address the issue, perhaps, in that case, for the very good reason that entrance gifts (voluntary or not) were an important source of revenue there. The author of (39) Lips [14] returns to the classic Evergetian position on entrance gifts; a presumably voluntary gift of this sort is recorded in [49].

Perhaps increasing criticism of the wealth of the empire's most successful independent religious foundations made some thirteenth-century founders leery of imitating the practice of building up a reserve fund as some monasteries did in the twelfth century.¹⁶ In (37) Auxentios [9] Michael VIII orders that his monastery should not store up unneeded revenue but instead donate it to various charitable causes, yet in (39) Lips [23] Theodora Palaiologina takes for granted the existence of a reserve fund at her convent.

11. Provisions for Financial Oversight

Thanks in part to the success of reform monasteries in the previous century, none of our authors doubted the importance of honest, competent financial administration for a religious foundation's well-being. Our authors did differ in their approaches for achieving it, however. In (34) Machairas [87], Neilos of Tamasia has the steward work under the superior's close supervision; the latter even accompanies [82] him on his inspections of the monastery's properties so that it was necessary to appoint [86] a second steward to substitute for the superior during his absences from the monastery. Maximos, the author of (35) Skoteine [21], also prefers that the superior should be involved in even the small details of the monastery's administration. In (37) Auxentios [7] Michael VIII seems to disagree as he orders the superior to rely on officials "of proven competence," since otherwise there would be "too much for one man to handle." Then, for the cloistered nuns in her two foundations, Theodora Palaiologina felt constrained to resort to salaried, non-resident laymen as stewards, who reported on a regular basis to the superiors of these convents.¹⁷

The procedural safeguards devised by the reform monasteries of the twelfth century also found favor with our authors. (34) Machairas [101] provides for a reconciliation of the monastery's financial accounts every other month while (37) Auxentios [9] orders that this should be done monthly. (40) Anargyroi [5] also requires the maintenance of a register of accounts while (39) Lips [22] mentions written records of property turned over for administration to the sacristan and treasurer.

12. Ambivalent Attitudes towards Aristocratic Privilege

Where it can be detected and analyzed, our authors' attitude towards aristocratic privilege shows a further move away from the egalitarian tendencies of Evergetian monasticism that had already begun in the twelfth century. This is true even for (34) Machairas, the only document textually linked to (22) Evergetis, where the relevant surviving Evergetian passages are toned down even ¹⁶ Cf. (27) Kecharitomene [24] and (29) Kosmosoteira [94].

¹⁷ (39) Lips [25], [26] and (40) Anargyroi [5].

INDEPENDENT AND SELF-SERVING MONASTERIES

when they are incorporated into the new document. This document's explicit acceptance [148] of ranks within the monastic community is its greatest concession to privilege.

Surprisingly, both Michael VIII and his wife Theodora Palaiologina are ambivalent about aristocratic privilege. In (37) Auxentios the emperor rationalizes [4] the superior's preferential treatment for some monks as a "certain wonderful equality that comes from inequality," but he also requires [12] that novices gain experience in all servile duties regardless of their former dignity or position. Similarly, the empress balances her extraordinary privileges [40], [41] for family members and noble ladies with a refusal [29] to tolerate demands for better food or more prestigious seating from nobly born nuns. Instead of defending or attacking privilege, she advocates [14] the novel notion of "equality of privilege."

13. Relations with the Ecclesiastical Hierarchy

Although our authors' relations with the ecclesiastical hierarchy were generally better than those of their counterparts in the twelfth century, the rights to which the local bishops were entitled remained a matter of controversy. Neilos, author of (34) Machairas, was perhaps the most accommodating. As bishop of Tamasia he was himself the local prelate at the time and, moreover, he was obliged [17], cf. [9] by the terms of the monastery's original grant of independence by Manuel Komnenos to concede to his episcopal successors commemoration (anaphora) in the liturgy and the right to install each new superior (cf. [140]). Neilos had also obtained [16] an episcopal stauropegion upon the erection of his foundation's church—a canonical requirement, to be sure, but one more honored in the breach than in the observance by Byzantium's patrons of religious institutions.

Maximos, the author of (35) Skoteine, enjoyed friendly relations with the local metropolitan of Philadelphia. Perhaps this led him to concede the latter's rights to grant [17] both blessing (sphragis) and installation (cheirotonia) to the foundation's newly chosen superiors as well as [20] commemoration in the liturgy and the rarely conceded right of spiritual correction. On the other hand, the author of (36) Blemmydes forbids [1] agents of the ecclesiastical hierarchy entry to his foundation, and orders [2] that there shall be no concessions of the rights to conduct investigations or spiritual corrections.

Michael VIII demonstrates that even an individual founder might not necessarily follow a consistent policy with regard to concessions of episcopal rights. In (37) Auxentios [2], [3] he concedes to the metropolitan of Chalcedon the rights of liturgical commemoration, blessing (sphragis) of a newly elected and installed superior, various honoraria, and (possibly) spiritual correction. As noted above, the emperor himself performed [3] the installation of the new superior in this foundation. In (38) Kellibara I, however, the emperor explicitly denies [15] any rights of overlordship, entry, or spiritual correction to the patriarch of Constantinople; the prelate is to content himself with the intangible rights of liturgical commemoration and proclamation. The emperor's wife also failed to provide any role for the patriarch in the installation of the superior in (39) Lips [1], though she does concede liturgical commemoration and the right to conduct spiritual correction of the convent's nuns.

14. Limited Provisions for Institutional Philanthropy

Only three of the seven foundations represented by the documents in this chapter made a significant provision for institutional philanthropy: (34) Machairas [118] mentions the maintenance of a hospice, (39) Lips [50] provides for a small hospital, and, most unusual of all, (37) Auxentios [9] orders the foundation's surplus revenues donated at the end of each year in order to ransom prisoners, support orphans, and provide dowries for destitute maidens.

D. Historical Context

1. Imperial Support for the Rights of the Ecclesiastical Hierarchy

Since the foundation for which (34) Machairas was written was regulated, in part, by concessions and privileges awarded to it by Manuel I Komnenos, it is necessary to go back to his reign to set the historical context. Just as the patriarchs who granted memoranda to the foundations represented by (30) Phoberos [35], (32) Mamas [1], and (33) Heliou Bomon [1] reserved certain rights for themselves such as obliging the monks to bring their newly elected superiors to the capital for patriarchal installation, as we have seen, Manuel I Komnenos also reserved some important rights for the local bishop as a condition of his own recognition of independence for Machairas. Thus (34) Machairas [9], [17] can rightly be seen as evidence of the delayed effect of a collaboration between the Komnenian emperors and the patriarchs intended to compel private patrons of independent monasteries to recognize the hierarchy's canonical rights.

2. The Controversy over the Award of Patriarchal Stauropegia

The willingness of Neilos, author of (34) Machairas, to apply for an episcopal stauropegion or "foundation charter" when he erected his monastery's church towards the end of the twelfth century is also noteworthy in the broader historical context of resistance by most benefactors to acknowledging the canonical rights of the local ecclesiastical hierarchy.¹⁸ In 1176, Patriarch Michael III (1170–78) had sided with Constantine Spanopoulos, bishop of Pyrgion, in overturning the concessions of patriarchal stauropegia that benefactors had obtained for churches they were rebuilding in the bishop's diocese on the grounds that these concessions unfairly diminished traditional episcopal rights in these facilities.¹⁹ By the 1180s, independent monasteries were also contributing to the problem thanks to their ambitious programs of building or restoring chapels located on their extensive properties. In 1191, Patriarch George II Xiphilinos (1191–98) was asked to decide if monasteries holding patriarchal stauropegia could extend their own rights to exemption from local episcopal control to their dependencies. Like his predecessor Michael III, this patriarch also supported the episcopal side of the argument against the interests of his own office, and he awarded the bishops liturgical commemoration, ordination of clergy, and the kanonikon, an ecclesiastical tax.²⁰ The patriarchate continued its disinterested policy of siding with the bishops against unscrupulous holders of its own stauropugia up until the Latin conquest of Constantinople in 1204.

¹⁸ See my Private Religious Foundations in the Byzantine Empire (Washington, D.C., 1987), pp. 238–43.

¹⁹ Venance Grumel, Les registes des actes du Patriarcat de Constantinople, vol. 1: Les registes de 381 à 715 (Chalcedon, 1932); 2nd ed. (Paris, 1972), no. 1131, quoted by Demetrios Chomatianos, De monasteriis et stauropegiiis, ed. J. B. Pitra, Analecta sacra et classica spicilegio Solesmensi parata, vol. 7 (Paris-Rome, 1891), pp. 348, 349.

²⁰ Grumel, Regestes, no. 1179; cf. 1180 (= Synodike apophasis, ed. Jean Oudot, Patriarchatus Constantinopolitani acta selecta [Vatican City, 1941], no. 8).

3. Growing Awareness of the Implications of Canon Law

The renewal of interest in canon law was itself one of the products of the reform movement that began in the eleventh century, and as we have seen, earlier documents in our collection (above all, (20) Black Mountain) show the impact of contemporary work in this field. Despite the early and continued selective use of canonical citations by our authors, during the course of the twelfth century it became as clear to Byzantine patrons as it is to us now that the canonical tradition, shaped as it was by the very different social conditions of late antiquity, generally favored the public authorities (i.e., the ecclesiastical hierarchy) over private interests in the resolution of most conflicts. Conversely, activist, reform-minded bishops like Constantine Spanopoulos realized that in canon law they had an effective weapon that, with patriarchal and imperial support, they could utilize in their conflicts with local private benefactors and, increasingly, the great independent monasteries. The Latin conquest, however, appears to have cut short the vigorous development of canonical studies that had been taking place in the twelfth century under patriarchal auspices.

4. Fracturing of the Reform Alliance

Thus the alliance between reform-minded private benefactors and like-minded members of the ecclesiastical hierarchy that dated back to the Synod of Blachernai in 1094 appears to have fallen apart well before the end of the twelfth century, perhaps as early as the reign of Manuel I Komnenos. The scathing critique of contemporary monastic foundations by Eustathios, metropolitan of Thessalonike († 1198), shows how far the formerly friendly relations had deteriorated.²¹ Eustathios' contemporary, the patriarchal archivist Theodore Balsamon, who himself was a moderate-to-conservative canonist, provides a discussion of the debate in ecclesiastical circles in the 1180s over the fundamental validity of founders' typika.²² This is additional evidence of deep hostility towards private benefactors, but that this basic question should have come up for discussion is not entirely surprising given that the canonical tradition did not even mention these documents. According to Balsamon, the most radical of his contemporaries wanted to declare all typika invalid, even if they contained no uncanonical provisions. To this party's way of thinking, all ecclesiastical property in a given diocese belonged by right to the local bishop, and therefore their patrons had no residual right to legislate for their foundations after dedication. Other, more moderate contemporaries were willing to accept the validity of founders' typika (cf. (54) Neilos Damilas [8]), provided that their contents were in accord with all the requirements of imperial and canon law. Another group accepted these requirements but added to them the obligation that the founder obtain specific imperial ratification of his typonon.

The remarkable fact is that, with the possible exception of (34) Machairas, none of the documents in this or previous chapters comes even close to meeting the requirements of any of the groups cited by Balsamon in his discussion, principally because since the beginning of the reform era their authors had routinely incorporated provisions restricting the rights of the ecclesiastical hierarchy. Therefore a vast ideological gap had opened up between the expectations of the ecclesiastical hierarchy, influenced by canon law, and the fundamental preconceptions of Byzantium's traditionally strong-willed and independent-minded private benefactors.

²¹ Eustathios of Thessalonike, De emendanda vita monachica, PG 135, cols. 729–910.

²² Balsamon, Comm. ad C. Const. I et II, c. 1 (R&P 2.651).

CHAPTER SEVEN

5. Impact of the Latin Conquest of Constantinople

It is too early in the present state of scholarly research to present more than a few generalizations about the impact of the Latin Conquest on the ecclesiastical foundations of the Byzantine Empire.²³ Initially, many, if not most, fell prey to secularization, particularly in Constantinople and its vicinity, but also in Thessalonike. Eventually, under pressure from popes Innocent III (1198-1216) and Honorius III (1216-27), the various Latin rulers who had divided up the conquests among themselves agreed to make restitutions or pay compensation, not to the previous owners, but to the new Latin Patriarchate of Constantinople and its dependencies. In the process of reconstituting a stable financing scheme for the patriarchate the complicated Byzantine system of mixed private, independent, and public ownership of ecclesiastical foundations disappeared as all the surviving monasteries became in effect diocesan institutions.

In Constantinople, at any rate, some twenty churches and fourteen monasteries continued to operate during the period of Latin rule (1204–61).²⁴ Among the latter was Pantokrator, although it is not known whether Greek monks remained there or whether they were replaced by Latins. In 1206, a papal legate donated the Evergetis monastery to the chief Benedictine monastery of Monte Cassino on the condition that the Greek monks resident there not be expelled. The Greek monks at Studios abandoned that famous monastery; there is no record that the facility was used during the Latin occupation. Many other religious facilities were abandoned and eventually fell into ruins. Some of these were restored in Palaiologan times after the Byzantines recovered the city: those represented by documents in this chapter are George Palaiologos' church of St. Demetrios (see (38) Kellibara I [12]), the convent of Constantine Lips (see (39) Lips), and the convent of Sts. Kosmas and Damian (see (40) Anargyroi [2]).

As for Byzantine foundations located on Latin territory outside Constantinople, the picture is less clear. On Cyprus, Neilos of Tamasia, author of (34) Machairas, managed to maintain the independence of his foundation and prevent its properties from being confiscated, perhaps through the expedients of designating [147] a protector (perhaps the Frankish King Hugh) for the monastery and appealing [161] to local magistrates for assistance in upholding the typikon.

6. Fortunes of Ecclesiastical Foundations in the Greek Successor States

Not much more is known at present about those foundations fortunate enough to have been located on territory that remained under Greek control in the various successor states of Nicaea, ²³ For the interim, see the studies of Robert Lee Wolff, "Politics in the Latin Patriarchate of Constantinople, 1204–1261," DOP 8 (1954), 225–94, "The Organization of the Latin Patriarchate of Constantinople, 1204–1261: Social and Administrative Consequences of the Latin Conquest," Traditio 6 (1948), 33–60, and "The Latin Empire of Constantinople and the Franciscans," Traditio 2 (1944), 213–37, all reprinted in Studies in the Latin Empire of Constantinople (London, 1976); my Private Religious Foundations, pp. 244–48, presents a summary of the salient points.

²⁴ R. Janin, "Les sanctuaires de Byzance sous la domination latine (1204–1261)," REB 2 (1944), 134–84.

Epiros, and Trebizond. As part of his own scheme to promote himself as the foremost claimant to the lost empire, the despot Theodore I Laskaris (1204–22) secured the appointment of Michael IV Autoreianos (1206–12) as patriarch-in-exile at Nicaea. The new patriarch then anointed his benefactor as emperor in 1208, but neither was able to secure his authority throughout the other Greek successor states. More than seventy years later, Michael VIII reminds Patriarch John XI Bekkos (1275–82) in (37) Auxentios [17] of this difficult period in the history of the patriarchate when the latter’s predecessors at Nicaea were belittled with the titles of “Patriarch of Nicaea” or “Patriarch of the province of Bithynia,” while the Nicaean emperors themselves were mocked as “alleged rulers of Romania.”

There was considerably greater institutional continuity for the Byzantine church in Epiros and Nicaea than in the lands that fell under Latin rule after 1204. The patriarchate’s weakened claim to authority in those Greek lands not ruled by the Nicaean emperors may have led first Manuel I Sarantenos (1217–22) and then Germanos II (1222–40) to abandon the policy of restraint in issuing patriarchal stauropagia that had been practiced in the late twelfth century by their predecessors back in Constantinople.²⁵ Indeed, the early patriarchs may have been especially keen to issue charters to private benefactors and independent monasteries in locations in Epiros, beyond the boundaries of the Nicaean Empire, but Patriarch Manuel II (1243–54) returned to the traditional policy of restraint when he chose to support an appeal by Demetrios, bishop of Domokos near Larissa, in a dispute with some private patrons of a local monastery.²⁶ In this case, the patrons had sought to transfer ancestral donations made to a monastery with an episcopal stauropegion to a new monastery for which they had previously secured a patriarchal stauropegion, thus hoping to escape Bishop Demetrios’ control.

Another feature of the religious history of the Nicaean state was the revival of churches and monasteries founded by individual clerics and monks.²⁷ Perhaps the legislation of Manuel I Komnenos awarding special tax exemptions to members of the clergy, which we know by Balsamon’s time had succeeded in reversing the traditional shortage of clergymen in the countryside, played some part in gradually promoting the conditions that made small-scale patronage of religious foundations like that seen in (35) Skoteine [2ff.] possible.²⁸ The Nicaean hierarchy may have encouraged such foundations as a useful counterweight to larger independent monasteries prone to the hostility evident in (36) Blemmydes [1].

²⁵ See Chomatianos, De monasteriis, ed. Pitra, pp. 339–44, and V. Laurent, “Deux fondations patriarcales en Epire aux XIIe et XIIIe siècles,” REB 12 (1954), 100–113, at 108, with Donald Nicol, “Ecclesiastical Relations between the Despotate of Epirus and the Kingdom of Nicaea in the Years 1215–1239,” Byzantion 22 (1952), 207–28.

²⁶ Manuel II, Peri ktetorikou dikaiou (R&P 5.119–20) = Vitalien Laurent, Les registes des actes du Patriarcat de Constantinople, vol. 1: Les actes des patriarches (Paris, 1971), no. 1314.

²⁷ For this phenomenon, see (35) Skoteine as well as the cartulary of the Lembiotissa monastery, F. Miklosich and F. Müller, Acta et diplomata graeca medii aevi sacra et profane, vol. 4 (Vienna, 1871), nos. 15 (MM 4.56–57), 16 (MM 4.58–60), 40 (MM 4.97–99), and 118 (MM 4.203–05).

²⁸ Franz Dölger, Regesten der Kaiserurkunden des oströmischen Reiches von 565–1453, 5 vols. (Munich-Berlin, 1924–65), nos. 1334 (= JGR 3.432), 1335, 1336; Grumel, Regestes, no. 1082; Balsamon, Comm. ad C. Nicaen. II, c. 15 (R&P 2.261).

CHAPTER SEVEN

7. The Palaiologan Institutional Reconstruction Program

After the recovery of Constantinople in 1261, Emperor Michael VIII Palaiologos (1259–82) faced a colossal task of rebuilding the many religious institutions that had fallen into decay and ruins in territories formerly controlled by the Latins. In the absence of their usual sources of funding, he also found it necessary to meet the expenses of the patriarch and the other members of the ecclesiastical hierarchy out of the imperial treasury.²⁹ The emperor's reconstitution of a venerable monastery of St. Michael led to the composition of (37) Auxentios late in his reign. Earlier, he had been working on the rebuilding of a church first erected in Komnenian times by his distant ancestor George Palaiologos. When refugee monks from the famous Kellibara monastery in Asia Minor sought his assistance, he decided to unite their remaining assets in and around Constantinople with his own project, leading to the foundation described in (38) Kellibara I. The foundation for which (36) Blemmydes was written in 1248 under the Nicaean Empire suffered confiscation after its founder's death and, as noted above, was subordinated to the Galesios monastery. During the reign of his son Andronikos II (1282–1328), Michael VIII's wife Theodora Palaiologina continued work on the restoration of ecclesiastical foundations, leading to the composition of (39) Lips and (40) Anargyroi.

²⁹ Pachymeres, De Michaele Palaeologo 26, ed. I Bekker, CSHB, vol. 1 (Bonn, 1835), p. 73.

34. Machairas: Rule of Neilos, Bishop of Tamasia, for the Monastery of the Mother of God of Machairas in Cyprus

Date: 1210

Translator: Anastasius Bandy

Edition employed: I. Tsiknopoullos, Kypriaka Typika (Nicosia, 1969), pp. 3–68, with corrections by K. A. Manaphes, “Paratereseis eis ta ‘Kypriaka Typika,’” Epistemonike Epeteris tes Philosophikes Scholes tou Panepistemiou Athenon 20 (1969–70), 155–68.

Manuscript: Autograph in the monastery hegoumeneion

Other translations: None

Institutional History

A. Foundation of the Monastery

The foundation traces its origin to the Palestinian monk Neophytos who, according to the typikon translated below, left [7] the Holy Land because of “the invasion of the godless Agarenes,” an event that has not been identified, and settled on Cyprus with his disciple Ignatios. Their extremely modest settlement was on Mount Aôos, about 20 miles southwest of Leukosia (modern Nicosia). How the attribute Machairas or “Sword” was acquired is unknown.¹ After Neophytos’ death, an elderly monk, Prokopios, joined [8] Ignatios. Hoping to pull themselves out of poverty by securing imperial patronage, they journeyed to Constantinople (probably some time in the 1160s), where they succeeded [9] in gaining from Manuel I Komnenos (1143–80) title to the mountain, an annual subsidy, a grant of institutional independence, and an edict restricting the rights of the local bishop of Tamasia (Tamasos) to liturgical commemoration. With this assistance, the two monks built [10] an oratory dedicated to the Mother of God and a few cells. By the time of Prokopios’ death, a modest community of five or six monks had developed.

Our author Neilos joined [11] the community in 1172, having arrived on Cyprus from an undisclosed point of origin with the intent of continuing on to the Holy Land on pilgrimage. He rendered signal service by traveling to Cilicia to obtain food for the brothers to relieve the effects of a famine and drought. Ignatios then drew up [12] a “written Rule” designating Neilos as his successor. Neilos’ own superiorship began [14] with a three-year drought, but the foundation’s fortunes eventually improved. Local benefactors donated land and movable property, and Neilos was able to erect [15] a church, a refectory, and cells. Niketas Hagiostephanites, the bishop of neighboring Tamasia, granted [16] a stauropolegion or “charter of foundation” for the church. Earlier, Neilos’ predecessor Ignatios had recognized [17] the local bishop’s right to install the monastery’s superior, a concession Neilos was eager to minimize [18], and happily he found Niketas to be accommodating. Eventually Neilos himself became bishop of Tamasia.² Perhaps this was when he founded [169] a nunnery at Tamasia, for whose support he earmarked [170] one-eighth of Machairas’ revenues.

THIRTEENTH CENTURY

B. Subsequent History of the Monastery

Despite Isaac Komnenos' successful usurpation (1184–91) of imperial authority on Cyprus, Neilos maintained [22] relations with the legitimate emperor Isaac II Angelos (1185–95), securing from him a confirmation of Manuel Komnenos' concessions, the gift of a garden in Leukosia, and a small cash donation. The conquest of the island by the crusader Richard the Lionheart in 1191 did not dim Neilos' enthusiasm for the imperial cause, for he secured [23] from Alexios III Angelos (1195–1203) a complete tax exemption for the monastery's properties and a grant of twenty-four dependent peasants. Whether Neilos actually secured any real benefits from these emperors in the absence of any effective control of Cyprus by the imperial government at this time is doubtful, yet Neilos clearly hoped for an eventual restoration of Byzantine rule. There is a conspicuous gap in the typikon where Neilos hoped [160] to indicate the name of a reigning emperor in order to designate him as the monastery's trustee.

The chances for a reassertion of Byzantine authority over Cyprus became even more remote when Constantinople itself fell to the Latin Crusaders in 1204. Meanwhile, the rule of the Lusignan dynasty became ever more firmly established on the island. At the time that the typikon was drawn up in 1210, the Lusignan king Hugh I (1205–18) had just reached his majority at age fifteen, enabling him to dispense with the regency of Walter de Montbéliard, Constable of Jerusalem and husband of the young king's elder sister Bourgogne.³ There are allusions [147], [161] in the typikon to the local authorities, but no direct recognition of foreign rule over Cyprus.

Although Pope Celestine III (1191–98) initiated the establishment of a Latin ecclesiastical hierarchy for Cyprus, the harsher consequences of Latin rule for the island's Greek orthodox religious establishments were likely delayed until after Neilos' death. The order for the expulsion of the Greek bishops came only in 1222 under Pope Honorius III (1216–27).⁴ Eventually the monastery lost most of its property and was reduced to destitution. The Ottoman Turks conquered Cyprus in 1571 and ruled it for over three hundred years. Machairas' fortunes revived in the eighteenth century under Parthenios, who served as the monastery's steward for nearly fifty years.⁵ He was a patron of Ephraim, who published the first edition of the monastery's typikon at Venice in 1756. At this time, Machairas was one of seventy-eight orthodox monasteries on Cyprus and, along with the Enkleistra of Neophytos (for which see (45) Neophytos below) and the Kykko monastery, one of only three stauropegial foundations independent of the regular diocesan authorities.⁶

The British occupation of Cyprus in 1878 brought an end to Ottoman rule. There were forty-six monks at the foundation in 1891 shortly before a devastating fire struck on September 5, 1892.⁷ The monastery was rebuilt, however, and continues in operation on its traditional site.

Analysis

Although this document dates from 1210 at a time when Cyprus no longer was part of the Byzantine Empire, it largely reflects conditions and institutions of a generation or two earlier. Textually related to earlier typika in the reform tradition, it testifies to the continued importance of the monastic reform movement in the early thirteenth century, though admittedly in rather attenuated form.

A. Sources for the Typikon

Aside from the eighty-one chapters (classified here as Group A) of apparently original materials,⁸ this typikon readily betrays its Evergetian heritage in its extensive quotations from (22) Evergetis and (32) Mamas even though the use of neither document is acknowledged. Forty-nine chapters (Group B) have textual links to both of these prior documents.⁹ Sixteen chapters (Group C) are shared with (22) Evergetis but not with (32) Mamas,¹⁰ while only ten (Group D) are shared with (32) Mamas but not with (22) Evergetis.¹¹ As usual with typika that are textually dependent on earlier documents, there are some original materials and reworkings to be found even in many of the transcribed chapters. Finally, there are fourteen chapters (Group E) that the author attributes to Basil of Caesarea;¹² most of these can be traced to the pseudo-Basilian Penitential, some to the Pachomian Precepts, and a few have no readily identifiable source.

The present document appears to draw on the Maman textual tradition (for the ten chapters in Group D) while also utilizing (22) Evergetis or some later version thereof (for the sixteen chapters in Group C). The bulk of the other borrowed materials (the 49 chapters of Group B), while shared with (22) Evergetis and (32) Mamas, probably were drawn from the former document except perhaps in two cases.¹³ By way of contrast, Nikephoros the mystikos, the author of (33) Heliou Bomon, obtained the considerable amount of Evergetian content in his typikon only through the intermediary of (32) Mamas. Here in (34) Machairas, either the author himself, or more probably, a direct non-Maman intermediary (for which see below) utilized (22) Evergetis extensively, turning to (32) Mamas only occasionally (mostly for the chapters in Group D).

An analysis of the content of the exclusively Maman-derived chapters suggests a carefully considered use of (32) Mamas to supplement or alter the tradition embodied in (22) Evergetis. For example, (34) Machairas utilizes the Maman tradition to emphasize [49] the importance of attending the office, to modify [65] the Evergetian treatment of quarrels over seating at meals, to include [78] the dietary observances intended to spite the Artzibourians, to incorporate [94] the stronger, post-Evergetian formula on the inalienability of sacred offerings, to emphasize [158] the unalterability of the cenobitic constitution, and to establish [161] a mechanism for outside support for the maintenance of the typikon. This document's textual preference for (22) Evergetis does not preclude its being an ideological descendant of the Maman tradition as well, for of the 75 Machairan chapters derived in whole or part from other typika, only 16 (Group C) come exclusively from (22) Evergetis.

References within the document to "the ancient regulation" [4], possibly an earlier typikon, but more likely the monastery's oral tradition, as well as to the rule (diataxis) [12], [18] of the author's predecessor Ignatios suggest some candidates for the source of the composite Evergetian/Maman tradition. The rule would have to date from some time after 1172, when Neilos arrived at Machairas to become Ignatios' disciple. The ancient regulation, however, whether oral or written, could have dated back to the monastery's foundation during the reign of Manuel I Komnenos (1143–80) (cf. [9]). The substantial similarity in content among (32) Mamas, (33) Heliou Bomon, and (34) Machairas, all written for foundations dating back to this emperor's reign and benefiting from his patronage, suggests that our document's source (oral or written) itself dates to some time after (32) Mamas was composed in 1158, probably in the 1160s.

The posited direct dependence on an earlier Machairan document or the institution's oral tradition can explain the Maman content in the present typikon, for (32) Mamas seems to have been the favored vehicle for the governance of imperially sponsored foundations in Manuel's reign. The reason for the Evergetian textual preference, even for matters covered in essentially the same way in (32) Mamas (see most of Group B), is harder to explain. To be sure, the Evergetian content in (34) Machairas has been considerably compressed into the latter's generally short chapters, and in the process, stripped of what must have seemed to our author's contemporaries and their immediate predecessors its rhetorical excesses (e.g., (22) Evergetis [13]'s octopus analogy for ambitious officials, missing from [88]) and, incidentally, of much of its reformist fervor. What our author implicitly endorses in his own typikon is the administrative rather than the ideological legacy of Evergetis.

Incidentally, this typikon's close dependence on the Evergetian tradition is helpful for overcoming some of its textual defects, enabling us to resolve some of the gaps in certain chapters and to surmise the content of others that are missing completely.¹⁴

B. Utility for the History of the Reform Movement

This typikon can be utilized for the fate of the monastic reform in the Byzantine world in the generation or two after the composition of (32) Mamas and (33) Heliou Bomon. The document's original chapters (Group A) are most important for this purpose. The author betrays little of the ideological fervor that had once distinguished the Evergetian reformers. He was not even committed to upholding an exclusively cenobitic approach to monastic life. Drawing instead on sentiments and reflecting concerns that were current a century after the composition of (22) Evergetis, our author seems most interested in taking an efficient, businesslike approach to running all the financial aspects of the monastery.

For this purpose, our author, like the first generation of post-Evergetian reformers, had a seemingly unbounded faith in the value of documentary evidence for establishing title to property (cf. [58]) and deterring (or at least detecting) theft. He intensifies the latter's earlier precautions designed to prevent internal theft by the monastery's own officials, but now the focus was not just on protecting monetary assets, but also movable property [95], commodities [99], and revenues in kind [83] as well as agricultural implements and other work tools [85] (cf. (35) Skoteine [44]). The precautionary record-keeping was taken down to the level of the monastery's individual tenant farmers and herdsmen, all under the direct personal supervision of the superior, which obliged the author to provide [86] for a second steward who would substitute for the superior in performing the latter's more traditional responsibilities vis-à-vis the monks.

Also useful for the fate of the reform movement are the typikon's chapters shared only with (22) Evergetis (those of Group C), which show (34) Machairas returning to certain Evergetian usages and institutions that had been abandoned by the Maman foundations. These include the institution of exclusive confession to the superior or his designee [50], [52] ff., [141], communal provision of garments [102], [103], reliance on monks as property managers [109], and the exclusion of women from daily charitable distributions [118]. Machairas' return to these more conservative (or radical, depending on one's point of view) Evergetian principles and practices shows that from an early thirteenth-century perspective, there was no one linear path of development from the sources of the reform tradition.

C. Lives of the Monks

1. Number of Monks

In the text as we have it today there is no numerical limit set on the number of monks although one is alluded to in [164], which envisions a one-to-one replacement of monks with no increase permitted. At the beginning of the superiorship of the author's predecessor Ignatios, there were [10] only "five or six" monks; but by the date of this document there were, in addition to the superior, no fewer than twelve officials, including two stewards [84], [86], the ecclesiarch [91], [93], the cellarer [91], [96], two treasurers [91], [100], [102], [104], the provisioner [91], [105], the storekeeper [105], the guestmaster [105], property managers [85], [105], [109], and a disciplinary official [114]. This suggests a foundation of twenty-five to thirty monks in all.

2. Liturgical Duties

Some of the monks were ordained clerics [165], cf. [164]. A priest, a deacon and a lamplighter were responsible [35] for the liturgical services. There are prescriptions for the performance of the canonical hours [31], [35], [42] through [46] that are textually independent of the parallel provisions in (22) Evergetis [6]. There are references [29], [30], [48], [73] to a liturgical typikon, apparently, judging from [75], a version of the Jerusalemite typikon of St. Sabas. The disciplinary official was responsible [114] for rousing the monks and for arraying them in choir. As in (22) Evergetis [4], the monks were also to celebrate [33] the office privately in their cells. As in (32) Mamas [21], monks were not to be excused [49] from performance of the office except for the sick.

In addition to the office, the monks celebrated the patronal feasts of the Mother of God [27], [29], above all that of the Presentation, which was to be celebrated "especially," while that of the Dormition was to be concelebrated by twelve priests. There are also prescriptions [26] for the regular illumination of the church. Departed monks were to be commemorated [157] in memorial services.

3. Manual Labor

There are incidental references to the practice of manual labor [32], [33], [86], [120]. Yet monks who pursued private crafts without the permission of the superior were liable [120] to having their handiwork confiscated or destroyed. The typikon specifically mentions a gatekeeper [116], a baker and his assistants [112], and also a carpenter, a cobbler and coppersmiths [104], [113]. Certain of the brothers also accompanied [83] the steward to the monastery's dependencies to help him gather the crops and witness the quantities collected.

4. Length of the Novitiate

Following (22) Evergetis [37], the novitiate was shorter [55] for notables (six months) than for others [56]. The latter were to serve in "appropriate tasks" for three years, continuing the trend towards a lengthening of the novitiate, exceeding even the two years required in (32) Mamas [22]. A monk from another monastery (a xenokourites) was eligible [60] for acceptance into the community after a probation of six months (cf. (32) Mamas [22]'s requirement of only eight days) and assent to the provisions of the typikon. Like the contemporary (45) Neophytos [9], the monastery was not to take in [115] lay youths for study of the scripture, but novices old enough to grow beards were to be admitted to learn the psalter.

THIRTEENTH CENTURY

5. Sacramental Life

The author follows (22) Evergetis [5] in providing [36] for the daily celebration of the liturgy. Although this frequency was a departure from more recent twelfth-century practice, the author does follow the trend of restricting his monks' access to communion. Those monks without sin were to partake once a week (cf. (22) Evergetis [5]: three times a week), while others were to partake twice a month (cf. Evergetis: once a week) or not at all. Additional provisions [40], [41] in this typikon reflect a new concern with the quality of the ingredients of the eucharistic bread (cf. (36) Blemmydes [4] ff.).

The author also follows (22) Evergetis [7] closely in imposing confession to the superior as a requirement on his monks. But here the superior was to hear [50] confession only once a day (cf. (22) Evergetis: twice a day). He could delegate the responsibility not only to the "more reverent brothers" (as in (22) Evergetis) but also to the "wearers of the great habit." At this monastery the superior was allowed to delegate [53] even the newcomer's first confession to "some of the more devout priests." However, the author took [54] a stronger line than (32) Mamas [29], supporting (22) Evergetis [15] in the latter's refusal to allow monks to have any other confessor than the superior or his designees.

6. Cenobitic Lifestyle

The author generally endorses the principles and language of (22) Evergetis [9], [25], [26] in support of the cenobitic lifestyle. All monks were to eat [79] in the refectory. The same food and drink (but not clothing) were to be provided [106] to all the monks, even officials. Clothing was to be provided [102] communally though the items distributed varied according to each recipient's rank in the community. Other personal possessions were forbidden [87], as in (22) Evergetis [13]. Our author did not share the antagonism of some of his twelfth-century predecessors (e.g., the author of (33) Heliou Bomon [26]) towards alternative forms of monastic life. Instead, he, like the author of (24) Christodoulos [A24], provides [152] for certain of the monks to live as solitaries in individual cells during the week, returning to the cenobitic community on weekends to eat with the brotherhood, turn over their completed handiwork, and receive new supplies and provisions.

7. Diet

The author provides ([67] through [78]) fairly elaborate regulation of the diet of his monks. There are indications [68], [70] that he, along with some of his twelfth-century predecessors (e.g., the author of (29) Kosmosoteira [6]), favored a more abundant diet, i.e., three cooked dishes instead of two, in certain situations in which (22) Evergetis [10]'s prescriptions were more austere. For Lenten Tuesdays and Thursdays, he introduces [69] a double dietary regime, austere for the strong and more lenient for the weak. He follows (22) Evergetis [10] in allowing [73] the superior discretion to alter the diet of the sick during the Lenten fast. Later, he allows both the superior and the steward to alter [99] diets to match the constitutions of individual monks. The eating of meat is explicitly forbidden [115], although in fact meat is absent from the dietary provisions of other Byzantine monastic foundation documents as well. In addition to seasonal times of fasting, the monks were also to fast [77] on three days of the week, Mondays as well as Wednesdays and Fridays, which is said to be a Palestinian observance. The author also adopts [78] the dietary provisions first seen in (20) Black Mountain [55] designed to refute the Artzibourian sectaries.

8. Servants and Agricultural Dependents

Monks were not permitted [87] to have personal servants. The author adds [115] that the bearded novices admitted for study of the psalter were not to be used as water carriers or for the performance of other personal services for the monks. The monastery's landed properties, however, were staffed [110] at least in part by lay farmers and herdsmen who were apparently hired laborers [82] paid a salary by the monastery, though the foundation also had twenty-four dependent peasants [23] as the result of an imperial benefaction.

9. Relations with Family

The author provides [136] for the reception of visiting relatives, though they needed to be announced to and meet with the superior first. Women were banned [115] from the monastery, however. They could not enter even for worship, such as on patronal feasts or for memorial services for their relatives, as the authors of (28) Pantokrator [18], (29) Kosmosoteira [84], (32) Mamas [27], and other documents were willing to allow.

D. Constitutional Matters

1. Independent and Self-Governing Status

The author adopts [21] the original formulation of (22) Evergetis [12] in declaring the independence of his foundation, that is to say, with no special provisions against the protectorate, epidosis, and other exploitation schemes such as in (32) Mamas [4]. An edict of Emperor Manuel I Komnenos (1143–80) had established [9] the institution's independence before the monastery had been built. The foundation also included [149] a chapel dedicated to St. John the Baptist that the author had erected east of the monastery. The author intended to draw up an inventory [150] of the consecrated movable property he had donated to this chapel. The author had also erected [169] a convent for nuns in Tamasia for which he had devised a "precise rule" and made donations of movable property. This convent was to be administered by the superior of Machairas and the ordained monk Neophytos as trustees (epitropoi).

2. Leadership

Citing common usage, the author designated trustees for his typikon, in the first instance God himself and his Mother [159], and also the emperor (unnamed) [160]. Since there was no universally acknowledged claimant to the Byzantine throne after 1204 and none at all who exercised control over Cyprus in 1210, it seems that the author preferred not to name anyone else as trustee who, like the trustees of the convent at Tamasis, might be in any position to interfere with the governance of his foundation.

There is a stray allusion [147] to a protector (i.e., an ephoros) to whom the leaders of the brotherhood were to resort if the superior should chance to refuse to stop spending the monastery's wealth improperly, yet there is no general treatment of this official's responsibilities or even an identification of who he might have been. In a subsequent chapter the author appeals [161] to "those who at the time are distinguished by the magistracies of the island," a circumlocution for Cyprus' Latin rulers, to uphold the integrity of the typikon. The ultimate source of this chapter is (32) Mamas [38], originally meant to describe the role assigned in that document to that foundation's protector (antilambanomenos). So perhaps the monastery originally had a formal protector whose role our author has reconsidered and incompletely edited out of the typikon as it now stands.

As usual, the effective supremacy of the superior in the monastery under the rule of the typikon is not explicitly acknowledged. The author evidently envisioned that each superior would designate his own successor, as he does [140] here in this document, and as he was himself chosen [12] superior by his predecessor Ignatios. Indeed, the author identifies [3] the need to prevent the appointment of the next superior from becoming “an accessory to seizure [of the monastery] and anarchy” as his immediate motivation for issuing this typikon. In the future, the actual choice would be made [17] by a vote of the brothers, subject to automatic ratification by the local bishop of Tamasia (cf. [18]). Unlike (32) Mamas [43], monks tonsured at other monasteries were not eligible [148] to become superior “for any reason whatever.” Monks tonsured within the monastery holding the rank of apostolikai or those entitled to wear the great habit (megaloschemoi) were to be preferred instead.

Despite the traditional reluctance to acknowledge the centrality of his position, the superior was the beneficiary of a trend to centralize the monastery’s administration in his hands. The superior was to appoint [100] the monastery’s treasurers. The implication, not explicitly stated, is that the superior should appoint [91] the rest of the monastery’s officials. He was intimately involved [82], [84], [85] in the financial administration of the foundation as well as in the oversight [97], [98] of the monastery’s supplies that were under the care of the cellarer. Moreover, the author allows [92] the superior to remove lesser officials (those installed without keys) whenever he saw fit rather than allowing them the traditional lifetime tenure conditioned on competent performance as in (22) Evergetis [32].

3. Authoritarian Style of Rule

The author combines the divergent Evergetian and the older Basilian traditions in prescribing the nature of the relations between the superior and the monks. Perhaps it is significant that, in a chapter commanding [142] the monks to obey their superior that is derived ultimately from (22) Evergetis [16], he drops “affection” from the list of attributes his monks should show towards their leader. Yet he adopts [144] the benevolent, paternalistic language of (22) Evergetis [17] in his guidance to the superior without making any significant changes. In reproducing [146], cf. [147] the provisions of (22) Evergetis [18], he even drops the latter’s command that the monks should not hold the superior accountable for his administration.

To these Evergetian provisions the author has added a series of canons ([122] through [134]), mostly from the Penitential traditionally attributed to Basil of Caesarea, that espouse (esp. [123], [131], [133]) a sterner view of authoritarian rule and monastic discipline that had already inspired similar provisions in (32) Mamas [24] and even in one instance in (22) Evergetis [22] itself.

4. Patronal Privileges

The author exercises [140] his patronal privilege of designating his successor, the ordained monk Joachim, as superior. Earlier, the author’s predecessor had done [12] the same for him through issuance of a written Rule (diataxis). The only other privileges noted in the document are prayers and liturgical commemorations: a “customary” trisagion [31] on behalf of the “holy fathers and founders” during the recitation of the canon of the first hour; prayers [44] for the emperor, the holy father (the patriarch?), the founders, the monks and their lay relatives during compline; psalmody and prayers [150] for the author at the chapel of St. John; and a joint annual memorial commemoration [154] for Neophytos, Ignatios and Prokopios, the author's predecessors.

5. Reading of the Typikon

The author utilizes the language of (22) Evergetis [43] in providing [167] for the reading of the typikon at mealtimes. This was to occur three times a year, rather than monthly as in (22) Evergetis. Monks from another monastery who sought admission were to have the typikon read [60] to them in order that they should give their personal assent to its provisions.

E. Financial Matters

1. Financial Administration

The steward was the chief financial officer of the foundation, but as the agent of the superior, without whose informed consent he was [84], cf. [87] to do nothing. His personal qualifications [80] and the procedures for his installation [81] both come from (22) Evergetis [13]. Our author adds [81] his preference that the steward, as well as the monastery's other officials [165], should be an ordained monk. The superior and steward were jointly to inspect [82] and take notes on the monastery's dependent properties. No one's accounts were to be examined [85], not even a shepherd's, except in the presence of the superior. Thus the author carries the obsession of his twelfth-century predecessors with preventing peculation down to the level of individual agricultural dependents' accounts.

As an apparent afterthought, the author adds [86] a provision for a second steward who was to look after visitors and the sick, provide necessary supplies for the brotherhood, examine revenues, and help maintain discipline in the absence of the superior. Perhaps the author thought such an official would be necessary for the periods when both the superior and the other steward were absent during their tours (cf. [82]) of the monastery's properties.

The author establishes grounds [90] for the deposition [88] of either steward that are based closely on parallel provisions in (22) Evergetis [14], [13]. Unlike that typikon, which allows a deposed steward to stay in the monastery, our author orders [90] his expulsion.

In addition to the two stewards, the monastery was also to have two treasurers. One would be responsible [100] for recording the monastery's revenues and expenditures as well as for making monthly withdrawals at the superior's command from the money box in the treasury (cf. the even more stringent security provisions in (32) Mamas [10]). The other treasurer would be responsible [104] for the storage and security of agricultural and other work equipment, apparently reflecting a realization that these also were valuable properties that required prudent management.

The typical twelfth-century post-Evergetian concern with preventing theft by a monastery's own officials is more than matched here by the author's provisions [101] for a reconciliation of accounts every two months by the first treasurer in the presence of the superior and the "leading monks." The stringent procedures outlined were designed so that "there will be no cause for scandal against him [the first treasurer] who has been entrusted with this office or anyone else." Neither the superior nor the steward were to take anything for himself out of the money box since "everything ought to be openly collected and spent."

THIRTEENTH CENTURY

The property managers (metochiaroi) were directly responsible [85], cf. [82], with assistance from others, for the cultivation of the monastery's landed properties. For this they received allowances in kind from the steward, who kept a written record of these payments. For the qualifications of these property managers, the author follows [109] the specifications of (22) Evergetis [34], with a change to preclude the use of laymen in this position (cf. [110]). Farmers and herders were to be recruited [110] from the ranks of the laity, however.

Overall, the author expected [29], cf. [170] the monastery's accounts to stay in balance, since he had "made the acquisitions of the monastery more abundant than its expenditures." One-eighth of the forthcoming revenues of the foundation were earmarked [170] for the support of the convent at Tamasia, including a stipend of twenty-four nomismata for the priests stationed there. According to Mango (Byzantium, p. 121), this suggests a total income for the foundation of twelve hundred nomismata.

2. Alienability of Landed Property

In a major break with one of the principles of the reform tradition, the author permits [111] the alienation of distant estates whose administration involved risk of spiritual harm. Given his insistence [110] that the monastery's properties be administered if not actually worked by monks rather than laymen, such a concession was probably inevitable. Such properties were to be traded for ones closer to the monastery. Proximate properties, however, were to remain absolutely inalienable on pain of sacrilege, which is in accord with the traditional reform principle.

3. Other Provisions against Misconduct

The ecclesiarch was to receive [93] a list of the church property entrusted to him, for which he was held accountable [95] in an annual check of movable property conducted by reference to an inventory.

The installation ceremonies for the rest of the monastery's officials are similar [91] to those set out for the steward and include the kissing of icons and reception of keys from the Mother of God.

4. Imperial Donations and Exemptions

In addition to recognizing the foundation's independence, Emperor Manuel I Komnenos provided [9] it with an annual grant (i.e., an imperial solemnion) of fifty nomismata. Subsequently, at the prompting of the author's emissaries, Isaac Angelos (1185–95) confirmed [22] his predecessor's benefactions and added the gift of a garden and a grant of twelve nomismata. Later, Alexios III Angelos (1195–1203) outdid both of his predecessors by issuing [23] a chrysobull that extended "complete immunity from taxation for eternity" to the monastery and all its immovable properties. The desire of founders to have endowments free of tax obligations was evident already in the twelfth century in (31) Areia [M10], [T6]. Alexios III also made a gift of twenty-four dependent peasants. The monks are instructed [23], [24], [47] to perform daily trisagia and commemorative services in exchange for these benefactions, though it is hard to see how they could have been of actual value to Neilos' monastery since neither Isaac II nor Alexios III exercised any political authority over Cyprus during their respective reigns.

5. Entrance Gifts Not Mandatory

The author endorses [57] the by now traditional principle of (22) Evergetis [37] that postulants should not be required to pay mandatory entrance gifts “as if [they were] legal.” He crystallized the core of the objection as follows: “For the so-called renunciation (apotage) destroys blessed submission.” Like (22) Evergetis, however, he welcomes [58] voluntary offerings, but includes additional precautions in an attempt to strengthen the foundation’s title to these donations should those who offered them seek to reclaim them on leaving the monastery. Donors of movable property were to make a deposition on the altar; those offering immovable property were to draw up a formal document of grant and dedication to God and place this too on the altar.

6. Other Sources of Income

In the early days of the foundation, the monks lived [7] off the charity of various benefactors. Later, our author solicited [15] donations of both movable and immovable property from various benefactors, which enabled him to erect the foundation’s church, refectory, cells, and palisade. He intended to list the immovable properties donated in a separate document (graphe), akin to an inventory. In gratitude, the author provides [156] for an annual commemoration of the monastery’s benefactors, following the example of (22) Evergetis [36] and (32) Mamas [40]. Yet in what he terms a “shuddering injunction,” the author announces [153] his unwillingness to allow the sale of siteresia, to be understood as living allowances, either to laymen or to monks, regardless of the benefits promised or amount of money offered in exchange. There is a rare and obscure allusion to tithes in [170] in the discussion of the financial support of the associated convent at Tamasia.

F. Overall Philosophy

The old Evergetian hostility to the existence of privilege is hardly evident in this document. As long ago in (9) Galesios [130], the monastic community here was divided into ranks, with the wearers of the great habit being the most honored, followed by the apostolikai. These orders were distinguished [102] not only by honor but also by dress, requiring an abandonment (cf. [106]) of the principal of equality in clothing advocated by (22) Evergetis [26]. Of course even (22) Evergetis [13], [14] reserved special rights for its “preeminent monks,” and more recently in (29) Kosmosoteira [3] we have seen a community divided into senior monks and servants. Here at Machairas the superior was to rely [50] on the wearers of the great habit for assistance in hearing the confessions of the other monks, and, along with the apostolikai, these ranking monks were to be [148] the preferred candidates for election to the superiorship.

Even where there are survivals of the traditional Evergetian hostility to privilege, they are generally toned down. The punishment for a monk who quarrels about seating precedence is reduced [64] from the expulsion provided for in (22) Evergetis (9) to being made to stand up and perform some service. The author turns to (32) Mamas [36] for a way to preserve [65], cf. [63] the superior’s prerogatives in arranging preferential seating while nominally endorsing the Evergetian observance. In [106], the Evergetian affirmation that the requirement of equal food and drink for all applies to officials drops out of our author’s own regulation. Moreover, the superior was to sit [117] with visiting officials at mealtimes during fasts and entertain them “differently” without criticism from the rest of the community.

G. External Relations

1. Relations with the Ecclesiastical Hierarchy

At the monastery's foundation, Manuel I Komnenos issued [9] an edict that prevented the local bishop from having "any authority over the monastery" except for the privilege of liturgical commemoration (anaphora). Subsequently, the superior Ignatios acknowledged [17] the prelate's right of installation (procheirisis) of future superiors, which said to have been granted by an imperial decree, though our author asserts that this was in practice to mean nothing more than an automatic ratification of the independent choice of the community. After our author built the monastery's church, he claims [16] to have followed "canonical procedure" in obtaining an episcopal stauropegion (a charter of foundation) from Niketas Hagiostephanites, the incumbent bishop of Tamasia, even though this was not specifically required by Manuel I Komnenos' original decree. Even though subsequently our author had himself become bishop of Tamasia, he warns [19] future bishops not to use the stauropegion and the right to liturgical commemoration as a pretext to interfere in the monastery's affairs. Should this occur anyway, the monks were to appeal to a representative of the emperor by presenting him with this typikon—a provision that obviously dates back to the era of Byzantine control over the island. The author obliges [140] his own successor as superior to obtain the sphragis from the new bishop of Tamasia. Bishops who were respectful of the monastery's rights were to receive [20] liturgical commemoration twice daily.

2. Institutional Philanthropy

The monastery, which lay on one of the pilgrimage routes to the Holy Land, emphasized hospitality, said [116] to be "a most royal gate to virtue," as its philanthropic contribution. Visiting monks were to be fed like residents; noble visitors were to be lodged—probably in the monastery's hospice or guest house (xenodocheion)—for three days.

No one was to be turned away [118] hungry from the monastery's gate, except, as usual, women, whose exclusion is justified [119] in the language of (22) Evergetis [38]. All others would be fed by the guestmaster (xenodochos) with bread from the table in the guest house. As in other institutions, the feast of the Dormition of the Mother of God, was the occasion [29] for an extra donation to the poor in accord with the monastery's resources. There is also a reference [170] to an allocation of a quarter of the foundation's revenues for "those who are struggling against the sacred disease" (leprosy), "and the other poor."

Notes on the Introduction

1. See the discussion in Hackett, Church of Cyprus, p. 346.
2. See his signature at the end of the typikon.
3. Hill, Cyprus, vol. 2, pp. 73–77.
4. Hill, Cyprus, vol. 2, pp. 46–47, with n. 3.
5. Hackett, Church of Cyprus, pp. 346, 348.
6. Hill, History of Cyprus, vol. 2, p. 25.
7. Hackett, Church of Cyprus, p. 348.
8. Group A: Chapters (81) new to (34) Machairas: [1], [2], [3], [4], [5], [6], [7], [8], [9], [10], [11], [12], [13], [14], [15], [16], [17], [18], [19], [20], [22], [23], [24], [25], [26], [27], [28], [29], [40], [41], [42], [43], [44], [45], [46], [47], [74], [75], [77], [82], [83], [84], [85], [86], [91], [93], [95], [97] [98], [99], [100], [101], [104], [105], [110], [111], [112], [114], [115], [116], [117], [120], [135], [136], [137],

34. MACHAIRAS

- [138], [139], [140], [149], [150], [151], [152], [153], [154], [155], [159], [160], [164], [165], [169], [170].
9. Group B: Chapters (49) shared with (22) Evergetis and (32) Mamas: [21] = (22) Evergetis [12] and (32) Mamas [4]; [30] = (22) Evergetis [3] and (32) Mamas [47]; [31] = (22) Evergetis [4] and (32) Mamas [47]; [32], missing, but cf. (22) Evergetis [4] and (32) Mamas [47]; [33] = (22) Evergetis [4] and (32) Mamas [47]; [34], cf. (22) Evergetis [4] and (32) Mamas [47]; [36] = (22) Evergetis [4], [5] and (32) Mamas [32]; [37], [38], [39] = (22) Evergetis [5], cf. (32) Mamas [32]; [48] = (22) Evergetis [6] and (32) Mamas [47]; [51] = (22) Evergetis [7] and (32) Mamas [30]; [55], [56], [57], [58] = (22) Evergetis [37] and (32) Mamas [22]; [59] = (22) Evergetis [37] and (32) Mamas [9]; [60] = (32) Mamas [22] and (22) Evergetis [37]; [61] = (22) Evergetis [9] and (32) Mamas [17]; [62], missing, but cf. (22) Evergetis [9] and (32) Mamas [17]; [64] = (22) Evergetis [9] and (32) Mamas [36]; [67], [68], [69], [70], [71], [72], [73], [76] = (22) Evergetis [10] and (32) Mamas [18]; [81] = (22) Evergetis [13] and (32) Mamas [7]; [87] = (22) Evergetis [22], [24] and (32) Mamas [34], [35]; [88] = (22) Evergetis [13] and (32) Mamas [2]; [89], [90] = (22) Evergetis [14], and (32) Mamas [2]; [92] = (22) Evergetis [29], [32] and (32) Mamas [6]; [106], [107] = (22) Evergetis [26] and (32) Mamas [34]; [108] = (22) Evergetis [41] and (32) Mamas [34]; [113] = (22) Evergetis [21] and (32) Mamas [35]; [144] = (22) Evergetis [17] and (32) Mamas [42]; [145] = (32) Mamas [44] and (22) Evergetis [18]; [146] = (22) Evergetis [18] and (32) Mamas [44]; [147] = (22) Evergetis [13] and (32) Mamas [44]; [148], cf. (22) Evergetis [17] and (32) Mamas [45]; [156] = (22) Evergetis [36] and (32) Mamas [40]; [157] = (22) Evergetis [36] and (32) Mamas [39]; [163], [166] = (22) Evergetis [42] and (32) Mamas [46]; [168] = (22) Evergetis [43] and (32) Mamas [46].
10. Group C: Chapters (16) shared with (22) Evergetis but not with (32) Mamas: [50] = (22) Evergetis [7]; [52] = (22) Evergetis [7]; [53] = (22) Evergetis [7]; [54] = (22) Evergetis [15]; [63] = (22) Evergetis [19]; [66] = (22) Evergetis [9]; [80] = (22) Evergetis [13]; [102] = (22) Evergetis [25]; [103] = (22) Evergetis [25]; [109] = (22) Evergetis [34]; [118], cf. (22) Evergetis [38]; [119] = (22) Evergetis [38]; [141] = (22) Evergetis [15]; [142] = (22) Evergetis [16]; [143] = (22) Evergetis [16]; [167] = (22) Evergetis [43].
11. Group D: Chapters (10) shared with (32) Mamas but not with (22) Evergetis: [35] = (32) Mamas [31]; [49] = (32) Mamas [21]; [65] = (32) Mamas [36]; [78] = (32) Mamas [19]; [79] = (32) Mamas [19]; [94] = (32) Mamas [37]; [96], missing; cf. (32) Mamas [11]; [158] = (32) Mamas [41]; [161] = (32) Mamas [38]; [162] = (32) Mamas [41]. These Machairan chapters also have analogues in (32) Mamas' close copy, (33) Heliou Bomon, which are not significant for our analysis here.
12. Group E: Chapters (14) derived from the Pseudo-Basilian Penitential or other late antique ascetic sources: [121], [122], [123], [124], [125], [126], [127], [128], [129], [130], [131], [132], [133], [134].
13. (34) Machairas [60], [145].
14. Missing chapters: [32], [62], [96], [155]; defective chapters: [31], [33], [63], [66], [67], [95], [97].

Bibliography

- Beck, Hans-Georg, Kirche und theologische Literatur im byzantinischen Reich (Munich, 1959), p. 695.
- Efthimiou, Miltiades, "Greeks and Latins on Thirteenth-Century Cyprus," GOTR 20 (1975), 35–52.
- Gregory, Timothy, and Wharton, Annabel, "Cyprus," ODB, pp. 567–70.
- Hackett, John, A History of the Orthodox Church of Cyprus (London, 1901), pp. 345–48.
- Hackett, John, and Papaioannes, Ch., Historia tes orthodoxou ekklesias tes Kyprou, 3 vols. (Piraeus, 1923–32), pp. 132–37.
- Hill, George Francis, A History of Cyprus, vol. 2: The Frankish Period, 1192–1432 (Cambridge, 1948).
- Magoulias, Harry J., "A Study in Roman Catholic and Greek Orthodox Church Relations on Cyprus between the Years A.D. 1196 and 1360," GOTR 10 (1964), 75–120.
- Mango, Cyril, Byzantium: The Empire of New Rome (New York, 1980), pp. 120–22.
- Menardos, S., "He en Kypro hiera mone tes Panagias tou Machaira," Epeteris tou Parnassou 10 (1914), 117–68.

THIRTEENTH CENTURY

———, He en Kypro Hiera Mone tes Panagias tou Machaira (Piraeus, 1929).

Talbot, Alice-Mary, "Machairas Monastery," ODB, pp. 1263–64.

Tsiknopoulos, J., He hiera basilike kai stauropegiake mone tes hyperagias Theotokou tou Machaira (Nicosia, 1968); rev. J. Darrouzès, REB 27 (1969), 304.

Volk, Robert, Gesundheitswesen und Wohltätigkeit im Spiegel der byzantinischen Klostertypika (Munich, 1983), pp. 227–32.

Chart Three: Analytic Chapter Groups of (34) Machairas

(34) Machairas
Group A
81 New Chapters

[1]	[2]	[3]	[4]	[5]
[6]	[7]	[8]	[9]	[10]
[11]	[12]	[13]	[14]	[15]
[16]	[17]	[18]	[19]	[20]
[21]	[22]	[23]	[24]	[25]
[26]	[27]	[28]	[29]	[30]
[31]	[32]	[33]	[34]	[35]
[36]	[37]	[38]	[39]	[40]
[41]	[42]	[43]	[44]	[45]
[46]	[47]	[48]	[49]	[50]
[51]	[52]	[53]	[54]	[55]
[56]	[57]	[58]	[59]	[60]
[61]	[62]	[63]	[64]	[65]
[66]	[67]	[68]	[69]	[70]
[71]	[72]	[73]	[74]	[75]
[76]	[77]	[78]	[79]	[80]
[81]	[82]	[83]	[84]	[85]
[86]	[87]	[88]	[89]	[90]
[91]	[92]	[93]	[94]	[95]
[96]	[97]	[98]	[99]	[100]
[101]	[102]	[103]	[104]	[105]
[106]	[107]	[108]	[109]	[110]
[111]	[112]	[113]	[114]	[115]
[116]	[117]	[118]	[119]	[120]
[121]	[122]	[123]	[124]	[125]
[126]	[127]	[128]	[129]	[130]
[131]	[132]	[133]	[134]	[135]
[136]	[137]	[138]	[139]	[140]
[141]	[142]	[143]	[144]	[145]
[146]	[147]	[148]	[149]	[150]
[151]	[152]	[153]	[154]	[155]
[156]	[157]	[158]	[159]	[160]
[161]	[162]	[163]	[164]	[165]
[166]	[167]	[168]	[169]	[170]

(34) Machairas
Group E
14 Chapters from the Basilian Penetential and other ascetic sources

[121]	[122]	[123]
[124]	[125]	[126]
[127]	[128]	[129]
[130]	[131]	[132]
[133]	[134]

THIRTEENTH CENTURY

As noted above, this document shares, probably through intermediaries, substantial portions of the texts of (22) Evergetis, (27) Kecharitomene, and (32) Mamas. In our translation, the borrowings are indicated in boldface type.

Translation

++ Index to the Rule of the monastery of Machairas +

1. Preface to the Rule
2. Concerning myself and the desire that is in my mind
3. Distinct reason for the Rule
4. Concerning the ancient regulation
5. Concerning the regulations that are going to be written
6. Concerning the beginning of the place
7. Concerning the monk lord Neophytos and the monk lord Ignatios
8. Concerning the monk Prokopios and his objective
9. Concerning the gift of the pious emperor
10. Concerning the building of the oratory
11. Concerning myself and my coming to the monastery
12. Concerning the rule of the old man
13. Concerning myself and the office [of superior]
14. Concerning the dormition of the old man
15. Concerning God's ineffable compassion and [about] the construction [of the buildings]
16. Concerning the stauropegion and the [right of] commemoration alone
17. Concerning the written injunction of the old man
18. Concerning the most holy bishop and the installation [of the superior]
19. Concerning those who will attempt to touch the things that are not to be touched
20. Concerning the fact that there is to be a commemoration of those who respect [this rule]
21. Shuddering curses against those who will make any attempt [to violate these injunctions]
22. Concerning the pious emperor, Lord Isaac Angelos
23. Concerning the pious emperor, Lord Alexios, and his gifts
24. Concerning the trisaqion of the emperor
25. Concerning the Christ-loving men and the immovable property
26. Concerning the illumination of the church
27. Concerning the feast day of feast days, the Holy of Holies
28. Concerning the rest of the feast days
29. Concerning the Dormition of the holy Mother of God [p. 4]
30. Concerning the [liturgical] typikon and precise canon of the church
31. Concerning the first hour
32. Concerning those who do not go on to their cells or to their handiwork
33. Concerning the [celebration of the] office in the cell

34. MACHAIRAS

34. Concerning the twelve days after Christmas and Pentecost
35. Concerning the third hour
36. Concerning the divine liturgy
37. Concerning the holy communion
38. Concerning those who do not receive communion
39. Concerning the prayers of holy communion
40. Concerning the [eucharistic] bread and wine
41. Injunction and additional emphasis
42. Concerning the ninth hour
43. Concerning vespers
44. Concerning the compline and the [begging for] forgiveness
45. Concerning the heavy semantra of the midnight office
46. Concerning the midnight office, how it ought to be sung
47. Concerning the big semantron and the trisaqion of the emperor
48. Concerning the beginning of the six psalms
49. Exhortation to the brothers concerning the office
50. Concerning the soul-saving confession
51. Concerning the fact that the brothers are to hasten to confession
52. Penalty for those who do not confess
53. Concerning the first confession
54. Concerning the confession to the superior
55. Concerning those who come to be tonsured
56. Concerning the change of clothing of the novices and their clothes
57. Concerning not seeking offerings from those who renounce [the world]
58. Concerning the voluntary offering
59. Concerning those who will attempt to seek the return of the dedication
60. Concerning the monks who come from another monastery
61. Concerning the table and food
62. Concerning the brothers who are absent from the thanksgiving
63. Concerning the reading at the refectory
64. Concerning those who seek seats of honor
65. Concerning those who ought to be preferentially seated
66. Concerning supper and missing the prayers
67. Concerning the regimen of the holy Lent [p. 5]
68. Concerning the Saturdays and Sundays of the holy Lent and [the appropriate] food
69. Concerning the Wednesday of the Great Canon
70. Concerning the [feasts of St. John the] Forerunner and [of] the holy Forty [Martyrs]
71. Concerning Palm Sunday and the [feast of] the Annunciation
72. Concerning the [feast of the] Annunciation, if it occurs during Holy Week
73. Concerning the Great Sunday [of Easter]
74. Concerning the week of Renovation
75. Concerning the week of St. Thomas

THIRTEENTH CENTURY

76. Concerning the fasts of the Holy Apostles and the Nativity of Christ
77. Concerning the three fast days of the week and their breaking
78. Concerning Artzibourios and the week of Cheesefare
79. Concerning the fact that all are to come to the refectory
80. Concerning the steward and his selection
81. Concerning the installation of the steward
82. Concerning the superior and the steward
83. Concerning the harvest and the brothers sent [to gather the crops]
84. Concerning the steward, that he is not to do anything without the knowledge of the superior
85. Concerning the superintendents of the dependencies
86. Concerning the steward who is on duty in the monastery
87. Concerning those who have some acquisitions in the monastery
88. Concerning the two stewards and if they are removed from their office
89. Concerning the stewards and the serious pursuit [of their duties]
90. Concerning those who administer the office of steward deceitfully
91. Concerning the installations of the officials
92. Concerning the offices that do not have keys
93. Concerning the installation of the ecclesiarch
94. Concerning the sacred offerings and the divine vessels
95. Concerning the superior, that he is to inspect the things of the church during the holy week of Renovation
96. Concerning the cellarer and his appointment
97. Concerning the superior, that he is to go into the storehouse and make an inspection
98. Concerning the fact that the cellarer is not to do anything without the knowledge of the superior
99. Concerning him who operates the storeroom treacherously and deceitfully
100. Concerning the treasurer and the things in the treasury [p. 6]
101. Concerning the rendering of account after the passage of two months
102. Concerning the garments and every giving and taking by the monks
103. Concerning the giving [back] of old [garments] and receiving new ones
104. Concerning the other treasurer
105. Concerning the superintendent of provisions and the superintendent of the storehouse and the travelers
106. Concerning [the fact that] food is to be the same [for all]
107. Concerning the ill and their diet
108. Concerning the fact that the ill are not to grumble for excessive food
109. Concerning those who are going to be superintendents of the dependencies
110. Concerning the fact that a layman is not to be made superintendent of the dependencies
111. Concerning the estates that involve [the risk of] spiritual harm
112. Concerning the baker and the brothers [who assist him]
113. Concerning the cobbler, the carpenter, and the rest of the manual workers
114. Concerning the disciplinary official

34. MACHAIRAS

115. Concerning the fact that the monastery is to be altogether inaccessible to women
116. Concerning hospitality to guests [who are] monks
117. Concerning the magistrates who visit
118. Concerning the poor who visit
119. Concerning the fact that alms should not be given to women who approach [the gate of the monastery]
120. An added remark to the superior
121. Canons of Basil the Great: 122, 123, 124, 125, 126, 127, 128, 129, 130, 131, 132, 133, 134
135. Concerning all the officials
136. Concerning the relatives of the brothers who visit
137. Concerning the canons of St. Basil
138. Concerning the above canons and decrees
139. Concerning the reasons for which these things were written
140. Concerning him who receives the leadership [of the monastery]
141. Concerning the brothers, that they are to confess to the superior
142. Concerning the fact that the brothers must have all goodwill and honor for the superior
143. Concerning the fact that they are to have love for one another and concord
144. Instruction to him who will be the superior
145. Exhortation to the brothers
146. Frightful penalties to the superior
147. To the superior who has disregarded the penalties [p. 7]
148. Concerning the fact that one who has been tonsured in another monastery should not receive the office of superior
149. Concerning [St. John] the Forerunner and his feast days
150. And [concerning] the holy icons [of the chapel of St. John]
151. Concerning the fact that another cell is not to be built
152. Concerning solitaries and their regimen
153. A shuddering injunction
154. Concerning the commemorations of our holy fathers
155. Concerning those who have dedicated properties to the monastery
156. [Concerning the commemorations of others worthy of remembrance]
157. Concerning the commemorations of all the brothers
158. Concerning my own judgment and the rule
159. Concerning the fact that following common usage a trustee is to be elected
160. Concerning the trustees: [they are to be] God and she who gave birth to him, and the emperor
161. A sworn appeal to the magistrates of the island at the time
162. Most shuddering curses against him who shall attempt to proceed towards the annulment [of the rule]
163. Instruction to the brothers
164. Instruction to the superior and regulation regarding [the number of] brothers

THIRTEENTH CENTURY

- 165. Regulation concerning clerics
- 166. Entreaty and appeal of the sinner Neilos to all
- 167. Concerning the fact that the present typikon is to be read three times a year
- 168. A brief and concluding prayer
- 169. Concerning the holy monastery for women in Tamasia
- 170. Concerning what this holy monastery must receive yearly [p.9]

Rule of Neilos, the ordained monk, superior and founder of the venerable monastery of the supremely holy Mother of God of Machairas. Father, bless.

I, the lowly monk Neilos, primate, signed with my own hand.

1. (Preface to the Rule)

The divine scripture teaches us that our present life is short-lived and flows away, calling our transient days “the flower of the grass” (James, 1:10), because man during his life blooms, as it were, but quickly passes away, cut down by death. Experience itself teaches this even more. Accordingly, we see our race every day being mowed down as an ear of corn and being summoned to the other world. Providence ordains it this way, that evil may be cut short and that we may thereby be transformed to a more divine life and undergo a really divine change and thus gain that which is good.

There is also another more divine and lofty thing for our benefit. What is that? It is the uncertain and indeterminate limit of each person’s life in order that we may thus always be prepared for our migration from this world and dispose well of our affairs so that even after death our opinions may be of benefit and become veritable pillars to those who come afterwards and of whom we took thought while alive.

2. (Concerning myself and the desire that is in my mind)

I, too, therefore, unfolding this objective in my mind and having come in my own thoughts to my inevitable debt, I now proceed [to write] my present Rule, while I am alive and have my faculties in good health and my mind sound by the grace of the omnipotent God. I am disposing of matters that certainly do not belong to myself. What [p. 10], in fact, do I have that is my own except that which is from the ordinance of the sacred canons and the injunction that supports them—even if through me God’s ineffable love for mankind has caused the fortunes of the monastery under my jurisdiction to rise to a greater and higher prosperity and condition, as will be shown below more clearly? But, indeed, I delineate matters that pertain to my other most devout brothers and set forth as living images the very things that are advantageous to my spiritual flock both physically and spiritually since there is, in fact, much need of both [physical and spiritual] care for these sheep.

3. (Distinct reason for the Rule)

Such then is the objective of the present Rule. However, there is another very good reason: that after my departure to the Lord the appointment of the superior may not become an accessory to seizure and anarchy, which very thing the love of power and contentious opposition that gradually emerges therefrom are accustomed to produce. By making this [opposition] the starting point for inciting trouble and by assuming its shape, the Evil One brings on a “turbid subversion” (Hab. 2:15) and a disturbance of the dignified life and the most noble conduct.

4. (Concerning the ancient regulation)

Moreover, [there is another reason]: that, having been laid down in my present Rule, the ancient regulation, which has been observed from the beginning, may be preserved up to the end unadulterated and altogether unmutilated, just as it has been preserved hitherto by God’s providence.

5. (Concerning the regulations that are going to be written)

The regulations of our holy monastery and the appointment of him who after me will hold the office of superior, the reasons as well as the times when the regulations of our cenobitic community are to be observed according to custom, will be written in separate chapters in the present manual with the approval of God and the pure Mother of God who conceived him without [human] seed.

6. (Concerning the beginning of the place)

It was necessary for me to mention in a condensed, general account and to present [p. 11] beforehand what sort of place it was in which our most holy monastery existed originally and what kind of change it underwent for the better with the approval of the all-benevolent God.

7. (Concerning the monk lord Neophytos and the monk lord Ignatios)

There was a certain old man, a bearer of the Spirit, Neophytos by name, who was leading the ascetic life, practicing asceticism in the deserts beside the [river] Jordan, and had become a consummate ascetic, celebrated for his moral excellence. The old man abandoned the places there because of the invasion by the godless Agarenes and came to the island. Because he had found the mountain impassable and harsh and away from all human disturbance, quiet and suitable for ascetic struggles, he chose to dwell there, having also as a companion his own disciple, namely the monk lord Ignatios. As soon as they built themselves a hut, they proceeded to inhabit the wilderness like a city and to procure their daily nourishment at the hands of some Christ-loving people. While they were living in such an angelic manner, the most honorable old man departed to the Lord and left behind his hut and his “mantle” to the new “Elisha.” (III Ki. 19:20) While the latter was toiling and being oppressed by poverty, he took the initiative to beautify the harshness of the uneven place as much as he could.

8. (Concerning the monk Prokopios and his objective)

He accepted an aged ascetic, Prokopios by name, having the latter as a consolation in place of his departed father. Whereas his eagerness was vigorous as regards the beautification of the place, his hand began to slacken because it was oppressed by poverty.

The thought came upon them to go off to the great city [of Constantinople] and to petition the pious emperor and to have him respond generously by his godly might to the poverty that was gripping them.

THIRTEENTH CENTURY

9. (Concerning the gift of the pious emperor)

He, the emperor Lord Manuel [I] Komnenos [(1143–1180)], Born-in-the-Purple, who was really a lover and imitator of Christ, not only listened to their petition and provided for [p. 12] them through an imperial and venerable decree to receive yearly fifty trikephala nomismata but also made a present to them of the mountain and the area around it. Furthermore, he made the monastery that was going to be built independent of every person, and through another edict prevented the prelate in the district from having any authority over the monastery and the monks who practice asceticism in it except merely [the privilege of] commemoration.

10. (Concerning the building of the oratory)

With God coming to their aid, they built the oratory which was named in honor of the supremely holy Mother of God, and they acquired only a few cells. [Then], the aforesaid old man [Prokopios] also departed to the Lord.

When he had been left behind, the monk lord Ignatios along with some brothers, no more than five or six, kept doing the things that were pleasing to God. For, in fact, the true man of God was striving not so much for his own advantage but for that of the men who were being shepherded by him. For the man was wholly spiritual [and] at all times he kept strengthening those under him so that they might nobly bear the toils of asceticism. Thus the man's fame spread and all ran to him as towards "the fragrance of ointment" (Song of Solomon 1:3), I mean his virtues.

11. (Concerning myself and my coming to the monastery)

I myself, the least [of men], was also moved in this way in the year 6680 from the creation of the world [= 1172 A.D.], and a strong desire came upon me to see the holy places and to do reverence to them and spend my whole life in submission to the fathers there.

In fact, rather quickly the desire became deed. When I had embarked on a sea voyage and had arrived at the island and had met with virtue-loving men, who praised both the tranquility of the island and the fact that this quite deserted place was suitable to those who wanted it for the purpose of asceticism, I chose to believe the words of the admirable men. I besought and earnestly entreated the latter to point out to me a tranquil place, and they yielded to my lowly request and indicated both the place and the old man [lord Ignatios]. [p. 13]

I, for my part, having made the obeisance that is customarily made to monks and having made known to him all the details of my objective, remained with him and was reckoned among his spiritual sheep. I had him as a spiritual father and guide of my deeds and salutary teacher of all things that are good and an unerring leader toward the road of the monastic life. I always submitted to his God-pleasing wishes. For having altogether denied my own will, I became in all things his own hand, foot, and staff of old age, coming to his aid and toiling together with him for the acquisition and establishment of the monastery. Also, when the island was being oppressed with famine and drought, I was sent by him to Cilicia for the purpose of ministering to the procurement of provisions for my brothers who are practicing asceticism with me. During his whole life I rendered every service to the monastery, for, in fact, I was doing everything pursuant to his judgment and wish.

34. MACHAIRAS

Since he found me, by the grace of God, thinking and doing everything to serve him, what did he do?

12. (Concerning the rule of the old man)

He set forth a written Rule and chose me for the leadership of the brothers and laid upon me the ministry of leadership and the office of superior. Yet, I—even if that which I am about to say should perhaps seem to be in bad taste, although certainly not to those who know me—put off the leadership.

13. (Concerning myself and the office [of superior])

I was all in tears, and, by pressing my face to the ground, I kept seeking to cast away from myself the burden of leadership. He, however, with some gentle and mellifluous instructions won me over. “It is not right, child,” he said, “to resist or to dispute God’s unavoidable judgments; for ‘what God has purposed, who shall frustrate?’ (Is. 14:27). For, as his ineffable compassion allows, so he will manage the matters that pertain to you that this harsh and dry place may be both bright and beaming and that you may become a cause of salvation to many souls and lead this obscure and small flock to expansion, with the approval of God and the pure Mother of God, and that you may set forth for them regulations and standards that lead to the monastic life and safety. May you always have the grace of the Holy Spirit giving you its approval as well as the prayers of our holy fathers.”

I, for my part, after I had made the customary obeisance, proceeded to ask for forgiveness and I left the whole thing up to God. [p. 14] He, his eyes filled with tears and looking up to him who watches over the universe, granted forgiveness and prayed that “power from on high” (Luke 1:35) be given to me. I, in fact, clung to his admonition and judgment; and neither did he fail utterly in his hopes for me, nor indeed did I fail, as I trust in God, to win his holy prayers, through which until now I am being preserved. I became quite anxious that the venerable monastery under me make progress with the good will of God.

14. (Concerning the dormition of the old man)

But it is, indeed, necessary to add to the narrative the events after the dormition of my father, and how the fortunes of the monastery were again reduced to a critical state and what way out of our great straits God granted us. For his is that truthful voice which says, “I will never fail you nor forsake you” (Heb. 13:5). Trusting in this [saying], we passed into relief from the great discouragement and storm which the multitude of our sins caused us, because the island was held in the grip of drought for three years and all were crushed and destroyed.

15. (Concerning God’s ineffable compassion and [about] the construction [of the buildings])

His ineffable love for mankind, however, helped us and lavishly granted us supplies in the following way: some of the Christ-loving and faithful men worked together with us for the purpose of assisting us and dedicated to the monastery revenues from their personal possessions, both immovable and movable, over which, in fact, we exercise ownership. We erected the church and adorned it splendidly, such as it is seen today, and in like manner the refectory, too, as seen at the present time, and we made a palisade around the monastery and built cells in such condition as seen at the present time, and that impassable and rugged place was converted with much toil to level ground and we turned it into a cenobitic community by the grace of Christ, the pure Mother of God working together with us in all things. She will grant us supplies also for the future, as I both trust and pray. [p. 15]

THIRTEENTH CENTURY

16. (Concerning the stauropegion and the [right of] commemoration alone)

Since in accordance with canonical procedure it was appropriate for us to receive also a stauropegion upon the erection and dedication of the holy church, this indeed we have done. We received a stauropegion from the most holy bishop of Tamasia, lord Niketas Hagiostephanites, and in accordance with the imperial and venerable decree of the pious emperor, lord Manuel Komnenos, the bishop has the right of commemoration and that alone.

17. (Concerning the written injunction of the old man)

But that father of ours of blessed memory, the monk lord Ignatios, also prescribed before his departure to the Lord that the prelate in the region have the right of commemoration and that alone, in accordance with the imperial and venerable decree, and [the right] of the installation of him who will hold the office of superior at the time. The very one whom the brothers shall have selected beforehand and approved by vote, him he shall install for them without having examined in any way him who has been voted.

18. (Concerning the most holy bishop and the installation [of the superior])

This very thing, in fact, the most holy lord Niketas Hagiostephanites of blessed memory did. He gave me the appointment and confirmed the prescription of my father with his own hands and he bound fast his successors with the most shuddering penalties.

19. (Concerning those who will attempt to touch things that are not to be touched)

If, however, any of those who will undertake the helm of the most holy bishopric at the time attempts to touch [this regulation] under the pretext of the stauropegion and his commemoration, he is not to be obeyed. Instead, the brothers shall petition him who at the time acts as the representative of our holy emperor and shall point out to him the present typikon and shall check the impetuosity of him who attempts to move things that are immovable. [p. 16]

20. (Concerning the fact that there is to be a commemoration of those who respect [this rule])

I prescribe that those who respect and abide by this custom which has been observed from the beginning are to be commemorated in all the evening and morning doxologies and services while they are alive and after death.

21. (Shuddering curses against those who will make any attempt [to violate these injunctions])

[= (22) Evergetis [12], ed. lines 538–53]: We instruct all in the name of our Lord God the Ruler of All that this holy monastery, which has been erected by me from its foundations, is to be kept independent and unenslaved, free of everyone’s control, and self-governing, and not subject to any rights, be they imperial or ecclesiastic or of a private person, but it should be watched over, steered, governed and directed only by God and his undefiled Mother, and by the one acting at the time as superior.

If anyone ever in any way or at any time wishes to gain control over this monastery or put it in subjection or place it under someone’s power, let him who has dared this, whoever he may be, “be held responsible for the divine body and blood of our Lord” (I Cor. 11:27) and God and Savior Jesus Christ. He shall have the pure Mother of God as an opponent and enemy on the Day of Judgment. Let, then, this monastery remain independent of all human authority.

22. (Concerning the pious emperor Lord Isaac Angelos)

It is necessary for the train and sequence of the narrative to add to what I said above some things that have been left out. For, in fact, certain brothers were dispatched by me to the pious emperor, Lord Isaac [II] Angelos [(1185–95)], and after they had besought his imperial majesty, the chrysobulls of the celebrated emperor, Lord Manuel Komnenos, were confirmed by his divine hand. Not only did he do this but he also made a present of a garden to our monastery from the imperial properties in Leukosia and the minting of twelve hyperpyra nomismata.¹

23. (Concerning the pious emperor Lord Alexios and his gifts)

Also the emperor Lord [p. 17] Alexios [III] Angelos [(1195–1203)], the true lover and imitator of Christ, through an imperial and venerable chrysobull, extended to our holy monastery and to all the immovable properties that have come to the monastery from any source whatsoever complete exemption from taxation and freedom for eternity. He also made a gift of twenty-four dependent peasants.² I also prescribe that these emperors be commemorated not by saying, as is the custom, “Again we pray for the most pious . . .,” but particularly in all the supplications of the vigil.

24. (Concerning the trisagion of the emperor)

After saying, “Save, O God, thy people . . .,” we are to say the following prayer, “Again we pray for our most pious and Christ-loving emperor Lord Alexios. Kyrie eleison!” twenty times. [We must repeat this prayer] after the midnight office, as will be discussed further down.³

25. (Concerning the Christ-loving men and the immovable property)

Besides, some other immovable possessions were dedicated to the monastery by faithful and Christ-loving men, which will be listed in a separate document⁴ according to their kind.

26. (Concerning the illumination of the church)

Before all other things I am going to speak of the most beautiful and loftiest topic, I mean, of course, the holy church. I shall prescribe a brilliant illumination, and further down I shall explain more clearly about the singing of psalms and the rest of the order.

At the daily doxologies and all services, the church shall be illuminated, as usual, with four tapers. Not only this, but they shall light an equal number of lamps which burn continually, night and day, at each of the two holy altars and at the sacred and divine icons which are to be venerated, as well as the twelve lamps of the choros and the two of the narthex. They shall have sufficient oil for these lamps, as is the custom.

THIRTEENTH CENTURY

27. (Concerning the feast day of feast days, the Holy of Holies)

We must certainly celebrate brilliantly the renowned and brilliant feast days and especially that of the Entry [of the Virgin into the Temple].⁵ For we shall open the gate and receive with joy all those who enter [p. 18] and refresh them kindly, and they shall be lavishly feasted. For if you do this, you will have the Divinity lavishly granting you his blessing “a hundred fold” (Mark 10:30; Luke 18:30), according to his undeceiving and divine statement.

28. (Concerning the rest of the feast days)

The other divine feast days of our holy Mistress, the Mother of God, that is the birth, the commemoration, the Purification, and that of the Annunciation,⁶ as I have indicated above, the brothers together will celebrate and be refreshed. They will be provided with fish by the monastery and a treat [of an extra serving of wine] shall be given, in accordance with custom, and they shall be lavishly feasted.

29. (Concerning the Dormition of the holy Mother of God)

But you must celebrate brilliantly the universally [celebrated] Dormition.⁷ Not as you do the Holy of Holies, but you must invite only twelve priests, and you must celebrate the departure [from life] of Our Lady, and you must care for the poor in accordance with your ability and not use as a pretext poverty, the scarcity of revenue, that is. For I have made the acquisitions of the monastery more abundant than its expenditures, and they were dedicated through the intercessions of the supremely holy Mother of God. On this feast day we eat grapes, as the [liturgical] typikon of the church expounds.⁸

30. (Concerning the [liturgical] typikon and precise canon of the church)

Since it was necessary for this holy monastery, after it had been auspiciously established, to have also a [liturgical] typikon and an accurately described canon of ecclesiastical order and of the rest of the way of life of the cenobitic community, I recorded particularly the matters of ecclesiastical rite and order. But it is necessary to consign to writing also all the things that have been omitted in that volume but by tradition have been handed down to us, so that partly they may be easily taken in at a glance and partly that nothing may be corrupted by anyone.

[= (22) Evergetis [3], ed. lines 66–70]: We must, therefore, pay heed most precisely to the things that will be stated, which I shall begin from a preferable place. It is preferable to begin with the hour that brings us the light, that is the first hour of the day, and I think it absolutely necessary that those who are going to give a description of the works of light should begin following the light. [p. 19]

31. (Concerning the first hour)

[= (22) Evergetis [4], ed. lines 75–76]: So after the worship of matins, the office of the first hour should be sung by you following on immediately, as is customary and at the end of this while the customary trisagion is being performed at the narthex, the priest says: “Pray for our holy fathers and founders.”

[= (22) Evergetis [4], ed. lines 116–19]: After its completion, you must depart to your cells, avoiding all meeting together and foolish distraction, idle chatter, and disorderly laughter. For what comes of such things? Clearly, the lapsing into disgraceful talk, abuse, and condemnations because . . . [Gap in text, cf. (22) Evergetis [4], lines 119–26]: [your mind is relaxed by this and you forget what is really good, and reaching your cells in a dilatory and lazy frame of mind you sink at once into a sleep of akedia and pass almost all the day in idleness without engaging in any beneficial activity whatever, as the great Basil also says, “To lapse from a fitting spiritual state is easy when the soul indulges in unrestrained laughter, and it is easier for a concern for goodness to be dissipated and lapse into disgraceful talk.”]⁹

32. (Concerning those who do not go on to their cells or to their handiwork)

[Missing chapter; cf. (22) Evergetis [4], ed. lines 127–35]

33. (Concerning the [celebration of the] office in the cell)

[= (22) Evergetis [4], ed. lines 139–42]: . . . and the care of handiwork or reading, and besides the genuflections according to one’s ability, inasmuch as he has received from the father an order to avoid [genuflections] only in the church when the psalm, “God is the Lord” (Ps. 117 [118]: 27) is sung. So when you pray in your cells you should always kneel down, except Saturday and Sunday, but whenever there is a vigil, we will avoid genuflections in the cells.

34. (Concerning the twelve days after Christmas and Pentecost)

[cf. (22) Evergetis [4], ed. line 142]: Besides, we must avoid genuflections during the twelve days after Christmas and the entire Pentecost, and during all the feasts of the Lord and those of the twelve apostles and the commemorations of all the great saints on which we are accustomed to hold vigils. In like manner, we shall observe also the singing of the mesoria in our cells during the entire Pentecost, during both its first week and the last [week], I mean both the week of Easter and that of the Holy Spirit.

35. (Concerning the third hour)

[= (32) Mamas [31], ed. lines 25–31]: When the semantron then is struck at the time that is proper, all must assemble in the narthex and there sing together the third and the sixth hours [p. 20] along with mesoria. At the beginning, however, of the sixth hour, both the priest and the deacon who have the priestly duties for the day and the lighter of the lamps along with them must make a genuflection to the superior, and, while the former must enter into the holy sanctuary to prepare this divine oblation, the latter must go off to strike the large semantron.

36. (Concerning the divine liturgy)

[= (22) Evergetis [4], ed. lines 145–47]: So the ritual of the third and sixth hours should be like that on the days of the year that are free from fasting. [= (22) Evergetis [5], ed. lines 151–57]: It is necessary now also to speak about the divine mystery, which must of necessity be celebrated in the church each day, but you yourselves must be sure to take care in this, my brothers, because what is performed there is divine and fearful, and because there more than in anything else the fearful and very great mystery of our orthodox and divine faith is accomplished, I mean the most divine and most precious sacrifice of the completely undefiled blood of our Lord God and Savior Jesus Christ.

37. (Concerning the holy communion)

[= (22) Evergetis [5], ed. lines 157–84]: So during it, as has been said, you must pay strict attention, and as far as possible chase from you every thought that is impure, sown by the devil, and unworthy of that fearful consecration, and purify yourselves in every way. Then as many as have been allowed by the superior to partake of communion should partake of the divine elements. For it will not be possible for any of you to partake freely and in a thoughtless manner, nor each day. This we would indeed wish, for to partake continuously of the divine elements is continuously to share in life, as Christ himself says, “He who eats my flesh and drinks my blood abides in me, and I in him” (John 6:56), and again, “Unless you eat my flesh and drink my blood, you have no life in you” (John 6:53), and as the divine apostle says, “He who is united to the Lord becomes one spirit” (I Cor. 6:17), and as the most gentle David says conversely, “Those who distance themselves from you will perish” (Ps. 72 [73]:27).

Therefore we would indeed wish this, as has been said, but because of human weakness and the danger of the action we do not allow it, for “Whoever eats the body and drinks the blood of the Lord unworthily is guilty of his body and blood” (I Cor. 11:27) says Paul, the divine and inspired speaker and leader of the apostles. [p. 21] This statement is frightening, my brothers, and causes not only sinners like me but also those who are very confident in themselves to fear partaking. So then as many as are sure that they are pure and free from disgraceful thoughts and submission to them, from anger and grumbling, grief and denigration, deceit and disorderly laughter, furthermore and more especially the bearing of a grudge and irritation, disgraceful talk and such things, should partake of communion once a week. But those who fall prey to the aforementioned passions and hasten to a renunciation of them through confession and repentance should partake of communion twice a month or not at all, at the discretion of the superior of course, for he should be in charge of such matters.

38. (Concerning those who do not receive communion)

[= (22) Evergetis [5], ed. lines 185–86]: But for someone to consider himself unworthy of communion without his knowledge cannot be approved. For he who does this will be condemned as someone fulfilling his own wish.

39. (Concerning the prayers of holy communion)

[= (22) Evergetis [5], ed. lines 187–91]: However it is permitted that those who should partake of communion read more attentively the prayers laid down for the partaking, make a common genuflection together to one another to grant forgiveness, and thus joyfully partake of the life-giving elements. So let these things be carried out in this way.

40. (Concerning the [eucharistic] bread and wine)

But since I have come to this point of the discussion, I must speak also about the [eucharistic] bread and wine that are brought to the holy altar for a “living sacrifice” (Rom. 12:1), which is holy, pure and bloodless, lest, because some carelessness or disregard has crept in with regard to these matters, we err unawares with respect to the greatest and loftiest [sacrament]. For, if Cain was condemned because of this very thing, for not offering to God, that is, the best things, but keeping them and storing them up for himself (cf. Gen. 4:2–5), I fear lest we, too, should be found to be liable to such a condemnation, if we do not offer the best to the Giver and Bestower of all things. [p. 22]

41. (Injunction and additional emphasis)

This surely I also enjoin: that the offerings of [eucharistic] bread not be made from the common dough from which the loaves of bread for the [refectory] table are made, but that the flour be separately sifted and kneaded and that from this [dough] be made the offerings of [eucharistic bread] that are altogether pure. Also that the [eucharistic] wine be given from the best wine produced in the monastery. If the superior should set aside some of this [bread and wine] for himself or even for those whom he himself knows not to be healthy in body to eat and drink at table, he shall not at all be condemned.

42. (Concerning the ninth hour)

The ninth hour and its mesoria must be sung as follows. After we have risen from our eating at the common table, the brotherhood sings the psalm, “The Lord is merciful and compassionate. He has given food to them that fear him” (Ps. 110 [111]:5), three times and together with it the trisagion, as is customary. Then the priest adds this prayer, “Blessed is God who nurtures us from our youth by his grace and love of mankind, always” and forthwith we begin the hundred and twenty-first psalm, “I was glad when they said to me, ‘Let us go into the house of the Lord’” (Ps. 121 [122]:1), and as we sing this [psalm], we come out of the refectory with the proper decorum and order and go to the narthex of the church and there, finishing off this psalm, we begin the trisagion and sing the ninth [hour]. After its completion, while the priest is offering the usual prayer, the aforementioned mutual forgiveness by the superior and the brotherhood again takes place, and we are dismissed to our cells.

43. (Concerning vespers)

The regulation of the church’s typikon shows quite clearly how the office of vespers ought to be performed. At the completion of [this office], after the trisagion, which is customarily said in the narthex, it is proper for the aforementioned mutual genuflections and forgiveness to take place.

44. (Concerning the compline and the [begging for] forgiveness)

[= (22) Evergetis [6], ed. lines 199–205]: After supper we ought to sing the compline, during which we must also genuflect whenever we are not celebrating a feast, and we call a feast the day when the psalm, “God [p. 23] is the Lord” (Ps. 117 [118]:27) is sung during the morning office. When the compline, too, has been sung and the superior has said the customary prayer, it is good for all the brothers, while they are standing up, to incline their ear to him when he kneels and says, “Forgive me, fathers and brothers, for I have sinned in deed and in word and in thought,” and granting him their forgiveness, to say, “May God forgive you, honorable father.” Then, each one of you must prostrate himself on the ground and ask a common forgiveness from the whole brotherhood, saying thus: “Forgive me, fathers and brothers, for I have sinned in deed, in word and in thought.” You must all pray for him who is lying prostrate and say, “May God save and forgive you.”

After all have asked for themselves this forgiveness and received it, it is appropriate for the ecclesiarch to say, “Pray, fathers, for our mighty and holy emperor, for our holy father, for those who enjoined us to pray for them, for our fathers and brothers who are absent, for those who sail the sea, for those who are being held in prisons, for those who are lying in sickness. Pray for and bless the founders; bless our fathers and brothers; bless our parents.” Then all together must answer, saying, “May God forgive and save them.” After this, having genuflected, all together must say to the superior, “Bless [us], pray [for us] and forgive us, holy father.” He says over you the customary prayer, “May God forgive and save you all.” As soon as he says this, all respond, “Amen,” and rise to accompany the father to the superior’s cell and, having received his counsel, they depart to their cells to carry out the night office, in accordance with the given regulation, and then full of gratitude and spiritual joy you should turn to sleep.

45. (Concerning the heavy semantra of the midnight office)

[cf. (22) Evergetis [6], ed. lines 213–21]: When both the lighter of the lamps and the disciplinary official have ascertained from the ecclesiarch the proper hour, they should go to the superior and, having received the customary blessing from him, the lighter of the lamps should depart in order to strike the heavy [semantron], while the disciplinary official, having said in a soft and gentle voice, “Bless [me], holy father, it is time for the midnight office,” should pass by the cells of the brothers and, saying in like manner at each [cell], “Bless [me], father, it is time for the midnight office,” [p. 24] he should awaken you for the service of the midnight office, while the lighter of the lamps strikes the heavy [semantron], in accordance with custom. Both [the disciplinary official] and the lighter of the lamps will [also], certainly, sing [the midnight office]. Thus, at the sound of the iron semantron, all will assemble in the church.

46. (Concerning the midnight office, how it ought to be sung)

When the priest has given the blessing, the midnight office is sung. After its completion, the superior cries out, “Pray for and bless our holy fathers; pray for me, too, the sinner, in order that I may be delivered from my passions and the snares of the evil one.” You, falling on your knees, answer, “God bless our holy fathers and may he forgive you, too, You yourself, too, pray for us, honorable father, in order that we may be delivered from our passions and the snares of the evil one.” The superior answers, “God forgive you all through the prayers of our holy fathers,” and you arise, answering, “Amen.”

47. (Concerning the big semantron and the trisagion of the emperor)

Having made an obeisance to the superior, the lighter of the lamps departs and sounds the big semantron, and thus we begin the trisagion for our mighty and holy emperor with troparia and an ektenes by the priest, [saying]: “Again we pray for our most pious and God-guarded emperors, their sovereign power, victory, permanence, peace, health and salvation, and that the Lord our God may further cooperate with them and make them prosper in all things and subject under their feet every enemy and foe.” [We say] twelve times, “Kyrie eleison.” Thus we begin the doxology of the morning office, which we must do in the following manner.

48. (Concerning the beginning of the six psalms)

[= (22) Evergetis [6], ed. lines 222–40]: After the striking of the big semantron praise should be ascribed to God by the priest who has the duty for the day, and he should at once make with the censer the sign of the venerable cross in front of the holy table and call out as follows, “Glory to the holy and consubstantial, indivisible, life-giving and unconfused Trinity always, now and always and for ever and ever.” After this, both the superior and the ecclesiarch reply “Amen” and should at once begin [to recite] “Glory be to God in the highest” [p. 25] followed by the six psalms, saying the words of the psalms in a low voice slowly and quietly so that all may then be able to recite them without error or stumbling. Then after the completion of the six psalms, the whole office of matins should next be celebrated just as the church’s [liturgical] typikon describes. This we must do whenever we sing the psalm, “God is the Lord,” (Ps. 117 [118:27] for if the day calls for the [singing of] “Alleluia,” we begin from the trisagion. Thus, then, will remain without alteration for all time the pattern of your daily office.

49. (Exhortation to the brothers concerning the office)

[= (32) Mamas [21], ed. lines 20–31]: But above all I entreat you, my spiritual fathers and brothers, that no one be absent from the ecclesiastical office either during the daytime and night time doxologies or during the vigils that are usually performed. For, if, in fact, anyone should be absent in consequence of sloth and negligence and not because of illness, which, of course can attract forgiveness, let such a person know that, if after a first and second and third admonition he abides in his sloth, he shall have in consequence as his just penalty the eating of dry food and the drinking of water only on the day on which this offense should be committed by him. Those, however, who perhaps are occupied with certain tasks or wrestle with bodily illnesses, as I have stated, shall not be subjected to the censure of this sort. For it is necessary to show consideration for the illnesses and the labors of men.

50. (Concerning the soul-saving confession).

[= (22) Evergetis [7], ed. lines 241–60]: We must also speak about soul-saving confession. Well then, the superior must enter the sacristy at each vigil at the time which he himself chooses for this, and leaving aside all work whatsoever and all the trouble of managing and directing, must take most diligent care to hear those who wish to make confession and set for each one the appropriate remedy. He is to be allowed, if perhaps he cannot act in person since the brotherhood [p. 26] is numerous, to authorize whichever of the priests he wishes, or even some of the more reverent brothers, (wearers of the great habit), to hear the thoughts of the more uneducated majority, the thoughts that trouble us day by day and hour by hour those which must always be easy to absolve and not have caused more deep-seated trouble, and to remit them and grant forgiveness. But the thoughts that require some healing and care must be referred to the superior by those who hear them, and he will produce the appropriate healing. So then, those who confess will conceal nothing from their [confessors], though perhaps hesitant if they know their thoughts need care, but they will uncover everything completely to their confessor.

51. (Concerning the fact that the brothers are to hasten to confession)

[= (22) Evergetis [7], ed. lines 261–87]: Also it is right that we should tell them what is expected of them. So then you, my brothers, seeing the superior hurrying off to this good ministry which is very beneficial to your souls, you should run, and running reach with eagerness this very calm harbor that is safe for your souls, and reveal completely without any covering up every stirring of your mind and every thought that harms your soul, as though you are making your confession in the presence of God and not a man. But the one who sets out to lie to God will always get his punishment. For the psalmist says “Thou wilt destroy all that speak falsehood” (Ps. 5:6). So then, by confessing without deceit and ridding your minds of all wrangling, all impurity, all confusion and trouble, you may be happy and rejoice, having gained this good hope namely that you will not fail to gain salvation. But make your confession without accusing each other when perhaps a violent dispute or some other argument occurs. Do not make your confession if you consider yourselves blameless and you are looking really for condemnations, nor should you speak about the bodily needs which afflict you. For there is always a time for them but this is a time for making confession of faults and obtaining healing for spiritual passions. If you must speak of some violent dispute, be keen to ascribe and assign to yourselves all the blame and reason for the fault, whatever it is. But if you speak about some other passions, reveal these completely so that you can gain double benefit from this, by both attaining sound health of soul and clothing yourself in exalting humility, for possessing this we will assuredly be like God who says, “Learn from me that I am gentle and lowly in heart” (Matt. 11:29). What else would be a clearer proof of gentleness and humility in heart than clearly to bear all affliction nobly and blame oneself in everything? [p. 27] The true confession without which I do not think anyone gains salvation is the cause of so many good things.

52. (Penalty for those who do not confess)

